But this theory, like the entire doctrine of secondary sex characters, stands upon a doubtful basis. It has grown up out of a comparison of men and women in very unequal situations. The bodies of men and women whose field of work and type of occupation differ widely have been compared. The man attends to the extra-domestic activities, while the woman is chiefly occupied at home. Bachofen writes: "If a man sits at a spinning-wheel a weakening of body and of soul will inevitably follow." Certain of the physical differences between men and women may therefore be sociologically determined rather than due to inborn differences.

One may object that the division of labor between the sexes, in which the woman takes the domestic and the man the extra-domestic sphere, is itself determined by inborn sex differences. Even in Socrates's time it was believed that the nature of the sexes fixed their fields of activity. Man was unquestionably intended for matters which must be attended to outside the house, "while the weak and timid woman was by divine order assigned to the inner work of the home." After thorough investigation it appears that this hoary theory, which still persists, is false. The division of labor between man and woman corresponds not to an innate difference but to their power-relation. If man dominates he says that woman's place is the home, and that work outside the home is fit only for men. If woman is dominant then she has the opposite opinion, takes care of business outside the home, and leaves the man to take care of the family and the housekeeping. Today man is dominant, but there have been many peoples among whom woman was dominant and the role of man and woman was the reverse of that common today. In ancient Egypt there was a period when women ruled. Herodotus reports that they unnaturally performed "masculine" activities, carried on commerce in the market-place, while the men stayed at home, sewed, and attended to domestic difficulties. Among the Kamchadales the men, in the days of female dominance, were such complete housewives that they cooked, sewed, washed, and were never allowed to stay away from home for more than a day. Similarly among the Lapps there was a period when the men did the housework while the women fished and sailed the sea. Under such circumstances the men also took care of the children.

When one sex is dominant there is always a division of labor. This differentiation of occupation is one of the chief causes of certain differences in physical form between men and women. It changes the fundamental conditions of development—among others the course of the inner secretions. Where man rules he does the active outside work and is accordingly larger and stronger; where woman rules and does the same "man's work" her body assumes what are today regarded as typically male proportions, whereas the man develops what we call feminine characteristics. We have a few definite proofs of this from states dominated by women. When women ruled among the Gauls, working outside the home, we are told by Strabo that the female was larger and stronger. Among the Orombies on the Congo women were in power and did all the hard work. Ellis says they were stronger and better developed than the men. The same was true of the Wateita in East Africa. Fritsch and Hellwald report the woman larger among the Bushmen. The Spartan women in the days of their rule had a reputation for enormous strength. Aristophanes says that a Spartan woman could strangle an ox bare-handed. The Egyptian women at the height of their power were called by their neighbors the "lionesses of the Nile," and they seemed to like the name.

Thus through legend and the records of travelers we have clear testimony that man is not larger and stronger than woman because of innate differences, as is generally supposed, but that physical superiority is a characteristic of the dominant sex, whether it be male or female.

Similarly those secondary physical characteristics which are today regarded as female are found among males when they occupy the subordinate position in which woman lives today. Woman is inclined today to full, rounded curves and even to stoutness. Among the Celts the woman dominated, and according to Strabo the men of that people were inclined to be fat and heavy-paunched. The same was true of the Kamchadales in the days of woman rule. The men were strikingly voluptuous and well rounded. The male Eskimos too were inclined to fatness in the days when they did the housekeeping—the more subordinate the fatter. In this the Oriental women are typical; their exuberance of figure is as well known as their absolute subordination and their confinement to the home. They may be contrasted with the fat, subordinate male Kamchadales, whose wives were slim and firm-breasted into old age.

Equal rights do away with this division of labor. There are no longer male and female jobs; not sex but inclination and fitness begin to determine the individual's occupation. In late Egypt, when the domination of woman was merging into a period of equal rights, there are many indications that both sexes did the same work without any differentiation of occupation. In the marriage contract in the time of Darius, the woman—who then made the contract alone—says "All, which you and I may together earn. . . ." Victor Marx has studied the position of woman in Babylon in the period 604-485 B.C., and finds a similar situation.

Today, when we are passing from male domination to equal rights it is natural that the woman should be seeking more and more to get out of the home. The greater her power the more she seeks to level the lines between male and female work. This effort is strongest in the subordinate sex—in this case the feminine—because it naturally seeks to better its position. In this transition period, therefore, women are pressing into male pursuits much faster than men into domestic occupations. Yet even in Germany a beginning has been made. For women the male professions seem higher and better, because they have hitherto belonged to the dominant sex, while for the men feminine occupations seem to have about them something degrading; but the more women approach equality the less odium attaches to what has been their sphere, and the more men tend to enter it.

The same phenomenon may be observed in periods of transition from female to male domination. Among the Batta, for instance, both sexes worked in the fields, but the men alone cared for the children. This was obviously a step toward equal rights. The men already shared the extra-domestic occupations of the women, but the women still refused to share the work of the hitherto subordinate men.

Every age holds its own standards absolute. The domination of one sex depends upon the artificial development of as many and as striking bodily differences as possible, and therefore approves them and insists upon emphasizing them. Equal rights tend to develop the natural similarity of the sexes and considering that the norm, regard it as ideal.

There is ample opportunity to observe today that equality of the sexes coincides with a tendency slowly to do away with artificial physical differences. The disappearance of the so-called feminine figure was so striking in America, where the sexes are more nearly equal than in Europe, that Sargent and Alexander prophesied in 1910 that soon men and women could hardly be distinguished from one another. A comparison with pictures of thirty or forty years ago makes it plain that even in Europe male and female figures are coming closer to each other. The narrow waists and full bosoms of the women have disappeared. Men are shaving their beards. And, as a result of our investigation, we may prophesy that the coming equality will iron out still more completely those differences which hitherto have been regarded as genuine secondary sex characters.

Whenever one sex is dominant there is a tendency to differentiate male and female costume. The more completely one sex dominates the greater will be the differences in clothes, and as the sexes become equal the differences disappear. When the two sexes are really equal they will wear the same clothing.

The clothing of the dominant sex usually tends to be uniform and tasteless, that of the subordinate to be varied and richly ornamented. Today man is still dominant, and his clothes are monotonous, dull, and less subject to shifts of fashion. Especially in formal dress he wears a sort of uniform. All men, of whatever age or position, wear dress clothes of the same cut and color. A grandfather wears a dinner coat exactly like that of his eighteen-year-old grandson. This seems natural, but the situation is reversed with the subordinate sex, most completely when the subordination is most complete. Only twenty or thirty years ago it was a crime in Germany for a mother to dress as "youthfully" as her unmarried daughter. A grandmother who dared to dress like her eighteen-year-old granddaughter would have been laughed to scorn. As woman's power has grown this has changed. Custom no longer requires a grandmother to emphasize her age by her clothes.

Where woman dominates she tends to wear darker and plainer clothing and the man dresses himself more richly and variously. Erman writes of the old Egyptians:

> While according to our conceptions it befits the woman to love finery and ornament, the Egyptians of the old empire seem to have had an opposite opinion. Beside the elaborate costumes of the men the women's clothing seems very monotonous, for, from the Fourth to the Eighteenth Dynasty, all, from the king's daughter to the peasant woman, wore the same garb—a simple garment without folds.

Herodotus, indeed, reported that Egyptian men had two suits, women only one. Erman naturally cannot explain the simplicity of the women's clothes and the eagerness of the men for color and ornament, because it contradicted current theories of the character of the two sexes. Today the view is current which Runge expressed when he said that "Women's desire to please and love of ornament is dependent upon her sex life." This view, though still common, is fundamentally false. The inclination to bright and ornamental clothing is dependent not upon sex but upon the power-relation of the sexes. The subordinate sex, whether male or female, seeks ornament. Strabo tells of the love of finery and cult of the body among Lybian men. They curled their hair, even their beards, wore gold ornaments, diligently brushed their teeth and polished their fingernails. "They arrange their hair so tenderly," he writes, "that when walking they never touch one another in order not to disturb it." It is usual in states where women are dominant for the men to wear long hair and pay particular attention to their barbering. The men of Tana, in the Hebrides, wore their hair 18 to 20 inches long, divided into six or seven hundred tiny locks, in the days when women ruled.

The stronger tendency of the subordinate sex to ornamentation apparently is closely related to the division of labor. The subordinate sex, working at home, has more leisure and opportunity for ornament than the dominant. Furthermore, leisure stimulates the erotic feelings. Since the partner does not share the leisure the lonely erotic often seeks a way out in self-ornamentation.

When the sexes are equal the clothes of the two sexes tend to be alike. We have noted that the Cingalese were physically similar; their clothes were exactly the same. The only difference was that the men wore a mother-of-pearl comb in the hair, the women none. Among the Lepka the sexes can be distinguished only by the fact that the men wear their hair in two braids, the women in one. Tacitus reports that the old Germans wore the same clothes and wore their hair alike.

We can observe the tendency to similarity of costume in this transition period. More than a decade ago Paris attempted to establish a fashion for women of knickerbockers and bobbed hair. The attempt failed, but today the bobbed head has invaded every civilized country, almost in direct proportion to the degree in which women have acquired equal rights. It is reported from England that English women can already go to their work in knickers, heavy shoes, and short hair without exciting any attention. In Germany the police forbid one sex to wear the clothes of the other, but during the war when German women had to enter male trades they usually wore men's clothing.

Among men, too, the tendency to similarity is evident. Thirty years ago the beard was a generally accepted sign of manhood; it has fallen out of fashion. In the Youth Movement there is a tendency to leave the shirt open at the neck and to adopt a hair-cut like a bobbed girl's. A note in Jean Paul's "Levana," which appeared in 1806, is interesting. He writes: "A few years ago it was fashionable in Russia for the men to fill out their clothing with high false bosoms." That was in the days following the French Revolution, when a short wave of freedom, even for women, swept across the earth.

What Your Child Learns

By MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS and MALCOLM M. WILLEY

IT is the willingness of children to swallow without question any potion of knowledge received from their elders that makes the problem of elementary and secondary education so interesting. With the vast majority of the children of this country finishing their formal schooling by the age of fifteen, it is important to consider what sort of educational nourishment is poured into their intellectual stomachs. What is learned in the formative years is rarely unlearned; and it is a realization of this fact that impels the champions of all sorts of causes to try to put their ideas into the curriculum of both grammar and high schools. History, for example, has become a process of propaganda and myth-making. And the process of intellectual adulteration is spreading. This is particularly apparent when one picks up books that deal with subjects such as government, economics, "Americanization," and "citizenship." The teaching of social sciences, usually under the name of "civics," is rapidly undergoing changes in the upper grades and high schools. The old anatomical study of government, with a memorizing of the departments and their functions and duties, is giving way to the study of social problems: the race problem, the labor problem, the immigration problem, and many others. But with the disappearance of the old formalism this new civics brings in dynamic ideas; and sometimes ideas are dangerous.

What sort of material is included in these courses? An answer to this question, as well as rather striking circumstantial evidence of the domination of conservative beliefs over the minds of those who control the material presented in elementary- and secondary-school education, is found in three very recent textbooks which have been issued to meet the varying requirements in these social-science courses. The first of these volumes, "Actual Democracy: The Problems of America," by Margaret K. Berry and Samuel B. Howe, two members of the Newark, New Jersey, school system, is intended for the consumption of high-school students. In issuing it the authors "acknowledge their indebtedness" to a syllabus, "Problems of Actual Democracy," prepared by the commissioner of education of that State. At the end of each chapter there are topics for discussion. Thus, after the chapter on The Problem of Private Property the student is asked to "show that private property and democracy are inseparable." If he has read his assignment he should have no difficulty in doing this, for all of the virtues of the institution are explained to him. The subject is summed up on page 63:

> Private property is one of the fundamental institutions of American democracy. It is an unmistakable index of social progress. It originated because of social reasons; it has grown under continual subjection to the social sanction. It is the basis on which our whole social order has been built up. It cannot be destroyed without destroying also the ideals of liberty and democracy in which Americans believe.

It is obvious that in an actual democracy based on the principles enunciated above one must know how to think "properly" upon the subject of unionism. The authors of this illuminating work have consequently included material which will help all New Jersey boys and girls to form an opinion of the various workers' movements in this country. More than that, they have established the relation of the unions to the institution of private property, which, as has been shown, is the corner-stone of democracy. Thus:

> There are several types of unionism in this country. First, we have what we may call "business unionism," which is trade conscious but not class conscious. It is essentially a bargaining and a conservative institution: an example is the Railway Brotherhood. Second is the "friendly or uplift union," which may be either trade or class conscious, is conservative, and favors collective bargaining and profit-sharing. An example of this form of unionism was the society known as the Knights of Labor, which at one time had a large and influential membership. The third type may be called "predatory unionism." It is secret, either radical or conservative, class or trade conscious, and has two wings: "hold-up" unionism, the corrupt type recently exposed in our great cities; and "guerrilla unionism," which never combines with employers, but engages in a secret and violent warfare with capital. There is also, unfortunately, a fourth and more objectionable type of unionism which calls itself "revolutionary unionism." It may be either socialistic, as was the Western Federation of Miners, or anarchistic, like the Industrial Workers of the World. It is class, not trade, conscious and antagonistic to the wage and other systems of society. This unionism does not, as a rule, care for the rights of the employers, and is disposed to believe in the policy of sabotage, which varies all the way from actual destruction of property to mere slacking on the job (pp. 73-74).

And having digested some twenty pages of this sort of thing, the question at the end of the chapter, Would a Labor Party in the United States Be un-American? will undoubtedly call forth answers satisfactory to the members of the State Legislature of New Jersey.

In an age of Klansmen, hundred-per cent patriots, and determined Nordics the "menace of immigration" naturally looms large. New Jersey students are helped to a proper appreciation of the "menace to America of a large, unassimilated population" by this harrowing experience undergone by the authors of the text:

> There is no doubt that there has been a tremendous increase in criminal thought and action affecting the political sphere in recent years which has been fomented by radical foreigners. In the early spring of 1919 the authors attended a socialistic mass meeting in New York City and saw thousands of foreign faces glow with approval and with the lust for cruel action, as speaker after speaker denounced the government of the United States and by inference justified acts of violence against it (pp. 167-168).

After showing that "there are three times as many foreign-born as native paupers" who enjoy the opportunities of our land, and other similar "facts," they conclude that the immigration situation > has rendered necessary a profound change in the very structure of our government. In order to control the turbulent non-American elements, we have been compelled to modify many of our earlier democratic ideals and to adopt centralization of authority, which is far different in spirit from American traditions (p. 169).

And more than that, another effect of immigration > has been the growth of radical theories of government, so that today American democracy is facing a life-and-death struggle with Marxian socialism (p. 169).

The volume on the Constitution ("The Common Sense of the Constitution of the United States"), by A. T. Southworth, has the merit of greater subtlety. This book interprets for high-school students the meaning of that justly famous document clause by clause. The comments on the first ten amendments, and especially on the First Amendment, give the measure of the value of the whole commentary. There are few men who can look the First Amendment square in the eye and not flinch. Mr. Southworth is not numbered among that few:

> This amendment also guarantees the right of free speech. There can, of course, be no such thing as absolute free speech. The only persons who say exactly what they think every minute of the day are babies and fools. If a person is in church, at a meeting, or in any public place he will hardly say aloud every thought that passes through his head. There is reason in all things, and on general principles a person may say in this country anything that he pleases, provided what he says is not libelous or slanderous, or contrary to the public morals; and provided that he does not advocate the overthrow of the government by force. In this country, where we have a government, not of men but of laws, it is not reasonable that any one should preach the overthrow of the government by force. If B says, "Murder A, throw him out of office, and let me rule," then it is perfectly logical for C to advocate the murder of B after B has set himself up as ruler. This is anarchy.

Thus to the high-school student murder is made to seem the kernel of anarchy, but the way in which the notion of violence and crime are connected with a definite theory of society to create these false associations in the minds of the students is doubtless more obvious to the adult observer than to the young pupil.

The third volume, a "Text-Book in Citizenship," by R. O. Hughes, who incidentally is a teacher in a Pittsburgh high school, is perhaps most ingenuous of all. This book is profusely illustrated. The striking thing about the illustrations is that so many of them are printed "by courtesy." By courtesy of whom is worth noticing. The list includes the Carnegie Steel Company, the Union Switch and Signal Company, the Portland Cement Association, the International Harvester Company, Swift & Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the American Steel and Wire Company, the United States Steel Company, the Illinois Steel Company, the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company, the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company, the Westinghouse Electric Company, and others of like origin. And it is not pictures of blast furnaces with sweating men that are contributed by these concerns. Instead, we have pictures of company Americanization schools, corporation flag-raising exercises and Christmas trees; pictures of Alabama school-children at tooth-brush drill (this by the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company); factory gardens; highways "before and after" being paved with Portland cement; company employees who hold stock; model factory buildings; "better houses for workers" (in the Carnegie plant); and, the gem of them all, a group of twenty-four elderly men who, having labored thirty-five years each in the employ of the Carnegie Steel Company, are posed at the annual picnic given to the employees as a reward for services rendered! The frank purpose of this method of instruction is well demonstrated by the picture, An example of Public Welfare Work by a Great Corporation, which shows a newsboy drinking at a fountain into the stone-work of which is engraved in letters so large that even a child with defective vision can read: National Tube Co. Public Fountain. And in the chapter on churches is the picture of a "community church." The caption reads: "John D. Rockefeller often attends this church, which is situated near his home in Pocantico Hills, New York. He sometimes lets photographers take his picture on such occasions, if they will attend services first."

But it is not only the pictures. On page 470 begins a section, Employers of the Right Sort. One reads: "The United States Steel Company reserves shares of stock which the employees may buy and so acquire a financial interest in the business." And Mary and Johnnie, preparing their lesson, write into their notebooks: "Employers of the right sort—United States Steel Company." Or if we turn to the discussions of the I. W. W. and the philosophy of direct action, we find (page 510): "It is hard to see how a right-thinking American can possibly indulge in such performances or hold such theories. A decent man finds it difficult to sympathize with even oppressed people who use any such means to have their grievances corrected." Then there is the paragraph about Lenin and Trotzky, "two able and unscrupulous leaders," and the anarchists, whom "no civilized people can tolerate," and all the rest. But enough has been said to give the general point of view of the author, and the material which might be quoted would merely be repetitious—there are some 750 pages of it.

When we consider such quotations as these from books written to teach the growing generation facts about their government and about the problems of our day, it is hard to look upon them as anything but evidence in support of the charge so often made that control is being deliberately exercised by interested parties over what is taught in the public schools. And yet, one hesitates to admit that the control is as direct and calculated as would appear. May it not be that the persons who write such textbooks are themselves seeing through the eyes of a reactionary press and the hysteria of the mob? Or are they, perhaps, responding unconsciously to very consciously directed propaganda? These three suggestions, it must be admitted, sound like conundrums. But the effect on American education is disastrous in any case.

Liberalism in the Colleges

By PAUL BLANSHARD

PROBABLY no section of America is more victimized by undiscriminating generalizations than the college community. A peculiarly vicious murder is contrived by two young college graduates and editorial writers lay the murder at the door of "too much education." A sophomore girl runs away with a station master after a fox trot and this proves the shallowness of college training. A college president turns out the lights on a radical lecturer and establishes the fact that free speech in our colleges is crushed by capitalism. A few courageous Methodists confess their Christian pacifism and lo, our colleges have become centers of bolshevism and treason.

Liberals who have experienced in their own youth the regimentation of the college have also been guilty of too many generalizations about our colleges. Remembering their own docility, they have looked for a sign of rebellion in the newer generation and, because they have seen no dramatic uprising, they have concluded that no "youth movement" exists in America, that the colleges are continuing to create a stronger bulwark for ancient oppressions. The conclusion is only half true. There is no organized youth movement in this country, but the colleges are in the process of profound and significant changes which cannot be described by a headline or a label. They are not "news." They cannot be summarized in a sentence any more than Einstein can be put into a cartoon.

What is taking place in American colleges is the preliminary part of a youth movement—the negative part. It is most noticeable in the changing attitude of the more brilliant and serious students. The earmark of the able college student fifteen years ago was receptivity in the classroom, loyalty to "great ideas." The earmark of the able college student today is, more and more, cynicism, irony. He is not to be fooled by anybody. He is a wise bird. The illusions of his father have less and less meaning for him. His professors hold ascendancy only if they do not take themselves too seriously. The novels which held honorable place on the desk of the older student generation have given place to "Babbitt" and "Janet March" and "Gargoyles." The successor to the young man who went "fussing" to a girls' seminary once a week now sits out the dances with a bobbed-haired co-ed who discusses quite uncoyly the damnations of monogamy.

Not that the college student of our time is "immoral." I have found no particular evidences of lost chastity. The student of our generation is simply more sophisticated: he knows why he is moral or immoral. His morality is more nearly virtue than innocence: his immorality is worn as a mantle of righteousness. Most of the old hypocrisy is gone. He is becoming aware that the older generation has failed and that accepted standards are not necessarily just standards. He clings only to faith in his inimitable self.

There is no better example of the changing attitude of college students toward life than the transformation of the college religious agencies, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., and the Student Volunteer Movement. Until a few years ago the propaganda of these agencies was purely romantic. The Student Volunteer Movement sent gullible young dreamers to Asia and Africa, armed with a story and hymnbook to save the heathen. The Y. M. C. A. told students that success in life comes to the good boy. Today the Y. M. C. A. on many of our campuses has become the active center of realistic thought concerning social and industrial problems. The Student Volunteer Movement has experienced an upheaval of progressive thought from within which made the Indianapolis convention of last January a source of ferment in scores of colleges. Its effect was not to send missionaries to Asia to save the heathen but to send back to the colleges several thousand earnest young men and women asking the question, "Has a nation which is saturated with national provincialism, commercial greed, and race prejudice any right to preach anything to the world?"

Social radicalism is spreading most rapidly in our theological seminaries and girls' colleges, notably in the former. The theological student of the last generation seriously discussed Bushnell's theory of the atonement. The theological student of today is not really a theological student at all: if he discusses theology it is apologetically, mildly, indifferently, pointing out that dogmas are not important anyway. He is a humanist using Christianity as an illustration; he has abandoned the magic formulas of salvation and is groping for something to preach about. He must preach 52 or perhaps 104 sermons a year. He cannot talk about heaven and hell because he is no longer certain about hell. He cannot quote Greek texts because pulpit pedantry cannot compete with the movies. He is beginning to talk about poverty and war and industrial injustice, not as side issues but as major concerns of the church. He is trying to make Christianity into a serious religion and his efforts may surprise all the skeptics and cynics by resurrecting some dead churches into living social forces.

About the girls' colleges, Mr. Coolidge was right. A great many dangerous thoughts are going on in them. The college woman has no Rotary Club to look forward to. She is part of a subject economic class. She has a suspended maternal instinct. She reads modern novels. The combination is a threatening one. Whether you go to Vassar or Wellesley or Mills College, California, you will find many of the most influential of the girls questioning, attacking, ridiculing the conventional standards in industry, politics, and the home. That may be due partly to the fact that the girls' colleges spend less time on football; and then the ballot has been taken seriously by a number of women.

A study of the control of American universities in relation to their liberalism yields astonishing results. The assumption is general that a private institution controlled by trustee business men is likely to be more reactionary than public institutions, especially in semi-radical States like Minnesota and North Dakota. The reverse is sometimes the case. Dartmouth is an illustration.

Dartmouth is today one of the outstanding examples of liberalism in college administration. Its president, Ernest Martin Hopkins, has repeatedly taken a militant stand in behalf of free speech. "If turning handsprings on top of the college gymnasium would teach men to think," he told me, "I would be perfectly willing to do it." When William Z. Foster was invited by the Dartmouth Round Table to speak on the left-wing movement of labor, President Hopkins said: "Personally I am opposed to Foster. I think that he has not used his influence and power wisely and has sometimes misled his followers, but the students can hear him in a college hall if they wish provided they raise the money to bring him to Dartmouth without my cooperation."

In a number of ways Dartmouth is injecting a new spirit into the classroom. Students in its labor-problems classes are not compelled to listen exclusively to one professor summing up all "sides" of the industrial struggle in a fruitless attempt to be impartial. They have had the opportunity of listening during the past two years to such speakers as James A. Emery, counsel for the National Association of Manufacturers; Matthew Woll of the American Federation of Labor, Julia O'Connor of the telephone workers of Boston, Robert Amory, president of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers; John L. Barry, president of the New Hampshire Federation of Labor; J. Eads Howe, and many other leaders in industrial struggles. In the compulsory course for freshmen the students are plunged into the middle of the controversies concerning the Negro problem, disarmament, socialism, and the League of Nations by readings from current periodicals and newspapers. Here again the effort is to place before the students cross-sections of the world as it actually is, a world of biased judgments and inflamed prejudices.

Although Dartmouth is by no means a radical institution (it has no avowed Socialists on its faculty), its policy is so much more progressive than that of institutions like Michigan and Pennsylvania that the outsider is likely to ascribe the policy to an unusual board of trustees. As a matter of fact the list of Dartmouth trustees reads like a page from "The Goose Step": Lewis Parkhurst, treasurer of Ginn and Co.; Henry B. Thayer, president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Co.; Albert O. Brown of the Amoskeag Savings Bank; Prof. John K. Lord, former professor of Latin; Dr. John M. Gile, surgeon; Henry L. Moore, retired treasurer of the Minnesota Loan and Trust Co.; Harry H. Blunt, treasurer of the Wonalancet Co.; Clarence B. Little, president of the First National Bank of Bismarck, North Dakota; Fred H. Howland, president of the National Life Insurance Co.; ex-Gov. Fred H. Brown, and Charles G. Du Bois, president of the Western Electric Co. That such a board of trustees can control a genuinely progressive educational institution is proof that no generalization about capitalist control of our universities can explain all the reaction and suppression.

Business-men rulers do not necessarily make a college reactionary. Much of the regimentation and conservatism of our American colleges is the product of the inertia and dulness of the hinterland in which the colleges are situated. The college must be a part of its environment. There are hundreds of the younger generation of professors who are leading their students toward progressive and honest thinking as fast as the mental background of the community will permit. This is notably true of the sociology professors who are leavening the conservative mass as fast as their more cautious colleagues in economics will permit. They cannot be expected to do more until the hinterland shows signs of transformation.

The progressives within the colleges have received little help from the labor movement, whereas our business interests have been often quick to reward the professorial apostle of reaction. The American Federation of Labor could create within ten years a very real change in the attitude of the college community toward the problems of the working class if it sent some of its best leaders to spend their whole time in presenting labor's point of view to the colleges. The success of the League for Industrial Democracy in reaching 50,000 students this year with its speakers and in getting several thousand to affiliate and read treatises on industrial problems is an indication of what might be done if progressive groups applied themselves to the problem of enlightening the college student. In spite of a growing sophistication about many things most of the college students of America have never heard a labor speech and probably never will. They have only the most grotesque notion of the meaning of socialism and many of them do not know what a pacifist really is. Their old idols are pretty thoroughly smashed, but new ideals of peace and industrial justice have not yet taken their place.

All things considered, the 700,000 college students in this country are amazingly neglected by the people who ought to have most hope in the next generation, the believers in a new social order. There are plenty of people from outside who are bothering the college students and professors, but their motives are either professional or commercial. There are the professors' associations helping the teachers to "get on"; there are the agents of the publishing houses and the persons snooping for honorary degrees and the legislators seeking some excuse to cut the tax appropriation. But where are the people who seek to enlist youth to fight in behalf of human ideals? We are a generation behind Europe in the use of the latent idealism of youth in behalf of social reconstruction.

The struggle for progressive ideals in the colleges during the next few years is likely to center about war and military training. In reflection and discussion about war many liberal clubs affiliated to the National Student Forum and the League for Industrial Democracy have found tremendous interest, not only in war itself but in the economic causes of war. The issue of war is dramatic and easily understood. It is brought home to the students of many of our largest institutions by compulsory military training on the campus. The yoke is bearing down heavily upon those agricultural schools which received land grants from the federal government on condition that they impose military training upon their students. It is one of the sorest spots in our college life. Campuses are dominated by the swaggering captain of the drill; students who hate militarism and all its appearances are forced to go through the motions of killing men.

"Now, fellahs," said the leader of the bayonet drill at Kansas State Agricultural College one night last spring as he stood in front of a line of rookies, "now, fellahs, remember when you run the bayonet through their guts, grunt a little and look fierce. It is not only what you do that counts but how you feel and look."

Could liberalism find a better issue than this for the next step in our colleges: the elimination of compulsory military training from those institutions which should be leading America away from war?

La Follette and Standard Oil

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

WITH La Follette concentrating on "the trusts" and making the trusts the bull's-eye for his most vehement rhetoric, the question arises: If the rhetoric came to be transmuted into action by La Follette in the White House, what would the action be, precisely, and in detail?

The answer to that question can be competently illustrated by the recommendations which Mr. La Follette made as chairman of the Senate's Committee on Manufactures last year regarding the petroleum industry.

Those recommendations can give but cold comfort to people who like to make out that Mr. La Follette would take a large hammer and smash everything to small bits. They refute the contention that Mr. La Follette would be "extreme" and "destructive." In fact, on analysis, they induce the view that Mr. La Follette would proceed inch by cautious inch and, instead of cramping the energies of business, would strive to release and expand them.

Mr. La Follette's recommendations regarding the petroleum industry grew out of some fifteen hundred pages of testimony regarding conditions in the industry—testimony from producers, transporters, refiners, distributors. Mr. La Follette came to the conclusion that the petroleum industry is dominated and essentially controlled by the so-called "Standard" companies. In other words, he saw himself confronted by a "trust." He thereupon made eight recommendations, which can be analyzed down into five.

The first noteworthy thing about these five recommendations is that not one of them is to the effect that the Standard Oil Company of Indiana or any other Standard company or any company whatsoever in the petroleum industry should be smashed and made smaller. Not once in the course of these five recommendations does Mr. La Follette suggest that any existing unit in the petroleum industry should be artificially governmentally contracted. The necessary conclusion from this fact is that if the Standard Oil Company of Indiana can legitimately grow to be even larger than it is now it would encounter no opposition from Mr. La Follette as President.

Mr. La Follette, however, does suggest five courses of action for the Government to pursue for the purpose of establishing what he believes to be fairer and freer conditions in the petroleum industry.

The first is that all companies in the industry shall be obliged to instal a uniform system of bookkeeping and shall be obliged to make reports to the Government showing their production, their storage, their costs, their prices, and other pertinent data, which the Government thereupn shall assemble and arrange in such a manner that at all times the full facts regarding the petroleum industry may be available to persons in the industry and the consuming public. This suggestion amounts to the proposition that petroleum companies shall send to the Government the sort of self-revealing data that all railroad companies now send to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It amounts to the proposition that petroleum is affected with a public interest and that petroleum companies should to a certain degree be obliged to behave as public utilities.

The second suggestion is that petroleum pipe-lines, engaged in pumping petroleum from place to place, shall be obliged to behave as common carriers and shall be obliged to have receiving stations and delivery stations wherever reasonably demanded. This suggestion amounts to the proposition that the present transportation law, which declares pipe-lines to be common carriers, shall be put into actual practical effective operation.

The third suggestion is that railroad freight rates upon petroleum products between certain points shall be sufficiently reduced to enable independent mid-continent petroleum companies to reach the Central and Eastern States in competition with the Standard companies.

The fourth suggestion is that exports of petroleum and of petroleum products from this country should be restricted in order to prevent the unduly rapid exhaustion of our domestic petroleum supply.

The fifth suggestion is that where oil companies have engaged in "price manipulations" and where they have engaged in restraint of trade through artificial divisions of marketing territory and where they have artificially limited production through alleged conspiracies based on the so-called "cracking process" patents, the Department of Justice should proceed against them.

This suggestion amounts to the proposition that the Sherman law, which is a law, even as the Volstead law is a law, should be enforced.

Is it possible to say that any one of these five suggestions is "destructive"?

The fifth of them—regarding the importance of the Sherman law—commended itself to that sane and reasonable man, our former Attorney General, Harry M. Daugherty, and it has equally commended itself to our present Attorney General, Harlan F. Stone, who is not a La Follette.

After a study of Mr. La Follette's fifth suggestion—a study begun under Mr. Daugherty and concluded under Mr. Stone—the Department of Justice has brought suit against the Standard Oil Company of Indiana and other petroleum companies to break up an alleged conspiracy limiting petroleum production through the so-called "cracking process" patents. The Department of Justice has also taken up the matter of marketing-territory divisions maintained by the so-called Standard companies and has begun to explore the possibility of an action which might break down the lines of those divisions. It finally has entered into a widespread inquiry, in collaboration with the chief legal officers of various State governments, regarding alleged price manipulations and conspiracies by numerous petroleum companies.

Mr. La Follette's allegations and recommendations, in so far as they affect the Department of Justice, have not been scorned by the Department of Justice but on the contrary have been closely studied and largely followed by it.

It is further to be noted that all of Mr. La Follette's recommendations were accepted and signed by his fellow-committee-members Senator McNary of Oregon, Senator Smith of South Carolina, and Senator Jones of New Mexico, none of whom bears the reputation of being an enemy of business.

That petroleum companies should make reports of their operations to the Government; that pipe-lines should be common carriers in fact as well as in theory; that there should be certain reductions of railroad freight rates; that exports of petroleum should be limited; that illegal conspiracies between petroleum companies should be checked—can any sane man, even if he disagrees with these suggestions, see anything in them justifying wild talk about Mr. La Follette and "Russia"? In fact, must not any sane man admit that these suggestions proceed inch by inch cautiously and not in seven-league boots recklessly?

The sum of it is that Mr. La Follette would not take a hammer and pound the big petroleum companies into small petroleum companies but would establish "free" and "fair" conditions, as he regards them, whereupon, in his belief, in his own words, "the independent operators would be able to restore and maintain healthy competition" in the industry.

That is the sum of La Follette as a trust-buster in action. He is not the enemy of the American idea in business. He is the candidate who gives most thought, whether with success or without success, to the progressive means by which the American idea in business can be continuously restored and maintained.

In the Driftway

IF men ever adopt a more sensible and comfortable dress—and heaven knows they need it, especially in summer—the change will probably be made at the behest of women. Hence the Drifter is glad to see that a woman, Madge Blair Barnwell, has started a crusade to induce men to go without their coats in summer. She writes in the New York Herald Tribune:

> I appeal to the common sense of every man to rebel against the slavery of a senseless custom and discard the coat and vest in summer. To wear the coat in hot weather is a wrong conception of propriety. The lists of prostrations and deaths from heat in summer show men are the victims and seldom women. It is because women do not wear winter clothes in summer.
>
> Is not man as decently dressed in his neat shirt as his mother, sister, wife, and daughter are decently dressed in their shirt-waists? Yet men are so modest that if a woman in low neck and short sleeves enters a man's office and finds him in legitimate comfort in his shirt-sleeves, he will apologize, hurry out, and put on a wool coat when the temperature is 95.

* * * * *

MRS. BARNWELL advocates simply the elimination of the coat in summer, but if the sentiment against appearing in a shirt only is too strong, she suggests a substitute.

> The shirt is a neat, jaunty, and becoming garment, but if a groundless prejudice requires it to be hidden, let us try a different garment, or revive a sensible old one.
>
> The blouse was originally a man's garment; women assumed it and men dropped it. Women are now assuming trousers; we hope the men will drop these, too, feeling they are becoming too effeminate, and adopt the picturesque and comfortable knee breeches, which should be of linen or cotton with silk or cotton hose.
>
> Men should wear blouses made of lawn, voile, silk, dimity, organdie, etc., with low sailor or round collars. "Collars are choking strips which men wilt while laughing at the foolish clothes that women wear." These blouses should be recognized as appropriate for any occasion in hot weather, from the office to the most formal social function. . . .

* * * * *

THE Drifter thinks that some progress has been made already toward more sensible summer clothing for men. A number of years ago a man was not regarded as well dressed in New York City unless he wore a wool suit. Now custom permits palm beach, mohair, linen, and various other light and porous fabrics, although many men are too stupid to take advantage of them. Mrs. Barnwell may not know that a good many summers ago there was a definite attempt on the part of men in New York City—all of whom were then stifling in wool—to go without their coats. It became a fad, and might have stuck except for opposition. The elegant and the would-be elegant restaurants protested, and at least one fashionable hotel announced that men without coats would not be permitted in its dining-room. This should have encouraged the practice, as there is little doubt that any man excluded on that ground could have recovered substantial damages. But New Yorkers are notoriously docile and spineless in matters of that sort. The Drifter believes that there is still a rule at the New York Public Library against a man's entering without a coat, or taking it off once he is inside. The rule ought to be violated systematically until the library's officers would have to withdraw it in self-defense.

* * * * *

ANYHOW we Americans are more sensible than the English in taking off our coats and in wearing informal dress in summer. On the steamships of the Royal Mail from Southampton to Buenos Aires, which is a three weeks' trip diagonally across the tropics, passengers are expected to dress for dinner every night in the "conventional black." This means that the immaculate man (the Drifter claims no such distinction) must set out with a wardrobe of some twenty dress shirts, as there is no laundry aboard. The Drifter recalls, also, embarking at the Isthmus of Panama on one of the steamships of this famous English line. Needless to say the weather was hot, and the Drifter appeared on deck without a coat but—he thinks—in a clean and presentable shirt. He observed that he was alone in this costume, and later he discovered that the purser had posted a notice on the bulletin board, evidently for the Drifter's express guidance, requesting gentlemen to wear their coats when on deck. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

La Follette and the One-Track Liberal Mind

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I would like to engage you to put some barbed wire on a fence and, if possible, to remove the fence if I do not get results. I think you can do this job better than anyone I know.

The position of "on-the-fence" liberals in this campaign has become so untenable that something must be done to make them jump either one way or the other. If a little barbed wire is not effective, will you remove the fence? It won't be needed after election day. One liberal with whom I have spoken cannot support my candidate for President because he thinks Senator La Follette is wet; another refuses because of the Senator's League of Nations position; a third because he still prefers to believe some newspaper reports (since retracted) of what Senator La Follette said about the war—rather than what the Senator did say. In each case there were no other objections; but that one reason seemed enough to cause them to withhold their support—at least openly.

You might think from this that the other candidates met with the unqualified approval of those liberals. They do not. Now, why do liberals demand that their own candidate agree with each one of them fully and are able to turn to one of the other candidates with whom, if they have been honest, they have disagreed on many points? Is it because some pet hobby is their only excuse for having been classed among liberals? Or is the charge true that they get more of a thrill out of being an "anti" something or other than "pro" anything? Or do you suppose there is too much "yellow in their pink"? Are they glad to seize upon anything to avoid taking a definite stand?

At this time, the first genuine opportunity in over fifty years to do something constructive for all the people, some of us who ought to know better are straining at a gnat and swallowing—an elephant or donkey, as the case may be. Liberals of every kind and shade, political, economic, racial, and religious, have united under the La Follette-Wheeler banner, knowing that this is their big opportunity. We cannot lose under any circumstances, no matter what the election result. We have already won our greatest victory because we have destroyed the best weapon reaction has ever had—its ability to keep us divided. Perhaps, having been accustomed so long to perching on the fence, it would embarrass their sensibilities if some of our liberals had to sit back on a hard chair with their feet solidly on the ground, instead of poised in mid-air.

La Follette-Wheeler Progressive Headquarters,
Chicago, August 28 DAVID K. NILES

[We agree with Mr. Niles that it is the time for all true liberals to show their colors. We have already stated that we are not in accord with all of Mr. La Follette's program, but so far as we can recall in its fifty-nine years of existence as a political weekly, The Nation has never yet found a political platform entirely to its liking from beginning to end. The great, dominating reason why all liberals should join La Follette is the man's compelling honesty and the sincerity of his platform. If we were assured that he could not put through a single legislative reform if elected we should still be for him, for the country needs nothing so much as his humane, warm-hearted, unselfish, peace-loving, anti-imperialist spirit in the Government at Washington. Any liberal who hesitates now because he does not like some one or two planks comes perilously near betraying the cause of liberalism.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The Rodeo Emigrates

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: English criticism of the rodeo, active as it has been, is not so effective as recent Midwestern reactions to such displays. England talks, and goes to see the terrible American show. The Middle West says nothing, and stays away. An experienced rodeo manager committed suicide not long ago in Excelsior Springs, Missouri, because his benches were empty and his debts in the thousands. I am credibly informed that rodeos have of late been unremunerative throughout our entire Middle Western territory. A rodeo held recently in Kansas City, Missouri, for the benefit of policemen and firemen's widows (a hitherto unfailing appeal) went bankrupt, leaving a large deficit in the widows' fund. The local humane society, largely dependent for its efforts on police support, found it useless to forbid the production; but the refusal of the public to attend was more forceful than any injunction.

Perhaps we are near enough to the cow country to know the difference between a spirited horse and one which bucks from pain and rage at an electric battery under the saddle, and to resent seeing cattle uselessly badgered in a ring. If rodeos have been popular and profitable in recent years, it has been on the Atlantic seaboard, and I understood that Tex Austin's show went abroad for lack of an audience at home.

Kansas City, Missouri, September 1 RUTH MARY WEEKS

Women's Wages and the Law

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With the argument and conclusion of your two brief editorials in the issue of July 30 on the Massachusetts decision in the minimum-wage case we are in entire accord. In view of the adverse decisions in the two federal child-labor cases, and of Justice Sutherland's decision in the District of Columbia minimum-wage case, and especially of the dicta which broaden its scope, the National Consumers' League could logically take no other position. But your premise seems to go too far.

You say, "Now that the highest court of Massachusetts has overthrown the essential feature of the minimum-wage law of that State, there seems to be no future for such legislation in this country without an amendment to the Constitution." What the Massachusetts decision overthrows is the penalty clause which, while important, is not the essential feature of the law.

The essential features of an effective minimum-wage law are two. The first is provision for cooperative inquiry into the wages actually paid to women and minors and the amount required for maintaining them in health, by official wage boards equipped with wide powers—these boards being established under a minimum-wage law and composed of representatives of employers and employees. The second essential is wide publicity for findings of wage boards as to the cost of living, as to rates established by the board, and names of employers who fail to comply with the requirements.

Publicity is not necessarily confined to newspaper advertising, important as that is. A State has various organs of publicity of its own, including reports, bulletins, and other issues of which the purchasing public ean effectively avail itself.

Miss Ethel Johnson, the official most intimately in touch with the Massachusetts minimum-wage boards, asserts that the great majority of employers have paid the rates decreed, not for fear of being punished by advertisement but because the rates were reasonable, being arrived at by representatives of employers and employees.

Even without compulsion, it is probable that a number of Massachusetts papers will willingly print lists of employers who refuse to obey the law, as soon as the legislature enacts an amending clause providing that editors shall not be held guilty of libel who print in good faith the findings of a minimum-wage board offered in good faith by a duly constituted authority.

Such a safeguarding amending clause could, it is true, conceivably be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. But until that is done, a federal amendment will hardly be sought by this league.

We are convinced that the Supreme Court can readily distinguish between the circumstances which led it to hold the District of Columbia law unconstitutional, and the circumstances which obtain in California and Kansas, where minimum-wage laws are before the Supreme Court of the State. The California law has a penalty clause similar to that of the District of Columbia law. But California is not the District of Columbia. A State legislature is obviously not Congress; and we cannot reasonably assume that all is lost unless there should be an adverse decision in one or both of these cases by the federal Supreme Court.

Meantime we shall continue to urge the enactment, by the States, of minimum-wage laws following the Massachusetts precedent, with such modifications as the recent decision suggests.

If after the highest courts of California, Kansas, and the United States have spoken in these cases it shall appear that under the federal Constitution as interpreted by the present court the women of the United States are, in fact, deprived of protective legislation, there will undoubtedly be nation-wide demands for a federal amendment and for effective limitations upon the veto power of the courts of State and nation.

The voting women of the United States will not rest content with any legal instrument or with any court which establishes a permanent right of employers to pay to masses of women compensation on which they cannot maintain themselves in health.

Brooklin, Maine, August 15 FLORENCE KELLEY,
General Secretary, National Consumers' League

For Gandhi

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you let me speak for Gandhi of India, who is trying to gain Swaraj for his country after the peaceful and constructive manner of the East, reminding Mr. Kunz (who wrote a letter Against Gandhi in your issue of August 6), that, far from "exaggerating," The Nation has yet to give the entire truth about this political-spiritual program?

I can only take up some of the definite misstatements in Mr. Kunz's letter; the manifest misleading quality of its general tone I cannot hope to combat. First, there has been no "execration," no "provocative" language on Gandhi's part. I challenge anyone to present the slightest proof of such a charge. Gandhi preaches "non-violence in thought, word, and deed," and to an almost unbelievable degree he has practiced his preaching. There has been violence on the part of his followers; that was only to be expected, for not all India's 320 millions have the pacific tradition or temperament. That this violence has been almost negligible considering the size of India, the population, and the intense provocation, I assert. If Chauri-Chaura is a "good specimen" of the blood-horror, Mr. Kunz's case falls flat. Twenty-seven policemen were killed, and this admittedly at the time of the most intense excitement of the exciting year that preceded Gandhi's "polite" arrest. Malabar was much more serious, but it was entirely outside the area of Gandhi's work, and, moreover, he was early in the trouble prevented by the Government from going to the scene of action. Cases of violence as notable as these two could be numbered on the fingers of one hand, and they do not prove that "Gandhi is not a man of his word" but simply that it was not humanly possible for him to restrain 100 per cent of his people.

Now for politics. It is true that the Besant group began the movement that Gandhi has undertaken to finish, but the finish of it is not the farcial "reform Councils." It is not a fact that they "united the country" and "gave it hope and enthusiasm." Gandhi did that, and the answer of the Government was his arrest, and this at a time when he had not demanded separation from the Empire. He has not yet asked this, though one group in India does ask it. Gandhi is "visionary." Jesus was visionary. So was the Sermon on the Mount, upon which the Indian non-violent non-cooperation movement is predicated. But the wildest promise Gandhi ever made was that if India would work the program he had laid down, India could get Swaraj in nine months. Always he emphasized the "if."

And now for the last paragraph of The Nation's correspondent. The country was not united in 1917, except in indignation at the horror of the recruiting method of the Government! Politically it was finding itself. Dyer and Amritsar helped it wonderfully. Gandhi was never a "tool" for the Islamic interests. He saw the value of making use of the Treaty of Sèvres to bring about a Hindu-Moslem entente. That was generalship. He was not driven into "corner after corner." It was the other way around. His arrest was not proof of failure. It was indicative of the fact that he was getting too close to victory. Spiritually Gandhi has not "lost footing." The political fortunes of the non-cooperation struggle will have their ebb and flow; battles will be lost and battles will be won. If Gandhi should be taken away the Gandhi idea will persist, and its constructive working out in different parts of the world will furnish the necessary counter-balance to the violence and the blood-lust of the West.

New York, August 15 BLANCHE WATSON

Contributors to This Issue

GILSON GARDNER is the Washington correspondent for the Scripps newspapers.

M. VAERTING, one of a group of German anthropologists whose lectures and articles have attracted much attention in Europe, is also part author of "The Dominant Sex," recently published in the United States.

PAUL BLANSHARD is field secretary of the League for Industrial Democracy.

THOMAS CRAVEN is well known as a critic and as the author of "Paint."

H. L. MENCKEN, editor of the American Mercury, has contributed many reviews and articles to The Nation.

NORMAN THOMAS, Socialist candidate for Governor of New York, is a contributing editor of The Nation.

HENRY T. FINCK was for many years music critic of the New York Evening Post.

EMIL LENGYEL contributes many articles and reviews on foreign affairs to current periodicals.

Dew and Bronze

By ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

Is it worth the dancing,
  This mayfly trance of life,
Dreaming, hoeing, yearning,
  Taking one a wife?
Frosts and winds, brief roses
  Heaped across the world,
Then to long, long sleeping
  In the gravestead curled.

Athens in white marble
  Says it's worth the pains
And white daisies marching
  Down the country lanes,
Candles and brief babies,
  The brittle wares of home,
Greek tales of gods unaging,
  And that high town called Rome.

Books

Art and Jazz

The Seven Lively Arts. By Gilbert Seldes. Harper and Brothers. $4.

IN a general sense all organizing activity, regardless of materials or medium, may be called artistic. Undoubtedly the conscientious barber is a "tonsorial artist" who derives a certain amount of aesthetic satisfaction from his work. Fitness, neatness, and precision have side-currents of emotional appreciation, and a good job of hair-cutting is accompanied by mental reactions intrinsically akin to those experienced from higher forms of activity. Art values differ only in degree; and so closely related and mixed is the stuff of life that it is practically impossible at times to ascertain at what point an emotional element attains independence and distinction in its own right. Thus it happens that beginners in aesthetics, on discovering the same psychological constituents in higher and lower forms, are moved to unseemly enthusiasms, and are led to magnify the significance of the antic or "lively arts," as Mr. Seldes labels them. Psychological values have been so driven into creative processes that the end and purpose of these processes have been buried in a mass of subjective commentary. Now, I do not deny the importance of the subjective life; nor would I take credit from the critics who are probing our impulses, tracing the sources of our desires, and analyzing the machinery of our preferences. This is valuable in so far as it reveals the quantitative nature of human effort and establishes a sort of continuity of life; but its whole tendency is to reduce all achievement to the same level.

Criticism today is permeated with the ambition to level objective values. Mr. Seldes is only one of many who, under the pressure of a new attitude toward creativeness, have lost their bearings. Having discovered, like many others, that qualitative differences do not exist, he jumps joyfully to the popular conclusion that there are no fundamental differences in the products of human energy. He assumes that because aesthetic impulses are involved in jazz activity, these performances must necessarily be significant and "valuable expressions of American life." His spiritual family would include Michelangelo and the artist of the comic strip, Shelley and Ring Lardner, the barber, the clown, and Irving Berlin. May I admit here that from the subjective point of view he is right—they are undeniably branches of the same old human tree? But I must mention another approach to art: one opposed to the cult of the new intelligentsia who "find themselves" in photography, vaudeville, and the comic strip; one that is not unaware of the part played by subjective processes, and yet, at the same time, is not blind to the more permanent questions of purpose and meaning; one that measures the social importance of idealism, and draws a sharp line between commercialized art and the forms which tell truthfully, or at least with serious intent, the story of the artist in the face of experience.

The art which travels hand in hand with modern commercialism is either nonsense or sentimental invention. That it contains psychological elements also found in higher forms in no way proves its claim to permanent worth. Pure fantasy, buffoonery, "Yes, We Have No Bananas," the tomfoolery of the column writers are vagaries of the human soul, but are not, on that account, of any constructive importance. The characters of the comic strip, while amusing and often ingeniously done, reflect a cynical and weary attitude toward the world. There is something in American life, in the madness of business, which forces "lively artists," sensitive men without faith and with little strength of soul, into eccentric play. The creative impulse, striving inwardly for recognition, finds no genuine outlet, and the unpleasantness of the inhibition is minimized in horseplay and plaintive silliness. All this, of course, is very interesting—it compensates for a profound void in our social life; and none of us who is truly American can deny having participated with pleasure in one or another of such manifestations, either actively as creator or "aesthetically" as audience. But objectively it is sheer nonsense; and to regard as form or organized experience such ragged constructiveness witnesses an inability to understand differences of degree which are the fundamental distinctions of life. The "lively arts" need no encouragement; in fact, the demand for comedians is so disproportionate as to make it worth while for metropolitan newspapers to pay third-rate gossips to chronicle their philanderings, and to employ as critics men who begin by professing to know everything and end by apologizing for their ignorance.

Art is produced only when the suggestive quality remains subordinate to the object; when the content is so wedded to the form that no separation is possible. In the "lively arts" all is suggestion, and the form is completely overridden by the comic idea. These expressions cannot be considered as objectively valuable—their significance is purely sociological. The surest test of aesthetic validity is permanence of appeal.

THOMAS CRAVEN

Wizards and High Priests

A Dictionary of Secret and Other Societies. By Arthur Preuss. The B. Herder Book Company. $3.50.

THIS is a handbook for the use of Catholic parish priests, compiled to give them information "on the subject of secret and other societies into which Catholics are liable to be drawn." The faithful, it appears, are often lured by Satan in the guise of joiners in red belly-bands and purple plumes, and even their spiritual directors are sometimes deceived. The Ku Klux, of course, is easy to detect, and so are the Freemasons, with their occult and sinister history, but what of the humble Knights of Pythias, the Red Men, the Odd Fellows, the Order of Shepherds of Bethlehem, the Supreme Commandery of the Universal Brotherhood, the Loyal Order of Moose? Here it is more difficult to discern the cloven hoof, but here, in most cases, it is nevertheless. The objection to these benevolent and rosicrucian fraternities, it appears, is not primarily that they are secret, for do not the Knights of Columbus also take oaths? The objection is that nearly all of them profess to be pious, and carry on religious ceremonies of their own invention, to the scandal and damage of Holy Church. Hence the decree Amplitudinem tuam of June 20, 1894, solemnly condemning the "Sociorum nempe Singularium, Filiorum Temperantiae et Equi-tum Pythiae," i. e., the Odd Fellows, Sons of Temperance, and Knights of Pythias. All have lofty purposes and all accept Holy Writ as beyond cavil or caveat, but all also dress up green-grocers and garage mechanics in chromatic chasubles and call them chaplains—or maybe Grand Worthy Rectors, Imperial Didaskaloses, or Transcendental Grail-Bearers—and so bring down upon themselves the anathema of the S. Congregation of the Holy Office.

Mr. Preuss, the editor of this strange dictionary, has very little humor, but he is apparently a man of much diligence, for he has accumulated a great deal of information about the mysterious brotherhoods he deals with, and some of it is very curious. He has been at the business for years, and seems to have an almost complete set of their secret books of ritual. In two pregnant pages, for example, he unveils all of the dark work of the Ancient Arabic Order of Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, of which the sainted Harding was an eminent member. One recalls the Shriners, in their public aspect, simply as long ranks of stout men marching down the street under a broiling sun, with fezes on their heads, barbaric bangles on their paunches, and scimitars in their hands. In their private chambers, according to Mr. Preuss, they engage in proceedings of a far more turbulent character—some, indeed, verging upon the goatish. For example, when they initiate a candidate. This ceremony is in charge of a high priest and seven inquisitors. At its climax the candidate is > conducted to the Grand Potentate, whom he is commanded to approach with humble and great reverence, stooping very low on his knees, his head near the ground, his buttocks elevated. He then receives the Grand Salaam, that is, a blow on his buttocks with two pieces of board between which are placed some torpedoes, which explode with a loud report. This is called the Grand Salaam, or Stroke of Introduction.

Even worse follows. The candidate is blindfolded, and then stripped. When the handkerchief is removed from his eyes, he finds himself confronting what appears to be an audience of ladies, "with bonneted faces and capes showing, the rest of their bodies hid by a screen." They are, of course, not ladies, nor even females, but simply Shriners swathed in the rejected finery of their wives. But the candidate is usually staggered nevertheless, and sometimes he is so overcome that he has to be led to a seat. If so, he sits down upon a large sponge soaked in ice-water.

These refined jocosities, fortunately, are never lethal. Among the Moose, a more daring class of men, there is sometimes a fatal issue. Some years ago, for example, two candidates succumbed at Birmingham, Alabama. One was an iron-molder and the other was the president of the local chauffeurs' union. They were blindfolded and their chests were bared, and then the k. k. Duodenum announced in a dreadful voice that they were to be branded. The brand was simply a metal emblem attached to a magneto. When the current was turned on both men collapsed with fright, and the lodge physician was unable to revive them. They were buried with the full ritual of the order, though not yet members in the full sense. The Hon. James J. Davis, Secretary of Labor in the Cabinet of Dr. Coolidge, is the present head of the Moose, and reviewed their annual parade in New York a few months ago. I daresay there will be no more fatalities while he is boss.

Mr. Preuss is often unduly tart in his discussion of such worthy men. He smells brimstone in every lodge-room. He takes the solemn buffooneries of the chaplains far too seriously. His defect, in brief, is that of all other ecclesiastical and pseudo-ecclesiastical smellers, at all times and everywhere. Nevertheless, he has composed an extremely interesting and instructive book. Let it be translated forthwith into all the Christian tongues of the earth. The foreigner, reading it, will learn more about the United States than he could gather from a thousand bales of the state papers of Dr. Coolidge.

H. L. Mencken

The Voice of Mercy

Lord Shaftesbury. By J. L. and Barbara Hammond. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

IN an age of large two-volume biographies it is as comforting as surprising to find the story of one of the longest-lived and most useful of Victorians adequately told in a book of 276 pages. It is even more surprising to find how clear an impression is given of the subject's personality with only the briefest record of his home and private life as boy or man.

Lord Shaftesbury was the devout Christian aristocrat in politics. To the iron laws of the early Victorian economists by which children were made the slaves of the machine almost as soon as they could walk alone he opposed the law of his God, which was a law of mercy and of pity.

To us—unless we are alert to remember some of the cruelties of our own time and the absurd reasons given in extenuation of them—it seems almost incredible that it took one hundred and two years of agitation, as the Hammonds remind us, to abolish the needless cruelty of forcing boys to clean the chimneys of England. They began early. "Six was described as 'a nice trainable age.'" Shaftesbury became interested in the fate of these children in 1840 and did not see the passage of his bill which finally put an end to the evil until 1875.

The story of these climbing boys and of the far greater number of factory children the Hammonds tell soberly and graphically. They give also an excellent account of the treatment of the insane less than one hundred years ago and of Shaftesbury's long years of service for them. But these, after all, are not new tales.

What gives an absorbing interest to this book is the discerning picture of the character and ruling passion of this sensitive, lonely, courageous man. "A man so sensitive could not have worked as Shaftesbury worked for factory children, climbing boys, or the victims of the brick fields or the mine, if he had not been sustained by some special power of pity or hope due to religion or the love of freedom."

It was not the love of freedom which sustained Shaftesbury. Yet it must be remembered that this convinced aristocrat, this narrow churchman, never descended to that proscription of contrary opinion which so often characterizes the believer in authority. His greatest work was done as the accredited spokesman of labor unionists in whose trade unionism he did not believe. Late in life, during the attempts to organize the farm laborers, Shaftesbury wrote:

> I have had the agitators here [he regarded "agitators" with a kind of disdainful arrogance] to stir the people to a sense of their wrongs and an assertion of their rights. They earnestly requested the use of the schoolroom, which I gave them, and "to do the thing handsome" paid for the lights.

He set an example to his fundamentalist successors by refusing to vote against the endowment of the Greek chair at Oxford on the ground that Jowett was to be appointed. "Heaven knows," he wrote, "how I loathe the theology of Dr. Jowett, but we should not put him down by dishonoring his chair."

The religion which sustained Shaftesbury was, in many of its aspects, a dour and narrow Evangelicalism derived from his old nurse, the one friend of his neglected boyhood. It made him fight bands in the parks on Sunday with the moral fervor with which he supported his "ragged schools" or looked out for the interests of the insane. Yet it had about it a quality of invincible pity. The Hammonds acutely observe that the difference between Shaftesbury and such Evangelicals as Hannah More was > like the difference between a hero and a villain in one of Dickens's novels. Hannah More reminded the starving laborers that they could have as much of the Gospel as they liked for nothing; Shaftesbury never looked on distress in this spirit, and he never thought that the rich had fulfilled their duties to the poor when they gave them a cheap copy of the Bible and a few improving tracts.

Only at two important points of social policy did his contemporaries have reason to blame rather than bless Shaftesbury's religious zeal. It made him the opponent of popular education lest it pass out of the hands of the church and of philanthropic Evangelicals, and it blinded him to the iniquity of the opium war. That worldly old prime minister, Lord Palmerston, had allowed his stepson-in-law, Shaftesbury, to appoint the bishops. Thus Palmerston seemed to Shaftesbury "an instrument for good" raised up by the Lord God, and when the House of Commons tardily passed a vote of censure on Palmerston for the Chinese war Shaftesbury saw in it only a shameful coalition to obtain office. This and Shaftesbury's opposition to the repeal of the corn laws—which was, of course exactly paralleled by the opposition of that other noble Englishman, John Bright, to the factory laws—were the chief positive blots on a record of urgent and intelligent devotion to humanitarian causes.

Negatively, there was Shaftesbury's failure to follow up the victories which he had won in factory legislation. The Hammonds point out the interesting paradox that the only agitation Shaftesbury led was the agitation of democrats, radicals, trade unionists, which he feared, while he held aloof from the later Christian Socialist movement which had in it not a little of the aristocratic temper of Shaftesbury himself. The reasons were many: financial difficulties, absorption in personal philanthropy, a curious sense of intellectual and moral isolation from his contemporaries. Yet the fact remains that if Shaftesbury's noble career of service shows the power of the ideal of the humanitarian aristocrat it also shows its limitations—even in England, most fertile soil for a Shaftesbury's efforts. It was not a mere accident that "till the workmen were enfranchised Disraeli did nothing; after Chartism collapsed Shaftesbury did little."

And yet I think the authors make their case that among other and stronger reasons which have made the social struggle less bitter in England than in Europe, the land of bloody revolutions, and America, land of bloody strikes, was the example of that Christian aristocrat who softened "in the manners of his age, as he had softened in its politics the savage logic of the Industrial Revolution."

NORMAN THOMAS

Music More than Tonal Fragrance

Music and Mind. By T. H. Yorke Trotter. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

BLIND TOM was a Negro boy who could sit down at the piano and repeat correctly a piece never before heard that had just been played for him. He was an idiot—but never mind, or nunquam mens, as we used to translate it at Harvard.

How much mentality goes with music? John Burroughs considered music to be a mere matter of the senses, like the fragrance of a flower—only this and nothing more. He was a wise man, but this opinion was extraordinarily foolish. It would be difficult to match it; for, absolutely and beyond all controversy, the most complicated of all mental processes is the writing of an orchestral score. As Edward MacDowell used to say, it is of all things human that which comes nearest to divine creation.

A professor of Magdalen College, Oxford University, has revealed the striking fact that while only 10 per cent of the students of that college take music as one of their studies, these men win 75 per cent of all the many prizes and scholarships, leaving only 25 per cent of these awards to the 90 per cent of the students who do not take music! This amazing record was the average for thirty years. Three cheers for music!

If there is a call for a second edition of Mr. Trotter's book "Music and Mind"—as there ought to be, for it is a good book—he is welcome to these facts; they will add much force to his arguments in favor of teaching music at educational institutions. How many students could remain deaf to the revelation made at Oxford that a musically trained mind increases tremendously one's chances of winning a prize or a scholarship?

While much progress has been made in recent years in the attention paid to music in schools, Mr. Trotter, who is an Englishman and a Mus. Doc. Oxon., is not satisfied. Present shortcomings are the more deplorable in view of the fact that Aristotle, twenty-two centuries ago, pointed out that music is useful for relaxation as well as for pleasure and that it has power to form the character and influence the soul, wherefore "the young should be educated in it."

If, these many years after Aristotle, music still occupies a subordinate position in our educational institutions, it is because its real value has been overlooked in our eagerness for technical skill.

Only a part of Mr. Trotter's book, however, is concerned with the educational side of the art. Other chapters are devoted to the question of music's power over us and to a description of the material with which the tonal art is built up. He does not believe that music can express definitely single emotions, for the reason that, in the words of Herbert Spencer, "Emotions are composed of enormously complex aggregates of elements that are never quite alike, and which stand in relations that are never quite alike." But it is this very indefiniteness of the musical utterance which, in Mr. Trotter's opinion, gives it its strength.

Musical genius is usually supposed to be a gift beyond control, but Mr. Trotter urges that the creative instinct can, like other things, be strengthened by use. Like many other writers of our time, he talks about the strange activity of the unconscious mind; why do none of these writers refer to Eduard v. Hartmann, whose "Philosophy of the Unconscious" some of us studied under Professor Bowen as long ago as 1875?

HENRY T. FINCK

Dies Irae

Autocracy and Revolution in Russia. By Baron Sergius A. Korff. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

AS old as sociology itself is the discovery that autocracy and revolution are synonymous in many respects. Pioneers of the science of social phenomena expressed their naive surprise at the striking resemblance between these seemingly different forms of social abnormity in the paradoxical statement that while autocracy is the revolution of the future, revolution is the autocracy of the past.

A correct appraisal of autocracy as a cause of the Russian revolution prompted Baron Sergius A. Korff to devote his attention primarily to the interpretation of the autocracy of Czardom. His findings are embodied in the present volume, which is a close version of a series of six lectures he gave before the students of Northwestern University.

"The revolution was the necessary outcome of the social readjustment that was taking place in Russia during the three last decades"—is the key-note that Baron Korff sounds in the preface of his book. He elaborates his theme in the first four chapters which represent as many outstanding elements of the subsequent Russian dies irae. Ruthless autocracy, handled by the class of the bureaucrats created particularly for this purpose, aided or supervised, as the case may be, by a degenerate aristocracy, necessarily brought its own negation. The Russian peasant, kept in ignorance for centuries, fooled with so-called reforms and semi-reforms, obsessed by a ravishing hunger for the soil on which his existence was conditioned, was the best material imaginable for the solid mass of the revolutionary phalanx. The events following the Russo-Japanese war are only a semi-articulate expression of that revolutionary tendency which had been living in the spirit of the Russian nation for the three last decades.

Baron Korff very precisely points out that the revolution of the soul and of the intellect is the primary consideration in an upheaval like that in Russia and not the political changes which take place almost automatically. Consequently, the Russian revolution dates far back into the last decades of the eighteenth century, and all that came after it was only the seeking of the direction of least resistance by the revolutionary era and the organization of its forces that it might take up the struggle with an overwhelmingly strong autocratic order.

On the whole, Baron Korff takes a sympathetic stand toward the Kerensky revolution, and although he is violently opposed to the Russian Soviet regime he makes every effort to be fair in his criticism of it.

It must be said in favor of the book that it is one of those few attempts at the writing of contemporary history in which the chief interest of the author is in the "unhistorical" masses and not in some arbitrarily selected "heroes," in the Carlylean sense of the word. This attitude bears out strongly the conviction of the author that the events which have recently forced Russia into the limelight of history are the consequence of the eruption of irrepressible natural forces beyond the control of the human factor. EMIL LENGYEL

Irving Babbitt Continues

Democracy and Leadership. By Irving Babbitt. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

ALL of Mr. Babbitt's customary bitter brilliance is in this latest book of his, which continues the application of theses developed from "Literature and the American College" through the most famous of his series, "Rousseau and Romanticism." As usual the burden of his animadversion is directed against Rousseau, and the positive trend of his argument is toward the inner discipline. An appreciation of the keen cut of his criticisms of what he terms modernist, as contrasted with modern, makes carping at other aspects of his book rather difficult without giving the impression that a total dissent is intended. Such is never the case.

The great problem of modern times is to discover leaders with standards, Mr. Babbitt contends, and democracy fails in proportion as it fails to find such leaders. Standards are to be arrived at by a cooperation of the imagination and the intellect, and the standards so secured are to be subordinated to the ethical will. Intellect is "the power in man that analyzes and discriminates and traces causes and effects." Imagination consists of what we perceive and conceive of the world outside. The ethical will is not peculiarly Western, but Eastern, and found chiefly in Buddha and Confucius; it is opposed to the pride of the intellect which is Greek, and in the modern world a product of the Renaissance, taken up then as a reaction against the total subordination of the individual will and also the intellect, to God's will, customary in the Middle Ages. The will seems to be a principle of inner control, individual in its origins. Its elevation to a primary place does not destroy the intellect, which is still regarded as one of the primary instruments of personality, but destroys its pride. For every Ormuzd Mr. Babbitt evolves he develops a corresponding Ahriman. Opposite the perfect individual developed per specifications above he places his own personal devil: the expansionist, the Rousseauist, the modernist, the imperialist, as he variously denominates him.

This not very unusual habit of mind is not conducive to absolute clarity. He is constantly developing opposites, but the most fundamental opposition seems to be between the disciples of Rousseau and Mr. Babbitt himself. He is the hero holding standards against the armies of destruction. Rousseau, be it to his credit, raised the right questions, but, alas, gave the wrong answers. Happily for the world Mr. Babbitt can supply the correct ones to those curious enough to read his books. The questions Rousseau raised are implicit in the advice he gave the world. His peculiar crime was to take away the integrating center in personality and place the emphasis on the periphery, necessitating the development of an external discipline or social-reform legislation. He released man from inner discipline and told him to expand, without considering the quality that was to result. From this reprehensible piece of advice has proceeded sentimentalism, literary and social. Social sentimentalism in the first place leads to imperialism—a carrying over into the social field of the expansionist element in the individual—and to humanitarianism or social reform in the second place. Literary sentimentalism is not considered in this book. Democracy by applying the quantitative rather than the qualitative test to results has broken down standards, and has elevated the divine average (Ahriman) at the expense of the saving remnant (Ormuzd-Babbitt). Now democracy has been led to this pernicious error by Rousseau, who tried to release man from his inhibitions personal and social—who expanded him. Apparently Mr. Babbitt fears that man, like a toy balloon, is going to continue to expand until he bursts. Just why that is less preferable than what is the alternative—disciplining the personality as per method above, until its logical end will be to shrivel up and blow away—I do not know.

Somewhat crudely the theses of this brilliant book have been indicated. Logical application of the assumptions leads Mr. Babbitt to condemn such various phenomena as American imperialism, the elective system in colleges, labor leaders, and Freudians as expansionists. He is so obsessed with disciplining the individual against what he is pleased to call sentimentalism that he aligns himself with very ordinary conservative positions. He says: "Every form of social justice, indeed, tends to confiscation and confiscation, when practiced on a large scale, undermines moral standards and, in so far, substitutes for real justice the law of cunning and the law of force." This seems to me logical, but, unhappily, not very good common sense, for not everyone will agree with the basic proposition.

Not all of Mr. Babbitt's bêtes noires have been mentioned. Nor have the finer shades of his arguments, positive and negative, been indicated. His learning is very great and he has a high gift for apt quotation. But in the bitterness with which he excoriates his enemies is the seed of his defeat. One tends closely to examine his positive arguments and their speciousness becomes apparent. By his own confession his ideal personality is "easier to outline than to accomplish." Nor should the brilliance with which he states the necessity for considering the problem of leadership and the brilliance with which he sets up his procedure for arriving at standards blind one to the fact that he fails to illuminate the central problem of leadership in democracy: the method by which desirable leaders are to gain and maintain their position. That of course requires an intimate knowledge of modern social psychology and sociology which Mr. Babbitt neither in the text nor the bibliography gives evidence of possessing. C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Books in Brief

Pandora Lifts the Lid. By Christopher Morley and Don Marquis. George H. Doran Company. $2.

This delightfully preposterous book reeks with a gay whimsicality. It is a kind of highly modernized "Treasure Island." The Inn is replaced by a fashionable seminary, the explorers by a sextet of irresistible, imaginative sub-debs, and the pirates by real, sure-nuff bootleggers. The hair-raising adventures undertaken in the glorious cause of radicalism are topped off by a deliciously unsentimental and naive love affair. . . . The type of book that makes one feel good-humoredly ashamed of being a day over twenty years old.

Augustus Carp, Esq. By Himself. Being the Autobiography of a Really Good Man. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

This pompously humorous book was very obviously written by an Englishman. It purports to be the autobiography of a certain young man who not only felt sure that he was very, very good but who also spent much of his time trying in a most inopportune and brazen manner to convert others to his own laboriously proper and exacting standards. In several spots the book is undeniably entertaining. Yet it will fail to appeal to a large number of people in this country because of the fact that so many Americans feel that a proselytizing, evangelizing, professionally good person is simply not a laughable figure but rather pathetic—and very annoying. . . . The illustrations by Robin, on the other hand, are uproariously superb, and all too few.

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

Provincetown Playhouse—Greenwich Village Theatre

Subscription Season

$11.00, incl. tax, 5 bills — $11.00, incl. tax, 5 bills Orchestra

$16.50, opening nights — $ 8.25, incl. tax, 5 bills Balcony

$20.00, incl. tax, 10 bills, 5 at Provincetown Playhouse, 5 at Greenwich Village Theatre.

At the Provincetown

The Great God Brown, by Eugene O'Neill; The Crime in the Whistler Room, by Edmund Wilson; The Colonnade, by Stark Young; Beyond, by Walter Hasenclever; Love for Love, by William Congreve.

At the Greenwich

Desire Under the Elms, by Eugene O'Neill; The Saint, by Stark Young; The Last Night of Don Juan, by Edmond Rostand; Much Ado About Nothing, by William Shakespeare; The Brothers Karamazoff, by Jacques Copeau.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

GREAT DEBATE of the CAMPAIGN!

SOCIALISM versus LAFOLLETTISM

SCOTT NEARING — Foremost Radical Spokesman

versus

MEYER LONDON — First Socialist Congressman and Labor Attorney

Chairman to be announced

SUBJECT

Resolved: THAT NO CLASS-CONSCIOUS SOCIALIST WORKER CAN OR SHOULD VOTE FOR LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. NEARING, Affirmative — Mr. LONDON, Negative

Sunday, October 5, 1924, at 3 P. M.

Central Opera House, 67th Street and 3rd Avenue

Tickets, $1.10 (incl. war tax)

On sale at Jimmie Higgins Bookshop, 127 University Place; Gothic Art Book Store, 176 Second Avenue; Katz's Music Store, 181 E. Broadway; Epstein's Drug Store, 1674 Madison Avenue; Stern's Jewelry Store, 1337 Wilkins Avenue, Bronx; Neidorf's Book Store, 1817 Pitkin Avenue, Brooklyn; Katz's Drug Store, 78 Graham Avenue, Brooklyn, or at the offices of and by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION

500 FIFTH AVENUE — Tel. Longacre 10435-10434

SINGING JAILBIRDS

By UPTON SINCLAIR

The hero of this drama is a class-war prisoner in solitary confinement; the entire play happens in a city jail, the last three acts in an underground dungeon eight feet long, five feet wide, and seven feet high. It contains many adventures—jazz, jungles, a Dominie, a Chink, a rosary, a slop-pail, an abortion, a miracle, rats, bulls, stool-pigeons en casserole, pie in the sky, a ranch, a roadhouse, and the Hall of Hate.

EUGENE O'NEILL: "The play is fine stuff—strong and true—and I've been deeply moved by it. A treat to read it!"

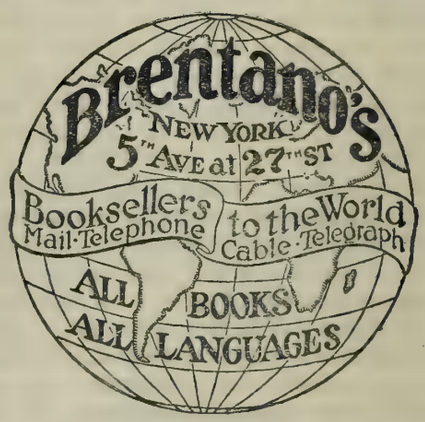
MRS. UPTON SINCLAIR: "The only work of art that Upton Sinclair has produced."

FLOYD DELL: "A better example of the expressionistic drama than any I have seen."

MICHAEL GOLD: "You are that genius of whom I prophesied, saying that he would arise to write the truth about California, only to be immediately hung by the vigilantes. It is terrible, bitter truth, and some of the scenes brought the tears to my newspaper-sterile eyes. . . . The play has a great sweep, and a real power in moving the heart. Some of the scenes are like a real experience—the loss of one's friend by death, the pangs of loneliness or prison experienced again."

Price 25 cents postpaid. One copy free with "The Goslings" and "The Goose-Step," paper-bound, both for $1.50; or both cloth-bound, $3.00.

UPTON SINCLAIR, Pasadena, California



The Bedford Barrow Co-operative Apartments

in Greenwich Village are genuine, non-profit co-operatives.

Thirty-five apartments, 4, 5 and 6 rooms.

Initial Investment $1,230 to $2,400.

Monthly Charges $50 to $100 (approx.) (Including mortgage payments)

Write for Information to:—

Consumers' Co-operative Housing Association, Inc.

70 Fifth Ave. — Room 411 — Chelsea 0432

Affiliated with

THE CO-OPERATIVE LEAGUE OF THE U. S. A.

International Relations Section

Rumanian Oil and Foreign Money

By EMIL LENGYEL

ON June 30 the Rumanian Parliament passed the so-called "mining law" which has caused serious complications in Rumania's international relations. Peter Jay, American Minister at Bucharest, in concert with the representatives of the Western European Powers, protested against the passage of the act. When it became evident that his protest was of no avail the American Minister left Bucharest for Washington in order to "report the case to his Government," as the official communique ran. At the same time, the Vienna paper, Die Boerse, reports, the Administration in Washington called the loan which had been granted to Rumania during the war. This report has not been confirmed as yet.

The mining law provides for nationalization of the sub-soil in Rumania. In the case of oil territories the granting of concessions, even if the oil deposits are in private territory, is a sovereign right of the state. The validity of the concessions is limited to fifty years. Those concessions, however, which had been acquired prior to the passage of the mining law will be in force until the expiration of their terms or until 1957, whichever period is shorter. Renewals of concessions can be granted by private owners of oil-fields only until 1957 when Rumania's sub-soil will, in its entirety, become the property of the nation. Thus, until 1957 the nationalization act affects only the oil territories that either had not been leased out prior to June 30, 1924, or whose leases are terminated in the meantime.

Other sections of the law provide for the "Rumanianization" of the oil companies by decreeing that 55 per cent of the capital stock of any oil company must be held by Rumanian citizens. The turning over of the majority of the shares to Rumanian citizens must be effected within ten years. Another drastic regulation of the new law is that two-thirds of the board of directors of oil corporations, their chairmen and auditors, must be Rumanians. The Government is vested with the power to dismiss, at its discretion, any manager of an oil company and to replace him with another. If public interest requires, the pipe-lines of any oil corporation may be expropriated. An interesting provision of the new law is that the employees of oil concerns shall participate in 15 per cent of the annual net profit of the company.

These provisions of the mining law have been described by the foreign offices of Western Europe and America as "confiscatory" and "detrimental to the interests" of those of their nationals who had invested in the Rumanian oil-fields. The Rumanian Government insisted that it was free to regulate the exploitation of oil for the best interests of the country even if this implied the limitation or exclusion of foreign capital from participation in Rumania's most important national industry.

The arguments of the Rumanian Government in favor of the mining law are based upon political and economic considerations. It is claimed that foreign oil companies have shown a tendency to eliminate native capital from Rumania's oil industry. The recent history of Mosul and of Persia where American and English oil interests have been carrying on bitter feuds served as a hint to Rumania that it was not always safe for a small country to extend hospitality to foreign oil concerns.

In the last two decades there have been indications that the stage was set in Rumania for an oil war of large proportions. Notwithstanding a considerable amount of official animosity, the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey made its appearance in Rumania. It is charged that the Standard Oil, unable to obtain petroleum territories directly from the state, had established native buying concerns which bought the oil-fields and resold them to the American concern. Under the name of Societate Romano-Americana the Standard Oil at last succeeded in intrenching itself in Rumania. Its competitor, the Royal Dutch-Shell combination, began business as the Astra Romana.

In order to counterbalance the supremacy of the American and English-Dutch concerns, King Charles of Rumania before the war induced two German banks, the Deutsche Bank and the Disconto Gesellschaft, to participate in the exploitation of Rumanian oil. These two banks founded the Steaua Romana, which became the most powerful oil company in Rumania and successfully maintained a balance of power in the oil-fields. After the war, however, German interests in Rumanian oil were passed over to other companies. In the Steaua Romana Rumanians acquired a 50 per cent participation but the other ex-German oil concerns were taken by foreigners. Thus the two great rivals, Standard Oil and Royal Dutch, again dominated the stage.

A diplomatic blunder, committed four years ago, helped to make the Rumanian Government realize the seriousness of the situation. It was in 1920, at the San Remo Conference, that Great Britain, represented by Sir John Cadman, and France, represented by Philippe Berthelot, agreed to concert the political action of their countries regarding the claims of their nationals in the oil-fields of Rumania. The United States, whose representatives observed unofficially the proceedings of the conference, protested against the agreement and demanded that the "policy of the open door" be respected in Rumania.

Both the San Remo agreement and America's protest were considered by the Rumanian Government as an affront. The staking out of claims in Rumania by British and French interests as well as the dissatisfied gesture of America seemed to indicate a belief that the government and parliament of the country over which they had been quarreling was only a negligible quantity. Some extremists went so far as to declare that the next step of the "Westerners" would be to demand the internationalization of Rumania's seaports and the introduction of capitulatory rights. Subsequently, a press campaign in the Rumanian papers brought out the fact, among others, that in an oil-producing area of 8,500 acres which is being drilled now in Rumania more than 6,000 acres belong to foreign corporations. Even more disadvantageous for the Rumanians is the ratio of the reserve oil-fields which are now being held by foreign concerns. Out of an estimated total of 55,000 acres of reserve fields foreign companies hold about 53,000 acres.

To what lengths the animosity against foreign oil corporations had gone was recently demonstrated in a bitter press campaign conducted by Rumania's leading oil periodical, the Romana Petrolifera. In a series of articles, entitled the American Peril, this newspaper accused the Romano-Americana of "unfair competition" and "utter disregard of the sensibilities of the Rumanian nation." "The Romano-Americana," says the paper, "excluded Rumanians from the staff of its employees notwithstanding the fact that it is living on Rumanian soil. Its officers and most of its employees are Americans who have no knowledge of the Rumanian language."

The passage of the mining law entailed serious consequences for Rumania not only by provoking the wrath of the foreign offices of the great Powers, but also from an economic point of view. According to a dispatch from Bucharest, Prime Minister John Bratianu has declared that Tancred Constantinescu, Rumanian Minister of Commerce, had been unable to obtain a foreign loan. In order to demonstrate their solidarity with the foreign oil corporations whose rights had been affected by the mining law and to express their dismay over this step of the Rumanian legislature the Western money-lenders refused even to consider the possibility of a loan.

The calling of the war loan by America makes the position of the Rumanian Government even more difficult. One should not be misled by the fact that the total amount of this loan is not more than $44,000,000. For the Rumanian treasury, in its present crisis, this is an enormous amount which it cannot hope to refund. It is feared that, following the American example, Rumania's other war-time creditors, too, will demand their money. Their total claims aggregate $451,000,000. As a counter-measure to the anticipated claims of the Allies the Rumanian Government declared recently that unless its quota participation in the reparation payment was increased Rumania's bills would be left unpaid.

Despite the opposition and reprisals the Rumanian Government is determined to execute the mining law as it stands and is not inclined to submit an amendment to it, taking off its edge, as has been suggested by the protesting governments. Tancred Constantinescu described the Rumanian attitude toward the opposition of the foreign governments in these words published in the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna:

> It is estimated that in addition to the oil-fields already exploited and the reserves set aside for future exploitation there is in Rumania at least 350,000 acres of oil-producing territory which, by the new law, belongs to the nation. In the future, naturally, we shall not be able to grant oil concessions to those foreign corporations and individuals that do not comply with the regulations of the law. It is equally natural that we were within our rights in adopting the mining law and that we are within our rights in executing it. No country can be deprived of its right freely to dispose of its own property. In accordance with this principle the Rumanian Government will grant concessions, so far as this is possible, for the exploitation of the nation's resources to Rumanian corporations and individuals only. It is decidedly unjust that foreign concerns have monopolized the oil industry in our country and that they have not allowed Rumanian capital to participate in it. The majority of the shares of the greatest and wealthiest oil corporations are held abroad. Some of them are not even listed on the Bucharest bourse, so that Rumanian capital seeking investment opportunities has no access to them. . . . On the whole, the new law protects Rumania's interests.

Communism in the Evening Post

AN editorial in the Moscow Pravda of July 25 comments on the difficulties confronting the London conference, then still in progress, and seizes with delight upon certain remarks of the New York Evening Post of July 22 on the role of the bankers. We quote the following paragraphs:

Who is the decisive power in all this scramble and all these disputes as to the method for robbing Germany a little more and the proportions in which the booty is to be divided?

We call the attention of our readers to a blunt answer in a serious American newspaper, the New York Evening Post, representing the right conservative wing of the generally sufficiently conservative Republican Party of the United States. This answer is so good that it will probably be included in Marxian textbooks on the state and law. "Finance," says this newspaper, "has always manipulated political affairs."

And if something new was manifested at the London conference, it simply resolves itself into this:

"Previously the financiers acted under cover, unobtrusively, now they openly dominate."

These admissions are somewhat indiscreet. It is a sober, realistic, and true evaluation of the democratic liberties. Let all the poor fools there imagine that they are not the hundredth spoke in the modern, democratic government wheel; let them amuse themselves with the illusion that they decide and conduct wars, conclude peace, appoint and overthrow governments. To the financiers it is clear how all this is actually carried on.

With egregious naivete, as if written for absolute idiots, the paper further explains that the financiers have come to the conference in order to save the world. In its opinion, the American financiers were forced to dominate at the conference, because "the statesmen of democracy have appeared impotent to do anything other than pull down the structure over their heads."

But who fails to understand, especially after the authoritative elucidation of a serious American newspaper, that through Herriot and the French Chambers, and through MacDonald and the English Parliament, the French and English financiers "manipulate political affairs" just as surely as do the American financiers through Coolidge and Congress? And who fails to understand that the power of the French and English financiers was reduced to the impotence of their attorneys and official representatives, the MacDonalds and Herriots, when the latter pretended to imagine that they could ignore the sacred right of the American financiers to a share of the profits from the European robbery and destruction?

Very true also are the subsequent arguments of the same American paper. You wonder if Marxians have not penetrated into its editorial office, and if the author of this article is not perchance under the influence of Lenin's book, "The State and Revolution." Please read what this paper says:

"American finance is a power virtually independent of politics, a power that owes only shadowy allegiance to any government."

Irrefutable truths! Can financiers be dependent upon politics if they have always controlled and continue to control political affairs? Can they be dependent upon politics if, as this newspaper maintains, "world finance is the most potent and effective force in international affairs"? Not finance is dependent upon politics, but politics upon finance. We have been arguing this for some time, not only in our Communist colleges and slogans, but even in the most elementary political textbooks. . . .

Yes, this force, fortunately for itself, is "independent" of any bourgeois government, because all bourgeois governments, no matter how often they may be replaced, no matter what democratic, conservative, liberal, or "labor" labels they may tack onto themselves, are all equally in the chains of "world finance."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1924 No. 3090

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 297
EDITORIALS:
Our Despotic Courts 300
It's a Way We Have in the Army 301
Automobile Ups and Downs 301
When We Spoke "Pieces" 302
WHEELER INVADES NEW YORK. By Oswald Garrison Villard 303
PLYMOUTH, CLARKSBURG, MADISON. By William Hard 305
JIM DENSON—A FRAGMENT OF HISTORY. By Sarah N. Cleghorn. 306
"ASK YOUR BANKER." By H. G. Andrews 308
MRS. MASON MARCHES. By Agnes Burns Wieck 309
A BUFFALO DANCE AT SANTO DOMINGO. By Witter Bynner 310
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 311
CORRESPONDENCE 312
BOOKS:
Mr. Asquith's Leisure. By Herbert W. Horwill 314
An American Statesman. By Ernest Gruening 314
Central Europe. By Emil Lengyel 315
An Economist Strays Afield. By David E. Lilienthal 315
Books in Brief 316
DRAMA:
Our Best War Play. By Joseph Wood Krutch 316
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Will Germany Live Again? By Karl F. Geiser 318

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

"I TOLD YOU SO!" Now that Defense Day (nee Mobilization Day but renamed by its parents in order to give the poor creature a fair start in life) has passed into well-merited oblivion, it is easy to point out how the event justified our predictions. The bona fide military value of the demonstration—if there was any—was overshadowed by an outpouring of brassy patriotism, of the blah and blurb that we recall so well from 1917-1918. In Bergenfield, New Jersey, a lying announcement was made that all men of military age would be arrested if they did not take part in the mobilization, and the falsehood was justified by the chief of police on the ground that "it put Bergenfield on the map." In New York City the participation of our "captains of industry" was featured by the newspapers. "Financiers Are Mobilized," said one headline, following which were details of the way in which Elbert H. Gary put the industrial resources of the country at the service of the Government before you could say "Jack Robinson." That's just what he would do—in time of peace. In time of war he would do again as he did in 1917-1918—profiteer in steel until a threat by the Government to nationalize the industry finally brought him to terms.

YES, DEFENSE DAY turned out in most of its aspects just as the anti-militarists had predicted. But not quite. They were not sufficiently optimistic to realize the full strength of the opposition that it would arouse. A good deal of this went unspoken, but enough made itself articulate so that the War Department's hope to carry the country back to the psychology of six years ago was only a frothy fizzle. The protests against Defense Day will remain as the one most significant aspect of it. As we write there lies before us a resolution adopted by the Colorado Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, reading in part:

> Such a day is certain to promote, rather than to allay international friction. Such a day is designed to stimulate in our youth enthusiasm for warlike enterprises, rather than to direct it into channels for the promotion of good-will. Such a day merits the uncompromising condemnation of the Christian church.
>
> Therefore, Be it resolved that we, the members of the Colorado Annual Conference, as ministers of the gospel of Jesus, refuse to have any part in the execution of the plans of our War Department for the observation of this day.

The anti-militarists have won. The War Department will not order another Defense Day next year. We dare it to.

LA FOLLETTE STILL LEADS in the straw vote being conducted by the Hearst papers. Out of the first 117,000 ballots cast 49,000 went to the man from Wisconsin, 47,000 to President Coolidge, and only 21,000 to John W. Davis. We commend these figures, indeterminate as they are, to those who object that La Follette may throw the election into Congress. If the election goes to Congress it will be because the Democratic wing of the conservative alliance cuts into the vote which should go to La Follette. We do not believe that the little group of ex-Progressives who complain that La Follette has stolen the party name copyrighted by Roosevelt will disturb many voters. These men seem to have lost their grip on realities. No one man can crystallize the meaning of a word beyond the power of other history-makers to change it. What was "progressive" in 1912 may be reactionary in 1924. Those who object to new meanings in an old political phrase are like Canute bidding the waves be still, or Calvin Coolidge fearfully predicting that for the American people to alter their Constitution (which begins with the words "We, the people of the United States") would be to destroy their own liberties.

"THE THOUGHT OF THE WORLD turns increasingly toward peace," Mr. Coolidge told the convention of the American Legion. Well, maybe. Mr. Coolidge had just finished telling about our American Mobilization Day. France is conducting her first large-scale post-war naval maneuvers in the Mediterranean—where England now concentrates eight super-dreadnoughts, two strong division cruisers, four destroyer flotillas, two airplane carriers, a submarine fleet, and auxiliary craft. Italy and Egypt are massing troops on their desert frontier, unable to settle a border dispute by the peaceable processes of friendly negotiation. China is watching the movements of the greatest armies which China has ever seen, maneuvering for position in civil war. It would be only natural if at such a time the thought of the world should turn increasingly toward any faint hope for peace.

AT GENEVA the French and British representatives have at last faced the appalling post-war increase in armament with a certain sense of the desperate realities. Europe, we have been told, was such an armed camp before the war that an outbreak became inevitable—and Europe has more men under arms today than she had before the war. The new militarism of Poland and the other new nations is again breaking Europe's back. Ramsay MacDonald and Edouard Herriot have been earnestly seeking some form of agreement which will make disarmament politically possible. England—quite properly, we believe—rejected the treaty of mutual assistance which based the hope for peace on a promise to use force. France, however, is not content with arbitration treaties which give no strong guaranty of security. Mr. Benes, the astute Czech diplomat, has been working upon a compromise plan. The proposal to use the British fleet to enforce League decisions was naturally disavowed almost as soon as it was put forward. But something will have to be done. It is unlikely that effective measures will be put through at the present session of the Assembly, but it is a gain that the questions of security and disarmament have been thrust into the forefront of European discussion. So long, however, as the League and the Allies leave Germany and Soviet Russia outside, as pariah nations, their discussions are condemned to sterility.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION for the Revision of the Rules of Warfare has unanimously agreed that "aerial bombardment for the purpose of terrorizing the civilian population, . . . or of injuring non-combatants, is prohibited." The same round is starting over again. Rules are made in peace and broken in war the minute one side is pushed to an extremity. In the next war the temptation will be the greater because man's knowledge of destruction has increased tremendously during the few years since the last war. On this point the report which has been submitted by the world's poison-gas experts to the League Assembly this month leaves very little to the imagination. In the World War an army had a choice of thirty different gases. Now an army can equip itself with over a thousand—so rapidly do we "progress." After the recitation of a long string of horrors for the civilian population against which there is absolutely no protection at present, the report concludes by urging that civilians should be warned of their future fate. Dr. Leo H. Baekland, president of the American Chemical Society, is doing his best. In the next war, he tells the society, "science will let no one escape and there will be no refuge from death and torture."

A TENTATIVE PLAN for cooperation between northern and southern Ireland has received hesitating official approval but official action seems palsied by fear of the Ulster extremists. The proposed plan would open up a way of future cooperation between Ulster and the Free State; it would eliminate the present deadlock over the Boundary Commission; and it would wipe out the disputed frontier and make Ireland an economic and in part an administrative unit. According to the plan Ulster will preserve its autonomy but will become a part of the Irish Free State as a British Dominion. Both will have their own Parliament and will have equal right in an all-Ireland Council which will decide questions affecting the whole of Ireland. English Conservatives who have always backed Ulster in its opposition to Catholic Ireland are urging Ulster to consider the proposed plan; Mr. De Valera is said to be willing to give up his agitation for an Irish Republic. Peace in Ireland depends upon some form of agreed unity, and the present situation with the Free State a Dominion and the six northern counties a political unit subject to the British Parliament is difficult. Let Irishmen of the North indulge that English heritage of compromise a little more freely and Irishmen of the South accept the advice of Æ not to rely so much on "the easily excited surface passions" but to turn to that "ancient Gaelic tradition of generosity of mind."

RAMSAY MACDONALD'S ACCEPTANCE of a motor car and an endowment fund for it of $150,000 from his boyhood friend, Sir Alexander Grant, is a grave political blunder. We have no question whatever that this had no connection with the baronetcy conferred upon Sir Alexander Grant three months later. On that point Ramsay MacDonald's word is sufficient. But the fact remains that his enemies now have a weapon with which to attack him and to assault his Government. That Sir Alexander Grant's action was induced solely by a desire to preserve the strength and health of the Prime Minister there can be no doubt. Politically, the two men stand at opposite poles, and as Sir Alexander knows MacDonald well he knows, of course, that it is impossible to influence MacDonald's convictions save by pure reason. But the mistake is there, none the less. Hope lies in the fact that it may call British attention to the fact that their Prime Minister is so miserably underpaid as to make it almost impossible for a man of MacDonald's small means to accept the position. The Prime Minister receives $25,000 a year, of which he has to give back to the Government one-fourth in income taxes. Out of the remainder he must pay the cost of an expensive official residence, requiring a large staff of servants. Even the lighting and heating are defrayed by him. If there is anything left of his salary at the end of a year the Prime Minister is obviously in luck. That he should not even have an official automobile is nothing less than amazing.

ENGLAND'S LABOR GOVERNMENT has found a way out of the unfortunate Amritsar predicament caused by Mr. Justice McCardie's approval of the conduct of General Dyer. Instead of taking issue with the judicial branch of the Government, causing a breach which would inevitably have been laid to the ineptitude of the Labor regime, Lord Olivier has hunted around and found a suitable principle expressed by a member of a previous Government. Mr. Montagu, Secretary of State for India in the Lloyd George Cabinet, affirmed

> The principle which has consistently governed the policy of his Majesty's Government, in directing the methods to be employed when military action in support of the civil authority is required, may be broadly stated as the use of the minimum force necessary.

Mr. Justice McCardie in his approval of the killing of 380 people went beyond this. The Government, adds Lord Olivier, > feel bound to dissociate themselves from the further view apparently held by the judge that the action proper to be taken by a military police officer for dispersing an unlawful assembly may be determined by a consideration of the moral effect it may be thought likely by the officer taking it to have on other persons whom he may believe to be contemplating disorder elsewhere.

DISPATCHES FROM PARIS, Constantinople, and Trebizond report a revolution in the soviet republics of the Caucasus. These dispatches prove one thing only: that anti-bolshevik conspirators outside of Soviet Russia have been plotting a revolution within the borders of the Union of Socialist Republics. Again and again and again the outside centers of counter-revolutionary conspiracy have announced revolutions in Russia. Sometimes rebellions occur on scheduled time; usually not. We shall await more authentic news, and we marvel that the press associations which accepted similar rumors as to the nine preliminary deaths of Lenin, the imprisonment of Trotzky, and the burnings of Petrograd (now Leningrad) do not learn to distrust the makers of Russian revolutionary time-tables.

CHILE, A COUNTRY whose favorite boast has been that of having only two revolutions in more than one hundred years of independent life, now appears ousting its first democratic President in the name of the very principles of progressive legislation and public economy that were at the basis of Alessandri's platform. Unfortunately, the military Cabinet that rebelled against the establishment of salaries for members of Parliament advanced as one of the urgent points in its own program of reforms an increase of pay to the military. At a time when Chile was all but bankrupt, such a clumsy trick makes it hard to believe the assertion that the armed movement is inspired by an unselfish and patriotic group of responsible citizens from all ranks of Chilean society. Through no fault of his own President Alessandri did not fulfil the expectations which Chilean democracy once centered in him. Caught between a well-intrenched senatorial opposition and a hungry flock of followers, Alessandri, during his four years in office, could neither reduce public expenditures nor materialize into laws the many important reforms he had bound himself to effect. So the masses that had idolized him, and the radical party that was his Imperial Guard to victory, ended by deserting him at the moment the pressure of the military and naval juntas was made manifest. Probably General Altamirano's Cabinet would have been satisfied to assume the reins of government, leaving Alessandri in the saddle for form's sake until the expiration of his five-year term in 1925. But Alessandri is too dominating a personality, besides being too clever a politician, to take a second seat with more responsibilities than prerogatives attached to it. Now a frankly reactionary coalition is in charge, and must justify its claim to a more disciplined and economic administration.

WE RECENTLY CONTRASTED Russia's and Scandinavia's enlightened laws for the protection of children of unmarried parents with the medieval system generally in vogue in other modern countries—including England, which has lately adopted a half-hearted "reform," and the United States. But the United States is forty-eight countries when it comes to laws of this nature, and their standards of enlightenment in regard to the treatment of children vary widely. North Dakota, for instance, is far up the scale and deserves special notice. In that State, without wiping out the distinction between legitimate and illegitimate children, much of the effect of this distinction is nullified by careful provisions for support and inheritance. Once paternity is established by private court hearing the father of an illegitimate child becomes liable for the expenses of the mother's confinement, and the mother can recover "a reasonable allowance" for the support of the child. If the father dies, such claims may be enforced against his estate. Such a statute goes far toward abolishing the cruel handicaps loaded by society on helpless children; a social distinction that carries with it little or no economic penalty soon loses its sting.

WHETHER THE DEATH PENALTY is good or bad for society is far from universal settlement. But the increase of scientific knowledge will inevitably lead us to the position of considering crime a symptom of disease. Such a point of view is, of course, not compatible with the death penalty, though a long period of scientific research and public education may have to pass before we settle in any such rational position. Meanwhile, if we must put up with the odious practice, the executioner's job, like jury duty, might be made a civic duty. Judges and jury could then see to the bitter end the majesty of the law at work. They could share the feelings of John Ellis, England's famous hangman, who recently attempted to commit suicide as a result of brooding over the fact that he had sent to their doom more condemned murderers than any other man.

WE ARE GLAD that the zeal of a New Jersey clergyman was not sufficient to deport the Wild Bull of the Pampas. There seems to have been more than a little irregular in the admission of the illustrious Mr. Firpo to this country, but it is all too evident that the New Jersey clergyman was not sincerely concerned with this; he was trying to stop a prize-fight which, rightly or wrongly, was entirely within the law. This kind of indirection, all too common in our day, has hardly more justification than an attempt to head off a prosecution by "getting something" on the prosecutor. Just the same, the admission of Mr. Firpo makes one blink. Why was the lady who accompanied him less moral than he? Why was she packed back where she came from while he was made welcome? Of course it may be argued that by separating them, Mr. Firpo's morals were put beyond contamination. But as a matter of equal rights, we suggest that next time they shall be allowed to draw lots as to who shall stay and who shall go.

Efforts are being made by a group of Armenians to interest American capitalists in a plan to exploit Mount Ararat. The plan is to erect a funicular railway and to charge a small fee for making the ascent.—News item.

ON ARARAT, where Noah docked his ark,
Americans are asked to build a park,
That the undelugible hill may be Invaded by funicular for a fee;
That where the renovated race began
The tourist may deposit trash and can;
That in the ancient footpath of the Lord
The loud Rotarian may steer his Ford.
Does Ararat today not wonder if
He was too hospitable to that skiff?

Our Despotic Courts

A DECLARATION in favor of maintaining the powers of our courts as they are was made on the same day, September 6, by the presidential candidates of both the Republican and Democratic parties. Although Senator La Follette was not mentioned by name, both declarations were obviously aimed at his proposal to give Congress—through amending the Constitution—the power to override by a two-thirds vote a decision of the Supreme Court. On September 11 "Hell and Maria" Dawes joined in the discussion, attacking Mr. La Follette by name as a "master demagogue." It happens that the platform of the Progressive Party contains only a general declaration in favor of limiting judicial tyranny and not the specific method of dealing with the Supreme Court suggested by Mr. La Follette. Neither has the Senator stressed the proposal personally in his speeches. But since we regard the curbing of the despotism of our courts (the sole custodians now of the old "divine right of kings") as one of the supreme issues of the day we are glad that the Republican and Democratic candidates have injected it into the campaign.

Mr. Davis touched on this tremendous subject in only a passing way in his speech at Omaha, but his intent was clear. President Coolidge made the defense of existing powers and practices of the courts the outstanding note in his speech at Baltimore, and we credit him with an able presentation of the subject from his point of view. He emphasized especially the place of the courts in protecting the minority from the tyranny of the majority, remarking:

> Somewhere must be lodged the power to declare the Constitution. If it be taken away from the court, it must go either to the executive or the legislative branch of the government. No one, so far as I know, has thought that it should go to the executive. All those who advocate changes propose, I believe, that it should be transferred in whole or in part to the Congress. I have a very high regard for legislative assemblies. . . . But the legislature is not judicial.

No, the legislature is not judicial. But all too often neither are the courts. That is the essence of the trouble. Numerous other countries with written constitutions give to their courts, directly or impliedly, the authority to interpret these documents, but in not a single instance has it been used as in the United States, and in no other country is progressive public opinion outraged over the exercise of such power. This is not altogether the fault of our judges. Perhaps it is not their fault at all. Our federal Constitution, and also those of our States, contains certain broad provisions—particularly bills of rights—the interpretation of which cannot be strictly judicial. That is, any interpretation involves a determination of policy—which is a legislative act. So there you are. The United States Supreme Court is practically a third house of Congress. But, unlike the other two, it is not subject to the veto of the President and it is not elected by the people. Yet its voice is final and absolute.

And that is not the worst of it. The worst of it is that whereas Congress changes its opinion from year to year to conform with progress and new public opinion, the Supreme Court acts according to precedent. What was decided in 1824 has to stand in 1924 also. Thus the court is progressively falling behind the times. In the early years of the republic the court's decisions generally met with public approval because they were fresh-made and in line with the thought of their day. This is no longer true. Since the interpretation of our federal Constitution is often necessarily a legislative act, isn't it our wisest course to put this power—with certain limitations as proposed by Mr. La Follette—in the hands of the elected representatives of the people?

Mr. Coolidge seems to think that there are only two alternatives: either to adopt England's way of having no written constitution and leaving Parliament supreme or to accept the American method of a written constitution with the United States Supreme Court as the final arbiter of it. Mr. Coolidge lacks information. In The Nation of May 14, last, Professor Charles Grove Haines of the School of Law of the University of Texas and a recognized authority on the courts of foreign countries pointed out that the great republic of France had adopted a third principle:

> The same theory of separation of powers which was thought in America to require judicial review of legislative acts to preserve written constitutions and to protect individual rights was interpreted in France to forbid the judges from interfering in the exercise of legislative power and of preventing them from suspending the execution of laws. . . . France is one of the chief examples of a government with a written constitution and legislative supremacy; that is, where the protection and guaranties of the constitution rest with the legislature itself, guided and tempered by public opinion as the source of legislative power and authority.

Thus the citizens of France have long maintained their liberties under a system which Mr. La Follette would introduce in a limited way into the United States. Can "Hell and Maria" Dawes dismiss this proposal, then, as merely the wild theory of a "master demagogue"?

The Nation is under no illusions in regard to the wisdom of Congress or the tolerance of majorities. It is sure that Congress would occasionally abuse such powers as Mr. La Follette would give it, if it had them. We think, though, that Congress would not often overrule the Supreme Court. It does not now pass much legislation over the President's veto. It would override the Supreme Court far less often, since the decisions of the latter come months and years after the passage of an act, when passions have cooled and personalities are forgotten. We think, too, that the possession of such powers in Congress would do much toward leading the Supreme Court toward more progressive views.

Finally, we would observe that freedom for the individual and respect for minorities have no security either through Congress or the Supreme Court except in so far as there is a compelling spirit of liberty and tolerance in the community behind them. Our war-time espionage law plainly violated the constitutional guaranties of free speech and a free press, but it was upheld by the Supreme Court because the spirit of our people condoned such violation in the hysteria of conflict. Alexander Hamilton said of the freedom of the press, and it applies to all liberty:

> Its security, whatever fine declarations may be inserted in any constitution respecting it, must altogether depend on public opinion and on the general spirit of the people and of the government. And here, after all . . . must we seek for the one solid basis of all our rights.

It's a Way We Have in the Army

PAXTON HIBBEN is not an officer in the regular army. He is not earning his living under the War Department nor at the present time subject to its orders. He served with credit as a captain during the European War, and is willing to hold himself in readiness for future duty to the extent of remaining in the Officers' Reserve Corps. Must he, therefore, refrain from expressing views contrary to those held at any moment by the chiefs of the War Department or in opposition to the official attitude of whatever administration happens to be in office?

On May 28, 1923, Captain Hibben was examined for promotion in the Reserve Corps by a board of officers who recommended that he be made a major of Field Artillery. But Captain Hibben was not promoted. He had been engaged in relief work for Russian children, and had publicly expressed himself in favor of the recognition of Soviet Russia. On the basis of a report by William J. Burns, then chief of the infamous and now happily defunct Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, the Secretary of War ordered General Bullard to conduct an investigation into the fitness of Captain Hibben for promotion. A board of officers assembled last October, but upon Captain Hibben's demand to be informed of the charges against him the inquiry was dropped and his request to see the papers in the case was denied on the ground that it would be prejudicial to the Government. On May 15, last, Captain Hibben asked for a Court of Inquiry, the legal method of proceeding. This was denied, and instead another board of officers was appointed to make an inquiry. Its sittings have just been concluded.

"This is not a trial," said the head of the board, Brigadier General William Barclay Parsons, with destructive frankness. Then what was it and why was it? The admission was a confession that the proceedings were extra legal—if not illegal—and that the War Department was going beyond the law in the effort to injure a man who disagreed with it. As at the previous inquiry, there were no charges. The hearing was frankly an inquisition. Nor did the head of the board conceal his bias. He said:

> Mental characteristics that would not in any way affect him as an individual or associate might well serve to disqualify him for exercising command over other men. The very friendships that a man makes, entirely harmless in themselves, might be such as to cause doubt in the minds of men under him and of superior officers as to whether an officer with similar connections could be relied on to act with requisite firmness in suppressing a rising against the public peace or proceeding against a particular enemy.

Captain Hibben, on his part, admitted his sympathy with the labor movement and his intention to vote for La Follette. Standing on his right to hold and express his own views as a citizen, he quoted Woodrow Wilson:

> Our life has changed and our politics are belated. Those who insist upon undertaking adjustment, those who argue that our laws should be brought up to date—to the date marked by our economic advance and change—are called radicals, not because they would change facts, but because they would adjust the laws to the facts.

These were his views, said Captain Hibben. "I do not call this communism; I call it common sense. I do not call it socialism; I call it sanity." The makers of revolution were not those who faced the issue, he continued, but those who denied it.

Captain Hibben and his counsel, Colonel John J. Bradley of the regular army, deserve all thanks for their effort and courage in fighting this case instead of letting it drop, as the War Department would like. Since the recent hearing was not a trial, there will be no public verdict and possibly not even any official action. But the issue is in a sense settled already. If officers of the Reserve Corps are to be subject to inquisition for their political and economic beliefs, the self-respecting and independent minded will soon get out. Neither the opinions nor the services of the dregs that remain will be of enough value to raise any controversy.

Automobile Ups and Downs

THE failure of the Lafayette Motors Corporation and the sale of its assets is another reminder that not all who embark in the motor industry reap enormous rewards. Where Henry Ford, the Dodge brothers, and some others have won huge fortunes, there are plenty who, like the Lafayette stockholders, have practically lost all they put in. There is a long list of once well-known cars which are no longer being produced or have fallen into obscurity. For instance, the Winton, which is widely believed to have been the first American gasoline car, is no longer being made; the Simplex, the Crane, and the Liberty are, we understand, no longer being manufactured, while others that were once leaders have dropped out of the running. Still other well-known companies, like the Locomobile and the Peerless, have had their financial troubles; and the Pierce Arrow has found it necessary to produce a considerably cheaper car, precisely as the Packard put its "single-six" upon the market several years ago.

Indeed, this action of the Pierce Arrow and the failure of the Lafayette seem to prove that the field of the very expensive car is extremely limited. The multi-millionaires have their Rolls-Royces and enough costly American cars to choose from. But the bulk of motor-car owners are naturally purchasers of much cheaper vehicles. Hence this is the day of the moderate-priced car. It is precisely in the $1,500 to $2,200 class that we have witnessed great mechanical improvements in the last few years, notably in the motors themselves. Take the Buick, for instance. Once a mediocre product, it is now so good an automobile that one wonders whether the General Motors Company has not unwittingly injured the market for another of its cars, the Cadillac, by making such excellent Buicks. That the public appreciates a medium-priced car is shown not only by the huge Buick sales but by the phenomenal success of the Chrysler car. Brought out only last spring, the latter, which was sold at first on the reputation of the skilled engineer who gave it its name, is now in no further need of artificial "boosting." It appears to be selling itself.

But success brings dangers with it, and it will be interesting to see if this car, which apparently demonstrates, like the Flint, that there is always room for one more automobile, will avoid the errors which have wrecked so many other companies. The constant changing of types of motor, the failure to keep up standards of manufacture, with a large product, and the effort to put profits before anything else, together with waste, extravagance, and uneven workmanship, have proved the undoing of high hopes. Competition, too, has its effect. If one looks at the Stock Exchange prices for motor-car stocks it is plain that to produce a car is not by itself to guarantee riches. Thus General Motors common sells at 14¾, Hudson Motor Car at 29, Jordan at 31, Pierce Arrow at 10 (preferred 34), Studebaker at 39, Moon at 22, while Nash Motors shines at 129. Yet the demand for cars seems to keep up amazingly and the saturation-point is not yet reached. Reports from the West declare that even the tramps now have their Fords and that the "gas hobo" has appeared in the wheat-fields, where he works for a few days in one place and then travels on, not by stealing rides on freight trains but in his own car! Statisticians report that among motor-car owners are many with incomes of only $1,500 a year. What will happen to our roads and our cities when those who have $1,000 a year take to driving? In view of the existing congestion in our inadequate streets and of the skyscraper garages which are already rising to meet the lack of parking space in some cities one wonders what revolutions the motor car still has in store.

When We Spoke "Pieces"

THE passing of the "piece"-speaking is vividly signaled by the news that William W. Delaney, who for more than thirty years has been publishing books of popular songs and recitations from his shop on New York's Park Row, is winding up his business. In the generation that he has been publishing Mr. Delaney has issued eighty-nine song-books and eleven volumes of recitations.

Sentiment flows and pours and gushes out of Delaney's Recitations No. 1. Several selections from Longfellow ("A Psalm of Life" and "Excelsior," for instance) appear in this first volume, while Will Carleton is represented by "Over the Hill to the Poorhouse," "Betsy and I Are Out," and other favorites. But to a large extent the selections are anonymous; they are waifs from the newspapers or magazines of the day, whose authors are unknown or at least uncredited by Mr. Delaney. "Guilty or Not Guilty," for instance, tells the story of "a creature wan and wild" brought before "the bar of justice."

"Your name," said the judge, as he eyed her with kindly look yet keen—
"Is Mary McGuire, if you please, sir." "And your age?" "I'm turned fifteen."
"Well, Mary," and then from a paper he slowly and gravely read,
"You are charg'd here—I'm sorry to say it—with stealing three loaves of bread."

Then Mary:

"I could get no more employment, the weather was bitter cold.
The young ones cried and shivered—(Little Johnny's but four years old).
So, what was I to do, sir? I am guilty, but do not condemn.
I took—Oh, was it stealing?—the bread to give to them."

Whereupon, of course, tears sprang to the eyes of strong men, the judge "cleared his throat," a collection was raised, and Mary was set free. Other sentimental classics preserved in Mr. Delaney's first volume are "The Face on the Floor" (elsewhere commonly called "The Face on the Barroom Floor"), "Asleep at the Switch," "Woodman, Spare That Tree," and "Christmas Day in the Workhouse"—the latter by George R. Sims, a former popular favorite now forgotten.

It is surprising to note the number of popular recitations which are anti-liquor sermons. Evidently the anti-liquor crusade of those days was much more a moral appeal than in recent years when emphasis on economic aspects finally brought prohibition to pass. Certainly there is a moral fervor that our twentieth century has never touched in "One Glass More," "Please Don't Sell My Father Rum," and "The Lips That Touch Liquor Must Never Touch Mine."

You are coming to woo me, but not as of yore,
When I hastened to welcome your ring at the door;
For I trusted that he who stood waiting me then,
Was the brightest, the truest, the noblest of men.
Your lips on my own when they printed "Farewell,"
Had never been soiled by "the beverage of hell";
But they come to me now with the bacchanal sign,
And the lips that touch liquor must never touch mine.

But though, heartbroken, she sends him from her door, there is hope:

If one spark, in your bosom, of virtue remain,
Go fan it with prayer till it kindle again;
Resolved, with "God helping," in future to be
From wine and its follies unshackled and free!
And when you have conquered this foe of your soul—
In manhood and honor beyond his control—
This heart will again beat responsive to thine,
And the lips free from liquor be welcome to mine.

Delaney's Recitations No. 2 is devoted to the comic spirit. Thumbing through this volume it appears that in the 70's and 80's it was a wild and hilarious adventure for a young man to kiss a young lady not of his own family. The popular stage settings were a hammock, a buggy, or a dark veranda. Other popular topics for the wits—in those far-away days before Ford jokes had been invented or the five-foot shelf of bootleggers' humor had appeared—were tramps, baseball, pugnacious dogs, crying babies, red-headed girls, landladies, widows, Germans, and Irishmen (the latter usually named McGinty and possessed of either a goat or a pig). Poems about Germans and Irishmen were invariably in dialect—so-called. Parodies appear to have been immensely popular, especially those in the German dialect of Charles F. Adams.

Oh, yes, and mules—kicking mules. They were a great boon to the comic poets of our fathers. The epitaph of one such beast sets forth:

He never did a decent thing, he wasn't worth a ducat;
He kicked and kicked until he died, and then he kicked the bucket.

Another and more appreciative commentary on the mule tells how one once weathered a storm which beat upon him in the hope of taming his defiant spirit:

The mule he budged not an inch, but kept a stiffened lip.
And raising of his tail aloft, said, "Storm king, crack your whip!"

Whereupon

The lightning danced a gallopade and seemed to say "Thou fool!"
And then shot out vindictively and struck that cussed mule.
! ! ! ! ! ! ! ! !
And this was years and years ago—since when it's been a rule
Of lightning and the elements to fight shy of the mule.

Wheeler Invades New York

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"WHO," asked a speaker at the Cooper Union meeting, "is John W. Davis?" Whereupon a voice from the back of the hall answered amid much laughter: "Adolph S. Ochs." If there is, perhaps, some reason for this confusion of identity, no one would, I am sure, answer similarly as to who is Burton K. Wheeler, Senator from Montana; for Adolph S. Ochs's New York Times has described him to all the world just as he is and informed us that he, of all the three vice-presidential candidates, is "most likely to harm his own cause." This we learn is due "to his violence of speech, his recklessness in personal attack upon President Coolidge and others, his too great willingness to blow his own horn." Having for years been thoroughly familiar with just what radicals and Socialists think, the Times goes on to assure us that "even radicals and Socialists desire a certain amount of dignity and discretion in their candidates for high public office"; and again cheerfully concludes that "Senator Wheeler bids fair to disquiet his own assured supporters and to repel any who might be won over by sounder arguments and better manners."

Now, I was tremendously relieved when I read this description of the fighting Senator from Montana because I had begun to feel that, as usual, there was something seriously wrong with my powers of observation as well as with my facts and my point of view, for I had been traveling some days with the candidate for Vice-President on the La Follette ticket and somehow I had gained a totally different idea of this man. I had seen a quiet-voiced, earnest person rise and go to the front of the platform and speak from half an hour to an hour and a quarter without the slightest effort at oratory, without a single one of the traits usually associated with one's conception of a demagogue. He made no effort, this violent and reckless radical, to stir the passions of his fellow-men, according to my observation. He did not bellow and rant, while his gesticulations were few and not graceful. He made no effort to vary the tone of his speech and failed to work up to a single climax. I realize now, thanks to the Times, that what I took for simplicity and unstudied and uncalculated speech was simply the extraordinary skill of this man in eschewing the usual methods and thereby throwing his auditors off the track. I see now that it was art raised to the n^{th} degree, an art that Sarah Bernhardt might have envied, an art that is more calculated to stir the hearts of his hearers to mutiny and rage than any effort to split the ears of the groundlings.

Yes, this is a dangerous man. Especially, after reading that editorial I could see what the Times meant by the recklessness of Senator Wheeler's personal attacks upon President Coolidge. It is true that I remembered that only a few days previously the Times had been girding at those Republicans who protested because John W. Davis assailed the President in his speech of acceptance. But then, of course, it makes a great difference on what ticket you run as to how one portrays or criticizes or defends a man's manners and methods in campaign times. If I had not been informed otherwise I should have stated that I heard him speak on an average of three times a day for a week and that I never once heard him blow his own horn, or use the personal pronoun except to poke fun at himself as often as he told of what he had accomplished. In my folly I thought I had never heard a man speak so often with so little trace of egotism. Again and again he assured his audiences that he was not there to appeal on behalf of himself, but on behalf of La Follette, the leader, and the cause. That, of course, I know now, was devilishly sly work to conceal his own passionate ambition for office, his own lack of courtesy and manners.

It is dreadfully reckless, I see now, for Senator Wheeler to point out that President Coolidge has never lifted a finger to help the investigators, but has done everything to hinder instead of help; for the truth is often an unmannerly jade. It was certainly rude and ungentlemanly of him to dwell repeatedly and satirically upon the "strong, mythical, and silent man" in the White House, and to tell a most impolite story about the foolish boy whose father counseled him to say nothing lest his foolishness be found out; and who was called a fool none the less when he declined to answer questions. That must have been hitting below the belt. And yet somehow even that seems to my dull mind as rather tame stuff to come from the conventional Montana cowboy kicking his spurred heels together as he leaps in the air to shoot off an oratorical pistol in either hand.

But the puzzling thing remains that the audiences which came to hear this violent and reckless person, who hardly ever raised his voice, remained to the bitter end to hear him. One forgets a good deal, of course, between campaigns, but it seemed to me that I had never beheld more interested faces than were upturned to this slow-spoken artist as he told the dramatic story of what his investigation of the office of Harry M. Daugherty had actually brought out. Perhaps it is the completest tribute to his artistry that the tenth time I heard him tell that story I listened with as much fascination and interest as I had the first time. Certainly at Rochester only a few of the 2,500 people who came to our meeting, which did not begin until nine o'clock, had left when the Senator stopped talking at twenty minutes past eleven. I caught myself saying: "If everybody in the United States could hear this man talk the vote would be unanimous for him and La Follette"—and then I remembered the hopelessly lost vote of the New York Times.

Then I must confess that we found we had lost another equally important group vote—the undertaker vote. At Watertown the meeting began late too. Our friends had first engaged the Odd Fellows Hall, but when they went to the undertakers to hire chairs there were none to be had. Curiously enough, each undertaker was undertaking a funeral or a wedding or a dance at that very hour on that very night, and so no radicals could sit on their chairs. So we were moved to the high-school auditorium and there the Senator told his amazing story in the same quiet tones to the people who came to hear him. There were some judges and some lawyers in the audience, but in the main they were simpler people, a part of the minority in as rock-ribbed a Republican district as is to be found in New York State, a representation of a great mass who know that there is something wrong with the country, who want to find the way out, but who, for the most part, are still in the thraldom of party, are still poisoned by a press which brands everything new and progressive as radical and dangerous.

They were much the same, these audiences, at Albany, Troy, Schenectady, Utica, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo—wherever we went. Usually the gatherings were small, often outdoors in cold and rain, the advance work being not always skilfully done, for the La Follette cause is, thank fortune, without the professional worker, experienced in getting up great mass meetings with plenty of money for red fire, bands, banners, and newspaper advertising. But the quality of the men and women in the audience, their earnestness and sincerity, the fact that numbers came to be converted, and the resultant newspaper publicity made the trip stimulating to us. It was something to sit in the railroad trains and have the plain-spoken trainmen come up and shake hands with the Senator, wish him the best of luck, tell him how their lodges stood, and what the travelers' sentiment was. It was pleasant to learn from them that though the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen has officially not indorsed the Progressive ticket most of its members, in some places all of its membership, will vote for La Follette and Wheeler. You got a sense of ruggedness in the men; the absence of boastfulness, or of absurd claims as to carrying this or that district, all made you feel that this movement has its roots deeper in the soil than any similar movement has had. Rightly or wrongly this campaign is distinctive in that it has come from underneath.

These earnest people who came to hear us understood and appreciated the speaker. They felt his leadership and they gave him the response of absolute attention and complete absorption, which are the highest tributes that can be paid to a speaker. They are not vocal; they do not find it easy to voice their desires and their needs, but the stirrings are there, and no one who left the Wheeler meetings could have any doubt that the auditors are not to be bought off by higher prices of wheat or any other temporary fluctuation in the prices of crops or of goods. The knowledge that something is very wrong has gone far. The only two questions are as to the leadership at hand and how the message of the new leaders can be got to the public. From the point of view of both these questions the Wheeler trip was a profound success.

Upon one thing everybody was united—trainmen, A. F. of L. leaders, newspaper men, business men, all whom we met—that John W. Davis is hardly in the picture; that it will soon be necessary not only to advertise for his whereabouts but to assure people that he is really in the running in New York State. Of course, it is a little early in the campaign, but we did not see a banner or a picture of Davis or a Davis badge or any local Davis publicity in any of the towns we visited. On the contrary, we were repeatedly assured that Davis would poll so small a vote as to be a negligible factor. On the other hand, in Rochester newspaper men and Democratic politicians, speaking separately, gave La Follette nearly one vote in every four of the 100,000 that are likely to be cast in the election. There are certain towns in the southern tier in New York County in which labor is in control. It will carry those towns for La Follette. The audience of 6,000 persons at Buffalo affords ground for the belief that an amazingly large vote will be polled for the Progressive ticket in that city. The work of education has begun; the fight for economic liberty is well started.

But always my mind goes back to the so-called rampant demagogue with whom we traveled, never out of patience, never concerned about his dignity, or the honors due him; always quiet, modest, unassuming; always full of anecdotes and reminiscences of the arduous struggle of his political life; to him defeat was a commonplace and victory a stimulating experience. Somehow or other to my foolish vision, his is a remarkably heartening personality, because Mr. Wheeler has proved anew that however bad the situation in Washington, it is still possible for a man of unselfish and shining honesty to come into our public life as a stranger from the West and make a nation-wide reputation for himself within three months. He affords the happy assurance that in a national emergency men of the necessary stature are to be found to lead a revolt against the iniquities in our public life. There is something about him that suggests Henry Clay to me, though Wheeler is without the polish and the education which marked that Kentucky aristocrat. Nature has given him a fine stature, a pleasant and winning smile, a directness which carries its message precisely as his well-modulated voice reaches the hearers in the back of the room, without any effort on the speaker's part.

Meanwhile, Senator Wheeler has jumped to Pennsylvania, and will go on to Ohio and the West. He will know neither rest nor peace nor quiet until Election Day comes with the surprises it has in store for us all. I can only record what I would have written had I not read that Times editorial: Wherever Burton K. Wheeler goes, he will make votes, he will stir the hearts and minds of his listeners; and whether those be Republicans or Democrats or radicals or Socialists or reformers of any stripe he will help the ticket, help it immensely, and strengthen in the faith every one who hears his voice.

Contributors to This Issue

SARAH N. CLEGHORN, an author whose most recent book was "Portraits and Protests," is now teaching English in Manumit School, a new idea in workers' education at Pawling, New York.

H. G. ANDREWS is a member of the Institute of American Business. His previous contributions to our columns will be recalled by our readers.

HERBERT W. HORWILL is an English journalist who frequently contributes to The Nation.

ERNEST GRUENING, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is now national publicity director for the La Follette-Wheeler campaign.

EMIL LENGYEL is a Hungarian journalist now in New York City.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL is a lawyer in Chicago who has devoted special attention to economic problems.

KARL F. GEISER is professor of political science in Oberlin College.

Plymouth, Clarksburg, Madison

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

IT is amazing how faithfully the three presidential candidates resemble their own respective home towns. Plymouth, Vermont, is capitalistic, democratic equalitarianism. Clarksburg, West Virginia, is aristocratic, hierarchical, rank-upon-rank, Jeffersonian, emotional democracy. Madison, Wisconsin, is sociological, statistical, dry-as-dust research and barking, under-dog radicalism, arm in arm.

In Plymouth nobody is really rich, everybody is equalitarian, and everybody believes in ground-rent, interest, and dividends as devoutly as Mr. Morgan ever could even if he stretched himself. There is a lovely story about a Western traveler in a Vermont town who was bragging to a gaunt starveling native about the fertility and bounteousness of the fields in his Western State. He derided the boulder-strewn sterility of the Vermont hills rising before his eyes. The native rejoined: "I wish I could collect some of my interest on my mortgages in your State."

Calvin Coolidge does not need to be asked by Wall Street to believe in interest or to believe in the indefeasible and irrepealable right of a man to hold what he has and to part with it only on his own terms. It is hard to persuade a Vermonter that if you hold a thing which is worth "x" dollars until somebody is willing to give you "x plus seven" dollars for it anything has happened that is anybody else's business. When Calvin Coolidge's writings are read by posterity, the grammarians who may be assigned to count the occurrences of the word "profiteer" in them will have little to do.

You keep or you sell, and you stay poor or you get rich, and everything may come out to be terribly unequal from the standpoint of economics, and yet everything is—and must remain—absolutely equal from the standpoint of personalities! Personal democracy and no economic democracy, social democracy and no sociological democracy—that is the drift of the temper of Plymouth and of Coolidge.

Davis and Clarksburg are more difficult to state. Yet Davis is as truly Clarksburg as Coolidge is truly Plymouth. Plymouth is a unity. Clarksburg has social strata. Rough-stuff miners come into Clarksburg. It is in that way industrial. Its miners and its other rather rough-stuff frequenters have a certain link to the mountains. In the mountains there are hill-billies. They are thought to be rough-stuff indeed. In the very center of Clarksburg, however, there is an old mansion with a large lawn in front of it, serenely holding at bay all commercialism, all industrialism, all roughness.

Clarksburg is rougher than Plymouth. It is also more urbane. Davis comes from the urbane part of it. He comes from what in a moment of frankness might be called the upper part of it. In Plymouth there is no upper part. In Clarksburg there is. Davis comes from it, quite outstandingly.

Is he therefore more capitalistic than Coolidge? Not at all. Clarksburg, being located where it is, has the Jeffersonian touch. Clarksburg can both recognize the existence of aristocracy and at the same time call everybody by his first name and start off on great crusades against capital—Eastern capital.

These Eastern and Northern capitalists who fatten off the tariff! Davis is just as much against them as if he had never seen New York. He comes from Clarksburg. He also is emotionally, personally democratic. Plymouth people are equals who do not speak. Clarksburg people are unequals who throw their arms about one another. Davis accordingly thinks that probably something ought to be done about hill-billies and Nebraska farmers who are having a bad time in comparison with Wall Street capitalists.

Coolidge's idea of helping a pauper is first to lower his taxes and then to hand him a tract telling him to have faith in Massachusetts—or Nebraska—or himself—or anything except the federal Government. It is not merely a difference between two men. It is a difference between two towns, two cultures.

Madison, Wisconsin, meanwhile is a garrison of statisticians who would burst the heads of the simple inhabitants of Plymouth or of the genial inhabitants of Clarksburg. Political and social progress through statistical and sociological research: that is an idea that never occurred to Plymouth or Clarksburg.

Put-'em-in-the-Brig-adier General Dawes says that La Follette is a demagogue. This makes La Follette all the more wonderful. He then becomes the only demagogue who ever carried in his wake whole card-catalogues of scientifically arranged research and information. The companies and regiments and divisions and corps and armies of researchers now encamped in Madison in the Wisconsin State University and in the Wisconsin State Capitol owe a very large part of their encampment to La Follette. He wanted Madison to be that way. As Governor of Wisconsin he insisted on making it that way.

These researchers have studied cows, alfalfa, unemployment, the number of workmen's thumbs lost in industrial accidents in machine-shops, water-power, the value of unoccupied lots in Milwaukee, stream-flow, the Irish tenant system, the reforms of Tiberius Gracchus, taxation in Yucatan, and every other subject in the world with an eye to its applicability to that great supreme world-theme, Wisconsin. La Follette was pretty nearly the inventor of this!

Madison was perhaps a bit that way before him. He made it that way exuberantly, triumphantly. The fate of the rebellious, radical low-brow determined in legislation by the scholastic, specialistic high-brow! That is the idea which La Follette—more than any other man—has contributed to American life. The scholars working for this demagogue La Follette would make Brigadier General Dawes—if he were not, for compensation, a splendid violinist and a true artist—look like a camp cook.

Three men; three towns; three cultures; three automatic—in this writer's view—sincerities. We choose between the sincerities and the cultures as we choose between the men.

One difference between the men remains. Coolidge and Davis are products of their towns. They are products. La Follette, besides being a product of his town, also produced it. His demoniac vigor, for woe or weal, shows nowhere more clearly than in this: he is the only candidate who was not only made by, but made, his home town.

Jim Denson—A Fragment of History

By SARAH N. CLEGHORN

I TOOK up the Macon News one winter afternoon from the steps where the newsboy had hurled it, and read on the front page an account of the bringing of a Negro boy named Jim Denson on the previous day from Wilkinson County to Bibb County to save him from a probable lynching. He had just been convicted, in his home county, of the rape of a white woman seventy years old. He was to be taken back there and hanged on the following Friday.

The feature in this story that had evidently most impressed the reporter was that the nephews of the injured woman had protected Denson from the mob, and had stood throughout the trial as the firm friends of law and order. And this impressed me, too; but I was even more impressed by another feature of the story, namely, that no defense whatever had been made for the prisoner. (It goes without saying, of course, that he had not been confronted in court with his alleged victim.) The judge had indeed appointed a lawyer to defend him, since he was without either friends or funds; but this lawyer had contented himself with saying that the defense had nothing to say.

So much for the Macon paper's account. I was going to the jail on the following day with some pie and oranges for the prisoners, many of whom I knew quite well. I visited the baker's on Cotton Avenue, and went to the jail with my basket of lemon and apple pies. The warden, or jailer, as he is called, let me in with his usual friendly greeting, and I walked along the narrow corridors in front of the cages chatting with my friends of both colors as they chose the pie they preferred and their favorite magazine from my armful of second-hand ones, or asked for a stamped envelope or postal card. There were in the Bibb County jail that winter a number of white men accused of murder, awaiting trial, or having been convicted and sentenced for life, or less, awaiting transportation to the State farm; or else either hoping for a new trial, or awaiting it when it had been awarded them. None of these men, most of whom had shot some person after a quarrel, was under sentence of death; the hanging machine, which I had been shown on my first visit to the jail, was not overshadowing my heart as I talked to them. There were also one or two Negroes in the jail who had been convicted of murdering other Negroes, and these also had been sentenced for life. Jim Denson, accordingly, was the only person in the jail under sentence of death; and I thought he would be, perhaps, in a cell apart.

But when, upon leaving, I asked the warden if I could see him, the warden answered: "Why, he's right in there with the other boys—you've walked right past him, and given him pie."

"Oh! Can I go back, then, and speak to him?"

"Why, sure. He's going to be hung Friday."

I was let in again. I walked along the front of the colored men's cage, on the lowest level, and said: "Which is Jim Denson?"

"Over there, ma'am."

"Are you Jim Denson?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Oh! How old are you?"

"Eighteen."

"Who belongs to you?"

"I've got a father living."

"What church do you belong to?"

"I don't belong to no church."

"Can you read?"

"No, ma'am. Never been to no school."

I asked him to tell me about his trial.

"They voted to hang me Friday."

"Did you speak in court?"

"No, ma'am."

"Why didn't you?"

"Nobody done told me to."

"Jim, what made them arrest you?"

"I don't know. They just took me."

Jim Denson looked like a stone. He spoke without modulation. If a stone could be imagined speaking, he spoke like a stone.

"When they carried me over here," he volunteered, "some of them done follow me with a coffin."

"Don't you want a minister to come and see you? A colored minister?"

"Yeass'm. I wishes I could see my father."

"Where does he live? I'll write and ask him to come."

"I wishes he would."

I went to see a Negro clergyman the next day—a stranger to me until that time. He said: "Yes, I know of Denson's case. I think probably a lawyer will be retained for him."

"Are you afraid," I asked, trembling, "that if any attempt is made to defend him, it will rouse a mob, and he will be taken out and . . . burned? Is it kinder to let him be mercifully hanged as soon as possible, whether he is guilty or not, for fear . . .?"

"No, no. I think you exaggerate that danger," he replied.

"I hope I do!" I cried.

"I think you do," he repeated steadily. "But of course it exists."

There was a modest sum raised, among people all strangers to this friendless boy, for which a famous lawyer undertook his case. When I went to the jail with oranges and doughnuts on the following Saturday, Jim Denson was still there.

"I'm glad you have a lawyer," I said. "I hope you can prove to everybody that you didn't do it."

"I hopes so," said the young stone face before me. "I wishes I could see my father."

"Oh—hasn't he come to see you? I wrote to him."

"No, ma'am. I wishes he would."

This wish, never gratified by so much as a message, was the only one Jim Denson ever expressed twice, in his talk or letters to me. One other wish he did express once—a wish for a pair of shoes.

"There is," he dictated to one of the ever-shifting fellow-prisoners who wrote his letters to me, "there is some wealthy boys in here, who has offered me their shoes, but my feet is too big. I wish, ma'am, you could send me some."

His case was slowly carried up, from court to court. The summer came on, and I went home to Vermont. The autumn passed, and Jim Denson was still saying, in the ever-changing handwriting of one after another of his fellow-prisoners: "I hopes you are in good health, as I am. I am trusting in the Lord to see me through. My case is not decided yet. Thank you, ma'am, for the ten cents you done inclose me for ice cream."

The second winter passed, and his application for a new trial was steadily refused by every authority having jurisdiction. One of his white fellow-prisoners, a man I knew well, who had shot and killed his neighbor in a boundary-and-trespass quarrel, had by this time had three trials and was out on parole; this left Jim Denson his successor as the inmate then longest in the jail. "There is none of the boys here that remembers you," he wrote. "There was one here when your letter came, and I done remembered you to him as you said to. He went to the chain gang this week. My case is not decided yet. I am trusting the Lord as well as I can. The captain" (so the Negroes usually call the warden) "is kind to me, and thank you, ma'am, for the dime you done send me for pie. My health is good."

His health was good! When I had lived in Macon, the sheriff's rule had been never to allow any of the prisoners to step out for a single instant into the fresh air. Once I had seen some prisoners in the narrow yard, lounging along the whitewashed wall, gazing at the coal-heap, talking. They were federal prisoners, moonshiners; for the United States allowed its charges a little air every day.

The second summer passed, and in reply to an inquiry Jim Denson's lawyer wrote to me: "If you can help when the case goes to Washington, I will let you know."

The autumn passed, the winter came on, and Jim Denson began his third year in the Bibb County jail.

"Your letters are a comfort, ma'am," he wrote. "I wishes I could see my father, or hear from him. I has written him a number of letters, but gets no reply. The Lord will see me through my trouble. I am going to be baptized."

Presently he sent me a clipping. The Supreme Court had refused him a new trial. There was now no way in which this boy, who had been sentenced to death without a word of defense being spoken for him, could ever have a word of defense spoken.

"My lawyer say please, ma'am, write to the Governor and Prison Board of Georgia. Captain Tom is good and kind to me. He say he will have me some better clothes when they carry me back to Wilkinson County to sentence me over again. I have been baptized."

In this next letter he inclosed a long clipping from the Macon Telegraph. It was headed:

DENSON RECAPTURED AND BROUGHT TO THIS JAIL
NEGRO YOUTH IS CAUGHT BY DOGS NEAR IRWINTON EXCITING CHASE IS HELD
MAKES FRIENDS WITH DOGS

Two or three dozen white men, said to have come from the neighborhood of Toombsboro, Denson's home, had besieged the county jail at Irwinton as soon as Jim Denson was taken back there after being sentenced to die on the 16th of June. Sheriff Player stood them off for an hour, the Telegraph said, and indeed only yielded when he fell, wounded in the foot. They then swarmed into the jail and took the prisoner. "They tied a rope around my neck," Denson said to the Telegraph reporter. "They put me in the car, the second to the last one in the line. It was a two-seated Ford, and Mr. Brown, dressed in white pants, had hold of the rope. . . . I kept smelling liquor. . . . The rope around my neck was tight . . . I felt the knot with my hand. . . . It was a slip knot."

He slipped it off, and lifting up his feet, shot himself feet first over the side of the car. He struck on his feet, and was flung on his head in a ditch. The bullets from the car went wide. This was on Monday, the 22d of May.

All that night and the next day there was a posse of deputized sheriffs hunting him, with a son-in-law of the woman he was accused of assaulting among them. All that Tuesday Jim Denson was attempting to reach the sheriff of Wilkinson County, or else the Bibb County authorities, in a hope to save his life by surrendering to them. He dared not try to surrender to anyone else, for once when he had attempted it the farmer whom he had approached had shot at him, and he had fled on all fours to cover again.

The posse, torn and panting, followed three bloodhounds which had found the boy's trail. But when the hounds came up with him, he made friends with two of them, and had them following him in friendly fashion when the barking of the third dog, which he could not tame, led the posse up.

When he was manacled once more to the sheriff, Jim Denson was glad. In this green world, in the beginning of life, this young son of a golden-hearted race was glad to think that his white fellow-Americans, who had never sent him to school, who had condemned him at seventeen years of age to die after asking him to waive his legal rights to plead for his life, and who had steadily refused for three years to give him any possible chance to prove his innocence in court, would now lock him up again in a cage.

As the party came into Irwinton, the reporter said, a crowd came out to meet them. The sporting spirit of the master race seemed to have been aroused, and they began a movement at once to request clemency from the Governor. As they passed the gallows which stood in the rear of the Wilkinson County jail, Jim Denson said to the reporter: "Boss, you guess I'll ever hang?"

The crowd shouted, "No!"

It seemed as if there was a little hope, and yet, when we remembered the two attempts to lynch him, it scarcely seemed possible that Governor Hardwick would do more than grant a reprieve to reconsider, and then "let the law take its course." A commutation of sentence would cause a great deal of anger, and editorials would point out how this very commutation would prove an encouragement to lynching; and read in quarters where moonshine was plenty, these editorials would be enough to keep the old sport alive. And though people, in the first divine enjoyment of letting themselves be human, honestly and even warmly desire to befriend prisoners, those of us who have ever tried to mobilize their emotion know well how soon the undertow of caution runs back through it. They feel the "risk" of setting their names to a petition for mercy, and are not sharply aware of the risk they take in refusing to do so. If a man is accused of a horrifying-enough crime, people tend to think he must be guilty.

On the 14th of June, two years ago, I sent a night letter to Jim Denson, hoping against hope. On the 15th, I suppose, he was taken back to Irwinton to be hanged. On the 16th he was hanged.

"Ask Your Banker"

By H. G. ANDREWS

"WHEN in doubt, ask your banker." That is the rule laid down in all the financial copy-books for the guidance of the timid thrifty, who are supposed to be satisfied with safety and 5 per cent. Investments which pay 10 per cent or 12 per cent, 25 or even 50 per cent are taboo, being the perquisites of the banking fraternity.

If in doubt on that score, follow the rule: Ask your banker. Tell him you have an opportunity to invest a thousand dollars in a highly attractive business proposition, which is almost certain to pay 6 per cent from the very first. By the third year, it may be paying 8 per cent. And by the fourth, 12 per cent. After that, nobody knows; 75 per cent is not beyond the possibilities.

What does the banker think about it? You are anxious for his opinion. Before you have had time to finish the verbal prospectus the banker will say, in a patient, kindly superior sort of way: "My good man, don't you know that 12 per cent and 24 per cent annual dividends are bait put out to catch suckers? There is no such thing in sound, conservative business. Ventures which pay more than 6 per cent at the outside are risky—very risky."

Then, perhaps as an afterthought, the banker may inquire: "And in just what sort of a fly-by-night scheme are you thinking of wasting your money?"

That is your opportunity. Properly rebuked, you can reply mildly: "I was thinking of buying some stock in a bank."

That is the signal for the banker to sputter. He will probably tell you you have been deceived by the outpourings of a few ignorant radicals who know nothing about banking, which is a highly technical business, in which only the best minds can hope to score even a moderate success.

But hold your ground. The situation has its points of interest. For banking, it would seem, is the one best bet for the mediocre intellect. Banks are scattered around the country like currants in a bun. The baker, the butcher, and the candlestick-maker in Possum Glory can start one. And it will go, unless someone deliberately walks away with the funds given to it for safe-keeping. The druggist, the local Republican and Democratic bosses, and the leader of the local cigar workers' union in Bird-in-Hand can start a bank. And it will go. Indeed, banks have survived even when dishonest cashiers have pilfered them for years.

And banking is safe—just about twenty-seven times safer than a grocery store, a shoe shop, or a meat market. Safe—and profitable. So profitable that it is a "blue-sky" business. In many cases a bank is a Ponzi dream come true. For 50 per cent, 60 per cent—even 300 per cent on the original investment are quite within the possibilities.

In 1917 the Treasury Department made out a report for some inquiring senators who wanted information concerning corporate earnings and government revenues. In this report fifty-six banks were listed which pay annual dividends in excess of 50 per cent. In 1923 the average dividend paid by 8,238 national banks was 13.48 per cent.

Place these facts before your banker, and by the time you have finished he will have caught his stride and be prepared to point out the fallacies in your reasoning. Dividends, the banker will say, are paid on the basis of capital stock and not on the basis of invested capital, which is capital stock plus the accumulated surplus. A New York bank paying a 50 per cent dividend illustrates the banking contention. The capital stock of this institution is $10,000,000, which would indicate a dividend rate of 50 per cent a year, since $5,000,000 is returned to stockholders annually. But, says the banker, capital stock represents only a comparatively small part of the total capital invested. The surplus of the bank which pays these 50 per cent dividends is in excess of $55,000,000. That, says the banker, makes the real dividend approximately 7.7 per cent.

The unsophisticated investor, however, is less devious in his reasoning. Surplus to him represents earnings—which belong to the stockholders. A bank with a $55,000,000 surplus can go out of business any time it wants to, return the original investment to the stockholders, and, in addition, divide up surplus in accordance with stockholdings. The man who invests $1,000 in bank stock and then goes on about his business takes the view that all the money received by him as a direct result of that investment is a dividend. He holds that bank surplus is simply a delayed dividend.

Thus the returns on bank stock would indicate that banking is at variance with the accepted dictum of bankers—that high returns are permissible only when grave risks are incurred. Banking does not involve grave risks. Taken as a whole, it is the safest pursuit which the business world presents. The banker sits where the tides of commerce meet and takes his certain toll. The certainty with which the banker can dip into the stream of commerce is shown by the fact that the average value of all national bank stock at 100 par was, on September 15, 1923, $219.43 per share.

Without a doubt, there is plenty of "blue sky" in banking. So much, in fact, that if bank dividends were held down to 10 per cent a year on the original investment and earnings over that amount returned to bank depositors, the annual return on that basis would be approximately $125,000,000. That is $2,083,330,000 capitalized at 6 per cent. This means that holding down bank dividends to 10 per cent on the capital stock investment would be equivalent to adding more than two billion dollars to the savings of the depositing public—a job well worth undertaking.

And it is a job which is being undertaken by a comparatively new group which has stepped into the banking arena. During the last two years the so-called labor banks, sponsored and financed by labor unions, have accumulated combined capital resources in excess of $130,000,000. There are some forty-odd labor banks now in operation. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers has a chain of banks, for example, which now stretches from Boston and New York to Spokane, Washington. As so far developed, the labor bank of the American type adheres to only one outstanding principle which sharply differentiates it from the other banks. The labor bank restricts the dividends to be paid stockholders to at most 10 per cent a year.

The limit on bank dividends strikes a very direct blow at the present banking system, which provides for the pyramiding of profits. As a result of this, many of the advantages arising through combination or through improved methods or invention have been completely wiped out. Capitalized through the pyramiding of profits, they have become permanent burdens upon the public.

The theory of the profit-sharing labor bank is that the public is a partner in the banking business. Therefore, invested capital in the form of accumulated surplus, says the labor banker, should work in the interests of the depositor, instead of working solely in the interests of the stockholder. There the issue is joined. On the one hand is the group of labor banks intent upon taking the "blue sky" out of banking. On the other hand is the old-line banking crew intent upon retaining all of the special privileges now inherent in the banking business. With the issue joined on that basis, one principle or the other must ultimately triumph. Either the banks which limit dividends to 10 per cent will be driven from the field or all banks will be compelled to accord the depositor the status of partnership. The labor bank, say its proponents, is the cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, which is slowly gathering on the financial horizon. This cloud does not threaten banking; it is a threat only to unlimited profits in the banking business.

The conflict between the restricted dividend and the unrestricted dividend is one which the public must decide. In the past, labor and capital have far too frequently contended as if no third party were in any way involved in their conflict. No chance has been given to the public to make itself felt in a manner at once effectual and final. The labor bank gives it a chance to score. So far the public has flocked to the support of labor banks wherever opportunity afforded. Only 14 per cent of the depositors in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' banks are locomotive engineers. The depositors—clergy, lawyers, teachers, professional men and women of every kind and degree, clerks, stenographers, and salesmen—represent that portion of the public which has already enlisted in the job of taking the "blue sky" out of banking.

Mrs. Mason Marches

By AGNES BURNS WIECK

MY neighbor, Mrs. Mason, is attending a convention, and a well-earned honor it is. For fifty-two Thursdays she has been drill practicing with her Auxiliary, the Loyal Ladies, thus winning her place on the drill team that was sent to the convention. The convention is the business of the men whose genius has made possible the Order which shelters and protects the Loyal Ladies. For their loyalty the ladies may serve banquets to the men folk, devise money-making schemes, and form drill teams that parade at the conventions. Mrs. Mason's drill team will now vie with many drill teams for some very lovely and alluring prizes. But when her marching feat is over, my neighbor will not tarry long at the convention; for something more alluring than the very lovely prizes has quickened both her spirit and her step these many Thursdays. As she waved me her goodby she shouted back: "Yes, I've got 'em all wrote down —Marshall Field's, Municipal Pier, Michigan Avenue, and Lincoln Park. We'll see 'em all and maybe more, if our legs hold out from all that marchin'." I stood smiling. I have often smiled at Mrs. Mason and her lodges—she's quite a joiner—but I rejoiced with her in her reward for all that foolish, futile marching. After forty years in coal towns, who would not become a Loyal Lady for the chance it offers to escape?

Among these Loyal Ladies my neighbor will meet many of her kind to whom this convention trip is the first vacation after a lifetime at the cookstove. But these submerged housewives will talk not of economic freedom. Nor will they join as equals in the convention of the Order. An auxiliary is an appendage of "just women," and when grave matters are at hand the Loyal Ladies will retire from the convention. In the quiet seclusion of their Auxiliary they may gather as the Loyal Ladies' Aid. But the contest of the drill teams! Ah, behold them!

There is Mrs. Mason's drill team. Who would guess them to be wives of coal miners, so well drilled have they been by the wife of a traveling salesman! Garbed in their uniforms of white, each skirt the designated nine inches from the ground, each heel of each white shoe in proper uniformity of height, these erstwhile housewives step out into their places with the sprightliness of a corps of Red Cross nurses. Their flowing purple surplices add an air of solemnity to the ritualistic ceremony about to follow. Their military caps of white and gold provide the necessary martial flourish, while the large American flags they bear aloft attest the patriotism of women whose husbands have been guilty of defying the injunction of a noble judge. An impressive sight! With pep and dash team after team arrives and each in turn goes into action. Spurred on by the zip and zim of Main Street captains, cheered by hundred percenters from every State in the Union, thrilled by the thought of prizes, each team strives to excel in faultless marching and accurate portrayal of the ritual of the order. The climax of an entire year of practice and preparation. Marching, merely marching, just as little children march in pretty drill exercises at school. Reviewing this superb feat is a man high in the councils of the republic. He has left his busy desk at Washington to gaze upon his handiwork; to this Best Mind redounds the credit of transporting weary wives of workingmen to a national convention where for a time they might forget the trials and tribulations of domestic life and march and wave flags for the glory of the Order.

Mrs. Mason's drill team may not win a prize but I am sure that she will stand out as a commanding figure. Blessed with a strong and vigorous body, she is well equipped for marching. Whether with broom, dust-cloth, or dish-rag, she marches about the house in a most amazing fashion. She marches right through a big week's washing in the time it takes the ordinary woman to get started. To wash, scrub, scour, shine, bake bread, can fruit, prepare supper for a houseful of unexpected company, and be marching off to the lodge by seven is no trick at all for Mrs. Mason. The work of raising her children has left no trace of wrinkles and the pranks of grandchildren do not vex her. She has never known anything but hard work—and her lodges. She would be lost without either.

Mrs. Mason once had an opportunity to go marching in a real crusade. Leading a band of striking miners' wives, she marched down a railroad track at an early morning hour to round up certain women whose husbands had not struck. To the mother of eleven children she thus addressed herself, "Are you satisfied with the livin' you're a-gittin'?" To which the woman, a match for Mrs. Mason in physique if not in repartee, shot back, "Yes, I am!" "What are you raisin' your young'ns for?" demanded Mrs. Mason. "Can you give 'em the kind of an education you'd like to?" "My kids go to school, I'd have you know." "Oh, yes, we've still got free schools, but what about a musical education? Out of a dozen, like as not you've got one that's turned that way. Could you educate her in music if she had the talent?" "We've got a graphophone in our house, and we can have all the music we want." "Oh, I see!" said Mrs. Mason. "You believe in gittin' your music out of a box instead of havin' it brought out of your children!"

Is this woman to spend her days marching through her kitchen and her lodge hall? In her husband's union she has an outlet for her ability and spirit only in strike time. Political freedom has brought her no opportunities for education or service. While the Mrs. Sam Clarks and the Mrs. Babbitts and the other ladies of Main Street are flaunting banners, shouting, singing, marching for the glory of their Coolidge and their Davis Mrs. Mason will be left in her kitchen unnoticed and unorganized. Following her husband's lead she will vote in the La Follette column. Only for her lack of training and for the fact that the women's organizations somehow have passed her and her class by, she would be marching in the forces of La Follette, in the same spirit that took her down that railroad track.

A Buffalo Dance at Santo Domingo

(New Mexico)

By WITTER BYNNER

Dawn came—
Not yet before us, where the sun was,
But behind us on a snow-peak.

Before us were the desert-hills,
All the barer for being spotted with pinyons;
And on the ridge,
Clustered black against the cold sky,
Were figures too still to be men.

Behind us, at the open edge of the plaza,
Stood the blanketed singers and drummers:
A thick crescent they were, curving toward a star.
And the star-man was taller than the moon-men,
And taller than he was the staff
Which he raised and lowered in the rhythm of the song,
With a shaking of its top-knot of buffalo-toes.

And then the figures on the hill,
Too still until now to be men,
Ran to and fro, criss-crossing the little canyons,
And changed into men
And changed into boys, into children,
And they came down the brown hill,
Pursuing,
With rests for renewal,
Two buffaloes,
Four deer,
Two elks,
Two antelopes.

And round us,
At a distance from the waiting chorus
Whose song gave welcome to the sun
And to the godly animals,
Were men and women and children of the pueblo;
And a few of them sat on the walls of old roofless houses,
And most of them wore their blankets hooding their heads from the chill;
And all of them were watching and were silent,
Except the chorus
Which was earth itself
With a song
That followed
The rising and the falling of the hills.

Two buffaloes,
Bare-bodied,
High-maned;
A woman,
Broad-bosomed,
But moving like a small bird;
Four deer,
White-coated,
With white fluff on their antlers
And white lace on their legs
And with brightly embroidered kilts of old meaning;
Two antelopes
Yellow,
With white chests;
Two elks
With straight horns, green-pronged, down their shoulders;
They entered the plaza.

And the faces of the men,
Being black,
Were no longer the faces of men
But were lost in the godly presences
Of two buffaloes, four deer, two elks, and two antelopes.

And now, for the dance, there was a hunter,
With eagle-feathers hung from head to ankle
And with a swinging bow and arrow.

And they danced the sun up
And carried it on their shoulders
Into the kiva,
Where it should take counsel with gods and men.

And soon they were back again, to dance,
Back with the sun in the plaza.

The chorus,
Darkly sculptural at dawn,
Was vivid now as a mesa topped with plumes:
Closely curved rows of brightness,
With war-bonnets, with bows and guns,
With slashes and dots and angles of red and yellow paint
On their heightened faces
And with sprays of evergreen, to sing by, in their hands.

And then came another hunter,
Naked, slim, and black,
With a small, sharp helmet of black,
And he circled the dance,
Nervous, deliberate,
With his bow and arrow toward the godly animals.

Circling, foraging, pacing, pausing,
Scenting, shifting, crouching, speeding,
The buffaloes were buffaloes,
The deer were deer,
The elks were elks,
And the antelopes were antelopes:
Moccasins, lean-muscled legs, rain-girdles, shells of turquoise,
Yet buffaloes, deer and elks and antelopes.

How could a short stick, held in two hands
And planted forward from a leaning back,
Become the two legs of an antelope?
How could a short stick, held in two hands
And planted forward from a leaning back,
Become the two legs of an elk?
How could a short stick, held in two hands
And planted forward from a leaning back,
Become the sidelong poise of a listening deer?

Only the gods can tell us,
Only the gods who danced that day,
The gods who suddenly flung the beauty of animals
And the beauty of men
Into one quick rainfall rhythm of moccasins:

A steady fall, a broken fall, a fall blown circle-wise:

The buffaloes in the center;
With the woman,
Who swayed between and about them like a smooth and friendly wind;
And then the four deer, staffs in a row, feet behind them beating;
And the two antelopes, who had run with delicate hoofs and dainty necks, now beating a foot-song as vital as the rest;
And the elks, with their large-stepping circles;
And the powerful hunter, with his dips and his calls;
And the subtle hunter, doubtful, hopeful,
Weaving, watching
The circling, the foraging, the pacing, the pausing,
The scenting, the shifting, the crouching, the springing;
And then the quick beat again
Of the moccasins of godly men . . .

All day they followed,
Slow as the sun,
Swift as the rain,
Through centuries . . .

All day the strong voices
In unison . . .

Till at sunset,
The chorus,
Ending its song and its drums,
Made us wonder why the wind had died on the moment,
Why the heart had ceased from hearing itself,
Where the water was lost that had been heaving through the ditches,
And where the hoofs were gone from beating on the sky.

Dead, ceased, gone?
They?
Or we?

We saw, that night, the shadow,
Passing,
Of a hundred years upon a thousand years.

And a larger earth
Absolved us
Of ourselves
With a song of ourselves,
Of godly animals,
Of godly men
Who follow forever
The rising and the falling of the hills,
Deer, buffalo, elk, antelope, hunter,
Our thighs and ankles painted with the red adobe and the white rain,
Our breast and forehead with the turquoise sky.

In the Driftway

PARIS has been having an agitated controversy in regard to manners in shops. What are the obligations of buyers and sellers? Does the girl behind the counter need more patience and politeness, or does the public need to exercise a little more sense and consideration? These are some of the questions that the French have been asking and answering, with opinion of all sorts and on all sides.

* * * * *

AND now a writer in the Manchester Guardian has joined the controversy with some observations on the English shop assistant and the differences between buying customs in France and England:

> It must be understood from the beginning that politeness, as understood in France, is a very different thing from that which obtains, for instance, in England. The English person who has lived in France turns with relief to the civility of the average English shop assistant. The French shopper, on the other hand, is apt to find her too restrained and uninterested. . . . With the extreme thrift and even parsimony of the French, the French shop assistant has probably a very much harder task than is the case with her English sister. This is evidenced by the way in which French shops will take back things that have been paid for. Even stuffs which have been cut off are taken back if they are over a certain length.

* * * * *

THE French customer, observes the writer in the Guardian, expects a personal interest on the part of the saleswoman, and adds:

> That is probably the greatest difference between the shops of England and France. The French saleswoman actually does become remarkably interested in her customer's purchases. That is part of her job, just as it is not the part of her job in England to obtrude her advice too much. This very personal relationship has its other side.

With extreme care and attention there is also found in French shops a good deal of indifference and even rudeness. It would be impossible to keep up the personal note all day.

* * * * *

NOW the Drifter has shopped both in England and France as well as in America and a good many other countries. It is an experience which nobody traveling in a foreign country should miss. Indeed, a liberal education in tastes and customs is to be found merely by looking in the shop windows. Undoubtedly the writer in the Guardian is right in emphasizing the willingness of French stores to take back or exchange goods in contrast to the policy in English shops. The French custom in that regard is as liberal as the American. But a point which the writer in the Guardian does not mention is the feeling in most English shops—as distinguished from those in France or America—that anybody coming in must buy something. That attitude has broken down somewhat in recent years, but it is still largely true that one who looks over goods in an English shop and walks out without purchasing—unless for a clearly good reason—is likely to be followed with a frigid glance (or a tart remark) pronouncing him a bounder.

* * * * *

ONE does not have to buy in a French shop, but if he does it often becomes a contest in wits to an extent that rarely develops in England or America. Fixed prices now prevail in the larger Parisian stores, but commonly not in small shops and in country towns. One not only haggles over prices but he demands that extras be thrown in. The American dictum that "the customer is always right" doesn't hold. Buyer and seller often get into violent arguments in which they assail each other's character and ancestry. It would seem that these bouts must end in blows—but they rarely do. It is all a part of the game.

* * * * *

GENERALLY speaking, the Drifter's sympathies are with the salesgirl. He recalls, with pleasure, the story of the woman who after looking at fifteen or twenty rolls of cloth turned to walk out of a store with the remark: "Thank you, I was just looking for a friend." To which the salesgirl answered sweetly: "If you think your friend is in that roll on the top shelf, I'll get it down too."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

General Weaver—Young and Old

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am grieved to the heart because of misunderstanding and consequent misrepresentation of General Weaver.

In The Nation of July 2 William Hard speaks of "the ideas and purposes of the late good old James B. Weaver of Iowa, who ran on the Populist ticket for President in 1892."

This is an intimation that the Populist Party of 1892 represented "the ideas and purposes of James B. Weaver" and that his most notable achievement was being presidential candidate for that party.

Very different are the real facts in the case. It is true that in 1892, as candidate on the Populist ticket, he received 22 electoral votes and about a million and a half popular votes, while in 1880, as candidate of the Greenback Party, he got less than a million popular votes and no electoral. Still, that 1880 vote meant a great deal more to him than the 1892.

In 1880 Weaver, the magnificent, the peerless, represented a living, growing party, with a definite name, pledged to a definite purpose, and any one who saw and heard him then could never think of calling him "good old James B. Weaver."

In 1884 Ben Butler killed the Greenback Party dead past resurrection. In 1892 Weaver represented its galvanized corpse, dolled up in "free silver" and other bangles. Is it strange if in his face, his voice, his gestures, we who knew him saw the question, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

General Weaver went into the campaign of 1892 with little of the vigor that had characterized him as a debater in Congress, as a traveling platform speaker, and as presidential candidate for the Greenback Party in 1880. I heard him once in 1892 and went away sorrowful. He made a good speech, far better than most of his political opponents, but to one who had known him in former times it was plain that his heart was not there. He was a broken man.

I wish Mr. Hard could have known Weaver as he was in the early eighties. At that time my home, like many others, was a sort of headquarters for the itinerant Greenbackers who were trying to take the issuing power of money from private hands. Perhaps if they had succeeded historians might have less of bloodshed and tyranny to write in their record of the United States of America.

Denver, Colorado, August 1 CELIA BALDWIN

Liang Shih-yi in America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is indeed a crime of Liang Shih-yi to have deceived the American people by telling that he is the Chinese representative when he visited President Coolidge and thanked for America's returned indemnity to China. It would be also a shame of the Chinese people if they had appointed him as representative. I do not attack his personality from personal point of view. It is only necessary, however, to bring the facts to American friends when Liang Shih-yi endeavors to make rumors which insult the Chinese people.

Liang Shih-yi's nature is intrinsically and originally bad, judged from what he has done to the Chinese people as well as to mankind. He played politics in Ching dynasty with a very bad record. In Yuan Shih-ki's Government he was Minister of Communication and did more harm than ever before. During the Washington Conference he took the premiership under the patronage of Chang Tso-lin, the well-known war-lord of Eastern three provinces. As the Washington Conference was going on he strongly advocated direct negotiation about Shantung question between Japan and China, which was fortunately rejected by the Chinese people. What was his motive is obvious. He wanted to get personal advantage at the expense of the nation. Happily he was charged as a traitor, and he is still under arrest.

Just before he came to this country he visited Europe with a certain purpose in mind. In Germany a tragedy happened to him; but to the Chinese people it was an extremely interesting comedy. He was severely punished by a group of Chinese students in a Chinese restaurant when he was eating with his son and some members of Chinese Legation in Germany. So many blows were presented to him that the members of Chinese Legation trembled. Then Liang Shih-yi's filial son came up to rescue his father with every effort. But a Chinese student checked him and said: "It does no matter with you; we let you see how we punish the traitor!" Finally, Liang Shih-yi was lying down on the floor and cried with a melancholy voice: "Kindly forgive me; otherwise, death will fall upon me very soon." It is due to God's help that he was not beaten to death.

Shamelessly he still has face to come to this country. The reason why he could escape our Chinese students' punishment in this country and England is that law and police in these two countries obstruct our doing so. Such a situation we regret. Liang Shih-yi's reason for coming to this country most probably has something to do with American capitalists. We Chinese people declare that Liang Shih-yi is a traitor, and any contract concerning China made by him we can by no means recognize.

Columbia University, New York, August 15 C. F. LIU

What Fannie Hurst Really Thinks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If you reprinted and commented upon my interview with Walter Duranty, published in the New York Times, after reading the Paris interview that was reprinted all over America, I am grateful to you for your discernment.

That Paris interview was a grotesque! It is true that I have come out of Russia with certain disillusionments, but not the hodge-podge of cheap, sensational catch-phrases calculated to make headlines. In giving out the Paris interview, I commented at length on the favorable as well as the unfavorable aspects of Russia, as they appeared to me. I did not leap into the hysteria of condemnation that was eventually published in the name of an interview with me.

I too well realize the futility of trying to contradict an interview that has gone broadcast to the extent of the one in question, but at least I want to go on record as protesting against the kind of sensational journalism that will sacrifice truth on the altar of the catch-phrase.

Everything contained in my interview with Mr. Duranty was said also in the Paris interview, but apparently it was not sufficiently spectacular meat for either foreign or home consumption. The high lights of my negative impressions were picked out and flung into misleading prominence.

Convinced as I am that the Russia I beheld is far from the goal her well-wishers have set up for her, my faith in the ultimate success of the experiment has not wavered. I shall take pains to clear that up in my forthcoming articles.

Meanwhile, I am grateful to you and to your paper for assuming that the quiet Duranty article may be just as true as the hysterical Paris one in question.

New York, September 8 FANNIE HURST

[We had read both the interview in Russia, cabled to the New York Times by Walter Duranty, and the interview in Paris, printed in New York by the Herald Tribune, at the time we made our editorial comment in The Nation of September 10. We accepted Mr. Duranty's version as the more truthful—partly because of the usual accuracy of his dispatches and partly because the sentiments seemed to be more in accord with Fannie Hurst's general attitude. Curiously enough, Mr. Duranty's dispatch was ignored in his own office. Comment was made in the column "Topics of the Times," based entirely on the garbled Paris interview.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

La Follette and Imperialism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have much admiration for Senator La Follette and many reasons incline me to vote for him at the coming election. I wish, however, that the public might know more definitely about his attitude toward the growingly imperialist policy of our Government through more than twenty years. The American people profess their reprobation of war; they doubtless hate it so far as they can lay the blame for it on other people. But they ask very few questions concerning the little wars, however unjust and cruel, over which the State Department spreads the name of the Monroe Doctrine, or offers the plea of business interests, or raises the scare-head of "bolshevism." What government in the world is more averse than ours to any substantial disarmament? Costly armaments are a fascinating emblem of power and national distinction.

I do not wish overmuch to blame our public men. Perhaps no one clearly planned the imperialistic policy. At first it simply grew and no one noticed it. Even when President McKinley weakly consented to venture upon the Spanish War and presently took over under our flag a great group of Asiatic islands and millions of unwilling subjects, few Americans were quite conscious that we were now engaged in a course of imperialism as real as ever Russia or Great Britain had undertaken. Both parties have united in fastening this imperialistic policy upon the nation. This policy is always aggressive, and requires a considerable force—for "defense," of course—not of its own people, but of its aggressive conduct, in order to hold what it has seized and to play the game of bluff among other Powers.

The worst of it is that such a policy, once accepted, does insidious mischief to the character of the men who are selected to carry it out. Like an inevitable fate, it grips men of good but conventional morality, such as Mr. Harding and Mr. Hughes, loads them with responsibilities alien to their previous experience and their official position, puts force such as no mortal ought ever to wield within call of their telephone, and pours through their feebly ballasted wills a sort of monstrous, composite, impersonal will to violence. This is what happened everywhere in the course of the Great War.

Ought we not to know what Mr. La Follette thinks of our American brand of imperialism and what he proposes to do if he is ever made the commander-in-chief of our enormous actual and potential militaristic establishment? Here is something "not to be entered upon lightly or inadvisedly."

The profoundest question before the world today concerns the international atmosphere in which henceforth the sixty or more nations upon the earth are going to live. Can we develop a generally humane and friendly atmosphere, or must we continue to live in the poisonous air of suspicion, fear, contempt, arrogance, and hate which makes war and grows out of war? It is given to the United States, as to no other nation, to take the lead in creating for the first time in history a valid civilization. We cannot effect this splendid service without renouncing our imperialistic policy and the display of warlike force which attends it, and the harsh and arrogant tone of the official voice which is bound to betray it (as in the recent conduct of our Congress toward Japan), and which spreads a nervous feverishness throughout the world. Let us set aside for good and all our armed meddlesomeness in foreign affairs and put on a decent and friendly face toward the people of every race and color, and we have nothing to fear from any corner of the earth.

Southwest Harbor, Maine, August 5 CHARLES F. DOLE

Snappy Work

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This will acknowledge the copy of "La Follette's Record," by Arthur Warner, which we note is stamped for "immediate release." This is exactly what it will get, for we shall release it to our waste-basket immediately.

Bristol, Connecticut, September 11 ARTHUR S. BARNES, Manager, Bristol Press Publishing Company

The Facts
About
John W. Davis
IN NEXT WEEK'S NATION

Books

Mr. Asquith's Leisure

Studies and Sketches. By the Rt. Hon. H. H. Asquith. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

TO read this volume continuously is like making one's way straight through an encyclopedia. We are carried from Some Aspects of the Victorian Age to The Last Crusade, from Sir Henry Wotton to Reading and Writing, from Modern Biographers to the "Antigone," and from a Spectator article on The Age of Demosthenes to a speech in Parliament on the death of Joseph Chamberlain. Nothing could better illustrate the versatility of the author and his cultivated interest in pursuits that lie far away from contests at the Bar and in the House of Commons.

In one chapter, his presidential address to the English Association, Mr Asquith describes his own "literary stock in trade" as "at best that of a somewhat threadbare amateur." That self-appraisal is certainly too modest. An amateur he may be, in comparison with the professional specialist, but his literary judgments are by no means a dull and hackneyed repetition of the conclusions of Professor Dryasdust. Whatever the subject he discusses, he brings to it an open mind, a catholic taste, the equipment of a trained scholar, and a lucid though nervous style. His critical faculty, as befits so distinguished an ornament of Balliol, exercises itself most readily and effectively on classical material. His little paper on The Art of Tacitus is a gem of literary and historical criticism. If he had not been a politician and a lawyer, Mr. Asquith would have made an ideal tutor in the honors school of Litterae Humaniores.

In such leisure as has been left him from one of the most industrious of public careers Mr. Asquith has found time to explore even the byways of literature. He claims to be one of the few persons who have attempted to grapple with that "fragment of a portentous epic," the "Davideis" of Abraham Cowley. But he has not allowed his attention to be absorbed by the bizarre and the unusual. He has read the great books, and has formed a sane and independent judgment of them. Here, for instance, is a characteristic sentence occurring in a paragraph on the value of terseness in style. "Cicero and Burke," he says, "are vulgarly called diffuse writers; but if you examine their best passages (and every writer ought to be judged by his best), you will not find a superfluous word." While he deplores the "vast multiplication of flimsy rubbish" which caters in these days to the popular taste, he confesses to "an almost insatiable fondness for good detective stories, from the great M. Lecocq and still greater Sherlock Holmes down to the latest and least of their French and American rivals."

The most valuable single contribution to this volume is undoubtedly the initial chapter on Some Aspects of the Victorian Age, delivered as the Romanes Lecture at Oxford in 1918. The terms of the trust excluded, unfortunately, from permissible subjects the two great controversial domains of politics and theology, and Mr. Asquith can merely touch upon them in passing. But the field that remains is large enough to provide him with an opportunity of which he makes effective use. Those who contemptuously dismiss the achievements of this period as of slight importance in the history of the human intellect ought to be set to read this admirable survey, in which the lecturer has "tried to show something of the extent and of the splendor of the contribution which the Victorians made to man's common and ever-growing heritage."

Incidentally, this book provides the collector of curiosities of the press with one of the most amazing and amusing misprints ever perpetrated. The proofreader has allowed Mr. Asquith to speak of Mark Pattison as passing his days "in Llama-like seclusion."

HERBERT W. HORWILL

An American Statesman

American Problems. By William E. Borah. Duffield and Company. $2.

THIS is a collection of some twenty-two speeches in the Senate, excerpts from addresses, and resolutions, covering a period of twelve years. While the selection does not do full justice to the intellectual breadth and courage which have vigorously identified Senator Borah with a greater variety of causes than any other man in Congress, the evidence of his eloquence and sincerity, of his almost unique combination of firm-principled old-fashioned Americanism and intelligent progressiveness is conspicuous on nearly every page. The words that he applies to Lincoln are as true of him:

> He possessed in a remarkable way the capacity for intellectual solitude, even in the midst of the throng—yet he never lost faith in the throng. He paid the people the high compliment of speaking to them in the language of reason and true eloquence. He believed they would accept a great principle as a controlling basis for action. . . .

Throughout the Great War and since, when men's minds became warped by passion and by propaganda, Borah stood fast for the fundamental liberties. In April, 1917, he said:

> Without an unfettered press, without liberty of speech, all the outward forms and structures of free institutions are a sham, a pretense—the sheerest mockery. If the press is not free; if speech is not independent and untrammeled; if the mind is shackled or made impotent through fear, it makes no difference under what form of government you live, you are a subject and not a citizen. Republics are not in and of themselves better than other forms of government except in so far as they carry with them and guarantee to the citizen that liberty of thought and action for which they were established.

And six years later, speaking for the release of the political prisoners, he declared:

> During the Great War the Congress passed what is known as the Espionage Act. It was passed as a war measure. It was claimed that we had authority to pass it because we were engaged in war. I did not myself believe that even though we were engaged in war we had the power to pass the law. . . .
>
> This law . . . is now a thing of the past. I have only one observation . . . and that is, I trust that at no time in the future will it ever be considered as a precedent for the enactment of any measure of that kind again. It should be regarded . . . as not only opposed to the principles of free government in time of peace, but also in time of war. I do not believe that laws of repression, laws which deny the right to discuss political questions, are any more necessary in time of war than in time of peace and I do not believe they are constitutional either in time of war or in time of peace.
>
> If this blessed old republic cannot rest upon the free and voluntary support and affection of the American people in time of war as well as in time of peace, if we cannot, as a people, be free to discuss the political problems which involve limb and life, even in time of war, our government rests upon a very brittle foundation.

Borah is not a faddist, however lightly he holds party allegiance when it conflicts with his convictions. While he felt a strong spiritual sympathy with the Bull Moose movement of 1912, he saw clearly its obvious weaknesses; nor did he hesitate to condemn some of its most "advanced" proposals. Of the recall of judges he said:

> I am afraid that the principle of the recall as applied to judges will tend to establish the rule of the majority in matters of judicial controversy. . . . Though the majority must rule, yet a government which has no method for protecting the rights of the minority—for it has rights—is a despotic government. . . .

Senator Borah has been unsparing in his condemnation of the Versailles Treaty, the ratification of which in the Senate he thus attacked in September, 1921:

> The Versailles Treaty in my judgment is the most pronounced negation of the moral law which has yet been crystallized into form by the hand of man. It must in the end, after working what evil and enforcing what misery it may, also perish. . . . There it is, harsh, hideous, naked, dismembering friendly peoples, making possible exploitation of vast populations, a check on progress and . . . challenging every precept upon which the peace of the world may be built.

The same speech reveals much of his world philosophy:

> One of the revolting monstrosities born of the war, the illegitimate offspring of secret diplomacy and violence, is the absurd, iniquitous belief that you can only have peace through martial means—that force, force, is the only power on earth with which to govern men. I denounce the hideous, diabolical idea, and I insist that this Government ought to be counted against all plans, all treaties, all programs, all policies based on this demoniacal belief.

Senator Borah's successful effort to bring about the disarmament conference was a concrete realization of this conviction. Subsequent proposals for an international economic conference and for recognition of Russia were other expressions of the same general outlook.

Always Senator Borah has been a passionate defender of the Constitution, a consistent upholder of the ancient doctrine that "ours is a government of laws, not of men," a vigorous assailant of corruption, waste, and partisanship in the conduct of government, an opponent of militarism, a persistent champion of all that is best in the American tradition. He fought the bonus relentlessly when political expediency would have counseled otherwise. He exposed the infamy of our bureaucratic and military imperialists in the Caribbean and Central America. Always his utterance has been the untrammeled expression of his conscience—a voice, often in recent years, in a wilderness of political quackery, calling to a spirit that is not yet dead in America.

ERNEST GRUENING

Central Europe

New Governments of Central Europe. By Malbone W. Graham, Jr. Assisted by Robert C. Binkley. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

POLITICAL literature is one of the greatest export items of the Central European countries. A clamorous advertising campaign is going on in the basin of the Danube calculated to charm the world's attention to this or that star on the political firmament of war-rent mid-Europe. Czecho-Slovakia is anxious to support her claim to the hegemony among the succession states by a well-conducted scientific warfare of information which some of her less friendly neighbors denounce as shameless propaganda. White Hungary is angry with all the world in addition to her own Jews, liberals, communists, and the other component parts of that unspeakable rabble of anti-Whites. She expresses her opinion along these lines in a whole library of unequivocal terms. The Jews, liberals, communists, and the other unspeakables are launching a counter-offensive the magnitude of which is limited only by the running capacity of the Vienna printing presses. Serbia is trying to convince the world that Croatia is simply in love with her, while some Croatian writers declare that Serbia is the greatest enemy of their nation. At the recent municipal elections in Slovakia there were constituencies in which twenty-five political parties were fighting for power. They all had more or less different opinions about the real interests of their country which they generously communicated with much waste of white paper to an eagerly listening humanity.

In this bewildering maze of propaganda which characterizes the making of a new Central Europe it is not always easy to find one's bearing. Propaganda is usually clad in an impressive armor of scientific data. On the other hand, what seems propaganda today may become the history of tomorrow if the party which handles it succeeds in attaining permanent power.

In view of these difficulties the present volume deserves to be spoken of with the greatest appreciation. It would not be fair to say that it is non-partisan. This term implies a certain lukewarmness which leaves the reader unsatisfied. Mr. Graham's volume is partisan in the best sense of the word. It approves or disapproves of political tendencies, parties, and politicians in a measure warranted by a careful and accurate appraisal of their qualities. It not only effectively records facts but it also helps one to arrive at an intelligent opinion concerning the past achievements and future possibilities of the nations under discussion.

The field covered by Mr. Graham comprises the post-armistice history of Germany, Austria, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, and Jugoslavia. It records every event of importance as accurately as any "100 per cent fact-er." It emphasizes the national characteristics of the new Central European states, points out the similarities and divergences in their constitutions, their conceptions of independent national life, and their aspirations. The bitter struggle of liberalism with reaction takes up a considerable part of the chapters dealing with the situation in contemporary Germany. In the history of Austria, special attention is paid to the dualistic nature of the inhabitants, divided as they are into Socialist city-dwellers and predominantly Christian Social villagers. Turning to Hungary, Mr. Graham speaks with much understanding of the noble efforts of Count Karolyi to win that country to democracy. Admiral Horthy's regime, which is justly described as the white terror, is held up to the students of Central European history as destructive. Czecho-Slovakia is mentioned as the most ambitious state of the new mid-European countries, which, deservedly, enjoys a privileged position in the comity of the Danube states. Lastly, Jugoslavia's position is described in considerable detail and the dangers which are inherent in her present triunite system of government are pointed out.

The last part of the book contains valuable documentary material illustrative of various phases in the post-war history of the new countries. To the research worker they mean all the more, because some of the documents here reprinted have not been easily accessible heretofore.

It is often said that history cannot be written for at least five decades after the event to be recorded. This limitation, however, does not apply to the present volume. It may well be that coming decades will witness an increase in the material at the disposal of historians. It may likewise be that some of the material which today seems to be an integral part of the annals of past events will be expunged as contrary to the evidence produced by subsequent discoveries. But Mr. Graham's work is as near an approach to positive history as careful observation and absorbing interest in the subject permit in recording the ever-changing political and economic life of present-day Central Europe. It is to be hoped that in another volume Mr. Graham will devote his attention to those new states in Central and Eastern Europe that are situated east of the states which he describes in the present volume.

EMIL LENGYEL

An Economist Strays Afield

Legal Foundations of Capitalism. By John R. Commons. The Macmillan Company. $3.

"THE life of the law has not been logic," wrote Mr. Justice Holmes, many years ago; "it has been experience." But this is the whole truth only when applied to what the courts have done, in contradistinction to what, in the course of their opinions, they say they have done. Driven by the practical necessities of a changing world, the courts have repeatedly reached decisions which would never have been reached if the governing precedents had been logically applied. Yet in rendering a decision which, as a matter of fact, changes the whole course of the law, the judges have almost invariably stated that their conclusion was based upon precedents or accepted principles which they had merely extended, by the methods of logic, to the new problem of the case before them. The language of the judges, therefore, as distinguished from what they actually do, is only the shadow and not the substance of the law, and cannot be taken too seriously.

Now, though all this is obvious to a legal scholar and a judge like Mr. Justice Holmes, it is difficult, if not impossible, for a layman to realize it fully. And so we find Mr. Commons, a distinguished economist, one of the most important men in the country in the labor field, making a serious study of the opinions of judges since the early days of the common law, and from this study attempting to describe and analyze the legal foundations of our capitalistic order. Being a layman, it is quite natural that Mr. Commons should take the language of the judges too seriously; nor is it surprising not only that he ascribes to their language a legal significance which it does not have but also that he finds in law-sheep bindings universal principles of economic and ethical philosophy.

A distressing lack of any real unity, either of thought or of treatment, makes it quite impossible to summarize or even to outline, within the limit of a review, this book of 400 closely printed pages. A few examples of Mr. Commons's approach to his broad subject must suffice.

The most unfortunate feature of this book (which Mr. Commons tells us was "commenced thirty-five years ago") is the entrance of a lay economist into the field of legal terminology. It is undoubtedly true that lawyers are careless in their use of legal terms. Undoubtedly such slipshod use of words impedes accurate analysis. In recent years certain legal scholars, familiar with the whole field of common and civil law, have worked out a set of artificial symbols, and urged that these be adopted as the working tools of the profession, to be used in a known, agreed sense. But to Mr. Commons such artificial symbols are of fundamental, even of universal significance. He crams into these arbitrary word-symbols meaning so complex and so foreign to the legal principles they must express as to make them valueless to a lawyer or a judge seeking to analyze some concrete legal problem; and surely there is almost no other justification for the new terminology.

Any exposition of the legal basis of capitalism must, of course, include a discussion of the meaning of "property." In tracing the development of this concept from the time of William the Conqueror to the present day, and particularly as it appears in the successive decisions of the federal Supreme Court, Mr. Commons performs what is probably the most satisfactory piece of work in his book. Yet one cannot but regret that he stopped where he did, instead of completing the picture, and making clear, once for all, the essential nature of property and of property rights.

Property, Mr. Commons might have made clear, is simply a dominion, flowing from and dependent upon the sovereign power, and only so long as the sovereign protects this dominion is there either property, or the earning power of property, called "value." Having established this beyond doubt Mr. Commons would then have been in a position to show in detail (as Mr. Donald Richberg has demonstrated in outline) that this dominion which we call property can exist only under the mantle of the sovereign's protection; that the sovereign is constantly creating, modifying, or destroying property, by extending or withdrawing or changing the boundaries of its protection, and as a consequence the dominion enjoyed by individuals is being enlarged, contracted, or destroyed. He could have pointed out that this process of molding property rights goes on without violating the constitutional provisions which safeguard property, because the privileges of dominion destroyed or modified were subject to destruction or modification by the very manner of their creation. Whatever the reason, the fact is that Mr. Commons has not set out and emphatically established these fundamentals. He has therefore missed an opportunity to silence the magpies who are constantly chattering about the interference of the legislature and the courts with their "natural and inherent" rights of private property, as if, without the legislature, the courts, etc., there would be private property rights at all!

Much of the value of his book is lost because many of Mr. Commons's ideas must be dug out, by main force, from a thick mass of heavy phrases and awkward, lumbering sentences. A simple illustration. He wishes to answer the question, "What constitutes the law?" Admittedly this is a serious and difficult question, and one about which many thoughtful books have been written. Mr. Commons answers: "Law is a science of the probabilities of official transactions in the exercise of authorized physical coercion." This may be accurate enough, but notice the simplicity and directness of Judge Holmes's classic definition: "The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact, and nothing more pretentious, are what I mean by the law." Undoubtedly the worth of his book would be increased tenfold if Mr. Commons could have maintained that ease and simplicity of expression of which he is at times the master.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Books in Brief

Cyrano de Bergerac. Voyages to the Moon and the Sun. Translated by Richard Aldington. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

French Comedies of the XVIIIth Century—Regnard: The Residuary Legatee. Lesage: Turcaret or The Financier. Marivaux: The Game of Love and Chance. Destouches: The Conceited Count. Translated by Richard Aldington. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Master Tyll Owlglass. His Marvellous Adventures and Rare Conceits. Translated by K. R. H. Mackenzie. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Valuable additions to The Broadway Translations. Mr. Aldington revives Cyrano with the fine enthusiasm of a poet and a scholar, and in the biographical prefaces before the plays which he has rescued from the eighteenth century he displays a charming gift of differentiation. The translation of "Eulenspiegel" here given was done years ago, and now is a little dusty.

Drama

Our Best War Play

MAXWELL ANDERSON and Laurence Stallings have seized the perfect moment. During the five years which have passed since the armistice nerves have regained their tone but memory has not been dimmed, and thus they have managed to set down without a suspicion of hysteria and without a suspicion of sentimentality their vision of that strange and terrible phenomenon, modern war. They have described its brutality without rancor and pictured the inhuman verve and endurance of its heroes without blinking the ugly uselessness of the circumstances which called them forth, so that they have written unquestionably the finest play of the war which America has seen. Moreover they have imbued it with so robust a spirit that we are treated to the strange spectacle of a tragedy which is played to the accompaniment of a continual ripple of laughter without once ceasing to be powerful and moving.

"What Price Glory?" (Plymouth Theater) is written not out of thought but out of experience. The terrible impartiality of its verisimilitude, which none of the opposing camps of thought can deny, comes from its authors' realization that whatever their own thoughts may be, what they have seen is more tremendous than their theories. Thus they have described, not argued, but admirable judgment has played its part. Keen intelligence, sweeping the field of memory, has seized upon the significant fact that dramatically the most important thing about war is not death and destruction but the way of life which it develops, that the great conflict just passed lasted long enough and drew into itself a sufficient number of men to develop a civilization or anti-civilization of its own, with a language, a philosophy, and a whole kultur as different from that of normal life as the kultur and philosophy of the Stone Age were different, and yet as adapted to the conditions of life as it was lived as ours. Upon the description of this way of life they have concentrated their attention.

It was Mr. Stallings, it seems, who actually participated in this new and tremendous mode of life, and he possessed a spiritual robustness sufficient to grasp and understand it. He has caught not only the Rabelaisian rhythm of its speech in which mouth-filling oaths do not stand out, being assimilated to the epic vigor of expression, but also the rhythm of that strange life itself with its simple values and its inexorable demands. Captain Flagg, professional soldier, is the perfect type which such conditions demand and strive to produce. Brutal to his men because he knows that brutality alone can fit them to endure the life they need, foul-mouthed because only so can he give vent to his emotions, and heroically faithful to his job for no reason at all except that men must have something, however irrational, to believe in and serve, he cultivates, unashamed, drunkenness and lust in every leisure moment, not because of any innate depravity, but because they alone are anodynes powerful enough and simple enough to drug such an existence. His men from the top sergeant down imitate as closely as their capacities will permit his adjustment to monstrous conditions; drinking like him, swearing like him, and, like him, reckless in all things, they nevertheless have come to accept hardship and death as normal and unescapable. They have forgotten the desires, the beliefs, and the habits of former life, and developed new and hardy souls fit for the new life which they lead.

Perhaps the concluding incident will best convey the spirit of the piece. Just back from the lines the captain and his sergeant have failed to conclude a duel to the death over an innkeeper's daughter who is too generous with her favors. Then word comes to move forward again. "Good God!" ejaculates the captain, almost dead from exhaustion, "it's the first time in months that I have had a real reason for fighting and now I can't fight. Tell 'em I won't go." But he does go, and his sergeant with him, both quite willing, if both should return, to take up at the earliest moment of leisure their little private tragedy of lust.

The acting honors of the piece are divided between Louis Wolheim as the captain, who comes first, and William Boyd as the sergeant, who comes second. Mr. Wolheim played the title role in "The Hairy Ape" and has thus had the privilege of appearing in two of the best American plays. He is worthy of both.

Mr. Faversham's new vehicle, "The Mask and the Face" (Bijou Theater), from the Italian, contains the germ of an excellent comic theme in its story of a masterful husband who comes to his senses when he sees that putting his ideas into practice awakes the admiration of no one except hysterical women, movie producers, and other ridiculous persons. But it never holds for long the tone of lightly bantering satire which it requires, wabbling distressingly between unconvincing drama and broad farce. "Thoroughbreds" (Vanderbilt Theater) may be described as the sort of play in which the beautiful Southern heroine says to her impetuous wooer: "No, I cannot marry you until I have cleared up the mystery of my birth."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

"SHIVERS WITH LAUGHS" MANTLE-News
GEO. M. COHAN Theatre-Bway-43d St.
Evenings at 8:30
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30
IS YOUR LAUGHTER FARCICAL OR PSYCHICAL?
LEWIS & GORDON present
THE HAUNTED HOUSE
OWEN DAVIS' SUCCESSOR to "The NERVOUS WRECK"
with
WALLACE EDDINGER

RAND SCHOOL
7 East 15th Street
Beginning Sept. 30, 1924.
Courses in History, Economics, Sociology, Psychology, Literature, Science, Music, Drama, Art.
Write for "RAND SCHOOL NEWS."

Great DEBATE of the Campaign!
SHOULD A CLASS-CONSCIOUS SOCIALIST OR WORKER VOTE FOR LA FOLLETTE?
SCOTT NEARING says No!
Foremost Socialist Spokesman
vs. MEYER LONDON says Yes!
First Socialist Congressman and Labor Attorney
Chairman to be announced
Sunday, October 5, 1924, at 3 P. M.
Central Opera House, 67th Street and 3rd Avenue
Tickets, $1.10 (incl. war tax)

EXTRAORDINARY LECTURE!
"WHY TROTZKY HATES MACDONALD"
A frank exposition of the differences between the principles, aims and methods of the Labor Party of England and the Communist Party of Soviet Russia
by John Langdon-Davies
Journalist, Oxford Lecturer.
Labor Party Candidate for Parliament,
(First appearance in this country)
Sunday, October 19, 3 P. M.
Cooper Union, 4th Avenue and 8th Street
Tickets 75c. (plus war tax)

Tickets for both these events on sale at Jimmie Higgins Bookshop, 127 University Place; Gothic Art Book Store, 176 Second Avenue; Katz's Music Store, 181 E. Broadway; Hauser's Bookstore, 1285 Fifth Avenue, corner 110th Street; Stern's Jewelry Store, 1337 Wilkins Avenue, Bronx; Neidorf's Book Store, 1817 Pitkin Avenue, Brooklyn; Katz's Drug Store, 78 Graham Avenue, Brooklyn, or at the offices of and by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 FIFTH AVENUE Tel. Longacre 10434-10435
N. B. TO OUT-OF-TOWNERS: If you desire a stenographic report of the above events, send us your name, stating which interest you.

In next week's Nation

The Record of John W. Davis

A Summary of the Facts

International Relations Section

Will Germany Live Again?

By KARL F. GEISER

Berlin, August 22

THE American tourists who now visit Germany by the thousands and see from the car windows of railway trains the green meadows, the red-roofed hamlets, brooks, winding roads, and well-kept harvest fields that lie in pleasant valleys and extend to the dark-green forest edge on the hills may honestly come to the conclusion that all goes well in Germany now; and those who observe the clean streets and orderly government of great cities like Berlin, Frankfurt, Munich, or Stuttgart will perhaps be convinced that a wave of prosperity is just ahead and that present conditions are about normal. The expert commissions which get much of their information from bankers and money lenders (who now receive from 25 to 80 per cent interest on loans) may determine, with mathematical precision, Germany's capacity to pay. To such the political destruction of a state or the permanent creation of human misery means little. In fact, the Dawes Report specifically states that one of its chief aims is "to set up machinery to provide for the largest annual payments from Germany." That state is duly charged with the crime of having managed her railroads in the interest of her industries; and the American college professor will see in this allegation impeccable evidence of German duplicity and enlighten his students accordingly. An empire of sixty-three million people may be put in bondage, or a nation of seventy million souls may be divided against its will for four decades by a "legal" contract, if only the books balance and trade is restored.

Saved Again

There is nothing in the Dawes Report or the proceedings of the London Conference that would justify the conclusion that the great mass of workers in Germany have any rights that international commissions should respect. German leaders themselves have ceased to appeal to the outside world on the basis of justice or humanity, for they are now convinced that such an appeal does not carry very far in a world where international ethic is determined by the counting house.

"What business have you," said an American official, "to report the miserable conditions in Germany? Such information should be given to the diplomats and those officials of the state who know how to use it." Nor was the remark made in a spirit of heartless cynicism. The fact is many foreign officials do not know the actual conditions that prevail among the masses; the Germans themselves scarcely realize it. Neither is it strange that this should be so. It has now been a decade since the war that made the world safe for diplomacy began, and, aside from occasional convulsions, the masses have gradually drifted into a settled order of misery. As in the cities of Italy and Germany, the relics of ancient and medieval civilization are hidden by modern structures from which the average tourist gains his impressions, so the deepest misery of the German people is not visible to the passing observer: it must be sought if it is to be found. Moreover, the average German does not exhibit his poverty to the outside world; he conceals it, and even a public official who has charge of a welfare department will not readily admit that those under his care are in actual want, for such an admission might be construed as a reflection upon his management. There is always a tendency on the part of every city and state official to put his department upon a self-sustaining basis. In accordance with this principle the Gas and Electric Light Department of Munich last winter raised the rates to the consumers with the result that the poorer classes were compelled to live without gas and light. At a recent session of the German Newspaper Association, held in Stuttgart, the president of that association asked for a concession that would permit the conference to continue beyond the closing hour of midnight. The concession was granted but on condition that the association should bind itself to turn over to the city treasury three marks per hour for every person who remained beyond the closing period. These are not isolated examples; they could be multiplied by thousands.

Those who know the characteristics of the race will not deny that the average German is industrious and will not accept charity in any form unless compelled to do so by the grinding pressure of his environment. And if the thought uppermost in the mind of the average German were expressed in a single sentence it would read: "All that we ask of the world today is to be allowed to live and work." Yet of the entire population of the empire, 22 per cent receive charity in some form. In Munich four-fifths of all children, up to six years of age, living in the city, are in part or entirely supported either from public or private charitable institutions; and Munich reflects but the average condition of the large cities. In Berlin conditions are worse, in Stuttgart somewhat better. It should be said, however, in this connection, that the social-welfare policy in Germany is not only better organized than in America, but is also more comprehensive in its scope, for Germany believes, and proceeds upon the theory, that every class, except the rich, is entitled not only to protection but to actual support from the state or municipality during a crisis. The public is therefore taxed to assist the owners of rent-bearing property as well as the wage-earners or the unemployed. Undoubtedly this policy is wise, for it has prevented a general financial collapse. The burden, however, that such a policy places upon the public is enormous, and cannot be carried indefinitely: it is a temporary policy and is based upon the hope of a better future—and an international conference.

It requires neither prophet nor seer to determine whether, and upon what conditions, Germany will live again. Statistics from any one of Germany's large cities, with just a little common sense applied to human nature, will furnish the answer. Take Stuttgart as an example: it has a population of 350,000 and represents the most hopeful condition of any of the larger German cities. Its present budget shows an expense account of 4.8 million marks; it has an income of 2 million marks: a deficit of 2.8 million marks must therefore be met in some way, in new burdens imposed upon the public. There are no reserve funds anywhere. Labor is not paid a living wage; of the 3,000 workers on the city pay roll the average wage is one dollar a day, which is approximately the wages paid to labor in industries throughout the German Empire. The average wage paid to policemen in Berlin is $25 a month, while, with rare exceptions, the salaries to professors in large universities is less than an instructor receives in an American college. But the point of mental depression is not indicated by the mere reduction of incomes, for the young instructors are often dropped entirely from the salary lists in all universities, and the same holds true among officials and employees of every class and every industry throughout the empire. Banking institutions now have reduced their personnel to about one-third of their former number and unemployment is again on the increase.

If space permitted, statistics could be adduced that would tell a story of patient suffering amid discouragement unparalleled by any state in modern times. But at best statistics can give only a faint impression of the life and spirit of Germany today. The significance of the complete destruction of the middle class, which has hitherto formed the basis of all great states, cannot be estimated in figures; neither can the effect of the impoverishment of the intellectual life be measured by formulas devised by economists. But even if one accepts the economic factor as the most significant denominator of Germany's future, as the London Conference did, it is difficult to find reason for optimism. Her industries upon which she must depend for a better future are wavering along every line, and are largely maintained, not from present profits but from capital turned into the wage fund to keep labor employed until help comes in the form of credit and a readjustment can be made upon a self-sustaining basis. But the capital which has thus far been employed to keep labor and industry going is now completely exhausted and the situation has never been more critical than it is today.

Those outside of Germany who feel that the crisis is now past or think that the conclusion of bankers goes to the root of the problem may be perfectly honest in their belief. Politically, Germany seems to be finding herself; her old efficiency is again returning and she is adjusting the burdens of the war in such a manner as to bear equally upon all, so far as that is possible. There is no longer actual starvation, though millions still hunger, and the death-rate has been reduced to about normal. But all this, if correctly analyzed, simply means that government has, to a remarkable degree, controlled the distribution of wealth in the interest of all classes and that they are all equally near to a general collapse.

The fact that cities or states, as corporate entities, may ultimately gain as a result of inflation does not help the present situation in the least, for there is no general surplus in any city or state government, or in any industry. When any branch of government or of an industry yields more than is necessary to sustain it, the surplus is distributed to other departments that are running at a deficit in order to permit the entire organization to function. It is not too much to say that the entire energy of the nation is devoted, not to outstrip competitors but to maintain its local and national life at a standard where, in the opinion of the masses, obedience to law and government will be preferable to anarchy.

No careful observer who penetrates the surface and conventional forms, who sees beneath the exterior, and feels the weak, nervous pulse of this great nation, who really takes the trouble to know its heart and mind, can honestly assert that Germany is hiding her wealth and deliberately evading her responsibility. The great majority of the old aristocratic families and those who were formerly rich and formed the chief support of charitable enterprises lost all their wealth, while the few profiteers who gained by the war give nothing to charity and do nothing to promote the public welfare. The result is that the internal burden of the state must be carried almost entirely by taxation. Where the necessary revenue is to come from, and how the burden of taxation can long be borne, German economists are at a loss to know; and their pessimism is supported by cold, stubborn facts.

Conservative estimates place the total wealth of Germany before the war at 350 milliard gold marks; it is now reduced to 150 milliards. In other words, 200 milliards of value have been destroyed. The total public and private income before the war was about 45 milliard marks; it is now about 20 milliards. This immense loss of wealth and income might perhaps be replaced within a reasonable period, if conditions were favorable and the chief sources of wealth were not destroyed; but the treaty makers, with the help of the experts, were very careful to see that every natural and convenient resource upon which the life of Germany must depend should either be crippled or destroyed. Her land area, exclusive of colonies, was reduced from 540,857 to 470,314 square kilometers; her population, from 64,925,993 to 59,858,284. Nor can it be said that the loss of territory is relieved by the loss of population, for aside from the fact that the most productive areas were taken by the Allies, the population per square kilometer has increased from 123.8 in 1914 to about 135 in 1924. Based upon pre-war conditions, economists have estimated that Germany loses annually, as a result of the treaty but exclusive of the Saar territory, more than one-tenth of her cereals, and more than one-tenth of her live stock, while her industries, upon which 40,000,000 depend for a living, are throttled by an annual loss of approximately one-fifth of her coal, one-fourth of her lead, two-thirds of her zinc, and three-fourths of her iron. The total number of her factories has been reduced by about one-fourth; but here again the significant fact is not the destruction or loss of property but the conditions which the treaty, subsequent conferences, and French occupation of the Ruhr have imposed upon German industries everywhere. In Solingen and its environs, to take but a single example from the illegally occupied area, there are about 600 industries where French control is absolute and harsh; import and export duties are levied and administered with the greatest possible annoyance to the managers and a needless cost to the owners of about 10 per cent of the profits. As a result employers have been unable to pay workmen their wages for the last two months—the very period, by the way, during which the London Conference adopted the Dawes Report, which asks Germany to pledge, as a guaranty for the payment of reparation, her industrial bonds!

Another fact which escaped the makers of the Dawes Report—and also the American newspapers—was connected with taxation. Every manufacturing concern, large or small, must pay an annual minimum tax of at least 10 per cent upon the volume of business transacted, regardless of profits or losses. There are, of course, in addition to this, many other forms of taxation: general property, incomes, land, excess profits, sales, privileges, luxuries, and amusements are but a few that may be mentioned. Taxes are, in fact, so numerous and complex that every large business concern has attached to it a special tax expert who determines the amount that must be paid under the various heads. No dogmatic statement, therefore, should be made upon this subject in a general article upon German living conditions. But it may be safely said that when an international conference in London or Paris attempts to estimate Germany's capacity to pay, and bases that estimate upon the hitherto accepted economic formulas or upon the volume of business transacted, it is practically worthless when used as an index to the real conditions of life at present or to future possibilities.

Official Germany has now accepted the Dawes Report. There was nothing to do but to accept when America said: "Unless you accept, no credit will be extended to you." But unofficial Germany—the composite opinion of all classes—does not believe that the Government can live up to the contract signed in London and accepted by the Reichstag. Unofficial Germany will call your attention to the fact that not a single one of the large Powers has offered to the German people a single concession to relieve their distress, or given the faintest hope for a better future, without demanding in advance more than an equivalent in return. Even the MacDonald Government, from which disinterested and generous action might have been expected, reimposed the 26 per cent export duty upon German goods the moment the London protocol was signed; and American protected interests may also be trusted to keep out German goods though 110,000,000 consumers would be benefited by their free entry into the United States.

Let there be no mistake: the Dawes Report was not framed to liberate or aid Germany; if it had been, it would not have taken the supreme control of the railways out of German hands. That control was taken by the foreigner as the final guaranty that German commerce could be throttled at any moment that it threatened its competitors by increasing the transportation rates. This is the sum and substance of the Dawes Report. If Germany as a state survives under this plan it will not be by virtue of her own right or merit but by the sufferance of her enemies.

CONTRIBUTIONS to the La Follette-Wheeler Campaign Fund received by The Nation since those recorded last week:

Previously listed	$3,537.25
June Hartman and sister	5.00
J. Baum	5.00
H. Meisel	1.00
L. T.	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sharpe	5.00
Benj. L. Tepper	5.00
Three Connecticut Friends	3.00
Theodore L. Landt	3.00
Oscar Berger	5.00
Ernest H. Dietrich	5.00
M. Gruendler	10.00
H. M. Olmsted	20.00
Jennie Honig and Helen Basch	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Zeisberg	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. John D. Mowrey	2.00
J. Schumer	1.00
Leo Jacobs	1.00
M. D. Wand	2.00
Chas. E. Ozanne	50.00
Stephen Demartini	5.00
H. A. C. B.	5.00
L. Teitelbaum	2.00
Everett Warner	1.00
F. Adelman	4.00
Clement Wells	5.00
Herman Schweiger	2.00
H. B.	1.00
Joshua S. Epstein	3.00
C. W. Broomall	5.00
Max Ehrlich	1.00
Mr. and Mrs. Herman Dietz	5.00
Hannah A. Falk	5.00
MacKnight Black	10.00
Julius Marcus	5.00
Anonymous	5.00
Ruth Anderson	2.00
Pauline M. Murrah	2.00
Frances E. Sabin	5.00
Rev. John Haynes Holmes	10.00
Stuart Chase	1.00
Charles Pratt	50.00
Mrs. L. D. Schoyer	10.00
A. Simon, M. Kaplan, Anonymous	3.00
Geo. Goward	2.00
E. L. Tiffany	3.00
S. Liotta	2.00
S. Lovich	2.00
H. E. Teweles	10.00
Mrs. Anna I. LaMonte	25.00
Sam W. Hoke	5.00
Herman Loeding	2.50
Mrs. T. M. Durlach and friends	200.00
Walter Verity, M.D.	25.00
Julia H. Scott	10.00
A. Hawick	10.00
Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Gillilan	10.00
Rev. J. H. Tever	5.00
Samuel Tzach	5.00
Roland E. Kremers	4.00
Ida D. Simpson	5.00
Leon Bardin	3.00
Dr. A. R. Braunlich	10.00
Otto J. Borngesser	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. Guerdon Nichols	5.00
J. S. Cheslinski	4.00
Total	$4,174.75

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1924 No. 3091

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 321
EDITORIALS:
A Lawyer for President? What Lawyer? 324
The Way to Disarm 325
Livy at Last? 325
Please Save the Republic! 326
WHO IS JOHN W. DAVIS? 327
IN MEMORY OF H. W. MASSINGHAM. By Henry Wood Nevinson 329
LOSSIEMOUTH. By Frank H. Simonds 330
LINES TO A DEAD LADY. By Lawrence Lee 331
INSTRUCTIVE NEW HAMPSHIRE. By William Hard 332
WORKERS' EDUCATION IN THE UNITED STATES. By A. J. Muste 333
DEPARTURE. By Ludwig Lewisohn 335
YOUNG AMERICA. By Frances Bradley 336
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 338
CORRESPONDENCE 338
BOOKS:
Upton Sinclair Scores Again. By C. Hartley Grattan 340
What Is Sex? By E. Carleton MacDowell 340
America's Foremost Composer. By John Erskine 341
Trivia. By Gerald Hewes Carson 342
A Rebel and a Leader. By Clarence R. Long 342
Books in Brief 343
DRAMA:
A Problem. By Joseph Wood Krutch 343
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Trade Union Congress, 1924 345
The Palestine Problem 345

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

ALL THE LA FOLLETTE NEWS is good news. Iowa is so certain for La Follette that, according to reliable reports, a group of the leading Wall Street financiers was hastily called together at a luncheon in mid-September, at which they pledged a large sum of money to buy Iowa back for Coolidge. But the most amazing news comes from California. At the outset of the campaign no one dared hope that this reactionary State would turn toward La Follette. The early optimism of Rudolph Spreckels, the La Follette manager, was readily discounted, but the Hearst and Literary Digest polls show an amazing turning to La Follette, even in Los Angeles. More than that, Gus Karger, the anti-La Follette correspondent of the Taft Cincinnati paper, wires from California that the State is now La Follette's. In New York the tide is turning from Coolidge. There Representative John D. Clark, of Delaware County, who upheld the President throughout the last session of Congress, was defeated for renomination, while Hamilton Fish, Jr., who opposed the President and was violently attacked during the primary campaign for not being regular, was triumphantly renominated. Chairman Shaver's admission that if the election were held today it would go into the House is further convincing proof of the growth of the La Follette movement. Even in a border State like Maryland the amount of support for La Follette is causing the Davis managers the greatest concern. The tidal wave is growing.

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE'S opening speech at Madison Square Garden, New York City, demonstrated that he is in powerful voice, in vigorous health, and ready for an aggressive campaign. In his attacks upon Calvin Coolidge he was particularly effective, and his analysis of the evolution of the Supreme Court's super-legislative position was a powerful demonstration of the need of curbing that dangerous body. Striking, indeed, was the response to his statement of what the war had meant to the world and to his own pledge to work to outlaw war—to no other sentiment did the vast audience respond as enthusiastically. That can be matched at every La Follette meeting; there is every evidence that peace-lovers throughout the country are turning to this man of peace with the certainty that if he is elected he will stand four-square for the outlawry of war. As for the Senator's economic proposals, there was nothing new in them, and, as our readers are aware, they are not as thoroughgoing as we should like. Why cannot so honest and brave a man, bent on destroying monopoly and the trusts, perceive the necessity of free trade? Until all protective tariffs are removed other measures are mere palliatives. Behind the tariff privilege of every kind is intrenched. None the less, we welcome Senator La Follette's serious discussion of economic problems; he is forcing people to think, however unwillingly, upon the fundamental issues.

HARRY DAUGHERTY was afraid. After months of bluster and braggadocio he did not dare take the witness-stand publicly and face questions on his record. He cowered behind a technicality. He is not the kind of man who fights in the open. Twice he has exposed himself as the slimiest kind of fighter. Once he conferred with the secretary and another employee of the Republican National Committee; the latter forthwith departed for Montana and arranged with a federal office-holder to have Burton K. Wheeler indicted on trumped-up evidence. Senator Borah's committee investigated and reported that Mr. Wheeler had "observed at all times not only the letter but the spirit of the law." Daugherty lapsed for a time into silence, appearing in the newspapers only in connection with his brother's fight to keep their bank accounts from examination. Now he plays another card. One of the many witnesses who testified to the rottenness and corruption in his department was Gaston B. Means, a former department employee, an intimate of Daugherty and friend of Andrew Mellon. Mr. Means was under indictment in New York for violation of the liquor laws. No sooner had he appeared against Daugherty than the prosecution was pressed. Means was convicted and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. He told Senator Wheeler that he had no money with which to appeal, and that a representative of Daugherty had approached him promising relief if he would repudiate his testimony. Wheeler told him to do as his conscience bade him. Now, in the midst of the campaign, Daugherty produces an alleged repudiation —which Means, somewhat equivocally, repudiates in its turn. This suspicious set of circumstances should be cleared up. Has Daugherty still influence enough in the administration of justice to arrange reprieves for men who perjure themselves to do his bidding and help his political associates?

ADD CURTIS WILBUR'S NAME to the list of misfits in the Harding-Coolidge Cabinet. Fall and Daugherty, the uncleanest of the crew, are gone, and the stupid Denby too. Curtis Wilbur has proved his unfitness for public office by his wild and foolish speeches. Mr. Wilbur is at least transparently honest. There is no guile or subtlety in these words of his San Francisco speech:

> The navy is of particular importance to the Pacific Coast . . . because of the belief that the last acts of the drama of civilization will occur in and around the Pacific Ocean. . . . [Then, immediately after referring to the Japanese exclusion:] It has been a great personal satisfaction for me to come down the coast with 14,000 sailors wearing the American uniform in ships adequate for their own protection and for the protection of our coasts, both East and West, from the aggression of any people influenced, as all people may be, by some extension of the mob spirit, some outburst of passion, or some real or fancied insult. There is nothing so cooling to a hot temper as a piece of cold steel.

This is good, old-fashioned saber-rattling militarism 100 per cent pure. We are glad that President Coolidge yanked Secretary Wilbur off the speaking platform; we are only sorry that he lacked the courage to admit his decent action.

"NICHOLAS MIRACULOUS" BUTLER, president of Columbia University, can be, when the fit is on him, a fire-eating orator. Something in Senator La Follette's proposal to modify the dictatorial power of the Supreme Court lit the fires within his breast. He was particularly excited by La Follette's statement that

> A century and a half ago our forefathers shed their blood in order that they might establish on this continent a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, in which the will of the people, expressed through their duly elected representatives, should be sovereign.

Without stopping to reread the Declaration of Independence Mr. Butler shouted that "Our forefathers did nothing of the sort. They took good care to do something quite different." The power of judicial review, he continued, "constitutes America's greatest single contribution to the cause of free government." The forefathers, one might suggest, would be even more surprised than we to hear it. Nicholas boldly challenged the enemy. "If they are looking for a fight on that issue," he said, "we are prepared to give it to them and it will be a fight to a finish." The finish came very soon. Norman Thomas, Socialist and Farmer-Labor candidate for Governor of New York, promptly challenged Mr. Butler to debate. But the fire in Mr. Butler's breast had died. "I don't intend to meet the gentleman," was all he had to say.

A SINISTER FIGURE has bobbed up again in the new commander of the American Legion, Colonel, or General, James A. Drain. Once chief of ordnance of the State of Washington, Drain arrived in Washington in 1905 as editor of Arms and the Man, under a guaranty of $2,500 a year for two years, made by the representatives of a cartridge company. Arms and the Man blossomed richly upon the advertising of all the large powder companies; and General Drain became a member of the National Militia Board and of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, which promptly recommended the purchase of four or five million rounds of cartridges from private companies for testing in competition with one million rounds of government-made ammunition. General Drain was also president of the National Rifle Association, which carried on its propaganda by use of a government franking privilege, to which it was in no way entitled, part of the salary of its press and publicity agent being openly paid by the ammunition-makers. In the passage of the Dick militia bill, the first eventful step toward nationalizing our militia and making it an instrument of propaganda for the federal military machine, General Drain also played a large part. He was as active a professional militarist as we have ever seen in Washington. His career is clear evidence that our existing militarism has largely been engineered by the interests which profit by armaments. He served as a colonel of ordnance in France and is the first non-fighting man to reach the headship of the Legion, which has so far lost ground that fewer than 1,000 votes were cast at its annual convention.

EXCEPT IN THE EVENT OF BATTLE, murder, or sudden death India hardly appears on the horizon of American news. Our knowledge of that strange land is a series of shocking incidents—whether of great beauty or great horror. The Black Hole of Calcutta, Amritsar, the Akali trouble, Tagore, Gandhi. Yet significant though seemingly unimportant events are occurring with great rapidity. Gandhi's non-violent non-cooperation has given way in popular favor to the more active political obstructionism of the Swarajists under the leadership of Das and Nehru. As a result the Central Provinces and Bengal have refused to vote the salaries of ministers. In Bengal the Governing Council has been prorogued and the departments taken over by the Governor, Lord Lytton. Triumphantly the Swarajists have declared that the continuation of dyarchy has been made impossible. They have repudiated the Montagu-Chelmsford reform scheme with its plan for gradual transference of one department after another to Indian rule "as they prove themselves capable of governing." The Swarajists are now demanding a conference which will draw up a new constitution providing for a "federation of self-governing Indian states" with a central government having certain fiscal and military powers. Mr. MacDonald has expressed himself emphatically as unwilling to be coerced by the Indian extremists. Yet in all probability the Labor Government if it remains in power will arrange such a conference as soon as it can turn from European affairs. Eventually Great Britain will have to move toward greater freedom in India for her own good as well as India's.

KANSAS ALWAYS HAS a surprise up its sleeve to keep current history from getting dull. The latest is the announcement that William Allen White, editor of the Emporia Gazette, is to run as an independent for the governorship because he regards both the Republican and Democratic nominees as tools of the Ku Klux Klan. In his own energetic language Mr. White says:

> I am proud of my State, and the thought that Kansas should have a government beholden to this hooded gang of masked fanatics, ignorant and tyrannical in their ruthless oppression, is what calls me out of the pleasant joy of my life and into this distasteful but necessary task.

This is straight talk, but it is nothing to what the Klan has said of Mr. White. For instance, the Enid (Oklahoma) Fish Hook recently called him a "doodlewad shot," adding: "He likes a dollar so well that if a fly were to light on a dollar of his money he would catch him and scrape his legs." Upon reading this the staff of the Emporia Gazette did not rebuke the Fish Hook. On the contrary they—we suspect "they" were "Bill" White himself—wrote:

> The downtrodden and oppressed force of the Gazette that has to live with this old whangdoodle and listen to his preterbatious scandulations have felt for some time that this town ought to have the truth about him. . . . He is the kind of affercascious old salamander who would spread stories about his own family to peluverate in the ignitious profits.

Between now and Election Day there promises to be a soul-stirring battle of words in breezy Kansas.

THE GOOSE-STEP in our schools goes merrily forward. We take the following from the program prepared for "American Education Week" (November 17 to 23, inclusive) by the American Legion, the National Education Association, and the United States Bureau of Education:

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1924

CONSTITUTION DAY

The Constitution is the bulwark of democracy and happiness.

1. Life, liberty, justice, security, and opportunity.
2. How our Constitution guarantees these rights.
3. Revolutionists, communists, and extreme pacifists are a menace to these guaranties.
4. One Constitution, one Union, one flag, one history.

Slogans—Ballots, not bullets
Master the English language
Visit the schools today

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1924

PATRIOTISM DAY

The United States flag is the living symbol of the ideals and institutions of our Republic.

1. The red flag means death, destruction, poverty, starvation, disease, anarchy, and dictatorship.
2. Help the immigrants and aliens to become American citizens.
3. Take an active interest in governmental affairs.
4. Stamp out revolutionary radicalism.
5. To vote is the primary duty of the patriot.

Slogans—America first
The red flag means danger
Visit the schools today

EUROPEANS MAY GENUINELY ADMIRE the American girl and may come to tolerate the American skyscraper, but there is one thing which they simply cannot swallow at all—they cannot conceive how anyone pretending to be a civilized human being can eat corn on the cob. Americans have boasted of this succulent and flavorful food all over the world, but they have left the world amazed and uncomprehending. Even the technique of this great American indoor sport is only dimly comprehended, as witness a recent note on the subject in the Manchester Guardian. The writer, who refers to the dish as "corn on cob," says:

> The spikes of unripe maize are boiled as a vegetable until quite soft, and then served on long dishes, bathed in butter. A silver handle, somewhat like an ordinary meat-skewer, is inserted at each end of the spike. Both hands are employed, one at each end, to hold the spike in position while one eats. It is well, for obvious reasons, to see that the dish is exactly below the mouth during the operation.

Probably it would shock the Guardian writer irretrievably to learn that his "silver handle" would be tossed aside with scorn by any real lover of "corn on cob," and that the actual technique is far more primitive than he suggests. We were delighted to learn that President Coolidge served corn on the cob to the Prince of Wales, but if he seriously wants to get in a masterstroke for world understanding he should call an International Conference on Eating Corn on the Cob to clear this matter up.

A GIFTED AND CHARMING LECTURER was lost to America by the sudden death of Charles Zueblin as a result of overexerting himself while climbing in Switzerland. Of most attractive personality and rare charm of manner, he preached modern liberal thought and political progress in so skilled a way that his varied audiences often failed to realize the radical character of much that he gave them. Founder of the Northwestern University Settlement in Chicago as far back as 1891, he was an instructor and professor at the University of Chicago from 1892 until 1908. For three years editor of the Twentieth Century Magazine, he was a contributor to most of the intellectual journals of the country, writing always from the ethical point of view on behalf of reform and progress. An ardent supporter of the League of Nations, he was in Switzerland to attend the present sessions of the Assembly, working to further the admission of Germany and Russia to its membership. America swarms with lecturers, but among them is no finer spirit and no truer patriot than was Charles Zueblin.

THE EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY of Edward Carpenter, on August 29 of this year, was the occasion in England for a survey and evaluation of his life's work. He emerges from the discussion an important and a curiously interesting man—a writer mild yet powerful, a prophet serene yet destructive, a critic of modern society who is half lyric poet and half philosopher. His coming to America and meeting Walt Whitman in 1877 first made him articulate, and he is often compared with the author of "Leaves of Grass"; but he is scarcely so potent a force, though he has a more critical mind. Returning to England, he developed a set of ideas which gradually took shape in "Towards Democracy," his earliest book and in many ways his most representative. In the intervals of experiments at the simple life he has produced a number of volumes which are all but classics. He was one of the first writers in England or elsewhere to treat frankly and rationally of sex; he examined the doctrines of human freedom and human equality; he revolted entirely against the industrial civilization in which he found himself. He still may mean much to a world which needs purity and calmness of vision above all things. In the interviews which he gave out on his birthday he congratulated England upon its Labor Government, and he declared that the only solution for the most pressing of modern problems—population—is not murder or war but birth control.

A Lawyer for President? What Lawyer?

ROSCOE POUND, dean of the Harvard Law School, has epitomized the preponderating place of lawyers in the public affairs of the country. They are, he says, "intrenched in the State House and Senate House." There are 320 lawyers among the 527 members of Congress. We are governed by lawyers, and hardly any question of public policy is more important than that involved in the candidacy of John W. Davis and in his own view of his profession. May a lawyer's acts in private practice be considered when he seeks public office?

The issue was presented when Senator Walsh, in notifying John W. Davis of his nomination, referred to and sought to meet the criticism that "you have been employed professionally as a lawyer by gigantic business interests whose policy and conduct have aroused quite general indignation, have repeatedly been the subject of the severest censure by the press, of investigation by the courts and Congress." Mr. Davis replied that "the answer to any criticism on that score must come . . . from the more than one hundred thousand other honest patriotic men and women who make up the legal profession in this country." Subsequently, he refused to discuss the bearing of his private law practice on his qualification for the Presidency. The bar itself has not answered for him. The answer must be given by the public. If the lawyers are to have immunity from the tests applied to all other candidates for office the reasons for such immunity must satisfy not alone the bar, but the people as a whole.

One of the tests applied to candidates is universally accepted in both private and public affairs. If a merchant goes to Mr. Davis's client, the Guaranty Trust Company, and asks for credit, the bank examines that merchant's record. When the New York Telephone Company was looking for a lawyer to help it obtain an increase in rates, it retained Davis because his record spelled ability and prestige. Similarly, a voter considers a candidate's record.

That record is studied with reference to the candidate's qualification for the particular place for which he has been nominated. If J. P. Morgan were a candidate for city comptroller he might get votes which would be denied to him as a contestant for the Presidency. If the head of the Santa Fe Railroad were nominated for the Presidency, progressives would little regard his domestic virtues as against the fact that his road was one of the die-hard injunction-using companies. Scholarship, dignity, Virginia-bred courtesy, desirable as these are, would not get liberal votes for a West Virginia coal operator who had clubbed labor unions with the injunction, the anti-trust act, or contempt proceedings. The recent outcry against Mr. Dawes for his connection with the Lorimer bank means that banker-candidates for public office must have at least honest records.

If a business man's private actions against the public interest are deemed relevant to his availability for political trusteeship, why should not the same be true of the lawyer? It will be appropriate to take, as an illustration, the lawyer who has precipitated this issue. Mr. Davis's client wanted to have union men jailed, and Mr. Davis helped in the contempt proceedings to jail them. His client wanted to collect triple damages from the miners' union, and Mr. Davis sought to show how to extend the use of the anti-trust act against labor unions for this purpose. A telephone company wanted to raise its charges, and Mr. Davis fought to get the increase, and to that end he urged valuation principles and methods opposed to the public good.

In some, though not in all, such cases a distinction can be made between the motive of the client and the motive of the lawyer. The client wanted the union men jailed because it wanted to break a strike. The lawyer may have had no such motive; his primary object may have been simply to earn his fee; but he knew, no less than his client, that the direct consequence of his act as lawyer would be to break the strike. The underlying motive of both was the same—money, power, or self-interest.

Various other distinctions which might be advanced do not apply to the broad issue presented to the bar and the public by Mr. Davis's candidacy. A lawyer who has at one time served against the public may forswear such service and prove his loyalty to the people's cause. A lawyer may serve, in other matters, a client some of whose business practices should bar him from the Presidency; that would not necessarily affect the fitness of the lawyer for public office. Of course he may not help a man commit a crime, but to help an accused person to preserve his personal liberty is not the same thing. The issue Mr. Davis's candidacy raises falls within none of these categories. His firm is a real part of the Morgan machine in the Morgan business—the connection between the two firms is intimate, it is constant, it has been riveted by years and years of companionship. This is substantial enough, but it is not all. Mr. Davis and his firm were associated also with the Kuhn-Loeb interest, the second largest financial house in America; with the Guaranty Trust Company, the largest bank of its kind in the country; with great railroads and industrial companies and public utilities. Here was a law practice at the center of the powers of imperialism, of industrial autocracy, and of the great "money trust." Mr. Davis's relation to these financial powers is exceptionally intimate. This fact may make the Davis example an unusually severe test of the problem he confidently propounded to the entire bar; but the extreme case of Mr. Davis and his own firm indicates how dangerous can be the doctrine that lawyers who seek public office should not be judged by their deeds in private practice.

It is fortunate that, if the issue was to be raised at all, it arose as it did. It gained an instant importance from the man who proposed the question, a leader of the American bar, an ex-president of the American Bar Association, a candidate for the Presidency of the republic. The urbanity, the agreeableness of this lawyer and of his professional associates strip the issue of the merely personal aspects and leave only the professional.

An answer was asked by the leader of lawyers from the lawyers themselves. Let the lawyers answer. Will they claim a privilege, an immunity which must in the long run drive them from public office? Or will they heed the words of America's greatest legal scholar: "It is no accident that the legal profession is more than ordinarily under criticism at present. . . . A period of growth is at hand and men are more sensitive to contrast between the legal and the moral."

The Way to Disarm

A NEW wave of optimism is sweeping over Europe. It finds its expression in the serious attempts to work out a program of disarmament at Geneva. Never, since the Hague conferences—unless in the restricted discussions at Washington—has the problem of disarmament so won the limelight of the world's attention. Pacifists and theorists have argued about it; statesmen and politicians have shrugged their shoulders and remarked "Yes, it would be ideal, but . . ." Today at last the prime ministers are awakening to the realization that unless they can solve the problem of this ideal all their other achievements will be wiped out.

It is a great forward step that the League is inviting all the nations of the world—Germany, Soviet Russia, and the United States included—to a disarmament conference next June. Unless all the great nations which are potential military Powers participate in such a conference it will be foredoomed to sterility. If the correspondents rightly predict that the French Government will offer no opposition to the proposal to admit Germany to the League and give her a permanent seat on the Council, there is still more cause for rejoicing. Nothing, however, so imperils progress as a too facile optimism. It is not enough that the minds of men in high position are at last puzzling over the if's and how's of disarmament. At Geneva last week two fundamentally opposed theories of disarmament and security clashed, and there is danger that the discussion may simply accentuate the contrast between these two views and render progress more difficult.

Ramsay MacDonald faced the issue squarely in his opening address. The Cecil-Requin Treaty of Mutual Assistance, which the British Government rejected, had made provisions for mutual assistance in case of war the basis of the move for disarmament. "We believe," said Mr. MacDonald, > that a military alliance in an agreement for security is like a grain of mustard seed, small to begin with; that is the essential seed of the agreement, and that seed with the years will grow until at last the tree that has been produced from it will overshadow the heavens, and we shall be back exactly in the military position in which we found ourselves in 1914. . . . The danger of supreme importance which is facing us now is that national security should be regarded merely as a military problem based on the predominance of force.

Mr. MacDonald therefore urged that the nations begin by agreements for general arbitration rather than by attempts to win security by military means. "The essential condition of security and peace," he said, "is justice, which must be allowed to speak. That is arbitration." And he proposed, in substance, an agreement for obligatory arbitration.

In his reply, generous-spirited as it was, M. Herriot made clear the fundamental flaw in French policy. It relies on force. It refuses to admit that there is any safety without predominant force.

> You cannot have justice without some force behind it. . . . We must make what is mighty just, and what is just mighty, if we are to give the peoples what they desire, if we are to save them from a repetition of their sufferings. We must realize that we have to provide for their security. . . . Arbitration, security, and disarmament are inseparable.

Those were warm-hearted words, very different from the utterances of a Poincaré. But behind them lurks the same old fallacy of reliance upon physical force. Translated into concrete terms, as they were by the French delegation at Geneva, those words meant a military alliance to preserve the status quo. That may not be what M. Herriot intended by them, but it is the interpretation given by the French Foreign Office and by the Paris press. It is the meaning followed in the discussions at Geneva by the representatives of the Little Entente, including that astute prop of French continental policy, Mr. Benes, the Czech Foreign Minister. Lord Parmoor so understood them when he sagely replied that in the last century some 700 arbitral decisions had been made but that in none of these arbitrations had any adequate force or "sanction" been provided. Yet he could find no single case in which the award or decision of arbitration had not been accepted.

If the French insist upon military or naval sanctions as part of the program for disarmament they will arouse that fear of the League as a super-state which has caused so much antagonism not only in the United States but elsewhere. The British Government hastily disavowed Lord Parmoor when he rashly suggested that the British navy might be used as part of an international law-enforcement force. Security is a shy and evasive thing; it resides in the minds and hearts of men, not in alliances and armaments. That is the lesson which nations must learn. Military security for one nation must always imply a threat to another. The way to disarm is to disarm; the way to peace is through arbitration; the only permanent security rests in mutual confidence.

Livy at Last?

PROFESSOR MARIO DE MARTINO-FUSIO'S alleged discovery of the lost 107 books of Livy has won more newspaper space than one might have expected. Most people who have been compelled to read even a few of the thirty-five extant books probably considered that an imposition. But the news achieved a place among the wise-cracks of the columnists, and that is one of the most coveted modern marks of distinction. These same books have more than once stirred passionate interest; they have been a will-o'-the-wisp for centuries. They raised and dashed the hopes of many an eager searcher in the days when, at the height of the worship of newly discovered antiquity, it was more common for loyal members of the church to doubt the value of the Holy Scripture than the inestimable value of the classics, when even ecclesiastics were afraid to read Saint Paul lest familiarity with his rudeness should spoil that greatest of human attainments, a good style.

When Boccaccio was rummaging the dusty remains of monastic libraries in search of ancient works and pouring his scorn upon dull monks who were careless of the treasures under their roofs—some even clipped up priceless manuscripts to sell as charms to superstitious laymen—such a discovery would have been a discovery indeed. Once a certain Dominican, Giovanni de Colonna, maintained that he had seen in the archives of the cathedral at Chartres a portion of the missing history, written in so strange a script that it could not be deciphered; but far more famous was one of those wild-goose chases which maddened the Renaissance. It involved one of the greatest scholars and one of the greatest princes of the age in pursuit of these same books of Livy. A certain Dane named Nicolaus appeared at the court of Martin V with the news that he himself had seen ten decades of Livy, written in Longobardish script mingled with Gothic characters, in a Cistercian establishment near Roskilde. Nicolaus was reputed a somewhat flighty man but he inspired high hopes in the breast of Poggio and set aflame that most extraordinary of papal secretaries. Poggio was a man who poured forth vitriolic satire upon the clergy and stopped at no obscenity, but he revered the classics—so profoundly, indeed, as to leave no reverence for the church he served. At his earnest request Cardinal Orsini sent a special messenger north to find them, and even Cosimo de' Medici himself thought the matter of sufficient import to send to his agent at Lübeck special instructions to spare no pains to obtain the treasure. But, alas, no Livy was found and the Dane passed, perhaps unjustly, for a liar. On three separate occasions did similar rumors stir Poggio, who would doubtless have sold his soul to any devil he could believe in for a glimpse of the books. Finally, even he was forced to admit, like another scholar of the time, that though the Institutes of Quintilian, the logical works of Cicero, and other priceless things had been almost miraculously recovered, the missing books of Livy would be forever closed to him. If indeed they should come to light at this late day Poggio would doubtless gnash his teeth in whatever eternity is allotted to so paradoxical a character. It would be a true pity that he should have been denied a pleasure which may be granted to an age capable of rejoicing in it so much less than he.

But so far no books have been found and he is spared, temporarily at least, the pangs of envy. From the beginning there was a mystery about the "discovery," and the day after it was announced the professor disappeared. No one seems to have suggested the possibility that the Fascisti had done away with him in the fear that the newly discovered manuscript might contain subversive matter or, improbable as it might seem, facts about the early history of Rome which good patriots would prefer not to know. The explanations given were various. Some suggested that he only wanted leisure to copy his treasures, others that the fantastic sums said to have been offered by the British Museum and others were sufficient to tempt even a scholar to seek to violate the laws of Italy and smuggle the manuscript out of the country. For a time nothing was sure except that, temporarily at least, Italy had not found Livy but had lost an archaeologist. Suddenly, however, Professor de Martino reappears, angrily denying that he has found either a life of Christ dated A.D. 58, which an exuberantly growing legend had added to his discovery, or the long lost books of Livy. What he did discover was a document which states that a certain scribe in Naples was commissioned to copy a complete Livy, and he has hopes that with this clue he may possibly trace the manuscript itself. He has been overwhelmed with visitors, letters, and telegrams, and now, so he says, demands nothing except peace in which to continue his researches. The chances are that his desire will be readily granted by a public whose interest in new discoveries dies down about as fast as it is kindled. The public will, in all probability, completely forget both De Martino and Livy long before the professor has recovered from the threatened attack of nervous prostration into which the publicity which he has received is driving him.

Please Save the Republic!

WITH our usual journalistic enterprise we are glad to serve our readers by printing now some of the dispatches which will appear in the daily press in the frantic last week of the campaign:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 28.—The Republican National Committee today announced that it has indisputable proof that the La Follette candidacy originated in Moscow. It gave to the press an affidavit of one Vladimir A. Prevarikatovski, who stated that he was present at an interview between Robert La Follette and Leon Trotzky in Moscow in 1923, at which the Senator from Wisconsin, in response to Trotzky's earnest appeal, gave his promise that he would run for President in 1924.

CHICAGO, October 29.—Hell-and-Maria Dawes, speaking today before the combined Rotary and Kiwanis clubs in Lincoln Park, declared that the German opposition to the acceptance of the Dawes plan came not from the Prussian militarists and conservatives, but was attributable directly to the influence of Robert M. La Follette. "While we were working out the plan," said the General, "we discovered a conspiracy against us working with the aid of gold contributed by La Follette's Milwaukee sympathizers. We have reason to believe that some of that money originally came from the Kaiser," added the commander-in-chief of the Chicago Minute Men.

PEORIA, ILLINOIS, October 30.—Speaking here in a last-minute effort to carry Illinois, John W. Davis declared to an enthusiastic audience of sixty-two people that the real objective of the La Follette campaign was the destruction of the American home. "I have excellent grounds for thinking," he solemnly declared, "that if my Progressive adversary is elected a law will be passed compelling every woman to wear bobbed hair and ordering the rearing of all infants in public institutions, after the plan of the Russian Communists, which even they have abandoned."

WASHINGTON, October 31.—President Coolidge, at his regular weekly reception to the Washington correspondents today, followed his usual custom of answering no questions and saying nothing. The serious aspect of his face, however, gives rise to the belief that he is convinced that the revolutionary effort to overthrow the Government by electing La Follette will be triumphantly defeated. A spokesman for the White House, whose name cannot be used, declared that the Progressive effort to establish free love in America will be rebuked at the polls by a greater majority than the seven million given President Harding.

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA, November 1.—William J. Bryan, speaking to his former neighbors at an old-home-week reception yesterday, made the sensational statement that the "interests" have now concentrated upon Robert La Follette and have concluded to buy the election for the Wisconsin Senator. "I protest against this outrage," he said. "Seeing Coolidge hopelessly beaten, Wall Street has at the eleventh hour raised three million dollars to defeat Davis and Brother Charley, fearing more than all else the presence of any Bryan in Washington."

WASHINGTON, November 3.—Calvin Coolidge, breaking his solemn, self-imposed silence, today issued the following last-minute appeal to the American electorate: "In the name of George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and Warren Harding I appeal to my fellow-citizens to preserve the American hearthstone, the special privileges of private property, and the virtue of our women. There is no doubt that the real objective of the so-called Progressives is to destroy the American home and to hoist the red flag of anarchy upon our glorious Capitol. I represent all the virtues; let every American patriot vote for me."

Who Is John W. Davis?

(The Nation invited the Democratic headquarters in New York to contribute an article in support of Mr. Davis, for this same issue, but no response was received.)

JUDGE JACKSON was the federal judge in the northern part of West Virginia. To him union organizers were not merely "agitators" but "vampires." If the organizer were a woman, she was furthering "an object which is entirely unworthy of a good woman. . . . It would have been better far for her to follow the lines and paths which the Allwise Being intended her sex should pursue."

So when "Mother" Jones and other organizers for the coal miners' union were trying to organize the men of the Clarksburg Fuel Company, the company took its troubles to Judge Jackson. The union had rented an empty lot about a fifth of a mile from the opening of the company's mine. The coal company brought the Guaranty Trust Company all the way down from New York to act as the nominal plaintiff, and Judge Jackson issued an order forbidding the union organizers to hold a meeting near the mine. But the union people had rented the lot, they felt they had a right to use their own property, and "Mother" Jones made a speech. The other organizers applauded her speech. The lawyers, including the law firm of John W. Davis of Clarksburg, hurried to Judge Jackson and asked him to jail the organizers who had taken part in the meeting and applauded "Mother" Jones. The judge put them in jail. The strike was broken. That was in 1902.

After Davis was nominated some of his friends circulated a story that he had defended a group of mine leaders, including Eugene Debs and "Mother" Jones. No dates have been given, nor details which would make it possible to trace such a case. The only record now available is that of the case in which John W. Davis helped put the fellow-organizers of "Mother" Jones in jail. Davis had begun practicing law in 1895 at Clarksburg, the county seat of one of the most important coal-producing counties of West Virginia. During his fifteen years of active practice his law firm played its part in the excited dealings of that period in coal lands and oil lands, coal leases and natural-gas leases, and in the centralized accumulation of coal and oil lands. Davis was on his way to a place in national politics; in 1904 he was a delegate to the Democratic Convention which called its nominee into retirement. In 1910 and again in 1912 he was elected to Congress.

In Congress Davis was strictly a party man, voting and speaking for his party's measures and accepting the decisions of the Democratic caucus. The insurgents, who were organized in both houses under La Follette leadership, attacked the Democrats for binding themselves to the old practice of voting as determined by their secret party caucus. It was this caucus which enabled a powerful lobby to render innocuous the insurgents' famous resolution for an investigation of the "Money Trust." But in the backstairs betrayal of the public interest Davis was merely voting with his party. Davis himself spoke in behalf of two measures presented by the Democrats for the purpose of redeeming their pledge to remedy the evils of court interference with labor unions in strikes. One bill, dealing with the injunction evil, simply announced, as Davis said, "rules common to other cases in equity"; the bill told the courts the proper rule, which they should know without being told. But on the real question, the propriety of injunctions in labor disputes, the bill was silent and Davis was silent. The insurgents insisted on their right to offer amendments, but the Democrats jammed the bill through. The other bill, a measure for a jury trial in contempt proceedings, did not cover contempts arising out of suits brought by the Government; in short, its provisions would not have given a jury trial to Debs in the Pullman strike of 1894 or to the coal miners in their 1919 strike or to the railroad shopmen in 1922. The Democrats permitted no amendments to their bill. The bills did not pass the Senate, but two years later, when Davis was no longer in Congress, similar bills became law—the so-called labor provisions of the Clayton Act, that expression of a naive hope.

In 1913 Davis became Solicitor General, the Government's lawyer in the Supreme Court. He inherited many suits begun by Wickersham, Taft's Attorney General, involving a number of concerns with which Davis was to become familiar on the other side of the fence some years later—such as the Standard Oil Company, the United States Steel Corporation, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and the Santa Fe Railroad. Davis also appeared for the Government in a suit to effectuate President Taft's withdrawal of certain oil lands from public entry and in a suit for forfeiture of railroad lands instituted by Taft's Administration in 1911. In two other cases, also begun by the Taft Administration, Davis was successful in sustaining indictments for violation of the federal anti-peonage act and in having the Oklahoma grandfather clause declared unconstitutional as a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Davis was Solicitor General long enough to appear also in defense of legislation passed during the Wilson Administration—the child-labor act, the eight-hour railroad act, the income-tax act of 1913, and the compulsory-military-service law.

Davis was Ambassador to Great Britain from 1918 to 1921. As his retirement approached he was confronted by the prospect of a return to private life. If ever such a prospect offered to a lawyer a wealth of choice, Davis had it. To great legal ability he had added not only great prestige as a lawyer but—what ranks among the highest of assets for material success in private law practice—potent prestige in many and diverse places where the lawyer's help is required for large business successes. He could pick and choose with success what law work he would do, for whom he would do it, and where he would practice.

His decision was announced in October, 1920. He would become a member of the New York law firm which had a business good-will more valuable perhaps than that of any other law firm in the entire country. Its name was not known to many laymen. But to bankers and investment houses everywhere, to the heads of railroad systems and the big industrial concerns, and to the select group of able lawyers who handled their work, Stetson, Jennings, and Russell, of which Davis became the senior member, was known as the firm which had piloted J. P. Morgan and his associates through great reorganizations, such as that of the Reading coal and rail properties; through the biggest of combinations and promotions, such as that of the United States Steel Corporation; through the war period, when the Morgan firm, acting as fiscal agent for foreign governments, had stood at the gates and taken toll on war-time contracts and had become enormously rich and intrenched as by far the most powerful house in America; through the financings which had given the Morgan firm its stake in, and its influence on, so large a part of industry at home and affairs abroad—on far-flung systems of railroads and public utilities; on basic industries such as steel and copper and oil; on the governments of the principal nations of Europe and Asia.

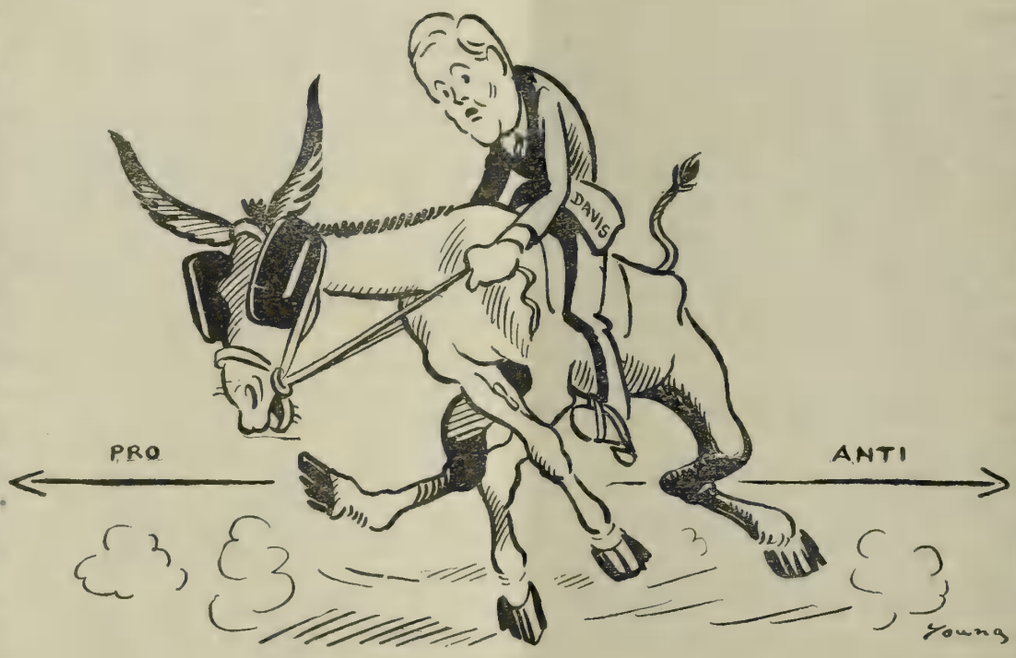
This law firm also serves as counsel for the Guaranty Trust Company, the largest trust-company bank in the United States, on whose directorate sit three of the Morgan partners. Its diversified business exemplifies that of the new type of great bank. Its borrowers include many of the biggest concerns having their plants within a radius of a thousand miles or more from New York. Through a subsidiary it heads and participates in the biggest financings. Its part in foreign trade has become enormous, and its investments in foreign banks extend to the banking fields in Asia and in Central and South America. Davis's firm also acted directly for other concerns, generally concerns which had been financed by the Morgan firm, such as the Erie Railroad.



Davis not only joined this firm of Morgan lawyers; he entered actively into big business as a director of large corporations. He went on the board of the Santa Fe Railroad, operating more than twelve thousand miles of railroad, with assets of more than $640,000,000 and the Morgan firm as its bankers. He joined the board of directors of the National Bank of Commerce in New York, an institution with resources of three hundred millions. He became a director of the United States Rubber Company, a two hundred and seventy-five million dollar concern, having plants all over the United States and abroad, supported by Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the second largest banking firm in the country.

During those three years of New York law practice before Davis was nominated for the Presidency, important issues were before the American public. In 1921 the Palmer-Daugherty-Burns policy of suppressing civil liberties was still in full swing. Davis was president of the American Bar Association in 1923, when one of its committees made a report calling upon the association to engage in the battle against "Red" propaganda and the "1,500,000 radicals in this country who are clamoring for . . . a . . . communistic state." Davis said nothing. The conscientious objectors were still in prison. Efforts were made to enlist Davis's help, but in vain. He did not lift a finger.

Nor did he have anything to say on the shopmen's strike of 1922, or the enormities of the Daugherty-Wilkerson injunction. Davis's own railroad, the Santa Fe, itself got an injunction without prior notice to the unions. The Santa Fe was one of the die-hard roads which held out against the settlement proposals made by President Harding, by Hoover, by the railroad brotherhoods, by the more liberal railroad presidents. Instead, the Santa Fe followed General Atterbury of the Pennsylvania Railroad in his rule-or-ruin campaign, and did not settle until December, 1923. Davis remained on the board, and said nothing publicly.

Davis himself was in 1922 engaged in directing against the United Mine Workers the most brutal and most dangerous court weapon developed against trade unions. The extent to which the Supreme Court would go in applying the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, with its severe penalties, as an anti-union club was most uncertain. The labor-union movement was on its guard against what it deemed a blow at its very foundations. At this juncture the Coronado Coal Company case brought before the Supreme Court the now celebrated attempt to hammer the national coal miners' union with the aid of the Sherman act. The Supreme Court, by unanimous decision rendered in 1922, refused to decide in favor of the coal-mine owners. The decision received front-page headlines in newspapers all over the country. The entire labor-union movement breathed freer. The owners of the mine decided to make a last desperate effort to get the Supreme Court to change its mind. A pinch-hitter of the first rank was required. John W. Davis was called in. He asked the court to hear the case again. He argued skilfully that the Sherman act should be applied to the unions in this case. His success would have meant the strengthening of a highly dangerous but still uncertain force against labor unions; it would have been a colossal blow to labor. Fortunately, Davis lost.

Davis was more successful in litigation involving the valuation of public utilities for rate-making purposes. With four new men on the Supreme Court, and a keen and pressing interest in the fight between the public and the companies as to the underlying principles of valuation, the court cases during these years had an unusual importance for the entire country, with respect to every class of public utility. Davis ranged himself on the side of the principal subsidiary of the American Telephone & Telegraph Company, the nation-wide holding company for which the Morgan firm floated a $100,000,000 bond issue in 1923.

Both before and after his nomination Davis spoke on issues regarded by him as important. He declared himself in behalf of the League of Nations and the World Court. On the question of American imperialism he was silent. However, his clients were engaged, with the help of his firm, in the business of lending to Central America, and were collecting from it, with the assistance of the State Department. Davis's firm was counsel for the American section of the International Committee of Bankers on Mexico, under the chairmanship of Morgan partners. In this relation Davis and his law firm saw one of the most remarkable instances of the power of American bankers over foreign governments. The holder of the finance portfolio of the Mexican republic was obliged to come to the offices of J. P. Morgan & Company to ascertain the terms to which his Government must agree before it would be permitted to deal with its neighboring great sister republic. It was during this period, also, that Davis's banker clients were furnishing new loans to Cuba, Peru, and Panama, in the shadow of the gibbet-like examples set up in Haiti and Santo Domingo.

The presidential candidate has, however, presented a program on labor. What was the alluring picture he painted for organized labor, to a union audience, on Labor Day? In his speech at Wheeling, West Virginia, he declared against child labor, a reform which had years earlier been adopted by the vast majority of the States and by overwhelming majorities in both houses of Congress. He declared in favor of vaguely defined changes with respect to the Railroad Labor Board, the point of which appeared to be that such a board as functioned should have the confidence of both sides. Finally, he favored the use of the injunction in labor disputes only where the injunction should properly be issued; "if the legislation already passed is not sufficient guidance in this matter, we must write it in plainer terms." He said nothing about labor's demand that courts refrain from breaking strikes with injunctions. Davis said nothing of the danger to labor unions arising from the extension of the Sherman act and its application to strikes, although the wrong involved had been made clear to him by his own attempt to inflict it upon the labor unions only two years earlier.

But in that speech at Wheeling, West Virginia, on Labor Day, Davis made one of the most reactionary statements made in this campaign by any candidate, including General Dawes himself, on a labor issue. He came out strong for the doctrine of "freedom of contract." This doctrine has in case after case been used as an argument for declaring important labor legislation unconstitutional. In real fact the doctrine means a lack of freedom of contract. The unemployed miner who can get a job at the West Virginia coal mines only if he agrees not to join a union, and the girl who can find a job only at a wage below that fixed by a minimum-wage commission, are denied the relief which the Legislature seeks to accord them, because the courts declare statutes passed for their relief unconstitutional, as interfering with "freedom of contract"!

Davis of course joins with Coolidge in opposing a curb on the Supreme Court's power. But Davis goes farther than Coolidge. Commenting on the widespread discontent aroused by the Supreme Court's exercise of its power, Davis said to the American Bar Association last year:

> Much of the current discontent is caused perhaps by the publication of dissenting opinions which serve to fan the flame of public distrust. Certainly, it is not edifying to the lay mind that an opinion representing the considered judgment of the majority of any court should be accompanied at the moment of deliverance by an effort to prove its manifest error.

This was directed at the practice of such great judges as Brandeis and Holmes, whose vigorous and statesmanlike dissenting opinions in constitutional cases are a curb on the court, and may become a corrective of its recent majority opinions. For Davis these salutary dissenting opinions only "serve to fan the flame of public distrust." That sufficiently reveals the workings of his mind.

In Memory of H. W. Massingham

(Former Editor of the London Nation)

By HENRY WOOD NEVINSON

London, September 5

LAST Tuesday afternoon an unwonted gathering of men and women was assembled in one of London's huge and ghastly cemeteries which make one long for compulsory cremation of the dead. Crowded around us in a waste of marble stood crosses and statues and emblems of eternal hope erected "in loving memory" over thousands of people long, long forgotten; and it might have been thought that we were but adding one more to the insignificant relics of ghosts who once had known the ordinary joys and sorrows of life, and now had vanished.

But it was a man of noble and extraordinary personality whom we were lowering into the common earth. At sight of him as he lived only last week no one could have guessed how noble and extraordinary. That slim and boyish figure, that pale and almost unwrinkled face, that fair hair untouched by gray, that soft and gentle voice, that swift and eager speech, as though prompted by flashes of sudden inspiration—those visible qualities would never have revealed a man of sixty-four, a man whose life for nearly fifty years had been one long and often bitter struggle, a man who had felt and had aroused the extreme passions of hatred and of scorn, who had acted as a gadfly to the whole of his country, stinging her up from torpid indifference and comfortable iniquity, or, again, like a knight-at-arms, charging full tilt and almost alone into the very thick of those heavy battalions on whose side the Prince of Darkness always stands, inspiring even cowards to follow him in the conflict, smiting the dark hosts of ignorance, prejudice, and greed, putting down the mighty from their seat, denouncing the most popular of superstitions, releasing the prisoner and the captive, proclaiming mercy to the subjugated, incurring every form of personal loss and personal obloquy, and in the end raising the cry of victory in nearly every cause for which he had striven. No one could have supposed it unless he had known that the simple figure whom we were burying was Massingham, greatest of English editors, and among the greatest of our writers.

I do not know or care what may be said against him by those vulgar and insensitive papers and politicians with whom he waged incessant warfare. "What recks it them? What need they? They are sped." But the great papers, even those that seldom agreed with him, like the Times, the Observer, the Westminster, and, I can have no doubt, the Spectator in tomorrow's issue, give him the praise due to a gallant, sincere, and unflinching opponent. For though he was himself the most generous of men, generosity in journalism has not quitted the world with him. His power of attraction was equally proved by the crowd of distinguished but very diverse men and women gathered around his grave. Of course nearly all of us were there who had served under him for the sixteen years when he as editor made the London Nation a unique influence for righteousness in the country; but there were many besides who could have agreed little with his views on national or social policy—some Liberal statesmen and journalists, still stiffly upholding the well-worn Liberal standards of last century; some ancient Socialists equally left behind by the rushing stream of time; and especially one noticed conspicuous writers whose interest in the daily world of politics is seldom expressed, and some clerical figures, prophetic of deeply religious change. All great journalists touch life at many points, but of Massingham it may be said that whatever he touched he adorned. Unless, indeed, I may say of him what I should wish to be written on my own tombstone: "From whatever he touched, he stripped the adornment." For his passionate sincerity and reckless disregard of the commonplace did strip the adornment from all the blazoned display of wealth, ambition, "glories of war," and "empire."

Of course, he was often mistaken—more often in his estimate of men than of policies. When first I served under him he was violently supporting the cause of Greece against the Red Sultan and his persecutions in Crete and Asia Minor. He might almost be said to have made the war that ended in such disaster in 1897—a disaster that anyone serving, like myself, on the Greek side must have foreseen. But the mistake on Massingham's part was a noble one. Even more noble was his condemnation of the Boer War, which drove him from his great position as editor of the Daily Chronicle in 1899, though I suppose there is hardly an Englishman who would not now admit he was right. Similar unpopularity he incurred by his efforts to bring the Great War to an end on decently negotiated terms which would have saved thousands of young lives and have avoided the present wretched chaos of Europe. His subsequent failure to persuade our British Coalition and the French politicians to conclude a just and honorable peace was, I think, the failure that broke his heart. As a patriot, he felt that the Peace of Versailles involved our country in the deepest shame, and, as a human being, he foresaw with horror the hideous dangers to which it exposed the European races. His mistakes in the estimate of men were more difficult to understand. He was always looking round for some conspicuous figure great enough and noble enough to lead the party of advance in England. At one time he fixed upon Lord Rosebery, at another upon Mr. Winston Churchill, at another upon Mr. Lloyd George, and yet again upon Lord Robert Cecil. In all such hopes he failed, and failed disastrously. In every case, except perhaps the last, he was impelled to turn with vehement disapproval against the man whom he had helped to power.

It was characteristic that he usually adopted a fine cause just at the time when it was most unpopular. So, for instance, it was with woman suffrage. In the stormy but attractive period of its earlier days, when everyone was fighting for or against it, he did not appear much interested, and he seldom allowed me to write on it in the Nation; I suppose for fear of my false reputation for violence. But when the war had almost put the suffrage out of sight, and nothing but scorn or indifference was to be gained by advocating it, then he came forward as its champion, encouraging the ranks till victory was ours. If it be said, on the contrary, that he joined the Labor Party only when it was on the point of rising to power, one must remember that he joined only after long struggle and defeated hopes of animating the old Liberal Party with something of his spirit and sincerity. Only in despair of finding a spark of fresh spirit or a touch of genuine sincerity in the established Liberal leaders did he incline to seek those qualities in a party that was at least progressive and full of hope. It must also be remembered that this inclination to Labor was the main cause of his exclusion from the editorship of the Nation, which he alone had created and to which he alone gave its peculiar and far-reaching influence.

And now he is gone—the great man so generous, so kindly, so alive to all beauty, so fiercely passionate. I cannot yet realize the loss to the country or to myself. With brief intervals I served him for nearly thirty years. For at least twenty of those years I wrote regularly for his papers whenever I was in England and not engaged (often for him too) at the front of some war, rebellion, or struggle for liberty. There was always a certain shyness between us, partly because he was editor and I only one of the staff; partly also because we were both typical Englishmen, and no Englishman may express admiration often, or affection ever. But till last week there he was, and I could always say to myself: "Thank God, there is one man who will fight for the noble and honorable and unpopular cause whatever happens!" But now he is gone, and his departure has left the world colder and more exposed to the devastations of the commonplace.

Lossiemouth

By FRANK H. SIMONDS

LOSSIEMOUTH, so the invaluable gazetteer testifies, fronts Moray Frith, looks out hopefully upon the portentous German Ocean. There the inconsiderable Lossie, coming north out of the Highlands, falls into the sea. Inconspicuous, when the gazetteer was last printed, Lossiemouth now advances two claims upon future editions, for here something more than half a century ago, in good Victorian days, was born the Right Honorable J. Ramsay MacDonald; here, too, henceforth and forever memorable therefore, is the single golf club between John o'Groats and Land's End where the Prime Minister of Britain may not play.

That the prophet is not without honor save in his own country is an old truism, but that the Prime Minister should not be without golf save in his home town, that again is something, and thereby hangs a tale, significant now from one end of the United Kingdom to the other; not without challenge indeed from one extremity to the other of that Empire on which the descending sun never quite sets.

To understand the fact one must travel in thought backward into the darkness which was the World War, to that moment when all Britain was authentically shaken, its eyes fixed upon Flanders and Picardy battlefields. At that precise hour, the Battle of the Somme still in progress, J. Ramsay MacDonald, member of the House of Commons and of the Lossiemouth Golf Club, Royal, Scotch, Caledonian, the details do not signify, rising in his place in Westminster, gave voice to words calculated, so it was then held, to depress the gallant Briton and encourage the unspeakable Hun.

These words being communicated swiftly to Lossiemouth, where the speaker was known chiefly as a silent man devoted to an unobtrusive but neither unsound nor unenthusiastic golf, had immediate, enduring consequences, for forthwith in special meeting assembled the Lossiemouth Golf Club unanimously and highly resolved that the said J. Ramsay MacDonald was henceforth and forever expelled from the Lossiemouth links, precincts, lands, premises, and buildings whatsoever, forbidden access thereto now and always. Said resolution having been thus adopted, was entered upon the permanent records, evidence that, in the hour of national trial, the Lossiemouth Golf Club had not hesitated to perform its duty, had not failed to do its bit.

The same being in due course of time further published abroad, came promptly to the ready ear of aroused patriotism. Lossiemouth proudly divided world interest with Ypres, Salonica, even Verdun; India, Ireland, Canada, Australia, islands and continents all around the seven seas murmured its name. The comet of a summer night, trailing its glory as it sped, such was Lossiemouth, then, ere the northern fog shut down and blotted it out not unkindly but inexorably.

As for the now Right Honorable J. Ramsay MacDonald, what he thought he did not say. His feelings, bitter or unresentful, are unrecorded; then as now he was a silent, dour, rather sad-faced man, deepwater somehow suggested by himself, deeper perhaps than the noble Lossie. What he did, on the other hand, is noted. Now and again on the sand dunes, with his faithful golf bag, he might have been seen swinging his clubs, practicing his stroke, preserving his form, not moved to abandon golf, nor for that matter Lossiemouth, not roused to violent resentment—nothing of the sort, obviously a patient man, patient even for a golfer.

Consider now the odd consequence of the passing of time. From 1916 we travel rapidly to 1924 when certain events having taken place in the British Islands, and these having produced certain results in the House of Commons, the Right Honorable Stanley Baldwin has the honor, according to tradition, to be received by George, Emperor and King, Defender of the Faith, etc. Being thus received, he duly mentions the name of J. Ramsay MacDonald. Thereupon, His Gracious Majesty having summoned the said MacDonald is pleased to lay upon him an august command, and the said MacDonald having departed returns again, kisses Majesty's hand, and is, authentically, His Majesty's Prime Minister.

Following which events the Court Gazette becomes singularly vocal on the subject of the same J. Ramsay MacDonald, notes that he has been honored by being invited to dine with the King and Queen, that the Prince of Wales, heir apparent, has lunched in Downing Street with the same Right Honorable J. Ramsay MacDonald and one Ishbel MacDonald, herself not quite unknown in Lossiemouth, companion of her father perhaps on the lonesome golf experiments after the great day of the expulsion.

See then what has arrived. Britannia, that kind-hearted if slightly apoplectic lady, apt to go off in fit of temper but never vindictive, has taken J. Ramsay MacDonald to her forgiving and ample bosom. Gracious Majesty, Emperor and King, has signified his august reconciliation. Bygones have become bygones from one extremity to the other of the United Kingdom, all is forgiven, blotted out, is as if it never were—with a single exception. Notable exception however, for still unrescinded stands the resolution of the Lossiemouth Golf Club: Be it resolved, henceforth and forever said J. Ramsay MacDonald be expelled.

The Mountain, the whole British mountain, has obviously come to MacDonald, which being the case, what—I ask you, Lossiemouth asks—what shall the Lossiemouth Golf Club do? The world is upside down; all fixed and immovable pivots have begun to maneuver uncontrollably. What, indeed—the real question after all—what shall all Lossiemouths in these Kingdoms, in Europe, in the world do? It is a grave question, my masters.

Can you not see those governors of that golf club now wrestling with this problem? Can you not see them as they set out to martial music this time eight years ago and now suddenly self discovered, music, procession, everything gone up a different street, marching now in an opposite direction to a different tune?

Not one Lossiemouth, but Lossiemouth symbolical of all Lossiemouths in this mad world, are they not also struggling manfully with this same problem? Struggling, be assured, not without honest effort, deep pangs, poignant bewilderment, for mark you, from a man's sins he may escape easily; divine and human forgiveness are not difficult to obtain. But from his good deeds, patriotic performances, acts and resolutions done with indelible ink when the blood is hot, man may not easily escape when the world has gone cold again.

Which fact being true, devastatingly true, shall we not extend to Lossiemouth, all Lossiemouths one and indivisible, foreign and domestic, wherever found, that sympathy which misfortune always commands; wish for them, too, that peace which surpasseth human understanding and all war-time expectation?

Lines to a Dead Lady

By LAWRENCE LEE

They say that when I come again to look
For you, on some sweet summer afternoon,
I'll find your chair, your cup, and silver spoon
Neglected by your unread open book.
They say that should I call to you, then lay
Myself upon the cool green sweep of grass
Beneath your window sill, you would not pass
Downstairs to me in your unhurried way.
They talk forever, telling what will be No more. But words are meaningless to me,
For I am sure that you will come once more
With blue-gold days—and smiling as before—
To read and talk between the cups of tea
Your white, swift-moving, shapely hands will pour.

Instructive New Hampshire

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

COMING down now from the general to the particular, and descending from the vague prospect of a whole nation to a sharper view of a single State, let us in the midst of instructive New Hampshire proceed to see what we shall see.

New Hampshire is Yankee and it is also French-Canadian and Scotch-Irish and Irish. It lives on farms and also in factories. One of its congressmen is a Republican. The other is a Democrat. The Governor is a Democrat. The majority of voters at the polls, when nature takes its course untroubled by novel issues, is undoubtedly Republican. The two United States senators are Republicans. The Democratic Governor became Governor two years ago largely through a novel industrial issue. There had been strikes in textile mills. There was an industrial demand by employees in textile mills for a forty-eight-hour week for women and children. This industrial demand became a political issue. What was sought by a strike began to be sought by a law. This issue the present Democratic Governor embraced and it contributed largely to making him Governor.

Thus in this nook of Northern Republican Yankeeland the struggle between labor and capital helped to turn the obdurate Republicans out and helped to put the modernistic Democrats in. It happened only two years ago. Nationally the Democrats hope accordingly that New Hampshire may go Democratic presidentially this year.

At that point we come to one more maddening illustration of the fact that the national politics of this country is only partly national, and is partly—and largely—a fortuitous assemblage of local peculiarities and waywardnesses and accidents, puzzling national analysis and defying national prophecy.

Governor Brown, Democrat, in the session of the State Legislature following upon his advent into office, did not succeed in enacting a forty-eight-hour law. Some of his enemies accuse him of having deliberately postponed a definitive settlement of the issue involved in order to maintain it intact for fruitful use politically in the next ensuing campaign. The Senate in the State Legislature was Republican. The claim was made that a forty-eight-hour week in textile mills in New Hampshire would make it virtually impossible for New Hampshire textiles to compete with textiles from the child-exploiting South. Republicans in the legislature proposed a "fact-finding commission" to study this claim and to make a statistical, scientific report upon it. Governor Brown's Democratic supporters in the legislature killed this proposal. The Republicans in the Senate thereupon killed the forty-eight-hour bill.

Thus the issue survived into this year. It on the whole favored the Democrats strongly. If the Governor had maneuvered to postpone the settlement of the issue, his subtlety was obscure to the public eye. What stood forth clearly was that Democrats had favored a forty-eight-hour law and Republicans had frustrated its passage. The chances for Democratic national success in New Hampshire this year seemed large.

Then Al Smith, John Winant, and Robert Marion La Follette started in to shrink them.

The New Hampshire delegation to the New York Democratic National Convention came back to New Hampshire bearing with it many seeds of religious and racial strife. A distinguished New Hampshire delegate—Ray Stevens—had been willing to vote for Walsh of Montana as nominee for President but had shown scant enthusiasm for Smith. The powerful Irish in the New Hampshire Democracy gave him no credit for his support of Walsh and marked him down and out for his failure to give support to Smith. A rift began to appear between Yankee Democrat and Irish Democrat in New Hampshire. It was widened by the thought that Governor Brown, a Yankee, had sometimes in his appointments been more appreciative of the French Canadians than of the Irish.

The Democracy of New Hampshire began to have internal pains. Simultaneously Republicanism in New Hampshire began to have yearnings toward progressivism. Robert Bass of Peterborough, ex-Governor, ex-Rooseveltian, inveterate antagonist of United States Senator George Moses (whose name of Moses betokens a desire not to pass beyond Jordan into the troublous and dubious Promised Land but to tarry and die this side of it in the safe and sane and sure and sensible and humorous vales of Moab), bestirred himself in his upland home and, along with other progressives, fell in behind one John Winant of Concord.

This is a young man—a very young man—with a sensitive and ascetic countenance picturing a character that might find a congenial habitation in a cell among monks of some particularly unworldly and contemplative order. He was a distinguished fighting aviator during the war. He was an "ace." He led a squadron, and always led it—at the peak of it.

Returning, and being religious, and having been a warrior, and having been an academic scholar and teacher, he became very successful in commerce. He also believed in urgent international activity for preventing war, for making war impossible. He also believed in the forty-eight-hour law for women and children in textile mills. He also wished to be Governor and went to people's offices and dropped his overcoat on the floor and walked absent-mindedly up and down over it while he told them that he wished to be Governor in order to establish the forty-eight-hour law, which they did not want.

A multitude of them supported him and supported what he wanted against what they themselves wanted. The young warriors of the State supported him. The old progressives of the State supported him. Numerous conservatives supported him because he was he. At thirty-four he won the Republican nomination for Governor against a most formidable and attractive rival, Frank Knox, publisher of New Hampshire's leading newspaper, the Manchester Union. In him New Hampshire Republicanism suddenly acquired a local leader in whom his followers see a spirituality which goes beyond progressivism but which includes it. The poor, the weak, the suffering, the struggling, who are to be put upon their own feet and made to walk—these are supposed to be the main objects of John Winant's thought, and the thought is supposed to find its title to sincerity in the amazing shy purity of his features and in the amazing bold frankness of his ambitions.

He is a worse speaker than Calvin Coolidge. This writer heard him speak. He spoke some eighty words. He had prepared them carefully. He got through some fifty of them without notes. Then for the last thirty he had to refer to pieces of paper twice. He sat down amid applause.

So the apparition of John Winant in New Hampshire Republicanism suddenly balances the Democratic progressivism of Governor Brown. Meanwhile, finally, certain wage-earners—and certain Irish—in considerable numbers—intend firmly to vote for Robert Marion La Follette. They mostly are Democrats. Some of them will vote for La Follette for President and Winant for Governor. Thus La Follette and Winant and Al Smith (all, in their varying manners, progressives) have shrunk the Democratic chances in this State and have swollen the chances of victory and "vindication" for Calvin Coolidge.

The analysts of the November election will need to travel forty-eight States subsequently to know what it means.

Workers' Education in the United States

By A. J. MUSTE

At the convention of the American Federation of Labor in Portland, Oregon, in October, 1923, the subject that attracted most attention, next to the sensational expulsion of the Communist delegate Dunne, was workers' education. Spencer Miller, Jr., secretary of the Workers' Education Bureau of America, estimates that during the past season there were 25,000 men and women in this country in attendance upon classes under working-class auspices. Sixty per cent of the American Federation of Labor is in organizations that have affiliated themselves with the Workers' Education Bureau.

All this is encouraging to friends of the infant movement. They are not, however, deceived by it. They are aware that only a small beginning has been made; that the mass of trade-union leaders and members have as yet no genuine interest in workers' education, at least not such as induces them to put money into it; that a city labor college may flourish mightily one year, and the following year practically die out; that the whole movement is in an experimental stage, and that little effort has as yet been made to check up in scientific fashion on the results.

It would seem that the most valuable thing to do at this stage is to state some of the problems and issues that are emerging in connection with the work, as to which data require to be collected and analyzed.

For one thing, there is the question of control. Shall the various workers' education enterprises be definitely controlled by working-class organizations—trade unions, political parties, cooperative societies—or shall they be intrusted to the extension departments of public-school systems, colleges and universities, and private groups of non-working-class composition? In a number of instances institutions or groups such as are here mentioned have evinced a disposition to "offer their services" to the unions under conditions that would imply turning over the workers' education movement, or important parts of it, to them. In the main the labor movement has taken the position that while it does not wish to supplant existing educational institutions, the control of the schools and classes that are to train not only the intelligence but the spirit of the officers and members of the unions (or other workers' organizations) must be in the hands of these unions themselves; and that the labor movement is quite capable of controlling the educational instruments which it is forging for itself. The Workers' Education Bureau admits to affiliation only enterprises definitely controlled by trade unions or cooperative societies. An offer recently made to it by an outside group to carry on teacher training for workers' classes was not accepted, and the policy laid down that such training should be carried on under the auspices of the labor movement, which would welcome the assistance of all individuals desiring to work with it.

It will be easier as time goes on to hew a straight line in this matter of control, because of the position being taken on another subject closely bound up with it, that of financing. In a considerable number of cases workers' classes avail themselves of public-school or church buildings where this does not involve any control over policy or freedom of teaching. In no instance known to the writer has any money "with a string tied to it" been accepted by any workers' educational enterprise. The extension department of the University of California, carrying on adult education among trade-union members, last year sought affiliation with the Workers' Education Bureau, but it was refused. Subsequently the university handed over the $10,000 annual appropriation for this work to a committee, three-fifths of whom were trade-union representatives. This committee then turned around and engaged as director the man who had previously worked under university direction. The reorganized enterprise has been granted affiliation with the W. E. B. However, the great majority of workers' schools and classes are being wholly financed by local unions, central labor unions, or internationals, supplemented perhaps by a small fee from students; and the general disposition on the part of trade unionists is to continue this independent and self-respecting method of financing. The time must come when regular dues are levied for educational purposes as well as for more conventional trade-union activities.

Who are to be reached by workers' education efforts and how are they to be approached and served? On the one hand, there are organizations that lay emphasis upon what is termed "mass education." The effort is made to get the mass of the workers out to great inspirational meetings at which recognized musical artists provide entertainment, plays are given—possibly by workers' dramatic groups—mass singing is developed, and lectures are given or debates staged that serve to place before the masses in popular language the significant issues confronting the particular union or the workers in general. As part of such a program speakers may be sent to local meetings to give educational and inspirational talks.

On the other hand, there are the instances where a comparatively small number are brought together to pursue intensive study of trade-union problems, to receive training for specific tasks such as organizing or secretarial work, serious study on the part of the students being required. Such a class is that to which the Executive Board members of Local 25, United Textile Workers of Philadelphia, have belonged for several years. They have studied the problems of the shops and the branch of the textile industry in which they are working, and on the basis of their studies have submitted and argued wage and other demands before employers' associations. A similar type of work is carried on in a resident institution such as Brookwood Labor College.

In addition there are a very considerable number of enterprises carried on chiefly by international unions or city central bodies where the classes (in economics, labor problems, psychology, literature; these last usually the best attended) are composed of a somewhat heterogeneous assortment of individuals who for various reasons have some interest in the subject taught; where the lecture method usually obtains, opportunity for asking questions and a certain amount of discussion being provided; but where the students do not put in a great deal of study and such benefit as they derive is general rather than specific preparation for trade-union tasks.

The first type of education mentioned, "mass education," is a job that all important social groups, such as churches, engage in. What may justly be criticized is that the technique of such "mass education" has not been well developed as yet by the labor movement and that sometimes it is mistaken for what it is not and regarded as a substitute for the training of officers and active members in the concrete details of their duties. In particular nothing to speak of has been done in a field that offers, to my mind, golden possibilities, that of training officers to preside at shop and local meetings.

Little criticism is offered of the intensive training next referred to, save in so far as here also the technique still requires much development; but of course such training reaches only the few. The most serious questioning at this moment has to do with the classes of the third type. There are certain exceptions, but in the main it is these classes that show astonishing ups and downs from year to year. It is asserted that they are neither "mass education" nor calculated to give intensive technical training, and that consequently they provide only a very mild and vague "culture" to a pseudo-intelligentsia of the trade unions.

Still another matter calling forth no little discussion is that of the aim of workers' education. There are some, it has been said, who "want the workers to be given culture and a background that will enable them to think for themselves," while others "want the workers trained in the science of overthrowing the present industrial order and in building a new order in which the working class shall rule." Others would criticize both these statements. They would hold that "culture" is a vague and misleading term in this connection, that those who stand for it are in danger of attacking the worker's problem at its circumference rather than its center, of trying to impart to the worker an appreciation of Plato, Browning, and the Venus de Milo which he in the mass is not interested in and could not benefit by. They would hold, on the other hand, that whatever may be the correctness or value of the second of the above statements as a generalization, its outlook does not fit American conditions and it is not of much help in solving the concrete problems of workers' education. They would put it that workers' education should aim to train members and officers of the unions and other workers' organizations to meet their problems and tasks as members of the organized working class more intelligently and efficiently. They would have the workers' education movement conceive of itself as an instrument being shaped by the trade unions for their own purposes, would have the movement take its place inside the trade unions, and say: Here are the unions with a standard of living to maintain or achieve, with hours of labor to be shortened, with strikes to be fought, with negotiations to be conducted, with an open-shop campaign or company unions to combat, with millions of dollars to expend, with injunctions and court decisions to fight, with problems and responsibilities in the field of more efficient production or of politics, and so on, and here are the members and officers of these organizations—now what can be done to enable these people more efficiently to handle those jobs? They would say that workers' education is not a brand-new thing dropped out of heaven or graciously bestowed upon the trade unions a few years ago by some college professor; on the contrary, unions have carried on educational work, by meetings and their press for example, ever since there were unions; the educational movement is becoming larger and more complex now simply because the unions have larger and more complex tasks to perform; and the educational work must in like fashion continue to develop as the situation confronting the organized workers unfolds. Incidentally, the propounders of this statement of the case would vigorously deny that such an aim is "narrow"; they hold that only that man is "cultured" who knows his place in society and can in some measure fill it, and that unto him all other things shall be added as a vital part of his being and not an extraneous trimming.

The first organized attempt to deal with the extremely important problem of teaching methods in workers' classes was undertaken by the American Federation of Teachers, which during the past winter called a conference on the subject at Brookwood. Among the subjects emphasized at this conference were the psychological approach to social, economic, and political problems; the further development of the technique of group discussion with a view, for one thing, to securing the important and significant contributions that students can make out of their working-class experience and not permitting classes to be "star" performances by teachers; and the development of a curriculum which would not consist of subjects or courses to be taught by various teachers in well-nigh complete detachment from each other, but of social situations taken up one after another, various teachers sitting in at classes and contributing expert knowledge on various phases of the one living, concrete situation under discussion.

The workers' education movement in America is in its infancy; it has as yet accomplished little; it is in many ways amateurish. But it is not smug and self-satisfied; it is not set and hardened; it is trying hard to improve upon itself; it is fluid, vital, dynamic. The interest on the part of the labor movement is still small, but genuine and on the increase. When the infant American labor movement in the thirties of the last century became interested in the problem of education, it did much for the establishment of our public-school system which, for all that it has been wrested to a considerable extent from its original purpose, has been one of the mightiest forces in our life. Now that American labor is again taking up the problem of education, who knows but it will make another epoch-making contribution?

Departure

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Warsaw, August 20

THROUGH the ill-lit streets we rumbled in our tight little Droschken. In passing one could see the shadowy outline of the tall monument of Adam Mickiewicz, the Polish national poet. In a well-known passage of his best-known work he had saluted the Jew as a brother. It is a very sore point with the Poles. He, too, is in the shadow, like his monument. . . . We crossed the Vistula—river of blood and tears. They have thrown corpses into it for centuries. For a time its West Prussian banks were at peace. Today there is no telling when that historic pastime will begin again as the river flows through the Polish corridor past Danzig into the Baltic Sea. . . .

Dim tree-tops stir in the cool wind. We take a rather roundabout way. One of the bridges was blown up during the war. The cobble-stones become more and more jagged. At last we stop. Our Droschken join a large semi-circle of others. . . . We plunge into a dark, streaming crowd. Jews, all Jews. Long caftans and caps; modern clothes out of little shops. Not only old men in caftans but boys and youngsters. No very long ear-locks here. Some concession is made to modernity in the city. The beards are long, however, and but for some red Judas physiognomy here and there, the faces, especially of the old and older men, have a grave and noble beauty. Thus Rembrandt saw them; thus they are today. The women are less definitely marked in character. Only here and there are glimpses of shapely profiles.

It is not an orderly crowd. But its disorder is quite without violence. Some passion stirs it, however, some impulse that lifts it above its workaday self. Are these the people who walk the Warsaw streets so quietly, so sadly? Are these the old men of the Ghetto streets, these the haggling slatterns of a thousand shops, these the caftaned boys who rather hug the walls when the sun shines?

They throng toward the platform of the railroad station. Most of them in vain. Only those who have tickets are admitted. This is not an unreasonable regulation. But for it all the half-million Jews in Warsaw would be here tonight. Intellectually they are disunited. There are parties and parties. Nevertheless they would be here tonight. Assimilationism of any kind is dead here—dead forever. The Poles have taken good care of that. The nine-hundred-year-old sharing of earth and sun and bread and vicissitude and fighting against a common enemy and oppressor can count no more. The Poles have seen to it; they see to it daily and hourly. So what are parties, opinions, divisions? All Jewish Warsaw is here in body or in spirit tonight. Two hundred people are being entrained on their way to Constanza, where they take ship, on their way out of bondage, on their way to Eretz Jisroel—the land of the fathers. . . .

The blue-coated Polish policemen with their long swords are impassive. Impassive and a little surly. Their duty tonight rather disgusts them. They are accustomed to inspiring fear, at least a nervous shrinking. Tonight, despite their authority, which cannot be denied, they simply do not exist. The spirit of the crowd has risen above them. . . .

We have tickets, of course, and are under competent guidance. But we, too, are sent with calculated rudeness from one gate to another. . . . At last we are on the platform, in the midst of an even intenser crowd—a crowd whose faces are a little pale under the dim lights. Pale but uplifted. For here are the people who are actually going and here are their fathers and mothers, their brothers and sisters, who will probably never see them again, but who are glad to give them up out of the darkness into the light and out of degradation to spiritual erectness. If they themselves cannot see Jerusalem, it is well that these others may; if they must await the pogroms to come, it is well that so many are saved.

So many. So few. This thing that we are witnessing is a weekly occurrence. About two hundred people leave each week. But in the files of the Palestine Office you see that there are ten thousand applications a week. Why are there so few out of so many? That is a story I cannot tell today. . . .

The train stands beside the platform and the leader from the Palestine Office is busy getting his people on board. He accompanies them to the Rumanian border, sees to it that they are not cheated nor delayed through passport or visa chicaneries, nor suffer violence nor robbery. At the border another leader takes his place, who accompanies and protects the group to its final destination. This is a fact of the deepest significance. . . .

Our Warsaw leader is a model of quiet efficiency. In half an hour he has his people in their proper compartments. No bundles must be lost and no children misplaced. For only one-third of today's group consists of young men and women, of Chaluzim, or pioneers. The rest are families who have the necessary minimum of capital which entitles them to go to Palestine. The heads of the families are carpenters, locksmiths, expert workmen in the building trades. They are more than that. They are idealists and, in a sense, scholars. For they are all speakers of Hebrew, in addition to Polish and Yiddish, and they have all liberated their minds from the restraints and inhibitions of the current orthodoxy and have seen an unheard-of vision and had the hardihood to break through a thousand shackles, overcome a thousand difficulties on their way to this tremendous adventure. . . .

We leave the ladies of our party tucked in a safe corner and Dr. Korngruen of the Palestine Office and I make our way through the crowd and go into one packed compartment after another to speak to those who are going. The third-class compartments are barren and comfortless and the long journey, followed by the steerage passage on the emigrant ship, is in itself enough to appal the Western mind. And these emigrants are not the Ellis Island type. Here are no fugitives. Let that be made as clear as possible. We speak to men and to women and touch the heads of children. These people will suffer on the trip, and the hardships of the land to which they are going will be real hardships to them. But they are sustained by what is within; they are sustained by the thought that their children will not be the helots of barbarians. . . .

A single carriage of first-class compartments heads the train. The doors are still open, and outside of them stand the Polish officers who are to occupy the compartments. They try to keep their faces expressionless. But as they stand there or walk up and down trailing their long swords you get from them an indefinable moral atmosphere. They are contemptuous and yet amazed. Something here does not fit in with their calculations. Something. . . . What is it? It is this, that the outcasts and the hunted and the oppressed that are here have undergone a profound change. They are as powerless physically as ever. Morally they are no longer so. For from the middle of the train flutters a little flag of blue and white—a flag that represents no guns or battalions or frontiers or force or fraud, a flag that represents no aspiration after power, only a hope, only an act of spiritual self-recollection. But that is enough. The flag is there. And with the flag the song. And slowly, a little hoarsely at first, then with rising energy and fervor, the crowd sings the "Hetikvah," the song of that hope, of that aspiration. . . .

The Polish officers enter their compartments; the doors of the other compartments are closed too. Against the panes of the windows, close to the panes, are the faces of our people—men and women and little children. The faces on the platform, silently turned to those others, are strained but calm and self-controlled. From an open compartment-window a young Chaluz is quietly saying a few words in Hebrew to those who must remain behind in Galuth, in the terrible Galuth of Poland. But there is no sentimentality, no excess of feeling. The hour is too tremendous for that. Two thousand years are gone, are swept away. "This year here," the fathers have said for generations and generations, "this year here, next year in Jeruschelayim!" That next year has come. . . . Slowly the train pulls out of the dim station. A single sob is heard from a woman on the platform. Then no more. Only the strains of the "Hetikvah," only the restrained melody of the song of hope, and here and there a final word of both farewell and salutation, the best word, the only word—Shalom, which means peace.

Young America

By FRANCES BRADLEY

Mountain Shad

"NO, they air not what yer mout call hefty chillen, but they don' come of hefty stock," looking from her husband's to her own angular, spare-built body. "I reckon they tromps the meat off'n ther bones on these mountings. 'Pears like all o' wee'uns air mighty lean. The cattle hain't nothin' but a rack o' bones an' the hawgs air so flat yer kin see right through ther slats. The chickens air all wings an' legs, an' even the sheep bleats right pitiful like when yer shears 'em an' fin's nothing' but a roll o' wool. Yet fer all o' thet, we air right stout. I reckon we air tough like the pine an' balsam an' hickory what grows hyarabouts." Seizing a branch of leaves from the chimney corner, she shooed from the room a long-legged dominecker that came stalking through the door, waving his gay wattles as he scuttled out of reach.

"How much milk do the chillen drink? Wall thet's easy answered fer they don' git none. We hev beef cattle but thar's no pasture in these parts an' we turns 'em out ter graze, so they don' give no milk ter speak on. Our chillen don' seem ter keer much about it no how. They air jes natu'ally born hearty an, time they air a month or so ole, they wants a taste o' everything I eats. O' co'se they pulls on me till they air a year or so ole, sometimes mo'n thet," with a sheepish glance at her husband, "but when they gits ready, they weans therselves, an' then they air through with milk.

"I haint never hed 'em weighed. Seems like chillen don' go by weight like hawgs an' cattle. But I reckon ef they war ailin', we'd hyar from 'em. They're never what yer mout call down sick sence John Junior hyar war a baby. He hed a risin' in his haid an' hit busted an' run outen his ye'r. He air right hard o' hearin' on his lef' side, but hit don' run no mo' an' 'cep' fer growin' pains he don' never complain o' nothin'.

"I fergot, Ruby hyar hev allus been kin' o' phthisicy. She hev big kernels in her neck an' she wheezes with every damp spell o' weather. Some say she hev got scrofulo, but hit air a mark. When I war 'thet way' with her I hed ter set up with a ole aunt o' mine who war a dyin', an' this chile war born with a wheezin' an' rattlin' jest like the death rattle in my aunt's throat.

"O' co'se ther teeth could be better, but they gits them from ther poppy an' mommy, but I reckon ez long ez they don' complain, an' they eats hearty ez pigs the whole endurin' day, they haint very bad off. We won' pester the doctors none yit awhile."

"Have you plenty of fruit and vegetables?" persisted the inquirer.

"Wall, we hev apples, an' the woods air full o' berries and grapes in season. Ez fer vegetables, these mountings air too steep ter plant, an' thar's not room between 'em fer a crap. We hev roas'n' ye'rs an' peas an' beans an' I tries ter hev a patch o' cabbage an' turnip greens. Sech ez hit is, they hev a plenty, but what they likes mos'ly air hawg an' hominy an' surrup an' coffee."

The Salamander

"Yaas'm, we had 'em all weighed an' medgered endurin' o' the war. The doctor an' nurse said they wuz powerful little fer ther age, but we didn't need ter be tol' that. They said the chillen mus' have milk an' eggs an' fruit an' vegetables, but they didn't say how we wuz ter git 'em. An they mus' have ther tonsils tuk out an' ther teeth fixed an' what not, but never mentioned who wuz a goin' ter pay the bill. I never said nothin' but I could a tol' 'em it wuz chillin' what tuk the meat offen ther bones, an' takin' so much medicine what ruint ther teeth.

"O' co'se we had sickness at the cotton mill befo' we come ter the lumber camp, but we wusn't sick the whole endurin' time. Fust off we had the flu when everybody wuz down with it. Then we all come down with measles, mammy an' pappy, my two married brothers an' ther famblies, an' Homer an' Homer Junior an' me, thirteen all at oncet. The mill doctor an' nurse tuk keer on us but they didn't aim fer us ter lay off later. Seemed like they wouldn't believe that it ruins a man ter go back ter work in less'n six months arter havin' measles, but it sho fixed po' pappy. We had ter live, so somebody jes natu'ally had ter work. Pappy said he'd take a chance on it, so him an' Lettie an' me got jobs an' lef' Ruthie an' the men folks ter min' the chillen. Pappy wuz too ole fer a mill han' so he worked outside, an' the white glarey san', it jes' about blinded him.

"Soon ez the six months wuz up we pulled out an' come hyar. We knowed in reason there wouldn't be much schoolin' in a lumber camp, but we 'lowed ef we could git away from sech a passle o' chillen, our'n wouldn't be ketchin' everything from devilment ter measles. But we sho jumped from the fryin' pan into the fire. The rainy season struck camp jes about time we did, an' I never seed sech a sight. The lan' lies low an' the water jes' natu'ally caint run off so it back up, an' this whole camp wuz under water. O' co'se ther wuzn't no work fer nobody. They lef' the tents an' shacks an' piled us into freight cars an' carried us ter higher groun'. Thar we staid till the water went down. We wuz packed in like sardines an' the sun wuz powerful hot, an' yer never seed so many snakes an' turtles, or heered so many frogs a bellerin' every night like bulls. Then hyar come the skeeters an' gnats an' flies, an' the chillen already had the itch among 'em, so the po' little critters looked like they had the measles ergin an' had been runnin' in the briar patch ter boot.

"No screens ner nets could hol' them skeeters, an' twuzn't no time till we all come down with chills an' fever. The company doctor poured quinine down us till the chillen could eat it outen ther han' like sugar, but I wuz too fur erlong with Jimmie hyar ter be takin' quinine, an' I reckon I tried twenty-five diff'ent kin's o' medicine. The man at the commissary said he had sol' $2,000 wuth o' chill tonic in six months, an' some o' that money come outen our pocket. It'd a bought a right smart o' milk an' eggs fer our chillen.

"We buys Eagle Bran' fer coffee but we jes' cain't give 'em milk ter drink. O' co'se we lives outen paper bags an' tin cans but it sho ain't cos we likes it. Ef anybody thinks they kin have cows an' chickens an' gyardens in a mill town or a lumber camp, let 'em try it oncet.

"I knows my chillen is skinny, but they is all I got, an' I'm a doin' the bes' I kin. Nobody cain't do no mo'."

Scipio Africanus

"Lawd no, chile, we ain't got no cow ner chickens, an' nothin' but dis piece o' house ter kiver our haids, an' hit don' kiver 'em lessn de sun is shinin'," and a genial smile disclosed the brilliant white teeth, thick lips, and satiny skin of the genuine African.

Pinning a lone, buttonless garment over the glistening nakedness of her first-born, and wiping with the corner of her apron the greasy face and hands of her second-born, she sent them out in the road to play, calling after them: "Min' what I tol' yer 'bout dat ditch." Picking up the latest addition to the family, she proffered the time-honored solace to a whimpering baby and explained: "We sho hez a time wid dese chillen. Tain't no place fer 'em ter play but in de road an' de road means de ditch what sluices de fiel'. Dey jes natu'ally cain't keep outen dat water an' hits not fitten ter play in. De bottom is so sof' an' slippy dat when dey falls in dey hez ter be pulled out, an' dey not gwine ter be satisfied till one on 'em gits drownded."

"Why ain't we got a yard? Why, cos de boss man ain't sesso. Eve'thing in sight b'longs ter him. When he say 'come,' we comes, an' when he say 'go,' we goes. He 'lows niggers is so triflin' dese days dat dey burns up the fence rails an' de cow an' chicken houses fas'er'n he kin build 'em, an' hit sho is de truf wid some on 'em. We kin keep geese fer dey cleans de grass outen de fiel', good ez a choppin' han', but dawgs an' hawgs an' cows an' chickens an' sech—no, mam, not on dis place," emphatically. "Co'se some boss mans is diff'ent, but in dese parts ef a man raises rice or cotton, hits rice or cotton plumb ter de fron' do' an' de back." She laid the sleeping child, full to overflowing, in the midst of a feather bed and covered him with a limp, soiled piece of mosquito netting.

"What does de chillen eat? Why bread an' meat. De boss man runs a commissary whar yer kin git flour an' meal an' white belly an' coffee, an' sorghum in season, ef yer hez de price."

"That may do for you and your husband, but children need fresh food."

"Well, dey hez fresh po'k ev'y hawg killin' time, 'bout Christmas; an' whenever de groun' is water soaked an' not fitten ter work, we goes afishin' an' brings in a nice mess o' cat or perch or brim. Dey sho fries good."

"But no greens or fruit?"

"Lawd, lady, we ain't used ter dem fixin's. My chillens eats what dey kin git, an' fer ez I kin see, dey gits along all right. O' co'se dey hez de ague an' summer complaint. Seem lak dey jes cain't git th'u de summer widout dat, an' hit las'es plumb till col' weather. Two o' my babies died dat-a-way. Sence den, Scip Junior w'ars a cricket's nes' an' Pearl Virginia a bunch o' dawg tushes, an' Eph hyar hez de ye'r bones of a rat in a little bag roun' his neck," displaying the treasured charm which protected the sleeping baby.

"Dey's good chillen ef I does say it, an' dey not hard haided nuther, even ef dey haids is long an' hangs over dey faces lak dey daddy's. Dey sho gits dat from Scip," laughing, "but I dunno whar dey gits dey holler chists an' pot bellies, less'n hits eatin' so much all de time. Dey eats all day an' I reckon dey'd eat all night ef I'd stay up an' feed 'em," handing out two slabs of corn pone and fat meat to the ebony specimens peering in hungrily at the door.

"Yaas'm, Eph is a right peart little feller but he's powerful slow about walkin'. I reckon dats on account o' his bow laigs. Some folks sez he's got rickets, but I reckon he's jes natu'ally lazy. Dey tells me ef yer drive a nail th'u de shell of a tarrypin an' rub de warm blood up an' down the back an' laigs of a rickety chile, he'll walk off ez bresh ez anybody. He's sho got ter walk ef he's ever gwine ter school."

"Have you a school near the plantation?"

"Well, hit's nigh when de roads is good, but hit seems a right smart piece when de creek backs up an' ev'ything is under water. I reckon Scip Junior'll be goin' nex' ye'r an' I hope he gits mo' schoolin' 'n his mammy an' daddy. We bof went ter school off an' on, but we plumb fergot eve'ything but how ter scribe our names. Eddication sho is a good thing fer dem dat hez it.

"Yaas'm, thank yer, mam, I'll do mer bes'. Good bye ter yer." Then—"You Scip an' Pearl Virginia, come in dis house 'fo' yer falls in dat ditch."

In the Driftway

FROM An Ardent Admirer, who is otherwise anonymous, the Drifter has just received the following communication, with the admirable sentiments with which he cannot but agree:

> Dear Sir: I know you as a friend of the poor and oppressed and I am therefore writing to ask you to do something for me. I am a poor man who has just had a vacation; not an extensive one, but just a little, innocent holiday in the course of which I never harmed a dumb beast or neglected to reward my fellow-man as requested from time to time. Now I have come back to work and I find work impossible. Man was not made for work. Nevertheless, I am compelled to seek my livelihood and have nothing to look forward to in the future except another vacation followed by another resumption of toil. What I would like you to do is to write your Congressman, if you can remember who he is, asking him to introduce suitable legislation abolishing either vacations or work. I know, dear Sir, that you have Influence; I know you never work yourself and are therefore not troubled with my problem; I know, if you will, that you have both leisure and power to Do Something. What will It BE? I am hopefully yours.

* * * * *

THE Drifter cannot but be flattered by the suggestion that he has so much authority, but he assures his correspondent that he attained to his present state of emancipation from toil by hard labor; every man must learn for himself the secret. Still, he remembers well the days, long ago, when he, too, returned to duty after idleness. He remembers the falling feeling in the region of his midriff as the familiar scenes once more thrust themselves on his eyes; he remembers going around in a sort of daze, doing old tasks, until in a few hours he found it impossible to believe that he had ever been absent from them. There are, of course, persons who pretend that they are foaming with eagerness to get back to their jobs. "Oh, yes," they say, "we had such a lovely time in Timbuctoo, but naturally we are simply dying to see our desk again because we have stored up such quantities of energy that only work will dispose of it properly." The Drifter scorns such hypocrisy. He agrees with his correspondent that man was not made for work, but would be much happier supporting himself and family on roots and berries under a tent of bramble branches.

* * * * *

FORTUNATELY there are two solutions of this perplexing problem. One is to work fourteen hours a day for forty years with no holiday whatever, after which a kind fate may have provided either rest from all labor in the earth or a competence to end one's days in peace. The other is to persuade some easily gulled person with ample means that you are working when you are merely doing what you like.

* * * * *

THE latter is the harder way, but on the whole the Drifter recommends it. There are persons so happy as to have discovered some such system early in life. They roam about the world or stay comfortably at home, according to their inclination, and each month their stipend arrives to keep away the danger of starvation and the necessity of a holiday.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

We Make Him Mad

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am a subscriber and constant reader of The Nation, and it exasperates me and makes me mad every week, and always has. I have often wondered why, and but recently discovered the cause. It is because The Nation always, constantly, consistently, and exasperatingly stands for Jesus Christ and His gospel. When I was a little Sunday-school boy my teacher tried to make me love Jesus; but the best I could do was to respect Him. I did not like the company He kept—publicans and sinners and the exploited and unprivileged. They do not bathe often enough and they smell of dirty linen. I love wealth, prosperity, good clothes, good dinners, and respectability. The Nation is for the poor, the unprivileged, the exploited, the Negro, the I. W. W., and all that sort of thing. That is what exasperates me. But I suppose you can't help it. I am a Pharisee and a Federalist of the Alexander Hamilton and John Adams school. I adore this monarchical republic they founded where wealth and privilege is securely intrenched behind its Constitution and laws against the hungry and predatory masses.

I shall vote for Coolidge and the Republican Party as the party of predatory wealth and privilege. With Horace I cry: "Odi profanum vulgus et arceo."

I was in a furious revival service down in Maine one summer in a camp-meeting. The evangelist cried: "All who want to go to heaven stand up!" All stood except the storekeeper, Old Dudley. "O Brother Dudley, Brother Dudley! Don't you want to go to heaven?" You ought to have seen the look of scorn with which the old man looked around on the crowd and said: "Not in this yere crowd, thank you!"

CHARLES EDWARD STOWE

Santa Barbara, California, August 12

Progressive Latin-Americans

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The La Follette-Wheeler headquarters recently issued a statement to the effect that groups of American citizens of Latin-American birth had given assurances that naturalized Latin-Americans would vote the La Follette-Wheeler ticket. Unfortunately for the outcome of the election, the number of votes that might be obtained by La Follette, or by the three parties combined, from naturalized Latin-Americans could hardly exceed four figures in the whole country. The reason is that Latin-Americans seldom renounce allegiance to their fatherland or become citizens of a country which is not their own.

It is safe to assert that of all the Latin-Americans and Spaniards who immigrate into the United States only about 1 per cent become American citizens. The Spaniards are the most likely to change their nationality, next come the Cubans, perhaps, and last the Mexicans. In a Broadway play recently the sarcastic statement was made that "even the Mexicans think their country is wonderful," and, reasonably or not, this is an incontestable fact. This is true also of all the Indohispanic peoples. We do not believe in trading nationalities, just as we do not believe in trading religions. Mexicans are Roman Catholics as a rule, and in spite of the active propaganda of American missionaries they do not often become Protestants. When a Mexican ceases to be a Catholic it is to become a freethinker; if he ceases to be a Mexican it is to become a citizen of the world.

Notwithstanding the foregoing remarks, the Spanish-speaking vote of the United States—not naturalized, but native born—is important, particularly in the South and Southwest. These American citizens, sympathetic with their brothers south of the Rio Grande, with similar feelings and emotions, can express their sentiments by the vote. They represent, furthermore, a force committed to all possible safeguards for the weak, checks upon the powerful, and to an effort toward peace and universal happiness.

We Mexicans may forgive but not forget the strenuous efforts of governments representing the two traditional parties to alienate from us the affection of the American masses and to make us hate the Americans, efforts which have been fruitless perhaps because they were against the law of nature. Deep i the heart of the common people is the feeling that men who toil for humanity are bound together in a common struggle for truth, comfort, and beauty.

If Senator La Follette had no record and were a newcomer in the arena, he would have the sympathies of the Indo-hispanic races in recognition of his bravery, prompted by a common defensive instinct against political machines and associated interests that have proved a menace to us. But the brilliant career of La Follette as Congressman, Governor, and Senator, particularly during the last decade, has won from us enduring admiration and respect. We, too, want to see the American banner true to its original purpose of freedom and love.

New York, September 15 J. M. BEJARANO

"Swashbuckling"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Once again having been grieved and surprised at finding in the pages of the treasured Nation the word "swashbuckling," one of my pet aversions, I am constrained to remind you that the true function of the swashbuckler is not to buckle his swash, but to swash his buckler. The word "swashbuckling" is therefore plainly to be seen as a misbegotten enormity.

"Swashbucklering"—yes, by all means, if one wants an adjective, but, pray, leave "swashbuckling" to the feature writers of the plute press who are much addicted to the word.

New York, September 7 ROBERT H. EDWARDS

Europe at Peace!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Perhaps the following note escaped the vigilance of the press correspondents. It appeared in the Vienna Arbeiter Zeitung.

A few weeks ago several of the less conservative European newspapers published the testimony of the Hungarian adjutant, Danics, who was sentenced in Budapest to four weeks' arrest for conduct unbecoming an officer. The charge against Danics was that he blinded one man and smashed another's leg. This all happened, so the adjutant averred, in carrying out duties assigned to him. Part of the adjutant's testimony follows:

> To hang fifty men, to dig fifty graves—I ask you, gentlemen, to place yourselves in my position! When the dirty commune was beaten, I was ordered to hang the dirty communists. So, in Szegedin, I strung up fifty of the bums. From there we went to Komorn, for the dirty bums tried to start something there. Colonel Pronay commanded me to hang anyone who showed himself unpatriotic. In Komorn we drank a lot of wine, and on the way home we met several citizens of the town. They were carrying on unpatriotic conversations, and so we beat them up and then went back to the barracks.
>
> Altogether there were twenty-four men in my detachment, and they all had a hand in hanging the communists. Suddenly someone appeared—I believe the military patrol. I didn't think they were soldiers, and we started to club them out of the saloon. We were drunk, for four of us had just finished fourteen liters of wine. . . . Yes, sir, we had to drink on this job or our nerves would have given way. Put yourselves in my place, gentlemen; I defended the fatherland against these dirty bums. . . . My nerves are all shot to hell. . . . Three months it took—I shoveled graves for every one I hanged. . . . To hang fifty men, to dig fifty graves. . . . A feller's got to do a lot of tall drinking on such a job.

Peace, so I believe, has been declared in Europe!

Vienna, July 9 JEROME LACHENBRUCH

The Alien's Dilemma

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: During the past few months my attention has been directed to the matter of citizenship for aliens.

I find that a large number of applicants, in every way desirable as prospective citizens, are denied citizenship on the expressed ground of the wife's presence in a foreign country. In many cases the judges tell the applicants: "Your citizen papers will be granted as soon as your wife resides with you in this country." When the applicant, however, takes steps to bring his wife to this country, he is confronted by the immigration bureau's policy of not admitting wives of immigrants unless the latter are American citizens!

The result is anomalous. Citizenship is refused because of the wife's non-emigration to the country, and permission to emigrate is denied because of the man's non-citizenship!

I would be extremely thankful to any reader or government official if he or she would enlighten me in this matter so that I may be in a position to give counsel to the scores of applicants who come to me for assistance.

New York, June 24 LEON A. MALKIEL

Is the Bar Association K.K.K.?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The writer of this communication happens to be one of your subscribers who is white, Gentile, and Protestant; who believes the Ku Klux Klan is perhaps the most insidious and dangerous organization today in America; who is convinced that Negroes, Jews, and Catholics are entitled to their political rights under our Constitution equally with our citizens who are not Negroes, Jews, or Catholics.

Now that august society, the American Bar Association, posing as the semi-official national representative of what the Constitution of the United States really means, never inquires of a lawyer applying for membership whether he be Jew or Gentile, whether he be Protestant, Catholic, or agnostic; and this of course is entirely in order and as it should be. But the men in control of the American Bar Association do insist that the applicant state his color; and if he be a decent, honest Negro lawyer (I happen to know quite a number) he is not allowed to join.

Now I ask you in all earnestness if the American Bar Association is not logically 33 1/3 per cent Ku Klux Klan?

Or is it a mere social club?

If it be the latter, all right to exclude colored lawyers of course; but let it cease to pose as an oracle of American citizenship. And let it cease to urge closer and more friendly relations with our fellow-nationals in the West Indies and South America. A very large proportion of the learned and honest lawyers in those countries show more or less color.

Washington, July 26 NILDO

Another Dominant Female

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Professor Vaerting forgot an authority at least as reliable as Herodotus and some of the others quoted in that article. Among the Jiggses, where the woman is dominant, the female, according to McManus, has almost twice the bulk and stature of the male.

New Preston, Conn., September 12 ROBERT L. WOLF

Books

Upton Sinclair Scores Again

The Goslings, A Study of the American Schools. By Upton Sinclair. Pasadena, California: Upton Sinclair. Cloth, $2; paper, $1.

UPTON SINCLAIR has a simply appalling appetite for scandal and an incomparable ability for getting it before his readers in an interesting fashion. His world is an old building which, though outwardly strong, is inwardly rotten and ready to collapse. So Mr. Sinclair with a lantern and some tools sneaks in and taps the timbers, knocks off the disguising plaster, and then publishes his findings to the world. The light he flashes into the dark recesses he investigates is not a steady white beam, but luridly and terribly red. And he works at headlong speed.

"The purpose of this book," he writes, "is to show how the invisible government of big business which controls the rest of America has taken over the charge of your children" in the public schools. The pattern into which the matter falls is essentially that of "The Goose-Step"; there is a great deal of melodrama. The matter is also essentially the same, as is indicated by such chapter headings as The Spy System, Lies for Children, Schools of Mammon, Boston in Bondage, Poison Pictures, Schools of Steel, The Country Geese, etc. The criticisms which may be leveled against that book may be leveled against this: (1) Mr. Sinclair is overnaive in his interpretations of the motives of authorities and fails to attribute enough importance to the force of association in the formation of conservative opinions, and he fails to acknowledge that there are honest conservatives as well as honest radicals. (2) He fails to make clear that the purpose of education is not to make Sinclairian radicals. (3) He recognizes that "the classroom teachers are the ones we must depend upon if education is to be improved," but he fails to emphasize that most teachers are honest supporters of the status quo and that teachers dissatisfied with the accepted ideas are as rare as dissatisfied Rotarians.

Yet if he fails to emphasize the limitations of teachers, he knows what they are, for he passingly summarizes them thus: "The present status of the American school-teacher is that of a wage slave, an employee of the school board and the superintendent; it is not the status of a free citizen, nor of a professional expert." This summary is beyond cavil. No other group which is at least potentially professional submits to such absurd and snooping regulation of its private conduct. It is no accident that most school-teachers are excessively nervous, because sex-starvation is forced upon them, male and female. The intolerable dulness of the conversation of the teacher outside of school hours, the constant harking back to professional concerns, and usually the most petty of those concerns, is simply the result of the stifling of all spirit of intellectual adventure. Vast numbers of school-teachers live in daily fear of losing their jobs, and the women in particular, in proportion to the number of years they have taught, are willing to make concessions to outrageous demands because of the difficulty of transferring to other less regulated work. As Sinclair notes, when conditions become too bad only the least adventurous remain. The objection that teachers have no professional standards is easy to make, but how to remedy the situation presents difficulties. Many teachers are such with the help of God and their A. B.'s, others teach a year or two after college graduation to "discover" themselves, and others through sheer incompetence in other fields become teachers to justify Bernard Shaw: "Those who can, do; those who cannot, teach." The only remedies adopted thus far to raise professional standards are as bad as the evils. The requirement of courses in silly methods, given by lordly nincompoops, in no way raises competency. Some of the finest teachers are, methodologically speaking, inferior, and some of the worst have endless methodology. What seems to be needed is some way of excluding from the teaching group those who are not interested in instructing youths, or who have no intellectual enthusiasms.

Sinclair looks to unions to remedy many of these conditions:

> In general, what I say is that school-teachers of the United States should have their professional organizations, and should run these organizations; they should establish professional standards, setting down not merely their rights, but also their duties; they should hold their members to these duties, and should maintain these rights against all comers, including superintendents and school boards. I say that teachers should do this, not merely for their own welfare, but for the welfare of the schools; I say that it is necessary both for the schools and for the children that teachers should cease to be rabbits, and should become self-respecting and alert citizens.

This is his important constructive suggestion. It would be a source of satisfaction to me if I could honestly say that I expect teachers to do this very shortly, and that Utopia is around the corner. But a mournfully realistic habit of mind makes me turn to this study as being a truthful portrait of the teacher, past, present, and future:

> The teacher is a "lady" in 95 per cent of cases—and in the other 5 per cent the teacher is a "gentleman." The teacher belongs to the white-collared class and receives a monthly salary—never the degrading weekly stipend known as "wages."

It is sad but true that teachers are snobs, fools, hypocrites, incredibly stupid as to their interests, what you will; but some do arouse themselves from coma, as Mr. Sinclair records. They are, as remarked before, rare. I suspect that school-teachers belong to the class of people who support the social system they work in no matter what it may be, and that if Mr. Sinclair's Utopia were realized they would no more sabotage that system than they do the present one.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

What Is Sex?

The Mechanism and Physiology of Sex Determination. By Richard Goldschmidt. Translated by William J. Dakin. George H. Doran Company. $6.

THE insistent demands of their experiments are usually so exhausting that biological investigators seldom consider the possibility of giving comprehensible explanations of the bearing of their seemingly pointless findings. Scientific language grows more and more complicated with each new finding; for new ideas, like new wine, are unsafe in old conveyors. Hence the results of the experiments are embalmed in the strict accuracy of terms technically defined.

Goldschmidt's present book is a notable exception; in the midst of his creative life he fits together his own results and the related bits of truth from all corners of the earth into a set of mature deductions—a strictly scientific purpose. At the same time he has invited general readers to enter along with the specialists. He gives the necessary elementary introductions; he keeps the main points clear of the multitudinous details; he defines his terms. The result is not a complete Open Sesame to his subject, but it is a half-opened door through which the adventurous uninitiated may slip into a new world.

One does not get far into this book without realizing how much broader is the meaning of the word sex to a biologist than to others; how utterly different are his sex problems from those of the layman. Popularly, sex and sex problems refer to sexual desire and mating in man. Biologically, mating is an incidental matter; the great emphasis is upon processes that precede mating—the formation of the sex cells, the relation of their color bodies (chromosomes) to maleness and femaleness and to heredity, the mechanics of sex determination, the physiology of sexual development, the meaning of individuals that have structures of both sexes at once. Indeed the analysis of such problems has gone so far that Goldschmidt considers the essential purpose of sex independent of mating and reproduction. For instance, in the Paramecium or slipper animalcule the usual method of reproduction is for one animal simply to divide itself into two equal parts by a central constriction; at times a sort of mating takes place in which two individuals are fused, and after an elaborate reorganization within each one, there occurs a mutual exchange of certain substances. After separating, the rate of subsequent divisions is increased. Except for the greater independence of mating and reproduction, this closely parallels the sexual processes in higher animals, in which the formation of the sex cells involves a similar elaborate reorganization of the cell contents. Now it has been found that mating is not at all necessary, as these animalcules have been prevented from uniting for thousands of generations without influencing the division rate or the vigor of the race. At intervals the generations follow more slowly; at such times it was discovered that the animals were undergoing the same complete reorganization that previously had been observed only at the time of mating. Here then is a case in which mating may be completely eliminated and the internal reorganization will alone accomplish the same effect upon reproduction. Worn-out material, toxic substances accumulate after a certain number of generations; these must be eliminated if the race is to continue; this elimination is what the reorganization accomplishes, and is the essential sex process.

The case of the Paramecium illustrates Goldschmidt's conception that all the varied manifestations of sex which are found throughout the animal kingdom are the outcome of the periodic need of a thorough spring house-cleaning, making it possible for generation to follow generation to the end of time. Sex, to a biologist, instead of being scented with shame or obscenity, is recognized as life's method of winning immortality.

The study of sex reaches into all branches of biology. Indeed the most important advances that Goldschmidt describes have come from putting side by side results obtained from diverse and at one time isolated fields. For instance the mechanism that accounts for the normal distribution of sex to the offspring has been revealed by combining the conclusions from breeding experiments on Mendelian heredity with those from the microscopic study of cells. The correlation of the microscopic studies and the breeding work has shown that the determiners of Mendelian characters are distributed to the germ cells by means of structures within the nuclei of the cells (the chromosomes); further it has been found that in most animals half the reproductive cells in one sex contain an odd chromosome. Now it is concluded that the mechanism for the distribution of the chromosomes in the formation of the germ cells is that by which both typical Mendelian characters and sex are normally distributed to the offspring. The sex of an individual is primarily determined at the time of fertilization by the number of chromosomes brought together by the egg and sperm.

Goldschmidt's own investigations have been concerned particularly with the intersexual types produced when certain species of moth are crossed. His findings have led to the formation of a theory that sex is determined by the quantitative relations of two basic substances in the chromosomes, one substance determining maleness and the other femaleness. In normal cases the presence or absence of the odd chromosome shifts the balance of these substances so that one or the other has complete control. In rare cases the relation of the odd chromosome to the others is not adjusted so as to swing the course of development all the way to one side or the other, and the individual starting out as one sex may switch over at some stage and continue development as the other sex. In this way all degrees of intermediate sexual characters were found, from males that looked almost completely female to females that looked male.

The chapter on man illustrates vividly the service that has been rendered by the detailed experimental study of animals that in themselves have no human significance; for here it is shown that the data from man, by themselves, have contributed little more than general support to the present biological understanding of sex. In man, as in most lower animals, sex control—the power to make a given individual develop as a male or as a female—is a thing of the future.

E. Carleton MacDowell

America's Foremost Composer

The Boyhood of Edward MacDowell. By Abbie Farwell Brown. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

MISS BROWN adds to our knowledge of MacDowell's boyhood. She does not add much, but that is not her fault, for as she says the record is meager, supplied by the recollections of Dr. Charles MacDowell, cousin and early playmate of the composer, and by Mrs. MacDowell's memory of her husband's conversation. A good deal of the first half of the book, it must be confessed, is supplied also by fancy and embroidery, and it is not always clear to the reader whether Miss Brown is reporting an episode verbatim as MacDowell told it to his wife, or whether she is reconstructing the scene and the conversation out of her own head. This perplexity is increased by the style of the book, the diluted and disposed-to-be-helpful manner used in some stories for children. There is no statement that Miss Brown intended it for children; on the contrary, she says that the story of this boyhood "should have significance in helping to interpret the quality of the music of our first great American composer." The adult reader, however, finds a good deal of this sort of thing, as on page 3:

> Now, if you should happen to take the right train out-of-the-world; and if you should find your proper way to a certain hill-crest, when you had reached the station among young mountains; and if you did not get lost in the winding paths of the mysterious wood of which I have been telling—you might come suddenly upon this cabin perched high and apparently empty. You would certainly be tempted to climb up on the platform and look about. And you would probably try the latch of the little bark door. But it would be locked. Then, I am sure, however polite you are, you could not help peeping in at the latticed window, hung with cobwebs outside—(for the spiders are curious, too). You would flatten your nose against the glass and stare, long and eagerly, into the dim interior, trying to make out what was there. And if you did not know what I am going to tell you in this book, I am sure you would be surprised and puzzled and you would whisper:
>
> "Surely, at last I have found the home of the fairies? This cannot be real. It must be the house of a fairy-tale. Look! I can almost see the story. Hush! I can almost hear it in faint music!"

This reference to the famous log-cabin at the composer's home, and many other passages in the book, would suggest that Miss Brown's inspiration and the subject she really has at heart is Peterborough, pervaded and dedicated by his memory, and generously converted by Mrs. MacDowell into a summer colony for creative artists. This unique institution, too little known and appreciated as yet by the American people, is one of the beautiful things that came to us from MacDowell's life; we are not likely to hear too much of it, and we are grateful to Miss Brown for the fine account of it at the end of her book. But no connection is established between the composer's boyhood and Peterborough, any more than between his boyhood and his music. He was a normal boy, who liked sports and the outdoors, and preferred the country to the city. There have been many like him—except for the genius, and in his case, as always, genius is not to be explained.

The reader is tempted to make a guess as to how this book suggested itself to Miss Brown, and why its theme seems to be something other than MacDowell's boyhood. At Peterborough she felt the strong influence of his charming personality, and reverently handled, she tells us, the very books that he loved as a child, some of them with pictures that he had colored. These, and the drawings in his sketch-book, were enough in those surroundings to evoke the image of a fortunate childhood, such as we ought to be told of. But when it came to transferring the image to paper, with the stimulating environment of Peterborough withdrawn, the story proved too brief. Miss Brown then went on to sketch the entire life of the composer, bringing most of her book under its title by the thesis that MacDowell always remained a boy at heart. This thesis seems misleading, except as all genius keeps something of childhood in it. MacDowell's reputation as a musician suffers as yet from the fact that though most people know his little things, like the "Wild Rose," few know his big achievements—the orchestral works, the sonatas, the brilliant Second Concerto, the best of the songs—on which his reputation as a master rests. His memory will be cherished very inadequately if we are to think of him as a man with the heart of a boy; true as that account may be, he had also a fine and highly trained mind, and in his personality was felt first of all the magic of varied and truly mature culture. The present reviewer sat in some of his classes at Columbia, and recalls that even in the university environment MacDowell was distinguished by the range of his intellectual background and by his cosmopolitan sense of what was going on in the world. Something of this MacDowell Miss Brown indicates in the last chapters of her book, where she describes his life at Peterborough, and where, as it seems, she has got back to her real theme.

MacDowell's life was singularly beautiful, and the charm of it is in Miss Brown's pages. But the legend of so big a man should be complete, and sentimentality should be kept out of it.

JOHN ERSKINE

Trivia

Fancies Versus Fads. By G. K. Chesterton. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

Solomon in All His Glory. By Robert Lynd. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

MODERNISTS and quidnuncs both owe Mr. G. K. Chesterton a constantly increasing debt of gratitude. He has taught the former that sharp sayings can be made to cut both ways; the latter the ancient strategy that the best defense is an offensive. The rest of us he diverts by his constant high spirits and by a continuous performance of stylistic calisthenics which would soon reduce a less ample and facile essayist to catabolic disaster, and a sad, quiet acquiescence in prohibition and Methodism. Fortunately, neither Mr. Chesterton's pen nor his spirit shows signs of wavering, and from certain sly, jocular references in his new collection of essays, "Fancies Versus Fads," we may happily infer that his shadow is not growing less.

These "notes," "sketches," "visions," "idle journalistic jottings," or "frivolous essays," as Mr. Chesterton in graceful self-depreciation variously calls the contents of his volume, "concern all sorts of things from lady barristers to cave-men, and from psychoanalysis to free verse." Yet there is unity in their variety. Here, all under one tent, we have almost a complete collection of Chesterton's antipathies. He is opposed to free verse, Madame Montessori, anything denominated "modern," "movements," prohibition, simplicity, complexity, reform, eugenics, educational theorists, the simple life, vegetarianism, liberated women, and "Darwinism"—to catalogue just a few of the topics upon which Chesterton alights with devastating effect.

In an essay on Milton and Merry England Mr. Chesterton gives an invaluable little autobiographical note. "My first impulse to write, and almost my first impulse to think, was a revolt of disgust with the decadents and the aesthetic pessimism of the nineties."

The green carnation has long since faded. Now, Mr. Chesterton writes his intellectual autobiography in a tasteful script formed of the corpses of slain faddists and philistines. Chesterton does not speak with the voice or passion of a Carlyle. But he sometimes cries out in Carlyleian accents, and with a gusto which approximates passion, against the Time-Spirit, against a regimented morality, a vulgar democracy, a timorous intelligentsia, and the slavery imposed upon the great masses of men by an industrial society and the Nonconformist Conscience.

Even the most devoted Tory must deplore Chesterton's too great fondness for the proof by analogy—most vivid, but most dangerous of all polemical methods. Too often the analogy is sheer fantasy, ingenious but inconclusive, and so leaves him who gets slapped safe and comfortable in his preconceptions. Yet we must always grant this of the Chestertonian method of balancing two lunacies: that more often than not he makes apparent in a clear, cold light the central point of sanity. So let us cherish Mr. Chesterton. He is our one perfect specimen of the reactionary militant. He has a positive genius for being unfashionable; that's why he is so fashionable.

The exigencies of modern literary journalism have furnished Mr. Robert Lynd with his opportunity. Mr. Lynd is one of the younger British literary lions. He writes with grace and amenity, and a scope nicely adjusted to stringent space allotments and the insistent demand for vivacity and contemporaneousness. "Solomon in All His Glory" does not quite live up to the promise of an earlier volume, "Books and Authors." Mr. Lynd is more engaging when he is communicating his literary enthusiasms than as a guide to the picturesque in London's town life, or as a votary of Nature, or as the mellow commentator watching human traffic from his ivory tower.

The book contains no better sentence than this: "There is no doubt that it is becoming in an ever greater degree the tendency of newspapers to pay attention to poets who eat tulips." There you have Lynd's verve, his quaint turn of thought, his idiomatic prose style. Life is an urbane comedy of manners for the townsman-essayist, and the most urbane, the most comic, the most mannered element in his book is, as it must be, his own personality. There are twenty-seven sketches in the volume. Each is a sort of "silver screen" upon which is projected a one-reel drama, travelogue, or educational film, with Mr. Lynd always the protagonist, whether the play be Wild Life in London, Youth, Travel Talk, Beggars, or The Chocolate Bus.

GERALD HEWES CARSON

A Rebel and a Leader

The Last of the Heretics. By Algernon S. Crapsey. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

HERE is the story of a boy who would not go to school. Here is a youth, called lazy and good-for-nothing, who drifted from city to city in search of a mission in life. But, here also, with humor and pathos, is the story of the dogged singleness of purpose and eloquent and intellectual brilliance with which that mission was fulfilled.

Here is seen the power of heredity to make environment. Algernon Sidney Crapsey was the youngest of a large and evidently rather free and headstrong family. His mother was a daughter of that Senator Morris of Ohio who denounced the evil of slavery and the compromises of Henry Clay in the Senate at a time when an Abolitionist was a social and economic heretic. At the age of six Algernon Crapsey was literally driven to school and through one entire term he refused to learn his letters. Whippings and pleadings at home and at school failed to shake his determination, and when at the age of eleven he rebelliously left school and announced that he had a job his family gave up in despair and let him go his own way. Thereafter he drifted from job to the army and from the army to one makeshift job after another, apparently getting nowhere. But eventually his wide reading, his constant study of preachers and actors, and the "Grey Man" of his boyhood filled his mind until, like an overcharged cloud, he exploded and sought the work for which, by heredity, he was fitted.

With little or no formal religious training, after exposure to the warping filth of army camp and low-class business talk, this boy became one man in his time who lived the Sermon on the Mount so far as the modern world permitted. And with hardly a smattering of formal education before his twenties, he became not only an educated gentleman but a wise thinker, a great orator, and an able writer.

Here, too, is sincerity with its power to attract all sorts of people to a man who is willing to proclaim the truth and live for the things of the spirit. The book is full of the stories of men and women who loved Algernon Crapsey like a son. They might not understand what he was trying to do with his life, but they loved him for what he was—a truth-teller and a truth-seeker—whose highest ambition was to be a follower in the footsteps of Jesus. And when in later life it seemed as if the whole world had beaten a path to his door, the explanation lay in him: Here was a man who had literally followed his Master's bidding: fed the hungry, comforted the afflicted, loved his neighbor as himself.

CLARENCE R. LONG

Books in Brief

Apes and Angels. By Richard Connell. Minton, Balch and Company. $2.

The device Maupassant employed and Bojer (in "The Power of a Lie") developed, of moving inevitably from an apparently trifling incident or casual remark to its tragic consequence, Mr. Connell turns to deft irony in the best of his stories of "apes playing angels, and remembering their halos while forgetting their tails." "Light tragedies," he calls the group, and they are most successful on the thin ice of humor that preserves his irony from bathos; he cannot quite convince us of the pathetic reality of his denouements. Without being imitative, Mr. Connell summons up memories: Fielding's burlesque of "Pamela," for instance, has its parallel with transposed sexes in the present travesty on the innocent country girl who comes to the city to be ruined. In a few of the tales, "accident" brings on the desired conclusion, but any accident is justifiable that helps produce the satirical picture of modern advertising efficiency in Son of a Sloganeer. The opening sentence of this story—"Mr. Bowser thumbed a buzzer"—is insidiously comic in its portentousness, and epitomizes the method by which the author keeps us chuckling through the volume.

Speculations. Essays on Humanism and the Philosophy of Art. By T. E. Hulme. Edited by Herbert Read. With a Frontispiece and Foreword by Jacob Epstein. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

A posthumous collection of papers on the philosophy of religion and art by a young Englishman who was killed in the war. He has hitherto been known to most Americans only through the five poems in free verse which Ezra Pound published in 1915 and which are reprinted here in an appendix. Although he considered himself an amateur in speculation, he was positive, original, and acute; and it would be difficult to say how much was lost to thought when he died at Nieuport in 1917. He had laid plans for a number of volumes which should develop the theory explicit in the present fragments—the theory that religion, ethics, and art have undergone a steady degradation since the Renaissance. The Renaissance, by rejecting absolutes (God) and embracing relatives (nature), created "that bastard, personality," and inaugurated a debauch which in philosophy means humanism, in ethics optimism or perfectionism, in art romanticism, vitalism, individualism. Hulme was in no sense orthodox; he did not ask for a literal return to the Middle Ages. But he hoped for the return of something corresponding to the doctrine of original sin—something, that is, which takes into account the essential futility of existence, the total inadequacy of nature, the permanent imperfection of man, and the definite reality of absolutes. His most fruitful speculations perhaps were in the field of art, where he championed those geometrical, abstract modes in modern sculpture, painting, and poetry which it seemed to him grew out of a sense in certain artists that nature, being insufficient and corrupt, needed to have imposed upon it the rigid forms of pure intellect. The graceful curves of nature flow nowhere; straight lines run to God. On so much evidence Hulme might be suspected of piety and despair. Instead, he was hard, sardonic, and pugnacious; his convictions grew out of free observation, his impatience was that of a true philosopher. He perfectly explains the sculpture of Epstein, and his pages on poetry throw much light on Maxwell Bodenheim, to take an American example—a poet who has entered the lists against sensuality and romance, fighting them with abstract diction and strictly intelligent metaphor. In the present volume historians of twentieth-century art may find the clearest and strongest expression of the spirit out of which it significantly came.

The Fabulous Forties. By Meade Minnigerode. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

An attempt to make the Early Victorian era amusing for us by collecting and annotating original data to show the comedy of Victorian manners. Mr. Minnigerode's contemporary material is not collected from state papers. Rather, he bends his search toward "forgotten plays and unremembered books, bright silks and satins, twinkling candelabra and vanished splendors." And so he does up the history and politics of the times, the domestic life, the New York stage, the books, the society, and the decade's great romantic climax—the Gold Rush of '49. Mr. Minnigerode has written with the vivacity his title demands, and succeeded in the not-too-difficult task of making an age other than our own look absurd.

The Outsider. Adapted by Joan Sutherland from the play of that name by Dorothy Brandon. Brentano's. $2.

A novel fabricated from the past season's play and filled with an abundant claptrap. The action depends largely upon a wondrous mechanical contrivance of vaudevillesque mysteriousness. The invention triumphs with a sensational flourish, the beloved loves with a gratifying timeliness, and the underdog inventor is admitted to the highest professional honors of the land. In short, fortune smiles—vacuously.

Cheat-the-Boys. By Eden Phillpotts. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

Aside from the variation in the industrial backgrounds of his tales, Mr. Phillpotts's novels are drawing precariously close to a set pattern. The apple-and-cider culture of the Devonshire orchards in this case provides a setting rather more juicy than the narrative.

Drama

A Problem

A CRITIC who went home after the first act of "Conscience" (Belmont Theater) would deserve to be forgiven, and yet he would miss some very genuine drama of which the beginning of the evening's proceedings gave not the slightest promise. When the curtain rises upon a lonely Alaskan hut swept by paper snow and reveals a very tiresome madman who summons ghosts from behind a black curtain that he may deliver to them vague harangues about the social system in general, the combination of melodramatic nonsense and intellectual pretentiousness suggests nothing so much as a feature film which has unfortunately learned to talk. One gathers that the hero is suffering from an undigested mass of doubtful metaphysics and also that he has done something which he is sorry for; but one wishes to be rid of him as soon as possible.

Yet when the action cuts back two years and concerns itself with some very real events in a very real American household it is immediately obvious that the author, instead of being, as might have been reasonably supposed, a scenario writer out of a job, is rather a dramatist capable of observation as shrewd, homely, and pertinent as the material of his first act was pretentious and vague. Moreover, as the piece proceeds the marvel grows, for in his story of a radical workman and his discontented wife he has seized upon a perfectly concrete example of the eternal conflict between man the visionary and woman the passionate conserver of the tangible values of home. He has not been kinder to this girl of limited intelligence and vulgar desires than justice demands; he has not hesitated to reveal the ignorance and the baseness which help to make her up; and yet withal he has made it abundantly clear why she clung with such passion to the bits of instalment-plan furniture which represent the sole triumph of her constructive instinct and why she rebelled against her husband, who seemed to her to be merely throwing himself away when he engaged in agitations and strikes which did nothing tangible except lose jobs for himself and his friends. The man is sustained by visionary enthusiasm, but she knows only that homes are broken up and life robbed of the cheap pleasures which alone she can enjoy; the result is an inevitable conflict for which no one is to blame and which is hence the very essence of drama. Somewhere the author has seen such a girl and seen her clearly enough to distinguish the conflicting elements which make her up. He has seen that womanly instinct to cling above all else to her own which makes her, even in her conflicts with her husband, the representative of a great and noble force; but he has seen also the streaks of vulgar selfishness which make her mean, and he has set both these things down. Yet after bringing his story to a definite conclusion he is capable of adding a wholly unnecessary fourth act in which he can relapse, literally and figuratively, into the world of paper snow and send his hero "out into the storm" to die in the most approved movie manner.

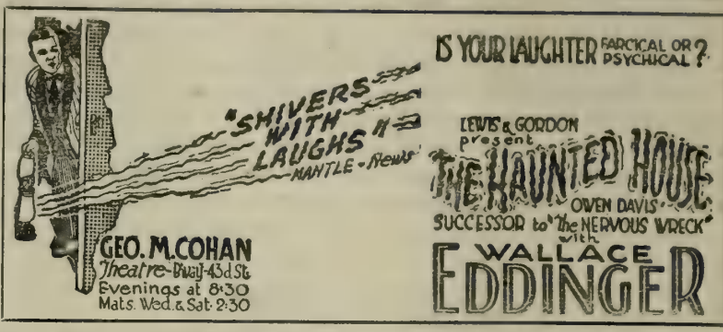
Hardly less interesting than the problem which the play has wished to present is the problem which it unconsciously raises: How is it possible that a man capable of the telling realism of the two middle acts can burden them with a first scene which seems calculated to drive spectators from the theater and with a fourth which does as much as it can to destroy the effect of what has gone before? These scenes are so utterly unnecessary as to suggest the possibility that they were merely tacked on to fill the time which a drama is conventionally supposed to occupy, but there are indications that such is not the case and that instead the author is suffering from a strange delusion as to the value of his work. In the first place these appendages are not apologetically called Prologue and Epilogue as they might have been, but appear instead as full acts, while the real play is paradoxically denominated an Interlude. Moreover the whole is not given some title which would suggest the real theme, but is called "Conscience"—as though the author had originally intended some vaguely bombastic story of a man driven to solitude and suicide by remorse, but had stumbled, half by accident, upon a real drama while casting about for an interlude to explain his play. Surely no stranger example of the author's proverbial lack of self-criticism can be found on the stage, but, fortunately, the problem is easily solved for the spectator. He can go late and come away early, yet still spend a more profitable evening than the average theater affords. Incidentally, Lillian Foster takes excellent advantage of her opportunity to make of the girl a figure at once mean and pitiful.

"Schemers" (Bayes Theater), which consists of a play within a play, is a completely abortive effort to demonstrate the wrongs which theatrical producers suffer at the hands of the critic. In the play the latter unanimously damn the piece which is presented for their approval, but damn it with such sufficient reason that, contrary to the author's intention, they are completely justified in the eyes of the spectator.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.



"SHIVERS WITH LAUGHS" MANTLE - News
GEO. M. COHAN Theatre-Bway-43d St.
Evenings at 8:30
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30
IS YOUR LAUGHTER FARCICAL OR PSYCHICAL?
LEWIS & GORDON present
THE HAUNTED HOUSE
OWEN DAVIS' SUCCESSOR to "The NERVOUS WRECK"
with
WALLACE EDDINGER

RAND SCHOOL
7 East 15th Street
Write for Bulletin

Courses beginning
Sept. 30, 7 P. M....Alex. A. Goldenweiser "Anthropology," "Psychoanalysis"
Oct. 2, 8:30 P. M.....Margaret Daniels "Elements of Psychology"
Oct. 3, 8:30 P. M.....Leo Saidla "Main Currents in Recent Literature"
Later Lecturers
Scott Nearing, Clarence Darrow, Langdon-Davies

SIX LECTURES
SIDNEY BRADSHAW FAY, A.B., Ph.D.
Professor of European History at Smith College
"THE CAUSES OF THE WORLD WAR"
Community Church Auditorium, Park Avenue and 34th St.
Tuesday Eves., Oct. 21, 28; Nov. 11, 18, 25; Dec. 2, at 8:15
Course tickets, $3.50, can be secured at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue. Single admission, 85 cents.

Great DEBATE of the Campaign!
SHOULD A CLASS-CONSCIOUS SOCIALIST OR WORKER VOTE FOR LA FOLLETTE?
SCOTT NEARING says No!
Foremost Socialist Spokesman
vs. MEYER LONDON says Yes!
First Socialist Congressman and Labor Attorney
Chairman: NORMAN HAPGOOD
Sunday Afternoon, October 5, at 3 P. M.
Central Opera House, 67th Street and 3rd Avenue
Tickets, $1.10 (incl. war tax)

EXTRAORDINARY LECTURE!
"WHY TROTZKY HATES MacDONALD"
A frank exposition of the differences between the principles, aims and methods of the Labor Party of England and the Communist Party of Soviet Russia
by John Langdon-Davies
Journalist, Oxford Lecturer.
Labor Party Candidate for Parliament.
(First appearance in this country)
Sunday Afternoon, October 19, 3 P. M.
Cooper Union, 4th Avenue and 8th Street
Tickets 75c. (plus war tax)

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 5th Ave., N. Y., Tel. Longacre 10434-10435
N. B. TO OUT-OF-TOWNERS: If you desire a stenographic report of the above events, send us your name, stating which interest you.

International Relations Section

The Trade Union Congress, 1924

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, September 9

THE Hull Congress was at least a great improvement upon the preceding congress at Plymouth. If it failed to show any genuinely creative spirit, at any rate there was completely lacking that temper of faction and discord which made Plymouth perhaps the most lamentable congress in recent years. And several forward steps were taken which, if small, may yet be ultimately significant. Above all, the Trade Union Council was given powers which, wisely used, may, for the first time, enable it effectively to coordinate the activity of the unions. Henceforth it is obligatory upon them to supply the council with information about their activities; and it will be able to intervene in disputes without being compelled to wait for an invitation. It cannot yet play the part of a general staff of labor; but I think most observers are coming to agree that there is much less unwillingness in the trade-union world to face the need of unity of command than there was a year ago. Secondly, and only less notable, was the universal adhesion to, and enthusiasm for, the Russian treaty. The tremendous campaign waged against it by the financial interests—a campaign unfortunately assisted, probably unwittingly, by the indiscretions of Mr. Snowden—has clearly been unable to divide the trade unions. They are sympathetic to Russia; they believe in the future of Russia; and they gave emphatic voice in their welcome to Tomski—the Russian fraternal delegate—to their conviction that the MacDonald Government must stand or fall by peace with Russia. Thirdly, there was a widespread sense among the delegates that though the Dawes Report must be accepted for the moment, it is only a phase in the economic reconstruction of Europe; that its dangers probably will be found to outweigh its advantages; and that the sooner the International Trade Union Movement prepares for its complete revision, the better it will be for the interests of the working class. A. J. Cook, the miners' secretary, secured the attention even of his own colleagues, when he declared that no political issue would be allowed to prevent the miners from putting their interests before those represented by the Dawes Report.

The hostility of the congress to the Communists was marked. All their resolutions were voted down; their speeches were listened to with reluctance and impatience. Especially noteworthy was the fact that overwhelming opposition compelled the withdrawal of a resolution in favor of independent working-class education. That was in fact an attempt to prevent the unions from supporting all such educational institutions as Ruskin College and the Workers' Educational Association, avowedly on the ground that their receipt of funds from non-union sources makes them "capitalist" in character. But the real purpose of the resolution was to confine trade-union support to the National Council of Labor Colleges, which is a rigidly Marxian movement. The absurdity of an attempt to describe a movement of which Mr. G. D. H. Cole is the leading figure as capitalist is too obvious to need analysis.

The congress revealed certain definite weaknesses which ought not to be passed over in silence. (1) It is too big to be effective. Debate is impossible on any subject in a real way. (2) The congress clearly tries to cover far too much ground. It would probably be a great improvement if all its hardy annuals were removed from its program and left to the Labor Party. It has not yet learned how to adjust itself to the new political importance labor has acquired. (3) There were few signs that any younger men are coming to the front to take the place of those leaders who are now in the Cabinet. The dominating figures in the congress, men like Purcell and Hicks, have all been well-known figures for twenty years. (4) The movement has still to face seriously the position of women in the trade-union world. The tendency is still to treat them as a handful of Cinderellas whose problems may be met by a resolution on which the congress need not spend too much time. (5) There is little effort to work a really effective program for the unions as a whole. The so-called charter has, doubtless, its value; but anyone with eyes to see must realize that there will be no real adequacy in the movement until it comes to grips with the problem of control in industry; and that means the united front which cannot be attained so long as the labor world is belittered with unnecessary unions.

I may perhaps add a word of disappointment at the effort of the fraternal delegates from America. Beyond an interesting reference to your labor banks, they confined themselves to a feeble echo of Mr. Gompers's worst pronouncements. And I do urge upon Americans a ten years' close season upon jokes about prohibition. The best of English labor is intensely interested in that experiment. If reference is to be made to it, let it at least be made in a spirit of critical understanding.

The Palestine Problem

WHAT follows is reprinted from the London Nation of August 30:

It is perhaps as well that, apart from an anthropological exegesis of the racial divergencies between the Jews of Palestine and those of Central Europe by Colonel Williams, Palestine affairs escaped the attention of the House of Commons during the recent debate on the Middle East estimates. Otherwise Mr. Thomas might have been tempted to take advantage of the "unholy alliance" between the official Opposition and the Labor front bench on the issue of Irak to assume the assent of the House to the giving of a British Government guaranty for a loan which the Palestine Government is anxious to float, but can only float on condition that subscribers are guaranteed against loss at the expense of the British taxpayer.

Fortunately this matter must come up for specific consideration, and it will not be out of place to discuss in advance its more salient features in order that the British taxpayer and his representatives may know exactly where they stand. As in the case of Irak, the Government is chary of supplying the full information essential to the proper understanding of the subject. The plea of "continuity of policy" is again produced to justify a regime which is open to serious criticism, but for which Conservative support can confidently be counted on. Again the Labor Government consents, at the bidding of a Colonial Office department, to stepfather a policy which is not only intrinsically unsound, cutting as it does across the sentiment of 90 per cent of the population affected, but has depended for its survival till now on radically unsound financial administration.

Broadly speaking, Palestine costs the British taxpayer £1,000,000 a year for the upkeep of military forces necessary for the maintenance of the present (Zionist) regime in the face of overwhelming opposition. Apart from this, its annual revenue barely, on the most favorable showing, meets its annual expenditure—in point of fact, it substantially fails to meet it, as no provision has hitherto been made for the payment of interest and sinking-fund charges on its debt. The national debt of the country already amounts to £5,000,000 at a moderate estimate, and it now seeks a loan of £3,000,000, partly to repay about £2,000,000 of that debt, and partly to finance a grandiose harbor scheme at Haifa, which will cost about £1,000,000. On the completion of the loan transaction the national debt will amount to £6,000,000, involving an annual charge of £300,000 on the local revenues.

The Haifa harbor scheme would be sound enough for a country which could afford the luxury of anticipating a future, perhaps remote, demand for modern shipping facilities. Palestine is not such a country, and under present conditions Haifa's development will be Jaffa's doom. Jaffa will be ruined if such a scheme materializes, but it is necessary for the Palestine Government to hold out the bait of some large development work to justify application for a loan. The bulk of the loan is, of course, essential to the continuance of the present regime, which to the extent of £1,583,000 has been financed by advances made by the Crown Agents without parliamentary authority. The Crown Agents now require the money to regularize an irregular transaction, and, if it cannot be found, Palestine will, to all intents and purposes, be bankrupt. It might be urged that the British taxpayer is only being asked to guarantee a loan of £3,000,000 in order to secure repayment of the sum already advanced, but this is not really so, seeing that refusal of a guaranty must result in a drastic revision of our policy with a possible saving of £1,000,000 a year over an indefinite period.

The rest of the present national debt of Palestine is made up as follows: £2,190,000 owed to this country in respect of railways, telegraphs, and other works handed over to the Palestine Government at a low valuation on the termination of the military occupation in July, 1920; £640,000 due in respect of the last four years to the Ottoman Public Debt Council, and payable in twenty equal annuities; an unknown sum, not less than £300,000, due to the same council on account of special revenues collected during the military occupation—this claim is disputed, though to all appearances legally valid, as the revenues were collected by the military authorities under the Turkish law; a further unknown sum, probably £150,000, due to the Hejaz Railway administration on account of a special stamp tax allocated by Turkish law to the service of the railway; and other minor sums, together with interest on the sums above mentioned in respect of the past four years.

The financial situation of Palestine scarcely justifies the demand for further financial support. It is true that against the capital debt there are assets—railways, buildings, etc.—but these assets are not readily realizable. Their value is in ratio to the stability and prosperity of the country, which are themselves at the mercy of the political situation. The only solid asset is the presence of a military force at a cost of £1,000,000 a year to the British taxpayer, as long as he consents to keep it there and pay for it. Every financial commitment accepted by him lengthens the duration of this liability. It is time, therefore, for him to take stock of the situation, to judge of its prospects of stability, and, if not satisfied, to weigh the advantages and disadvantages to himself of the present position, and of any feasible modification of a regime which imposes an obligation on him in the interests of others.

The political situation is the key to the problem. The Balfour Declaration of November, 1917, laid down the broad lines of British policy in respect of Palestine. That declaration has been reaffirmed by each successive Government, including the present Labor Government. No sane person can desire its recall. For Jews and Arabs alike it represents a British promise on which there can be no going back. But a sound and reasonable regime safeguarding the rights and legitimate aspirations of all can be based on its terms without stretching them. It is true that extreme Zionists did, at the beginning, put on the declaration an interpretation it was incapable of bearing; but that phase is past beyond recall. It has left a legacy of suspicion and rancor which has been held officially to necessitate direct British administration with a strong bias in favor of Zionism. We cannot trust the Arabs to be fair to the Jews after their early experiences. The sooner that phase passes the better for all concerned, for the ideal of a Jewish National Home in Palestine is doomed by the continuance of a regime calculated to irritate and exasperate the Arabs beyond endurance.

Mr. Churchill and his successors have not been blind to this fact. But they have shrunk from facing it squarely. As in India and in Egypt, half-hearted concessions have been offered to the Arabs, who will only accept the genuine article. Barring the possibility of a Fascist reaction in British Eastern policy, they will get it, but, if they get it by their own efforts, the Jews will suffer as the Armenians are suffering for former European support in Turkey. We should try to avoid such a climax by being reasonable with the Arabs.

We recognize in principle that a democratic, constitutional regime in Palestine is the ideal to be aimed at. We have offered to set up a legislative council consisting of Arabs, Christians, and Jews, roughly in proportion to their respective numerical importance, but we have stripped that offer of reality by insisting on the inclusion in the council of a sufficient number of British officials to control its operations absolutely. The official members would, of course, vote solid under the High Commissioner's direction, and, combining with the Jews, they would outvote the Arabs and the Christians. A 90 per cent majority of the population can scarcely be expected to accept the position of a minority in the council. The deadlock leaves us with the continuance of Crown Colony government and a deadweight of popular hostility into the bargain.

It is unnecessary to discuss whether a Zionist High Commissioner can be absolutely impartial. The Arabs do not think so—nor do the Jews, who would not go to Palestine unless assured of a potential administrative majority. It is a pity that the High Commissioner is a Zionist and that other Zionists hold high positions in the Government, while Arabs do not. That defect should be rectified as soon as possible, but the obvious solution of the problem is to set up a purely representative council—as in Irak—and to stand by in our mandatory capacity to prevent oppression of minorities by the majority. That is our proper function. It would cost us less than the present regime. Above all, it would give the Jews a reasonable chance of realizing their legitimate aspirations. But they must relinquish the idea of Zionist domination in Palestine or even of a Jewish imperium in imperio, and we must not encourage such dreams.

Contributors to This Issue

HENRY WOOD NEVINSON was on the staff of the London Nation from its beginning in 1907 until Mr. Massingham's resignation in 1923.

FRANK H. SIMONDS is the author of a "History of the World War."

A. J. MUSTE is the head of Brookwood, the trade-union college at Katonah, New York.

FRANCES BRADLEY is the director of the Child Welfare Division of the Montana State Board of Health.

C. HARTLEY GRATTON is in charge of the department of English at Urbana University School.

E. CARLETON MACDOWELL is a research geneticist for the Carnegie Institute at Cold Spring Harbor, New York.

JOHN ERSKINE is a professor in Columbia University.

HAROLD J. LASKI is a lecturer in the London School of Economics.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1924 No. 3092

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 347
EDITORIALS:
Get Out the Issues! 350
Seven Million Dollars for Peace 351
Shed a Tear for the Klan 351
Officers or Gentlemen? 352
TED JR. By William Hard 353
CANADA'S PUBLICLY OWNED ELECTRICAL POWER. By Harry W. Laidler 354
LOOKING ON. By Art Young 356
THE GREASED WHEELS OF DIPLOMACY. By Louis Fischer 357
THE CHINESE STUDENT MIND. By Pearl S. Buck 358
A REPORTER'S MIRROR. By W. G. Clugston 361
LA FOLLETTE. By William Ellery Leonard 363
"THE BIG NOISE." By Blanche Goodman 363
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 364
CORRESPONDENCE 365
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
China, Russia, the Allies, and the Chinese Eastern Railway 368

FALL BOOK SECTION

TRUTH AND REALISM IN LITERATURE. By Maxwell Bodenheim ... 373
ICELAND'S NEW BIRTH. By Elizabeth Knowlton 374
HENRY SEIDEL CANBY. By Henry Seidel Canby 375
GIFTS. By May Williams Ward 376
BOOKS:
Emily Dickinson. By Genevieve Taggard 376
Wilsoniana. By Harry Elmer Barnes 378
Mr. Forster Looks at India. By Edwin Muir 379
This Most Momentous Period. By Lewis S. Gannett 380
Bitter Mirth. By Joseph Wood Krutch 382
Mystic and Rationalist. By Henry Raymond Mussey 382
Bruno and Others. By Irwin Edman 384
The Springfield Republican. By Oswald Garrison Villard 386
Almost White and Black. By Konrad Bercovici 386
Spoon River, Illinois. By Mark Van Doren 388
Back to Rome. By Tenney Frank 388
Greek Vases. By Gisela M. A. Richter 390
Handel. By Henrietta Straus 390
Books in Brief 392
DRAMA:
Hopwood versus Vajda 393
SOME NOTABLE FALL BOOKS 396

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IF THE REPUBLICANS really wish to keep the Washington scandals out of the campaign they are giving small evidence of that desire. Within a week the Department of Justice dropped a group of indictments against Remus, the "king of the bootleggers" who recently made a statement in behalf of Harry Daugherty; Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., who acted as a sort of office-boy in carrying the oil-lease papers about Washington for signature, was nominated—under Old Guard pressure—as the Republican candidate for governor of New York State; and President Coolidge, Secretary Wilbur, and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt have all approved the plan to promote Rear Admiral Robison, the key man in the navy involved in the transfer of the naval-oil lands to Doheny and Sinclair. Robison was jumped to his present position as chief of the bureau of engineers when Secretary Denby gave him that important post; now official favoritism marks him out for another leap over his peers, despite the fact that his public record in recent months reveals nothing except his complicity in the Doheny transaction. He admitted on the witness-stand that he learned all he knew of the leases from the Dohenys, and that he pushed the lease-transfer plan despite opposition from Admiral Griffin and others. If the Administration wanted to convict itself of complicity in the oil scandal it could hardly have adopted more effective methods.

THE MAGIC OF THE ROOSEVELT NAME is not likely to carry the rough rider's son into the governorship of New York State. This country has never taken kindly to inheritance in politics, and the parallelism between the careers of the two colonels which carried Theodore, Jr., into a Washington position above his powers is likely to come to a sudden end. "Al" Smith will win again. But "Al's" own election may serve as a check to his career. He did not want to run; he could earn more money in private life, and his own political ambitions would have been better served by a national speaking tour than by a home-State campaign. New York knows "Al" already, and has proved its affection at the ballot-box. But this time Governor Smith is accepting more than the nomination for governor. He becomes the running-mate of Mr. Morgan's attorney. That will not help him in politics, and it ought not to. "Al" Smith has a very different record from John W. Davis; his natural affiliation, barring the question of party regularity, would be with La Follette rather than with Davis. By supporting Davis in this campaign he is knifing the new-party movement which expresses in national politics the progressive attitude on public issues which is Governor Smith's chief pride at home. As Norman Thomas, Socialist and Farmer-Labor candidate for governor, puts it:

> Al Smith cannot and will not change the character of Tammany Hall or the Democratic Party. Tammany Hall and similar machines, despite the human qualities of some of their leaders or perhaps because of them, are the best instruments ever devised for keeping the people quiet with personal favors and small concessions while special privilege gets what it wants. . . . The test as to progressivism in this campaign is the attitude the voter takes to the creation of a new party.

CALIFORNIA'S SUPREME COURT has also done its bit to aid the La Follette campaign to curb one-man decisions by the courts. La Follette opponents besought the court to remove the names of the Independent electors from the ballots on the ground that electors were not "officials" within the meaning of the law, but mere messengers, and could not be nominated by petition. Three of the seven judges held the contention unjustified. Four accepted the technicality—and the Independent names are off. La Follette will appear on the California ballot only as a Socialist. Presumably the three judges were no less learned than the four, but, as Senator La Follette puts it, one man's twist of mind "nullifies the deliberately expressed will of the 50,000 voters" who signed La Follette-Wheeler petitions in California. "The decision," Senator Hiram Johnson believes, "is unjustified by the law, contrary to public policy, and of most harmful consequences. It is decisions such as this that undermine public confidence in the courts." Down in Louisiana a public official similarly ruled the La Follette-Wheeler electors off the ballot. Some wag in the State La Follette headquarters, recalling the slogan "Ballots not bullets" indorsed by the American Legion for National Education Week, wires us as follows:

> Referring your issue October 1, page 323, slogan of American Legion "Ballots not bullets." We were denied today La Follette's and Wheeler's names on the ballot. Please ask American Legion to wire Secretary of State Baton Rouge the slogan "Ballots not bullets."
>
> (Signed) Louisiana La Follette Headquarters.

IN HIS THRUSTS at the Republicans John W. Davis sometimes makes a good point for Senator La Follette. He did so in Wilmington when discussing the powers of the Supreme Court. Mr. Davis is a corporation lawyer and as set on preserving the Supreme Court's powers, with all their abuses, as is a professional banker like Mr. Dawes. But for all that Mr. Davis is too well informed to stomach Mr. Dawes's twaddle, and at Wilmington he pointed out that the Republicans, having failed to inspire hope through promises, were trying to instil fear through hobgoblins:

> I detect, gentlemen, the bringing on the stage of a new "bogy-man." He is wearing a fur cap and a long, red robe, and across his breast his name is written in curious characters such as we rarely see in the United States, and they point to him and tell you "He is a Bolshevist"; and when his cap falls off and he lays down his red gown, you find that he is none other than our familiar friend, Senator "Bob" La Follette of Wisconsin.

The La Follette proposal to limit the Supreme Court was not nearly so drastic, Mr. Davis said, as Colonel Roosevelt's suggested recall of judicial decisions; the idea that the power of Congress should be superior to that of the Supreme Court originated not in Moscow but in much more familiar London. Mr. Davis might have added that the same theory holds also in conservative republics with written constitutions, like France and Switzerland, where we hear no outcries about the destruction of either property or personal liberty. Switzerland, which, like the United States, is a federal republic, specifically repudiated the American principle of judicial supremacy in writing its constitution. Its supreme court may overrule legislation passed by the cantons (corresponding to our States) but only a popular referendum can reverse laws passed by its national legislature.

WHAT WOULD HAPPEN if the election were thrown into the House? So many misconceptions seem to be current that we quote the language of the Twelfth Amendment to the Constitution, which determines the procedure:

> . . . The person having the greatest number of votes for President [in the Electoral College] shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest number, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. . . .

TRANSLATED INTO THE LANGUAGE OF 1924, this means that if neither Coolidge nor Davis nor La Follette obtains 266 electoral votes, a majority of the whole, the election must go to the House. Barring a "tidal wave" it now seems likely that no candidate will receive such a majority. The House could elect any one of the three leading candidates—but it votes by States, each State's representation casting one unit, and a majority, or twenty-five State votes, is necessary to a choice. At present five States have tied delegations in the House, twenty-two (including the La Follette Republicans of Wisconsin and the Non-partisans of North Dakota) are Republican, and twenty-one Democratic. Unless, therefore, a large number of representatives broke party lines, no candidate could obtain the requisite majority in the House, and the man chosen as Vice-President by the Senate would become acting President. The Senate could choose only from the two leading candidates. It seems certain that the progressive Republican Senators would vote for either Wheeler or Bryan in preference to Dawes, and that one of the two would accordingly be elected in the Senate. Either would be sure to give the leader of his ticket—Davis or La Follette—his choice of Cabinet positions, and to make him chief adviser of the Administration.

IS SECURITY a precondition of disarmament or is disarmament a precondition of security? France is the champion of security before everything else; Denmark upholds disarmament, and her Premier has announced the intention of disarming "to the skin." The Journal des Débats, one of Paris's oldest and most responsible papers, declares that Denmark thereby abandons her independent sovereignty and suggests that perhaps she should be excluded from the League of Nations. As one reads the speech of M. Munch, the Danish delegate at Geneva, it is difficult to understand the basis of such violent opposition. The Manchester Guardian gives a summary of the speech:

> It is the existence of great armies and navies that is the danger. Once these great armies and navies of great nations are set in motion it would be impossible to arrest them, whatever the morality of the matter or the sanctions may be. No guaranties would be of the slightest use. With little states a system of arbitration and guaranties may function well enough. In the case of a great Power, or of the allies of a great Power, it would be very difficult to prevent recourse to war. Disarmament is therefore the only way of attaining security, not vice versa.

This point of view need not have given annoyance. But M. Munch also suggested that the basis for reduction might be found in the disarmament clauses of the peace treaties imposed upon Germany and her allies. Austria was accorded an army of 30,000—about 5,000 per million inhabitants; Germany 100,000—or 5,000 per three million.

Why, suggests M. Munch, should not such terms be taken as a basis? The reason is perfectly clear. Germany's army would be half as large again as France's.

IMPOSSIBLE ECONOMIC HURDLES are already being erected over which Germany is expected to leap with the weighty Dawes scheme—if she can. England has restored the 26 per cent import duty on German goods; France has recently imposed a like duty, and it is reported that Belgium will follow her example; America's tariff wall remains firm. Home industries in all the Allied countries are being protected from German dumping with a vengeance. If Germany is to be hopelessly discouraged by a long and futile effort to find markets the result may be the same as if there never had been a Dawes Report. The Anglo-German trade parleys have broken down, and the forthcoming Franco-German economic accord may boil down to an exchange of French iron ore for German coal and coke. M. Louis Loucheur, a member of the French delegation to the Assembly of the League of Nations, who will probably be a member of the trade commission, makes a vague suggestion which might have important developments:

> Why not try to reach a common-sense adjustment of this situation? Arrange production and consumption on a rational plan and the allotment of materials will follow without difficulty. This is a task in which Geneva may play a role.

COLLEGE STUDENTS, no matter from what favored circumstances in life they may come, are capable of appreciating the laboring man's point of view once they are compelled personally to face his problems. Thus it has proved with the members of the 1924 Rochester Industrial Service Group, composed of students from nine Eastern colleges who spent the past summer as laborers and factory workers and at the close of their experience declared:

> Whereas in the past college men have been engaging in industry under strike conditions without adequate knowledge of the true causes of the strike, and
>
> Whereas such actions by college men have caused many strikes to be lost for the workers, whose cause was absolutely justified, and
>
> Whereas such action by college men disturbs the feeling of fellowship between the college man and his industrial brother, creating suspicion and mistrust and breaking the bond of common fellowship in the interest of which we are working to establish better industrial relations,
>
> Be it Resolved that we, the members of the Rochester Industrial Service Group of 1924, hereby openly sympathize with the worker in his struggle for the betterment of labor, affirm our belief in the inalienable right of the worker to strike, and denounce the acts of college men who have in the past been instrumental in breaking strikes, and condemn strike breaking as an utter disregard of the workers' necessary struggle for a decent livelihood.

IS $500 A DAY a fair fee for a lawyer to charge? Answer (from the lawyers): Yes. The Interstate Commerce Commission raised the question lately in passing upon the reorganization expenses of the Missouri-Kansas-Texas Railroad, for which $2,364,249 was asked, including $750,000 for counsel fees. Of course any number of worthy counselors appeared on behalf of the reorganization managers to assure the commission that $500 a day was a modest sum for the services of any good lawyer. Yet these same men, we venture to say, are crying to high heaven against the imposition of having to pay a skilled mechanic $10 or $12 a day, and are convinced that President Coolidge was right in vetoing the bill to increase postal employees' salaries. They are also sure that railroad rates cannot be reduced without ruining the companies. Meanwhile reorganizations and receiverships continue to be a favorite method of milking American industry to the enrichment of a few executives and lawyers. All too often after a company has been reorganized the stockholder may about as well throw away his certificates and the public must be prepared to shoulder indefinitely a vast overhead of extravagance, if not of near robbery.

THE IRONY of elaborate and expensive campaigns to preserve the nation's health while at the same time automobiles are allowed to run wild through our streets, taking an increasing toll of life each year, is pointed out by the Life Extension Institute. "It is certainly discouraging for those engaged in public health work and preventive medicine," says a recent bulletin, "to find that the automobile is more deadly than the typhoid bacillus and that it even kills more people than alcohol does directly." The following tabulation showing the number of deaths in 1921 from certain causes in the United States Registration Area (comprising at that time 82 per cent of the population) is given:

Influenza	10,193
Automobile accidents	10,168
Typhoid fever	8,007
Angina pectoris	8,031
Cirrhosis of the liver	6,598
Alcoholism	1,611

Both the speed of automobiles and the deaths from them have been increasing progressively year by year. The death-rate per 100,000 from automobile accidents shows the following trend in the United States Registration Area:

1900-1910	1911-1915	1916	1917	1918	1919	1920	1921	1922
1.0	3.9	7.3	9.0	9.3	9.4	10.4	11.5	12.5

"Perhaps," suggests the Life Extension Institute, "the time will come when the manufacture of high-speed automobiles for pleasure purposes will be forbidden by law."

A KNOWLEDGE OF LATIN may still be a rare thing, but the study of it is in no danger of disappearing. So at least we conclude from the general report of the Classical Investigation financed by Mr. Rockefeller's General Education Board. From it we learn that 940,000 American pupils, or about one-fourth of the total enrolment, are studying the language in secondary schools and that 40,000 are continuing their study in colleges. A smaller but still considerable number, about 27,000, are engaged with Greek. In view of the fact that, in spite of this tremendous thumbing of dictionaries and conjugating of verbs, it is rather rare to find a man not a professed scholar who can do much more than translate a motto, the attention which the committee has devoted to teaching methods would seem to be extremely wise. Latin does aid the mastery of English, and so do other admirable things; but after all the chief reason for studying it is in order to read the treasures which it locks up. Yet for years the attempt to give an actual working knowledge of the language has grown more and more half-hearted, and the average student still reaches desperately for his dictionary when confronted with even simple prose.

Get Out the Issues!

AN unusual nonpartisan movement has come into existence this year to "Get out the vote," as the slogan has it. Wholly distinct from the usual party appeal, the effort has the support of important organizations like the Federal Council of Churches and the League of Women Voters; of influential publications like Collier's and the Literary Digest. The leaders of the campaign have our respect; their motives are altogether praiseworthy. Yet we find ourselves quite without enthusiasm for the effort. Indeed we believe that it is on the wrong track.

The facts that have brought into existence this campaign to "Get out the vote" are beyond all question regrettable. In the last presidential election only 49 per cent of the qualified voters of the country actually cast ballots; only a minority of the electors took the trouble to go to the polls. Several facts crop out at once in explanation of this situation. Woman suffrage is one. It is well known that a multitude of women still take small interest in exercising their new right, although statistics are lacking to show how great a factor this is. Another reason for the small actual vote compared with the possible one lies in the total disfranchisement, despite the Constitution of the United States, of most of the Negroes in the South.

But neither of these explanations is sufficient. Neither, for instance, explains why there should have been a progressive falling off in the percentage of voters for the past quarter of a century. Woman suffrage did not affect any presidential election before that of 1920, while the Negroes of the South have suffered a fairly uniform disfranchisement since the seventies or eighties. Yet the Federal Council of Churches reports the following startling decline in the percentage of qualified voters going to the polls:

1896, 80 per cent.
1900, 73 per cent.
1908, 66 per cent.
1912, 62 per cent.
1920, 49 per cent.

Nor does a look at the figures by States give one any comfort. It is true that the percentages in the South are exceptionally low. In South Carolina, for instance, votes were cast in 1920 by only 8.5 per cent of the qualified voters; in Mississippi by 9.4 per cent; in Georgia by 10.5 per cent. Yet, turning to the North, one finds that in the native, white, Protestant State of Vermont (Calvin Coolidge's own birthplace) the percentage was only 45.2, while in Maine, another stronghold of old New Englandism, it was 46.9. Massachusetts came off but a little better, with 53.3 per cent, while the great Empire State showed 52.7 per cent. Even in the politically minded West the figures are disappointing. The percentage in California was 48.9. Colorado registered 56.1 per cent; Kansas, that stalwart believer in reform through legislation, showed 57.9 per cent. All these percentages, it should be emphasized, were in a presidential year, when interest is always at the peak. In the election of 1922 in Massachusetts the State officials were chosen by one-sixth of the electorate!

In the face of such a situation it is natural that the cry should go up: "Get out the vote!" The Federal Council of Churches is asking ministers everywhere to preach on the duty of voting. In New York City a proposal was even favored at a recent meeting of Republican clubs to disfranchise habitual non-voters. Now the privilege and right of voting is one that may properly receive emphasis at any time, but when it comes to compelling or even specially urging great masses of indifferent voters to go to the polls we believe that the result is likely to be harmful rather than otherwise. An unwilling or indifferent vote is a thoughtless one; it expresses no conviction or desire. The sponsors of the slogan "Get out the vote" have got the cart before the horse. The reason why Americans have been voting less and less in recent years is that there has been less and less to vote about. The deplorable figures marshaled by the Federal Council of Churches are striking confirmation of popular belief in the doctrine that The Nation has been preaching: that there has come to be no difference between the Republican and Democratic parties and that the vital issues before the country are dodged by both. We can hardly blame 51 per cent of the electorate in staying away from the polls in 1920, with a practical choice only between Harding and Cox. We advocated then a protest vote for one of the minority parties, but unfortunately the average American seems to lack the patience for that kind of political construction.

Happily the situation this year is different. At last the oneness of the two old parties, with their common straddling of the issues, has brought its inevitable consequence. The emergence of the Progressive Party not only gives the voter this year a chance to express himself on big, vital, critical issues, but it affords him the satisfaction of knowing that a ballot for La Follette and Wheeler is virtually sure to be effective, at least in throwing the election into Congress and thus compelling a new party alignment in the United States. It is such a new party alignment that the country needs, and whether one is a conservative or a radical he ought—if he believes in democracy—to welcome and work for a political re-formation which will give the people a chance to express themselves on fundamental issues. With that attained, there will be no need to urge voters to go to the polls.

It is this need for new party lines and issues that the backers of the campaign to "Get out the vote" ought to be concentrating upon. Conservatives ought to welcome a frank facing of the issues as keenly as liberals. Instead there is a determined effort in many quarters to cloud the situation by harping on the disadvantages of a "third party" in the American scheme of government. But even if our historic two-party system were the only workable arrangement, there would be no warrant whatever for supposing that the Progressive movement is, or is going to be, a "third party." There is no indication in the straw ballots that it has a smaller following than the Republicans and the Democrats, and if the significance of this campaign penetrates to the electorate, the death of either the Republican or the Democratic party, perhaps of one in some sections and of the other in other States, is foreordained.

The need of the hour is not to preach: "Get out the vote!" It is to demand: "Get out the issues!"

Seven Million Dollars for Peace

FOURTEEN years ago Andrew Carnegie, seventy-five years old and eager to find some means of making his wealth serve the world, created the ten-million dollar Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. The income of $500,000 a year was to be spent in work for "the speedy abolition of international war." About seven million dollars have already been spent; but very little seems to have been accomplished toward hastening the end of international war. Where has the enormous sum of money gone?

Arthur Ruhl, in the October Survey Graphic, tells how the money has been frittered away. Under the guidance of a group of eminent, but also eminently cautious, men (the average age of the board of trustees is 67) it has published a long list of important and authoritative documents, subsidized technical international law journals, and arranged international scholarships. The division of economics and history is publishing a monumental 150-volume economic history of the war, written for the most part by gentlemen in the various countries who waged the war and highly approved of it. The division of international law has burrowed into Roman law and has refurbished the writings of Grotius, Pufendorf, Bynkershoek, and Balthazar Ayala. This division offered its services to our State Department during the war, and assisted in the task of getting ready for the Treaty of Versailles. The third division, of intercourse and education, under the aegis of Nicholas Murray Butler, had an excellent record prior to the war, and has disgraced itself since. It sent an international commission to report on the causes and conduct of the Balkan wars, an extremely important piece of work which, owing to the sudden outbreak of the Great War, never received the credit which it deserved. It translated Norman Angell's "Great Illusion" into seven languages, and distributed it widely. It sent President Eliot on a mission of good-will to China.

But when the war came the Endowment—Mr. Butler's division more than the others—"endeavored," to use its own words, "to contribute what it could by taking a clear and definite position in favor of the active and relentless prosecution of the war to final victory." It abandoned work for peace, or even for a reasonable peace when peace came. Its pamphlets lost their authority and became mere Creelish propaganda; it even republished ridiculous red-bearded "Bolshevist Portraits" from the highly spiced columns of Lord Northcliffe's London Times. It translated Mr. Butler's unimportant remarks into Spanish as part of a library of American literature. It contributed £10,000 to help repair Westminster Abbey, $107,000 to help rebuild the Louvain library, and $150,000 to construct a model public square, fully equipped with shower-baths and bowling alleys, in the commune of Fargniers, somewhere in France. So expensive were these pursuits that it dropped the excellent work which Mr. Duggan was doing to assist international relations clubs in the colleges; but somehow or other the Endowment found funds to purchase a fine old eighteenth-century hotel to use as its headquarters in Paris. "A large court," its year-book notes, "gives light and air to the spacious rooms decorated in the style of Louis XV. . . . The building contains fifty-five rooms, large and small. . . . There is a terrace on the roof with sanded paths and shrubs from which a superb view of Paris and the Seine may be obtained."

"The speedy abolition of international war"! Mr. Carnegie's purpose seems strangely remote from these kindly but insignificant expenditures. The report on the first year's work which said that "any result short of a large and valuable one may well be disappointing" sounds bitter and ironic today. Seven million dollars has been poured out—and there is no prospect that future millions will be better spent.

It is, of course, no easy task to find ways of making the Carnegie millions work effectively for the abolition of war. But where is the evidence that these gentlemen have been eager to explore such paths as lie open? Their reports sound rather like the work of timid souls whose chief passion was to find ways of spending money which would safeguard them from attack. There is no harm in providing shower-baths for French peasants, but surely there are more significant ways of hastening the abolition of war. The World Peace Foundation of Boston, to which Mr. Ginn left a million dollars with a similar hope, has used its money to promote interest in the League of Nations and the World Court. One may disagree with it, but one respects its enthusiasm and energy. The Carnegie millions have probably done little harm; but one can hardly say more for them.

There was a time when a neutral conference might have shortened the war. Instead Mr. Butler turned the money to the "active and relentless prosecution" of what in those humorless days was called "the war to end war." Today the money goes into Louis XV palaces, with sanded paths and shrubs on the roof. If the trustees had courage, they might set on foot such a study of the causes of the World War as was made of the Balkan Wars. They might undertake an international campaign in behalf of compulsory arbitration. They might . . . but what's the use? They have squandered seven million dollars on harmless trifles, and fourteen years hence, doubtless, a still older group of trustees will report another seven million spent as timidly and with as little vision.

Shed a Tear for the Klan

WHILE most good citizens are rejoicing in the decline of the poor old Ku Klux Klan, should not a few of us pause to let fall a tear of joy in memory of one service rendered by that mystic and invisible empire? Doubtless many weighty charges may properly be laid at the glate of its klavern; but one argument may be adduced in its favor before the record is closed—that it helped, in its unwitting way, to save America from falling into the hands of a dictatorial fascism.

The war years, from 1917 to 1919, filled the souls of our regimentalists, military, political, and industrial, with a great joy: America was under discipline! That fact they were to remember later—with its poignant recall of some few brief and fleeting moments of great beauty. The so-called "peace years," from 1919 to 1921, were years of the Great Fear: fear of Russia and the revolution; fear of the alien; fear of the workers and the labor unions; fear of ideas—to follow the analysis of our fears made by S. K. Ratcliffe in the Hibbert Journal. In the presence of the Great Fear it seemed possible to retain the Great Discipline of the war years; or failing that, to find a new regimentation for our national life. "America must be saved!"

Meanwhile arose before our eyes the Great Example. As early as 1918 Mussolini, who had once had ideas and therefore knew the danger of them, began to organize the Fasci in Italy. He enrolled a million members, robed them in black shirts, gave them the symbol of ancient Rome, and early in 1922 was ready to declare war on all radicals and liberals—in the name of national discipline. "Democracy," said he, "has failed in Italy. This is the Day of the Dictatorship."

Many in America had the same great idea. "Constitutional Leagues" sprang up everywhere—offering by unconstitutional methods to uphold the Constitution. The Better America Federation wanted to fill all the jails on the West Coast; the National Security League waited the call on the East Coast. The desire to regulate other people's loyalties was well-nigh universal. Our attorneys general—Palmer and Daugherty both—specialized in Red Dangers.

Late in 1922 some heroic resident of heroic Boston organized the Sentinels of the Republic. Sentinels stand no nonsense. Yet for some reason, the "dictatorship" did not happen. The "great, ignorant mass" of the people went right on—as if the revolution were not at our doors. It seemed, at times, to some of our patriots, as if the country were scarcely worth saving!

Finally, in April, 1923, Brigadier General Charles G. Dawes, who had sworn fluently in Flanders and elsewhere, came to the rescue. By this time Mussolini had made himself impregnable in Rome. Dawes dallied not with "sentinels." Harking back to our own ancient times, he organized his "minute men," gave them white cockades for their hats, put obedience into their souls, order into their ranks, and dared the enemies of the country to "come out and show themselves." That was a great day—that twenty-sixth of April, 1923.

Why did the dictatorship never come? Partly, at least, because of the Ku Klux Klan. As early as 1920 it had begun to exploit the Great Fear, to capitalize the American desire for discipline, to develop the technique of regulating other people's affairs, devoting special attention to those great undisciplined groups, the Catholics, Jews, and Negroes. The Klan had provided for its members a magniloquent set of names and titles; had clothed them in the self-righteousness of a white, Nordic, and Protestant god, and had put white-hooded robes on them to keep that self-righteousness unspotted from the world; it had done the typically American thing of selling shares in the enterprise at ten dollars per. It was anciently supposed that the Kingdom of Heaven was without price; but for a share in this specially reserved Nordic heaven ten dollars seemed ridiculously low.

Thus the Klukers, two or three years ahead of all other would-be dictators, had introduced the dictatorship into private life without troubling to set up a visible government. They had skimmed the cream off the Great Fear, taken the profit out of the Great Discipline, irretrievably caricatured the Great Example. There was no chance for black shirts. Thousands of patriots were already parading in the nobler white robes, enforcing discipline by night, terrorizing communities, smashing the laws in the name of "The Law." No other performance could possibly compete with this in existence; no other fascism could win the limelight.

So, Gentle Reader, drop a tear of gratitude; the Klan took the cash, and beat all the other "sentinels" and "minute men" and extra-legal defenders of their own interpretations of America. For such service, real, if unintentional, who would deny the tribute of a tear?

Officers or Gentlemen?

PERHAPS—only perhaps—the ultimate absurdity in censorship has been reached. The Mayor of New York, upon receiving the other day a complaint from officers of the navy and the Marine Corps that a new and very successful play, "What Price Glory?", tended to bring ridicule and reproach upon the United States army, promptly invited a major general and a rear admiral to sit in judgment on the piece. To the obvious question raised by the Evening World and other papers—What right have the objects of a satire to pass upon the right of that satire to live, and in particular what necessity is there for generals and admirals to be called in as critics of literature?—Mr. Hylan replied with a beautiful piece of official logic: "Do you object to such a procedure? Would you go to a lawyer if your heart was bad; and would you go to a physician if you were anxious to ascertain whether you had deliberately libeled an honest citizen?" Of course not. Nor would you go to Ed Wynn and the Dolly Sisters with a request that they stand and review your army. You go to a physician if your heart is bad, and you go either to the critics or to the people if your play is said to be bad. In the present case both the critics and the people had pronounced the patient sound. The reviewers were clamorous in their praise, and as for the audiences—it is sufficient to say that the censors had to buy their seats from speculators.

Needless to record, the objections to "What Price Glory?" were not only irrelevant but childish. The scene of the play is a marine encampment in France, and the characters, both officers and men, are gloriously rough-spoken; incidentally they manifest greater interest in a French barkeeper's daughter than they do in the abstract principle of democracy or the autonomy of small states. The offended officials, who might be pardoned for their ignorance of the fact that anybody knows the army to be the source and center of picturesque swearing, but who must be aware that headlines were once full of Go-to-hell-Whittlesey and are now full of Hell-and-Maria Dawes, were pained to find "the words hell, Jesus, damn, etc., used continually"—though almost in the same breath they expressed their outrage because General Pershing's military police in Paris were called "Sunday-school boys" and the members of the intelligence division were called "damned Bible scholars." All this, together with the picture of uproar and confusion at the front which the play presented, the martial critics feared would stop recruiting. After seeing the performance, the rear admiral is reported to have said, "no mother would allow her son to enter army or marine life." Perhaps not; but what of the orphaned youths who might be won to this pell-mell, robust existence—surely a more attractive one than that to be found on any marine poster, where stiff, smiling boys in choke-collars stand on duty under remote, improbable palm trees?

After all, why is the military so sensitive? Is it afraid that there will never be another war, when laughter can be stopped by law and patriotism be summoned to sit on satire? For four loud years it had its innings. It strutted and bluffed until all but a few were frightened. Now can it not sink decently into its back seat?

It has long been known that soldiers have no sense of humor; must it be added that they do not even know where they belong?

Ted Jr.

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

Merits

HE is extremely industrious. As Assistant Secretary of the Navy he has worked almost without vacation. He is helped as a worker by the happy fact that he frequently, or perhaps habitually, eats no lunch. In place of lunch he can play a game of squash and return to his desk. He has given his job at Washington a high degree of steady, staunch service.

He is frank. He frankly enjoys public life. He does not pretend that he has to be coaxed into it. He does not say: "If my fellow-citizens insist—" He virtually says: "If my fellow-citizens will let me—" Feeling that way about it, he does not talk any other way. He is not mealy-mouthed.

Frankly and earnestly desiring to be a public man, he works as hard at politicianeering as he has worked at administering. He does not give politics the silly slight of taking it superciliously or casually. Since he wishes to be in public life, and since politics is the avenue to public life, he takes politics seriously and attentively. He is not that hazardous thing—a politician amateur. He is a professional.

He has ideas for which he is willing to do battle.

Disbelieving in the injunction which Attorney General Daugherty brought against the railroad shopcraft strikers in 1922, he opposed it in discussions inside the Cabinet and outside the Cabinet. He did not oppose it tentatively. He opposed it flatly and outrightly and completely.

Thinking that labor should have a higher status, he has not hesitated before audiences of employers to defend the claim made by certain organizations of labor to a voice in the management of industry.

Believing in free speech he has picked out boil-'em-in-oil Republican clubs as suitable arenas for addresses by him unreservedly in favor of free speech—of free speech really free and utterly untrammeled.

Detesting religious intolerance, he has sought audiences of Masons to listen to his denunciations of the Ku Klux Klan.

Finding that people who agree with him about labor and about free speech do not so much agree with him about national defense, he makes strong speeches to them in favor of national defense.

Finding that people who agree with him about national defense do not so much agree with him about labor and free speech, he harangues them in favor of labor and in favor of free speech with special delighted zeal.

While not ready to die for every idea that he holds, he is ready to do battle for certain of his ideas firmly and unremittingly.

Working within the Republican Party, he conceives it to be his task to choose points on which the Republican Party can be made more "liberal."

He brings to politics and to government a mind well disciplined and well stored. He reads. He studies.

Finally, he is cultivated. He reads belles lettres as well as economics and politics. He can quote Praed and Father Prout aptly. He has incessant humor of his own. He is not a mere political specialist without a background. He centers on politics from a quite spacious rounding of the humanities.

Faults

HE is gladiatorial. He likes to dazzle the populace with his sword-play. He likes to be crowned with olives and laurels and palms and all other growths with which crowning is done.

He will not often in public affairs do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame. He is extremely far from medieval Christian prayer for deserving being known and remaining unknown.

He has a pagan love of glory and of fame.

Along with patriotism, he has egoism. Along with an heroic disregard for the pains and penalties of the march toward fame, he has a demonic passion for the march.

Marching, he sometimes is too careless as to who they are that march with him.

He was careless about Albert B. Fall.

That Roosevelt would knowingly have hurt the navy by any harmful disposition of its oil supplies would seem to be a contradiction in terms. The word Roosevelt and the phrase national defense are identicalities. Even if it might be thought that Roosevelt would go over to the Treasury Department and steal a bar of gold bullion, it would remain unthinkable that he would knowingly hurt the navy or the army or the national guard or the boy scouts. Any part of national defense is dearer to Roosevelt than—I will not say his life; for that would be with him a small matter; but than—his ambition.

His fault in the naval oil-reserve matter was that he accepted a political and personal close acquaintanceship with Mr. Fall and did not watch Mr. Fall closely enough for possible scandals likely to be produced by Mr. Fall's notorious anti-conservationism.

Mr. Fall was an anti-Leaguer. So was Roosevelt. Mr. Fall had views of labor that led him to oppose the Daugherty injunction. So had Roosevelt. There were many links of congeniality between the old man and the young man. The young man marched on while the old man and Mr. Denby signed leases which, however technically defensible by certain sorts of oil experts, were clouded by circumstances which the young man should have penetrated.

The fault was a fault of excessive easiness in acquaintanceship. Senator Walsh of Montana acquitted Roosevelt of crime. Roosevelt is not charged with crime. He is charged with having missed an opportunity positively—and spectacularly—to defend the public domain on behalf of Rooseveltian unrelenting conservation. When he reflects that it might have been done spectacularly, he must indeed be repentant of his error and be minded never to repeat it.

He has to please the many. Between pleasing the many and pleasing the few, all moral considerations being equal, he will always twiddle his fingers at the few and turn to the "thumbs up" or "thumbs down" of the many.

Trustful friendship will depart from him with his youth. There will remain ambition, patriotic, egoistic, serving self, serving the state, meriting well of the republic, with merits crowned by the many.

Aristocrat and militarist they call him now. Gladiator and demagogue a different "they" will ultimately call him.

Canada's Publicly Owned Electrical Power

By HARRY W. LAIDLER

"GOOD morning, Judge." It is the Hydro News of July, 1924, Canada's tiniest monthly, speaking. The "judge" addressed is the citizen of Winnipeg. Winnipeg has a public electric-light plant and a private plant. The private plant has been hard pressed of late by its public competitor. Its promoters didn't like it and wrote a scathing rebuke, accusing the Hydro Commission of besmirching the fair name of Winnipeg, of hindering the city's growth. The Hydro News, official organ of the municipal plant, thus replies:

> "Unfair competition"—to supply current in your home at the lowest rate on the continent; "hurtful publicity"—to advertise in every corner of the earth that any private enterprise locating in Winnipeg is not at the mercy of the Power Monopoly, but is guaranteed a dependable abundance of electrical energy at the cheapest rates in North America; "Reactionary force that Hampers and Hinders"—to keep a system at highest efficiency, to increase its capacity fourfold, to lay by reserves of four millions of dollars out of earnings, to save citizens sixteen millions of dollars in rates, to build the first Central Heating Plant in Canada? Hurtful publicity? Reactionary force Hampering and Hindering?
>
> Citizens, you are the judge.

This reply gives in a nutshell the startling results of Winnipeg's experiment in the generation and distribution of hydro-electric power during the past dozen years. Until 1906 the citizens of Winnipeg had been paying about 20 cents per kilowatt hour for electricity for domestic lighting purposes. They felt that this was too much. They voted to build their own plant at the Point du Bois, some seventy miles from the city. No sooner had this decision been reached than down went the price charged by the private company one-half. It was announced: "The rates henceforth for domestic lighting will be ten cents per kilowatt hour."

This reduction shelves the municipal plant, thought the company, for good and all. But the people went ahead and built their plant. The plant was opened in 1911. Instead of ten cents the charge was 3½ cents per k.w.h. During the war everything in Winnipeg increased in price except electricity. Following the war, in 1922, the price was still further reduced, an average charge of one cent being made for electrical heating in the home. This made an average for lighting and heating of 2½ cents per k.w.h. As a result of this rate, and of an extraordinary promotion campaign, the municipal Power Commission of Winnipeg now supplies 7,000 electrical ranges in that city with heat, the average electrical cooking bill being but $2.82 net per month. Winnipeg has the proud reputation of harboring more electrical ranges than any other city in the world.

Nor have the low rates led to bankruptcy. By January, 1924, the citizens of Winnipeg had in their possession a plant costing $13,000,000, with a potentiality of 100,000 horse-power. The total reserves now approximate 25 per cent of the assets of $17,681,000 and are equivalent to one-third of the money invested in the property.

In addition there has been a revenue surplus of over $337,000. The plant pays its municipal taxes, while its contribution to the Pension Fund and the Workmen's Compensation Board exceeded, in 1923, $30,000. And throughout its career the commission has shown an initiative and enterprise in the development of all phases of its work which many sage economists attribute only to private profiteers.

But Winnipeg's experiment in public ownership of hydro-electric power plants is a mere bagatelle when compared with the stupendous development in Ontario, a development which includes within its scope some 360 cities and towns. During the closing years of the last century groups of citizens in various parts of Ontario woke up to the fact that the industrial and agricultural life of the province had a remarkable chance for development. That development, however, depended primarily on the province's ability to obtain an adequate supply of power at low cost. The province was without coal resources, but Niagara Falls was at its very doors. How best could hydro-electric energy be secured from the Niagara River and distributed to the people? The anthracite strike of 1902, which placed in jeopardy many of Canada's industries, brought this question to the forefront of public discussion. The following year seven municipalities appointed an investigating committee to make a survey of the entire situation. The committee reported in 1906, and in this same year the provincial fathers appointed the now famous Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario with unusual authority—with power to buy outright or hold shares in existing electric plants; power to acquire land, water privileges, and water-power machinery; power to generate and distribute electrical energy to the people of the province. But it did more than appoint a commission. It appointed as chairman of the commission the most active advocate of publicly owned hydro-electric power in Canada, a man of indomitable will and energy and of rare singleness of purpose—Adam, now Sir Adam Beck.

The commission began its career by supplying to thirteen municipalities a small initial load of less than 1,000 horse-power. It first purchased its electrical energy from one of the already existing private companies, the Ontario Power Company. By 1914 the small load of 1,000 horse-power had increased to 77,000, and by 1917 the commission found it necessary to make an outright purchase of the Ontario Power Company with its 160,000 horse-power, and subsequently (1920) of the Toronto Power Company with its plant of 125,000 horse-power—two of the three big power plants on the Canadian side of Niagara Falls.

These hydro-electric plants are within a stone's throw of Niagara Falls. The water, taken from the Niagara River above the falls, has a drop of somewhat over a hundred feet before reaching the turbines. The commission soon came to the conclusion that this did not make for the most effective use of the available water-power, as the total fall of the Niagara River from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario is more than 300 feet.

Sir Adam Beck and his coworkers thus set about the problem of utilizing the greatest possible amount of total fall and at the same time of supplying the demand which they felt would inevitably result in the not distant future. They built an intake structure above Niagara Falls at Chippawa. For a distance of one and a half miles they deepened and widened the Welland River from Chippawa to Montrose. They then cut through a canal over eight miles to Queenston, excavating in so doing some seventeen million cubic feet of rock and earth, and lining the canal throughout with concrete. Then came the triangular forebay, into which the water rushed from the canal; the tubes, into which the forebay emptied, and the great turbines of the power house, 305 feet below, situated in the power house on the edge of the river at the bottom of the gorge. The Chippawa-Queenston development is the greatest single hydro-electric development in the world. Even its opponents are forced to pronounce it a "wonderful conception."

Since commencing operations the commission has also purchased no less than twenty water-powers, thirty hydraulic generating plants, and over sixty electrical distributing stations; operations which, when fully developed, will have a potentiality of 1,000,000 horse-power. The "hydro" cities which have come into partnership with the provincial commission have increased from a mere handful in 1906 to 360 in 1924, while the number of horse-power actually distributed to these cities has jumped from 1,000 to nearly 700,000. The property owned by the public is now valued at the colossal sum of $250,000,000. And still the operations of the commission and of the partner municipalities grow. Even now plans are being laid for the development of the Canadian side of the St. Lawrence River with its 800,000 potential horse-power.

The partnership plan between the provincial commission and the municipalities is a unique one. An Ontario city council decides to distribute electricity to its citizens. It writes to the commission. It asks that one of the commission's experts be sent to the town to estimate the cost of installing a local distributing system. The estimate is given. The municipality issues bonds to cover the cost of its local system, the bonds to be retired in twenty or thirty years, and contracts with the commission for the transmission of electricity at cost to the city limits.

The local distributing system is built under the supervision of the commission. The municipalities have complete control over the local distribution, charging a rate approved by the commission. The commission in turn has charge of the building of central plants and transmission lines to the borders of municipalities, and of securing the capital required for construction purposes from the Provincial Government. The charge made by the commission to the cities covers not only the actual expense involved in generating and transmitting electrical energy, but a sum for depreciation, for interest on its loans, and for a sinking fund for the retirement of its bonds. The enterprise is thus made to pay for itself without imposing a burden on the taxpayer. If, at the end of the year, it is found that the commission has charged the municipalities more than is necessary to pay the cost of operation, a refund is made to them.

Has this public enterprise made good? It has had its bitter opponents. A few years ago they were in control of the legislature. They appointed an investigating commission, known as the Gregory Commission. This body spent a half-million dollars sending their agents all over the province. On March 13, 1924, it made public a summary of its report. The summary began:

> The principle of public ownership of water-powers of the province and their development by the people, for the people is, in our opinion, fundamentally sound and should be maintained at all hazards in its full integrity. . . . That the organization of the commission is financially sound there is not a shadow of a doubt. The engineering department of the commission is made up of men of high professional qualifications as engineers, and as such they are serving the commission zealously and efficiently. The various plants of the commission are exceptionally well operated by them.

The Ontario undertaking has meant a saving of millions of dollars to the consumer. Sir Adam Beck maintained before the Public Ownership League Conference last year that it had already saved no less than $100,000,000 to the people of the province in reduced charges alone. The residence charge for lighting per k.w.h. in twelve of the large cities in the province varied in 1923 anywhere from 1.1 to 2.6 cents. The charge in Toronto, ninety miles from the falls, was 2.1 cents; in London, 132 miles away, 1.6 cents. In nine out of twelve of the chief cities electricity for domestic lighting purposes may be bought for less than two cents per k.w.h. Before the days of the "hydro," residents in these cities were paying anywhere from seven cents to twenty-five cents per k.w.h., over three times the present charge. In 1922 in only one city containing more than 1,000 consumers was the charge more than five cents. And yet the "hydro" municipalities were able in 1923 to set aside a surplus of over $1,000,000.

The advantages of "hydro" are not confined to the housewives in industrial centers. "Hydro" has been a real factor in lightening the burden on the farms. In an effort to bring electricity to the farmer, the Provincial Government has voted to pay 50 per cent of the cost of all construction of rural lines. On many a farm in Ontario one finds not only the housewife enjoying a new emancipation with her various electrical appliances, but the farmer easing his strenuous existence by means of electrical milking machines and cream separators and water pumps and churns, saws, threshers, etc. The monthly bill for the "lighter farm service" ranges between $6 and $8. In few of the farm communities where "hydro" has gone would a private corporation have ventured. There is no immediate money in it.

The Ontario development has brought into the hands of the people a great property valued at more than $250,000,000, a property which will have been fully paid for in the course of a generation, with little or no direct tax on the people. Over fifty municipalities have even now piled up surpluses equal to their capital obligations and are virtually out of debt. When the bonded debt in the cities is paid off, the charge for electricity can be further redueed.

The undertaking has been operated without the graft which almost inevitably attends the leasing or selling of public resources to private individuals. The recent investigating body gave high praise to the financial methods employed by the commission and failed to discover any evidence of dishonest dealings. The commission has shown unusual energy and imagination in its operations. Too great initiative, not too little, has been the chief charge against it.

The commission has made mistakes—mistakes in estimating costs of building plants, mistakes in the amount placed aside for the retirement of bonds, mistakes in the handling of labor and legislators; but, when all has been said and done, its work and that of its cooperating municipalities have demonstrated conclusively the great advantages of public over private ownership and administration of the sources and distribution of electrical energy.

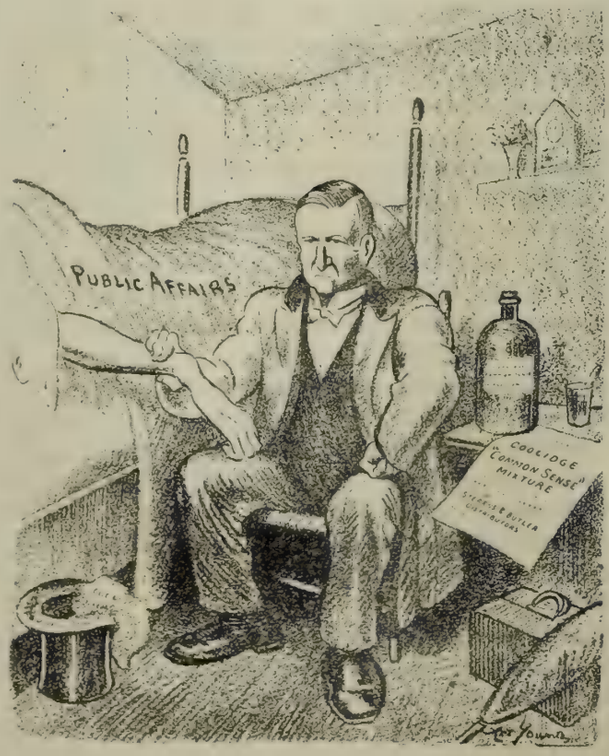
Looking On

by

Art Young

The Supreme Court's Back Yard

The Misfit



A Village Doctor

He gets a reputation for wisdom through seldom saying anything

The Greased Wheels of Diplomacy

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, August 26

CHERCHEZ LE PÉTROLE has become as universal and inevitable an explanation of the comedies and tragedies of international relations as Cherchez la femme is of human relations. The question of Japanese recognition of Russia, involving as it does a new alignment of political forces in the Far East, is purely a question of oil. Japan, fortunately, is quite cynical about the matter. Tokio statesmen make no hypocritical effort to clothe themselves in a mantle of high-sounding phrases. If you want peace on the Pacific and our recognition, they say to Moscow, you must give us the oil of Sakhalin.

Four countries and one private party are interested in Sakhalin oil: Russia, which owns the oil; Japan, which wants the oil; Harry F. Sinclair, who has a concession for it; Great Britain, which supports a rather flimsy pre-war claim of the Shell Company; and the United States.

Nippon troops occupied Northern Sakhalin (Southern Sakhalin was ceded to Japan as a result of the Russo-Japanese War) in July, 1920, on the pretext of the alleged Nikolaiev massacre. The occupation is a rather unsavory morsel for our State Department. Secretary Colby protested against it. On May 31, 1921, Mr. Hughes told the Mikado's Government that we could "neither now nor hereafter recognize as valid any claims and titles arising out of the present occupation and control." (Mr. Hughes does not restrict his diplomatic support to the Standard Oil Company.) This position Mr. Hughes made even more emphatic at the Washington Arms Conference. When Baron Sidehara said that "the military occupation of the Russian province of Sakhalin is only a temporary measure and will naturally come to an end as soon as a satisfactory settlement of the question shall have been arranged with an orderly Russian Government," Mr. Hughes went further:

> The American delegation [he said] has also noted the assurance of Japan by her authorized spokesman that it is her fixed and settled policy to respect the territorial integrity of Russia, and to observe the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of that country, as well as the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations in every part of the Russian possessions. . . . The assurances are taken to mean that Japan does not seek . . . to set up an exclusive exploitation of the resources of Sakhalin.

Mr. Hughes's interest in the open door to oil resources has always been exceedingly keen. There is, of course, more than that to it. It is America's traditional policy to keep Japan out of Siberia, and Sakhalin is not only part of Siberia but it controls the entrance to the Amur River, which drains a large and rich section of Russia's Asiatic continent.

When Mr. Hughes returned from Europe this summer it was reported that he would devote much of his attention to the Far Eastern situation. The "Far Eastern situation" must mean to him China's recognition of Russia and Japan's threatening recognition of Russia. The secretary can attempt to throw a wrench into the workings of the one (for instance, by thwarting the joint Sino-Soviet operation of the Chinese Eastern Railway) and to prevent the other. But it is probably too late to effect the fate of the road, while as regards Japan he is between the devil and the deep sea. If he persuades Tokio to refuse Russia recognition he aids Japan in maintaining the occupation against which he himself has protested and which is not in America's interests; if he abstains from interfering he helps Soviet Russia, his bête noire, and contributes toward the isolation of the United States in the Far East. With China in an intense anti-America, anti-imperialist mood, with anti-Americanism growing in Japan, and with Russia under the anathema of our unrelenting Secretary of State, it would be small wonder indeed if both yellow nations were drawn more and more toward Russia. And in the ever-recurring friction between the United States and Japan, Russia, as a high official of the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs recently said to me, would under present conditions maintain a benevolent attitude toward Japan. Mr. Hughes may be proud of his record in office: he has alienated China, Russia, and Japan.

But for oil, Japan would already have recognized Russia. All other disputed points have been settled. Japan has admitted that sooner or later it must leave Northern Sakhalin. And Russia is prepared to give Japan a concession for oil the moment the evacuation is completed. Oil is a life-or-death question for the Nipponese navy. The archipelago itself has no appreciable petroleum resources and Japan has been buying most of its supply in California. This, obviously, is an undesirable procedure. Recently Japanese agents put in an appearance in Persia, where they probably learned to their sorrow that the Anglo-Persian and Sinclair had preceded them, and in Rumania, where the Standard Oil will probably manage to fence them off. Sakhalin thus becomes Japan's best and almost only bet.

The military cliques in Tokio would gladly keep Sakhalin for themselves. But the pressure of their own people and the odium of the world plus what is more important—the desire to keep Russia as a friend—has reconciled them and their Government to modified ownership in the form of a concession granted by Moscow.

The details of this concession are now the only bar to Japanese evacuation of Sakhalin and to Japanese recognition of Russia. For Russia the problem is complicated by the presence of the Sinclair Oil Company. In January, 1923, the Soviet Government finally approved an oil-and-gas concession to the Sinclair company in Northern Sakhalin. It virtually gives Sinclair monopoly rights. Obviously, however, if Sinclair insists on the fulfilment of his contract he will get nothing, for should Karakhan say to Yoshizawa, the Japanese envoy in Peking, "We cannot give you a concession because all the oil has been promised to Sinclair," Yoshizawa would reply, "Let Sinclair come and get it. We shall not evacuate." Accordingly Moscow has proposed a tripartite arrangement between Russia, Sinclair, and Japan. This suggestion was first made public in a leading editorial in the Izvestia, the official organ of the Soviet Government. Mr. Veach, the vice-president, and Mason Day, the European representative of the Sinclair Oil, came to Moscow several weeks ago to discuss this question with officials here. To be sure, these clever gentlemen tried to tell journalists that the editorial in the Izvestia did not express the views of the Government and that they knew nothing of a tripartite proposal, but I have it from a prominent member of the Foreign Office collegium that when Messrs. Veach and Day left the bolshevik capital several days ago they were fairly well satisfied that Sinclair would have to accept the proposal, especially since the Government has the right, according to the same official, to cancel the Sinclair concession on the ground that the company has not lived up to some of its technical requirements.

Meantime, Karakhan laid the tripartite proposal before Yoshizawa. Yoshizawa rejected it and presented a counter-proposal. Japan, he said, wants a monopoly concession for ninety-nine years. It will pay Russia 5 per cent of the oil produced. (Persia gets 16 per cent from the Anglo-Persian.) Moreover, and this is the most impossible of these impossible demands, Japan insists on the suspension in Sakhalin of Soviet labor laws. Russia, of course, flatly refused the offer, and Yoshizawa sent to Tokio for further instructions. This is the state of affairs today.

However, it is the general view here that a compromise agreement on the basis of the tripartite proposal will soon be effected and that de jure recognition will follow it. In fact, there is a suspicion in some quarters that Japan has already begun a slow and secret evacuation of Sakhalin. The Tokio Cabinet has nothing to gain from continued occupation but enmity in Russia and disfavor at home. Evacuate they must. They are committed to it. It remains only to haggle over the price. For a while Japan gambled on Russia's diplomatic position in Europe. Would the Anglo-Soviet conference fail? Would the Russo-German conflict end in disaster and humiliation for the Bolsheviks? Would Herriot rebuff Moscow? Japan would then be able to strike a better bargain on the Pacific. Accordingly Japan engaged in the well-known game of killing time. Yoshizawa has been commuting between Peking and Tokio. No sooner does Karakhan ask him a question than he runs to his capital "for instructions." And on one occasion he even went on an excursion to Sakhalin, ostensibly to discover whether evacuation was feasible. But the cards are apparently stacked against Japan, and the yellow statesmen may make haste in order to anticipate a further unfavorable turn of events. In every respect time is on the side of Russia.

Still, as Radich, the Croat leader, once said, militarists are always stupid and the worse their position grows the more stupid they become. Those in Tokio may protract the negotiations with Russia until cold weather makes evacuation impossible. Then the troops will have to remain until next spring. What useful purpose such tactics may serve it is difficult to imagine, for, at present, very little oil is being taken out of the island.

The Chinese Student Mind

By PEARL S. BUCK

IT is a common human failing to believe that the particular group of people upon whom one is voluntarily expending one's chief energies are necessarily the most interesting and worth-while folk in the world. I stand sometimes before one of my classes of ninety-odd Chinese college students and am almost convinced that they are a band of young Gideons. I seem to see unquenchable fires in their eyes and a determination in their young faces which warms my heart, cold after so many years of contact with Oriental habits of squeeze and face-saving. I find myself repeating that old Israelitish war-cry: "Surely the Lord and the sword of Gideon can do it."

Yet in saner moments I am quite well aware that to an unprejudiced Occidental eye these young men would appear rather a lack-luster group. They are seldom beautiful, physically, and they run to stoop shoulders and adenoids and a general tendency to snuffling colds in the head. They have a deplorable inclination to a complete blankness of mind and facial expression, especially when called upon to recite, and their English is at once pathetic and extremely delightful. Nevertheless, as I grow into something approaching a closer understanding of these young persons and others like them I begin to be more deeply convinced than ever of their essential importance in the scheme of things in China today, and through China to the world.

They are told so, often enough, in all conscience. Every great or near-great man from the West who is asked to lecture to them thunders forth that the students are the hope of China, and then goes on to hint tactfully or otherwise of his grave fears that the hope is but a weak reed unless, etc., etc. Well, they are the hope of China, of course. But it seems to me from where I sit in the gallery of our little college chapel that the set of their backs is rather drooping and their upturned faces a little anxious as they listen. I wonder if secretly they do not grow a little weary, sometimes, with the weight of this amorphous, floundering, old country forever being thrown upon their slender and inexperienced shoulders. Anyway, I wish these successful and famous men from the prosperous West would speak less often of poor, old China's faults and hopeless failures, and would send forth to these young people a more heartening message of courage for the future.

For the preeminent need of the Chinese student of this generation is encouragement.

Perhaps if the minds of these students could be dissected we should find that they could be classified into three fairly distinct stages of development: first, a complete bewilderment with the modern trend of affairs; second, a profound depression and pessimism; and third, a bitter determination to win somehow in the end and wrest at least a sort of order out of the chaos we call China.

I suppose a great many of them never get beyond the first stage. I am afraid to think how many, lest I be discouraged too, and give them all up and go to making my fortune somewhere. Anyway a lot of them. They get altogether bemazed in the sort of world in which they find themselves. Their rather slow minds are not able to digest or even grasp a tenth of the scintillating modern ideas presented to them at every turn; and after a brief period of struggle they subside into a quiescent state and become absorbed in the minuteness of daily living and pleasures. From then on they never more concern themselves with either the good or the evil of the times into which their country has fallen, except as such times affect their own daily bowls of rice and the roof above their heads, and whether or not they can maintain their "face" by buying a silk gown at New Year.

Such as these are found everywhere; some are thin and ill-clad, contriving this way and that to get a better-paying job with a minimum of work attached, and stooping to anything. Others, having stooped more successfully, grow portly and bestial, and one may see their like on the streets in any Chinese city, waddling out of a handsomely carved gateway and then being propelled from the rear by a lackey into a chair or carriage or even an automobile. Their thick bodies are encased in heavy brocaded satins and exquisite furs, and their fat hands are soft and pulpy like unwholesome white spiders. "Their god is their stomach."

Here is the tragedy which every true teacher fears may befall him: that for a lifetime devoted to his high calling he will see in spite of himself only these empty husks of human beings for his harvest!

Perhaps no one, save those who have grown up in China and remember what China was and can perceive just how much of the old China is still here, can have any real conception of the difficulties which beset the students here just now. They are caught as helpless victims between the impact of two totally different civilizations. Their parents have taught them one set of values. They have been trained in the conservatism, obedience, and dependence of the old patriarchal system of family life. From birth it has been impressed upon them that they are Chinese and males and therefore invincibly superior. They have always been given special privileges as males, and have therefore received the best possible education, the best possible clothes and perquisites which the family finances could procure, and, in addition, anything else they could reasonably demand or unreasonably desire. They are imbued with the comfortable conviction that they are promising young citizens of the Middle Kingdom of the World.

Since it is a widespread belief and a fact, I think, that a modern education is advisable if one is to be in the financial game in China today, these young sprigs are sent to school, and they pour in hordes into any school that teaches English. Then comes the shock. They come with all the inheritance and training of calm, indolent, arrogant, and self-satisfied old China. Straightway there falls upon them a modern civilization which does not at all admire the old, and which is nervous, tense, energetic, and iconoclastic.

A thousand new and astounding ideas pull them every which way—ideas which are apparently quite irreconcilable with those with which their minds have been previously furnished. They are deluged with Bolshevism; not by their teachers, to be sure, but by all the insidious forces of the red flag working indefatigably in the schools here nowadays.

They hear, on the other hand, the missionary proclaiming his religion as the only hope for a degenerate China. Yet it seems to them almost impossible to find out what the essential principles of Christianity are, for they vary, apparently, with different schools of thought. Many of the students in mission institutions get a vague idea that all Westerners are Christians and that the Western countries are Edens of pure delight. Then, here in the port cities, they see those white people who live so besottedly that one hates to call them human beings for the sake of the rest of us. Or along comes the Great War and international jealousies and land-grabbing, and the student begins to see what spheres of influence really are, and indemnities and retributive measures and all the rest of it. He finds out that America, even America, is pouring morphine into China through Japan; and England, not to be left behind, is hastening with extra supplies of opium; and, after all, cigarettes are more successful than the Gospel. He is bewildered.

He who has always been taught the sacredness of family unity and the desirability of posterity hears for the first time that China, "this vast, fertile paradise," as one of my young students put it in his patriotic fervor, is actually overpopulated and that birth control is the only saving principle. He sees with bulging eyes the peculiar marital relationships of many visitors from the West, who to all appearances are educated, cultured, accepted. He becomes yet more bewildered. Indeed, the whole question of the relation of the sexes, the inevitable reaction against the old constrictions, the desire for a really workable code of morals and social contacts, is, of course, as commonly agitated here as in the most modern country of the West—perhaps more so—and is having no small part in the perplexities of the student consciousness in China at present. They realize that their own system of segregation and compulsory marriage is far from ideal. They dislike the idea of enforced polygamy.

"Oh, that American marriage law to be in China!" exclaims one young junior in his weekly theme. "That Chinese could only one wife! Thusly we could have a considerable family calmness in the Chinese home, because too many wifes makes a family eloquence."

Yet a week later he came to my office in trouble to find out if a statement of the divorce situation in the United States which he had seen in a paper was true. If so, then something was wrong there too. There was nothing to tell him but the truth, and he went away surprised and perplexed.

Again, to these students, fresh from the old-fashioned treatment of women in their homes, to whom the touch of a decent girl's hand has been impossible and unthought of—to these students comes the shock of the modern dance. It is rather disheartening that out of all the richness of our American life this debated thing, the modern dance, should be brought back by the returned students. I cannot pretend to judge whether or not dancing as it is done today is a profitable pastime in the West. I have been away far too many years for that. But I do know that it is desperately dangerous for these Chinese lads, who have not had the slightest experience of contact with the opposite sex to prepare them, and whose puzzled souls are balanced perilously enough as it is between the right and wrong of things.

Mah jong is probably neither better nor worse morally than a hundred other games, but it has always been associated with evil in China, at least. "A Chinese family who possesses a set of mah jong is considered questionable," declared a Chinese friend one day, an educated and cultured gentleman, who was as astonished as the callowest student over the recent craze among foreigners.

It is not to be marveled at, then, that among all these contradictory leaderships and ideas the credulous student is utterly befogged. And, as if that were not enough, he is administered Western education in solid and undiluted lumps. Foreign methods, foreign religion, foreign culture and customs are ladled out to him in a totally unadapted form. Said one of my pupils, quaintly, the other day: "So far as I have heard, God has built His country in America for many years, but still American life is very indigestible to us. Why is this?"

Why, indeed! It will take more than the stoutest digestion, I fear, to accomplish the assimilation.

Each year I watch sorrowfully the mental and spiritual deaths. I meet their bodies sometimes, later, as plump money lenders or pompous magistrates; but we seldom recognize each other, for the lad I knew in each was not strong enough to live and it is too keen a pain to see only the earthy flesh left.

This is why I rejoice when out of the bewildered ones emerge a smaller group of those who are able to struggle through even to so discouraging a thing as pessimism. Healthy pessimism in the young sometimes results in a right-about-face and a new start.

It is certainly not to be disputed that the Chinese students today are deeply affected by a prevailingly pessimistic state of mind. With some this is expressed in an unwonted recklessness and indulgence in hitherto forbidden habits and pleasures and dissipations: a carpe diem sort of philosophy to which the young anywhere are especially prone. With others it has resulted in a wounded national pride and a sullen refusal to acknowledge or even see national or individual faults; and in some cases there is even a distinct anti-foreign feeling. With a blessed, chosen few it has resulted in a facing of facts and a wholesome humbling of spirit and a determination to get the best they can from the West and keep the best they have of their own.

There are, however, four distinct causes for this present attitude of pessimism.

Perhaps one primary cause has been the practical failure of the student movement in China. That this movement was a spiritual success is not to be denied. It was the supreme moment in many a student's life when he could and did rise to the height of denouncing the greed and sinister deeds of his government. Pathetic children they were, futilely crying and righteously indignant against those who should have been their leaders and protectors; kin to those other children who fought eagerly and trustfully to make the world safe for democracy and died for it. Both failed. It was a modern Children's Crusade.

Practically, the students failed to change government policies in the slightest degree, and they seem to have laid down their weapons. Nothing shows this more clearly than the utter silence with which they have met the news of the last disgraceful presidential election. I heard only one remark. "With $10,000,000 he bought this one chair. Now he fears no man."

It is the silence of despair.

A second reason for this attitude of pessimism, however, may be their apparent lack of ability to persevere in any line of action in attacking their problems. This is partly youth and partly an inherent racial characteristic. They tend too much to starting off with firecrackers, speech-making, and a high-sounding name, and then impetus seems to be dissipated and the attention drawn off to other things. Possibly it is a lack of deep-seated convictions. They do certainly tend to lack convictions. One seldom sees the fiery vocational enthusiasms such as Western students have, where a boy will be a doctor or engineer or what not against tremendous odds and at the cost of heroic efforts. Here they seem to choose most often from expediency and convenience, and I have known an annual chemistry fee of six dollars to be the deciding factor in whether or not a boy would be a teacher or a doctor. The small margin on which they live is partly responsible for this, of course.

Whatever the cause, they are incorrigible promoters. They are forever starting agricultural societies and mutual improvement societies and temperance societies and anti-Japanese societies and dozens of others. Most of these die of general inanition, and then are reorganized with more firecrackers and speeches into something else. Magazines have sprouted up like weeds all over the country—radical magazines, so-called scientific magazines, literary magazines, short-story magazines—a fascinating kaleidoscopic mirror of student mind and thought. These magazines continue with great fervor for a short time and then they are no more. Three months seems to be the average life-time, with an occasional belated and tottering fourth issue. Again, part of it is youth; part of it is lack of sufficient technical knowledge; part of it is natural lack of stick-to-itiveness.

A third cause for this pessimism is the fact that many of these young men are just beginning to fathom the real depths to which their country has fallen. They have inherited from their ancestors the firm and unconsciously arrogant belief in the natural superiority of China. She has always been the Middle Kingdom, or, as the old sages had it, "the yolk of the egg round which the other nations cluster as the white." They have had a pride, and a rightful pride, in China's civilization, in her history, and in her achievements. But doubts are beginning to come. There are other large countries richer and more prosperous. There are other civilizations which seem to have had more desirable and practical results; other religions, even, which seem to have produced a more general honesty and morality. Evidently the rest of the world does not seem to regard China as the yolk of the egg at all, and on examination she really does not seem to be.

More alarming to them than this is a realization that they do not seem to be able to produce the honest and able leaders which they need so sorely—leaders who can withstand the temptations of political life.

"Why do you not take a government position and show the people what a really honest official should be and do?" I asked a fine young Chinese graduate from Oberlin, who is marking time as a teacher in a small private school.

He hesitated a moment, then looked at me squarely, and replied: "Honestly, I am afraid of myself. There would be so many places where I could enrich myself privately that I would rather not subject myself to the temptation."

I respected him for his frankness, and yet sighed to know his statement was true. Love of money and power or "face," as it is called, is a universal temptation, all too seldom withstood. The continued graft and dishonest government, the lack of any trustworthy leaders is pricking the bubble of their self-conceit. They are beginning to ask: Is China not capable, then, of producing men?

Alas, perhaps the strongest cause for the deep-seated pessimism abroad among them is the discovery, especially since the war, of how very imperfect those countries are which they had hoped to use as models. Before the war there was at least no visible breakdown of civilization. The war, however, and the conditions continuing since, have made them realize sadly that even in those countries whence came the science and the technical skill they admire so much, and where Christianity has been so long, even there people are wrestling as bitterly as they themselves with much the same sort of unsolved problems. And these young people are thrown back upon themselves again, "sheep having no shepherd."

No one knows, except one who has it to do, how unspeakably difficult it is, since the war, for an Occidental to stand before these Orientals as a teacher. Of course the only way out of it is to confess our failures frankly, pointing out the reasons for them with a friendly warning to others in like situations, and to hold up our ideals as high as ever, struggling along as human beings, without the West posing as competent to be a leader in any way. It is the only possible road to self-respect or the respect of the Far East.

Taking out all these, then—the hopelessly bewildered, the hopelessly pessimistic and cynical, the reactionaries, all those who pass through the schools and colleges and cannot stand under the terrible truths of modern knowledge and times—there remain still the golden few. These are the real hope of China. They are bewildered, yes, but not lost; pessimistic, but not unto death. They have been able to keep hold of a burning determination to serve their country righteously, at all costs. Out of them will come one day a Lincoln who shall set his people free.

"Oh, if you can teach us this term, teach us something to make us hopeful!" cried a young woman in one of my classes in the large government college here.

It is the wistful cry of youth; a heartbreaking cry to those who hear it, for who has a right to hope if youth has not? And we who come from that West which has done so much to take away their hopefulness must give it back again in a courage strong enough for life as it must be lived in China today.

There is only one way in which we can give back courage to them, and that is by a renewed fellow-feeling and brotherhood. This can be expressed only in a more complete understanding, both individual and national, of China's present difficulties and a greater patience with her as she works out, slowly and painfully, her own salvation. I do believe that in this people there lie potentialities of power and spiritual leadership which, if rightly allowed to develop themselves, will as time goes on help to lift the world along.

A Reporter's Mirror

By W. G. CLUGSTON

WHY is the American newspaper more widely read than ever before in its history, yet more generally abused? Is something radically wrong with journalism of the present day? Many who give thought to the matter believe there is.

A high percentage of the newspapers that survive steadily grow stronger in a financial way and usually keep increasing their circulation totals, but politically not one of them is as powerful as the average newspaper once was. Although the "public press" is still supreme in the matter of making campaign issues and giving the people public questions to growl about, newspapers are not as potent today as they once were in making public men—in electing to office the candidates they support, and to obscurity the candidates they oppose. And it can hardly be denied that the newspapers are growing in disfavor among the labor groups and certain classes of farmers. Also, there are many lawyers, doctors, and educators, and even some writers, who freely and sometimes loudly express their lack of faith in the public press. So certainly there must be some ground for criticism and for investigation, even if nothing is fundamentally wrong.

I asked the managing editor of a well-known Middle-western newspaper the question: "What is wrong with American journalism?" He answered immediately: "If you mean the American newspaper, I would say there is too much scrambling for circulation and too much attention to policy, without enough attention to giving the news."

I asked a cub reporter on a paper that has a daily circulation of nearly 200,000 the same question. His reply was: "Those who buy them have been taught to believe newspapers are maintained to give the truth about the news as it happens, while those who make them have been taught to believe they are maintained to make money."

The charge Oscar Wilde made when he said that "journalism is unreadable and literature unread" hardly applies to the question as it is now being considered, because most of the criticism against the newspapers today is not that they are unreadable but that the news they contain is not reliable—not straight news. Newspaper owners usually employ writers who are capable of making their news readable; in fact, it is often the case that truth and accuracy are sacrificed for no other purpose than to make a news story readable.

A more pertinent criticism than that of Oscar Wilde was recently made by Henry Ford's weekly when the newspapers were being blamed for being parties to the morality scandals of the moving-picture colonies. Ford's paper brought in the following indictment:

> The most hopeless element in it all [the movie scandal] is that the newspapers know all this stuff beforehand, yet never lift a hand concerning it until it "breaks," as they say. And then they are tremendously indignant about it. But, of course, the newspapers, like the movies, are paying for this kind of betrayal. Public confidence in a newspaper is in direct ratio to its public service. The newspaper renders all kinds of propaganda service, but very few of them know what public service means.

Here we get at what I consider the worst barnacle on the belly of the octopus press: propaganda. Propaganda is the pack-horse used to carry most of the evils that get into the news and editorial columns—propaganda intended to warp the public mind so that a policy may be carried out, or an objective may be reached, which the owner of the paper, or the editor or reporter, may for any reason think worth while.

Our greatest national endeavors are to swing the public mind in certain directions—nationally, against Bolshevism and good booze and Senate investigations of corruption, and in favor of ship subsidies and the Mellon tax-plan and snake-doctor remedies for agricultural evils; locally, against municipal ownership of the electric-light plant and in favor of a bulk bond issue for general improvements. As we had the stone age and the iron age, so now we have the propaganda age. Under our form of government, and in our present stage of civilization, you can put over anything you desire if you put enough of the right kind of propaganda behind it. And newspapers far excel pulpiteers, paid chamber-of-commerce agitators, and public speakers in putting over propaganda. They demonstrated this to a Creel's taste during the Great War.

There are many enterprises and issues which newspaper owners feel compelled to favor for public or personal or political reasons, and many others of which they disapprove and desire their readers to disapprove. Is it not natural that they should use their papers to convince their readers they are right? The matter of the honesty of these owners need not be considered, nor their high or low purposes. It is only a question of whether they are not, perhaps, biting their own bodies with poison fangs and thus paralyzing themselves when they permit their news columns to be converted from news channels into propaganda sloughs, as many do.

But, even if the owner of a newspaper does not go in for propaganda and makes every effort to keep his paper clean and close to the truth, there still are scores of ways in which propaganda can and does creep into the columns. Editors have their prejudices and pets; so have reporters, who are the real makers of newspapers—the real journalists. A large part of the blame that is being heaped upon newspapers should go to the reporters. Their sins are frequently scarlet, even when they are employed by honest publishers who do not try to put policy and propaganda in the place of truth.

With few exceptions the ranks of reporters are made up of two classes: those who stay with their jobs of reporting because these jobs give them a chance to associate with successful business men without being successful; and those who having failed to become literary successes stay with reporting because writing news is the next best thing they can do when unable to earn their "ham and" by writing and selling literature.

The best reporters of the first class usually are leeches or grafters; those of the second class usually are sourheads and cynics. Most generally it is the reporter of the first class who "gets on" and becomes a "star" writer. The cynics usually drift into desk jobs and socialism, becoming copy-readers, rewrite men, or headline writers.

The "star reporters" naturally get the big assignments —they write about the matters that are of most general interest and most vital importance to the masses of readers. They are thrown with influential, successful men, and usually they are admitted with all privileges of membership and brotherhood into the Rotary clubs, the chambers of commerce, the booster clubs—and sometimes the country clubs. In these they have all the pleasures a successful business man enjoys without having any of his worries. There they make their friends—often real friends. And the keenest of the successful business men court their acquaintance, pat them on the back, treat them as equals in every way, and, in return for giving them the privilege of their associations, work them for publicity for their projects, propaganda for their particular grafts, and free advertising for themselves.

Sometimes these reporters handle publicity jobs as a sideline, using their papers to put over their publicity. A few newspaper owners even encourage this, as it enables them to keep good men working for smaller wages than they otherwise would demand. However, owners and editors often are not to blame for rewarding and favoring the reporters who make friends with the representatives of powerful interests that are intent upon warping the public mind to serve their selfish purposes. These are the reporters who sell themselves to the owners and editors by selling themselves to the men with whom their jobs throw them—men whom the editors and owners regard highly who go to considerable pains to praise and boost friendly reporters. The other reporters simply do not sell themselves in this way, and as a result they do not get on in the business scramble; they may write better stories, but they do not press agent the right friends and they do not know how to get the right friends to press agent them to their bosses.

A great many of those who criticize the newspapers go on the theory that those who make the newspapers—those who write the news—are artists, or should be artists. I have tried to point out that this is not the case—barring the rare exceptions; that those who do most of the writing for newspapers are average mortals who are divided into two distinct types or classes. Those whose ideal is to ape and hang to successful busines men are more satisfied with life and put more enthusiasm into their work. As naturally follows, they are more successful newspaper men. Those of the other class are dissatisfied because they cannot do what they want to do and look upon newspaper work with disgust.

Of course, there must be something of the artist about every man who writes. There must be a pronounced desire to create, which overpowers the more general desire of men to acquire wealth. But, in reporting, there is the situation that Bernard Shaw describes in his general discussion of the professions:

> You have the man to whom his profession is only the means of making himself and his family comfortable and prosperous; . . . and you have the man who sacrifices everything and everybody, himself included, to the perfection of his work—to the passion for efficiency which is the true master-passion of the artist.

And when one of this latter class gets into the profession of reporting—one willing to make the sacrifices of a true artist—about the first sacrifice he makes is that of his job. He leaves the field and loses his chance of becoming a star reporter rather than leave his art and lose his soul, as he would have to do to get on with the Lions, the Kiwanians, and the Rotarians.

John Macy, in his able essay on Journalism, undertakes to show that most of the positive corruption of the newspapers comes from the struggle between the employing class and the wage-earning class through the fact that the employing class controls the advertising patronage of the newspapers and thus controls the politics and the news columns. Many times this may be true—too many times. But I cannot agree with this theory entirely because I have known newspapers not controlled by advertisers—newspapers whose owners were just as anxious to give the laboring class a square deal as to give a square deal to the business interests—yet almost as much propaganda for the business interests and against the interests of the common people got into these newspapers as into the papers policy-controlled in the interest of special groups.

Why was this? It was simply because of conditions confronting those assigned to report and write the news.

Much of the criticism of labor unions against reporters and newspapers should, if we could put every chip where it belongs, be lodged against those who represent the labor unions and come in contact with the reporters. When a reporter goes to write news about a struggle in which representatives of big corporations and representatives of labor unions are pitted against each other, nine times out of ten the labor-union representatives are to blame when their side gets the worst of it in the news. The average representative of a labor union looks upon a reporter with suspicion and takes pains to let the reporter know it. He does nothing to build up a friendship with the "news hound," and often he assumes an attitude that makes it unpleasant for a reporter to be in his presence. Not so the representative of the corporations. He goes out of his way to make friends with the reporter. He makes the reporter believe he considers him both honest and fair; he cultivates a close friendship and often goes to great lengths to show the reporter that he is ready to perform the offices of a real friend. He confers favors upon the reporter that mean something to him, financially or otherwise. Or he makes the reporter glad to be in his company —makes him feel that they are equals, often makes him feel they are equals above the common herd.

Most reporters, being very human, naturally lean their likes toward those who do the most to make their paths smooth and easy and pleasant—and they, sometimes unconsciously, make their news stories lean toward such persons. The fault does not lie so much with the reporters, or the representatives of the corporations; it seems to me that it lies mostly with the representatives of the labor unions in that they are not smart enough to know how "to work" the reporters. But if, on the other hand, they were keen enough to know how to do this, it is most likely they would not for long remain representatives of the laboring men. They would be grabbed up and put to work representing the corporations.

On the whole, when I compare American journalism with other American institutions, I am not so sure there is anything so very wrong with the way it functions among the other mechanical contraptions of our civilization. There are evils connected with it; often they dominate it. But, all in all, I believe American journalism is on a higher plane than many other American institutions.

Certainly I am convinced it is on a higher plane than American politics, and that those who labor as newspaper men have higher ideals and more honor and a greater regard for the truth than those who labor in politics, local, State, or national. I am not sure but that our journalism is more free from the evils of propaganda than American churches. The average newspaper ranks higher in my estimation than the average college or university.

The only way I know to improve American journalism is to improve humanity. When readers will no longer allow their judgment to be warped, the newspapers will quit trying to propagandize them.

It is disheartening to have to admit that the masses show they prefer the Saturday Evening Post and the American Magazine to such high-class publications as the American Mercury, The Nation, the Century, the Dial, and the New Republic. It is discouraging to recount that the Appeal to Reason has gone out of existence while the Kansas City Star grows fat in all its alleged iniquities. It is a blot on America that Frank Harris has been sent back to Europe improperly honored and unappreciated while Frank Crane becomes more popular and more prominent on every news-stand and bookshelf. There is no glory to the nation in the fact that Editor Harding was placed in the President's chair and Upton Sinclair on the blacklist of newspapers. But the people usually get what they want and what their intelligence entitles them to receive. And they get stung on a lot of things worse than they do on the newspapers they buy.

La Follette

By WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD

(From "The Lynching Bee and Other Poems," 1920)

In the Valley of Decision,
Down the Road of Things-that-are,
You gave to us a vision,
You appointed us a star,
And through Cities of Derision
We followed you from far.

On the Hills beyond To-morrow,
On the Road of Things-to-do,
With that strength of hand we borrow
As we borrow soul from you,
We know not sloth nor sorrow
And will build your vision true.

"The Big Noise"

By BLANCHE GOODMAN

ORIGINALLY, it was the name given him by his political opponents. But oddly, it had been seized upon by his admirers and used as a term of rough endearment, thus confounding his enemies and driving them to seek something less adaptable to the hail-fellow-well-met spirit.

He had been a leading figure in the town for so long, had identified himself with it in so many ways, that it seemed almost as though the place did not exist apart from him. The local newspapers adored him. His voice was heard on the Living Wage, Religious Education in the Public Schools, Pure Food Laws, Our Foreign Policy, Child Labor, and the Evils of the Boss System. Apparently, his motto was: "I care not who makes the laws of this town, so that I make its speeches." And make them he did. It was his boast that he was accessible at all hours to whatever delegation or individual might call upon him for his views. He delighted in referring to himself as "the man with the open house and the open mind." Now and then he hit upon a happy phrase that was repeated with relish by the press, and bandied about by his admirers for days thereafter. An enemy once growlingly commented: "He talks so much that he can't help but say something good once in a while."

He had a wife and children. The children had made homes or careers for themselves elsewhere. His wife, a little, tired-looking woman, gave her days over to domestic affairs. Her individuality was swallowed up in the blare of her husband's trumpetings, as the sound of a tuning-fork is eclipsed by the noise of a megaphone.

She formed no outside ties. First there were the children to look after. Then as they grew up, there was the Big Noise's career. It was Cocteau who said: "There is a house, a lamp, a plate of soup, a fire, wine, and pipes at the back of every important work of art." Cocteau might have added, "and guest rooms." Meals were constantly in either a state of preparation or consumption, and beds were kept in readiness for expected—and unexpected—visitors. The Big Noise paid tribute now and then to his wife's indefatigable labors, referring to her with elephantine jocularity as "my boss," and lauding her domestic abilities in flowery phrases. It made good copy. Sometimes when a camera was pointed at him as he stood on the lawn talking with a group of his constituents, he would hold up a forbidding hand and shout: "Wait a minute and I'll fetch mother!"

No one ever dreamed of asking her opinion on the living wage or woman's suffrage. And yet people who knew her before her marriage recalled her as a gay, vivacious girl, a girl not without a certain forcefulness of her own.

And now the Big Noise lay dead.

Through one of those fantastic tricks the gods sometimes devise for their playthings he had met his end. A reunion of war veterans was being held, and he, along with the governor and one or two other notables, rode in uniform at the head of the parade. He had paused a moment, a commanding figure upon the curveting bay he bestrode, to adjust some part of the saddle. He did not notice a megaphone attached to the telegraph pole beside which he had reined in his horse. There was a sudden lull in the band music. As he bent forward, a raucous yell came through the horn! "What's the matter with the Big Noise? He's all right!" The horse gave a leap forward. Over went its rider to the paved street, striking his head upon the curbstone. Death was instantaneous.

The news would have to be broken gradually to his wife, they said. She was visiting a daughter in a nearby town. There was a new grandchild (it was only at such times that she left home) and this made things doubly hard. They wired her that he had been suddenly taken ill.

Some friends went down the road, half way, to meet her and prepare her as gently as possible. She made no outcry. She merely sat and looked at them with a slightly dazed air as if she did not understand them. They whispered pityingly behind her back to one another: "The shock has stupefied her, poor thing!"

And so she came home—to a home strangely, unaccustomedly still.

The porches, the hallway, and all the rooms on the lower floor were filled with people. But they sat awe-stricken, dumb, drawing back and bowing their heads respectfully as the widow of their dead leader passed up the stairway and into the room where he lay.

"She wishes to be alone with him," they whispered, and a few close friends, fearing the inevitable outburst of grief, waited upon the stairs with anxious faces.

She closed the door firmly behind her and walked to the bedside. They had swathed the back of his head in some dark stuff, so that the injury was in no way visible. His face unmarred by the fall, his body full and firm, he lay there, with lips slightly parted. One could almost have sworn that he breathed lightly.

She stood beside him, her face a mask. Time passed and still she stood. Any moment, perhaps, he might rise, and looking at her firmly, his brow creasing, his dominant index-finger flung out in familiar gesture, he might call out in that orotund bass of his: "Americans! Shall we relinquish the ideals for which our forefathers . . . ?"

The midrib of a feather protruded from the pillow beneath his head. She drew it forth cautiously, glancing about like a frightened bird, and placed it upon his lips. It lay there quiet, its fronds unstirred . . .

A great roaring seemed suddenly to have ceased.

Timidly she looked about.

And slowly, gradually, as when the east is tinged with dawn, a strange, new smile crept into her face. For, out of that silence, scarcely discernible at first, then more and more insistent, came a soft, rustling chorus of little voices through her mind . . . a sound for so long swallowed up in that greater, all-engulfing one . . . the sound of her own thoughts. . . .

When they came into the room with obtrusive kindness to lead her away, they found her standing motionless beside the bed. "You must take some food," they told her. "You must keep up your strength."

Unprotesting, she permitted them to lead her out of the room, casting no look backward at the bed and the burden it held. Calmly she greeted the friends downstairs, then seated herself in a rocker, conversing with this one and that.

They waited in vain for that sudden, wild outburst. . . .

They said finally that the shock of grief had turned her mind. . . .

In the Driftway

HUNDREDS of thousands of soldiers are afoot in China, yet there is little real fighting. The Chinese, alone among the great peoples of the world, have never permitted themselves to be swept away by the current tides of war. Physical courage is not to them the supreme form of valor. They have not, like the Western peoples, a vast body of tradition which sets the martial above all other virtues, nor do they see any reason to kill people who differ from themselves. The peculiar flavor of Chinese poetry is in part due to this maturity of mind. "The glorious accident that an English scholar of Chinese in our own generation [Arthur Waley] is also an artist," as the Manchester Guardian puts it, has made it possible for us to catch something of the essence of this Chinese genius which has been closed to previous Western generations.

* * * * *

JUDGED by our Western standards Po Chui's famous Old Man with the Broken Arm was a detestable coward. But for eleven hundred years this story of the old man with hair white as the new snow, who was glad that in his youth he had broken his arm with a stone rather than go to war, has been told and retold in China:

> One limb destroyed—whole body safe!
> But even now on winter nights when the wind and rain blow
> From evening on till day's dawn I cannot sleep for pain.
> Not sleeping for pain
> Is a small thing to bear,
> Compared with the joy of being alive when all the rest are dead.

In what other country could a poet choose such a hero?

HALF a millennium before the birth of Christ Lao-tsze coined the Chinese proverb: "The best soldiers do not fight." Lao-tsze was already, at that relatively early date, inveighing against the rush and bustle of modern life. The note echoes down the centuries. A full thousand years ago To'ao Sung wrote:

The hills and rivers of the lowland country
You have made your battleground.
How do you suppose the people who live there
Will procure firewood and hay?

Do not let me hear you talking together
About titles and promotions;
For a single general's reputation
Is made out of ten thousand corpses.

And in the days when William the Conqueror was blustering through England, Su Tung-p'o was writing verses which seem to us the ultra-modern product of super-sophistication:

Families, when a child is born,
Want it to be intelligent.
I, through intelligence,
Having wrecked my whole life,
Only hope the baby will prove
Ignorant and stupid.
Then he will crown a tranquil life
By becoming a cabinet minister.

* * * * *

THE Western nations, with their blind belief that in industrialism and forced labor lies the only real progress, have upset the old China; their conflicts, their absorption in railroads and coal mines, their eagerness to exploit, the greed of their arms manufacturers, lie behind the mammoth civil war now waging. But perhaps, in the three thousand years of China's civilization, there is something which can rise superior even to this last imitation of Occidental "progress." Before even the Norsemen discovered America Yuan Chieh gave the title Civilization to this ironic poem:

To the southeast—three thousand leagues—
The Yan and Hsiang form into a mighty lake.
Above the lake are deep mountain valleys,
And men dwelling whose hearts are without guile.
Gay like children, they swarm to the tops of the trees;
And run to the water to catch bream and trout.
Their pleasures are the same as those of beasts and birds;
They put no restraint either on body or mind.
Far I have wandered throughout the Nine Lands;
Wherever I went such manners had disappeared.
I find myself standing and wondering, perplexed,
Whether saints and sages have really done us any good.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Toward Moral Shipwreck

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to ask the author of Changes in Sex Relations whether she would insist on any sort of permanence for the irregular sex-relationships which she so evidently approves? Would not a succession of such unions lead to promiscuity and the progressive degradation of the female, not to speak of the male? I am of the opinion that the reading of Elsie Clews Parsons's paper would tend toward the wrecking of the lives of many. I have known actual cases of moral shipwreck and disintegration to result from the perusal by young people of novels by high-minded doctrinaire authors who felt it to be their duty to spread "ethical" teaching of the character of that included in New Morals for Old. Improvement in sexual relations will not be found in the disregard of marriage or in temporary substitutes for marriage but in its reform.

Kingston, Pennsylvania, May 12 ALBERT L. WHITTAKER

Does Mr. Mencken Know?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: H. L. Mencken in his article The Sex Uproar seemed to swerve from his accustomed logical course. In an effort to maintain his satirical bachelor identity, he obscured the truth—that is, if there is a truth in this involved subject which The Nation's current series is making so much more involved.

Mr. Mencken's statements concerning man's attitude toward sex are but half true; they make too little of his predatory nature. Man does treat the matter "jocosely," dismisses the thing "lightly," and reduces it to a "recreation." Yet it is not accurate to construct from this fact the principle that, in marked contradistinction to woman, his interest ends here. As life goes, whether he will admit it or not, the talk of man is still very much like that which Mlle de Maupin heard when she masqueraded as a man; like the conversation of Kipling's men "after the women have left the room." Left to himself, he will inevitably refer somehow to sex; and the reference will receive immediate attention whether it be through a toast, an anecdote, a formal speech, or intimate disclosures concerning reconnoitering and accomplishment.

It is true that man "craves the approbation of his fellowman"; yet this approbation is not the end of all of his ambitions. For with men in general there is always the lurking hope that approbation and subsequent success will bring ultimate sex reward.

Mr. Mencken states that "all that is worth knowing about sex can be taught an intelligent boy of sixteen in two hours." Surely the subject is not so simple as this when considered, as it must be, from the standpoint of one individual and another. Would that the heroes of "Maurice Guest" and "Of Human Bondage" might here testify! Would that Emma Bovary and Anna Karenina could come forward!

In The Nation July 9 Isabel Leavenworth says in Virtue and Women:

"Sex experiences, like other experiences, can be judged of only on the basis which they play in the creative drama of the individual soul. There are as many possibilities for successful (and we take the liberty of adding "unsuccessful") sex life as there are men and women in the world."

New York, July 19 BERNARD SOBE

What Is Jealousy?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The articles on Changing Moral Standards which have been appearing in The Nation are timely and thought-provoking. All of them thus far, however, with the possible exception of the contribution of Mrs. Gilman, have failed to take account of one of the most troublesome elements in the relationship in question: the problem of jealousy.

What is the definite character of the jealousy a person in love experiences when the object of his adoration spurns his love and marries another person? Is this jealousy common to all people or is it true of only some? Is there any connection between this jealousy and the point Mrs. Gilman brings out—that "love literature" deals almost exclusively with the love for one woman, not for many women? If this factor of jealousy is deep seated in man, would it or would it not interfere with greater freedom of the marriage relationship? Perhaps the feeling of jealousy is due to the institution of the marriage of fidelity and possession? Perhaps the substitution in the place of this institution of the freedom and "naturalness" advocated by Bertrand Russell would do away with the feeling of jealousy?

Dorchester, Massachusetts, July 7 CHARLES ANGOFF

A Critic of La Follette

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: General Dawes calls Senator La Follette "the master demagogue." He is wrong. That sad distinction yet belongs to Mr. Bryan, whose vain gift has made him the Old Man of the Sea to the Democratic Party. Yet there is sufficient truth in the Dawes statement to impart plausibility. Permit me to indicate but one example.

The Senator is against the "monopolies." How would he put them out of business? First, what are the monopolies? If you leave out of consideration the beneficial monopolies like the telephone, gas and electric, street and interurban transportation, and other corporations, which are "natural," and which are, generally speaking, under the supervision of the States in which they operate, then you have left great corporations like the American Woolen Company, the National Sugar Refining Company, etc., whose operations directly affect the economy of every individual. (To call the Standard Oil Company a monopoly, as many do, is absurd.)

Well, the Senator could put the real monopolies out of business by establishing either free trade or a very low tariff. You yourself, my dear sir, covered this point but you did it in such a casual manner as to arouse an ambiguous smile. In the most incidental fashion you spoke about the tariff being extirpated root and branch. That would unquestionably bring about the greatest economic revolution in the past fifty years. But that would be the real way to put the monopolies out of business.

Now, my point is this: Senator La Follette is not a free trader, or anything approaching one. He is not distinguished for any important utterance he has ever made on the protective tariff. Any one of fifty Democrats in Washington excels him in this all-important respect. There is nothing in the index to lead one to expect that, if elected, Senator La Follette would or could have enacted a tariff measure that would radically affect the situation—while everyone knows that the Democratic Party would certainly proceed at once to greatly reduce the schedules.

Therefore, for the Senator and his heterogeneous collection of discontents to talk about doing away with monopolies without intelligently and constructively discussing the tariff situation is demagoguery.

Brooklyn, September 12 WM. TAYLOR

Why Wasn't I Born a Judge?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Four years ago I bought a farm in Connecticut, fifty miles from the big town. The house is a mile from the nearest telephone line, but it stands on a main road and the agent said: "Oh, yes, you'll get a telephone without any trouble at all." I went down to consult the district telephone manager. "Yes," he agreed, "we'll build a line. Of course you'll have to pay the cost of construction." He figured on an envelope. "It will come to five hundred and fifty dollars." "But," I demurred, "people up our way tell me that a few years ago you went around begging them to let you build a line to their doors." "Yes," admitted he, "but times have changed."

I went home and sat down to think in happy isolation from the world. But there lie disadvantages as well as advantages in the lack of a telephone, particularly if you are a writer whose bread is baked or burned by the moods of New York editors. The next year our telephoneless state became so exasperating that again I sent a Macedonian cry to the district manager. He was a jolly fellow, that manager. He came up to the farm, pulled four eight-inch trout out of our brook, grinned, said construction costs had gone up, and quoted us a price of six hundred and fifty. Heigho! Six hundred and fifty. I had enlisted two other subscribers on the route, but though both agreed to take the phone, neither cared to contribute to the cost of construction. I had nothing with which to combat the jolly manager's insistence that all rural service in the State was unprofitable, yet it seemed a bit hard that I alone should be asked to build a line that would immediately become the perpetual possession of the telephone company, for the benefit of all present and future residents of that mile or so of road. But after all it was an academic problem, purely. I hadn't any six hundred and fifty. My wife and I went back to our happy exasperated duitude.

Then one day some months ago a friend advised: "Go and see Judge K. He'll tell you how to get a phone." I went. "Why, yes," said the judge, "I think you can get a phone easily, if you do as I did. Some years ago an independent telephone company applied for a license in the State. This company here testified before the legislative committee and before the Public Utilities Commission that there was no need of a second telephone concern in the State because it was prepared to serve all residents of the State on an absolutely equal basis. A year or so ago I bought a house a mile from the end of the phone line. The company wanted five hundred dollars to give me service. I answered: 'Now, gentlemen, the time has come to make good on that testimony of yours.' Well," the judge laughed, "the very next day the construction gang was on the job. My phone didn't cost me a cent. Go ahead, write the general manager, cite my case. You'll get your telephone."

I did. I cited that judge's case in full, adding that I, representative of a profession equally illustrious, hoped for treatment equally just. The general manager sent down a special engineer, who looked me over, did some figuring, and said that in a few days the company would send a report. I waited for it, in growing excitement. It came. I tore it open with trembling hand. Ah! As a special concession to an eminent but isolated author, the company would bring a talking wire to my door for—exactly six hundred dollars.

Why wasn't I born a judge?

Westport, Connecticut, July 27 WEBB WALDRON

Contributors to This Issue

HARRY W. LAIDLER is the author of "Public Ownership Here and Abroad" and other volumes.

LOUIS FISCHER is The Nation's correspondent in Russia.

PEARL S. BUCK teaches in the University of Nanking.

W. G. CLUGSTON is the Kansas correspondent of the Kansas City Journal.

MAXWELL BODENHEIM is well known as poet, novelist, and critic.

HENRY SEIDEL CANBY is editor of the Saturday Review of Literature.

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD is an editor of the Measure.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is a lecturer in the New School for Social Research.

EDWIN MUIR is an English poet and critic.

IRWIN EDMAN teaches philosophy at Columbia University.

TENNEY FRANK, professor of Latin at Johns Hopkins University, is at present conducting the American School of Classical Studies at Rome.

JOSEF HOFMANN AT HIS STEINWAY

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

From under those miraculous hands a Chopin Nocturne ripples in delicate, lacy perfection. A Liszt Rhapsody becomes a thing of glamour and passion. A shadowy theme from Debussy assumes delectable contours, gleams with cool, floating light. Here speaks the immortal genius of great composers. And here, also, under the touch of a master pianist, speaks the glorious voice of a great instrument—the Steinway. Long ago Hofmann chose the Steinway as the one perfect medium for his art. Rachmaninoff knows how exquisitely it interprets a subtle nuance or a profound emotion. Paderewski knows how magnificently it responds to his imperious demands. Levitzki, Cortot, Grainger—these are but a few of the celebrated pianists who, if only sincerely artistic motives are involved, invariably choose the Steinway.

To meet the requirements and acoustic conditions of every home, the Steinway is made in numerous styles and sizes. Each embodies all the Steinway principles and ideals. And each returns to those who buy it, not only unending pleasure and delight, but the definite gift of permanence. You need never buy another piano.

There is a Steinway dealer in your community or near you through whom you may purchase a new Steinway piano with a small cash deposit, and the balance will be extended over a period of two years. *Used pianos accepted in partial exchange.

Prices: $875 and up

Plus transportation

Steinway & Sons, Steinway Hall
109 East Fourteenth Street, New York

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

China, Russia, the Allies, and the Chinese Eastern Railway

BEHIND the present civil war in China lies, among other problems, that of control of the Chinese Eastern Railway, which is not only an invaluable short cut from Chita to Vladivostok, saving the long roundabout all-Russian route which follows the Amur River, but forms the closest link between Europe and Port Arthur and Peking. This railroad also is the key to the intrigue, in which almost all the Great Powers took part, which sought to forestall Chinese recognition of Russia on May 31, 1924; and it played a part in the Washington Arms Conference. The Russian and Chinese governments insist that the railroad concerns them alone, but France, Japan, and the United States have asserted an interest in its fate. The American interest is, however, dictated rather by hostility to Soviet Russia than by the history of the road. We print below the text of the Russo-Chinese treaty, together with the important annex concerning the railroad. To understand the latter the history of the road may be summarized as follows:

Following the defeat of China by Japan in 1895 Russia assumed a more active interest in China. She arranged China's first foreign loan in 1895, and obtained French capital for the foundation, under Russian charter, of the Russo-Chinese, later Russo-Asiatic, Bank, in August, 1896. (A promise of a concession for the Chinese Eastern Railway had probably been made in a secret anti-Japanese treaty negotiated by Li Hung Chang at the coronation of the Czar in May, 1896, and on September 8 a contract for its construction was signed with the Russo-Asiatic Bank.) Article I of this agreement specifically provided that "the shares of the [Chinese Eastern Railway] company can be acquired only by Chinese or Russian subjects." The railroad was built, and prospered. The bank held all the stock and the Russian Government all the bonds.

After the soviet revolution, however, other Powers assumed an active interest in the railway. The Chinese-Japanese secret military agreement of May 16, 1918, provided for the transportation of Japanese troops over the road. The United States had sent a railway mission to Siberia during the Kerensky regime. At the time of the Czecho-Slovak uprising in Russia the Allied governments approved a Japanese-American agreement, dated January 9, 1919, which provided for administration of the Chinese Eastern Railway by an interallied board headed by Mr. John F. Stevens, an American. During this regime the railway bought certain supplies, on credit, in the United States. It is the existence of this debt which gave Mr. Hughes his excuse for attempting to interfere with the Chinese-Russian agreement regarding the railway—although the supplies were purchased for the use of the Allied troops and the railroad has not even yet been paid for its service in transporting the Allied troops. The French Government has excused its interference on the ground of the interest of the French stockholders in the Russo-Asiatic Bank, despite Article I of the agreement with that bank, which was obviously intended to prevent just such international complications.

Following the period of interallied control the Chinese Government, by an agreement with the bank dated October 2, 1920, announced its intention to assume provisionally the administration of the railway. The provisional period was to end when an agreement was reached with the Russian Government. Such an agreement was reached in the supplementary agreement printed below. The railway, however, is in the hands of the war lord of Manchuria, Chang Tso-lin, not of the Government dominated by Wu Pei-fu with which the Soviet Government made its treaty. Thus far Chang has refused to recognize the new treaty, and he is now actually at war with the Peking Government. Recent newspaper dispatches report, rather vaguely, that Chang, Japan, and Soviet Russia have come to an agreement. If that be true Chang has presumably accepted some such terms as those outlined in the documents printed below, reprinted, in the main, from the Peking Daily News for June 18.

AGREEMENT ON GENERAL PRINCIPLES FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF QUESTIONS AT ISSUE BETWEEN THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA AND THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS.

The Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, desiring to reestablish normal relations with each other, have agreed to conclude an agreement on general principles for the settlement of the questions between the two countries, and have to that end named as their Plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

His Excellency the President of the Republic of China: Vi Kyuin Wellington Koo,

The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Lev Mikhailovich Karakhan,

Who, having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I. Immediately upon the signing of the present agreement the normal diplomatic and consular relations between the two contracting parties shall be reestablished.

The Government of the Republic of China agrees to take the necessary steps to transfer to the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics the Legation and Consular buildings formerly belonging to the Czarist Government.

ART. II. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to hold, within one month after the signing of the present agreement, a conference which shall conclude and carry out detailed arrangements relative to the questions in accordance with the principles as provided in the following articles.

Such detailed arrangements shall be completed as soon as possible and, in any case, not later than six months from the date of the opening of the conference as provided in the preceding paragraph.

ART. III. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to annul at the conference as provided in the preceding article all conventions, treaties, agreements, protocols, contracts, etc., concluded between the Government of China and the Czarist Government and to replace them with new treaties, agreements, etc., on the basis of equality, reciprocity, and justice, as well as the spirit of the declarations of the Soviet Government of the years of 1919 and 1920.

ART. IV. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, in accordance with its policy and declarations of 1919 and 1920, declares that all treaties, agreements, etc., concluded between the former Czarist Government and any third party or parties affecting the sovereign rights or interests of China, are null and void.

The governments of both contracting parties declare that in future neither Government will conclude any treaties or agreements which prejudice the sovereign rights or interests of either contracting party.

ART. V. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recognizes that Outer Mongolia is an integral part of the Republic of China and respects China's sovereign rights therein.

The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics declares that as soon as the questions for the withdrawal of all the troops of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics from Outer Mongolia, namely, as to the time-limit of the withdrawal of such troops and the measures to be adopted in the interests of the safety of the frontiers, are agreed upon at the conference as provided in Article II of the present agreement, it will effect the complete withdrawal of all the troops of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics from Outer Mongolia.

ART. VI. The governments of the two contracting parties mutually pledge themselves not to permit, within their respective territories, the existence and/or activities of any organizations or groups whose aim is to struggle by acts of violence against the governments of either contracting party.

The governments of the two contracting parties further pledge themselves not to engage in propaganda directed against the political and social systems of either contracting party.

ART. VII. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to redemarcate their national boundaries at the conference as provided in Article II of the present agreement, and pending such redemarcation, to maintain the present boundaries.

ART. VIII. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to regulate at the aforementioned conference the questions relating to the navigation of rivers, lakes, and other bodies of water which are common to their respective frontiers, on the basis of equality and reciprocity.

ART. IX. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to settle at the aforementioned conference the question of the Chinese Eastern Railway in conformity with the principles as hereinafter provided:

1. The governments of the two contracting parties declare that the Chinese Eastern Railway is a purely commercial enterprise.

The governments of the two contracting parties mutually declare that with the exception of matters pertaining to the business operations which are under the direct control of the Chinese Eastern Railway all other matters affecting the rights of the national and local governments of the Republic of China, such as judicial matters, matters relating to civil administration, military administration, police, municipal government, taxation, and landed property (with the exception of lands required by the said railway) shall be administered by the Chinese authorities.

2. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees to the redemption by the Government of the Republic of China, with Chinese capital, of the Chinese Eastern Railway, as well as all appurtenant properties, and to the transfer to China of all shares and bonds of the said railway.

3. The governments of the two contracting parties shall settle at the conference as provided in Article II of the present agreement, the amount and conditions governing the redemption as well as the procedure for the transfer of the Chinese Eastern Railway.

4. The Government of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics agrees to be responsible for the entire claims of the shareholders, bondholders, and creditors of the Chinese Eastern Railway incurred prior to the revolution of March 9, 1917.

5. The governments of the two contracting parties mutually agree that the future of the Chinese Eastern Railway shall be determined by the Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the exclusion of any third party or parties.

6. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to draw up an arrangement for the provisional management of the Chinese Eastern Railway pending the settlement of the question as provided under section (3) of the present article.

7. Until the various questions relating to the Chinese East-

The Pioneer Shipping Firm for RELIEF SHIPMENTS

That these should be continued see THE NATION Wednesday, September 24th.

"WILL GERMANY LIVE AGAIN"

Best Quality and Prompt Service Guaranteed
No Extra Charge for Deliveries Occupied Zone
Cable Orders Promptly Executed
Price List Gladly Sent Upon Request
Make Up Your Own Assortment

Following Is a Small Part of Our Price List

$10.00 M B F $10.00

MUTTER'S BESTER FREUND

24½ lbs.	Wheat Flour, Gold Medal	10 lbs.	Best Premier Farina
5 "	Best Lard	1 "	Cocoa
5 "	Roasted Coffee in tins	10 "	Granulated Sugar
1 "	Ceylon Perri Walla Tea	5 tins	Borden's Condensed Milk
10 "	North Carolina Rice	5 "	Borden's Evaporated Milk

$5.00 HANSA $5.00

11 lbs. Flour, Gold Medal	5 pkgs. Macaroni, 9 ozs. each	3 lbs. Rice
2 " Roasted Coffee in tins	5 lbs. Sugar	14-oz. tins Condensed Milk
	1 " Cocoa	2 lbs. Crisco

FLOUR—Washburn Crosby Gold Medal 110 lbs. net	$6.00
MILK—Condensed, 48 tins U. S. Standard	8.00
MILK—Condensed, 24 tins U. S. Standard	4.25
MILK—Evaporated, 48 tins U. S. Standard	7.00
MILK—Evaporated, 24 tins U. S. Standard	3.75
SUGAR—Finest American granulated, 100 lbs. net	9.50
COFFEE—Roasted, 5 lbs. net in tins	2.75
HAM—15 lbs.	7.00
LARD—10 lbs. net in tins	2.75
BACON—20 lbs. net	6.00
BUTTER—10 lbs. net	6.00
POTATOES—110 lbs. net	3.50
COAL—Per ton of 2205 lbs.	15.00

$20.00 OUR OLD HAPAG $20.00

24½ lbs. Flour, Gold Medal	5 lbs. Roasted Coffee in tins	2 lbs. Crisco, 1 lb. tins
10 lbs. Rice	1 lb. Cocoa	5 lbs. Lard
10 lbs. Sugar	1 pkg. Tea	5 lbs. Double Smoked Breakfast Bacon
5 lbs. Farina	6 tins Condensed Milk	5 lbs. Cervelat Wurst
5 lbs. Dried Fruits	6 tins Evaporated Milk	2 tins Corned Beef
	1 qt. Salad Oil	50 Bouillon Cubes

Self-Packed Packages Forwarded Weekly
Upon Request Will Call for Same in New York City
30 Years' Shipping Experience with the Hamburg-American Line in New York

American Merchants Shipping & Forwarding Co., Inc.
H. von Schuckmann C. E. W. Schelling
147 4. Ave., corner 14th Street Central Savings Bank Bldg.
New York, N. Y.

HAMBURG OFFICE: Kl. Rosenstr. 16, ecke Moenckebergstr.

ern Railway are settled at the conference as provided in Article II of the present agreement, the rights of the two governments arising out of the contract of August 27/September 8, 1896, for the construction and operation of the Chinese Eastern Railway which do not conflict with the present agreement and the agreement for the provisional management of the said railway and which do not prejudice China's rights of sovereignty shall be maintained.

ART. X. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees to renounce the special rights and privileges relating to all concessions in any part of China acquired by the Czarist Government under various conventions, treaties, agreements, etc.

ART. XI. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees to renounce the Russian portion of the Boxer indemnity.

ART. XII. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees to relinquish the rights of extraterritoriality and consular jurisdiction.

ART. XIII. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to draw up simultaneously with the conclusion of a commercial treaty at the conference as provided in Article II of the present agreement a customs tariff for the two contracting parties in accordance with the principles of equality and reciprocity.

ART. XIV. The governments of the two contracting parties agree to discuss at the aforementioned conference the questions relating to the claims for the compensation of losses.

ART. XV. The present agreement shall come into effect from the date of signature.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present agreement in duplicate in the English language and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done at Peking, this thirty-first day of the fifth month of the thirteenth year of the Republic of China, May 31, 1924.

(Seal) V. K. WELLINGTON KOO
(Seal) L. M. KARAKHAN

AGREEMENT FOR THE PROVISIONAL MANAGEMENT OF THE CHINESE EASTERN RAILWAY

The Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics mutually recognizing that, inasmuch as the Chinese Eastern Railway was built with capital furnished by the Russian Government and constructed entirely within Chinese territory the said railway is a purely commercial enterprise and that, excepting for matters appertaining to its own business operations, all other matters which affect the rights of the Chinese national and local governments shall be administered by the Chinese authorities, have agreed to conclude an agreement for the provisional management of the railway with a view to carrying on jointly the management of the said railway until its final settlement at the conference as provided in Article II of the agreement on general principles for the settlement of the questions between the Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of May 31, 1924, and have to that end named as their Plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

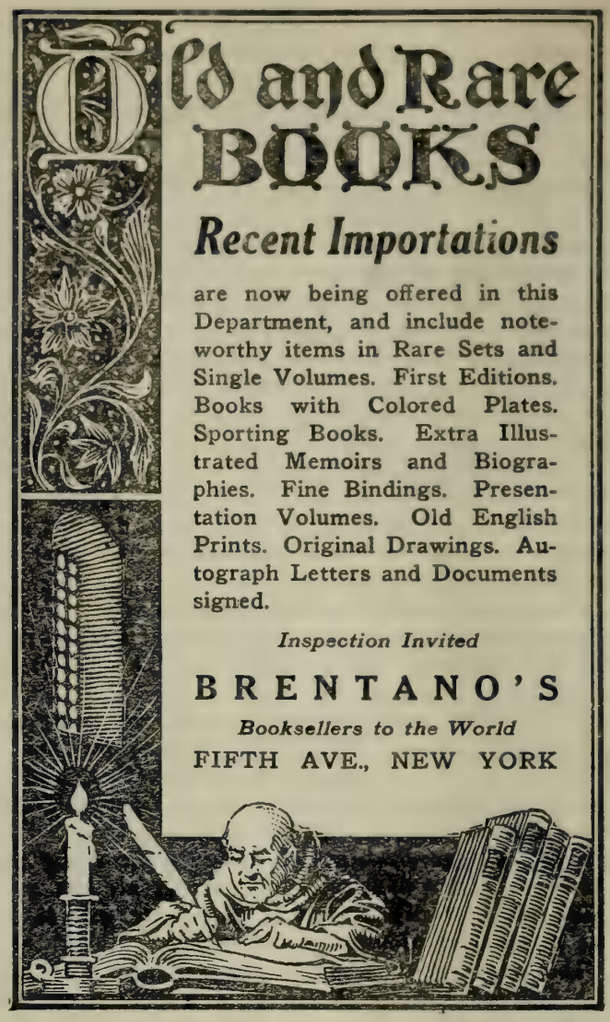
His Excellency the President of the Republic of China: Vi Kyuin Wellington Koo,

The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Lev Mikhailovich Karakhan.

Who, having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The Railway shall establish, for discussion and decision of all matters relative to the Chinese Eastern Railway, a board of directors to be composed of ten persons, of whom five shall be appointed by the Government of the Republic of China and five by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The Government of the Chinese Republic shall appoint one



Old and Rare
BOOKS
Recent Importations
are now being offered in this Department, and include noteworthy items in Rare Sets and Single Volumes. First Editions. Books with Colored Plates. Sporting Books. Extra Illustrated Memoirs and Biographies. Fine Bindings. Presentation Volumes. Old English Prints. Original Drawings. Autograph Letters and Documents signed.
Inspection Invited
BRENTANO'S
Booksellers to the World
FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

PROSPECT HILL APARTMENTS
41st STREET AND PROSPECT PLACE
100% Co-operative
ON the highest point in midtown New York; ground floor on a level with sixth floor in Washington Square district; within 10 minutes' walk of Grand Central Station. Decorations of apartments and fixtures included in the sales price. Apartments wil consist of 2 to 4 rooms or larger combinations. Fireplaces, chemical refrigeration, incinerators, etc. Occupancy Spring of 1925. References required. Send for complete plans.
HAMILTON, ISELIN & CO.
SELLING AGENTS
385 Madison Avenue, Murray Hill 7660

BERMUDA
8-9-12-15 Day Tours and longer, including all necessary expenses costing $88 and up, according to length of tour.
HAVANA
8 Day Tour, $135. 10 Day Tour, $140. 15 Day Tour, $150.
(Longer Tours.) Complete descriptive literature, etc.
UNIVERSAL-LEHRENKRAUSS TRAVEL AGENCY
Efficient Travel Service Since 1878.
Officially appointed agents for all Trans-Atlantic, Trans-Pacific, Lake and River Lines.
Travelers' Checks, Letters of Credit, Foreign Money, Baggage Insured and Transferred.
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
359 Fulton Street, Opposite Borough Hall
Telephone: Triangle 7000.

of the Chinese directors as chairman of the board of directors, and he shall also be the director general.

The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (U.S.S.R.) shall appoint one of the Russian directors as vice-chairman of the board of directors, and he shall also be the assistant director general.

Seven persons shall constitute a quorum, and at least six must vote upon a measure before it shall take effect.

In the absence of the director general or of the assistant director general their respective governments have the right to name a director general, who shall be one of the Chinese directors, and an associate director general, who shall be one of the Russian directors, ad interim.

ART. II. The railroad shall form a supervisory council, composed of five persons, two of whom shall be Chinese, one appointed by the Government of the Chinese Republic, and three Russian, appointed by the Government of the U. S. S. R. The chairman of this council shall be elected from the Chinese members.

ART. III. The railroad shall have a manager who shall be a citizen of the U. S. S. R., and two assistant managers one of whom shall be a citizen of the Chinese Republic and one of the U. S. S. R. These officials shall be appointed by the board of directors, and such nominations shall be confirmed by the respective governments. The rights and duties of the director and of the assistant director shall be defined by the board of directors.

ART. IV. The chiefs and assistant chiefs of the various services of the railroad shall be nominated by the board of directors. If the chief of any service is a citizen of the Chinese Republic the assistant chief of that service shall be a citizen of the U. S. S. R.; and if the chief be a citizen of the U. S. S. R., the assistant chief shall be a citizen of the Chinese Republic.

ART. V. The distribution of offices in the various services of the railroad shall be based upon the principle of equal representation of citizens of the Chinese Republic and of the U. S. S. R.

ART. VI. With the exception of the rate schedule and the budget, which will be drawn up as provided in Article 7 of the present agreement, matters upon which the board of directors cannot agree shall be submitted to arbitration by the governments of the two contracting parties.

ART. VII. The board of directors shall submit the rate schedules and the budget to meetings attended by the members of the board of directors and the members of the supervisory council.

ART. VIII. The net profits of the railway shall be retained by the board of directors and shall not be utilized until the railway question is definitively settled.

ART. IX. The board of directors shall, as soon as possible, revise the statutes of the Chinese Eastern Railway approved December 4, 1896, by the Imperial Government of China, taking as a basis the present agreement and the agreement establishing general principles for the settlement of questions at issue, signed on May 31, 1924, by the Government of the Chinese Republic and the Government of the U. S. S. R., not later than six months after the formation of the board of directors. These statutes shall remain in force until modified, unless they contradict the agreement establishing general principles for the settlement of questions at issue, or unless they prejudice the sovereign rights of China.

ART. X. The present agreement shall become invalid when the question of the Chinese Eastern Railway shall be definitively settled as stipulated in Article 2 of the agreement establishing general principles for the settlement of questions at issue between the Chinese Government and the Government of the U. S. S. R., concluded May 31, 1924.

ART. XI. The present agreement goes into effect from the date of its signature.

Done at Peking, this thirty-first day of the fifth month of the thirteenth year of the Chinese Republic, May 31, 1924.

La Follette's Record

A few hundred copies of the reprint of Arthur Warner's three articles on La Follette's Record are still available.

Readers who would like to help along the Progressive Campaign could do nothing more effective than to buy a dozen copies and mail them to their intelligent but still unconvinced friends.

Single copies, 10 cents
12 copies, $1.00
100 copies, 5.00

Free with a new subscription, if you mention it.

MARX'S CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE has now for the first time been published in cloth binding: in the same volume is the COMMUNIST MANIFESTO by Marx and Engels. Both are invaluable historical documents. Price 60c. postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

THE COLLAPSE OF CENTRAL EUROPE
A brilliant discussion of the military, economic and moral breakdown of the last year of war in Germany.
By DR. KARL F. NOWAK. Price, $8.00. E. P. Dutton & Co.

WHAT LA FOLLETTE'S STATE IS DOING
Latest and Most Authentic Book
On
What's Going On in Wisconsin
A Value Hand-Book For La Follette Campaign Workers
Price $2.50, postpaid
Order through your bookseller, or by mail of Batavia Times Press, Batavia, N. Y. For descriptive circulars, address Chester C. Platt, 119 W. Main St., Madison, Wis.

accept nothing but
Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
3 Tablets 15c.
10 Tablets 40c.
Midol
for HEADACHE

Keeping the Telephone Alive

Americans have learned to depend on the telephone, in fair weather or in foul, for the usual affairs of the day or for the dire emergency in the dead of night. Its continuous service is taken as a matter of course.

The marvel of it is that the millions of thread-like wires are kept alive and ready to vibrate at one's slightest breath. A few drops of water in a cable, a faulty connection in the wire maze of a switchboard, a violent sleet, rain or wind storm or the mere falling of a branch will often jeopardize the service.

Every channel for the speech currents must be kept electrically intact. The task is as endless as housekeeping. Inspection of apparatus, equipment and all parts of the plant is going on all the time. Wire chiefs at "test boards" locate trouble on the wires though miles away. Repairmen, the "trouble hunters," are at work constantly wherever they are needed in city streets, country roads or in the seldom-trodden trails of the wilderness.

Providing telephone service for this great nation is a huge undertaking. To keep this vast mechanism always electrically alive and dependable is the unending task of tens of thousands of skillful men and women in every state in the Union.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

BELL SYSTEM

One Policy, One System, Universal Service

WANTED

WORKERS to sell La Follette-Wheeler Campaign Bonds. Call at once at La Follette-Wheeler Headquarters, Room 1002, 25 W. 43rd Street, New York City.

BOOKS ON THE EAST

The only shop in America specializing in books on all Oriental subjects—Travel, History, Languages, Philosophy and Religion, Art in all its phases including Ceramics, and Oriental Rugs, Mythology, Folklore, etc., etc. Send for catalogues mentioning the subject or country that interests you.

ORIENTALIA, Inc.

32 West 58th St. New York

"NIGHT"

by Harold Brainerd Hersey

Just published, containing forty-four erotic poems with forty-four corresponding illustrations by Elliott Dold. Privately printed from type and the type then distributed. Price $3.00. "Eugenics," Box 77, Sta. G, New York.

THAT BOOK YOU WANT!

We hold an enormous stock. Second-hand and New, all subjects. On approval. Also Rare Books. Catalogues free, mention interests. Commissions executed. FOYLES, 121 Charing Cross Road, London, England.

German Books, Etchings
W. BEYER
213 West 43rd Street, New York City

HOFFMANN SCHOOL

for Individual Development

386 Fort Washington Avenue, New York City

DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL

Rebecca Hoffmann, Director
Dr. Nathan Peyser, Educational Director

Children 4-10 years Bus Service

NEW YORK BRANCH
ELIZABETH DUNCAN SCHOOL
CARNEGIE HALL, STUDIO 61
DANCING CLASSES FOR CHILDREN AND ADULTS—AFTERNOONS AND EVENINGS

"A corner of old Russia in New York"—
THE RUSSIAN INN
33 West 37th St., 'phone Fitzroy 6567
LUNCHEON TEA DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

WOMAN with medical education, who has held executive positions in public health and social work, would like position caring for a family of motherless children, where a liberal point of view would be an asset and a salary paid commensurate with the responsibiilty. Familiar with all details of care of children and of housekeeping. Box 243, care THE NATION.

REFINED FAMILY desires intelligent young man to occupy room, modern conveniences, $20 per month. On E. 11th St. between 2nd and 3rd Aves. Phone Lexington 10493.

Dignified, Exclusive Profession not overrun with competitors. Crowded with opportunity for money-making and big fees. $5000 to $10,000 incomes attained by experts. Easy to master under our correspondence methods. Credentials awarded. We assist students and graduates in getting started and developing their businesses. Established 1916. Write for information; it will open your eyes. Do it today! You'll never regret it!

American Landscape School 200 Newark, N. Y.

Fall Book Section

Truth and Realism in Literature

By MAXWELL BODENHEIM

MOST realistic novels are failures primarily because reality itself is an effective raconteur only when the tale is being physically lived and spoken by people in houses, streets, alleys, and farms. If you have ever witnessed a spontaneous, long-drawn-out, bloody fist-fight or a scene of dramatic greed between two men or the hysteria of a jilted woman or any of the salient climaxes of reality, you have been forced to admit to yourself the impossibility of adequately and fairly describing these happenings. When the incident is related, the reciter must do something else besides furnishing his own detailed version of the plot, words, and appearances. His eye is at best a notoriously defective camera and his ears are unreliable drums pawned to a host of dishonest inaccuracies (the dishonesty may be unconscious, but it is always present to a moderate extent). When he retells the occurrence, the more "real" he strives to make his story the more he will succeed only in disputing and beclouding this precious "reality." His dialogues will never be quite faithful, and his descriptions will always suffer from missing touches of verisimilitude; his recounting of action and motive will be to some extent stunted and set awry by the fixed designs of his prejudice.

A literary creator should regard the words and actions of men and women as nothing more than a luring taunt to his virtues as a dangerous, persuasive, and unfair liar—as a first shove to his distorting intentions. He must be able to daze certain men into accepting his version as a veracious one by the vigorous skill of his conscious or unconscious misrepresentations, and to force other men to retorts and disagreements which will seem angrily impotent when compared to his own words, or lure these men to an unwilling silence. He must look upon creation as the egotistic, unscrupulous branding of himself upon human beings and episodes whose essence is a thousand confused faces, neither of them one whit more plausible than the other. He enters a distraught, elusively vicious, and criss-crossed realm—life—and changes it to the world in which, directly or by inference, he would like to live, or to the ruins by means of which his ego brings distinctness to its dream of solitary disdain. He may create the illusion of truth for other human beings whose inward needs and perceptions are roughly aligned with his, but this must never be his conscious and ruling motive. If it is, he will be disarranging the scene at hand, under the impression that he is disclosing it untouched, and his individuality will become a weakened drudge, hypocritically and evasively marring human beings and their drama, with the air of a just bystander.

For these reasons, many of the realistic novels of our day seem to be the sheerest of "fictions" in comparison to the work of other writers whose prose is patently imaginative, highly colored, and filled with deliberate exaggerations. The imaginative, impressionistic approach, when it is well-executed and not carried out by some tyro, can convey the air of a new or formerly submerged reality which most people were not quick-witted enough to discover, while the "realistic" truth-portrayer, with his homely, carefully natural, homespun array of everyday words and clothings, gives you nothing but the secretly dishonest conversation between a stenographer, a rewrite man, and the victim of their conference.

For instance, the novels of Mr. D. H. Lawrence, often over five hundred pages long, appear to be false and stereotyped when compared to the more subtly compact work of brilliant, young English writers such as Virginia Woolfe and Dorothy Richardson, and one of the reasons is that Lawrence attempts to reproduce laboriously all of the details of his scenes and every slightest word which his characters might have uttered in actual life, while the two women creators use more suggestive and imaginative methods. The following quotation from "Women in Love," by Lawrence, is an illustration of the above-mentioned point:

> "No," she said, "I think that the appeal to patriotism is a mistake. It is like one house of business rivaling another house of business."
>
> "Well, you can hardly say that, can you?" exclaimed Gerald, who had a real passion for discussion. "You couldn't call a race a business concern, could you?—and nationality roughly corresponds to race I think. I think it is meant to."
>
> There was a moment's pause. Gerald and Hermione were always strangely but politely and evenly inimical.
>
> "Do you think race corresponds with nationality?" she asked musingly with expressionless indecision.
>
> Birkin knew she was waiting for him to participate. And dutifully he spoke up.
>
> "I think Gerald is right—race is the essential element in nationality in Europe at least," he said.

The discussion, started thus, goes on without a break through five pages, and the relation between nationality, patriotism, and race is flogged into a score of "Ma, what does this mean?" questions and "It means that a circle is round, Willie" retorts, as though the participants were tussling with a marvelous obtuseness and had not solved the simplest meanings of earthly divisions and procedures. In his eagerness to reproduce a conversation between talkative, educated, middle-class people, without discarding a single word or finger-flourish, Lawrence created nothing but an unconscious, clumsy, redundant caricature of the original men and women. No human beings on earth could ever talk quite as stupidly and verbosely as his characters do, yet his individuals are unreal precisely because he is intent upon truthfully and painstakingly portraying them. He retails their conversations and actions without restraint or imagination, and the souls of his creatures become lost in a welter of verbiage and detailed descriptions; his accounts are usually darkly inflated retailings of sexual lust, or feebly dogmatic discussions on every conceivable subject, from nationality to horse-shoeing, although his aims were entirely different. If you are prone to accept the surface motives and guises of human beings, his arrangements will charm you with their "fidelity" to life, but otherwise you will note scores of discrepancies and avoidances and awkward contortions in the reports.

Creative writing, especially in novels, is after all the ability to lie ferociously, delightfully, and with a canny fusion of under- and overstatements that refuse to place an implicit faith in the flat daylight world of facts and averages. The word "sophistry" was made by this sluggish, daylight land to refute the onslaughts of its most prominent and brilliant enemies.

Iceland's New Birth

By ELIZABETH KNOWLTON

WHEN at last, after days of plunging northward through a wild gray sea, I saw on the horizon the gleaming snow-peaks of Iceland, I felt I had reached the land beyond the rim of the world. That impression was only strengthened by my first sight of Reykjavik, Iceland's capital, a bleak little town of 18,000 inhabitants, with white cement government and business buildings, and brightly painted dwelling houses, all huddled cheerlessly together on a black and treeless lava plain. This frontier settlement is, however, not only the home of a thousand-year-old civilization but the center today of an important literary and artistic movement, a movement that is already making interesting contributions to European culture.

The growth of the movement began with Iceland's struggle for political freedom more than a century ago. A group of young enthusiasts of the 1840's, the Fjolnir, helped arouse the national artistic consciousness, and started to purify the Icelandic language and the Icelandic thought from Danish influence. Then in the latter part of the nineteenth century writers and poets appeared whose work embodied the new-old dreams of an Icelandic national art. Now within the last few years, almost coincident with Iceland's final political triumph in the constitution of 1918, there has come a glorious flaming of native talent. The work of the young Icelandic writers, poets, and artists is rousing interest and enthusiasm over all Northern Europe, and the little island is on her way to winning back at least a part of the position of preeminence which she held in Viking days, when she was the artistic center of the Scandinavian world.

The Sagas and Eddas were all written by Icelanders, and no Norse court eight centuries ago was complete without its Icelandic bard, while on the island itself the general culture was so high that every man was a poet, and the biting lampoon was often used as a weapon of combat. Through the centuries the common people have loved and cherished their literary past; the sagas have been the popular reading in farmhouses during the long, dark winter, and contests in making rimur, a complicated Icelandic verse-form, have always been a favorite amusement. An artistic movement grows naturally among such a people, and it finds everyone, merchant or politician, farmer or fisherman, equally interested in its productions. The leading poets today sell faster than American best-sellers. The paintings of the modern artists hang in every well-to-do home. The new drama is presented by amateur companies, even in the tiny fishing villages of the North. The Icelandic Government also takes a paternal interest in those men whose work shows definite promise, giving them money and buying their paintings and statues for public buildings.

There seems to be, however, no definite fixed group of writers and artists at work in Reykjavik. The Icelander is even today an individualist and a wanderer. One writer has perhaps just returned from America, another from Scotland; a third is on a visit from Copenhagen. Any day a painter may pick up his canvases and sail south across the sea to study or exhibit, and many of the younger men have borrowed a leaf from their Viking ancestors and deliberately invaded another land to conquer it for Iceland. There is now a small colony of them in Copenhagen, where they try out their productions on a larger audience than their native country with its population of less than 100,000 can supply. They write their dramas and novels in both Icelandic and Danish, and it often happens that plays are seen by audiences in Copenhagen long before they reach their native land.

But everything produced anywhere by the Icelandic genius bears the unmistakable mark of its origin. Icelanders cannot escape their distinctive heritage. Most of their prose takes us physically to their barren native country. All of it leads us into a new bleak country of the soul. It is a place of strong passions, deep and repressed, that finally reveal themselves in violent acts, of complex souls tormented in the dark, a place of threatening fate and of terrible natural forces that wait to do its will, of cold and darkness, blizzard and earthquake, gaping chasms and raging torrents. Behind all the clear intellectualized realism of their manner, one feels a great vitality and a powerful primitive force in which their work is rooted and by which it is nourished.

Their poetry is equally grim and characteristic. Of the form of Icelandic verse it is hard for the outsider to speak, for its greatest beauties are peculiarly untranslatable. It is extremely complicated, having rhyme, rhythm, and alliteration, and the Icelandic words have a great many old Norse associations and overtones of meaning. The subject matter is supplied by the Icelandic country: the swans that float on the lonely lakes, the ravens that fly croaking across the lava plains, the aurora that fills the Northern skies with portent, the terror of the winter storms. The weird creatures of old folk-tales also appear, trolls and mountain gnomes, dwarfs and demons. Iceland's poetry shows the same fresh vitality and the same harsh, bold method of treatment as its prose. The old saying "Every Icelander is a poet" has always been true, even when the other arts were dead, and it is doubly true today.

Modern Icelandic painting, though less widely known, is almost equally interesting. There are in Reykjavik a number of young artists painting native landscapes and scenes from peasant life. They are not dominated by any special ism, and the work of the best is beautiful and satisfying.

I had the opportunity, during my stay in Reykjavik, of meeting several of the prominent figures of the Icelandic renaissance. One of the most important and interesting of these is Einar Hjorleifsson Kvaran. Kvaran, "Iceland's greatest master of prose fiction since the saga age" and one of the official candidates for the last Nobel prize, is the dean of Icelandic letters today. Back in the eighties he was one of the first to break away from a slavish imitation of Denmark and to give his genius to the development of the new national literature. He is now a kindly, dignified old man, with a personality that triumphs over careless clothes and plain surroundings. When I visited him he was living some miles away from the capital, on a lonely farmstead on a lava plain stretching down to the sea, but he expected soon to move back into town in order to take part in political affairs. He is still active in literary work, and has in recent years begun a thorough study of spiritualism. Kvaran has become a classic in his lifetime, having outlived most of his great contemporaries.

Another of the big men of the earlier period is Indridi Einarsson, the father of the modern Icelandic theater, who first in the drama, as Kvaran in the novel, reasserted Iceland's right to a literary existence. Einarsson is a sturdy, white-haired figure, with the broad cheekbones of the Norseman and the gentle, dreamy expression of the scholar, the translator into his native tongue of many of the works of Shakespeare, as well as the author of several important original plays, founded on Icelandic history and folk-legends. Einarsson has given his lifetime to building up the Icelandic theater. It is thanks chiefly to him that Reykjavik has for years had a repertory company, which gives Icelandic plays twice a week during the winter. It will soon become a real national theater, suitably housed in a fine building to be paid for by an amusement tax collected through the government.

Of the new writers the very greatest was probably Johan Sigurjonsson, who died recently while still in his thirties. He left behind him a most remarkable series of plays, the best known of which, "Eyvind of the Hills," the story of an early Icelandic outlaw, has already been produced in four European countries and in America. Although most of the younger men are now in Copenhagen, I met in Reykjavik Kamban, who had brought a Danish moving-picture company to Iceland to film his play, "Hadda-Padda." Gudmundur Kamban was first brought into prominence by the enthusiastic support of Georg Brandes, the Danish critic, who has welcomed and praised the work of most of the Icelandic group. Kamban himself is a young man of poise and self-confidence. He hopes some day to make moving pictures out of the finest of the sagas.

Aesgrimur Jonsson, the greatest of the Icelandic painters, proved to be as little as possible like the popular conception of an artist—a plain, unassuming little man, with reddish hair and a square Scandinavian face. "Only a native can paint Iceland," he declares, and during every year he spends many weeks entirely alone in the high mountains and uninhabited wastes. His work is always recognizable because of his remarkable success in reproducing the strange luminous effect of the landscape of Iceland in sunlight, where the air seems almost to shine of itself, and the snow mountains and rocky plains and waters of that bare country are clothed in color.

Before I left Reykjavik I visited the museum of the sculptor, Einar Jonsson, a strange bleak building of his own design, erected for him by the Government, on the plain outside the city. Here I found put in actual tangible form that strong and vital imaginative force, that new vision, which is Iceland's gift to the world. Sculpture in Iceland today is practically a one-man job, but of all the figures of the Icelandic renaissance Jonsson is perhaps the most widely known. Although he is one of the younger men he has already a European reputation and has even exhibited in the United States. In Fairmount Park in Philadelphia there now stands his statue of Thorfinnur Karlsefni, the Icelander who ten centuries ago was the first settler on the American continent. Jonsson's work is typical of the new Icelandic spirit in art. It is different, it is expressive, it is crowded and overcrowded with ideas and with emotion. It is a definite rebellion against the classic, an assertion of belief in an art peculiarly for the Nordic peoples; and a conscious groping for a form, a method, and a content which shall express—as the classic sculpture expressed the simplicity and purity of the Greek ideal—that thoughtful, tormented, grim beauty which is the distinctive conception of the Northern races.

Henry Seidel Canby[1]

By HENRY SEIDEL CANBY

THE subject of this sketch has been accused of common sense and credited with good judgment. If he possesses them, which is by no means certain, they are defensive qualities engendered in the attempt to protect himself against a constant inner conflict. Canby is a Quaker by inherited temperament, an Epicurean by taste and desire. His ancestors wore plain clothing for the soul's sake, but bought expensive books and admirable furniture. Spiritually he resembles them.

The essence of Quakerism is of course the Inner Light. But that explains nothing. The Quaker temperament is more important than the Quaker theology. Such a temperament is obsessed by the need of meditation, even in the midst of a most active life. Where other men live by the impulse of the moment, or rest upon principle, or ask reasons only, the essential Quaker is consciously or subconsciously, no matter which, seeking to be in accord with his universe. It may be crepuscular beauty or the flash of swallows' wings; and indeed even the primitive Quakers, so notoriously insensitive to art, were respondent to natural beauty. It may be a thrill of ethical impulse or spiritual aspiration stirring in discord or worldliness. This irrepressible desire gives the true Quaker an ever-ready sympathy and a tolerance of strange circumstance. For who can tell by formula (so they said in seventeenth-century meeting houses) where God may not be manifest!

Canby is possessed of this intense desire to be in accord with the human spirit as it moves darkly, but like most congenital Protestants he blends it with the reformer's desire to make others as Quaker as himself. This led him into the teaching of literature and kept him at it for twenty years, and is the cause and motive of his present concern with editing a journal whose duty is to propagate sound criticism. If he had been a purer spirit he would have long since let meditation shape his career and produced better books, or, in happier accord with nature and the complex of wills that surrounded him, no books at all. He came to New England from his native Delaware at the tender age of eighteen. That saved him from the comfortable inertia of the spirit which has made good Republicans and honest capitalists of so many descendants of the old stock, but infected him with zeal, the bacteria of Puritanism, from which complete recovery is rare.

The search for the Inner Light teaches caution. Its destination is illimitable, the ways diverse, deception easy, satisfaction impossible except by complete accord. The old Quakers grew rich almost necessarily, for their caution in the dangerous by-paths of the world made them prosperous even when they were not successful. And Canby, by his inheritance as well as by his desire, has been cautious in enthusiasm and condemnation. This makes for good judgment, but hinders the development of ideas, the formation of a school, the forming of a program. His program, indeed, he could never formulate; for the wish to reconcile incompatibles and find a harmony in a world that may be dualistic or chaotic is an aspiration, not a program; and success would be an emotion rather than a theory. But so it is with all good Quakers.

[1] This is the seventh in a series of articles by American critics on themselves. Heywood Broun, Ludwig Lewisohn, H. L. Mencken, Carl Van Doren, Llewellyn Jones, and Harry Hansen have appeared; E. W. Howe, John Macy, and others are to follow.

It is doubtful, however, whether Canby would have turned, for good or ill, to literature, if it had not been for an almost violent Epicureanism, drawn from Heaven knows where, but clouding as well as enriching what might have been a serene life as a lawyer or scientist whose concern for the Inner Light began and ended at home. He grew up, like so many of his generation, in a world where family life was rich and outward experience of beauty and adventure rare and thin. The desires for both which another age or another environment would have readily satisfied were checked by circumstance and inhibited by the native caution of the Quaker, which taught self-control and the discharge of immediate duty as the first defense against worldliness. They defended only too well; kept the spirit cool and contemplative, but the senses overcharged with desire for active employment. The university in those days was half Puritan, half barbarous. Europe turned the key and literature, painting, and architecture opened the door. Nevertheless, Canby manifests today all the symptoms of an inhibited nature seeking with a belated youthfulness for miscellaneous sensation as well as harmonious accord.

The search for the Inner Light and the desire for experience of joy, beauty, excitement are not always, or often, consistent. That is the inner conflict which increases the native caution of such a Quaker, and induces a restlessness where there should be calm. Has such a temperament anything to contribute to literary criticism? Canby would answer, yes, if the desire for experience once satisfied allows the mind to reflect and create in the peace that follows achievement. Such a consummation is difficult, for there is always one more experience to be encountered. Therefore Canby's position as a critic and writer cannot yet be summed up without overestimate of an influence making for tolerant and sympathetic judgment which may quickly pass, or injustice to a literary effort which is only under way and may or may not go further. But that Canby is a Quaker in criticism, in conduct, in philosophy, and in everything but the formal sectarianism of that religious society he would have to admit, or be unable either to explain or to justify his erratic course through the professions and the intellectual responsibilities he has somewhat too blithely assumed.

Gifts

By MAY WILLIAMS WARD

I have had lovers and would-be lovers.
  One brought burning lips;
One, a restlessness such as hovers
  Over ships;
One brought a whirlwind of merrymaking;
  One, his first-born song—
(For a little I might have been his for the taking,
  Not for long.)
So many disturbing gifts—even the singing—
  And not a giver guessed
I shall be won by a lover bringing
  Only rest. . . .

Books

Emily Dickinson

The Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson. By Martha Dickinson Bianchi. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson. With an introduction by her niece Martha Dickinson Bianchi. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

BECAUSE it is the familiar fate of most rare spirits and great innovators to be foolishly misvalued, one should not be surprised, having found in her poetry a most astonishing Emily Dickinson, to turn through the first half of her "Life and Letters"—that is, the Life, by her niece—and find only a mundane reproduction along family lines. Where are the bold and capricious and impassioned colors that lie so marvelously beside the nun-like gray and spiritual azure of her nature? Not here. This is the supreme irony of the book: Emily's family still has her under lock and key; so far as such devices are powerful at all, they are still, forty years after her death, the chief concern of this single surviving Dickinson. Reticence, good taste, Amherst sensibilities—all the forces that stifled and warped the living girl are here again, silencing the events of her life and destroying her letters, as perfect in many instances as her poems. I have merely to refer the reader to the 1894 edition of the letters and certain passages in the later chapters of this volume to illustrate Mme Bianchi's shortcomings. As to the maltreatment of the poetry in the past, let anyone compare the facsimile reproduction of Renunciation in "Poems: Second Series" with the printed version, in that series edited at the request of her sister Lavinia by Higginson and Todd. In every instance this freshest of spring water has had to come through the filter of common and cloudy minds.

Such outrageous tampering with the facts in the life of a nearly inexplicable woman, and with her priceless writings, cannot, however, be the only significance—serious as it is—of the publication of this book. For those who do not know the real Emily there remain her letters and certain significant incidents in the narrative to send them flying toward discovery.

Although the total story, as told in black and white, is not particularly illuminating, a wealth of detail remains for any one who cares to write his own spiritual biography of Emily. Like Margaret Fuller, the woman of action in that narrow and remote society, Emily, the artist and ascetic, clearly had a father. Again like Margaret, at an early age she calls herself a Whig and suggests that she would like to vote and read politics. We discover that she lived by Keats for sensuous richness, by Browning for outspoken zest (calling "Men and Women" a "broad book"); cherishing the extravagance and waggery of Dickens, and brooding over the fortunes of Elizabeth Barrett, George Eliot, and Emily Brontë, her far-away kin.

Of the central drama of her life, from which came such fragments as

> So we must keep apart,
> You there, I here,
> With just the door ajar
> That oceans are,
> And prayer,
> And that pale sustenance, > Despair!

we have very little, but for imagination enough. The truth of the story here has recently been disputed by a family friend who insists that the real tale is neither so conventionally noble nor so simple. From the present book we gather that the man Emily Dickinson loved was a minister in Philadelphia who begged her to run away with him and, when she refused, took his wife and child to the Pacific coast, dying there many years later. God and death, throughout Emily's whole passionate utterance, take on a new meaning when remembered with these facts.

She rebelled against drab morality and theology—she rebelled against death and loss and anguish—but death and God became in the end the symbols of her fulfilment.

Putting poems, letters, and life side by side, another much-suppressed clue emerges. God and father are evidently closely linked, and the recluse and unmarried spinster daughter of a rich man had a significant economic problem when seen by the light of

> Twice have I stood a beggar
> Before the door of God!
> ▪ ▪ ▪
> Burglar, banker, father,
> I am poor once more!

But you will not get to the bottom of Emily Dickinson even in the letters. Here our difficulty is not the niece, but the great original herself. The letters, like the poems, suggest a depth quite beyond any plummet except that of another such spirit. Certainly Emily had her beginnings and many of her conclusions in human and natural dilemmas; and some of these are herein shown. Within herself she performed miracles—that hardest and slowest miracle, chiefly, of self-mastery and self-expression.

Two emotions seem to do battle back and forth: there is the constant triumphant note of her victorious self, and, struggling with that, a less obtrusive anguish and rebellion, always spoken in language too cryptic to trouble those about her. Most poignant of all is this line to a child too young to understand—written curiously enough to the Martha Dickinson who edits the present volume: "Dear Mattie: Be sure to live in vain, dear. I wish I had. Emily."

As to explaining the artist, there is no explanation. How such a woman could write The Railway Train:

> I like to see it lap the miles,
> And lick the valleys up,
> And stop to feed itself at tanks;
> And then, prodigious, step
>
> Around a pile of mountains,
> And, supercilious, peer
> In shanties by the sides of roads;
> And then a quarry pare
>
> To fit its sides, and crawl between,
> Complaining all the while
> In horrid, hooting stanza;
> Then chase itself down hill
>
> And neigh like Boanerges;
> Then, punctual as a star,
> Stop—docile and omnipotent—
> At its own stable door.

a few years after the first of these whistled into Amherst, and in doing so, write perhaps the only poem, for all our conscientious attempts, that makes art of the machine age—this puzzle, besides many subtler ones, we shall not solve.

Nor shall we discover here the secret of her strange technical power, unless in the stray remark that Emily was something of a musician. Her verse, which is to our whang-bang school poor technique, accomplishes the most miraculous sound-flutings; her assonance-rhyme, like her thought, is a tone that opens in the central atom of feeling, outward. Her images, magnificent, tempered, utterly her own, make her the only genuine Imagist.

In the collected work we are face to face with a startling personality and one of unusually diverse qualities. Emily's poems are played on plucked strings, on an instrument of great variety and range. Her scope is wide, and the tones are many—she finds infinite subtleties between the gaps of our crude scale—but there is only one method, the direct stroke of a bold hand. She had no bow as has Edna Millay, who by one long sweep gives us a lyric line of marvelous power. This inability to link words endlessly with gathering speed has kept Emily from having an understanding audience. Her gift is static—"to scalp the naked soul" by an instant's sound and image.

However they may outdo her in cumulative melody, Emily surpasses our contemporaries, Edna Millay and Elinor Wylie, in the simple matter of range. From this silver bliss:

> I taste a liquor never brewed,
> From tankards scooped in pearl;
> Not all the vats upon the Rhine
> Yield such an alcohol!
>
> Inebriate of air am I,
> And debauchee of dew,
> Reeling, through endless summer days,
> From inns of molten blue.
>
> When landlords turn the drunken bee
> Out of the foxglove's door,
> When butterflies renounce their drams,
> I shall but drink the more!
>
> Till seraphs swing their snowy hats,
> And saints to windows run,
> To see the little tippler
> Leaning against the sun!

she runs the clear half-notes downward to:

> The heart asks pleasure first,
> And then, excuse from pain;
> And then, those little anodynes
> That deaden suffering;
>
> And then, to go to sleep;
> And then if it should be
> The will of its Inquisitor,
> The liberty to die.

Two poems on death, numbered in this collection XX and XXII, stand alone, I think, in the whole world's literature. No other poet has said what is herein said. The nearest approach would be the utterance of a Shakespearean woman with Hamlet's soul. But perhaps the bleak and religious Emily has been overstressed at the expense of the capricious and nimble one. Papa Above! Regard a Mouse and

> Lightly stepped a yellow star
> To its lofty place,
> Loosed the Moon her silver hat
> From her lustral face.
> All the evening softly lit
> As an astral hall—
> "Father," I observed to Heaven,
> "You are punctual."

merely suggest the merry irreverence that runs like a stream, through light and shade, in her work.

We find the images—lightning "skipping like mice" and a snake "unbraiding like a whip-lash in the sun"—a wealth of homely memory and fancy. But we cherish above even these delights the utterance of the impalpable. "Pain has an element of blank" begins one poem. And again this:

> Elysium is as far as to
> The very nearest room,
> If in that room a friend await
> Felicity or doom.
>
> What fortitude the soul contains,
> That it can so endure
> The accent of a coming foot,
> The opening of a door!

Poor Emily who could not write like Lowell and Longfellow! She could not. She wrote in secret, for herself alone, and now we find her, in the company of the maddest and most stubbornly realistic men, Blake, Shakespeare, and Browning.

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

Wilsoniana

Woodrow Wilson: A Character Study. By Robert Edwards Annin. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

With Congress and Cabinet. By William C. Redfield. Doubleday, Page and Company. $3.

MR. ANNIN'S analysis of the personality of Woodrow Wilson is one of the two serious works which thus far exist dealing with the whole career of the late ex-President. The author is a prominent business man engaged in export shipping, was a fellow-student with Mr. Wilson at Princeton, has been prominent in Princeton alumni affairs, was a close friend of the late Moses Taylor Pyne of the Princeton board of trustees, and has long been intimate with Dean Andrew F. West. These affiliations at once reveal him as a critic of Mr. Wilson, but his book is in no sense a diatribe. Wilson's superior qualities and more notable achievements are in the main set forth as clearly and generously as they are in the eulogistic biographies by Hale and Dodd. At the same time his weaknesses and failures are also given due space—this being the unique and novel aspect of the book.

Mr. Annin has not essayed to write a systematic biography. Rather he has utilized the more important facts in the successive stages of Wilson's personal, professional, and public career as the basis for an interpretation of the personality, aims, and methods of the man. While his psychology is of a non-academic and non-clinical "common-sense" variety, he gives evidence of no little subtlety and keenness in character analysis. The different chapters vary greatly in value. Those on the period up to 1914, and the last four, summarizing the more important alleged traits of Wilson's personality, are highly illuminating and suggestive and to a large degree convincing. Those dealing with the war period are disappointing and misleading because Mr. Annin apparently has not revised his views since 1917, and writes somewhat after the fashion of Mr. Roosevelt's "Shadow Lawn" speech of 1916.

Mr. Annin's treatment of the period of Wilson's life prior to his assumption of the presidency of Princeton is brief, but suffices to show that the traits which he manifested as chief executive were apparent in his student days and throughout his professorial career. As student and professor he was distinguished for casuistic acumen, readiness as a debater, rhetorical talent of a high order, impressive oratory, and a certain degree of intellectual audacity and originality, which were in no sense associated with notable doctrinal heterodoxy, profundity, or logical consistency. When he became president of Princeton these characteristics persisted, developed, and bore fruit. Mr. Annin concedes to Wilson a wise and progressive program of educational policy and vigorous devotion to its execution, but maintains that he was ambitious for more comprehensive and rapid changes than were possible, impatient of restraint or opposition, often inconsistent or illogical in the combination of different and in part mutually exclusive plans, unscrupulous in method, opportunist in attitude, domineering in leadership, and careless in fulfilment of promises and obligations. Most instructive of all, however, is Mr. Annin's contention that the Princeton presidency constituted the logical and adequate apprenticeship for the later position of chief executive of the country. From 1902 onward Wilson built up a personal political machine at Princeton in which he applied all the methods of executive and party leadership which made him so successful in 1913-14. The apparent sharp break in his life following 1910 was, then, but a transfer of his technique and endeavors to another related realm of human activity. He was no tyro in political methods when he assumed the governorship of New Jersey in 1911. As soon as opposition to his policies at Princeton became formidable he adopted a procedure which was sure to ruin his chances of success there but which would bring him into the public eye in spectacular fashion, namely, that of carrying his fight to the alumni throughout the Eastern United States and representing it (rather inaccurately) to be a struggle between plutocratic control and scholarly independence in higher education. His plan succeeded, and the nomination for Governor of New Jersey saved him from humiliation at Princeton.

As president of Princeton, Governor of New Jersey, President of the United States during his first term, War-President, and peace negotiator, Wilson started with brilliant success accompanied by much adulation, which begat a certain degree of dogmatism and arrogance and encouraged a willingness to give ubiquitous advice and guidance in all fields of human endeavor. When opposition arose he exhibited intolerance and impatience, but proved a courageous and persistent, if ruthless, fighter unless the battle seemed to be going against him. Up to the time of his final collapse fate invariably intervened to snatch him from defeat and degradation and place him where he could repeat the drama on a larger and more striking and impressive stage. The selection as president of Princeton came at a time when his somewhat striking qualities as a teacher were beginning to arouse less enthusiasm than formerly; the nomination for Governor saved him from abasement at Princeton; the nomination for President of the United States rescued him from oblivion in New Jersey; Mr. Hughes's folly during his visit to California in 1916 averted his retirement to private life in March, 1917; the declaration of war made him the rhetorical leader of the Allies and the most powerful figure on earth from 1917 to 1919. As peace negotiator he received the plaudits of Europe as has no other single person before or since, and these were able to drown out the echoes of his domestic repudiation in the congressional election of 1918. His "peace of justice" turned out to be one of the most oppressive peace treaties in history, yet his reputation might have been preserved but for the senior Senator from Massachusetts. Had the League of Nations been accepted by the United States it is highly probable that Wilson would have been its first president (though he may not have entertained any such ambition). In such an event it is an interesting, if futile, conjecture as to how he could have been saved, short of divine intervention and translation, when his forward-looking but rhetorical and metaphysical internationalism had been wrecked by the realistic nationalism and militarism of M. Poincaré.

The remaining demonstration of major interest in Mr. Annin's book is that of Wilson's inability to retain close personal friends in professional life, and his willingness to repudiate those who had served him faithfully, once their association with him had become a liability rather than an asset. Miss Thomas, Pyne, Smith, Harvey, McCombs, Bryan, House, Lansing, and Tumulty constitute an impressive necrological succession. While the book is to be taken cum grano, and should be constantly paralleled by the account in Professor Dodd's apologia, yet it is unquestionably the most searching and significant study which has thus far been made of the interesting personality of Woodrow Wilson. But we shall never attain any satisfactory definitive estimate of that baffling psyche until we have been more adequately oriented by better historical perspective, and have been able to obtain from acquaintances, physicians, and neurologists some credible and significant information as to his ancestry, youth, and physical and mental health.

It was a well-intentioned but simple-minded and colorless business man who served as Secretary of Commerce under Wilson. Taken as a whole Mr. Redfield's book seems hardly worthy of publication in such admirable format. It contains, to be sure, interesting sidelights and observations on Washington affairs, but they touch only on matters that have been revealed more thoroughly in many earlier books. Mr. Redfield is eminently a person of the "Honest-to-God" variety; he could not have been an enthusiastic reader of the "Mirrors of Washington." His style is commonplace but his expression is direct and rendered concrete by many personal anecdotes, which are not, however, always relevant or illuminating. The dramatic high point in the book is his account of watching the second Mrs. Wilson climb through a window in the Bureau of Standards Building. In his account of his relations with the official family of the Wilson Administration there is little of value or novelty. His attitude toward President Wilson is sympathetic but reverential and adulatory. Of some significance is his reference to the President's statement to him: "Sometimes as I sit here I feel as if the whole American people were looking in the White House window. I hope they know I am trying to do the work well." His contributions to the official activities of the Cabinet as a group extended to protecting it from vulgar eavesdroppers at the Shoreham luncheons and to keeping Franklin K. Lane awake by poking him in the ribs with his elbows during cabinet meetings. Most readers will probably concede that the latter was a positive service to the cause of efficiency in American public life which by itself justified Mr. Redfield's attendance at cabinet meetings. Many characteristics of the author revealed by this book indicate that if he could also lay claim to a vote-getting legend he would have been the appropriate candidate to carry the Democratic banner against Mr. Coolidge in another Tweedledee versus Tweedledum campaign. HARRY ELMER BARNES

Mr. Forster Looks at India

A Passage to India. By E. M. Forster. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MR. E. M. FORSTER stands apart from the main movements of present-day English literature. He has a striking lack of eagerness for doing the things which other writers do, a striking freedom from the mob instinct in a region where it is today strongest, among writers and artists. He is inclined toward the ironical school of which Mr. Lytton Strachey is the instructor, but he differs from Mr. Strachey's pupils in an important respect: they underline their inclination until they succeed in making it resemble Mr. Strachey's as closely as possible, but Mr. Forster lets his remain where it is, supported on itself. His work is a work of inclinations, adroitly balanced, and rarely slipping into the faux pas of a decision. With great tact he knows how to go half-way in any given direction, and his talent consists in knowing exactly where the half-way point is. This knowledge implies a great deal of experience in reserve behind it, and there is no doubt that that experience is real. Mr. Forster gives his reservations the weight of categories which everybody would be more intelligent by accepting; and no doubt they would, though Mr. Forster attaches too much importance to intelligence. He writes always as a man who knows better than any one else while not insisting on the fact. And he writes thus because he is, first, a capable man, and, secondly, a man of taste. He knows where he stands; he has found his place, and there is a note of assurance, accordingly, in all he says. But although his utterance is genuine as that of few of his contemporaries is, one doubts whether it is profound. The intellect is not exercised to its utmost in going half-way in all directions. Practical expedience, intelligence of a rare kind, may be shown in doing that; but hardly wisdom, not the passion for truth which animates great art. Mr. Forster does not possess these qualities; on the other hand, he has an intelligence of greater force and purity than that of any other imaginative writer today. That intelligence is a scrupulously truthful one; but

ABLE BOOKS

GHTON LIN CO.

Great Novels of Decade

Little h Girl

uglas Sedgwick and truth tell- lix, the heroine, ting creature. I lmiration of the touch which once the typical e of her country me time an indi- n being."—Dor- ield Fisher in ay Review of ven me the pro- easure. Close- nant, vivid, it is time a piece of ychological ex- ' — Katharine rould.

g perfection of ." — Gamaliel important book l of the current ction."—N. Y.

POLITICS UNITED ATES

. Haynes

hardly be better campaign year."— ews. $3.50

HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN FRONTIER

Frederic L. Paxon

The first complete history of the American frontier from 1763 to 1893. A permanent contribution to American historical writing.

With maps. $6.00

RELIGIOUS LIFE IN ANCIENT EGYPT

Sir W. F. Petrie

A companion book to "Social Life in Ancient Egypt"; a study of a most fascinating phase of Egyptian life. Illus. $2.00

THE FALL OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC

Hendrick W. Van Loon

A new edition with delightful pen-and-ink illustrations by the author. Illus. $5.00

MEDIEVAL PEOPLE

Eileen Power

The life of the peasant and the middle classes described vividly and with profound knowledge. Illus. $2.00

INDIA: A Bird's-Eye View

Earl of Ronaldshay

A concise and authoritative survey of present-day India by the former Governor-General of Bengal. Illus. $5.00

PARTY BATTLES OF THE JACKSON PERIOD

Claude G. Bowers

A New Popular Edition of this brilliant biographical study called by Senator Beveridge "as fascinating as a novel of Dumas. $2.00

rs, please mention The Nation

Bitter Mirth

Rue with a Difference. By Charles Recht. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

MR. CHARLES RECHT is cultivating one of the most significant varieties of the new novel; in "Rue with a Difference" he has produced a book which, like the novels of Aldous Huxley, is absolutely of the present moment and takes its mood of spiritual perplexity from the atmosphere which the most typical representatives of modern intellectual movements are compelled to breathe. The plot, the setting, and the personages of such a novel may be any at all, but three things determine its nature: first, its central and only important character is the author himself; second, his attitude toward himself is half mockery, half despair; and third, its theme is the inability of the modern man to orient himself spiritually in the world which his intellect perceives. Casually the hero accepts, as all accept, the spiritual iconoclasm of science, and in the detachment of ordinary life he has learned to play with the cynical wisdom of biology and psychology which explain away the awe of emotional experience just as earlier science explained away the awe of conventional piety. Yet under the stress of an unexpected emotional crisis, knowledge is quite incapable of controlling his emotions or of justifying them to himself. In love he calls upon the illusion of man's grandeur and dignity to help him to accept his emotions, and faced with tragedy he calls upon illusion to dignify his suffering; but lyric flight is checked by the rationality which he has always cultivated, and in the world of metabolism and hormones, repressions and complexes, he finds no answer for his needs. He is feeling about love, for instance, as a troubadour felt, but he is thinking, perforce, as a clever young man of the twentieth century is compelled to feel. Try as he will the two halves of his soul will not coalesce and he cannot either feel as his intelligence tells him he should feel or think as his emotions would have him think, and thus he mocks his torn and divided soul but cannot hide his pain. He can neither inhibit the extravagance of romantic love nor believe that love to be other than a pestilential irrationality.

It makes little difference what incidents Mr. Recht has chosen to body forth this conflict. It happens that his hero is a writer of advertisements, that the circumstance which precipitates his problem is love for a girl quite worthless in herself but become unfortunately the symbol of his desire, and that the end of the story (for there is no solution) is murder and a trial by jury. These things are merely the accidents of the theme; its central problem is the problem so familiar in contemporary literature: How, as Mr. Recht ingeniously phrases it, shall Homer Saddletree, a well-educated inditer of prose poems in praise of balloon tires, wear the rue which an utterly impossible love affair has thrust upon him? Obviously not as some knight might have worn it, reverently trusting in the religious mystery of love, and obviously not as some psychiatrist, himself quite free from emotion, might suggest, merely as an interesting specimen of psychical botany—no, it must be worn with a difference and that difference must somehow express a tender emotional acceptance and a scornful intellectual rejection all at once. But that, unfortunately, is a very hard style indeed to catch.

There is a good deal that is still tentative in Mr. Recht's technique. He is not quite sure how he wants to conduct his story and the whole gives a patchy effect, with sections of narrative and sections of speculation in unfused contact. Moreover the murder is hardly convincing, though it is necessary as preparation for the trial scene, which is quite the most passionately felt part of the book; but he finds many and ingenious ways of giving the central problem concrete expression. When, for example, he translates the advice, given by a friend, to see his beloved as "a relative thing—a use—a method" into the admonition "Let your champagne go flat so that you can convince yourself that the bubbles are nothing but air," he has put into a phrase the whole problem, which is simply how to enjoy the magic wine of emotion in the full consciousness that it is intellectually reducible to a commonplace.

The present reviewer has heard calm people assert, not only that they found in anthropology, biology, or psychology nothing to disturb the tenor of their emotions but also that the whole thesis here discussed is nonsense and that no peculiarly modern disorganization of mind exists. He, however, prefers to take the testimony of much in contemporary letters and to assume that there does exist a widening gulf between current modes of thinking and current modes of feeling, that while science has approached existence from one angle, emotion and to some extent art have approached it from another and older angle, so that many people, at once sensitive and intelligent, do suffer from a sort of permanent split in the soul which prevents their achieving a stable and harmonious way of life. Somewhat analogous problems may have arisen before. Doubtless religious people accustomed to the cozy old cosmography experienced something remotely similar when astronomy shattered it and exposed them to the cold immensities of space which contained no sign of the heaven they had come to depend upon; though their problem no longer troubles us we have our own difficulties. The Elizabethan lover in the grip of irrational passion could accept the decree of the Implacable Aphrodite and retain his self-respect, but it is more humiliating to be compelled to bow down before a carefully catalogued psychosis. We instinctively feel, not only toward love but toward a whole series of phenomena like patriotism and morals, for example, in an old traditional manner, while we think about them in another—because new knowledge has come too rapidly to be emotionally assimilated. Mr. Recht's hero believes that his infatuation is a vulgar phenomenon which reason should dissipate, but he knows equally that his romantic love is a hard fact. How of these two things may he make a poem when he cannot even respect his own pain?

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Mystic and Rationalist

Carlyle and Mill. By Emery Neff. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

TWO great and good men, brought together by common interests and hopes, cultivating for some years a warm friendship, gradually drawing apart as their differences more and more clearly revealed themselves, living the rest of their lives in keen and even bitter intellectual opposition, and dying at last unreconciled, neither having learned how to help the other in pursuit of a common end—such is Mr. Neff's picture of Carlyle and Mill, two outstanding figures in the first era of modern thinking in the industrial world. "Mill," says Mr. Neff, "had the ideas which were to mold the future, but endeavored to propagate them by the inefficient methods of eighteenth-century rationalism. Carlyle knew the best devices of present-day propaganda, but his ideas lagged in the feudal epoch."

United, he suggests, they might have helped England answer many of the questions which still divide her, even today. Both saw that the economic problem underlay the political. Both knew that the system of irresponsible private property and free competition was impoverishing the nation physically, intellectually, and morally, and was sowing seeds of class war. Sympathizing with the demand of the common people for suffrage as a means of taking government out of the hands of "fat, elderly gentlemen" incompetent to rule, both yet profoundly distrusted the wisdom of the uneducated masses, and would have persuaded them to depend on the judgment of men of conspicuous ability. Both had much the same vision of a more humane economic order influenced by ethical and aesthetic considerations. Both were consumed by a fiery zeal for practical activity in bettering the human lot. "The words Duty, Justice, Goodness, and Truth were for them like an awing glory, like the Uplifted Host."

Six distinguished men and women of letters have already announced their belief that THE NEW SPOON RIVER is a more important, a greater and more enduring volume of poetry and a truer commentary upon our life than the original Spoon River Anthology. It gives the changes which industry and immigration have wrought in Spoon River.

The New SPOON RIVER
by EDGAR LEE MASTERS

Regular Edition $2.50 Limited Signed Edition $10.

Ben Hecht's
HUMPTY DUMPTY
is his most vigorous presentation of the case of the individual against the many and the gods of the many; a high-hearted novel for the reader who likes his fiction charged with thought and graced with style. (October 25th.) $2.00

Waldo Frank's
CHALK FACE
is a mystery story that restores the thriller to literature. Over and above the physical mystery is a rarely and beautifully conceived psychological mystery—one of the most distinguished offerings of the season. (October 11th) $2.00

Henry James Forman's
SUDDEN WEALTH
is a timely novel in this day of conscience-stricken millionaires. It tells of the effects upon some ordinary human beings of an unexpected great inheritance. (October 11th) $2.00

George F. Hummel's
SUBSOIL
Author of "After All" (10th edition)
"It carries assurance that among us another novelist of serious mien and firm proportion is rising to his true height."—N. Y. Evening Post. $2.00

Bercovici's
ILIANA
Every one of the stories in this book was awarded three-star ranking by Mr. Edward J. O'Brien in his annual summary. "Bercovici is a superb story-teller. He is like one of his own gypsy wandering minstrels."—N. Y. Times. $2.00

Charles Recht's
RUE WITH A DIFFERENCE
"Lest it be thought that Mr. Recht's story lacks interest by reason of seriousness and social criticism, we hasten to add that it is unusually rich in fictional values."—The New Republic. $2.50

Two New Books by
DR. SIGMUND FREUD

"Both author and publisher have conferred upon the general public a great boon. They merit the thanks of all for a work which stimulates thought and research at the same time that it edifies."—Eve. Post Literary Review. $3.50 confute the report, carried in front page stories that Dr. Freud had renounced Psychoanalysis. They are extensions of psychoanalysis into New Realms of Human Consciousness. "BEYOND THE PLEASURE PRINCIPLE" ($1.50) an investigation into human awareness of death, "GROUP PSYCHOLOGY AND THE ANALYSIS OF THE EGO" an application of Psychoanalysis to crowd instincts. $2.00

PRIMITIVE RELIGION
by Dr. Robert H. Lowie
Author of "Primitive Society"
(5th edition)

The Inheritance Of Acquired Characteristics
by Dr. Paul Kammerer
The book contains an exhaustive study and complete documentation of this important subject, and gives an account of Dr. Kammerer's revolutionary experiments which virtually offer laboratory proof of evolution. Illustrated. $4.50

THE POEMS OF VILLON
Translated by John Heron Lepper
Not only is the new John Heron Lepper translation included—British critics regard it as the most successful rendering yet made—but the complete version as well of John Payne and versions of Swinburne, Symons, Rossetti and Pound. Published Oct. 25th. Definitive, Complete, Unabridged Edition. Limited to 1,000 copies. $6.00

IMAGINARY LIVES
by Marcel Schwob
"We have been enchanted by no such historical wizardry since we read Gobineau's 'Renaissance' and Merejkowski's 'Leonardo.' — William Rose Benét in The Saturday Review of Literature. "A unique and delicious book."—N. Y. Evening Post. $2.50

MOSES
by Lawrence Langner
"MOSES reveals in a superlative degree the qualities of Shaw's great historical comedies. I can think of no dramatist but Shaw who could have conceived and executed a play about Moses in this fashion." — Ernest Boyd in N. Y. Sun. $2.00

The Private Life of Louis XV
by Mouffle d'Angerville
This volume reveals Louis XV as a human being who showed true royal courage and dignity and who was forced into illicit amours by the frigidity and religiosity of his wife. Illustrated. $3.50

Japanese Fairy Tales
by Lafcadio Hearn
"All told, the book is a notable addition to juvenile literature—real literature."—Springfield Republican. "The pictures by Gertrude Kay faithfully follow the style of Japanese prints . . . a worthy addition to any library."—Chicago Post. $1.50

Sticks & Stones
by Lewis Mumford
Mr. Mumford, through the history of American architecture, tells us some extraordinary things about American social tendencies and American civilization. $2.50

Conversations In Ebury Street
by George Moore is the first book by George Moore for general circulation in years. Its handsome format will be a consolation for those who could not afford it in the limited Carra Edition. $2.50

Among the Brahmins and Pariahs
by J. H. Sauter
This is a translation from the notable German work which English critics declare to be the best book on India in many years. $3.00

Have You Read These Fine Novels?
THE BACK OF THE BOOK, by Margaret Leech
WHO WOULD BE FREE, by Marian Spitzer
BE GOOD SWEET MAID, by Anthony Wharton Each $2.00
Write for the complete Fall Catalog.

BONI & LIVERIGHT GOOD BOOKS 61 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK, N.Y.

THAIS by ANATOLE FRANCE is the latest volume in the Modern Library

Another modern masterpiece joins its hundred-odd fellows in the Modern Library. THAIS is the most carefully wrought and profoundly imagined work of the great French writer. In limp binding, stained top, gold stamped, convenient pocket and library size, hand bound and printed on fine paper in clear good type. 95c.

Coming in October and November, an OUTLINE OF PSYCHOANALYSIS, Edited by J. S. Van Teslaare and PLAYS BY MOLIERE, Edited by Waldo Frank. Write for the illustrated, complete catalog.

With all these points of agreement, they were yet fatally divided by differences of temperament, which led them to increasing disagreement on particular measures, Carlyle tending more and more to trust the right-thinking hero-master with a sword, Mill inclining to wait on the slow, painful processes of education in a democracy. The same strife continues today, in the intellectual as in the political world. Perhaps it is true, as suggested, that no reconciliation is possible.

Mr. Neff's book is not essentially biography, and it contains little of biographical detail or personal gossip. Its author deals with Carlyle and Mill not as isolated literary phenomena but as "largely typical of the intellectual and spiritual history of the age of transition into our twentieth-century world." The agencies of transition were industrialism, democracy, and pure science. So Mr. Neff makes a rapid survey of the material, economic, and political changes of the early nineteenth century and the accompanying revolution of thought concerning social affairs, as represented in the writings of Bentham and the classical economists on the one hand and the replies of their opponents on the other. Probably no technical specialist will be entirely satisfied with every detail of the resulting picture; yet it is an encouraging sign of the times that a study in literature should concern itself so largely, not with matters of form or literary sources but with the conditions of living and thinking that give meaning to literature. In the development of science, the necessary process of analysis and specialization has run mad. To those who doggedly believe in the underlying unity of life and of human experience it is therefore cheering to note among our younger scholars multiplying indications of an attempt at the more difficult task of synthesis. If these writers do not always give tithe of mint and anise and cummin, perhaps they are no less obedient to the weightier matters of the law. The world stands much in need of their courage.

From the study of men like Carlyle and Mill one rises with a renewed sense of the continuity of human experience and thought, of the oldness and the freshness of real ideas. After all, Mill said everything that is to be said in behalf of liberalism in economics and politics. In fact, the half-century that has elapsed since his death has only given added point to most of his observations and warnings. Carlyle, too, thundering at the iniquities of laissez-faire and the cash nexus, and crying out for real leadership as the condition of anything better, might well be the voice of those bewildered hosts today caught in the grip of forces that they cannot control and crying aloud to their god: "Make us a king." To study understandingly, as Mr. Neff has done, two such thinkers as Carlyle and Mill in the setting of the life and thought of their time may well be to get valuable suggestions for the solution of the old problems that puzzle us still; for the thoughts of Carlyle and Mill, like those of Lao-tsze and Jesus, are as true now as the day they were uttered.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Bruno and Others

Modern Thinkers and Present Problems. By E. A. Singer. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

IN his preface Mr. Singer remarks: "The names that stand over these chapters might, if moments had names, be those of moments in each man's history." That sentence is an illuminating conception and the book a striking treatment of the history of philosophy. Mr. Singer recognizes and makes clear that a philosophy is a classic in the sense of being a characteristic and permanent mode of human thought given eternally persuasive and cogent expression. Neither Mr. Singer nor anyone else could in thirty pages do justice to the system or the subtleties of Bruno or Spinoza or Kant. He does not try to. He does not make the mistake of the silly summarist, dissecting the dead anatomy of a man's living thought. These are essays in the best and modest sense of that much-abused word and literary form. They catch the mood and essence of systems of thought; they reveal the psychological and social soil out of which they grew and the permanent savor of them for us.

A philosophy like a symphony has varied seductions for those who are charmed by its music, and no two readers would write the same program notes for a symphony of ideas which they in common love. Spinozists and Kantians will undoubtedly differ from Mr. Singer on points of emphasis or interpretation. But it is hard to see how anyone, standing aside from technical cavil or a special moral propaganda, could fail to be impressed with the relevant and cogent lucidity of each of these portraits of a classic mind.

Mr. Singer's book would be a healthy prescription to those who linger from ignorance or habit in the belief that ideas can be fruitfully studied apart from the time and temper of their propounders. Bruno may by main force be treated as a mere textbook label attached to a textbook analysis of a confused pantheistic system. That would not be the portrait of an idea but the analysis of an irrelevance. It is not Mr. Singer's method. Bruno assumes in these unpretentious pages more vital and apposite dimensions. He is made visible as a sensitive and passionately religious spirit stepping suddenly from the warmth of his Father's house into cheerless spaces of an infinitely empty universe. He is revealed as the monk wakened by knowledge to the chilling vision of a cosmos in which men and stars are alike mere motes in a purposeless infinity. His discovery of the endlessness of space and things ends for him the distinction between Heaven and earth and with that obliteration the whole Christian legend. And it is this same Bruno who removes God from Heaven and Heaven from sight only to fill the whole universe with God. Bruno, the renegade and philosophic skeptic, becomes Bruno the mystic, identifying the universe with God and life and his own flaming love. And he is made to stand out in this lucid delineation as an eternal type of the soul who flees, even in our own day, from dogma to seek in wider ways and find God at last in everything.

The chapter on Bruno seems to be Mr. Singer's best. Hardly less an achievement, however, is his essay on Spinoza. It is not a simple matter to convey in terms that will persuade and enlighten the layman a spiritual mood which finds its only adequate articulation in the mathematical metaphysics of Spinoza. Mr. Singer does convey that mood, and he does more to give the uninitiate an insight into the Spinozistic view and world than any other writer in English except Santayana. A reader can hardly miss the point or be altogether ignorant of the paraphernalia of Spinoza's thought after this short chapter. He will get from it the rigid deduction of all things and all thoughts from the initial proposition that God exists. He will follow Spinoza's geometric elaboration of a tight mechanistic universe. He will feel the grip of eternal necessity closing him in; he will discover the method of attaining freedom through reason. In it he will briefly find how the passionless objectivity of mind may be the technique toward a calm and saving passion, a love of that divine order which is through and through and by eternal necessity God.

Mr. Singer's treatments of Hume, Kant, Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche follow familiar lines, but always with a just and humanistic emphasis that lifts them out of routine exposition. In the chapter on Hume he manages with a singular economy of letters and biographical material to paint a full-bodied portrait of this urbane, ironic, and clear-headed Scotchman who brought the open air of common sense into the stuffy confines of theological and metaphysical morals. His chapters on Schopenhauer and Nietzsche remain chiefly interesting for the sharp and true contrast he makes between these two men, the first with his preference for a peace of non-being to being unhappy; the second with his conqueror's ideal and its ruthless loneliness.

SELECTED PUBLICATIONS — FALL 1924

NON-VOTING

Causes and Methods of Control

By Charles E. Merriam and Harold F. Gosnell

Armchair speculation on the problem of non-voting has long been plentiful, but this is the first actual investigation of it; it throws new light on one of the greatest problems of democracy.

Cloth, $2.50; paper, $1.60; postage, 10c. extra

MANAGERIAL ACCOUNTING

By J. O. McKinsey

Based on the assumption that all business administrators should have a basic knowledge of accounting.

Vol. I, $4.00; postpaid, $4.15

PSYCHOLOGICAL TESTS IN BUSINESS

By A. W. Kornhauser and F. A. Kingsbury

Deals with the application of tests to problems of business.

$1.90; postpaid, $2.00

OUR PHYSICAL WORLD

By Elliot R. Downing

Initiates the child into the mysteries of earth, air, and water.

$2.50 and $3.50; postage, 10c. extra

THE ELECTRON

By Robert A. Millikan

By the latest winner of the Nobel Prize in Physics. $1.75; postpaid, $1.85

GENERAL CYTOLOGY

Edited by E. V. Cowdry

A more comprehensive and authoritative presentation than has ever before been attained. $7.50; postpaid, $7.75

GERMANY IN TRANSITION

By Herbert Kraus

The author is professor of constitutional law in the University of Konigsberg, Germany.

$2.00; postpaid, $2.10

THE STABILIZATION OF EUROPE

By Charles de Visscher

The professor of international law at the University of Ghent, Belgium, delivered this second of three lectures on the Norman Wait Harris Memorial Foundation.

$2.00; postpaid, $2.10

THE OCCIDENT AND THE ORIENT

By Sir Valentine Chirol

The English lecturer in this group is an authority on the problems of the Near and Far East. All three of the lectures will be published in October. $2.00; postpaid, $2.10

THE NEW TESTAMENT

By Edgar J. Goodspeed

An American translation based on the many manuscripts now available to scholars.

$1.50 to $5.00; postage, 10c. extra

PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIAN LIVING

By Gerald B. Smith

Applied ethics for the individual as he finds himself a member of various groups in actual life.

$2.50; postpaid, $2.60

PRINCIPLES OF PREACHING

By Ozora S. Davis

Eight powerful sermons arranged for study, criticism, and analysis.

$2.50; postpaid, $2.60

THE PROJECT PRINCIPLE IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

By Erwin L. Shaver

A volume of theory and practice.

$2.75; postpaid, $2.85

A MANUAL OF STYLE

By the Staff of the University of Chicago Press

A completely revised edition defining good usage for any who deal with printed pages in the making.

$2.00; postpaid, $2.10

SOME CONTEMPORARY AMERICANS

The Personal Equation in Literature

By Percy Holmes Boynton

A series of brilliant and engaging essays, rich in personal reactions and written from a knowledge of our literary history equal to that of any American critic today. $2.00; postpaid, $2.10

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

5807 ELLIS AVENUE CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

One must confess to finding least satisfaction in Mr. Singer's closing contemporary comments. There is nothing wrong, but there is likewise nothing new, in his chapters on Pragmatism and Progress. His chapter on Love and Loyalty in Royce does not, for at least one reader, do much to clear up the dull confusion of that earnest and meandering philosopher. The chapter entitled Prospect and Retrospect is curiously unstimulating after the bright pointedness of the history preceding. To say that Realty must be conceived of as something that man can make and mold and that the old ideals of Peace and War must be reconciled is hardly food for strong men or even for professors of philosophy. It must be either caution or sophistication that prevents Mr. Singer from arriving at or stating any more distinctive conclusions. Perhaps he realizes that the classic philosophies have exhausted the chief incommensurable attitudes toward life and destiny. He knows, perhaps, that conciliation between them is not really possible. In any case he remains a charmingly sensitive delineator of these classic vicissitudes of the modern spirit.

IRWIN EDMAN

The Springfield Republican

The Story of an Independent Newspaper. One Hundred Years of the Springfield Republican. By Richard Hooker. The Macmillan Company. $2.

THIS is a greatly needed and model newspaper history, compact, illuminating, and interesting, and written with all modesty. Coming as it does from the pen of the present managing owner, the fourth in line from the Samuel Bowles who founded it in 1824, it might easily and justly have been a panegyric upon the three Samuel Bowleses who established the newspaper, gave it its sterling character, and made it a model small-city journal. Mr. Hooker, with true Puritan self-control, has, if anything, subordinated the Republican's makers to the entity they created. For instance, he has dedicated his book to the third Samuel Bowles, but he has not conveyed to the average reader a true understanding of that exquisite and sensitive character whose soul vibrated in complete attune with the highest American ideals, who always subordinated his personality to his work. Though he gave endless attention to the smallest details of management that the Republican might face modern competition and yet survive, nothing could induce him to abate one jot of his principles, as nothing could induce Edwin Lawrence Godkin or the other great editors who put devotion to the national ideals above all else.

The story of the Republican is really that of this extraordinary Bowles family. None other that we know of in America has held one newspaper property for so long or managed it so ably. Colonel Harvey has declared that the second Samuel Bowles was the greatest editor in our history—Colonel Harvey himself being an alumnus of the Republican, whose long list of graduates to win distinction after leaving Springfield is proof positive that there can be no better school of journalism than a newspaper of this type. The Bowles family not only made a daily which was a great educational and inspirational force, but produced a journal that found subscribers in many States of the Union because of its sanity, its cleanliness, its ability, its principles. It is today the only great daily which maintains its weekly edition—long after those of the Tribune of Greeley and the Evening Post of Bryant and Godkin, once so nationally important, have passed away. The glorious thing about the Republican is that its owners have refused to compromise with yellow journalism. They have kept its admirable appearance, displaying the news well and journalistically but with dignity of type and expression, so that the Republican proves, as does the Kansas City Star, that dailies can pay though they remain conservative in dress and form.

Mr. Hooker has frankly set forth the mistakes as well as the successes of the Republican, but considering how great is the liability to error of the editor who must form his judgments quickly on the news of the day, the record of the century is remarkable indeed. The high-water mark of the Republican seems to the reviewer to have been the period of the Spanish war and of our Philippine aggression. Then the Republican spoke as if inspired and fought its losing battle with extraordinary ability and most correct vision as to what this break with our national ideals would cost us. Unfortunately, there came after the death of the third Samuel Bowles a letting down of editorial ideals. At least it is impossible to believe that if he had lived the Republican could have approved the draft of 1917 or been so deceived as to the truth about the war and the economic and imperialistic forces which dragged the United States into it against the wishes of the bulk of the people.

While one must regret this, there is still much to be grateful for in the fact that in its technique the Springfield Republican continues to rank with the Baltimore Sun and a few others as the best of our dailies. It remains an intellectual journal which the man of education may read with profit and pride, for it has not yet discarded its reasoning faculties or enthroned ignorance in the editorial sanctum. Nor has it decided that its sole function is to amuse. It remains a noble monument to the rapidly passing journalistic order which conceived of itself as a responsible profession instead of a purely money-making business.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Almost White and Black

The Fire in the Flint. By Walter F. White. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MR. WHITE has with this one novel struck deep into the problem which must agitate the United States for centuries to come—the problem of the colored race. As a story-teller he leaves little to be desired. He knows the colored race as only a colored man could know it. And he knows the attitude of the Southern white as only a Negro could know it. He is able to interpret the white man's attitude quite as well as the colored man's, all the time that his story tramps steadily ahead.

It is easy enough to be dispassionate when things do not concern very deeply. Mr. White could not be dispassionate in describing lynchings, murders, and persecutions of a people of the same blood as his. All through the novel one hears the voice of the new Negro—not the voice of the one who is trying to lead his people away from Egypt through the desert into the promised land but the voice of the one who cries: "I am here to stay. It is as much my country as it is yours. Your skies are my skies. Your land is my land. Your battles are my battles. Your laws are my laws. Your language is my language. And even a good deal of my color is your color. Why, then, do you treat me as if I were a different kind of animal?" Much blood has been shed to free the Negro from slavery. Now that he is free more will be shed to secure him the use of his freedom.

"The Fire in the Flint" is the story of Kenneth Harper, a young Negro physician who after having studied in the North and gained considerable experience in the war returns to his home town in the South to practice medicine. He is fully convinced that the dark days of the black man are over, that since Negroes have proved their abilities in the world of science and art they are to be treated as equal to their supposed superiors. He has dreams of becoming a great surgeon. Coming so recently from the North, he has the feeling that the Southern Negro walks around with a chip on his shoulder, and says as much to his brother, who thinks differently. But the Ku Klux is at work. Kenneth is rudely awakened to reality. His brother is killed, his sister's soul and body are murdered, his mother goes insane. Then Kenneth is filled with a rage that is best expressed in Mr. White's own words: "And if by raising one finger I could save the whole white race from destruction, and by not raising it I could send them all straight down to hell, I'd die before I raised it!"

Selections from the Harper Lists

By Gamaliel Bradford

Author of "Damaged Souls"

Bare Souls

"GAMALIEL BRADFORD reintroduces into modern literature a method of biography that is sincere, analytical, uncompromising and yet sympathetic," writes William Lyon Phelps. In this unusual book Mr. Bradford turns aside from the study of American historical figures to portray with his accustomed brilliance a group of the great writers of England and France. His subjects include Charles Lamb, Keats, Flaubert, Voltaire, Horace Walpole, Thomas Gray and Edward Fitzgerald. Under his magic touch they spring to life, not in a formal, chronological narrative, but in an intense, concentrated revelation of spiritual experience. $3.50

THE CAUSES OF INDUSTRIAL UNREST

By John A. Fitch

An analysis, by an expert on industrial problems, of the background, the point of view and the circumstances out of which the general labor struggle arises. $3.00

THE BLACK GOLCONDA The Romance of Petroleum

By Isaac F. Marcosson

"An arresting and revealing study"—as the Boston Transcript calls it—of the world oil industry, its dominating personalities and its international complications. $4.00

THE MYSTERY OF RELIGION

By Everett Dean Martin

Author of "The Behavior of Crowds"

"A wide reading of it would certainly ventilate American religious thought," remarks the N. Y. Evening Post, of this keen and unconventional study in social psychology. $3.00

HISTORY OF ART

By Elie Faure

Translated from the French by Walter Pach

This great history of civilization as expressed by art is now complete in English, from the drawings of the cave men to the modern expressionists. With over eight hundred illustrations.

Volume I. Ancient Art
Volume II. Mediaeval Art
Volume III. Renaissance Art
Volume IV. Modern Art
Each, $7.50

Fiction

R. F. D. No. 3

By Homer Croy

Author of "West of the Water Tower"

A stirring and beautiful story of a Missouri country girl and her reaction to the fate which stalks her through a crucial year of her life. $2.00

Julie Cane

By Harvey O'Higgins

Author of "From the Life" and "Some Distinguished Americans"

If H. G. Wells' Mr. Polly was a favorite of yours, you will find here a kindred soul. Mr. O'Higgins' story of an extraordinary life is a book you will read with satisfaction and remember with delight. $2.00

Talk

By Emanie N. Sachs

"You will be cheating yourself of some great reading if you miss 'Talk'," says John V. A. Weaver. Its wit and wisdom have made it one of the most discussed books of the season. $2.00

Poetry

Sunrise Trumpets

By Joseph Auslander

"Lyric poems—entirely unhackneyed and breath-takingly beautiful."—Time. $2.00

Atlas and Beyond

By Elizabeth J. Coatsworth

Poems full of the charm and mystery of far-off lands. $2.00

GYPSY FIRES IN AMERICA

By Irving Brown

Author of "Nights and Days on the Gypsy Trail"

"This is an epic. If Mr. Brown or anybody else could surpass it in warmth and passion and understanding, it would be a miracle," writes Konrad Bercovici in the Saturday Review of Literature. $3.00

LEVIATHAN

By William Bolitho

"Mr. Bolitho writes with the interpretative power of the imaginative historian. He has style—a sinewy strength, a swift capturing of color and line and movement, and at times a dramatic intensity that reminds one of Carlyle at his best."—New York Times. $2.00

DISTRESSING DIALOGUES

By Nancy Boyd

Preface by Edna St. Vincent Millay

Here they are at last! From "I Like Americans" to "Two Souls with but a Single Thought." With Edna St. Vincent Millay, "we take pleasure in recommending" the Complete Collected Works of Nancy Boyd—the literary treat of the season. $2.00

AT A VENTURE

By Charles A. Bennett

Illustrated by Clarence Day, Jr.

"An essayist of penetrating and captivating wit—an artist of facile genius. They have made, between them, one of the most thoroughly satisfying of recent books."—Philadelphia North American. $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers Since 1817 NEW YORK, N. Y.

This is Kenneth's answer to a plea over the telephone to come and save a white woman from death. And yet a few minutes later the physician goes to the bed of the woman and ministers to her. The duties of a physician are above the feelings of the individual. He still is greatly tempted to let his patient die and so avenge all the ills the white race has heaped upon him. But again the physician wins over the emotions of the man, and he guides the white woman until he has seen her past the danger-point. Ku Kluxers are waiting outside. They are there to avenge an insult; they believe that a "nigger" is spending the night in the arms of a white woman. The patient at last becomes easier; Harper leaves the house to be lynched outside after a desperate struggle.

In such a mold Mr. White has poured all that he knows, all that he has observed in years, all that he has dreamed and all that he has experienced, interpreting everything with his own passion and leaving art to take care of itself. The result is a stirring novel, beautifully and passionately written, the exact like of which has never been seen in the United States. I am thankful to Mr. White that he has not tried to give also the "lighter side of Negro life." In the best creative work of the Negro now there is a certain Slavic tendency, self-searching, analytical; this is revealed superbly here. "The Fire in the Flint" may be but the first of Mr. White's novels of Negro life, and more should follow from the pens of others in the interest of a better understanding between the white race and the black —the almost white and the almost black.

KONRAD BERCOVICI

Spoon River, Illinois

The New Spoon River. By Edgar Lee Masters. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

MR. MASTERS seems to feel not so much that he has written a new anthology of Spoon River as that he has written the anthology of a new Spoon River. For times have changed. The old village, once so fascinating in its isolation and decay, has been sucked into the whirlpool of Chicago, which now can almost claim it as a suburb. Wires hum over its head, and chimneys smoke; money has come in, and much that is usually comprehended under the term Middle Western has gone out. As anyone may read upon the epitaph of Jeremiah Howell:

> In old Spoon River we rode our horses
> Hunting ducks by the lake or river;
> Now they are chasing the anise bag
> Over the hills and down the hollows.
> We used to walk and we used to work,
> Now it's golf at the country club,
> And polo ponies instead of racing.
> This was a place of simple delights:
> We read old books, and talked of evenings,
> And rode to the country in our buggies.
> Now it's the magazine and the movie,
> And flivvers as thick as summer flies.

The observer's concern, Mr. Masters seems to say, is no longer with the grotesque and often hideous little private tragedies of a provincial people; it is with the grotesque and almost uniformly hideous tragedy of human life anywhere.

So that while Mr. Masters has set his scene where it was set before, and has relied as before upon the dramatic device of the epitaph, he has not been at so much pains as he was in his masterpiece to communicate the local spiritual savor of a community which he knew so well because he had looked at it so long. In the interest of universal truth he has encouraged a tendency in himself which he all but controlled in 1915—the tendency to unload his general ideas upon the reader. Dozens of his characters begin by speaking for themselves and end by speaking for their creator; dozens never begin at all. This is unfortunate, since Mr. Masters is worth a vast deal more to the world as an artist than he is as a preacher. And it is particularly unfortunate in view of the fact that his ethical ideas are admirable, his enthusiasms valiant and sound. Here he is, the same unkillable radical in life and love that he always was—an arch-lover of passion and beauty, a worshiper of Dionysos and Apollo at the same time that he is a stout defender of the simple Christ, a man intoxicated by the words Republic, Liberty, Honesty, and Friend, a hater of hypocrisy, a caustic enemy of cant. Yet here also, and altogether too much of the time, he is the baldest sort of sermonizer—the sort whom with another text he spends his time despising. The result is a book decidedly inferior to "The Spoon River Anthology," a book comparatively deficient in drama, in irony, in fun, a book less universal in value—the paradox is familiar—than its truly provincial predecessor. It flames with no lyric like that now famous one of Anne Rutledge's; it will raise little or no laughter like that which still is the lot of Walter Simmons and Petit the Poet.

It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the new anthology is without virtue. Bad or good, it manages to be continuously interesting; its energy, as nearly always with Mr. Masters, is unbounded. There is wealth in the episodes, there is zest in their telling, and plainly there is still unusual hitting power in the poet's blunt free verse. And upon at least one page, under the name Howard Lamson, may be found a set of gnomic verses which are beautiful because their riches are confined within a well-pondered lyric form:

> Ice cannot shiver in the cold,
> Nor stones shrink from the lapping flame.
> Eyes that are sealed no more have tears;
> Ears that are stopped hear nothing ill;
> Hearts turned to silt are strange to pain;
> Tongues that are dumb report no loss;
> Hands stiffened, well may idle be;
> No sigh is from a breathless breast.
> Beauty may fade, but closed eyes see not;
> Sorrow may wail, but stopped ears hear not;
> Work is, but folded hands need work not;
> Nothing to say is for dumb tongues.
> The rolling earth rolls on and on
> With trees and stones and winding streams—
> My dream is what the hill-side dreams!

MARK VAN DOREN

Back to Rome

Roman Politics. By Frank Frost Abbott. Marshall Jones Company. $1.50.

Aspects of the Study of Roman History. By Thomas Spencer Jerome. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

MR. ABBOTT'S contribution to the series Our Debt to Greece and Rome is a brief but fascinating volume on Roman politics. Mr. Abbott has long been known as our foremost authority on Roman political institutions. On the subjects of practical politics and of the social basis of Rome's political behavior he has contributed many essays to many volumes. His knowledge of Roman folk-psychology has the depth that results from a thorough study of the whole literature and not alone of the historical sources, a fact that reveals itself in all his judgments.

The book, to be sure, does not precisely represent what one might expect from the serial title, for if one looks to find, for instance, just what suggestions our constitution-makers may have borrowed indirectly from Polybius's analysis of the Roman constitution, one is disappointed. But few of us are really interested in mere questions of debit and credit. In state-building as in art and literature borrowings that produce vital results are used with such creative power that the question of source matters little, and other borrowings so shame the user that his work is hardly worth recording. Mr. Abbott has fortunately chosen rather to illustrate the course of Roman politics by reference to ours, and to indicate how the Roman people, so like are able to present here only a partial listing of their publications of the season. The Scribner Fall List is one which touches every field of literature, notably biography, science, letters, art, religion, and fiction. A complete announcement will be sent on request.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

From the jacket of

The Dark Cloud

By Thomas Boyd

The author of "Through the Wheat" has written a chronicle of adventure on the St. Lawrence and Mississippi rivers in the brave and picturesque days of the eighteen-fifties. $2.00

For October Publication

Mary Rose — A play

By Sir James Barrie

Boards, $1.00; leather, $1.75

The Faith of a Liberal

By Nicholas Murray Butler

About $2.00

Dogs and Men

By Mary Ansell

The men come out rather the worse for the comparison in this charming study of dogs. $1.50

Just Published

The Diary of a Dude Wrangler

By Struthers Burt

Struthers Burt

Some score of years ago the author of "The Interpreter's House" went to the West. His aim was to find some way of making a living that would free him from the necessity of writing for money. Eventually he became a "dude wrangler" and this fascinating and often beautiful book is hung upon the narrative of his own career in this strange new profession of breaking in the Eastern tenderfoot. $3.00

Cowboys North and South — By Will James

The cowboy's story at its best, told by a cowboy in cowboy language, and illustrated with the author's drawings. $3.50

Greater France in Africa

By Prof. Wm. M. Sloane

A survey of French colonial policy. $3.00

Arthur Train's THE NEEDLE'S EYE

The success of His Children's Children has prepared an enormous public for work of importance and high interest from Arthur Train. And yet this novel sets a new standard for its author, for it is a splendid achievement, an extraordinary advance even over its predecessor.

Now on sale at all bookstores—$2.00

John Galsworthy's THE WHITE MONKEY

Merely to say that this story of the lives of young people of today reintroduces several of the characters of "The Forsyte Saga" is enough to make thousands of readers look forward to it with the keenest anticipation. As a novel it is, however, quite independent of Mr. Galsworthy's great opus. Published October 24. $2.00

Just Published

Memoirs of an Editor — By E. P. Mitchell

By the man who put his impress upon the editorial page of the old New York Sun. $4.50

Letters from Theodore Roosevelt to Anna Roosevelt Cowles, 1870—1918

Illustrated. $2.50

These letters to Theodore Roosevelt's older sister have the charm of the "Letters to His Children".

Racial Realities in Europe — By Lothrop Stoddard

The author of "The Rising Tide of Color" surveys Europe from a wholly new viewpoint. $3.00

The Character of Races — By Ellsworth Huntington

A deeply interesting study of the effect of environment on the racial character of man. $6.00

For Early Publication

A Popular History of American Invention — 2 Vols. $10.00

A fascinating narrative and a treasury of information. Edited by Waldemar Kaempffert.

Points of View — By Stuart P. Sherman

Spirited and witty discussion of the vital literary topics of the generation. $2.00

Impressions of Great Naturalists

By Henry Fairfield Osborn

Friendship and intimate knowledge warm and inform these biographies and studies. $2.50

The Genius of Style — By W. C. Brownell

The first book to appear in years from the pen of the distinguished critic. $2.00

the Anglo-Saxon Americans in temper, in mental endowments, in social ideals, and in political capacity, experimented—sometimes imprudently, but always open-mindedly and practically—with every device of government, ranging from strong centralization to trustful democracy and back again, and how in so doing they came to try most of the nostrums that have ever been tested in our own government. With few words wasted he gives the stage-setting for their attempts at oligarchic rule, at representative government, at the employment of the "recall," of pure democracy, of "fascist" militarism, of paternalistic and laissez-faire government of subjects, and, with illuminating parallels from modern instances, indicates how each experiment worked out. He similarly analyzes the forces that struggled for domination and weighs the relative influences of noble families, of capital, of the agrarian element and of the populace, and in particular of the foreign peoples that attained citizenship at Rome. Though one does not study history in order to acquire precise models for political action, it is true that a sound knowledge of how people are likely to behave in the political group is practically apposite, and this is the kind of information that this little volume affords.

Mr. Jerome's volume is of a wholly different character. Some of the essays, as for instance The Senate and the Caesars and The Tyranny of Tiberius, purport to be attempts at historical analysis, but one finds, seasoned with shrewd obiter dicta, a mass of temperamental impressions based upon second-hand sources. Most of the other essays, e.g., The Credibility of Testimony, The Use of Invective, and Moralists as Historical Sources, in so far as they do not repeat a twice-told tale, are permeated with an interest in morbid psychology and with Freudian interpretations that give them a bizarre turn. We simply do not know enough about the personality of Tacitus, for instance, to justify even a small fraction of the judgments pronounced upon him in this book.

TENNEY FRANK

Greek Vases

A Handbook of Greek Black-figured Vases, with a Chapter on the Red-figured Southern Italian Vases. By Joseph Clark Hoppin. Paris: Librairie Ancienne, Edouard Champion. 200 frcs.

MR. HOPPIN'S "Handbook of Red-figured Vases," which appeared in 1919, has been such a boon to archaeologists that the appearance of his "Handbook of Black-figured Vases" will be greeted with joy. Archaeological research is always complicated by the numberless references to be looked up, often in obscure publications; and anything that lightens that labor is of inestimable service. Mr. Hoppin's handbooks, giving lists and bibliographies of vases which are either signed by or attributed to ancient potters and decorators, with illustrations of the signed specimens, and M. Pottier's "Corpus Vasorum," which aims at illustrating every Greek vase in existence, therefore are not only intrinsically valuable contributions to archaeology but will have far-reaching consequences in facilitating and stimulating research. Fortunately, the position of Mr. Hoppin and M. Pottier as archaeologists is such that a high standard is assured.

The paintings on black-figured Athenian vases have both the attraction and the limitations of archaic Greek art. We find in them the spontaneity and vivacity of youth, but not yet the grandeur which Greek art reaches just before and during its maturity; for by then the red-figured technique had ousted the earlier style. But in their charm and gaiety and decorative quality they are full of suggestion today. So that Mr. Hoppin's profusely illustrated volume should have a wide as well as a specialized appeal.

An important difference is noticeable between this handbook and the earlier one on the red-figured vases. In the former were included both artists who actually signed their work and artists whose names were unknown but whose work was recognizable on a number of vases, and who could therefore be recreated by the mere invention of a name. Many scholars have of late been devoting their time to this engrossing task of discovering the great (and small) personalities in Athenian vase painting; foremost among whom has been J. D. Beazley of Oxford. Research in vase painting has thereby acquired a totally new interest; the differentiation of styles and the assignment of works to their masters have become as important and as intricate tasks as they are in Renaissance painting. In the field of the black-figured vases this work has hardly begun. We have the masters who signed, and these Mr. Hoppin has presented to us in his new book. The nameless ones have not yet been recreated or rebaptized, except sporadically. And Mr. Hoppin, who was among the first to recognize the importance of stylistic attributions in his former handbook, has wisely confined himself in this one to our present limited knowledge. It may be hoped that Mr. Beazley, who has built so well the foundation of the stylistic study of the red-figured vases in his book on "Vases in America," will some day do the same thing for the black-figured pottery.

In order to produce a book comprehensively Greek rather than exclusively Athenian, Mr. Hoppin has not confined himself to the Attic vases, but has included pots signed by southern Italian masters (Asteas, Lasimos, and Python) and by the early Boeotians and Corinthians. An appendix giving illustrations of some of the red-figured vases which could not be embodied in the former handbook is most welcome. The collection of all this material is an onerous task. In obtaining the mass of photographs needed Mr. Hoppin spared no pains; and on the whole private owners, museum curators, and friends appear to have been generous and helpful—with a few exceptions which are very properly recorded! In the matter of good judgment, one of the chief requisites in a reference book of this type, Mr. Hoppin has also well acquitted himself. Only the rhyton in the Louvre signed by Kleomenes looks queer in this splendid company and should not have been included; at least not without some expression of doubt as to its authenticity.

GISELA M. A. RICHTER

Handel

George Frederick Handel. His Personality and His Times. By Newman Flower. Houghton Mifflin Company. $7.50.

IN these days, when America is being so overwhelmingly "discovered" by European musicians, this new biography of Handel should have a peculiar interest aside from its musical value. For no other great composer ever adopted so absolutely a country that was so foreign to his own in language, customs, and ideals as did Handel when he gave his allegiance to England. He identified himself so completely with the people of his adoption, and did so much to rescue and glorify music in England, even to the extent of setting some of his finest music to English texts, that England not only pensioned him during his lifetime but paid him her highest tribute when he died—burial in Westminster Abbey. She has, indeed, cherished his memory and his music ever since, though during his lifetime he apparently rested uneasily on her bosom, being alternately exalted and decried. Mr. Flower worships Handel as a man as well as a musician. And he goes to no little pains to emphasize the courage and greatness with which Handel overcame such handicaps as an austere and restrained home life, the somewhat natural misunderstanding and opposition of a commercially minded and autocratic father with no ear for music, and the fickleness of an eighteenth-century public. Over all of these things, however, one can sympathize but hardly weep, for in the end his father was forced to capitulate and Handel won instant artistic and financial appreciation wherever he went. As for his ups and downs, they were those of any man who devotes the greater part of his life, as Handel did, to operatic composing and producing. He seems to have had an

AMERICA: THE GREAT ADVENTURE

GEORGE PHILIP KRAPP

I believe this to be one of the best books I have ever published. A vivid, interesting, picturesque yet sound one volume history of America. A book for every boy and girl, woman and man. Beautifully illustrated with four 4-color plates and seventeen black and white drawings by Philip Von Saltza. Octavo $4.00

BALISAND

JOSEPH HERGESHEIMER

"The years have perfected Mr. Hergesheimer's art. He has written nothing more impressive than this realistic novel of the romantic past in Virginia. A rich, a rare, a beautiful book."—Ellen Glasgow in The Saturday Review. $2.50

Materia Critica

GEORGE JEAN NATHAN

"A volume packed with ideas, information and illuminating expressions of Mr. Nathan's philosophy of art and life. An urbane, civilized attitude toward all manifestations of dramatic art, from burlesque to the Moscow Art Theatre, from Charlie Chaplin to Eleonore Duse."—Ernest Boyd in The New York Sun. $2.50

THE FIRE IN THE FLINT

WALTER F. WHITE

A remarkable novel by a Negro that is rousing wide and excited comment, as a thrilling story, as an artistic piece of work and as an extremely significant picture.

Laurence Stallings in the New York World:
"His case is so fiery a one of truth. Few novels have been needed more."

Sinclair Lewis:
"It seems probable that 'The Fire in the Flint' and 'A Passage to India' will prove much the most important books of this autumn. Of the highest significance."

Carl Van Doren, Norman Angell, Zona Gale, Dorothy Canfield are a few of the strong supporters of this important book.

At All Bookshops $2.50

NAPOLEON

ÉLIE FAURE

Author of The History of Art

Havelock Ellis in The Dance of Life wrote: "Some may think this the most remarkable book on the subject they have ever come across. For to Faure Napoleon is a great lyric artist." $3.00

Edmund Burke

JOHN MORLEY, O.M.

The only available edition of an important and well known work. It consists of seven hundred and fifty copies only, designed by Bruce Rogers, the greatest printer of our age, and printed under his supervision. $10.00

The Lord of the Sea

M. P. SHIEL

With a Long Introduction by Carl Van Vechten

Romance at its purplest by the man whom Hugh Walpole calls "probably the best romantic novelist now writing in English." $2.50

ALFRED A. KNOPF

730 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

Just Published!

BLOCKADE AND SEA POWER

By

MAURICE PARMELEE, PH.D.

Chairman of the Allied Rationing Committee During the World War

The author's close contact with the British Foreign Office gave him unusual opportunities to witness the workings of the Blockade as a potent international weapon.

"In its conclusion," says Dr. Parmelee, "this book is a protest against nationalism, navalism, and militarism, and a slight essay towards the attainment of the supreme goal of the political evolution of mankind—the World State."

$3 at your booksellers. By mail $3.15

THOS. Y. CROWELL CO. : NEW YORK

The DISCOVERY of INTELLIGENCE

By Joseph Kinmont Hart

THIS book, written for the general reader, tells the story of the long battle between folkways on the one side and free thinking and acting on the other, with special reference to education. It is an uncommonly stimulating volume which should appeal to every alert reader who is, or thinks he is, or would like to be a practitioner of independent thinking and acting. Before Socrates all people lived by habits and customs—folkways; since Socrates an increasing number have conducted their lives somewhat independently of folkways, though they have had to fight a great deal to do it. Folkways are still extremely powerful in the field of education; this book explains why they are and why they shouldn't be.

Illustrated. Price $4.00

The Century Co., 353 Fourth Avenue New York City

uncanny faculty for feeling popular needs, though he did fail once or twice in this, and sometimes his music itself was at fault. Naturally he suffered from the intrigues of enemies and the caprices and vanities of singers, for politics and the arts were closely allied in those days, and the pernicious "star" system in opera was already in vogue. But when one considers the dull routine of Bach's existence, the "Sturm und Drang" of Beethoven's, the harassing poverty of Mozart's and Schubert's, Handel seems to have had a pretty good time, on the whole, and to have received what would have been considered substantial material rewards even today. That he never acknowledged defeat is an admirable characteristic, but scarcely enough to make him a hero par excellence. And it is because Mr. Flower is continually telling us of Handel's virtues that he fails in part of his purpose, which is to give us the personality of Handel. The rare quotations from Handel himself, revealing a very human touch of temper or of humor, are the only saving leaven in a monumental lump of perfection.

However, Mr. Flower has made some valuable corrections and additions regarding the general biography of Handel. For instance, he has smashed the long-cherished myths as to the authorship of the libretto for "The Messiah," the origins of the "Water Music," of the "Harmonious Blacksmith," and even the house where Handel was born. He gives some very interesting pictures of operatic conditions in Germany, Italy, and England, and more or less kaleidoscopic views of one of the richest and most fascinating periods in European art and politics. He dwells, too lightly, perhaps, on the friendship of Pope for Handel, and the enmity of Addison and Steele; on the disastrous if temporary effect that the success of the "Beggar's Opera" had upon the fortunes of Handel, and the political intrigues of the Crown Prince Frederick against his royal father. The book contains some hitherto unpublished photographs of Handel.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Books in Brief

Yea and Nay. A Series of Lectures and Counter Lectures given at the London School of Economics in and of the Hospitals of London. Brentano's. $2.

They do these things well in England; there is an audience which appreciates cleverness undiluted by too much moral earnestness. When the London hospitals needed money, instead of naming a bankers' committee they mobilized the intellectuals; and the public paid the price. Mr. Wells and E. B. Osborn debated the Teaching of History, and Rebecca West and Sheila Kaye-Smith faintly disagreed on the Sex Novel. G. K. Chesterton denounced the newspapers, and Lady Astor presided when the Oxford and Cambridge Unions sent their best to debate: That Education is the Curse of the Country. It was all over in an hour—just tea-time. It would be entertaining to try it in America—but would it work in a country accustomed to dive into the subway when Englishmen saunter off for tea?

Three Problem Children. Narratives from the Case Records of a Child Guidance Clinic. Publication No. 2, Joint Committee on Methods of Preventing Delinquency. 50 East Forty-second Street, New York.

Problem children are those who do not get on in their own little world of home, school, and playmates. The cause may be within the body or the mind of the child himself, in some untoward circumstance in which he has been placed, or, more probably, in a complicated interaction of the two. In this volume an organization which is doing pioneer work in its field of salvaging such children has taken the trouble to write out its clinical records for a popular audience. There is the story of Mildred, who at eleven was in Grade 1A and labeled feeble-minded; a single year of kindly, understanding treatment gave her seven promotions and brought her up to her comrades of the same age. There were Sidney, a truant, and Kenneth, who

BEST BOOKS

GONE NATIVE

A Novel
by "Asterisk"
Author of
ISLES OF ILLUSION

A powerful and intensely thrilling discussion of the evil of miscegenation written in realistic and vivid style by the anonymous author whose was considered the most startling book ever written on the South Sea Islands.

ISLES OF ILLUSION

GONE NATIVE

A Novel
by "Asterisk"
Author of
ISLES OF ILLUSION

A striking picture of the evil result—physical, mental and moral—of an attempt at married life between a European and a native woman in the South Seas.

GONE NATIVE

A Novel
by "Asterisk"
Author of
ISLES OF ILLUSION

A STORY THAT IS AS EXCITING AND READABLE AS IT IS WELL WRITTEN AND AUTHENTIC. LIFE IN THE PRIMITIVE STRIPPED OF THE VENEER OF CIVILIZATION. ROMANCE COUPLED WITH REALITY AND PENNED WITH THE HAND OF GENIUS.

At all Bookstores, $2.00 net

SMALL, MAYNARD AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS

had been in trouble ever since he was put on probation after his gang robbed the corner grocery. In their cases also the label was not as simple as that slapped on by home and school. The record of the wheels within wheels which had to be set in motion to restore these three children to a fair measure of healthy and happy living scores a black mark against the educational systems which lay behind their failures, and presents in readably concrete form the varied scientific and social resources brought to children by this new type of work.

Public Health in the United States. By Harry H. Moore. Harper and Brothers. $4.

What Dr. Haven Emerson characterizes as "one of the most enlightened movements of the past century," the swing of public interest toward not merely the avoidance of disease but the achievement of positive health, has rolled up a record of fact, experiment, and observation so voluminous and so scattered as to elude all but the specialist. Mr. Moore has brought together in one fat volume an array of material on the present status of the public-health movement in this country and its more important historical antecedents which would be overwhelming were it not for an especially serviceable arrangement of chapters, notes, index, and numerous appendices and an admirable series of illustrative graphs. His avowed aim—to provide an outline with statistical data which may be useful to lay members of health committees, to students in high schools, colleges, and schools of social work, and to administrative officers of government, as well as to persons engaged professionally in public health work—necessarily calls for a detail and explicitness of treatment to which many of the dramatic values of this social frontier are sacrificed; but there is insured at the same time an armentarium hitherto lacking for those who are interested in observing or participating in its advance.

Christianity and the State. By S. Parkes Cadman. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Mr. Cadman develops the familiar thesis that patriotism is not enough, but that Christianity ought to be. He brings to his subject wide reading and an immense number of words, but he scarcely visualizes, and certainly does not illuminate, the deep problems at issue. The result is one of those books that have no special reason for existence unless it be the reputation of the author as a popular preacher. Unfortunately the pulpit has ceased to be a place whence light may be expected to shine full either upon the church or upon the state.

Drama

Hopwood versus Vajda

IMPORTED theatrical fluff, like French eiderdown, seems at once lighter and warmer than the native product, and since two current farces offer excellent material for an inquiry the reason might be worth the seeking. In the Age of Innocence it used to be thought enough to say that those across the water dared be naughtier than we, but now that our own playwrights have kicked over the traces that explanation is no longer adequate and it is evident that Mr. Hopwood would, thanks to his inner self, still be Mr. Hopwood even if he were writing for Vienna itself. Both "The Best People" (Lyceum Theater), which he produced in conjunction with David Gray, and "Grounds for Divorce" (Empire Theater), imported from the Hungarian of Ernest Vajda, are excellent entertainments, but the one, for all its foreign influence, remains as essentially American as the other is essentially European.

The truth would seem to be that though we Americans are perfectly capable of alternating sophistication and sentiment, naughtiness and charm, we are still too moral to fuse them into

McBRIDE BOOKS

To be Published October 15th

STRAWS & PRAYER-BOOKS

By James Branch Cabell

"Straws and Prayer-Books" is a companion volume to "Beyond Life," and admirers of that sagacious and witty book will find here the same qualities: wisdom and irony, malice, and a candor that is at times perturbing. It may be described as an autobiography of the mind: the story, not of the incidents of a man's life, but of the adventures of his imagination. Readers will find it the most personal as well as one of the most diverting of the Cabell books—one which has not its like in literature. $2.50 net.

THE LIFE STORY OF AN UGLY DUCKLING By Marie Dressler

There have been many autobiographies of stage folk but surely none like this, the life story of the best-beloved of American comediennes, creator of the immortal Tillie. The book is informal, humorous, written in a highly colloquial style, and presents a candid and engaging picture of one of the most interesting personalities of our time. Illustrated. $3 net.

BUSHRANGERS By Charles J. Finger

Mr. Finger, whose Highwayman was one of the most beguiling books of last year, here conjures up the figures of half a dozen robust adventurers of the last century, whose exploits are still a legend in parts of Australia and South America. Here are Popjoy, the sailorman, who lived an exile and a prisoner and died a hero; Beresford of the slums, who swaggered as a gentleman through the Australian bush; and Captain Moonlight, parson and thief, who came to grief in a little matter connected with the purchase of a yacht. It is a fascinating book Mr. Finger has given us, peopled with rascals and cutthroats and told with the hearty swing that the material demands. With eight illustrations in color from wood blocks, by Paul Honoré. $3 net.

PAULUS FY By Helene Mullins and Marie Gallegher

Not like other books! Now ready in its first edition. $2.00 net.

THE JUDGE:

A Play in Four Acts

By Maxim Gorky

Mr. Gorky's latest play, The Judge, which its author regards as the best of his dramatic writings. In an introduction written especially for this edition, Mr. Gorky discusses modern drama and explains in detail his theories of play-writing. Boards. $1.50 net.

FROM THE HIDDEN WAY

By James Branch Cabell

A new edition of Mr. Cabell's poems, uniform with his other works. $2.50 net.

WHEN ISRAEL IS KING

By Jean and Jerome Tharaud

A study of the Jewish Problem in Hungary, by the foremost European writers upon this subject. $2.00 net.

THE HOUSE OF HATE

By Rita Wellman

A fascinating novel of life in modern Florence, centering about a woman in whom love and an even more powerful passion struggle for supremacy. Drura Hellerman is a distinct achievement in portraiture, and the drama of her fortunes is told with admirable subtlety. $2.00 net.

THE VALLEY OF EYES UNSEEN

By Gilbert Collins

Far-off China and the mysterious hinterland of Thibet are the scenes of this exciting tale in which yellow men and white struggle for the treasure preserved by an unknown race. $2.00 net.

THE THING IN THE WOODS

By Harper Williams

A tale of ghosts that walked, of men found dead with the mark of no known creature upon their throats, of women who screamed at twilight, and of a silver bullet which finally found its mark. $2.00 net.

At all bookstores. In ordering by mail add 6 per cent. for postage.

Robert M. McBride & Co., Publishers, New York

one, and yet it is exactly this fusion which farce after the continental model demands. A simple people, we are willing to admit that a joke is a joke and may indeed be forgiven considerable breadth, but a serious matter is a serious matter, and love, marriage, and morality are decidedly serious matters. We have no objection to the comic-strip view of domestic life or even in our revues, for example, to broadly comic treatment of marital infidelity provided that it is distinctly understood that laughter alone is intended; but we have to know where we stand and we are decidedly uncomfortable on that middle ground where the foreigner loves to place himself and where, all human frailties freely admitted, there is still room for sentiment and charm. We can laugh, for example, with loud guffaws at the spectacle of the unfaithful wife and the deceived husband, and we can, if given the cue, thrill to the drama of remorse and the fresh-turned page, but we cannot generate the atmosphere of Schnitzler nor make of such a situation an idyl of frail and foolish humanity.

Some, thanking God, will reply that I have said no more than that with us the boundaries of morality have not been obliterated, others merely that we are not quite civilized; but be that as it may, the continental farce does demand just this breaking down of boundaries or this completer civilization. Its manners and its morals are exclusively those of what is called the great world but it assumes that complete worldliness does not preclude a certain charm. A nation composed like ours of people who relish equally and in separate compartments of their being the smoking-room story and the saccharine drama furnishes no soil from which the most sophisticated sort of comedy can grow, but when the comedy of sex dissociates itself from nastiness and mingles with sentiment that soil will be prepared. At present sexual attractiveness is either broadly comic or dramatically terrible; it is never frankly recognized as the basis of charm.

Mr. Vajda has, even in farce, the courage of his convictions, but Mr. Hopwood has not. The latter, it is true, can look with a tolerant eye upon frivolity. He can write gorgeous lines redolent of his milieu like the one given his flapper in the present piece when she squelches a pretentious mother with a "Now, mother, don't you try to ritz me, I've seen you with your hair down"; but though he can find his comedy in such an atmosphere he must go elsewhere for his sentiment and send frivolous youth to a serious-minded chorus girl and a noble chauffeur to learn true love and find the happy end. Mr. Vajda, on the other hand, has no need to go outside the ranks of wealth and sophistication. For him, true continental that he is, the divorced wife can be sent back into the arms of her erring husband. She need not, like Mr. Hopwood's heroine, retire to a farm to learn sentiment, for she can continue to be her own impudent self and yet not fail to be delicious.

Vajda is no naughtier than Hopwood. It is merely that, in Hungary, sophistication is old enough to accept itself but that here it casts its eye apologetically in the direction of bourgeois standards. It happens that "The Best People" is completely innocuous, but its author is capable of approaching something very near the smoking-room in the incidents of his plays and something very near the saccharine drama in their moral background, while Vajda could not, I am sure, come within a long distance of either.

The two farces under discussion are almost equally amusing, but "Grounds for Divorce" has the additional advantage of having with it Miss Ina Claire, our foremost expounder of that light charm which is not inconsistent with the most complete sophistication. The dramas of the week have not been distinguished. At the Princess Theater "My Son" calls upon the atmosphere of the Massachusetts coast to freshen up a none too novel theme and succeeds fairly well. At the Vanderbilt Theater "Lazybones" reveals Mr. Owen Davis aiming, apparently, at nothing higher than "a good show" and hitting the mark pretty accurately.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The New School
for Social Research

PURPOSE: To seek an unbiased understanding of the existing order, its genesis, growth and present working, as well as of those circumstances which are making for its revision.

Registration begins September 29
School Year begins October 6

JOHN B. WATSON—Behavior Psychology.
Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS—Mental Hygiene.
Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

DOUGLAS A. THOM—Habit Training in Children.
Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

BERNARD GLUECK—Mental Hygiene Problems of Childhood.
Thursday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

HARRY A. OVERSTREET—The Technique of Influencing Human Behavior.
Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—Introduction to Social Psychology.
Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

WILLIAM I. THOMAS—Personality Development.
Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

HORACE M. KALLEN—Beauty and Use.
Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

A. A. GOLDENWEISER—Theories of Evolution and Progress from Herbert Spencer to Bertrand Russell.
Monday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

DAVID FRIDAY—Principles of Political Economy.
Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LEO WOLMAN—The Labor Movement in the National Life.
Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FREDERICK R. MACAULAY — Statistical Method.
Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

JOSEPH K. HART—Theory and Practice in "New Schools."
Friday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

STARK YOUNG—The Art of the Theatre.
Tuesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

H. W. L. DANA—Twentieth Century Literature.
Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

Tuition for each course of eighteen lectures, $20.

Write for catalogue to

465 West 23d Street New York City

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

IS YOUR LAUGHTER FARCICAL OR PSYCHICAL?

LEWIS & GORDON present THE HAUNTED HOUSE

OWEN DAVIS' SUCCESSOR to "The NERVOUS WRECK"

WALLACE EDDINGER

GEO. M. COHAN Theatre-Broadway at 43d St. Evenings at 8:30 Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

SIX LECTURES SIDNEY BRADSHAW FAY, A.B., Ph.D.
Professor of European History at Smith College

"THE CAUSES OF THE WORLD WAR"

Community Church Auditorium, Park Avenue and 34th St.

Tuesday Eves., Oct. 21, 28; Nov. 11, 18, 25; Dec. 2, at 8:15

Course tickets, $3.50, can be secured at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue. Single admission, 85 cents.

The New School for Social Research announces six lectures by

JULIAN S. HUXLEY of Oxford University

SOME ASPECTS OF EVOLUTIONARY BIOLOGY

Wednesdays and Fridays, October 8-24, 5:20-6:50 P. M.

Single tickets, $1.50 Course tickets, $5.00

465 West 23rd Street, New York City

THIS SUNDAY! THIS SUNDAY!

Great DEBATE of the Campaign!

SHOULD A CLASS-CONSCIOUS SOCIALIST OR WORKER VOTE FOR LA FOLLETTE?

SCOTT NEARING says No! Foremost Socialist Spokesman

vs. MEYER LONDON says Yes!

First Socialist Congressman and Labor Attorney

Chairman: NORMAN HAPGOOD

Sunday Afternoon, October 5, at 3 P. M.

Central Opera House, 67th Street and 3rd Avenue

Tickets, $1.10 (incl. war tax)

EXTRAORDINARY LECTURE!

"WHY TROTZKY HATES MacDONALD"

A frank exposition of the differences between the principles, aims and methods of the Labor Party of England and the Communist Party of Soviet Russia

by John Langdon-Davies

Journalist, Oxford Lecturer.

Labor Party Candidate for Parliament.

(First appearance in this country)

Sunday Afternoon, October 19, 3 P. M.

Cooper Union, 4th Avenue and 8th St

Tickets 75c. (plus war tax)

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 5th Ave. Tel. Longacre 10434-10435

The DEBATE of the CENTURY!

Is CAPITAL PUNISHMENT a Wise Public Policy?

Clarence S. DARROW says NO!

Famous Chicago Attorney in the Leopold-Loeb Case

VERSUS

Judge Alfred J. TALLEY says YES!

N. Y. Court of General Sessions

Chairman to be announced.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 26, 3 P. M.

MANHATTAN OPERA HOUSE 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.

Tickets $1.65, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30, $4.40.

On sale at all branches Tyson's and McBride's Ticket Agencies, or at the offices and by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Avenue Longacre 10434-10435

Provincetown Playhouse—Greenwich Village Theatre

Subscription Season

$11.00, incl. tax, 5 bills $11.00, incl. tax, 5 bills Orchestra

$16.50, opening nights $8.25, incl. tax, 5 bills Balcony

$20.00, incl. tax, 10 bills, 5 at Provincetown Playhouse, 5 at Greenwich Village Theatre.

At the Provincetown
The Great God Brown, by Eugene O'Neill; The Crime in the Whistler Room, by Edmund Wilson; The Colonnade, by Stark Young; Beyond, by Walter Hasenclever; Love for Love, by William Congreve.

At the Greenwich
Desire Under the Elms, by Eugene O'Neill; The Saint, by Stark Young; The Last Night of Don Juan, by Edmond Rostand; Much Ado About Nothing, by William Shakespeare; The Brothers Karamazoff, by Jacques Copeau.

RAND SCHOOL

7 East 15th Street

Write for Bulletin

Courses beginning

Sept. 30, 7 P. M....Alex. A. Goldenweiser
"Anthropology," "Psychoanalysis"

Oct. 2, 8:30 P. M.....Margaret Daniels
"Elements of Psychology"

Oct. 3, 8:30 P. M.....Leo Saidla
"Main Currents in Recent Literature"

Later Lecturers

Scott Nearing, Clarence Darrow, Langdon-Davies

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL. 239 E. 14th Street New York City.

"A Symposium on Modern Literature"

1. "French Literature," Prof. H. W. L. DANA

Saturdays, 8:30 p. m. October 11—November 8

October 11: "Rabelais."

Admission, 50c. Course, $1.50

The DEBATE of the SEASON!

SHOULD LITERATURE BE CENSORED?

JOHN S. SUMNER
Secretary, New York Society for Suppression of Vice

versus

ERNEST BOYD
Noted International Author and Critic

Chairman: CLIFFORD SMYTH
Editor, International Book Review.

SUBJECT:

RESOLVED: That limitations upon the contents of books and magazines as defined in proposed legislation would be detrimental to the advancement of American literature.

Mr. BOYD, Affirmative Mr. SUMNER, Negative

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1924, AT 8:30 P. M.

TOWN HALL,

W. 42nd St., between Sixth Ave. and Broadway

Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75, 3.30 (war tax inc.)

On sale at Brentano's, Macy's Book Dept. and Wanamaker's Book Dept., and at the offices of or by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave. Tel. Longacre 10434-5

Some Notable Fall Books

BIOGRAPHY, MEMOIRS

Adnesse, J. F. H. and Others. Life of Casanova from 1774-1798. N. L. Brown. $2.

Bade, William. Life and Letters of John Muir. Houghton Mifflin. 2 vols. $7.50.

Ballard, Colin B. Napoleon—an Outline. Appleton. $5.

Barry, David S. Forty Years in Washington. Little, Brown. $3.50.

Bazalgette, Leon. Henry Thoreau: Bachelor of Nature. Harcourt, Brace. $4 (?).

Belloc, Hilaire. Marie Antoinette. Putnam. $5.

Bradley, William Aspenwall, tr. The Journal of Louis Hemon. Macmillan.

Broke, Lord Willoughby de. The Passing Years, Reminiscences of. Houghton Mifflin. $6.

Brown, L. H. Leconte de Lisle. Columbia University. $2.50.

Browne, W. R. Altgeld of Illinois. Huebsch. $3.

Calkins, Earnest Elmo. Louder, Please! the Autobiography of a Deaf Man. Atlantic Monthly Press. $2.50.

Chapiro, Joseph. Talks with Gerhart Hauptmann. Dial Press. $3.

Chittick, V. L. O. Thomas Chandier Haliburton, "Sam Slick." Columbia University.

Cooper, James Fenimore. Correspondence of James Fenimore Cooper. Yale University. 2 vols. $7.50.

Crapsey, Algernon S. The Last of the Heretics. Knopf. $3.50.

Cronwright-Schreiner, S. C. The Life of Olive Schreiner. Little, Brown. $5.

d'Angelo, Pascal. A Son of Italy. Macmillan.

d'Angerville, Mouffle. The Private Life of Louis XV. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

de Castellane, Boni. My Memoirs. Knopf. $5.

Dennis, Charles H. Eugene Field's Creative Years. Doubleday, Page. $4.

Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan. Memories and Adventures. Little, Brown. $4.50.

Edgett, Edwin Francis. Edward Loomis Davenport. Brimmer. $5.

Ellis, Havelock. Casanova. Luce. $2.

Faure, E. Napoleon. Knopf. $3.50.

Goldring, Douglas. James Elroy Flecker. Seltzer. $2.

Gompers, Samuel. Seventy Years of Life and Labor. Dutton.

Gorky, Maxim. Fragments from the Diary. McBride. $5.

Gosse, Edmund. The Life of William Congreve. Scribner. $2.50 (?).

Graham. R. B. Cunningham-. Hernando De Soto. Dial Press. $2.50.

Greig, James, ed. The Farington Diary. 1804-06. 3 vols. $7.50.

Hammond, J. W. Charles Proteus Steinmetz; a Biography. Century. $4.

Herzen, Alexander. My Past and Thoughts, the Memoirs Of. Knopf. 2 vols. Each $2.

Hickey, William. Memoirs; v. IV. Knopf. $5.

Hinckley, Edyth. Mazzini, the Story of a Great Italian. Putnam. $6.

Howe, M. A. de Wolfe. Barrett Wendell and His Letters. Atlantic Monthly Press. $4.50.

Huddleston, Sisley. Poincaré; a Biographical Portrait. Little, Brown. $2.50.

Huneker, James Gibbons. Intimate Letters Of. Boni and Liveright. $7.

Lawrence, David. The True Story of Woodrow Wilson. Doran. $2.50.

Liptzin, S. Shelley in Germany. Columbia University. $1.90.

Loisy, Alfred. My Duel with the Vatican. Dutton.

Lowell, Amy. John Keats. Houghton Mifflin. 2 vols. $10.

Machen, Arthur. The London Adventure. Knopf. $2.

AMONG LIPPINCOTT BOOKS OF THE FALL

The Literary Tid-Bit of the Season

In some it has aroused violent denunciation—in others, the highest praise. It is the book all America and all Europe will read this year. Eight printings required to satisfy the demand here and abroad.

UNCENSORED RECOLLECTIONS. ANONYMOUS

"This is about the most entertaining volume of intimate memoirs the reviewer has read for many seasons. For piquant and racy revelation of character and incident revolving around the eccentricities, pleasures and vices of the great and near-great of the last half of the Victorian period, the anonymous author is to be highly commended. He knew everybody in his time and knew what they did and where they did it. Interminable gossip about personalities of international notoriety and fame, gossip and banter that are fascinating and thrilling to encounter, run through the volume like the swift flow of a swollen stream. This is a most absorbing volume and one could go on quoting indefinitely from its glamorous, unconventional pages."—N. Y. Herald-Tribune. Octavo. 340 Pages. $4.50

EVERLASTING LIFE. By WILLIAM W. KEEN, M.D.

A comforting faith; a satisfying belief. It will help to bring order out of chaos in modern Christian thinking. Support and consolation on a question which more than any other has troubled the hearts of men. $1.00

OUR FAITH IN EDUCATION. By HENRY SUZZALLO, President, University of Washington

"The little book is vibrant with the finest kind of spirit and breathes the warmest faith in the beneficent function of our school system in the successful working out of our democratic philosophy."—Times Book Review. $1.25

LIPPINCOTT'S SOCIOLOGICAL SERIES

Books that apply scientific methods to social thought
Edited by Edward Cary Hayes, University of Illinois

CRIMINOLOGY. By EDWIN H. SUTHERLAND

An analysis of criminality in the light of recent developments in the science of human behavior. Tentative price $3.50

RACES, NATIONS AND CLASSES By HERBERT A. MILLER

The psychology of dominion and freedom. Tentative price $2.00

THE SOCIOLOGY OF REVOLUTION. By P. SOROKIN

A sociological analysis of Revolution, in the light of the Russian Revolution especially. Tentative price $2.00

POLITICAL ACTION. By SEBA ELDRIDGE

A naturalistic interpretation of the Labor Movement in relation to the state. $2.00

POPULATION PROBLEMS. By EDWARD B. REUTER

An enlightening book on the facts of population here and abroad. $2.00

SOCIAL WORK IN THE LIGHT OF HISTORY By STUART A. QUEEN

The first study of social work in historical perspective. $2.00

Fiction for Fall Evenings

LOUIS BECKE'S

Famous South Sea Tales Now Published in a Uniform Edition

PACIFIC TALES

Strangely true stories of the days when "bluff-bowed old wave-punchers plunged their clumsy hulls into the rolling swell of the Pacific carrying their 'trade' of knives, axes, guns, bad rum and good tobacco, instead of, as now, white umbrellas, paper boots and shoes, German sewing machines and fancy prints." $2.00

BY REEF AND PALM AND THE EBBING OF THE TIDE

Still stranger romances of island life—the loves of white men and brown women, often cynical and brutal, sometimes exquisitely tender and pathetic. $2.00

RODMAN THE BOATSTEERER

Tales of mutiny on whaler and pearl ship, of savage peace and war, of human nature, white and brown, in the old beach-combing days in the Pacific, "when every white man lived like a prince and died in his boots from a bullet or a spear." $2.00

HELEN ADAIR

There is a mystery about Helen Adair, dark, silent, hauntingly beautiful, a girl of obvious refinement and education—yet confessing in open court to a criminal charge. An unusual romance of loyalty and daring in the rescue of political prisoners from the old Convict Colony of New South Wales $2.00

HARBOTTLE. By JOHN HARGRAVE

"A book of more than passing interest. Indeed, it is not too much to call it a novel of great importance, as an expression of the spirit of the times. Many of the episodes are dramatic, and all are realistic. Mr. Hargrave owes much to H. G. Wells, but his thought is his own, though its great significance lies in the fact that it is also an up-to-date expression of the chief idea at work in 'The Mind of the Race.'"—Saturday Review, New York City. $2.00

At all Bookstores

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

LONDON PHILADELPHIA MONTREAL

McRae, Milton A. Forty Years of Newspaperdom. Brentano's. $3.

Mégroz, R. L. Walter de la Mare: a Biographical and Critical Study. Doran. $2.50.

Melville, Lewis. Lady Suffolk and Her Circle. Houghton Mifflin. $5.

Melville, Lewis. Nell Gwyn. Doran. $7.50.

Mitchell, E. P. Memoirs of an Editor. Scribner. $4.50.

Moses, Montrose J., and Gerson, Virginia. Clyde Fitch and His Letters. Little, Brown. $4.

Moskowitz, Henry. Alfred E. Smith; an American Career. Seltzer. $2.50.

Paine, Ralph D. Joshua Barney; a Forgotten Hero of Blue Water. Century. $4.

Paleologue, Maurice. An Ambassador's Memoirs. Doran. 3 vols. Each $7.50.

Rickword, Edgell. Rimbaud, the Boy and the Poet. Knopf. $3.50.

Schwob, Marcel. Imaginary Lives. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

Seitz, Don C. Joseph Pulitzer—His Life and Letters. Simon and Schuster. $5.

Shaw, George Bernard and Henderson, Archibald. Table Talk of G. B. S. Harper. $1.50 (?).

Shorter, Clement K. C. K. S., an Autobiography. Doran. $3.50.

Steuart, John A. Robert Louis Stevenson: a Critical Biography. Little, Brown. 2 vols. $8.

Strachey, St. Loe. The River of Life. Putnam.

Thomas, Lowell. With Lawrence in Arabia. Century. $4.

Tolstoi, Leon. The Truth About My Father. Appleton. $2.

Tooker, L. Frank. The Joys and Tribulations of an Editor. Century. $4.

White, Dorothy V. The Groombridge Diary. Oxford University. $4.20.

White, William Allen. Woodrow Wilson, the Man, His Time and His Task. Houghton Mifflin. $5.

White, William Hale. Letters to Three Friends. Oxford University. $3.50.

Wise, Stephen S. Thirty Years' Battle in the Ministry; an Autobiography. Brentano's. $4.

Woodforde, James. The Diary of a Country Parson. Oxford University. $4.20.

Zedlitz-Trutzschler, Robert. Twelve Years at the German Imperial Court. Doran. $5.

DRAMA

Benavente, Jacinto. The School of Princesses and Other Plays. Scribner. $2.50.

Brown, Alice. Charles Lamb, a Play in Five Acts. Macmillan.

Dickinson, Thomas H. Playwrights of the New American Theater. Macmillan.

Eaton, W. P. Actors' Heritage. Atlantic. $4.

Ervine, St. John. The Organized Theater; a Plea in Civics. Macmillan. $1.75.

Hamilton, Clayton. Conversations on Contemporary Drama. Macmillan.

Hughes, Hatcher. Hell-Bent for Heaven. Harper. $1.50 (?).

Jourdain, Eleanor F. The Drama in Europe, in Theory and Practice. Holt. $2.25.

Koch, Frederick H., ed. Carolina Folk Plays. Second Series. Holt. $2 (?).

Krutch, J. W. Comedy and Conscience After the Restoration. Columbia University.

Langner, Lawrence. Moses. Boni and Liveright. $2.

McEvoy. J. P. The Potters. Reilly and Lee. $1.50.

Morgan, A. E. Tendencies of Modern English Drama. Scribner. $3.

Sinclair, Upton. Singing Jailbirds. A Drama in Four Acts. Upton Sinclair.

Wiener, Leo. The Contemporary Drama of Russia. Little, Brown. $2.50.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF CLEOPATRA
By Arthur Weigall
A biography of the famous queen in which the "Serpent of the Nile" becomes not a serpent at all but a true wife, mother and lover. A comprehensive account of her life and influence upon History. Illustrated $5.00

MARIE ANTOINETTE
By Hilaire Belloc
"Hilaire Belloc sensed to the fullest the brilliance, the pathos, the tragedy of this queen's life—decidedly historical but never does fact intrude with dry abruption—it is throughout vivid, colorful, living."—Marian G. Sharp. Illustrated $5.00

GALAPAGOS: WORLD'S END
By William Beebe
Giant tortoises, marine lizards and strange creatures never before seen are pictured by the distinguished naturalist in his account of his famous expedition. Gorgeously illustrated with over 100 pictures in color and black and white. $9.00

PEARLS AND SAVAGES
By Captain Frank Hurley
With this intrepid explorer you plunge deep into the savage heart of Guinea, among pygmies, head hunters and primitive survivors of the stone age. Illustrated with ninety magnificent full-page photographs of savage life. $7.50

VOYAGING
By Rockwell Kent
"Voyaging Southward from the Strait of Magellan." With pen and picture one of America's greatest artists describes his explorations. Illustrated with a collection of his finest drawings. $7.50

THE FABULOUS FORTIES
By Meade Minnigerode
America of the early forties, ingenuous, high spirited, when New York was young—when pigs roamed the streets and excitable citizens voted in Astor place—is pictured in this delightful volume. Illustrated with fine old prints. $3.50

ENCHANTED AISLES
By Alexander Woollcott
"Intriguing title, wonderful book, full of charming, amusing tales of the theatre, also short sketches of writers and musicians: and all written by a man with a world of understanding and humor."—Madge Kennedy. $2.50

THE GOLDEN BED
By Wallace Irwin
A gorgeous love story of a Southern beauty and a "poor white" by the author of "Lew Tyler's Wives," perhaps the most highly and universally applauded novel of the season. "Masterly," says the Times. "It will take high rank among America's literary creations." $2.00

THE UNCERTAIN FEAST
By Solita Solano
A story of stark realism in which a ruthless, dominating business man fights his way to financial success and fails utterly in his love conflict with a subtly determined woman. $2.00

REDEMPTION
By Beckles Willson
A story of the character moulding years of a young Canadian. Problems of college, the stage, suffrage, immigration, and racial feuds find their place in this story. $2.00

At all Booksellers

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

2 West 45th Street NEW YORK

ECONOMICS, INDUSTRY, POLITICS, SOCIOLOGY

Atkins, Willard E. and Lasswell, Harold. Labor Attitudes and Problems. Prentice-Hall. $5.

Baker, Ray Stannard and Dodd, William E. The Educational, Literary and Public Papers of Woodrow Wilson: College and State, 1875-1913. Harper. 2 vols. $7 (?).

Burns, C. Delisle. A Short History of International Intercourse. Oxford University. $1.75.

Enfield, R. R. Agricultural Crisis, 1920-23. Longmans, Green. $3.50.

Fitch, John A. The Causes of Industrial Unrest. Harper. $3 (?).

Florence, P. Sargeant. Economics of Fatigue and Unrest and the Efficiency of Labor in English and American Industry. Holt. $5 (?).

Iconoclast. England's Labour Rulers. Seltzer. $1.50.

Jusserand, Jules J. School for Ambassadors. Putnam.

Levine, Louis. The Garment Workers. Huebsch. $5.

Luce, Robert. Legislative Assemblies. Houghton Mifflin. $6.

MacDonald, J. Ramsay. Socialism, Critical and Constructive. Bobbs-Merrill. $3.50.

Mathews, J. M. American State Government. Appleton. $3.75.

Morley, Felix. Unemployment Relief in Great Britain. (Hart, Schaffner & Marx Prize Essay on Economics.) Houghton Mifflin. $2.

Moulton, H. G. The Reparation Plan. McGraw-Hill. $2.50.

Robinson, Edgar E. Evolution of American Political Parties. Harcourt, Brace. $4 (?).

Root, Elihu. Men and Politics. Harvard University. $3.

Small, Albion W. Origins of Sociology. University of Chicago.

Stoddard, Lothrop. Racial Realities in Europe. Scribner. $3.

Trotsky, Leon. Problems of Life. Doran. $4.

Villari, Luigi. The Awakening of Italy: the Fascista Regeneration. Doran. $2.50.

Wallace, William Kay. The Passing of Politics. Macmillan.

Wedgwood, Josiah. Essays and Adventures of a Labor M. P. Huebsch. $3 (?).

ESSAYS, CRITICISM

Aldington, Richard. Literary Studies and Reviews. Dial Press. $2.50.

Bahr, Hermann. Expressionism. A. and C. Boni. $5.

Baldwin, C. S. Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic. Macmillan. $2.10.

Baring, Maurice. Punch and Judy and Other Essays. Doubleday, Page. $2.50.

Boyd, Ernest. Portraits: Real and Imaginary. McBride. $1.25.

Boynton, Percy Holmes. Some Contemporary Americans. University of Chicago. $2.

Bradford, G. Bare Souls. Harper. $3 (?).

Brennecke, Jr., Ernest. Thomas Hardy's Universe. Small, Maynard. $3.

Brownell, W. C. The Genius of Style. Scribner. $2.

Cabell, James Branch. Straws and Prayerbooks. McBride. $2.50.

Canby, Henry S. Definitions: Second Series. Harcourt, Brace. $2 (?).

Chekhov, Anton. Letters on the Short Story, the Drama and Other Literary Topics. Minton, Balch. $4.

Ellis, Havelock. Impressions and Comments: Third Series. Houghton Mifflin. $3.

Elton, Oliver. A Sheaf of Papers. Small, Maynard. $3.

Firkins, Oscar W. William Dean Howells. Harvard University.

Hearn, Lafcadio. American Miscellanies. Dodd, Mead. 2 vols. $6.

Hewett-Thayer, Harvey W. The Modern German Novel. Marshall Jones. $2.50.

Hewlett, Maurice. Last Essays. Scribner. $2.50.

Holliday, Robert Cortes. Literary Lanes and Other Byways. Doran. $2.50.

Huddleston, Sisley. Those Europeans. Putnam. $2.50.

Iijima, Ikuzo. Langland and Chaucer. Four Seas. $3.

A Course of Study in Music Understanding

Second year—Now ready

From Song to Symphony

By Daniel Gregory Mason

Price, $1.50 net

Adopted by The National Federation of Music Clubs

Authoritative Concise Readable

This new manual of music appreciation leads the student step by step from folksong to the modern symphony. It presupposes an understanding of the subjects so luminously treated in Prof. Gehrkens' Fundamentals.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY,
178-179 Tremont St., BOSTON 10

Chas. H. Ditson & Co., 8-10-12 East 34th St., New York

Order of your local dealer

THE LAND OF JOURNEYS' ENDING

By Mary Austin

A BOOK of the strangest, most romantic and interesting part of our land. No tourist-book, but that of a dweller, a student, a lover—one who has found the reason, the rhythm, the memories and the soul of this land of many peoples' journeys' ending. Indian, Spanish, Anglo-Saxon came and each brought something. Mrs. Austin knows well the historic and cultural gift of each, and perhaps no one has so sanely, truly and knowledgeably interpreted the Indian of the Southwest. Her book is liberally illustrated and has been supplied with a glossary of Spanish terms.

Illustrated. Price $4.00

The Century Co., 353 Fourth Avenue New York City

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

Kaun, Alexander. Leonid Andreyev, a Critical Study. Huebsch. $3.50.
Lalou, René. Contemporary French Literature; 1870-1924. Knopf. $3.50.
Macy, John. The Story of the World's Literature. Boni and Liveright. $5.
Marr, George S. The Periodical Essayists of the 18th Century. Appleton. $2.50.
Maude, Aylmer. Tolstoy on Art. Small, Maynard. $4 (?).
Mencken, H. L. Prejudices; Fourth Series. Knopf. $2.50.
Moore, George. Conversations in Ebury Street. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Nathan, George Jean. Materia Critica. Knopf. $2.50.
Neilson, Francis. The Desire for Change. Huebsch. $1.50.
Newman, Ernest. Wagner as Man and Artist. Knopf. $5.
Newman, Frances. Genius and the Short Story. Huebsch. $2.50 (?).
Noyes, Alfred. Aspects of Modern Poetry. Stokes. $2.50 (?).
Phelps, William Lyon. As I Like It. Second Series. Scribner. $2.
Robinson, David M. Sappho. (Our Debt to Greece and Rome ser.) Marshall Jones. $1.50.
Rosenfeld, Paul. Men Seen. Dial Press. $2.25.
Rusk, Ralph L. The Literature of the Middle Western Frontier. Columbia University Press. 2 vols.
Russell, Bertrand and Others. Our Changing Morality. A. and C. Boni. $3.
Saurat, Denis. Blake and Milton. Dial Press. $2.
Saurat, Denis. Milton, the Man and the Thinker. Dial Press. $4.
Selincourt, Basil de. Walt Whitman: a Critical Study. Small, Maynard. $4.
Sherman, Stuart P. My Dear Cornelia. Atlantic Monthy Press. $2.50.
Sherman, Stuart P. Points of View. Scribner. $2.
Walpole, Hugh. Anthony Trollope. Doran. $2.50.

FICTION

Ades, Albert. The Naked King. A. and C. Boni.
Anderson, Sherwood. A Story Teller's Story. Huebsch. $3 (?).
Arlen, Michael. The Green Hat. Doran. $2.50.
Armstrong, Martin. The Bazaar and Other Stories. Knopf. $2.50.
Ashmun, Margaret. The Lake. Macmillan. $2.
Baroja, P. Red Dawn. Knopf. $2.50.
Bennett, Arnold. Elsie and the Child and Other Stories. Doran. $2.50.
Benson, E. F. David Blaize of King's. Doran. $2.
Benson, Stella. Pipers and a Dancer. Macmillan. $2.
Beresford, J. D. Unity. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.
Bibesco, Princess. Isvor. Stokes. $2.50.
Bojer, Johan. A Pilgrimage. Century. $1.75.
Bolitho, William. Leviathan. Harper. $2 (?).
Borden, M. Three Pilgrims and a Tinker. Knopf. $2.50 .
Bouverie, Katherine Pleydell. January. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Bowen, Elizabeth, Encounters. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Burke, Kenneth. The White Oxen. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.
Burke, Thomas. The Wind and the Rain. Doran. $2.
Burt, Struthers. The Diary of a Dude-Wrangler. Scribner. $3.
Byrne, Donn. Blind Raftery. Century. $1.25.
Cannan, Gilbert. The House of Prophecy. Seltzer. $2.
Cohen, Octavus Roy. Sunclouds. Dodd, Mead. $2.
Conrad, Joseph and Ford, Ford Madox. The Nature of a Crime. Doubleday, Page. $2.50.
Croy, Homer. R. F. D. No. 3. Harper. $2 (?).
De la Mare, Walter. Ding Dong Dell. Knopf. $2.50.
Dial, Stories from the. Dial Press. $2.50.
Dreiser, Theodore. An American Tragedy. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

New Books From Beacon Hill

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY present below some outstanding new books, selected from a list of publications of which we are rather proud. Detailed descriptions of all our new books will be found in our complete "Fall Announcement." Write for your free copy.

Memories and Adventures
By Sir Arthur Conan Doyle
The fascinating life story of the creator of Sherlock Holmes, which Arthur Bartlett Maurice, famous critic, says "should be one of the most stimulating books of the decade." $4.50

The Truth at Last
By Charles Hawtrey Edited by Somerset Maugham
Amusing, frankly self-revealing memoirs of a famous English actor, well remembered in America for his tours in "A message from Mars" and "The Man from Blankley's." $5.00

The Passionate Quest
By E. Phillips Oppenheim
An engrossing novel of present-day London, in which this famous novelist, for once, makes the central figure, instead of a man, a girl who craves happiness. $2.00

To-Morrow and To-Morrow
By Stephen McKenna
A realistic, vital story of post-war England and particularly of its inner political circles, in which some of the famous characters of "Sonia" make their last appearance. $2.00

Sixty Years of American Humor
Edited by Joseph Lewis French
A prose anthology, by the editor of "The Pioneer West,t" containing selections from the best humorous writers of the past sixty years, from Artemus Ward to Sam Hellman. $2.50

The Inn of Discontent and Other Fantastic Plays By Percival Wilde
This volume contains five one-act plays, "The Inn of Discontent," "Lady of Dreams," "Ashes of Romance," "The Luck-Piece" and "Nocturne," by the foremost American author in this field of the drama. $1.50

Seamen All By E. Keble Chatterton
A series of true stories of adventures at sea, from the days of the Barbary Pirates down to the World War. The book is full of action and may be recommended to any one who cares for the sea. $3.00

The Contemporary Drama of Russia
By Leo Wiener
A new and provocative consideration of relative values in the present-day Russian drama, by the Professor of Slavic Languages and Literature at Harvard University. $2.50

Cargoes for Crusoes By Grant Overton
The best volume on books and authors of the year—containing biographical and critical discussions of leading authors and their books. Published jointly by Little, Brown, Doran and Appleton and sold for less than manufacturing cost. 50 cents

These books are for sale at all booksellers

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY, Publishers
34 Beacon Street, Boston

Farjeon, Joseph Jefferson. The Master Criminal. Dial Press. $2.
Farrere, Claude. Thomas the Lambkin. Dutton. $2.50.
Finger, Charles J. Bushrangers. McBride. $3.
Firbank, Ronald. The Flower Beneath the Foot. Brentano's. $2.
Flandrau, Grace H. Entranced. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Fletcher, J. S. The Time Worn Town. Knopf. $2.
Ford, Ford Madox. Some Do Not. Seltzer. $2.
Forster, E. M. A Passage to India. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Galsworthy, John. The White Monkey. Scribner. $2.
George, W. L. The Triumph of Gallio. Harper. $2.
Georgian Stories of 1924. Putnam. $2.50.
Hackett, Francis. That Nice Young Couple. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Hamsun, Knut. Segelfoss Town. Knopf. $2.50.
Hecht, Ben. Humpty Dumpty. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Hergesheimer, J. Balisand. Knopf. $2.
Hichens, Robert. After the Verdict. Doran. $2.
Hummel, George F. Subsoil. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Husband, Joseph. Citadel. Houghton Mifflin. $2.
Huxley, Aldous. Young Archimedes and Other Sketches. Doran. $2.
Irons, Ion. Simples. Seltzer. $2.
Irwin, Margaret E. F. Who Will Remember? Seltzer. $2.
Johnston, Mary. The Slave Ship. Little, Brown. $2.
Lagerlöf, Selma. Marbacka. Doubleday, Page. $2.50.
Lawrence, D. H., and Skinner, M. L. The Boy in the Bush. Seltzer. $2.50.
Lewis, Edwin Herbert. Brunel: Historical Romance. Hyman-McGee. $2.
MacFadyen, Virginia. Windows Facing West. A. and C. Boni. $2.
McKenna, Stephen. To-morrow and To-morrow. Little, Brown. $2.
Mackenzie, Compton. The Heavenly Ladder. Doran. $2.50.
Mann, Thomas. Death in Venice. Knopf. $2.50.
Mansfield, Katherine. The Little Girl. Knopf. $2.50.
Marshall, Archibald. Anthony Dare's Progress. Dodd, Mead. $2.
Maxwell, W. B. Elain at the Gate. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Merrel, Concordia. Miss Pilgrim's Progress. Seltzer. $2.
Merz, Charles. Centerville, U. S. A. Century. $2.
Mitchison, Naomi. When the Bough Breaks. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Morand, Paul. Closed All Night. Seltzer. $2.
O'Higgins, Harvey. Julie Cane. Harper. $2 (?).
Peterkin, Julia E. Green Thursday. Knopf. $2.
Phillpotts, Eden. Redcliff. Macmillan. $2.50.
Powys, Llewelyn. Black Laughter. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Powys, Theodore Francis. Mark Only. Knopf. $2.50.
Pryce, Richard. The Romance of Jane West. Houghton Mifflin. $2.
Recht, Charles. Rue with a Difference. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Rolland, Romain. The Soul Enchanted; vol. 1, Annette and Sylvie; vol. 2, Summer. Holt. Each $2.50 (?).
Sachs, Emanie N. Talk. Harper. $2 (?).
Samms, A. L. As It Happened. Hyman-McGee. $1.75.
Scott, Evelyn. The Golden Door. Seltzer. $2.
Sedgwick, Anne Douglas. The Little French Girl. Houghton Mifflin. $2.
Simons, H. Black Uniform. Hyman-McGee. $2.
Sinclair, May. Arnold Waterlow; a Life. Macmillan. $2.50.
Spitzer, Marian. Who Would Be Free. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Stallings, Laurence. Plumes. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Starrett, Vincent. The Surprising Adventures of Jimmie Lavender. Hyman-McGee. $2.
Watts, Mary S. Fabric of the Loom. Macmillan.
White, Walter F. The Fire in the Flint. Knopf. $2.50.
Woodward, W. E. Lottery. Harper. $2 (?).

FINE ARTS

Andreyev, Leonid. Roerich, a Monograph of a Great Artist. Brentano's. $30.
Ashton, Leigh. An Introduction to the Study of Chinese Sculpture. Scribner. $15.
Beardsley, Aubrey. The Uncollected Works of. Dodd, Mead. $12.50.
Borenius, Tancred. Four Early Italian Engravers. Medici Society. $5.
Breasted, James. Oriental Forerunners of Byzantine Painting. University of Chicago. $4.
Briggs, Martin. Muhammadan Architecture in Egypt and Palestine. Oxford University. $28.
Hambidge, Jay. The Parthenon and Other Greek Temples: Their Dynamic Symmetry. Yale University. $6.
Hind, C. Lewis. Landscape Painting; v. I, From Giotto to Turner; v. 2, From Turner to the Present Day. Scribner. Each $8.50.
Hutton, Edward. The Sienese School of Painting in the National Gallery. Medici Society. $3.50.
Jackson, J. American Colonial Architecture. McKay. $2.
Jourdain, M. English Decoration and Furniture, 1500-1600. Scribner. $25.
Kelly, J. Frederick. Early Domestic Architecture of Connecticut. Yale University. $15 (?).
Kent, Rockwell. Voyaging Southward from the Strait of Magellan. Putnam. $7.50.
Klingsor, Tristan. Cézanne. Dodd, Mead. $1.75.
Landowska, Wanda. Music of the Past. Knopf. $2.50.
Leipnik, F. L. A History of French Etching. Dodd, Mead. $12.50.
McCormick, Harriet Hammond. Landscape Art Past and Present. Scribner. $20.
Marriott, Charles. Modern English Architecture. Scribner. $7.50.
Mumford, Lewis. Sticks and Stones. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Nevill, Ralph. Old English Sporting Prints and Their History. C. E. Lauriat. $18.
Pach, Walter. The Masters of Modern Art. Huebsch. $3.50 (?).
Robinson, Charles N. Old Naval Prints, Their Artists and Engravers. C. E. Lauriat. $18.
Reutter. Architecture of India. Brentano's. $35.
Siren, Osvald. Chinese Sculpture from the Fifth to the Fourteenth Century. Scribner. Three vols. $75.

HISTORY

Adams, Randolph Greenfield. A History of the Foreign Policy of the United States. Macmillan.
Andrews, Charles M. The Colonial Background of the American Revolution. Yale University.
Bowden, Witt. Industrial Society in England toward the End of the 18th Century. Macmillan.
Coate, Mary. Social Life in Stuart England. Appleton. $2 (?)
Diehl, Charles. A History of the Byzantine Empire. Princeton University.
Duchesne, Louis. Early History of the Christian Church; v. 3. The Fifth Century. Longmans, Green. $6.
Ewart, John S. The Roots and Causes of the War: 1914-1918. Doran. 2 v. $12.50.
Halévy, Elie. History of the English People of the 19th Century. Harcourt, Brace. $7.50 (?)
Harvey, G. E. History of Burma. Longmans, Green. $7 (?).
Haverfield, F. The Roman Occupation of Britain. Oxford University. $6.
Hudson, William Henry. The Story of the Renaissance. Holt. $2.50.
Huizinga, J. The Waning of the Middle Ages. Longmans, Green. $5.40.
Krapp, G. P. America, the Great Adventure. Knopf. $4.
Lawrence, D. H. Movements in European History. Seltzer. $2.50 (?).

Lord, Robert Howard. Origins of the War of 1870. Harvard University. $3.50.
Nevins, A. American States During and After the Revolution. Macmillan. $4.
Oman, Sir Charles. The Art of War in the Middle Ages, A.D. 378-1485. Houghton Mifflin. Two vols. $12.50.
Pease, Theodore Calvin. The Story of Illinois. McClurg. $2.50.

MISCELLANEOUS

Boyd, Nancy. Distressing Dialogues. Harper. $2 (?).
Filene, Edward A. The Way Out. Doubleday, Page. $2.50.
Gaines, Francis Pendleton. The Southern Plantation. Columbia University.
Gruening, Ernest, ed. These United States: Second Series. Boni and Liveright. $3.
Hooker, Richard. The Story of an Independent Newspaper: The Springfield Republican. Macmillan. $2.

PHILOSOPHY, PSYCHOLOGY, RELIGION, ANTHROPOLOGY

Alexander, Hartley. Ghost Masks from Amerindian Myths. Dutton.
Alexander, Hartley B. Nature and Human Nature. Open Court. $3.
Bagger, Eugene S. Psycho-Graphology. Putnam. $1.75.
Baudouin, Charles and Lestchinsky, A. The Inner Discipline. Holt. $2 (?).
Bentley, Madison. The Field of Psychology. Appleton. $3.50.
Burnham, William H. The Normal Mind. Appleton. $3.50.
Croce, Benedetto. The Conduct of Life. Harcourt, Brace. $2.25 (?).
Dawson, M. M. The Ethics of Socrates. Putnam. $3.
Dewey, John. Experience and Nature. (The Paul Carus Foundation Lectures.) Open Court. $3.
Driesch, Hans. The Crisis in Psychology. Princeton University.
Follett, M. P. Creative Experience. Longmans, Green. $3.
Freud, S. Beyond the Pleasure Principle. Boni and Liveright. $1.50.
Freud, Sigmund. Group Psychology and the Psychology of the Ego. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Giddings, Franklin H. The Scientific Study of Human Society. University of North Carolina.
Gregory, J. C. The Nature of Laughter. Harcourt, Brace. $3.75.
Harrison, Jane Ellen. Mythology. Marshall Jones. $1.50.
Jesse, F. Tennyson. Murder and Its Motives. Knopf. $3.
Jones, Rufus, M. Fundamental Ends of Life: What Men Want. Macmillan. $1.50 (?).
Le Bon, Gustave. The World Unbalanced. Longmans, Green. $3.50.
Luckenbill, D. D. Annals of Sennacherib. University of Chicago. $4.
Lutoslawski, Wincenty. The World of Souls. Dial Press. $3.50.
MacCurdy, George Grant. Human Origins. Appleton. 2 vols. $10.
Martin, Everitt Dean. Psychology, What It Has to Teach You About Yourself and the World You Live In. People's Institute. $3.
Mathews, Shailer, ed. Contributions of Science to Religion. Appleton. $3.
Morgan, John J. B. The Psychology of the Unadjusted School Child. Macmillan. $2.
Oldham, J. H. Christianity and the Race Problem. Doran. $1.75.
Rivers, W. H. R. Psychology and Ethnology. (International Library of Psychology.) Harcourt, Brace. $3.75 (?).
Rivers, W. H. R. Social Organization. Knopf. $4.
Roth, Leon. Spinoza, Descartes and Maimonides. Oxford University. $2.50.
Rowe, Henry K. The History of Religion in the United States. Macmillan. $1.75.
Sullivan, W. C. Crime and Insanity. Longmans, Green. $4.20.
Taylor, Alfred Edward. Platonism (Our Debt to Greece and Rome ser.) Marshall Field. $1.50.
Watts, A. Abnormal Psychology and Education. Appleton. $2.
Wile, Ira S. The Challenge of Childhood. Seltzer. $2.50.

POETRY

Braithwaite, W. S. Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1924. Brimmer. $3.
Cabell, James Branch. From the Hidden Way. $2.50.
Campbell, Roy. The Flaming Terrapin. Dial Press. $2.
Conkling, G. H. Ship's Log. Knopf. $2.
Cox, J. H. Folk-Songs of the South. Harvard University. $6.
Crane, Nathalia. The Janitor's Boy and Other Poems. Seltzer. $1.50.
Cumberland, Gerald. Rosalys and Other Poems. Hyman-McGee. $1.50.
D., H. Heliodora. Houghton Mifflin. $1.50.
Davies, W. H. Secrets. Harcourt, Brace. $1.50.
Edman, Irwin. Poems. Simon & Schuster. $1.50.
Farrar, John. The Middle Twenties. Doran. $1.50.
Felshin, Simon. Poems for the New Age. Seltzer. $1.
Guiterman, Arthur. A Poet's Proverbs. Dutton.
Masters, Edgar Lee. The New Spoon River. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Moore, T. Surge. Judas: an Epic Poem. Hyman-McGee. $2.
Ransom, John Crowe. Chills and Fever. Knopf. $1.50.
Sapir, Edward and Barbeau, Marius. Folk Songs of French Canada. Yale University. $2.50 (?).
Symons, Arthur. Love's Cruelty. A. and C. Boni. $1.75.
Van Doren, Mark. Spring Thunder and Other Poems. Seltzer. $1.50.

SCIENCE

Barker, J. Ellis. Cancer. Dutton. $3.
Berthoud, Alfred. New Theories of Matter and the Atom. Macmillan. $3.50.
Cohen, Morris R. Reason and Nature: the Significance of Scientific Method. Harcourt. $3 (?).
Haskins, C. H. Studies in the History of Mediaeval Science. Harvard University. $6.
Kammerer, Paul. The Inheritance of Acquired Characteristics. Boni and Liveright. $4.50.
Slosson, Edwin E., ed. Keeping up with Science. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.

TRAVEL, NATURE, DESCRIPTION

Austin, Mary. The Land of Journey's Ending. Century. $4.
Baring-Gould, S. The Riviera. Brentano's. $2.50.
Beaver, W. N. Unexplored New Guinea. Lippincott. $6.
Bercovici, Konrad. Around the World in New York. Century. $5.
Bumpus, T. Francis. Ancient London Churches. Stokes. $4.50.
Derennes, C. The Life of the Bat. Harper. $4.
Ferenczy, Arpad. The Ants of Timothy Thummel. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Forman, Henry James. Grecian Italy. Boni and Liveright. $4.50.
Franck, Harry A. Glimpses of Japan and Formosa. Century. $3.
Massingham, H. J. In Praise of England. Dutton.
Maxwell, G. S. Authors' Thames. Brentano's. $4.50.
Noice, Harold. With Stefansson in the Arctic. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.
Osborn, Henry Fairfield. Impressions of Great Naturalists. Scribner. $2.50 (?).
Wade, B. E. Ventures of an Ant. Rand-McNally. $1.50.

New books of ALBERT & CHARLES BONI New York

BLACK CAMEOS
by R. Emmet Kennedy

25 stories of rural negro life, interspersed with the words and music of 18 spirituals. A book which will take its place alongside of the Uncle Remus stories. Illustrated by Ed. L. Tinker. ($2.50 net)

A NAKED KING
by Albert Ades
(Co-author of Goha the Fool)

Flesh as a bait against spirit draws man's deepest emotions to the surface and renders A NAKED KING profoundly stirring. This book, really a study of the psychology of genius, will confirm the reputation of Ades, whose previous work was acclaimed in seven countries as a masterpiece and which E. M. Forster called: "Perhaps one of the great books of all time." ($2.00 net)

LOVERS of literature (and that includes, we think, every reader of The Nation) will hail with joy our plans for the further development of THE AMERICAN LIBRARY, under the editorship of John Macy, Robert Morss Lovett, Van Wyck Brooks, and Albert Jay Nock. COLUMBUS' JOURNAL was published first and was an instantaneous hit. In the complete works of MELVILLE (edited by Weaver) are Israel Potter and Redburn. Moby Dick and Pierre will follow shortly; AMBROSE BIERCE also has two: Can Such Things Be and In the Midst of Life; ARTEMUS WARD, HENRY JAMES, and GEORGE ADE will be represented this Fall. The editors will welcome your suggestions and advice in this project, and we shall be glad to send you a complete catalog on request.

THE WHITE OXEN
by Kenneth Burke

We have never before had the privilege of publishing a first book of which we could say in such confidence, this book marks the entry into the field of American literature of an author of the first rank. ($2.50 net)

ST. ANTHONY AND OTHER STORIES
by Guy De Maupassant
Translated by LAFCADIO HEARN

Lafcadio Hearn's translations of De Maupassant are masterpieces in their own right. They have the quality of great English prose and yet keep the spirit and meaning of the original. The stories translated were selected by Hearn as De Maupassant's most typical. ($2.00 net) jumped his first blind baggage at twelve, with the twin fears of the orphanage and reform school urging his steps. Then for twenty years he was a derelict of the roads. From Calgary to Chihuahua his red head, his quick fists and the song on his lips were known. He tells his true story in

JIM TULLY

BEGGARS OF LIFE

[A Hobo Autobiography]

Tully maintains that the true story of the hobo has never been told. Other tramps, like Jack London, have sentimentalized and some have been simply writers on a holiday. Tully was a professional hobo with the soul of a poet, and he has compounded his book of the bitter fear which every hobo has, not only of hunger and the natural elements, but of organized Society. A stirring book, whose realism is softened only by Tully's humor and whimsicality. ($3.00 net)

YOUNG MISCHIEF AND THE PERFECT PAIR
by Hugh de Selincourt

A new novel by the author of "One Little Boy." ($2.00 net)

ON BOARD THE MORNING STAR
by Pierre Mac Orlan

A pirate story, illustrated by Daragnes. ($2.50 net)

FIVE TALES
by Emilie Verhaeren

Illustrated by Masereel. ($2.50 net)

THE VIZETELLY TRANSLATION OF EMILE ZOLA

Zola, first of the French realists, has been pitifully represented up to now by adequate translations available in America. The Vizetelly edition is recognized as the definitive translation. We take pleasure in announcing its complete publication in twelve volumes. The first two, to be issued early in November, are THE DRAM SHOP (L'Assommoir) and GERMINAL. Price $2.00 net each.

OUR CHANGING MORALITY
by Bertrand Russell, Floyd Dell, Elsie Clews Parsons, etc.

In spite of protest our younger generation continues unheedful of the older maxims of morality. To what end? These and other questions are answered in this symposium which has been appearing in The Nation. ($3.00 net)

WINDOWS FACING WEST
by Virginia MacFadyen

A biography of a beautiful and successful mistress. ($2.00 net)

Publishers of The American Library

39 West 8th Street and other books for Civilized Americans

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1924 No. 3093

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 403
EDITORIALS:
"Ain't Goin' to Study War No More"? 406
Government Ownership to the Fore 407
Catching Up with Shaw 407
"Eats" 408
BE BRISK WITH BABBITT. By Sinclair Lewis 409
THE PRAIRIES CATCHING FIRE. By Oswald Garrison Villard 412
DAWES: FIRST AID TO SWINDLERS. By David E. Lilienthal 414
NICARAGUA PECKING THE SHELL. By William Hard 416
DIRECTIONS FOR BURIAL. By William A. Norris 417
A SCHOOL FOR WORKERS' CHILDREN. By Devere Allen 417
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 418
CORRESPONDENCE 419
BOOKS:
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 420
The Agricultural Crisis. By Rexford Tugwell 420
Goethe Intime. By Kuno Francke 421
Good Reporting. By Robert Emmet MacAlarney 422
By-Products of Espionage. By Harry Hansen 422
Books in Brief 423
DRAMA:
Mimicry and Realism. By Joseph Wood Krutch 423
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
China and Germany Settle Up 426
Divorces and Suicides in Germany 428

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Managing Editor Literary Editor

ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager

Contributing Editors

ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50 and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE STORY OF MR. DAWES and Mr. Lorimer, told elsewhere in this issue, has furnished two fascinating sidelights, one on journalism, one on politics. Donald Richberg exposed the Dawes record in the New Republic for July 9. Somewhat tardily, the Independent of Boston came to Mr. Dawes's assistance. It invited a gentleman whom it described as "John Barton Payne, chairman of the American Red Cross, formerly chairman of the Shipping Board, and later Secretary of the Interior in Mr. Wilson's Cabinet," to reply. It did not mention the fact that Mr. Payne was also the paid attorney for Mr. Dawes and his bank in the litigation over their deal with Lorimer. Mr. Payne, however, in his statement, frankly revealed his relation to the case, although the rest of his article is a hodgepodge of shockingly misleading statements. So much for journalism. As for politics, Mr. Payne, after reading Mr. Richberg's article, wrote to the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, warning him not to make "the mistake of adopting or pressing this matter as a criticism of General Dawes, whose conduct from beginning to end was in the highest sense admirable." And the Democratic Party, from that day to this, has, so far as we have heard, breathed no reflection upon Mr. Dawes's illegal practices as a banker. The solidarity of the two old parties in defense of bankers' interests as opposed to the public interest could hardly be made clearer. The Independent has served the public, if unwittingly, in helping to make it clear.

THE FIRE AND BRIMSTONE vice-presidential candidate of the Republican Party is through. For a few weeks his swagger and braggadocio captivated a certain number, but from now on Mr. Dawes will lose votes for his ticket every day. Indeed, if the Democratic Party were not in a conspiracy of silence to protect Mr. Dawes's reputation, his presence on the Republican ticket might be made the final and convincing argument for its defeat. Certainly if the facts in regard to Mr. Dawes's participation in the Lorimer bank swindle could be got before even 50 per cent of the electorate they ought to swing the election against Coolidge and his braggart partner. Of course Senator Brookhart's demand that Mr. Dawes quit the Republican ticket will not be realized, but it will have a wholesome effect in leading voters to do so. Senator Brookhart says:

> Charles G. Dawes has wrecked the Republican campaign, and especially in the Northwest. . . . His sulphuretted-hydrogen bank record, as established by the Supreme Court of Illinois the day he was nominated, renders him unfit for the public service, and he should be removed as the candidate for his party as Denby and Daugherty were removed from office. . . . The claim that he was ignorant of the import of his act and only regarded it as a friendly favor adds color to the general claim that his own advertised financial ability is only a bluff and that he acts as the agent of international banking powers. The further defense that all bankers are doing the same thing is resented even by the bankers themselves.

THE ONE AMUSING NOTE in this drab story of financial crookedness is Mr. Dawes's defense—or rather his bland refusal to make one. "I will not debate my character with any man," is his answer to this unanswerable episode. We don't blame him—he hasn't a leg to stand on. From his military experience he has evidently absorbed the truth that

> He who fights and runs away
> May live to fight another day.

Besides it has long been the custom for both Republicans and Democrats to dodge all issues of any consequence. Why should Mr. Dawes make an exception to the rule? His moral character—condemned by the highest court in his State—is the one point of supreme interest to the voter. So naturally, running true to old-party form, Mr. Dawes dodges it. Mr. Davis did likewise in regard to the one point of most consequence in his candidacy—his corporation-law practice and its probable effect upon his sympathies and his point of view. He announced magnificently that he would not discuss the subject. And Mr. Coolidge, playing still safer, carefully refrains from expressing himself on almost every question in regard to which the public might possibly be interested.

SECRETARY MELLON too has joined the Nothing-to-say Club. When the New York World and John W. Davis charged that the American Aluminum Company, in which the Mellon family predominate, was a price-fixing monopoly benefiting by exceptional tariff protection, Mr.

Mellon vigorously retorted that "no monopoly in the aluminum trade exists." He cited a variety of figures to show that the tariff had not raised aluminum prices, adding, however, that "If the tariff had not been in effect the 35,000 people in the aluminum industry would be without jobs or they would have to work for lower wages." That was characteristic—to claim, all in one breath, that the tariff had not raised prices, and if it had not the industry would have been ruined. The World shot a few holes in Mr. Mellon's defense at once; within a week the Federal Trade Commission issued a digest of a report on the cost of household utensils prepared in response to a congressional resolution in 1921. This report charges the Mellon aluminum companies with several forms of price discrimination, price-fixing, and "various practices forbidden by a judicial decree under the Sherman Act." "The Aluminum Company of America," the commission stated, "has a practically complete monopoly of the production of aluminum in the United States." That statement was in fact moderate. That Mellon-controlled company produced in 1923 four-fifths of the entire world production of bauxite, the ore from which aluminum is made. Mr. Mellon wilted. The New York Sun, an Administration organ, reported his retreat in these dignified words:

> Secretary Mellon will have no further statement to make at this time. He announced today that he expected a formal answer would be made at the proper time by the aluminum company. Meanwhile he will not engage in controversy.

Naturally not.

WILLIAM HARD is The Nation's Washington correspondent, and The Nation is proud of him. The Nation is glad to print what he says even when it sharply disagrees with him. Last week we printed William Hard's friendly assessment of Theodore Roosevelt, Jr. We think that Hard still labors a bit under the mystic memories of the days when he and little Theodore's father were making the old Metropolitan Magazine memorable. Young Theodore may be as charming as Bill Hard says, and may be able to quote Praed and Father Prout, but he certainly showed no ability to quote anybody intelligently on the conduct of the Navy Department. He approved the leasing of the naval oil reserves, he told the Senate committee, but he did not know Teapot Dome from the Elk Hills Reserve; he "could not recall" what geologists advised the leasing, although he thought he had acted on the advice of geologists; he did not know what oil had been leased or for how long. He had just done what he was told to do. He had never even read the leases which destroyed his father's conservation policy; he was just too stupid or too lazy to find out what was going on. When Albert Fall asked him to, he sent marines to Teapot Dome to drive out the poachers whom Harry Sinclair did not dare drive out—for fear his doubtful leases would come before the courts. Ted, Jr., meant no harm; he did not know what it was all about; he just served as office-boy for wiser politicians. Such a man should be left at home, where he will have plenty of time to be charming.

A LAWYERS' COMMITTEE has been organized in New York City to support the candidacy of John W. Davis. In a circular letter to lawyers it says:

> The problems which confront the country in this particular campaign demand a vote for Mr. Davis. The formidable third-party movement is no accident—with its open attack upon the courts and advocacy of dangerous economic experiments.

Who are these lawyers who regard as dangerous economic experiments the regulation of the oil industry, the telephone and telegraph industry, the money power, and banking imperialism in Central and South America, and the prevention of the use of the courts as strike-breaking agencies? The party politicians and office-holders on the committee, including the head of Tammany Hall, are hardly responsible for such a statement. Nor can it express the view of such a member of the committee as Mr. Samuel Untermyer, who has himself fought for a number of these "dangerous economic experiments." But on this Lawyers' Committee are also men of the same lawyers' stratum as Mr. Davis, serving the same kind of client as did Mr. Davis, sharing with him the princely fees paid by the money monopoly and big business.

CONSIDER THE CLIENTS of the leaders of this candid Lawyers' Committee. Among them are some of our most distinguished banking firms—J. P. Morgan & Company, of course; Blair & Company, and Dillon, Read & Company, at the forefront of the financing in Central and South America and the financing of power and light and traction companies; Goldman, Sachs and Company, Lehman Brothers, and Harris, Forbes and Company. Nor are the biggest banks far to seek—the First National Bank of New York, one of the "Big Four" in Wall Street; the Bankers Trust Company, in which are represented the Morgan and the Rockefeller interests; the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, the participant in financing of imperialism, of railroads, of public utilities, and of industrial trusts; the Central Union Trust Company of New York, one of the active instruments in the operations of powerful financial families and firms in the field of public utilities and railroads; the American Express Company, which is not only in the banking business but controls the great railway express company in the country. The attorneys for the most powerful families of the country, which reach out into every big industrial undertaking, are in the list—for Morgan, Rockefeller, Gould, Brady. But why should the lawyers for these bankers, thus espousing Mr. Davis, give Mr. Davis away?

GANDHI RECENTLY DECLARED that he was being defeated by the Swarajists and by the Mohammedans, because of their political wrangles and religious fighting. "To fight is vanity." Relative to the quarrels in the All-India Congress Committee between the Swarajists and the non-cooperators, Gandhi said recently:

> At present I am interested in three things only—Charka (native spinning), Hindu-Moslem unity, and removal of untouchability. Unless these three things are accomplished consistently with unity I shall consider that there is no place for me in the political life of the country. If these conditions are fulfilled and if No-Changers and Pro-changers, Moderates, Conventionists and all other parties unite, then only can I remain in political life; otherwise I shall retire and spin and meditate.

After the continued religious rioting at Delhi, Gandhi entered upon a twenty-one-days' fast as penance. America might not respond if Mr. Coolidge or even "Al" Smith started to fast as penance for a Ku Klux Klan riot. India, however, was moved by Gandhi's act. A religious-unity conference was called. Both Moslems and Hindus pledged themselves to toleration on the vexed questions of cow slaughter and the right to play music near mosques. The conference established a Central Arbitration Board of fifteen members with Gandhi as chairman to settle similar disputes in the future. The Hindu Feast of Sacrifice which ended in bloodshed may yet mark a step toward that unity for which Gandhi is working so desperately.

IBN SAUD, CHIEF OF THE WAHABIS of Central Arabia, has forced Hussein, king of the Hejaz and commander of the Moslem holy places, to abdicate. But British imperial policy is sufficiently supple to meet such a blow at its prestige as the defeat of one king equipped and financed with British gold. Winston Churchill let the cat out of the bag when explaining the Arabian situation to the House of Commons in 1921. Ibn Saud, he said, had been in "a state of warfare, raid, and reprisal with King Hussein and with his neighbors generally"; nevertheless, Churchill had arranged for peace. The British Government would continue the subsidy of £60,000 a year which Ibn Saud had been receiving, and would in addition make him a lump-sum grant of £20,000! The ways of diplomacy are devious. When the Nationalist Turks drove the caliph out of Constantinople the British gave support to Hussein's claim upon the title of head of the Moslem world. And if Ibn Saud drives Hussein, the British puppet, out of Mecca, Mecca will still be ruled by a man heavily in Britain's debt.

RAMSAY MACDONALD'S GOVERNMENT seems, as we go to press, about to lose the last of its nine lives. It has trembled on the brink of destruction many times since, nine months ago, it began a precarious career. For Ramsay MacDonald has never had a majority behind him; Labor has not even been the largest party in Parliament, and the existence of the Labor Government has depended upon the lukewarm support of members of the other parties. In nine months MacDonald has done much for Europe, but the radicals within his own party have been disturbed by his absorption in Continental politics. The incident of the biscuit manufacturer and the motor car undoubtedly hurt him. Lloyd George has seized upon the incomplete Russian treaty as a useful electoral bogy, and the Tories are aroused because the Government dropped the case against a Communist arrested for inciting to mutiny. None of these, of course, is ground enough to explain the fall of a ministry. Ramsay MacDonald has achieved that pacification of Europe which the Tory and Liberal governments were unable to accomplish; France is ready to welcome Germany into the League; the tension of a year ago is relaxed. So the dogs of domestic politics are free to bark again.

EDWARD A. FILENE of Boston liked Mr. Bok's peace plan so well that he offered similar prizes in France, Great Britain, Germany, and Italy for the best answers to the question, "How can security and prosperity be restored in France, Germany, etc., and in Europe through international cooperation?" More than 15,000 plans were submitted. A comparison of the German and French winning plans shows many points of similarity—acceptance of the Dawes scheme, utilization of the League of Nations and an extension of its responsibility, recognition of the economic unity of Europe, and the necessity for control of raw materials. The French plan urges the formation of a League of European States in addition to the League of Nations; while the author of the German plan urges greater use of the Interparliamentary Union, an association of active or ex-members of national parliaments, in order to further the cause of international arbitration. The German plan damns the Treaty of Versailles as the root of all evil and then proceeds to quote from it some excellent suggestions which the Allies have ignored. One of the German prize-winners suggests that > the other Powers do their part in opening their archives and thus provide a basis for an impartial discussion of the guilt question—a discussion whose outcome would have the very greatest importance in the moral evaluation of Germany among the nations."

THE DENIAL OF A NEW TRIAL to Sacco and Vanzetti by Judge Thayer was not unexpected and should not be too much of a disappointment to the believers in justice who patiently and devotedly have struggled for more than four years to save two probably innocent Italians from death. It was before Judge Thayer that the trial was held, and not a few of those present felt that the court showed a bias against the defendants which was at least partly responsible for the verdict of guilty. The probability of bias on Judge Thayer's part at the trial has been greatly strengthened by his refusal to reopen the case, for it seems impossible that any unprejudiced mind could calmly review the seance of hysteria and hate that was unfolded in his court in 1921 without feeling that it must have eventuated in a gross miscarriage of justice. Fortunately the fight is not lost. A demand for a new trial can and must be made to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. All honor is due to the little group that has so long stuck by these moneyless prisoners. The effort deserves all the moral and financial assistance which readers of The Nation can give.

WHENEVER THE PUBLIC hears of an expedition to recover treasure from the sea it pictures a vague and romantic—and probably unsuccessful—quest after the hidden wealth of Captain Kidd, or something equally fantastic. Few persons realize that most such expeditions are eminently practical; that raising sunken treasure from the deep is an established business with a technique as well developed as that applied to erecting a skyscraper or boring a tunnel. Thus the divers who have gone to the Virginia capes to salvage the gold from the Ward liner Merida—sunk in collision in 1911—are on no wild-goose chase; theirs is a business venture, although more speculative than most salvage operations because of the probable difficulty of finding the vessel. The World War brought a great revival in salvage, owing to the large number of vessels sunk by submarines or otherwise. The British Admiralty quietly salvaged nearly 500 ships, valued with their cargoes at £50,000,000, during the conflict. After the armistice it raised the Vindictive, which had been filled with cement and sunk in Ostend harbor to spoil it as a submarine base. But the Admiralty's greatest feat was the recovery of the treasure of the Laurentic, sunk by a submarine off the north coast of Ireland in 1917 in 120 feet of storm-tossed water. Work was interrupted again and again by rough weather, but after seven years £4,750,000 out of a total of £5,000,000 had been recovered.

"Ain't Goin' to Study War No More"?

THE League of Nations has at last buckled down seriously to its primary task. The Assembly of the League, in which the little nations as well as the great take part, has done what the Council, dominated by the Great Powers of the war-time Entente, had failed to do: It has forced a world move toward disarmament. It has taken action worthy of that oft-forgotten preamble to the League Covenant: "The High Contracting Parties, in order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war . . . agree to this Covenant of the League of Nations."

Representatives of forty-seven nations submitted the protocol elaborated in the commissions of the League. Aristide Briand, six times premier of France, pledged the ratification of France, declaring that:

> The protocol framed by the League of Nations constitutes the most formidable obstacle to war ever devised by the human mind. If it is voted you, its framers and sponsors, will have the right to say you have installed peace in the world.

Since the Hague conferences no such serious effort toward peace has been made by the nations of the world, and the Geneva protocol is a glorious advance over the Hague conventions. It ought to be, with the World War intervening. And yet, with the fresh memory of that "war to end war" and of the peace that came so near to ending peace, the world must push beyond oratorical enthusism and analyze every fervent hope. It will not do to break the heart of the world again.

What is this "most formidable obstacle to war ever framed"? It is, first of all, not a treaty for disarmament; that is left to a conference to be called next June, if meanwhile three of the four Great Powers (Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan) permanently represented on the League Council and at least ten other Powers ratify the protocol. It is intended to be a treaty of security, making disarmament possible. The method of attaining that security is a compromise between the point of view represented at Geneva by Ramsay MacDonald and that represented by the French spokesmen. The Geneva protocol, while it begins with an agreement for compulsory arbitration, ends with a series of sanctions to be applied against a state which breaks the agreement. There lies the danger. The protocol is not merely a covenant to outlaw war; it is a covenant to outlaw any nation that resorts to war, and even, perhaps, an agreement to make war jointly against any such nation.

Agreement upon compulsory arbitration is a giant step forward along the path to world peace. It is a development of an historic policy of the Government of the United States. We accepted arbitration in days when the idea of international arbitration was young; we led in the struggle to establish effective international courts at the two Hague conferences; Elihu Root was chairman of the commission which drew up the first draft of the present World Court, providing for universal jurisdiction, for arbitration of all international disputes. That provision was rejected by the Council of the League, although it is the very cornerstone of any possible peace. That the League has now returned to it proves that even among diplomats progress is possible.

But this agreement among the members of the League not to have recourse to war against each other (except in case of resistance to immediate acts of aggression) must be studied with its context. It suffers, first of all, from the fundamental defect of the League—its own exclusions. Provision can be made for inclusion of Powers which, like the United States, remain outside of the League of their own free will; but what of Powers, like Germany and Soviet Russia, which have been deliberately excluded? The protocol provides an opportunity for them to sign, but "on the dotted line." No peace-pact can appeal to them unless they have a share in framing it.

A second difficulty has been over-advertised on its less important side. The Japanese delegation demanded that the protocol include some provision for discussion of disputes which the World Court might declare to be matters of purely domestic concern; and the final draft includes a provision permitting discussion of such questions before the Council of the League. The Japanese presumably had in mind the possibility of raising the question of immigration before an international forum, and that, in the present state of American opinion, would not be tolerated. The suggestion of such a possibility in connection with the League can only prejudice American opinion against the whole program—even against any arbitration agreement. Yet sooner or later American opinion will have to awaken from its provincialism. The world is not a series of hermetically sealed chambers. If Brazil, in a captious mood, were to refuse to send us coffee or rubber; or if European countries should dare make laws restricting the privileges of American business men, we should cease talking of "purely domestic affairs." Indeed, Mr. Hughes has shouted from the housetops his conviction that Mexican and Russian laws are as much his business and Mr. Doheny's as they are Trotzky's or Calles's.

To experienced European minds, indeed, the loophole allowed must seem, if anything, too small. The Italians would like to discuss the question of international allocation of raw materials. Even more pressing is the question of European boundaries. The protocol would seem to rivet upon Europe the chains cast in 1919. French statesmen are already glowingly proclaiming that it eternalizes the boundaries fixed by the treaties. Those boundaries may be an improvement upon the prewar frontiers; but some among them cannot be maintained forever. Jugoslavia holds a section of Macedonia which is predominantly Bulgarian in population; Italy holds the purely German South Tyrol; and Poland has an extended eastern frontier which even Polish statesmen admit in private must be revised. How shall opportunity be provided to correct those unrighteous frontiers?

If a Power refuses arbitration, or refuses to accept the decision, and makes war, it is defined as the aggressor and in that case a whole series of sanctions are set on foot against it. What these are the cabled summaries do not make clear. Even the New York Times, usually so invaluable for its complete texts of important documents, printed only a muddled summary of the protocol. Yet the question of these sanctions, demanded by the French, is all-important. If, as some dispatches hint, they militarize the heart of the peace pact, another great hope will go a-glimmering.

Some of us hoped that the United States would take the lead in another great disarmament conference. Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Hughes, afraid of the political consequences, hesitated; and Geneva took the lead. The product of its effort is a compromise; it may include provisions impossible for the United States to accept. Yet if the text of this League protocol gives any serious hope of world peace the United States must agree to participate in the world disarmament conference, by whomever it may be called.

Government Ownership to the Fore

WHAT would the Republicans and Democrats do if they did not have the La Follette platform to berate? There is General Dawes, for instance. His speeches are devoted almost entirely to showing that the Progressive Supreme-Court and railroad planks stamp Senator La Follette as a Red of the deepest dye. Now Secretary Hoover has taken a hand and, ever a defender of the existing order, has come to the rescue of private ownership of railroads in a speech which must have cost the Republican campaign committee at least $30,000, since it was broadcast to the public from fourteen radio stations. There is no denying that he put his case as ably as we have seen it presented. At least it was one of the few really reasoned arguments which have come from the Republican camp since, early in this campaign, they suddenly found that Mr. La Follette had given them something else to do besides merely declaring that all is well in the world.

We are glad that Mr. Hoover was as effective as he was, because we welcome the pushing of this railroad issue to the front. We do not believe that it will hurt the La Follette cause in the long run, for where it will repel timid souls in the East who really believe, in their innocence, that if elected Robert La Follette would bring about government ownership on March 5, 1925, it will win votes in the West. More than that, this issue has come into our politics to stay; hence we rejoice that a serious discussion of it is under way. It is one of the fundamental proposals of the La Follette platform. Like The Nation, Senator La Follette has been slow to come to government ownership and has apparently done so only because of the conscientious belief that unless we take this bulwark of privilege complete victory will not be possible. In this connection we hear from reliable sources that shortly before his death Woodrow Wilson had become converted on this issue and that government ownership was to have been one of the planks in the platform he was drafting for presentation at the last Democratic convention.

We do not know, of course, precisely what won over Mr. Wilson, it may be the fact that Canada now owns more than 60 per cent of her railroads and will, if students of Canadian affairs are correct, own the rest of them within five years. Canada's experience ought certainly to convince the American public that our republic will not collapse over night should we decide to take over the railroads. The losses reported on the government railroads in Canada have been due primarily to overcapitalization and to other causes which are removable. There is already a marked improvement in the situation; and no effort is being made to turn the roads back to private ownership. In England, too, the drift is noticeably toward a more serious consideration of the government's relationship to transportation lines. If it be pointed out that England is a much smaller country than ours and that the railroad problem there is somewhat different, we are still of the opinion that our railroads can be taken over without the republic going to pieces through that inefficiency, that stilling of private energy and enterprise, and the creation of a railroad bureaucracy exerting undue influence upon our political life which Mr. Hoover so dreads.

Government ownership would bring grave problems with it—evils if one pleases; but we have come to our position after a deliberate weighing of those evils against the worse evils of the present system. We have a railroad bureaucracy now, influencing our public life—and we have no adequate check upon it. The "invisible empire" which Woodrow Wilson declared in 1912 was ruling us for the benefit of special interests has never been destroyed. It is more powerful than ever, and the cries of anger and alarm which are now going up are proof of the value which that empire places upon this fortification. Take the railroads out of Wall Street and a deadly blow will have been struck at that corporate control of our political life—that corporate control which can conceive of nothing better for American citizens than a continuance of the rule of Calvin Coolidge and of the Cabinet in which "only three out of ten" have so far been proved incompetent or corrupt. Certainly no one can deny that those vested interests which are based upon special railroad privileges continue to grow. Mr. Hoover to the contrary notwithstanding, government regulation has utterly failed to end discrimination and special favor; and there is no reason to suppose that can be done short of elimination of private ownership and Wall Street control.

Finally, our readers must not forget that government ownership is not the same as government operation, and that before the latter need come to pass some plan of joint democratic operation by a board representing the railroad workers, the public, and the government may be tried. The outstanding fact remains that the beef trust, the coal trust, the steel trust, and the oil trust are still fortified and intrenched by their alliance with the railroads—an alliance which the people must and shall destroy.

Catching Up with Shaw

FOR the controversalist who wishes to achieve a really lasting fame it is probably better to be wrong than right. The last leader of a lost cause can have no successor, and his niche in history is secure; but he who fights on the winning side is destined to see his pet idea become a commonplace and his most daring epigram reduced to a platitude. The wrong-headed toryism of Dr. Johnson makes him, even today, a picturesque and interesting figure, whereas his liberal opponents have sunk into insignificance. They have been left too far behind to be greatly admired, and while he seems to deal in brilliant and perverse paradoxes they parrot tepid commonplaces which, however true, have long ceased to be interesting.

Even Bernard Shaw must pay the penalty of being a logical and constructive thinker who imposes his truths on his own generation and thus encourages a new generation to go on beyond him. For prefaces historical, critical, and historio-sociological or for sermons absolute he is still the best in the world; but it is doubtful if any ordinary reader of the new preface to "Saint Joan" would think of applying to it any of those adjectives like "acrobatic" and "paradoxical" which were formerly ejaculated as a matter of course by even his most ardent defenders at the appearance of each new work. Rather would the ideas there expressed seem to such a reader merely common sense, brilliantly phrased perhaps, but by no means fantastic or paradoxical. Even the once famous insolence seems no longer particularly insolent. That Shakespeare's historical plays are not, in the modern sense, historical at all and that when Schiller made his tragedy of Joan turn upon a wholly fictitious yielding to romantic love he robbed the story of its significance for a generation which is no longer interested in the idea of frigidity as a magic charm—these things are scarcely less than obvious. "Better than Shakespeare?" and "Better than Schiller?" have become, even with the question mark (once passionately urged in their defense) omitted, quite reasonable phrases.

Thus far, even within his own lifetime, has extended that process by which the most brilliant thought becomes, as a penalty for its truth, commonplace. Already the world is beginning to catch up with Shaw. Doubtless neither we nor our grandchildren shall live long enough to see him completely outmoded. But Shaw himself has set his scenes in times lying ahead "as far as thought can reach." Thus it is not unfitting to wonder what will be his fate milleniums hence. Fortunately for his fame he has what most pamphleteers lack—wit enough to keep him long sweet, and doubtless even in that distant age when youths are born full grown from eggs and all men are Shavians there will still be delight in the skill of his trusts for those with sufficient imagination to recreate the past. But many a schoolmaster, expounding Shaw's works in connection with the other ancient classics of the twentieth century, will be compelled to counter the objections of striplings who find his work platitudinous. Laboriously explaining, as many a schoolmaster of today has explained in connection with worthies of our own past, the teacher will say: "But we must remember, children, that after all he does have a certain historical interest. He was the first to give currency to many ideas which are familiar to us but which were, in those days of ignorance and superstition, almost unheard of. Indeed, there is some evidence for the belief that many of his more slow-thinking contemporaries regarded him as little better than a juggler of fantastic paradoxes."

"Eats"

WHEN the editors of this journal get tired of uplifting humanity, and settle down to making money instead, they are going to start a magazine about food. It will bear the succinct and succulent title Eats. It will contain such appetizing recipes and such exalted discussions on food as to make the mouth of the public water just to see it on the newsstands. The success of Eats is foreordained by past experience. Whenever we write an article urging men to be better, truer, and more beautiful, nobody reads it except the printer, but as often as we discuss the divine art of cooking and the poetry of the palate, the post office has to put on an extra carrier to deliver the letters from our loving friends.

Recently, for instance, we said a word about clam chowder, laying down the proposition that the dish was unknown to New York City; it was only in New England, we said, that people knew how to make it—that is, with milk. At once we began to receive letters telling us places in New York City where "real clam chowder" was to be had. Of course, we did not try any of these places because we might have liked the chowder and that would prove our editorial wrong. And if there is one thing that spoils our day it is for somebody to write in—as they're always doing—to prove an editorial wrong.

But there were also letters sustaining our position. New England rallied magnificently and unanimously behind our contention that New England was the only home of true clam chowder. The Gorton-Pew Fisheries Company of Gloucester wrote a professional confirmation of our stand, while Perry Walton of Boston sent assurance that the only Simon-pure clam chowder is made at Chatham, Cape Cod. He said:

> I have a man of all work who fits the term better than any one I ever knew. In the first place, he bears a name that goes back to the founders of the town. He has been before the mast in every kind of a ship in every port of the seven seas. What he doesn't know about gardening, fishing, navigating, carpentering, painting, and even machinery is useless to know. He had been talking all summer about his clam chowders, so I said to him: "Alfred, we'll go out on Monomoy and dig a few quahogs." We got a half bucket of clams.

We interrupt our correspondent's yarn only long enough to observe that at least he starts right. He begins with half a bucket of clams, in distinction from most of our restaurauteur friends, who begin with a whole bucket of water. But let him go on with the description of how his man of all work proceeded:

> This is the way he made his chowder. He took about five slices of pork cut a quarter of an inch thick and minced them into little cubes of the same dimension. These he put in a boiler on a hot fire to fry out the fat. After the fat was fried out, he carefully lifted every bit of pork but the grease which was left. In the meanwhile he ran the clams through a meat chopper. Then taking three onions, carefully paring them, he ran them through the same chopper into the receptacle containing the clams. Allowing the clam juice to settle, he poured off what remained into the bowl containing the clams and the onions, which he then put on the stove to boil for twenty minutes, having first added the pork grease and about two tablespoonsful of flour carefully dissolved in water and free from lumps, in lieu of the cornstarch which he said was preferable. After the whole had been boiled for twenty minutes, he set it aside and allowed it to cool, so that he could pour in a quart of milk without curdling it. While cooking, he added pepper and salt to season it, remarking as he did so: "I al'ays b'lieve in seasonin' while I'm cookin'."
>
> There were six of us who sat down to lunch with that clam chowder as the pièce de résistance, and there wasn't one who had not two helpings. We felt that Alfred knew more about cooking than a chef of a modern hotel in addition to his other accomplishments, and also learned that potatoes are a bête noire to a real chowder. "They take all the flavor out of the clams," was Alfred's explanation.

When we start that magazine Eats, we shall have the editorial offices on Cape Cod so as to lunch with Alfred and his clam chowder.

Be Brisk With Babbitt

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

I. A Booster for Coolidge

THOUGH I had been sent to Zenith to interview Mr. George F. Babbitt in the matter of the presidential campaign, I did not see him for two days after my arrival. I felt that as a background to the story I ought to consider the city, study its changes in the three years since I had viewed it.

I was not altogether ingenuous in my purpose. The fact is that a Tory in New York had accused me of encountering in various American cities only the highbrows, and, after denying it with the indignation which the truth of the statement naturally aroused, I privately repented and vowed that I would go into the plain, simple, normal, wholesome, and otherwise painful aspects of some Hundred Per Cent American Community.

So for two days of six hundred hours each I trudged the unending streets of Zenith. I saw that there were numbers of delicatessens, laundries, trolley cars, radio supply shops, billboards, people, and new fall felt hats, but otherwise I have no revolutionary discoveries to report.

Now, among the more select and intellectual circles of Zenith I am somewhat known because of three lectures on the "The Influence of the Atharva Veda and Duns Scotus on the Manner of Edith Wharton," which I delivered at Symphony Hall in 1920. Or it may have been my impersonation of a clergyman at the Press Club Get-together Dinner. Anyway, I know most of the newspapermen, and toward evening of my second lonely day I came into the Hotel Thornleigh to find Eddie Morrissey of the Advocate-Times waiting for me.

"Hello, why didncha let me know you were in town say is this the right dope Ernest Boyd pulled about Scott Moncrieff's translation of Proust what you in town for say the city editor says I gotta interview you got any preferences or shall I just write it how about a little poker this evening say do you think I could get a job in New York or London there'll be just five or six of us playing," observed Eddie.

During the evening I admitted to him, with secrecy, that I contemplated interviewing Mr. Babbitt.

Next morning, at eight, a peculiarly gloomy portion of the dawn, I was aroused by the telephone.

"This is George Babbitt speaking. Heard you wanted to see me. Just drop in at the office at any time," said a brisk but manly voice.

"Well——"

"I hate being interviewed. What I feel is that if a man can't conduct his business without a lot of this personal publicity and social items, he'd better quit. But it's always a pleasure to meet you boys from out of town, and if there's anything I can tell——"

"I think I'd better come in this afternoon."

"All right. Any time. Whenever it's convenient."

I seemed safe till noon. But at nineteen minutes past nine there was a knock, a lot of knocks, and sulkily I opened the door on a beaming, ruddy, well-padded, round-faced gentleman with large rimless spectacles—Mr. George F. Babbitt.

"Well, well, well, well," said Mr. Babbitt. "Going by the hotel and thought I'd save you the trouble of looking me up. Now, look here, I don't want you to get the idea I like being interviewed, or that I think my political ideas are of significance——"

"Come in. Mind sitting— Oh, just throw that shirt and stuff on the floor."

"——or, to be perfectly frank, even of interest to the body politic as a whole. In fact, I feel that as a plain business man who has no share in politics except to build up his party and play the role of good citizen so far as it may be in his power I have no right to even try to influence others. But— Eddie Morrissey 'phoned me that you'd like to know my opinion on Cal and La Follette and Davis, so I said if I can help him out in any way——

"Now, here's how I figure it out. Trying to put aside all prejudices, I've finally decided that any vote except one cast for Coolidge is a vote thrown away. You see, all things considered, it's like this: I feel there's been a lot of misjudgment of Cal. I know he isn't as showy as Harding and Bill Bryan and Dawes and a lot of obviously brainy men like that, but my feeling is that he's a fellow who takes his time to make up his mind and to weigh all sides of the question. He's not a fellow that goes off half-cocked, or that yields to every passing wave of the ill-balanced popular winds of fashion. And then another thing:

"I've had an opportunity of getting a viewpoint on America and its relations to the world such as mighty few folks are lucky enough to have. Fact, I've been to Europe!"

"Really?"

"Yump. Seen the whole thing from Puncture to Blow-out, as the fellow says. Do you remember Paul Riesling—great friend of mine—skinny fellow with black hair? (Lord, you'd love Paul! Honestly, he's the real goods, and you ought to hear him fiddle—I've been told, on good authority, that if he took it up professionally instead of sticking to the roofing business, he'd put Kreisler and all these birds right out of the running. One of these dreamers, but right on the job just the same.)

"Well. Paul 'd had a lot of trouble, one kind and another, and he was sort of going to pieces. I had a hunch —the poor kid has always wanted to go to Europe—I says to him, 'If the wife will give me the time off, I'm going to lug you over to Gay Paree and get your mind off your worries.' Well, sir, you certainly got to hand it to Myra. All she said was: 'Go the limit as long as you don't bring home one of these Paris cuties with you!' and so off we went.

"Well, sir, of course I'd always known that Europe wasn't efficient like the U. S., but I'd never appreciated what that meant. The very first thing we hit on the steamer was an Englishman, and I said to him: 'Well, what's your impression of the States?'

" 'Magnificent country,' he says.

" 'Glad you liked it,' I says.

" 'Splendid machinery,' he says.

" 'Well,' I says, 'I'm glad you liked it.'

" 'There's only one thing,' he says. 'There isn't any hospitality.'

"Well, of course that knocked me for a row of radio sets, because anybody that knows anything about the U. S. knows that while we may have our faults, we're the most hospitable people on earth. Look at the good time we gave the Prince of Wales, polo and everything—prob'ly you noticed how grateful he was in this letter he gave out when he was leaving. So I thought probably this English fellow was trying to jolly me, and I says, 'Yes, it's a shame. We don't hardly ever give our guests anything more than the madame's pearl necklace and the baby's bottle.'

"You know how these blinkin' Britishers look at you sometimes—as if they thought it was somebody else they'd been talking to and suddenly discovered it was only you? Well, that's how he looked, and then he says:

" 'No, seriously. I'd bloomin' well heard——'

"I can't do the English accent the way he did it. You know how funny they talk—the way they keep dragging in Fancy and Quite and all those trick words. But I mean: He said:

" 'I'd always blinkin' well heard—and not just from you bloomin' Americans alone—that you're so all-fired hospitable. What I found was that in America my host didn't hesitate one jolly bit to lug me out to a gathering where we weren't even expected, and I'd be taken in as one of the family. A bunch of birds would slap me on me back and call me by me jolly old first name, don'cha know, and I'd feel awfully welcome and all that sort of thing.' (You know how they talk, but I can't exactly get it, even though I was in England, and one of my best friends is Sir Gerald Doak, this famous steel man, regular bang-up member of the aristocracy, they say he knows Lord Leverhulme intimately. But I'll just give you an idea of the way he put it.)

" 'But, then,' he says, 'after I'd met all these folks so darn' chummy-like,' he says, 'I never would come to know them one jolly bit better, and if I ever handed them out any ideas or opinions or anything that was different from their own, they'd throw me out.

" 'Now, in England,' he says, 'you don't slap a fellow on the back—if you ever do that sort of thing—till you're gol-blimey well sure you know him, and after that he's one of your own folks. In America you have railroad-station hospitality—everybody welcome to come in and then invited to keep right on moving, but in Great Britain we have fireside hospitality, the kind that lasts.'

"I'm telling you all this because it's such a good sample of the way Europeans don't get America. Talking about it on the steamer coming home, a lot of folks were wondering why it was, but I explained it—you see a fellow gets onto a lot of human slants and psychology in the real estate business. I explained to 'em that the reason Europeans don't understand us is because they're all jealous of us, and so they simply won't let themselves be adaptable and consider new viewpoints and take the trouble to get a real genuine insight into other nations, the way Americans do.

"Well. We had a pretty good time, at that. O course London is awful' slow, after New York and Chicago—hardly a skyscraper in the whole burg, and no cabarets or elevateds or anything—people so darn' conservative and old-fashioned that they can't see the need of getting down to business and hustling if they're going to take their part in modern competition. But I had a fine time with Sir Gerald Doak. Unfortunately Lady Doak was away, so he couldn't invite us to Nottingham, but he took us to lunch at his club, and he slipped us a lot of real inside information—how this Ramsay MacDonald was in the pay of the Soviets.

"And we found one awfully nice place—the Cheshire Cheese—that's where this Dr. Johnson, you know, the famous author that wrote a lot of books, where he used to hang out, and say, they've got a dandy book there that all the visitors write in—some of the cutest things you ever saw, poetry and sketches and everything, and almost all of 'em by Americans—I was mighty proud of my country after I saw that book. I remember there was one piece written by a gentleman from Omaha that ran something like this:

> Here's to the good old Cheshire Cheese,
> That tries hard every Yank to please;
> And when I drink old ale in prime condition,
> I don't know as I think so much of prohibition.

"Well, I saw the whole works—Westminster Abbey and Buckingham Palace and the Tower and everything, and made a study of business conditions—looked over several department stores and so on—not one-two-three beside the American stores.

"I could see Paul was still feeling touchy, and I let him go off by himself. At the Chesshire Cheese I ran into a dandy couple—Mr. and Mrs. Smith of San Francisco, I wonder if you ever met him, he's in the insurance business—and we three chased around together, and evenings we'd look for some regular American movie and kind of take it easy and get back at ourselves for working so hard at sight-seeing all day.

"And we did the English country, too. Paul had some crazy idea about wanting to moon around some out-of-town cathedral all day (some big Episcopalian cathedral, I think it was), so I let him beat it off by himself, and I and the Smiths and another dandy couple, Mr. and Mrs. Apstein of Milwaukee, he's in the machinery business, and their three kids, we all hired an automobile, and say, we made two hundred and thirty-seven miles in one day, including a stop for lunch.

"Then we went over to Paris, and Paul, he wanted to see some museums, I guess it was, so I hooked up with a peach of a fellow from Rochester, N. Y., that I met at the New York Bar—Evans, his name was—and him and Mrs. Evans and I, we certainly did that old town up brown—the Moulin Rouge and the Rat Mort and Zelli's (that's that dancing place—fellow runs it is an American, even if he has got a Dago name, and they have a swell American orchestra).

"And then on to Rome—met Dr. and Mrs. Simmons of Fargo on the train going down there, and we three bummed around together—not much to see there, if you want to know the truth—and then Florence (wasn't it?)—that's where I ran onto Reverend and Mrs. Jackson—no, in Madrid it was I met the Jacksons and—Oh, a slew of other places. Amsterdam and Switzerland and all over.

"Well, as you can see, I got a pretty thorough notion of Europe. And now here's where I come to the point.

"Europe is picturesque and quaint and historical and all that, but it's a gone goose; it hasn't got any pep. Why,

I've seen streets right in Rome, which the guide book calls the Eternal City, that they wouldn't stand for in Punkin Center—dirty, narrow, stinking alleys worse 'n any runway behind a garage!

"Now, of course a lot of fellows will tell you and talk about there not being any bathtubs in Europe. That shows they aren't observant. Makes me tired to hear a fellow just quoting conventional opinions and not using his eyes and being original. Paul and I didn't have a bit of trouble getting rooms with baths, at the Cecil in London or the Continental in Paris or anywhere. But——

"People over there don't know how to be friendly. When we landed in London, the bell-boy that took our grips up to the room was a bright-looking little tad, so I gave him a quarter—a shilling they call it—and I says to him, 'Say, buddy, are they pulling off any good movies in town this evening?' Well, sir, I bet I had to repeat it half a dozen times before I could make him understand.

"You see over there in England, they don't have regular public schools like ours, way I understand it, and there's a lot of hick dialects back in what they call the counties, so a lot of the common people don't hardly understand the Queen's English at all. And even when this boy did understand, and I kidded him a little about being so slow on the come-back, he didn't kid me back like a nice bright American bell-hop would. No democracy and friendliness. Same with the cops, when you'd try to stop and pass the time of day with 'em—looked at you like you were a Heathen Chinee.

"Now, another thing. They can talk about London being the big noise, but do you realize that the price per front foot of some of the best business properties in London is actually less than it is for corresponding locations right here in Zenith? That's a thing that ain't generally understood, and somebody ought to write it up and bring it to the attention of the general public more strongly.

"Then the taxicabs. Why, say, some of those old taxis in London couldn't make a two per cent grade on second! And the cocktails in London—why, right in the Cecil itself, which as you know is the bon-ton classy hotel of the whole country, where all the dukes and everybody stays, the clerk himself told me so—they didn't mix as good a cocktail as I can.

"And you hear so much about the food, but you couldn't get as good coffee at the Cecil as we have right at home, and when I asked How's chances on their digging up some corn on cob, the head waiter simply passed out.

"I'm glad to see this Scott Fitzgerald shows up French cooking, too, here in a recent Saturday Evening Post. He shows where all the wise birds in France duck these fancy sauces and everything and stick to American crackers and American cheese. Glad he explained that to people.

"And say, darned if every dining car in France didn't have toothpicks right on the table. Why, you take the greenest American boob you could find, and if you caught him swinging a toothpick publicly, he'd just about die of shame. And this is the country that thinks it has so much more class than the U. S. A.!

"So there you are. We've got it all over Europe. They simply want to make all they can out of us. And so—a thing that so many Americans can't understand, without they've had the privilege of studying Europe first-hand—our game is to keep clear of Europe, and it's my firm conviction, first, last, and all the time, that the man who can best keep us clear of European entanglements is that most American and even Yankee of all our greater statesmen—Calvin Coolidge!

"Now, of course there are those that insist La Follette is basically and fundamentally American. I heard a man in this town—Seneca Doane his name is, crank lawyer, I used to like him, fact he was a classmate of mine, and I agree with him that labor has its rights just as much as capital, providing it doesn't get funny and pull a lot of obstructive strikes and otherwise interfere with the conduct of necessary and constructive business—but I mean, I heard this Doane give a smart-aleck talk about how in Wisconsin La Follette duplicated the simplicity and democracy of the old days, and Doane said he was agin the Supreme Court because the Supreme Court itself was agin the Constitution, and how he was the One Hundred Per Cent American and not Daugherty. All that junk.

"Now, what are the facts? La Follette is a man that's always talking about public ownership, and from that to communism and chaos there's only one step. And a boy from here that was in Washington representing the Advocate for several months tells me that he was on the inside and got all the dope, and seems La Follette has entertained Germans and Russians right in his own home. He lets on to be opposed to the League of Nations and foreign entanglements, but didn't he deliberately go over to Moscow and get right in with that murderous Soviet crowd, here not long ago?

"In other words, he's the sort of fellow that if he once got to be President and was given a free rein, he'd be negotiating with Germany and Russia and France and God knows what all nations, and getting us mixed up with that bunch of has-beens and hoboes and highfalutin' four-flushers over there instead of sticking to business and growing corn and selling real estate.

"Maybe Davis ain't as bad. The papers all say he's a Southern Gentleman, and of course the Southerners are great folks for the home virtues, but still, he's been ambassador to England, and when you think of the way the papers say the Prince of Wales was staying up till all hours dancing every night when he was here, you can readily see that isn't the kind of training you want for a man that's going to keep us free of foreign entanglements, and enable business to have that feeling of security and progress which will enable it to make such extensions as are necessary if we are ever to fulfill our manifest destiny of controlling the industrial affairs of the world and you can't shake a hoof all night and be down at the office at nine. And without that, how is business going to have sufficiently rapid turnovers to assure to every working man that high standard of comfort——

"There was a cartoon in the Saturday Evening Post that showed where, unlike Europe, every American laborer owns a nice automobile and a dandy little detached cottage, and you don't find that in Europe, do you!

"So that's why I'm going to vote for Coolidge, and I hope I've made my line of reasoning clear to you.

"You see, I've done pretty well in the real-estate game, all things considered. And I want to be permitted to go right on doing well, you can bet your life on that! And if La Follette thinks I'm going to hand my business over to a lot of European paupers or to the Government—well, he guessed wrong, that's all!"

(To be continued next week)

The Prairies Catching Fire

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Minneapolis, Minnesota, October 4

A MORE baffling political campaign this country has never seen—as to that observers are agreed. From State after State comes the same report—from Nebraska, Iowa, Ohio, Illinois—and it reads: "Everything confused here." Even in Minnesota the evidence is extraordinarily conflicting, so that he who would prophesy must take serious chances with his reputation. Men of absolute reliability come to you and tell you of conditions in their section of the State and five minutes later their statements are flatly contradicted by the next man you meet. In Urbana, Illinois, some people told me that the nearby farmers were either for Coolidge or apathetic; others declared that the German-American farmers in the vicinity were unanimously for La Follette and that there was a good deal of stirring and unrest among the others. A traveling man testified that the tide had been setting to La Follette, but that it had turned and was now favoring Coolidge. Meanwhile the La Follette workers assure me that their candidate gets stronger every day! What should one believe?

Now, as a result of all these contradictions and cross currents I am prepared to prophesy that La Follette will either carry three States or a dozen between Ohio and California; and I venture that with no little trembling, so much depends upon the work done by all the parties between now and election day. Can the farmers in Illinois and Ohio be reached by the Progressives? Can the Republican vote be got out in Minnesota? Will there be money enough for the La Follette campaign, time to get a large band of speakers under way, and to send out a lot of printed matter? How far will the skyrocketing prices of rye and wheat affect the farmer vote? Will the Republicans at last get their campaign under way and if so will they concentrate on several doubtful States as they seem to have decided to on Iowa and flood them with money, of which they have such an abundance? If one knew the answer to such questions prophesying would be easier. Meanwhile it is only safe to say that La Follette's chances are improving all along the line in the Central West, that the other parties are slow to their tasks, and that among their followers there is genuine apathy, while the La Follette workers are bending to their tasks with an enthusiasm and a devotion which in considerable degree offset their lack of experience and their empty treasuries.

Money, organization, and leaders—how much they mean in a hastily improvised campaign like this one cannot appreciate until one goes from city to city and State to State. There are fine men at work both from the ranks of labor, from the Farmer-Labor forces, and from the general liberal public. Many of them are learning the game as they go along and are building their machines as best they may when their cupboards are bare. Men and women work long, long hours, night after night; they iron out difficulty after difficulty only to confront others. And yet the progress made has been amazing. Everywhere the La Follette forces have been the first to get under way and the publicity they achieve is remarkable.

Middle-class citizens have been so stuffed with the Coolidge myth and the assurances of most of the big dailies that Coolidge will be elected by a landslide that the election is to them not a bit of a sporting event. He is more interested in the baseball pennants and scandal than in his politics and, if he is a Democrat, he at least has the excuse that party leaders and spellbinders have let him alone much longer than usual. But the farther west you get the less the apathy is.

Here in Minnesota politics are really teeming. They are not only helping to choose the President; they are electing a Senator to succeed Magnus Johnson, and also choosing a Governor. The election is really in the air and the campaigning bears many of the old familiar aspects. The Farmer-Laborites are out to win and even the Republican headquarters admit privately that La Follette will carry this State. They also believe that Magnus Johnson will be defeated and so do many newspaper men, but the Republican leaders are not rejoicing over that, for Congressman Thomas D. Schall, who is running against Johnson, was not their choice. Even though he is out for Coolidge and Dawes, they feel, with justice, that he is not to be relied upon by them or by the Progressive group in Congress—he is a vacillating person. But he is a robust campaigner who makes a sympathetic appeal because he has been blind for eighteen years and is led on to the platform by his wife. Many of those who are most prominent in Schall's campaign admit that they will vote for La Follette; just as many Farmer-Laborites tell you they will bolt Johnson—a situation characteristic of the cross-currents.

The outcome of all the contests in Minnesota now rests upon developments in the Twin Cities. The rural districts seem overwhelmingly for La Follette and Johnson—to a lesser degree for the latter. If there is a large registration in St. Paul and Minneapolis, particularly of women, it will threaten the Progressive national and State tickets, for the bulk of the women are conservative. Magnus Johnson was elected in an off year and in the middle of summer. There is always a much larger vote in a presidential year than in the off ones and the growth of the electorate makes people believe that this year no less than 700,000 votes will be cast—Johnson won last year with 325,000. Yet there is absolute confidence, even among the political writers on hostile papers, that La Follette at least will win.

In Illinois the situation is far more difficult to analyze. It is generally agreed that Governor Len Small, who so nearly went to prison last year, will walk off with the gubernatorial prize this year, his being the good luck to have the enmity of the Chicago Tribune. To have the Tribune's support these days is to court defeat. Ex-Governor Deneen, the Republican candidate, is also picked to win the Senatorship. But when you enter the national field the evidence is once more so conflicting as to make guessing impossible. La Follette is running well in Chicago, in the coal-mining districts in the southern part of the State, and in certain farming sections where German-Americans predominate. It is conservative to say that 60 per cent of the large German-American population of the State will cast their ballots for La Follette.

The Negroes are standing by Coolidge despite his silence on the Klan, or are going to Davis. No effective work is being done among them for the third party, which has not picked the right persons to handle the situation. The middle class and the business crowd are as everywhere overwhelmingly for Coolidge, but they are so certain of victory that they are not working or caring, and that is helping the "radicals." Probably the leaders will scare them into activity a little later. Meanwhile, in view of the uncertainty as to the attitude of the farmers, I cannot place this State in the La Follette column. I believe that it will stand by its own beloved Dawes and Coolidge by a large majority.

In Ohio things bear still another aspect; there the big cities are going for La Follette. This is conceded by the local political writers. In Dayton, for instance, at a recent mayoralty election the Socialists needed only 2,000 more votes to carry the city. The La Follette managers are confident that they will add so many liberal votes to the enrolled Socialists that they will easily carry the city. The Socialists are running the campaign and are working hard for victory. A leading journalist admitted this and at the same time spoke of the unparalleled lack of interest in the other camps. He had heard nothing of any stirring at Democratic headquarters, and the Republicans had only the night before agreed upon a campaign chairman and ended dangerous internal dissensions. In Cleveland the State La Follette organization, a group of able young men, is certain that not only the city and county but that the State will be carried by the Progressives. Newspaper men of varying faiths conceded Dayton and Cleveland, Cincinnati, Toledo, Columbus, and Hamilton. But here again the question is, what will the farmers do? The La Follette leaders admit that they have not reached them. Railroad labor is unanimous for La Follette; if the other unions are not similarly united, that is because a number of labor leaders have had in the past very close associations with the Republican or Democratic machines and are not so easily detached from those alliances. But Peter Witt of Cleveland uttered a brilliant and a most illuminating truth when in one of his speeches he remarked: "Of course no labor leaders can deliver the whole labor vote in this election, because labor has delivered its leaders." That is literally the case; the leaders have in many instances been pushed into the movement by the demand from underneath that the La Follette ticket be supported.

In Ohio the movement has undoubtedly reached a great many of the men of the type to be found in city clubs everywhere. The third party is being taken seriously and earnestly discussed. On the other hand, two planks in the La Follette platform are keeping near-liberals from joining the movement—the Supreme Court and government-ownership issues—as if they were immediate questions. Upon them the conservative press, both Democratic and Republican, is pounding away. As the local press in the country districts is the usual machine-made type, the Ohio farmer is only getting the Republican point of view. If he can be educated, if the apathy among the old-line voters continues, if the money which is beginning to come in to La Follette headquarters in an increasing stream continues to pour in and effective campaigning is done, it is possible that Mr. Coolidge will be in for a severe shock when he reads the returns from Ohio. Certainly that State owes it to itself to purge its good name of the shame of the "Ohio gang."

Obviously in all that I have written there are many buts and ifs. That is unavoidable. But the amazing thing that I cannot get over is that so hastily improvised a machine has accomplished so much with so little means. The progress of the movement is astounding, for, aside from Ohio, where the Scripps newspapers are so powerful, there is very little newspaper support. The news of the movement goes from hand to hand, from mouth to mouth. The gospel is spread in the lodges, in the clubs, and in the hotel lobbies. One is astounded where one finds converts and that the converts are so comparatively well-informed. It all goes to prove that the country is ripe for the movement and there are many at the Chicago La Follette headquarters who believe that had they received in July a half million dollars in cash the country could have been carried. One cannot escape the poignant regret that the campaign could not have been planned, at least on paper, and organized last February or March. Had Senator La Follette announced his candidacy then instead of in July the old parties would be scared to death today.

Equally amazing is the profound feeling of gratitude and affection to Robert La Follette and the loyalty to him of the masses who have enrolled under his banner. He is accepted with absolute fidelity as the one man above all others to lead; no one questions that he is by himself in public affection; no one says: "I wish it had been Borah or Norris." There isn't a single audience that does not applaud enthusiastically references to his war record. I have not spoken to one which did not cheer the bravery, the determination, and the unselfish service he has rendered; even the supporters of Coolidge and Davis in the hall seem to hold La Follette in respect. Of course in the Republican meetings they applaud when La Follette is described as an imp of Satan—but not in Minnesota. In St. Paul Dawes came a terrible cropper when he was asked about his connection with the Lorimer bank scandal. He got off that phrase about "sulphuretted hydrogen" and then, to everybody's amazement, offered no defense of his acts in that connection and collapsed, sitting down and ending his speech after he had been talking for only twenty-five minutes. Even his supporters were dumfounded and I have heard of several persons who went there intending to vote for him, but changed their minds when he refused to answer in the bank matter. His abuse of La Follette and insistence that it is all a revolutionary movement may go down in some Eastern communities; they are too sophisticated in the West to swallow such stuff.

It only remains to say that as there is no Democratic Party left worthy of the name in Minnesota, so the evidence of decay in the party in Ohio and Illinois is on every hand and that will still be true even if by reason of the contest between La Follette and Coolidge Davis should carry those States and Indiana. The Democratic Party has no catchword, no slogans with which to charm, and no planks to call either for attack or condemnation or for enthusiastic devotion and loyalty. Its publicity work is pitifully inadequate.

Finally, the question one asks oneself wherever one goes: Is there a silent undercurrent for Coolidge or for La Follette? Over that question people are racking their brains without reaching a satisfactory reply. One can only wonder if there is such an undercurrent and if on election day it will sweep Coolidge into office or give La Follette so many electoral votes as to throw the election into Congress. The issue is likely to become more confused rather than more clarified as the remaining weeks pass.

Dawes: First Aid to Swindlers

By DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

CHARLES G. DAWES has declared that the real issue in this campaign is law enforcement and the preservation of the Constitution. In view, therefore, of Mr. Dawes's passionate lip devotion to law enforcement and respect for law, his own record is especially interesting. To those to whom Mr. Dawes's type is familiar, it will be no shock to learn that he was personally involved in a shady piece of financial shystery, evasion of law, and deception of public officials, full details of which together with the rebuke of Mr. Dawes by the Supreme Court of Illinois, can be found in the following reported cases: Golden vs. Cervenka, 278 Ill. 409; Chicago Title & Trust Co. vs. Central Trust Company, 224 Ill. App. 474; Chicago Title & Trust Co. vs. Central Trust Company, 312 Ill. 396.

"On the minute! On the minute!
When common labor asks for rights
Give 'em hell—and keep 'em humble,
Show 'em how a 'patriot' fights."

The story, in brief, is somewhat as follows. Mr. Dawes, after serving four years as United States Comptroller of the Currency, a position given him in return for his services in the Bryan-McKinley campaign of 1896, retired in 1902 to organize a bank, the Central Trust Company. The bank prospered. Some years later William Lorimer, who was thrown out of the United States Senate on account of the bribery of the Legislature which had sent him to Washington, opened a national bank in Chicago. This bank's condition became so critical that it was refused Chicago clearing-house privileges, and the Comptroller of the Currency was on the point of suspending it. Lorimer decided to "reorganize" the moribund bank, transforming it into a State bank; for the purposes of the reorganization it was necessary to satisfy the State Auditor of Public Accounts that the bank was possessed of $1,250,000 "actually paid in in cash," and that such cash "is now in the hands of the proper officers of said association . . . and is to be used by them solely in the legitimate business" of the newly organized bank. Lorimer had no such sum; so after vain efforts to obtain it from other banks, he appealed to Mr. Dawes, president of the affluent Central Trust Company, and his intimate political associate. Mr. Dawes, without the knowledge or consent of the directors of his bank, delivered to Lorimer $1,250,000 in cash belonging to the Central Trust Company, to deceive the auditor and the public. He was successful; the auditor's representative counted the cash and returned it to Lorimer, giving him a certificate authorizing him to start his bank; the cash was then returned to the Central Trust Company, and Lorimer's bank was started. When Lorimer's bank crashed, thousands of depositors lost their savings. On June 12, the very day that Mr. Dawes was nominated for Vice-President, the Supreme Court of Illinois entered a final decree holding Mr. Dawes's bank liable for the loss caused by this illegal transaction and for the money "wrongfully taken by it."

It is worth emphasis that when Mr. Dawes allowed $1,250,000 of the funds of the Central Trust Company (of which he was president) to be counted as Lorimer's money, in order to deceive the State auditor, he did so without having the least authority from the owners of that money. Mr. Dawes sees nothing incongruous in a man with such a record setting out to convert his countrymen to a reverence for law and a passion for law enforcement!

On Tuesday morning, September 2, 1922, when Mr. Dawes opened his Chicago Tribune he might have read the speech of Attorney General Daugherty asking Judge Wilkerson to enjoin the strike of the shopmen. "So long and to the extent that I can speak for the Government of the United States," roared that now disgraced gentleman, "I will use the power of the Government of the United States within my control to prevent the labor unions of this country from destroying the open shop." Perhaps it was this announcement on the part of the most influential man in the Harding Administration which aroused Mr. Dawes to enthusiasm. Not long afterward, in a speech before the Union League Club of Chicago, he said:

> The Daugherty injunction in my judgment future generations will regard as the beginning of a new era of law and order in this country, because our government, through it, announces that the right of a man to work is as sacred as the right of a man to stop work.

About this time the Citizens' Committee to Enforce the Landis Award, a notorious open-shop crew led by Jim Patten, the wheat gambler, and the Donnelleys, bitter anti-union printers, was busily smashing the building-trade unions of Chicago. This is the way Mr. Dawes characterized these gentlemen:

> As what I will have to say is connected with militant good citizenship, I want Mr. James A. Patten of the Landis Award Committee, whom I see in the audience, to take his > seat on the stage while I speak. If Mr. R. R. Donnelley is here I want him to come up also. It is a good thing for an American audience once in a while to get face to face with the men who are fighting their fight. Here is one of them, one of the bravest [referring to Mr. Patten]. In these days of the evasion of the real issue by politicians, of the exclusion from political platforms of those issues which concern the inalienable rights of the individual, it is a great honor to have one of the fighters for those rights before us.

He then went on to eulogize the open shop, declaring it to be embodied in our bill of rights, "for the general recognition of which millions have died and mankind throughout the ages has passed through martyrdom."

Not many days afterward Mr. Dawes was the golf partner of President Harding on Edward McLean's Florida houseboat expedition. Before leaving this affable company Mr. Dawes took the correspondent of the New York Times into his confidence; from him we learn that Mr. Dawes was so pleased with the "announcement" of Mr. Daugherty that he wanted it to be the basis of the 1924 campaign. Quoting from that newspaper, page 1, of the issue of April 1, 1923:

> Having a far-reaching bearing on the 1924 campaign is the discovery during President Harding's Florida trip of a loosely organized but nevertheless strong movement for a declaration by the Republican Party in favor of the open shop and the shaping of the national campaign upon this and a law-and-order issue. . . . It is on the open-shop question that these men of affairs . . . would have the next presidential campaign fought. They urge that sooner or later this matter must be settled before there can be any industrial peace. . . .
>
> The chief spokesman of this movement to President Harding has been Charles G. Dawes. The former Director of the Budget declared frequently on the trip that he is through with holding office. Apparently, however, he is not through with politics, and it is safe to say that he will be heard from in Illinois, taking part in a movement to purge Chicago of political labor leaders. . . .
>
> As far as has been discovered the movement in which Mr. Dawes is active, and which came to light during President Harding's Florida visit, is not organized. . . . Taking part in it are several men who built up sentiment favorable to Mr. Harding among Eastern bankers, before the 1920 campaign.

Mr. Dawes returned to Chicago and proceeded to put his plans into effect, and a few weeks later we hear of the formation by him of the Minute Men of the Constitution. The purpose of this organization, according to its founder, is "to obtain delegates from Illinois to the Republican and Democratic . . . conventions, pledged to support the inclusion . . . in the platform of each party" of certain planks, all dealing vaguely with law and order and respect for the Constitution. Daugherty's "announcement," made in the course of his stump-speech to Judge Wilkerson, finds an honored place as Plank Four:

> Indorsing the announced position of the Government of the United States, maintaining the right of a citizen to work without unlawful interference is as sacred as the right of a citizen to cease work, irrespective of whether he is or is not a member of a labor or other organization.

Then Mr. Dawes and some of his associates set out to make Illinois safe for Mr. Dawes's private "constitution," by means of a speaking tour through the State. The plan was to announce a meeting to discuss law enforcement and the Constitution. Such a meeting was held in Springfield, for example, under the auspices of the Mid-Day Luncheon Club. Mr. Dawes singled out for vituperation John H. Walker, president of the Illinois Federation of Labor, and a highly respected citizen of Springfield. He charged Mr. Walker with being a dangerous citizen and accused him of attacking the Constitution. At the close of the meeting he shouted: "Now, then, everybody who is in favor of the Constitution of the United States, stand up!" Of course, the entire audience arose. "I thought so. Now you're all members in good standing of the Minute Men of the Constitution. There are no duties, no dues, and no meetings." This performance was repeated throughout the State, but with particular success in the wealthy suburban towns near Chicago. It is not only amusing but significant that immediately following this Springfield meeting the secretary of the Mid-Day Luncheon Club wrote to Mr. Walker, apologizing for the aspersions cast upon his citizenship by the boiling brigadier and assuring him that these views were in no wise shared by his listeners.

Mr. Dawes had an opportunity to translate his notions into action in the Cook County judicial election on November 6, 1923. One of the judges seeking reelection was Dennis E. Sullivan, an able and vigorous lawyer, who as a judge had flagrantly abused the writ of injunction against the workers of Chicago. Another contestant was former Judge Jesse E. Holdom, who when a judge had unhesitatingly issued drastic injunctions against union activity. When the depositors of the defunct Lorimer bank pressed their claims for fraud against the Dawes bank in June, 1920, Judge Holdom was so eager to protect Mr. Dawes that a leading member of the Chicago bar publicly described the result as "a gross breach of judicial duty" and "one of the most barefaced and shameless attempts to pervert justice which has ever been made within the history of the administration of justice in Cook County."

Early in October, 1923, a committee on injunctions was named by the Chicago Federation of Labor. These fifteen men (including such generally respected and conservative leaders as John Fitzpatrick, Victor Olander, and Matthew Woll) issued a report addressed to the liberty-loving citizens of the country, which declared that "government by injunction has become a menace to free citizenry," and urged the defeat of Sullivan and Holdom. This was the signal for what Mr. Dawes described (in a pamphlet which his followers of the Minute Men now take great pains to keep hidden) as "The First Fight of the Minute Men of the Constitution." Meetings of the Minute Men were held throughout the country towns in the county, in which it was represented that the Chicago Federation of Labor had taken a stand against law and order and the Constitution. The only reason these "Red labor demagogues" opposed the use of the injunction, Mr. Dawes assured his audiences, was that it "restrains men who want to assault and kill from carrying out such practices"! Although both Sullivan and Holdom were badly outdistanced in the city vote, the efforts of the Minute Men in the country towns elected both. The following morning Judge Sullivan called upon Mr. Dawes and thanked him for securing his reelection.

That same evening the truculent general was the speaker (and Judge Sullivan an honored guest) at a meeting of the Chicago Association of Commerce. In his address he first disarmed his fellow-conservatives of the Democratic faith by declaring that "I am not running for office and you cannot make me run for office," and then went on to denounce those labor leaders who had opposed the reelection of the injunction judges. He said:

> What is this claptrap about injunctions? Is there a man here . . . whether he belongs to a union organization or not, that does not know what the claptrap is about? Is it feared on the part of Sam Gompers, John H. Walker, and Victor Olander that it is encroachment upon the liberty of the American people by injunctions? What they are afraid of is not encroachment upon the liberties of American citizens; they fear the encroachment of their privilege to assault American citizens and kill American citizens when they go peacefully to their work.

His remaining pyrotechnics consisted of a discourse on the meaning of the Constitution, involving a theory as simple as it is outrageous: that the Constitution makes it mandatory upon our judges to issue injunctions against the workers whenever they strike, threaten to strike, or in any other way interfere with the plans of their employer.

Now, as every competent lawyer knows, this is utter nonsense; the Constitution does no such thing. And nothing will more quickly increase dissatisfaction with the operation of our constitutional form of government than the dogmatic assertion—by men enjoying the prestige of Mr. Dawes's party position—that the judicial conduct which many have come to find tyrannical and arbitrary is not due to the errors or abuses of individual judges, but is commanded by the fundamental law of the land, by the very form of our government itself. Mr. Dawes turns the resentment of the victims of government by injunction from the judges who have abused that writ to the Constitution itself, and to that extent weakens the confidence of the masses in the Constitution. And yet this is the man who has the effrontery to go about the country posing as the savior of the Constitution from the "enemies of constitutional government."

Let no one be confused as to the real issue in all this hubbub Mr. Dawes raises about the "attack on the Constitution." On one side is a sort of strait-jacket, the private "constitution" of Mr. Dawes, labeled "Made in Evanston," and designed to safeguard Mr. Dawes and his companions, the open-shoppers, the financial pirates, the Daughertys, the Sinclairs, the McLeans, the Burnses, the Falls, et al.; on the other side is the Constitution of the United States, a human, flexible medium of government, devised 137 years ago by shrewd, foresighted, but fallible men to meeting changing needs in a changing world, a document which purports first of all to protect human rights and human liberties. The most significant result of the coming election will be the attitude which the American people take on this vital and clear-cut issue.

Nicaragua Pecking the Shell

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

A CHARMING young Nicaraguan comes to my house. He is extremely charming. He is extremely intelligent. Yet he does not seem entirely to adore the United States.

This amazes me. It does not seem to amaze that literary psychological person, Heywood Broun, of the New York World, who happens to be present at the time. Heywood Broun and the young Nicaraguan seem jointly perfectly to understand why a young Nicaraguan, charming and intelligent, might not entirely adore the United States. I attribute these things to psychology. They are beyond politics.

The young Nicaraguan tells a most delightful story about the present President of Nicaragua. In Nicaragua, it appears, there has been a custom whereby processions of school-children (and other such demonstrations) happen on the Fourth of July in compliment, obsequiously, to the United States. The present President of Nicaragua, it appears, omitted these demonstrations. Instead he said: "Let us wait to see what demonstrations are made in the United States in honor of Nicaragua's national holiday." Thus he saved himself from having any demonstrations in Nicaragua for us at all.

Heywood Broun laughed. Heywood Broun does not care how far he goes. I cautiously proceeded to inquire about politics.

My young Nicaraguan was highly informing about politics. This new Nicaraguan President—Martinez—pronounced with the accent on the second syllable and with the "i" as "ee" and with the "z" as "s"—is a full-blooded and full-brained Indian. He is a one-hundred-per-center. He has paid off the money owed by Nicaragua to bankers in Wall Street on the Nicaraguan National Railway. He also has paid off to bankers in Wall Street the money owed by Nicaragua on the Nicaraguan National Bank. It is different from any situation that has existed in Nicaragua since somewhere along about 1913. Nicaragua, it appears, is freeing itself from the clutches of Wall Street and Charles Evans Hughes.

Heywood Broun looks pleased. He seems to rejoice in the freeing of Nicaragua from being improved by Mr. Hughes. He seems, I think, to remember that both Mr. Hughes and the Reverend John Roach Straton of New York are Baptists. He seems to be against the improvement of others by Baptists whether at home or abroad.

Our charming Nicaraguan, so well grounded in finance, so well rounded in belles lettres, so well able to chat or even chatter with Mr. Broun, tells us now about a new election which presently will happen in Nicaragua. Now in fact it already has happened. It was last Sunday, October 5. It is history.

Its details, its results, we cannot yet know. The returns are slow. Our young Nicaraguan, before it has happened, has told us thoroughly about it:

Mr. Hughes is determined on "constitutionality" in this election. If it is not conducted sufficiently formally and correctly, Mr. Hughes may refuse to recognize the winner of it. In the recent election in Mexico, this policy was all right. It worked out to favor Mr. Calles, the candidate of Labor. In Nicaragua it may work out to hurt the candidate of Labor. This candidate is Solarzano. Calles was in right with the election officials of Mexico. Solarzano is in wrong with the election officials of Nicaragua.

Mr. Hughes supported righteousness by supporting constitutionality in Mexico. He is supporting wickedness by supporting constitutionality in Nicaragua. So says our young Nicaraguan.

Mr. Hughes undeviatingly pursues the theory, the principle, that Latin-American countries near us must learn how to conduct elections. These elections may be temporarily rather rough-stuff. In time they perhaps will become more refined.

They must become more refined. Practice makes perfect. Latin-American elections in these countries will improve. In time they will be all right. Meanwhile we must stick by elections and reprove revolutions. We must refuse to recognize the presidents produced by revolutions, which are relatively bad. We must give our recognition to presidents produced by reasonably lawful and honest elections, which relatively are good.

Thus Mr. Hughes. Inflexibly he pursues this policy whether it produces radical presidents in Mexico or may produce conservative presidents in Nicaragua.

Our young Nicaraguan cannot disapprove the results of Mr. Hughes's policy in Mexico. He yet can—and does—disapprove the potential results of Mr. Hughes's policy in Nicaragua. Those results may be, he thinks, that the "conservative" elements in Nicaragua, possessing most of the judges of the election, may relatively "constitutionally" and relatively "lawfully" win the election, and yet the "liberals" and "laborites," of whom he is one, may really have a majority of the voters and may really numerically have a right to rule the country.

He is out to assert that right. With him he has a young Mexican. The two of them are out to assert the right of Nicaragua to produce its own government, in its own way, irrespective of Mr. Hughes and irrespective of the United States. It is for me to be scandalized. I am a political reporter. I am not a war correspondent. These young gentlemen are about to depart for Nicaragua to put some manhood—to put, that is, some barricades and barrages—into the Nicaraguan election.

Heywood Broun is quite against war. He also, however, is quite for liberalism. Strange how a pacifist and a nationalist may in some circumstances be equally silent! Neither Heywood Broun nor I restrained our young Nicaraguan and our young Mexican on their way to Nicaragua to barricades and barrages.

They went.

The election was last Sunday. What happened I do not know. I only know that Mr. Hughes presumably is standing out for what in the end will be most orderly and will be best for the western hemisphere and for the world. Mr. Hughes is standing out against rough-stuff and bloodshed. Mr. Broun and I, on the contrary, are engaged in saying an affectionate farewell to gentlemen presumably about to grasp rifles.

Let Mr. Broun explain it. Our Nicaraguan, our Mexican go. The election was last Sunday. I stand in fact for the policy of my country. I give in truth my heart to those gentlemen—to those great gentlemen. I suppose they are large persons now in Nicaragua, or dead.

Directions for Burial

By WILLIAM A. NORRIS

(I have lain dead in windy places;
I have been blown in the dust of shattered rocks,
Tumbled over the stones of streams,
Floated slow in the deep green womb of a river;
I have been dropped on the pallid feet of seaweeds.)

Fasten the lid with nails,
Put a stone on my chest,
Go away with your tears and laughter . . .
The small white teeth of the frost will find me out,
The rain will come with a trowel to set me free;
I shall be going home to the wind and water,
The cleft red earth and the rock.

A School for Workers' Children

By DEVERE ALLEN

A CENTURY ago American labor was deeply interested in elementary and secondary schools. That today labor needs to give fresh thought to the education of its children is beginning to be realized by some people in the labor movement. Manumit School, near Pawling, New York, amid the rolling hills of Dutchess County, may mark the entrance of American labor on a new and significant program of experimental education.

Manumit School symbolizes an alliance of progressive labor and progressive education. On Saturday, September 6, seventy representatives of organized labor and educational movements journeyed to Pawling for a two days' conference. Right on the spot where the enterprise is to be carried out the special problems involved in such a pioneering venture were discussed and an association was formed to direct the affairs of the school. This association will include the originators of the school, Mr. and Mrs. William M. Fincke; the faculty; and people from the educational and labor world. A. J. Muste, head of the faculty of Brookwood Workers' College, is chairman of the executive board. The school has had a small-scale tryout for a year; but the leasing of the property by the association from Mr. and Mrs. Fincke and the other owners, at a dollar a year, means that the educational project, along with the use of a fertile, 177-acre farm, numerous buildings, and fifty head of dairy cattle, has been presented to the labor movement.

Manumit is a residential school. It operates through the usual school year of nine months, and accepts this year children from nine to fourteen years of age. Each succeeding year it expects to take in children one year older until, in time, it will prepare for college. Parents are expected to pay the actual costs of their children's attendance at the school; but where it is found necessary charges may be adjusted in each case. The school is less interested in a child's capacity to pay a full fee than in his capacity for service after he has finished at Manumit.

Children at Manumit will have every advantage of a vigorous outdoor life; the school is situated in a beautiful valley high above sea level, surrounded by wooded hills which challenge both leg muscles and imagination. The school's garden and cattle supply fresh vegetables and milk, and the food is prepared under the guidance of a trained dietitian. The surplus milk is marketed through the co-operative New York State Dairymen's League, and is handled as a school job in which students share responsibility. A clear mountain stream runs through the farm, affording swimming and wading pools; and mountain springs furnish an abundance of pure drinking water.

But there is more for workers' children than ideal physical surroundings. There is an atmosphere of home life, good fellowship, community living, cooperative government, democracy, intellectual alertness, spiritual aspiration. "A new social order"—these words ran through all the discussion at the conference, as they run through all the school's announcements, a bright cord of faith on which all other things of life are strung. There is at Manumit no emphasis on competition; there is little to encourage individual domination; and yet each child has an opportunity to develop his individual interests and capacities in a spirit of freedom. "Manumit," says one of the school's announcements, "will have no didactic, authoritarian 'teaching'; nor passive, obedient 'learning.'" At Manumit there is no need of formal, rigid discipline imposed from above, for there is no "above" in the usual sense. Rather, the constant sharing of responsibility in the manual labor of the farm and home, and the type of community living which is the core of the Manumit idea, tend to form habits of self-discipline, mutual helpfulness, and social outlook.

Six mornings a week are devoted to study, thus freeing a good deal of the students' time for recreation, dramatics, and other informal activities of the school community. The "study," however, does not mean merely the reading of books in preparation for an old-fashioned recitation, although students have every opportunity to acquire a love of reading. It means work in one or another kind of laboratory, in arts and crafts, in group discussions, on the school periodical, in the printing shop.

In short, Manumit School will adapt to its own needs the most appropriate methods which have been developed in other experimental schools, such as the Fairhope School, the Stelton School, the Walden School, the City and Country School, the Lincoln School, and the schools operating under the Dalton plan; but it will not slavishly imitate any one of these. It will regard itself as a growing, developing project, subject to the criticisms and suggestions of its friends in the educational and labor world, striving to make itself a more and more effective instrument for the service of the labor movement.

Does this mean that Manumit School is a place where children are to be pumped full of propaganda, or indoctrinated with all kinds of labor isms? Anyone voicing this natural inquiry would have found a reassuring answer from the discussions at the recent conference. The people behind Manumit realize that the American labor movement itself has its numerous wings and divisions of opinion. But more than this, they have an acute realization of the pedagogical difficulty of teaching rigid systems of prescribed thought to children, should they wish to do so; and they do not wish to do so, for they know that nothing in the long run could so harm the labor cause as to unfit labor's children for that scientific, discriminating independence on which its future strength so largely rests. What Manumit stands for, in its relation to labor, is the free, untrammeled inquiry of the child's mind, when he displays a readiness for it, into the basic functions, problems, and ideals of the toilers, which in the public schools are deliberately withheld from his intellectual and emotional experience.

In what way does this school differ from the other well-known "free" or "modern" schools? Unlike, perhaps, a majority of these other schools, which take as pupils mainly the children of professional and middle-class families, with a sprinkling of wage-workers' children for variety, Manumit, by reversing this situation, will more accurately approximate the proportions of the adult world. Also, while it will not employ the general methods of the ordinary public schools, Manumit plans to keep its students at each age abreast of public-school measures of performance, as some of the modern schools do not. This effort is not undertaken to prove the school's comparative efficiency; and, in fact, it is undertaken with considerable reluctance. But if its children are to come from workers' families, who have to move about a good deal and who face economic uncertainties that might compel withdrawal of their children and their entrance into a regular public school, Manumit does not want these children to be lost in the public-school process, unideal as that process usually is. This much of a concession to circumstances seems dictated by necessity; but the teachers at the heart of the Manumit experiment will need to exercise great vigilance lest the pressure of public-school standards have too potent an influence on day-by-day instruction technique. Of this danger they are doubtless well aware.

No one connected with Manumit, I am sure, would look upon the project as a simple one. Entirely aside from the intricate questions of instruction and the tasks of finance, there will be from time to time, no doubt, many delicate and difficult problems of administration. It could hardly be otherwise with an enterprise so hitherto untried. However, if the promise of the school thus far and the quality of the support given to it by labor and education can be taken as portents of the future, somewhere, scattered about in workers' homes, are fortunate children who may go to Manumit and some day do good works to the glory of our pioneers in labor education.

In the Driftway

THE DRIFTER has never been one of those whose coffee tasted sour unless the morning newspaper were propped against the cream jug, and he is about to give up newspaper reading entirely. There is too much foreign news in the newspapers, and it is all bad news. The Drifter does not refer to the decay of capitalist civilization. The newspapers never note that anyway, and he would not be unduly depressed if they did. Nor does he refer to the half-dozen wars in various parts of the world while the League of Nations is arguing about what the headlines call an "arms pact." The Drifter is a romanticist, not a moralist, and wars in sufficiently remote spots suggest pleasant adventures to his imagination. What disgusts the Drifter are the reports of Progress.

* * * * *

IT was only a few weeks ago that the newspapers noted the installation of a traffic policeman in Papeete. That was enough to ruin Tahiti for any drifter. Tourist automobiles in South Sea islands is a horrid thought. Then came the news of the housing shortage in Bagdad; the Government was considering the erection of model apartment houses for the stenographers. That ruined the city of Haroun-al-Raschid. Next the newspapers blazoned a new bolshevik atrocity: Moscow was to bar all horse-drawn vehicles and permit only automobiles in its streets. A Moscow without droschkes and izvostchniks indeed! The Bolsheviks might as well order down all the blue and green and red and gold onion spires of the old city of churches and replace them with uniform gray spires, in accordance with the fashion in this advanced land of drab prosperity. Finally, Mussolini ordered Progress in Italy.

* * * * *

VENICE is to abandon her lovely gondolas; Rome is to have a skyscraper; and Tivoli's falls have been bought by an electric-power corporation. To be sure, there have been motor-boats in the Grand Canal for two decades, and the decline of Venice may well date from the day four centuries ago when some somber old Puritan doge ordered that thenceforth all gondolas must be black. The romance of the gondola was always, to an effete product of civilization like the Drifter, somewhat marred by the sight and smell of dead cats in the picturesque old canals. And Tivoli has been harnessed for a hundred years. The New Fall was artificially established a century ago when engineers diverted the course of the Anio to prevent flooding of the town. The tumbling waters which inspired Horace already help, so prosaic friends tell the Drifter, to push Rome's trolley-cars and light her streets. And there would be a certain justice, the Drifter must admit, in a skyscraper in Italy. The Italians built most of the skyscrapers in America; why should they not have at least one in Rome?

* * * * *

THERE are always excuses for progress, but there is no need of reading about it. The Drifter would like to cut out newspaper-reading altogether and spare himself the sad news of this onward march of civilization. But the same paper that told of the prohibition of horses in Moscow told of the finding of delicate lipsticks in an Egyptian tomb and announced a new discovery of that primeval skyscraper, the Tower of Babel. The Drifter cannot forego such pleasant reminders that there is no such thing as progress after all.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"Helping Haiti"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Jolibois, fils, the well-known Haitian leader, who is still illegally detained in the American military prison in Port au Prince, Haiti, has just been the victim of another inhuman act. Because the starving Haitians cannot afford to pay the $4,000 which he demands to set Jolibois free High Commissioner Russell ordered him removed to a remote section of the jail, where he had had made a special cell only four feet square.

When the news of this treatment of their leader leaked out, hundreds of Haitians started to march through the streets in sign of protest; but they were quickly dispersed by the gendarmerie, officered by members of the Occupation.

The high commissioner has told the Haitians that their barking (to use his own expression) will be of no avail, as the Washington Government will put the stamp of approval on anything he does in its name.

New York, September 18 JOSEPH MIRAULT

The Russian Red Cross

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: During my trial at the Army Building, recently, I was closely interrogated as to my employment during 1922 and 1923 by the Russian Red Cross as secretary of its commission in the United States. There appeared to be some question as to what legitimate work the Russian Red Cross might have to perform in this country. I am inclosing a translation of a letter which has just been received by the Russian Red Cross Commission in America, which, besides illustrating the type of thing the Russian Red Cross Commission tries to straighten out, may be of interest to your readers per se.

PAXTON HIBBEN

South Norwalk, Connecticut, September 17

TRANSLATION

Marquette, Michigan, July 6, 1924

RUSSIAN RED CROSS:

I beg you to help me. I am a Russian. On May 31, 1922, armed robbers fell upon me and at the point of a gun made me lead them to the farms, which were fourteen miles away. That was in Detroit, Michigan, at 9 o'clock in the evening, and the robbers kept me at the farms all night. In the morning they attempted to rob a bank, but were arrested there with my help. I did not realize what the robbers were planning to do, but when I was arrested the prosecutor assured me that the bank was robbed. I told him that the night before I had been compelled at the point of a gun at 9 o'clock to lead the robbers to the farms, which were fourteen miles away. The prosecuting attorney then asked me who I was. I said: "A Russian." He jumped up then and went away, and in the morning two State policemen were sent to me. They kept beating me for two days. I was deathly frightened by the robbers and when the policemen beat me up, in addition, I became unconscious and did not know when they left me.

I was unconscious for two weeks. I had in my pocket $381.18. The officials took this money away from me and did not return it to me. I cannot speak English and am afraid to ask for it. Also in Detroit I had worked for the Wilson Body Company, and $97 was due me from them. This money, too, the authorities collected and impounded. I was kept in prison for eight months before the case came up, and I do not know what the sentence was. Some prison officials told me that I would have to sit in prison for seven years, if no one will help me. I beg you, Red Cross, help me!

JERRY SKOLPENSKY

The Negro and the G. O. P.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: No voters have been more loyal to the Republicans than the colored voters. And no voters on earth have been denied their rights and offered more insults, as a reward for their loyalty, than they have. A general exodus from the G. O. P. by the colored voters would be as helpful to the country at large as to the colored race. Segregation and discrimination in the Federal Government departments here in Washington against the colored employees should be a stink in the nostrils of a true and just Republican President. But while his spirit is willing to give justice to the faithful colored voters, his flesh seems to be weak to resist the meanness inaugurated against them by his predecessors in office.

All who are in favor of perpetuating segregation, discrimination, and jim-crowing of the colored employees in the various government departments in Washington, and throughout the entire country, will please step up and vote for Coolidge and Dawes.

Washington, September 29 J. C. CUNNINGHAM

Books

First Glance

OF new books there may be too many, but the thirst of a seasoned reader for reprints of old—and good—ones is never quenched. Few sensations of the literary sort can have been more agreeable than that of a person who in the middle of the last century watched the Bohn Library grow to its hundredth or two hundredth title, and there is like comfort, though so far on a milder scale, to be taken these days in the steady progress of the series called The Broadway Translations (Dutton), a series edited with both learning and imagination and with the evident hope to make available for modern lay readers the rarest and best of foreign masterpieces. Three recent volumes (each $5) yield extraordinary riches.

"A Book of 'Characters,'" compiled and translated by Richard Aldington, an English poet, was much to be desired in a day devoted among other things to the fine art of satirical portraiture. The battle line against affectation is long just now—stretching all the way from newspaper columnists to novelists and poets, from Don Marquis, say, to Rose Macaulay and H. G. Wells and E. A. Robinson and Edgar Lee Masters. Types of the bore, the brute, the bigot, and the prig are in the way of becoming so familiar that a volume is welcome which collects equivalent specimens from all but forgotten literatures and thus demonstrates—if nothing else—the monotony of human nature. Mr. Aldington has had predecessors in his task, but none of them dug up so much. Here of course is Theophrastus for the Greeks; here are Sir Thomas Overbury and sixty-six other English satirists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; here, best of all, is La Bruyère for the French, commencing his work with the lightest of touches: "Arsène contemplates mankind from the summit of his mind and, seen from that eminence, men frighten him, so to speak, by their littleness." A reformer would learn a great deal about his hopeless trade by coming to Mr. Aldington's feast of folly.

Miles behind in sophistication comes that famous medieval compendium of tales, the "Gesta Romanorum," reissued for the series in a century-old version by Charles Swan. Some of the liveliest stories in the world—stories found elsewhere in Boccaccio, Chaucer, and Shakespeare—lie in this jumble with some of the dullest. But Germany, France, and England loved them all in the Middle Ages, and loved equally the pious "applications" by which one allegorizing priest or another attempted to draw the invention and wit of the East, whence many of these narratives derived, into line with Christian morals. "My beloved, the emperor is our heavenly Father; the elephant is Christ . . . and the iron-bound chest filled with stones is a heart filled with virtues."

The series would be justified if it included nothing besides Aksakov's "Chronicles of a Russian Family," given here in its three parts with only a few omissions. Surely there are few autobiographies so brilliant as this; it deserves to be better known. Sergei Aksakov, who died in 1859, was a very ordinary kind of writer until he was awakened by Gogol. When a homesick boy at school he had been subject to a species of ecstasy that was taken for epilepsy as often as his imagination returned to the beautiful scenes of his yet younger days—a certain enough sign that his genius lay in his memory. Now, under the influence of a consummate realist, that same remembered existence rushed over him and he set it down, proceeding in his passionate researches through the massive figure of his grandfather to the unaccountable, inspired creature who was his mother and finally to himself as child. The record that results is perhaps unique in its brightness and completeness. No other Russian wrote precisely like this man of the perfect memory; no other Russian has written better.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Agricultural Crisis

The Agricultural Crisis, 1920-1923. By R. R. Enfield. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

THERE exists an acute agricultural crisis, it is true, but we are emerging from it now and such an emergence always hides the fact that a chronic difficulty still remains, as indeed it has for fifty years or more. Like a local infection of body tissue it flares up now and again and then dies down. It is always there; and it will always be there until those things are done which have to be done to effect a cure.

It may as well be said at once that we are a long way from political willingness to see the thing through. It looked for a while as though the farm bloc would refuse the various kinds of legislative pap so freely offered by their Eastern friends and, with an eye on their constituencies, who, it appeared, had an eye on them, would hold out for the true medicine. Corn was being burned for fuel, wheat was being fed to stock, and farm children were ill-fed. Farm bankruptcies rose from 6.4 per cent to 17.4 per cent of all bankruptcies. But a comparative crop failure in Canada has increased farm incomes temporarily and relieved the pressure on Congress, which only just failed to pass the McNary-Haugen bill with its sweeping implications of change in policy. The whole matter is forgotten now and everyone is glad the bill failed. We seem to be as far as ever from facing reality.

This reality is very simple too. It consists essentially in the fact that the prices farmers receive are consistently less than those they must pay. They are therefore in a lasting state of bankruptcy. What explains the acute phases of this chronic disease, such as the one we have just passed through, is the fact that, as the general level of prices moves up and down in cyclical fashion, the prices farmers receive vary in their relationship to it. As the general level moves upward farm prices precede it; as it declines farm prices also precede it. This means that as the incomes of all of us increase farmers' incomes increase more rapidly, but that as they fall off farmers' incomes also fall off more rapidly. Now, if the farmers' gains upon the rest of us in times of rising prices equaled or exceeded their losses in times of falling prices there simply would be no agricultural problem. There is no manufacturing problem. But unfortunately what farmers lose is always more than what they gain by probably 10 per cent; they are therefore at an everlasting disadvantage.

A handicap with such perfectly apparent causes would, one might think, form a social problem relatively easily analyzed and settled. But one who thought this would be uncomfortably surprised to find that he might read a long way into the economic literature of our time before he found this contrast appearing clearly, and that he might read a long way further before he struck any clear ideas as to what ought to be done about it. Such a person will welcome Mr. Enfield's book on the agricultural crisis, even though it be a British book. It appears in Mr. Enfield's figures that farmers are not so badly off in the United Kingdom, though conditions there have been bad enough. If prices of farm products in the United States in eighteen months of 1920-1921 fell 54 per cent, in the United Kingdom they fell only 31 per cent; and this last percentage also about measured the fall of the general price level.

Mr. Enfield does not, as we might have liked, go straight to the discussion of his main problem. He has to write a good deal before he sees it; and even then it is not clear at once to an American reader. For his figures are all British and they actually show that in the United Kingdom agricultural prices fell not more but less than other prices. This means that when our Middle West was having a panic all its own, the intensity of which was totally uncomprehended by other industrial groups of the country, British farmers were better off than any other group in the kingdom. There is a lesson in this if we will learn it. We might profitably inquire, it seems, why British farmers are better off than our own. Mr. Enfield is naturally led to a somewhat different conclusion than the one we should be forced to by the facts of our own situation. He concludes that for the United Kingdom agricultural difficulties are only part and parcel of larger general ones. We should have to add to this the very special disabilities our farmers suffer.

The progress of the book is through chapters on causes to one on solution, which is conceived in terms of "stabilization." And this suggests—what is perhaps better known among economists here than abroad, thanks to a brilliant generalization of Mr. David Friday—that an upset in the relations between the gross incomes of farmers and of manufacturers involves eventual industrial disaster. The reason of course is that the one group is the customer of the other; any reduction of buying power in either group immediately closes the markets of the other. But farmers cannot shut down, and this is at least one of the secrets of their long disabilities. The weather and the soil share the main responsibility for producing crops, the effort of man being more or less a constant factor, and neither the weather nor the soil is changed on short notice in response to shifts in the prices of the goods they create. Factories can be stopped, machinery can be halted, workers can be turned out; and so the flood of industrial product can be temporarily dammed until prices are restimulated by shortage.

A government willing either to strengthen the farmers' bargaining power or to weaken that of the manufacturers could cure the agricultural sore. All other suggestions are dust thrown in the air, and all other directions for investigation are intended to obscure the main issue: Shall the United States continue to discriminate in favor of manufacturers and against farmers? For a long time a debt has been accumulating to the credit of our farmers, and only the remarkable patience that comes of long seasoning in the sun and wind of rural hillsides and long accustoming to the natural rhythmic changing of the seasons can have prevented until now its collection by some kind of force. In the meantime investigators like Mr. Enfield at home and abroad are supplying the factual contrasts and verities which cannot forever be ignored and which must ultimately find recognition in public policy.

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL

Goethe Intime

Goethe: Skizzen zu des Dichters Leben und Werken. Von Hans Gerhard Gräf. Leipzig. H. Haessel. 18 marks.

THIS volume of essays by a well-known Goethe scholar will be welcomed by those who love the memory of the classic days of Weimar and Jena and to whom even the small everyday affairs in the lives of the great men of that epoch are of absorbing interest. Dr. Gräf, himself a native of Weimar, does not, like Friedrich Gundolf, attempt to explain Goethe scientifically as a phenomenon of nature; he does not, like Georg Brandes, try to define him internationally as a force in the spiritual development of mankind. To him Goethe's genius and unique service to the cause of humanity are established facts; and he contents himself with adding to our knowledge of certain parts of his activity and of certain phases and figures of the life that surrounded him. Within this narrower field of investigation Dr. Gräf displays not only a remarkable erudition and mastery of detail, but also a fine insight into human character and a firm grasp of general intellectual problems; and the very simplicity and anecdotal quality of his presentation lend to these sketches a decided personal charm.

The first essay—which, a footnote informs us, was originally published as a separate pamphlet in Swedish—is a study of the interest taken by Goethe, through a large part of his life, in Sweden and in individual Swedes. It can hardly be said that this study reveals any unexpected or new side in the poet's character, but it does acquaint us with a variety of persons whose relations with Goethe in one way or another reveal his habitual large-mindedness and breadth of view. Particularly interesting is what Dr. Gräf relates about his intercourse with a Swedish diplomat, Gustav von Brinckmann, and with the famous Swedish chemist Berzelius. The diplomat's ardent glorification of his own genius and of the superiority of German literature in general Goethe seems to have taken with urbane irony and a good-natured smile; he called his ecstatic admirer an "Allemand enragé" and advised him, in order to cure himself of this hysteria, to go to England and hear the popular slogan of the day: "No German nonsense sways my British heart." Berzelius, in whom he rightly suspected an opponent of his favorite Neptunistic theory of the formation of the earth's crust, he seems to have treated at their first meeting with undisguised coldness and reserve, but only to change his manner to frank cordiality as soon as a successful experiment by Berzelius convinced him of his opponent's scientific originality and preeminence. Regarding Goethe's attitude toward another great Swedish scientist, the botanist Linnaeus, our author records the following characteristic dictum: "Next to Shakespeare and Spinoza no great man among the departed has affected me as much as Linnaeus, chiefly through the opposition which he aroused in me. I have learned immensely from him, only not botany."

While Dr. Gräf through numerous similar cases confirms the correctness of Goethe's own saying: "I have always had a liking for the Swedes," he also shows that his deepest interest in Sweden was of a geological nature. He fairly worshiped Sweden as the land of granite, "the firm and unshaken base upon which the whole surface of the earth has come to rest."

There follow essays on Goethe's various sojourns in Bohemia; on the restless life and tragic death of Goethe's Darmstadt friend Merck; on the curious relation of Goethe and Schiller to Johann Heinrich Voss, the dreamy, sentimental son of the sturdy poet of the same name; on Christiane Vulpius and her unsentimental diary; on the daily affairs of Goethe's last year of life; and on other miscellaneous subjects. All these essays are marked by the same intimate knowledge and the same loving tenderness and regard for everything connected with the greatest epoch of German intellectual history that distinguish the opening essay.

A curious bit of modern German history comes to light in one of the last essays, entitled "Ein Nationalheiligtum der Deutschen." It appears that in connection with the hundredth anniversary of Schiller's death, in 1905, Dr. Gräf had conceived the idea of having the sarcophagi of both Goethe and Schiller removed from their present resting-place, the "Princes' Vault," to a mausoleum of their own, to be built by popular subscription. He felt that their present position in a corner of the vault of the Grand-Ducal family, in company with a score of princely nonentities (Karl August being the only one of his family worthy of their companionship), was an affront to the memory of the two greatest German poets; and he considered the Schiller centennial a proper occasion to remove this blot from the hallowed tradition of his native town. He developed these ideas in an article which, couched in the form of a vision and dwelling mainly upon what the erection of such a sanctuary of the spirit would mean to the whole German people, seemed calculated to avoid any possible offense to the sensibilities of the then reigning Grand Duke. The article was accepted by the foremost German monthly, the Berlin Deutsche Rundschau. Proof had been read and the publication had been arranged for in an early number, when through an indiscretion the matter leaked out in Weimar itself. A storm of indignation arose in court circles; Dr. Gräf found himself suddenly a social outcast, a person suspected of undermining allegiance to dynasty and country; the editors of the Rundschau were swamped with letters of protest against the publication of so dangerous a manifesto—in short, the article was suppressed. A truly patriotic idea, an appeal for national homage to genius, was smothered before its birth by miserable court apprehensions and cabals.

Let us hope that republican Weimar of today will make amends for the failures of courtly Weimar of twenty years ago. Let us hope that the belated publication of Dr. Gräf's essay in the present volume, to which is added a dignified account of the petty intrigues which succeeded in stifling his voice at that time, will now lead to a realization of his dream: the erection of a truly national Goethe-Schiller sanctuary, unimpaired by any belittling restrictions of whatever sort.

KUNO FRANCKE

Good Reporting

The Best News Stories of 1923. Edited by Joseph Anthony. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.50.

THE trained journalist will peruse this collection and nod, taking the mean of excellence as a matter of course. But to the lay reader, who habitually swallows with gulped breakfast coffee his day's allotment of information, at least a trace of revealment is likely to come. For he has merely snatched at the chronicled doings of a day, without discernment, faintly conscious now and then of being gripped by a news narrative. Not one newspaper reader in a thousand actually feels the texture of warp and woof in first or last page paragraphs. Newspaper owners are coming to realize this. Hence the stereotyped dailies of today, so often flavorless—omitting, to be sure, consideration of the so-called "colyums" and the colloquial drama in the go-as-far-as-you-like sporting departments. Mr. Anthony is to be thanked for unearthing such a pocket of nuggets, for one had almost come to believe that the consulship of Plancus has passed in any Park Row. Apparently, however, the zest-in-haste of the reporter on the firing line is not entirely eliminated. There are yet staunch scouts of the news to whom every sudden happening is a challenge to courage and resourceful skill as they tap typewriter keys while copy-boys snatch sheets from their platens, or scribble, illegibly but inspiredly, for the wayside telegraph operator—the wise confederate who has wrought so valiantly to aid in gratifying the fact and color appetite of a voracious but undiscriminating public.

There is only one real test for a news story. It must be written in a hurry. Even a cub may make a fair job of disaster or hectic political crisis if he has leisure in which to concoct his screed. But as Harold J. Learoyd, one-time managing editor of the New York Evening Post, used to say, "A slow news day is no news day. The paper could be turned out by the senior class of a young ladies' seminary then. No one is a real reporter until he can qualify with a house of cards tumbling around his ears." Mr. Learoyd got more out of a tiny but hand-picked staff than any executive who sat at an equally littered desk. He knew.

In Mr. Anthony's book there are stories of sorts, grouped by material and treatment. Nearly all were written in a hurry. Therefore they are fair samples. It is a pity that some relentless philanthropist cannot be induced to present this volume to every corporation head, university president, reputedly eminent lawyer, and American statesman with the proviso that it must be read from cover to cover. They would be the better, and wiser, for digesting it. For the hand of well-nigh everyone is turned against the reporter when he takes the trail of news. He is welcome only when a dull ax needs grinding. At other times and seasons he performs intelligence work in an enemy country. How the reporter does what he does as well as he does has ever been the secret marvel of the city desk that flings him forth into No Man's Land. Handicapped in every conceivable way, harassed by the entire gamut of interference—wind and weather, the remorseless clock hands that cannot be shoved back, glittering galaxies of lying statements, conscienceless misrepresentations so that he may be tricked into pandering to insatiate personal ambition, exaggerations petty and huge—he yet touches the spectrum of the news, in the main rarely color blind and, considering the hazardous task of separating the false from the true, rarely misrepresenting with deliberate flagrancy the essence of fact. Doctor, lawyer, merchant, chief—scramble them together, and it is a safe wager that their average content of ethical effectiveness is not one whit superior to that of the reporter.

All in all, Mr. Anthony deserves thanks. Yet the retired newsgatherer, repining as veterans do for the good old days, will regretfully wish that someone had been compiling "best" news stories in what Mr. Lawrence Perry delights to term "the golden nineties." There were giants in those days, men of—but no matter. At least one of them is represented in the volume—Mr. Lindsay Denison, of the Evening World, with his The Klan Holds a Klavern.

Miss Fannie Hurst never wrote anything quite as real as The Passing of Kid Dropper, which Mr. Louis Weitzenkorn covered for the New York World. If you read this when it was printed last August, probably you have forgotten it. Read it once more and see how a story rattled off in a hurry, on a rickety typewriter, can stand the ordeal of becoming cold.

Finally, at least six of the exhibits are the product of former students of the Pulitzer School of Journalism at Columbia University. This institution has been in existence only since 1912, which is not a bad omen.

ROBERT EMMET MACALARNEY

By-Products of Espionage

Two Royalist Spies of the French Revolution. By G. Lenotre. Translated from the French by Bernard Miall. Henry Holt and Company. $2.75.

MOST of the authors who have written about the French Revolution have portrayed martyrs, saints, and military heroes; this is the only book that sketches the career of a ludicrous buffoon—and yet there must have been many such. Louis Fauche-Borel was already a joke in his own age; Charles Nodier had his measure and several decades after the Revolution gave an amusing account of him in his "Souvenirs"; yet in some English studies of our own day Fauche-Borel is mentioned with respect as "head of the secret service of Louis XVIII during the Napoleonic regime." If any further deflation was necessary it came at the hands of G. Lenotre, who, several years ago, completed the book now translated into English. Out of forgotten dossiers in the archives of France M. Lenotre has constructed the portrait of this superb clown, this burlesque on human pomposity. The story is almost incredible; but it helps to explain the times, Louis XVIII, and even some of the political phenomena of our own day.

Merely to top off the high spots is unjust to this detailed study, but it is necessary. Fauche-Borel emerged from a small royalist imprimérie in Neuchâtel, in 1795, and his first mission was to attempt to bribe General Pichegru to combine his revolutionary Army of the Rhine with the royalist forces of the Prince of Condé. The notorious Comte de Montgaillard, a turncoat if ever there was one, had induced Fauche-Borel to undertake this mission. The latter was a bewildered, vainglorious sort, a small-town man suited to perform small-bore jobs, and so much a Simple Simon that he remained loyal throughout to the cause that he favored. This loyalty was played on by Perlet, another spy, who persuaded Fauche-Borel that he was a royalist, although actually he was in the employ of Veyrat, Napoleon's inspector-general of police. Perlet originated the preposterous hoax that Paris was the headquarters of a large secret royalist committee, and regularly kept Fauche-Borel, then in London, informed of its activities. Fauche-Borel, Louis XVIII, and the British cabinet swallowed the hoax, but when Perlet used it to obtain money the cabinet became wary; Fauche-Borel, however, dispatched his nephew Charles Vitel with a large sum to Paris. There Vitel was arrested as a spy, robbed by Perlet, and promptly shot. Eventually everyone seems to have known of the hoax except Fauche-Borel; it was not until he found himself turned away from the court after the restoration that he made inquiries. He brought suit against Perlet and had the latter disgraced, but failed to rehabilitate himself. In 1829, at the age of 67, he threw himself from the roof of a newly purchased hotel in Neuchâtel, a broken-hearted man.

There never was a royalist committee, not even the shadow of proof of one, and yet Louis XVIII and his entourage in England believed in it explicitly. Why? M. Lenotre takes pains to explain that hope, flattery, and ignorance of the true situation inspired this confidence. This leads us to suggest that methods have changed little; and so has human nature. We need only to point to the misinformation dispensed during the late war, and the fervor with which the public clung to its illusions and its chimeras. Nor need one feel that men like Veyrat, Perlet, Montgaillard, Fouché, and Fauche-Borel operated solely in an historic age; they were the antecedents of recent scoundrels and dupes who helped to poison the wells of information and to fill the national archives of all nations with tons of cooked-up "facts" of no value whatsoever. Consider, for instance, one of several incidents of which I had personal knowledge. In 1919, while I was attending the Paris peace conference as a newspaper correspondent, I visited a Negro congress called by W. E. Burghardt DuBois. An agent of the American government, in uniform, called on me the next day and wished to know the purpose of the meeting. I gave him the substance of certain resolutions adopted there which called for equal justice, order, and tolerance. "I know," he exclaimed, as he feverishly scribbled his notes, "starting a revolution, that's what they're doing. We'll get them. We'll revoke their passports." If his report helps encumber our national archives, it is my hope that the future historian will read it with the perspicacity with which M. Lenotre has read the Strange and Astounding Adventures of Fauche-Borel.

HARRY HANSEN

Books in Brief

The Forest Giant. By Adrien Le Corbeau. Translated by L. H. Ross. Harper and Brothers. $2.00.

How this book escaped being written seventy years ago for the Victorians is a mystery. Perhaps the submerged reader is still seventy dogged years behind, both here and in France, for certainly the book will be taken seriously, into several editions, by all lovers of outdoor sweetness and inner light who like nothing better than a cosmic subject applied for personal edification. The giant sequoia has always been better in actuality than in art, and this story of its life-cycle is no exception.

The Poetry of Architecture. By Frank Rutter. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

"To remold convictions in the light of added knowledge" is the announced purpose of the series in which this volume appears. Mr. Rutter comes far from doing any such thing. Here are all the old formulae of Ruskin's "Seven Lamps"—"the grandest book on architecture ever planned." We hear of "structural falsity," "mere masks," "insincerity." As architecture is "fitness expressed," Roman architecture and the modern steel building are "splendidly untruthful." There is not a hint that Wölfflin and Riegl have meanwhile written; not a hint that abstract relations of form and space have a value apart from fitness, that Roman and Baroque art have their own laws of being and are not to be judged by Greek or Gothic canons. The choice of examples and similes from buildings familiar to the English reader makes the book less useful to Americans, who might otherwise be intrigued by its easy style into some knowledge of the views of yesterday upon a subject often thought forbidding.

Drama

Mimicry and Realism

WHEN the curtain rises upon the empty scene of the first act of "Minick" (Booth Theatre) the eye catches in a fraction of a second a perfect vision of the standardized comfort and hackneyed elegance of the middle-class flat. An instant later a sound directs the attention to a distant corner and in an adjoining but just visible room one sees a serving maid, vigorously wiping forks and spoons in that state of vague indignation chronic with those who serve in the slightly disorganized households of the bourgeoisie. With a loud clatter she drops the pieces one by one into the open drawer of a buffet and the atmosphere of nervous irritation which the jangling generates completes the absolute verisimilitude of the picture. Then, in less than a quarter of a minute from the raising of the curtain, a ripple of laughter announces the fact that the audience has achieved a delighted recognition of itself and caught the spirit of the piece. "Minick" is a succession of such recognitions and the opening moment is its epitome.

Perhaps the word "mimicry" describes more accurately than the word "realism" the means by which such effects are obtained, and the relation of mimicry to art is indeed questionable. It is, perhaps, an extremely difficult trick rather than a supremely important artistic process, and it is trivial enough beside that deeper observation and subtler recording which, even while missing the familiar accent of everyday existence, reveals truths so hidden and so new as to seem at first sight strange rather than familiar. Mr. George Kaufman has, however, achieved perfection in his chosen field and there is no denying either the difficulty of his trick or the pleasure which it gives. He has taken from Miss Edna Ferber a story which he has saved from the sentimentality into which it threatens to fall, and he has lavished upon it a genius for the imitation of minutiae second only to the similar genius of Mr. Sinclair Lewis. Rarely in the course of the whole play does he fail to catch even the exact emphasis of a fact. Every speech seems the echo of a familiar voice, every contretemps awakens the memory of some personal discomfort, and the whole gives constantly the impression of something thoroughly familiar and yet never before entirely realized. It is no small thing not only to have transcribed with such fidelity the observations of a keen eye and an accurate ear, but to have known also just what in this observation was common to all New York so that each of a thousand spectators should see in father Minick something of his own father, in Mrs. Minick something of his own wife, and in the whole Minick household a routine of minor occurrences amusingly and embarrassingly like what he had vainly imagined to be the individual eccentricities of his own household. No transcendent genius perhaps was required, but something more than mere parroting was, for the mimicry is more than the mere mimicry of individuals. Contemporary life, at least in its externals, is seen as a pattern to which individual lives, in spite of all their apparent differences, conform, and this pattern is sketched firmly enough to fix itself in the mind of the audience and clearly enough to invite a criticism of itself. The laughter which it raises is neither troubled nor bitter, perhaps indeed it is occasionally facile; but in the main it is at ourselves, and laughter at ourselves is always worthy laughter because it is indubitable proof that the spirit of self-criticism is at work. "Minick," not being a great play, will offend nobody. It has sentiment enough to please the most sentimental and it is kindly enough to spare the feelings of the most tender, and yet with all it is in addition true enough to have, for those capable of feeling it, a gentle but salutary sting.

Mr. Kaufman and Miss Ferber approach art from one direction, while Mr. James Elroy Flecker attempts to reach it from another. The former begin with the vulgar elements of the popular drama and succeed by virtue of observation and sincerity in imbuing them with a measure of truth and significance; the latter takes hold of all the sacred paraphernalia of Serious Art and attempts, less successfully, to animate it with passion and life. His "Hassan" (Knickerbocker Theater) has indeed its moments of poetry, but on the whole its good intentions are more evident than its accomplishment. The producers seem to have been content to accept it as little more than the scenario for a spectacle, and, relying upon the fascination of costume and color, they have not been disturbed by the fact that the audience is not always sure whether the fine Oriental recklessness in the matter of the executions and torture is to be taken with a smile or a shudder. Thanks to a considerable amount of glitter to which a capable ballet contributes considerably, "Hassan" is not dull, but it never creates sufficient illusion to engage the emotions very deeply, and perhaps it is just as well that it does not, for physical horror, upon which it so largely depends for its attempted effects, is at best but an unsatisfactory substitute for genuine tragedy.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

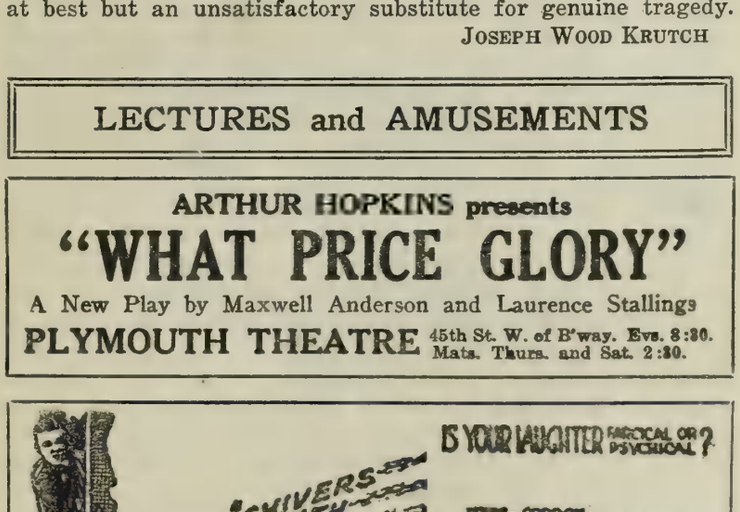
LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.



RAND SCHOOL

7 East 15th Street

Saturday afternoon lectures:

Oct. 25—1:30 P. M. ..... Morris Hillquit
"Socialism, Labor and the Progressive Movement"

Oct. 25—3:30 P. M. John Langdon-Davies
(Labor Candidate for House of Commons)
"Why Labor Rules England"

Nov. 1 ..... J. F. Horrabin
(Illustrator of Wells' "Outline of History")
"H. G. Wells and World's History"

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30, Debate, Clarence Darrow vs. Scott Nearing

The DEBATE of the CENTURY!

Is CAPITAL PUNISHMENT a Wise Public Policy?

Clarence S. DARROW says NO!

Famous Chicago Attorney in the Leopold-Loeb Case

VERSUS

Judge Alfred J. TALLEY says YES!

N. Y. Court of General Sessions

Chairman to be announced

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 26, 3 P. M.

MANHATTAN OPERA HOUSE, 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.

Tickets $1.65, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30, $4.40.

On sale at Box Office, all branches of Tyson's and McBride's Ticket Agencies, or at the offices of and by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. City. Longacre 4447-19435

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, send us their names.

The DEBATE of the SEASON!

SHOULD LITERATURE BE CENSORED?

JOHN S. SUMNER
Secretary, New York Society for Suppression of Vice

versus

ERNEST BOYD
Noted International Author and Critic

Chairman: CLIFFORD SMYTH, Editor, International Book Review

SUBJECT:

RESOLVED: That limitations upon the contents of books and magazines as defined in proposed legislation would be detrimental to the advancement of American literature.

Mr. BOYD, Affirmative Mr. SUMNER, Negative

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1924, AT 8:30 P. M.

TOWN HALL—West 43d St., near Sixth Ave.

Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75, 3.30 (war tax inc.)

On sale at Brentano's, Macy's Book Dept. and Wanamaker's Book Dept., and at the offices of or by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. City. Longacre 10434-4447

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, send us their names.

EXTRAORDINARY LECTURE!

"WHY TROTZKY HATES MacDONALD"

A frank exposition of the differences between the principles, aims and methods of the Labor Party of England and the Communist Party of Soviet Russia

by John Langdon-Davies

Labor Party Candidate for Parliament
Journalist, Oxford Lecturer
(First appearance in this country)

Sunday, October 19, 8:30 p. m.

Cooper Union, 4th Avenue and 8th St.

Tickets 75c. (plus war tax)

On sale at the offices of or by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 5th Ave. Tel. Longacre 10434-10435

DEBATE

SAMUEL UNTERMYER for vs.

MORRIS HILLQUIT for

DAVIS La FOLLETTE

CLARENCE DARROW will be Chairman

RESOLVED: that viewing the concrete circumstances of the pending election, the cause of sound progressive government will be best promoted by voting for LA FOLLETTE rather than DAVIS

Sunday Afternoon, October 12th
(COLUMBUS DAY) 2:30 P.M.

Madison Square Garden, 26th St. and Madison Ave.

TICKETS: 50c. and $1.00 (Reserved)

Auspices: NATIONAL LABOR FORUM

ON SALE: Rand School, 7 East 15th Street,
219 Sackman Street,
1167 Boston Road.
Tyson's and Gray's Ticket Agencies.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, OF

The Nation

Published weekly, Wednesday, at New York, N. Y., for October 1, 1924.

State of New York, County of New York, } ss.:

Before me, a Commissioner of Deeds in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Lewis S. Gannett, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the acting editor of The Nation and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:

Publisher—Oswald Garrison Villard, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

Editor—Oswald Garrison Villard, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

Managing Editor—Freda Kirchwey, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

Business Managers—None.

Acting Editor—Lewis S. Gannett, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

2. That the owner is: (If the publication is owned by an individual his name and address, or if owned by more than one individual the name and address of each, should be given below; if the publication is owned by a corporation the name of the corporation and the names and addresses of the stockholders owning or holding one per cent or more of the total amount of stock should be given).

The Nation, Inc.

Katherine S. Dreier, Central Park West, New York City.

Agnes Brown Leach, 160 East 64th Street, New York City.

Ellen McMurtrie, 1104 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mary McMurtrie, 1104 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Maria C. Scattergood, 355 Bourse Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

R. L. Selene, 334 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Fanny Garrison Villard, 525 Park Avenue, New York City.

Oswald Garrison Villard, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

Edward S. Waters, 52 William Street, New York City.

Maurice Wertheim, 44 Pine Street, New York City.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.)

None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

5. That the average number of copies of each issue of this publication sold or distributed, through the mails or otherwise, to paid subscribers during the six months preceding the date shown above is ———. (This information is required from daily publications only.)

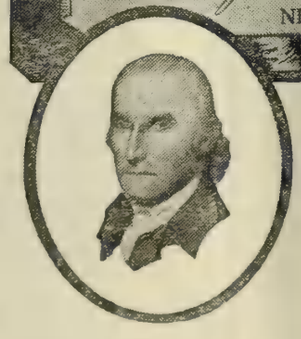
LEWIS S. GANNETT, Acting Editor.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 23rd day of September, 1924.

[Seal] Irene B. Cox.

Commissioner of Deeds for the City of New York.

(My term expires Oct. 17, 1924)



The Man Without a Home

BACK in 1680, Richard Floyd sailed from Wales to found a homestead on the south shore of Long Island.

Less than a hundred years later, his great-grandson, William, signer of the Declaration of Independence and Captain of the Suffolk militia, called out his friends and neighbors to protect that home from a shipload of his British cousins.

With martial aspect they drove the invaders back to the boats. But while William Floyd was with Congress in Philadelphia, the enemy came in force and the patriot's family barely escaped to Connecticut.

For seven years William Floyd strove for his country, while a troop of light cavalry used his home as a barracks.

Victory won, he returned from his long exile. Neighbors flocked about him with cheers; but his once luxurious estate stood despoiled to the naked core. He won a nation; but lost a home.

*

THE simplest estate you can leave your family is Monthly Income Life Insurance.

The Prudential issues this in various flexible and convenient forms to run as many years as you wish, or for the lifetime of your beneficiary. It is insurance that Insures the Insurance.

*

The little Prudential book of the fifty-six signers of the Declaration of Independence, and a copy of the Constitution of the United States, will be sent with our compliments, on your request.

Put a part of your savings into Life Insurance. It will be safe there; it will be sure to come back; and it will protect the home, and the family it shelters, even though you should have to leave them—before you have finally finished your great work. Life Insurance protects home builders.

THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF AMERICA

EDWARD D. DUFFIELD
President

HOME OFFICE: NEWARK
New Jersey

IF EVERY WIFE KNEW WHAT EVERY WIDOW KNOWS—EVERY HUSBAND WOULD BE INSURED

International Relations Section

China and Germany Settle Up

ALMOST immediately following the signature of the Russo-Chinese agreements (printed in last week's International Relations Section) Germany also reached an important economic agreement with the Peking Government. The text of these agreements, embodied in two letters signed by the Chinese Foreign Minister, is here reprinted from the Peking Daily News of July 14.

Peking, June 6, 1924

His Excellency,
MONSIEUR LE DR. BOYE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary for Germany, Peking.

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE:

I have the honor to inform Your Excellency in the name of my Government that the Chinese Government, in order to settle the affairs of the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank, has agreed on the following procedure:

1. The Chinese Government will return to the bank as soon as possible all books taken over from the bank as those kept during liquidation.

2. The Chinese Government will return to the bank its immovable properties, together with buildings erected thereon, at Peking and Hankow, free from incumbrances. As to its immovable properties in other parts of China which have been liquidated and for which the bank asks for compensation, the Chinese Government agrees to pay to the bank 1,950,000 Mexican dollars in Tientsin-Pukow and Hukuang Railway bonds.

3. Thereafter all claims of the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank against the Chinese Government and of the Chinese Government against the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank will be considered as paid, with the exception of the advance including interest given by the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank to the Chinese Government on the security of the unissued portion of the Tientsin-Pukow supplementary loan of 1910.

In order to settle this matter the Chinese Government undertakes to take all steps necessary to make the hypothecated bonds negotiable and, in special, to take up the respective loan service, with due regard to the interest accrued on the advance, on the day when the service of all Chinese government loans issued in Germany is resumed. If so desired by the Chinese Government, the bank will advance to the Chinese Government the funds necessary for the service of these bonds for one year commencing from the date of exchange of these notes. Interest on this additional advance will be paid half-yearly at the rate of 7 per cent per annum by the Chinese Government to the bank.

The repayment of the advances by means of these bonds or otherwise will be arranged by separate negotiations between the Chinese Government and the bank that are to begin forthwith, and the bank undertakes not to issue these bonds to the public until these negotiations have been concluded, but for no longer than one year after the exchange of these notes, unless otherwise agreed upon.

4. The Chinese Government is prepared to reinstate the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank into its pre-war status, including its functions as an issuing bank under the loan agreements, and will take steps to that effect, with the exception, however, of its functions under the Hukuang Railway Loan Agreement which will remain in abeyance for the present.

5. On the exchange of these notes the regulations relating to the liquidation of the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank will be withdrawn. The order not to pay the creditors of the bank will be withdrawn on the 31st of October, 1924.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to Your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

(Signed) V. K. WELLINGTON KOO

Peking, June 7, 1924

His Excellency,
MONSIEUR LE DR. BOYE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary for Germany, Peking.

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE:

I have the honor to inform Your Excellency in the name of my Government that the Chinese Government in further execution of the second paragraph of the notes of May 20, 1921, annexed to the Sino-German Agreement of the same date, has agreed on the following procedure:

1. The Chinese Government will release the whole of the outstanding balance of the German private property still withheld by China. The two governments agree that the total value of the property so released, together with the property released since 1921, is between 69 and 70 million Mexican dollars.

2. The German Government will pay to China the advance portion of the indemnity, being equivalent to one-half of the value of the released private property as under Article 1.

This payment is being made in the following way:

	Mexican Dollars
(a) Cash paid in 1921	4,000,000
(b) 15,000,000 Mexican dollars in railway bonds, viz.: Bonds of the 1908 Tientsin-Pukow Railway Loan of £400,000 nominal at 68 equal to £952,000 in market value at 8.421 Mexican dollars per pound sterling equal to	8,016,792
Bonds of the 1910 Tientsin-Pukow Railway loan £950,000 nominal at 66 equal to £627,000 in market value at 8.421 Mexican dollars per pound sterling equal to	5,279,967
	Bonds
Bonds of the 1911 Hukuang Railway Loan of £381,640 at 53 equal to £202,269.20 in market value at 8.421 Mexican dollars per pound sterling equal to	1,703,308.90
(c) at 8.421 Mexican dollars per pound sterling equal to £1,881,001 in drawn bonds and coupons due to June 15, 1924, of the Railway Loans mentioned under (b)	15,839,909.45

These payments amount to a total of....Mex.$34,839,977.35

3. As a final compensation for the balance of all claims of the Chinese Government, arising out of the war, the German Government undertakes to settle all outstanding claims of the German private individuals against the Chinese Government, except claims in connection with the service of the Chinese bonds.

4. The Chinese Government will issue a presidential mandate whereby the former declaration on the suspension of the service of the three Railway Loans mentioned in Article 2 (b) and of the Reorganization Loan is definitely canceled and the full service for them resumed. Coupons of the Reorganization Loan already due will be paid one month after the exchange of these notes except an amount of £1,087,768 of these coupons at 8.421 Mexican dollars per pound sterling equal to $9,160,-094.30—which the German Government will deliver to the Chinese Government for cancelation. Coupons and drawn bonds of the three Railway Loans due before October 1, 1924, being secured in accordance with the agreements relating to these loans, will be repaid at the rate of two coupons and one drawing per year on the dates provided for payment of coupons and drawn bonds by the respective agreements, commencing from October 1, 1924. Coupons and drawn bonds due on and after October 1, 1924, will be paid on respective due dates.

5. The execution of the obligations under Articles 1, 2, and 4 will take place simultaneously, not later than eight days

WANTED!

FOUR HUNDRED PICKED FIGHTING MEN AND WOMEN!

FOR years Bob La Follette and the men and women with whom he is waging war on reaction have been fighting for you!

THEY'VE got the enemy on the run now! But they need ammunition to keep rolling up the enemy. That ammunition is MONEY!

THOUSANDS of men and women in New York City are eager to supply those funds. They are waiting to meet with the smile of welcome and the flash of greenbacks those who will call on them for those funds. They are eager for the privilege of fighting for "Fighting Bob!"

FOUR hundred picked fighting men and women are to be given the honor, the privilege, the burden and the task of raising these funds.

LA FOLLETTE VICTORY BONDS are to be sold to the progressives of New York by these four hundred! Will you be one of the Four Hundred? We need you—the country needs you—Progress needs you—Humanity needs you—

RIP INTO REACTION—REPORT AT LA FOLLETTE WHEELER CAMPAIGN HEADQUARTERS

Room 1002

25 West 43rd Street

OXFORD BOOKS

A SHORT HISTORY OF INTERNATIONAL INTERCOURSE

By C. Delisle Burns — Net $1.75

A timely volume covering a period from the Beginnings of Peace in Europe to Since the Great War.

THE EUROPEAN STATES SYSTEM

By R. B. Mowat — Net $1.00

Deals with the relation to each other of the different States of Europe.

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN

By G. Elliot Smith — Net $2.85

"A work of first rate importance. As easy for the layman to read as Hendrik Van Loon's The Story of Mankind."—Burton Rascoe in New York Herald-Tribune.

THE ECONOMIC POSITION OF THE MARRIED WOMAN

By Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher — Paper cover, 50c

A brief summary of the improvements in the legal status of married women, with a consideration of what improvements have still to be made in their economic position.

A HISTORY OF THE TORY PARTY 1640-1714

By Keith Feiling — Net $6.00

The book pays a fine tribute to the lasting value to political theory of a party that contains the names of some of the greatest Englishmen of the 17th and 18th Centuries.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

American Branch

35 West 32nd St. New York City

SS

PIONEERS IN SHIPPING

LIEBESGABEN (Relief Shipments)

Assortments from $5.00 up

Make up your own Assortment from our Price List
Ask for our Price List G

All Orders and Shipments Delivered FREE HOUSE!

SELF-PACKED PACKAGES

are FORWARDED WEEKLY and at rates commensurate with efficient service.

American Merchants Shipping & Forwarding Co.

H. von Schuckmann C. E. W. Schelling

30 Years' Shipping Experience with Hamburg-American Line

OFFICES: 147 S—4th Ave., cor. 14th St., New York City

HAMBURG OFFICE—KLEINE ROSENSTRASSE 16

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c.
10 Tablets 40c.

Midol for HEADACHE

Portrayed Without Prejudice

How much do you know of what the Labor Party has done during its first year of office in England?

This experiment in new government by men with a new vision is beginning a fresh chapter in the political history of free peoples.

The Manchester Guardian

WEEKLY

is the one medium where the liberal minded person can get the gist of English politics in this most interesting period portrayed with the same spirit of truthfulness and impartiality that has distinguished The Manchester Guardian for more than a hundred years.

The Manchester Guardian Weekly, apart from its discussion of political news, is also a weekly review that keeps the intelligent reader in touch with new developments in literature, music, and the drama.

In short, THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY gives its readers in more than sixty different countries an accuracy of information and a freshness of viewpoint that help them to maintain an intelligent outlook on all vital matters.

MAIL COUPON BELOW

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England, commencing with the current issue.

Name.....

Address.....

after the exchange of these notes; coupons and drawn bonds mentioned above as well as the railway bonds as detailed in Article 2 (b) will be handed over to the Chinese Legation in London by the German Embassy in London in exchange against the official notification addressed by the Legation to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in London, communicating to the bank, on behalf of the Chinese Government, the presidential mandate as provided for in Article 4.

6. This agreement shall be considered as a final settlement of all outstanding claims of the Chinese Government against the German Government and nationals, and of Chinese nationals against the German Government, as well as of all outstanding claims of the German Government against the Chinese Government and nationals and of the German nationals against the Chinese Government, provided always that they originated before July 1, 1921.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to Your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

(Signed) V. K. WELLINGTON KOO

Divorces and Suicides in Germany

MORE than twice as many couples are now being divorced each year in Germany than was the case before the war, according to figures published in Wirtschaft und Statistik (Berlin) for June 15, 1924. The number of divorces and the rate of divorce per 100,000 inhabitants are given as follows:

Year	Number of divorces	Rate per 100,000
1913	17,835	26.8
1914	17,740	26.2
1915	10,791	15.9
1916	10,494	15.5
1917	11,603	17.7
1918	13,344	20.6
1919	22,022	35.0
1920	36,542	59.1
1921	39,216	62.9
1922	36,548	59.6

Analysis of these figures shows the greatest frequency of divorce in the cities of Berlin, Hamburg, Bremen, and Lubeck, in industrial Saxony and in Schleswig-Holstein. In every part of the Reich, however, the divorce rate was markedly higher in 1922 than in 1913. The divorce rate increased also both among those who had been married a short period and among those who had been long married, even among those married more than twenty-five years. But the relative increase was greatest among those married from one to four years, i.e., among the war marriages and early post-war marriages. The proportion of cases in which the man was declared the guilty party in 1922 was about the same as in 1913, 54 per cent; but in 1919, the first post-war year, the woman was held guilty in 55 per cent of the cases, and in 1920 the two sexes stood equal.

Suicides have not increased in similar proportion, but there are certain interesting parallels between the divorce and suicide figures. (The latter are given in Wirtschaft und Statistik for July 1.) The war brought a sharp drop in suicides as in divorces; whereas in 1913 15,564 suicides were recorded in Germany, the number fell sharply in 1915, and in 1918 was below 10,000 (possibly suicides in the field were not recorded), but in 1919 the figure rose to 11,555; in 1920 it jumped to 13,372; in 1921 it was 12,764; and in 1922 the total rose again, to 13,402. This was at the rate of 21.9 per 100,000 inhabitants; the 1913 rate, however, was higher still, 23.5. The suicide rate was highest in precisely those parts of the Reich where the divorce rate was highest—highest in Berlin, next in Hamburg; with Brunswick, Bremen, Saxony, and Schleswig-Holstein following in that order. It is also interesting to note that whereas before the war there were 34 women suicides to every 100 men suicides, this figure leaped to 62.6 in 1919, the year when women played a larger role than men in giving grounds for divorce. The figure declined to 54 in 1920 and to 46 in 1922.

Contributors to This Issue

SINCLAIR LEWIS is the author of "Main Street," "Babbitt," "Dr. Arrowsmith," and other books.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL is a Chicago lawyer.

DEVERE ALLEN is on the editorial staff of the World Tomorrow.

HARRY HANSEN, literary editor of the Chicago Daily News, is the author of "Mid-west Portraits."

KUNO FRANCKE is professor-emeritus of German literature in Harvard University.

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL is assistant professor of economics at Columbia University and editor of several volumes on economic subjects.

ROBERT EMMET MACALARNEY has been city editor of the New York Evening Post, New York Evening Mail, and New York Tribune.

La Follette's Record

A few hundred copies of the reprint of Arthur Warner's three articles on La Follette's Record are still available.

Single copies, 10 cents
12 copies, $1.00
100 copies, 5.00

Free with a new subscription, if you mention it.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1924 No. 3094

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 429
EDITORIALS:
- Ramsay MacDonald's Achievement 432
- Mr. Fosdick and the Presbyterians 433
- Pedagogues in Revolt 433
- Anatole France 434

THE WINNING OF THE WEST. By Oswald Garrison Villard 435
BE BRISK WITH BABBITT. By Sinclair Lewis 437
THE BANKER SAVES THE FARMER. By Paul Harwood Millar 439
"POLITICS AIN'T WHAT IT WAS." By William Hard 441
"BROTHER CHARLEY." By Paul Y. Anderson 442
OCTOBER END. By William A. Norris 444
AUTUMN, FORSAKE THE HILLS. By Frank Ernest Hill 444
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 444
CORRESPONDENCE 444
BOOKS:
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 446
- Spiritual Adventures. By Joseph Wood Krutch 447
- The Value of a Survey. By Clara M. Smertenko 447
- The History of British Labor. By Herbert W. Horwill 448
- Spain's Chinese Revolution. By Roy Temple House 448
- A Successor of Conrad? By Rose Lee 449
- Human Conduct. By John B. Watson 449
- Music and Musicians. By Henrietta Straus 449
- Books in Brief 450

DRAMA:
- Melodrama and Aspirations. By Joseph Wood Krutch 450

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- General Hertzog's Policy. By M. B. D. 452
- Savinkov's Story 452

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Managing Editor Literary Editor

ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager

Contributing Editors

ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IT WAS NOT LA FOLLETTE who originated the charge of a great Republican slush fund, beginning with $600,000 in Pennsylvania. It was the New York Times. Senator La Follette read at Scranton a dispatch from the Washington bureau of the Times of October 6, declaring that

> Last week hurried conferences on the subject of finances as well as organization were held by the party leaders here and in New York. Chairman Butler conferred with E. T. Stotesbury, the Philadelphia partner of Morgan and Co., and plans were immediately set afoot in Pennsylvania by W. T. Mellon of Pittsburgh and Joseph R. Grundy of Philadelphia to raise $600,000 in that State for use elsewhere.

Joseph R. Grundy himself supplied evidence. Thousands of copies of a letter bearing his signature were sent out from Philadelphia on October 2, appealing for funds. The letterhead bears the legend "Ways and Means Committee of the Republican National Committee for Pennsylvania (Outside Pittsburgh District), Joseph R. Grundy, chairman-treasurer." (Presumably the Mellons arrange for the money in Pittsburgh.) Edward T. Stotesbury appears on this letterhead as chairman of the executive committee, and on the executive committee are Samuel Vauclain, president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works; S. D. Warriner, president of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Co. and leader of the anthracite operators; Bayard Henry, a director of the Pennsylvania Railroad; Ira J. Williams, chairman of the board of the F. H. White Co. and of the Ajax Metal Co.; John Gribbel, director of a score of banks, electricity, gas, and power companies; the Countess de Santa Eulalia, whoever that stalwart Republican may be; and Mrs. Cyrus H. K. Curtis.

A CHORUS OF REPUBLICAN ABUSE greeted La Follette's reading of the Times dispatch and the Grundy letter. Denunciation of the Senator was as bitter as the letter itself, which demanded dollars to defeat La Follette and Wheeler, "a Lenine and Trotzky with a formidable band of followers made up of the vicious, ignorant, and discontented element" who would "likely cast millions of votes next November, perhaps enough to defeat the Republican Party." One of the Mellons said the story was "just a lie." Bascom Slemp, the President's postoffice salesman, said it was "pure fabrication." But the New York Evening Post blurted out the truth. Cyrus H. K. Curtis owns the Post, and the names of his wife and some of the directors of his publishing company appear at the head of the Grundy letter. He ought to know something about it. And this is what his paper says:

> . . . Republicans are now raising money for the defeat of La Folletteism and all its ways and works. La Follette says Pennsylvania will raise $600,000 and New York $1,000,000.
>
> Possibly. Since these are wealthy States, densely populated, and because from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 usually go into the legitimate expenses of a national campaign, these figures are not alarming. Doubtless they will, as they should, be raised.

The treasurer of the New Jersey Republican State Committee is quoted in the friendly New York Herald-Tribune as saying that the 1924 quota of that State is $500,000, $200,000 more than the 1920 quota. Where is the money coming from? How is it used?

MR. HUGHES, who talked until he lost the campaign of 1916, is complaining because this election may be thrown into Congress. Mr. Hughes takes a long leap in logic when he says that "the question is whether the endeavor to defeat the election of a President and to establish minority control of our Government shall succeed." By "defeating the election of a President" Mr. Hughes means merely keeping Calvin Coolidge out of the White House. Mr. Hughes himself does not believe that Mr. Coolidge will have a popular majority at the polls. If Mr. Coolidge were by mischance elected it would be by a minority vote; no one of the three candidates expects an outright popular majority over the two others. If a coalition in Congress should elect either La Follette or Davis in the House, or either Wheeler or Bryan in the Senate, that coalition would represent a popular majority opposed to Coolidge. Even the election of Charles W. Bryan would seem a godsend if it saved the country from four years of Coolidge or Dawes.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, editor of The Nation, is at the moment making speeches for La Follette in the West. To him comes a letter from Carl W. Riddick, national organizer of the National Republican League, stating that it is addressed to him "after careful inquiry as to party loyalty and individual responsibility," adding:

> Unscrupulous traitors, masquerading as Republicans and widely heralded as Republicans, have aligned themselves with those destructive forces that are now striving to disrupt our form of government and substitute for it the wild-eyed fanaticisms evolved by the insane Reds and Revolutionists of darker-than-ever Russia. . . .The National Republican League is fighting these bush-whacking bandits wherever they may hail from and whoever they may be, but to maintain this holy warfare militantly it must have you and your influence with it. . . . To be a trifle blunt let me say that I hope you will sign the enclosed pledge slip and return it with your check.

The gentleman—or lady—who composed those stirring phrases for Mr. Riddick had a talent for writing, but Mr. Riddick had better hire a new assistant to make "careful inquiry" into the "party loyalty" of those to whom his letters go.

SOMEONE WITH A PREWAR SENSE of the proprieties appears to have been much upset by the discovery that Mr. Thomas Lamont of the firm of J. P. Morgan and Company ventured to write a letter to the diplomats in London advising them what terms to make if they wanted a fat loan made to Germany. Our ambassador extraordinary, Mr. Kellogg, however, apparently succeeded in keeping the letter off the record. Accordingly the letter has been suppressed, though the striking international success of the $200,000,000 loan would indicate that the advice was taken. Why anyone should be indignant in 1924 because a banker advises a statesman in straightforward terms is beyond our understanding. Mr. Lamont represents one of the Great Powers of the world; a note from him is of more importance even than a dissertation on liberty by Mr. Mussolini, and he is likely to be vastly better informed. The House of Morgan is more than American, it is an international power, with alliances in England and elsewhere. Its aid has become almost as necessary to a solution of the Franco-German conflict as that of the French Government itself. Indeed, to a degree it controls that Government. Herriot, before he came to power, dared attack the Morgan loan; once in office, he set about renewing it. When "the League" saves Austria or Hungary it is with aid from Mr. Lamont's firm. The Dawes Plan will not become a working reality without its aid. Money rules; and he knows how it rules. His notes are likely to be worth reading.

THAT PROTOCOL prepared at the League Assembly "for the pacific settlement of international disputes" turns out, upon the arrival of the complete text, to be a distressingly long, wordy, and repetitive document. Cautious diplomacy forced the insertion of endless qualifications and verbal compromises. It is, plainly, an attempt to enforce peace among the members of the League. The complicated machinery utilized, in which the Council of the League plays a dominant part, is not such as will facilitate the participation of non-members of the League; and they are not invited to join in this mutual-security pact. They are, however, invited to attend a new international conference for the reduction of armaments to be called next June if a sufficient number of states meanwhile ratify the protocol. The United States is not likely to sign any such document as this; but if discussion of this protocol leads to a concrete program of international disarmament this country cannot stand aloof.

GERMANY IS SLOWLY EMERGING from a prolonged political crisis. The elections of May 4 gave the central bloc—which included the Social Democrats, the Democrats, the Centrists (Catholic), and the so-called People's Party, but excluded Communists at the Left and Nationalists and Racialists at the Right—a bare majority. Persistent attempts have been made to force out the Socialists and bring the Nationalists into a governing bourgeois bloc. The Nationalists, however, made that difficult by their refusal as a party to accept the Dawes Plan. When it came, in August, to a vote, they split, enough voting for the enabling laws to give the necessary two-thirds majority. Their entrance into the Cabinet then seemed imminent. The Government announced that Germany did not accept sole responsibility for the war, and that it would so inform the Allies. This announcement was heralded as a victory for the Nationalists. But French, British, and Belgian diplomats in Berlin immediately called at the Foreign Office bearing heavy loads of advice. Marx saw the point; Stresemann still thumped upon the table; but after a partial election in Upper Silesia showed heavy losses for both Nationalist and Communist extremes and a strong tide toward the center parties, moderation won in Berlin too. Stresemann swallowed his anger; the Cabinet remains as it was; and the German Government, apparently in good favor even in Paris, is to be given a front seat among the permanent members of the Council of the League.

RADICH IS BACK—that strange "Gandhi of the Balkans," the powerful peasant leader of Croatia. Radich is undisputed leader in his own country; and he insists upon Croatia's right to republican autonomy within the Serb-Croat-Slovene kingdom. Croatia, he says, has never accepted the federal principle. Regularly, at every election, Croatia has given him an overwhelming majority; and the elected deputies, almost as regularly, have refused to take the oath of allegiance and to sit in Parliament. Pachich, the wily war-time leader of the Serbs, first invited Radich to sit in the Cabinet; then, when he refused, charged Radich with treason—and indeed he had never hesitated to speak his mind, even to urge his followers to refuse military service. Radich defied Pachich for a time, then crossed the border. He talked with Herriot in Paris; he passed months in London; he went to Moscow for several weeks as the guest of the Soviet Government, and took part as delegate of his party in the meetings of the Red Peasants' International. Now, with Pachich out of office, he has returned, and his followers form part of the bloc which maintains the Davidovich Government in office. He still demands the autonomy of the Croatian Republic, and his people still reverence him as no other Balkan statesman is today reverenced. But the Serbs have not forgiven him his taunts, or forgotten that they waged the war as Allies while Croatian legions fought against them.

CHIEF OF POLICE TRACEY of Paterson, New Jersey, has at least called attention to the long-drawn fight of the Paterson strikers organized in the Associated Silk Workers. By threatening to deport as Reds some 235 aliens, by refusing to allow the strikers to assemble and then using violence to break up a test meeting before the city hall, by a wildly undiscriminating use of nightsticks and arrests, the chief of police has turned the eyes of the public on a battle that has long gone unnoticed. The silk mills of Paterson have seen many conflicts. The present strike involves a small proportion of the men, organized in an independent union, demanding, primarily, changes in the number of looms tended by each worker. The issue means little to the public; but the struggle transcends its immediate cause. The mayor of Paterson twice attempted a settlement by calling a conference among the workers, the employers, and representatives of the public. The workers met with the mayor, but the employers refused either to discuss the issue or to meet the union. The mayor then washed his hands of the whole business, according to his own announcement; but he took steps, none the less, toward the deportation of the foreign-born workers. Meanwhile the chief of police had closed to strikers the hall where they had met peaceably for many weeks. The Civil Liberties Union organized a test meeting, and the arrests and police brutality followed. A small strike has, through the stubborn pugnacity of the employers and later through the lawless threats and violence of city officials, become a fight for human rights.

WHILE THE NATIONAL CITY BANK informs the public in its September bulletin that "the improvement in business sentiment noted in the latter part of July became more widespread during August and, in the main, has been supported by changes in the industrial situation," the Bureau of Labor Statistics measures more accurately the extent of that improved "sentiment."

> Employment in manufacturing industries in August showed an increase over July of 0.2 per cent. This is the first increase shown in this series of monthly comparisons since March.

An increase of two-tenths of one per cent! Compared with the statistics of August, 1923, there is a "decrease in 1924 of 15 per cent in employment, a decrease of 17.2 per cent in payroll totals, and a decrease of 2.6 per cent in per capita earnings." The Russell Sage Foundation has made public some of its findings of a five-year inquiry into the subject of unemployment. It states that from 10 to 12 per cent of all the workers in the United States are continuously out of employment and that each year from 1,000,000 to 6,000,000 persons are out of work for weeks and sometimes months at a time.

> Widespread unemployment [it says] is now a constant phenomenon, with far reaching economic, social, psychological, and moral bearings.

But the New York Times gravely assures us that the problem is not really serious until there are "six million workers without jobs, or nearly 20 per cent of the country's wage-earners."

BREAD AND CLOTHES, milk and money—these unofficial diplomats which America has sent into Germany have, more than anything else, helped to offset the efforts of official diplomacy and to establish relations of friendliness between the two peoples. In America at least the active aid to Germany has created good feeling; it is almost impossible to hate a people you are helping. Only recently a new effort has been organized in this country which consciously combines the purposes of relief and internationalism. A Christmas Ship of Friendship is being fitted and loaded with food and clothing and sent to Germany as an expression of friendship from "the women of America." Actually the group that is sending it and appealing for help is made up of women well known for their fine spirit of international good-will during the hard years that have passed. They recognize the need for more effort during the coming winter particularly for that "large group of self-respecting people in Germany whose pride has prevented them from receiving the aid that they desperately need." (Recent figures report 40 per cent of all German school children still undernourished.) The cargo of the Ship of Friendship will be distributed through the German churches. Money should be sent to the Women's Church Committee, 105 East 22nd Street, New York; gifts of used clothes are being packed at 1521 Cherry Street, Philadelphia.

JOHN GOLDEN sends us a circular letter in which he ingeniously reveals both the goodness of his heart and the fact that he regards playwriting only as a legitimate and very profitable business. Having, so he confides, become prosperous, he wishes to express his gratitude to the Theater; but he can think of no plan better than one "to help others profit in the same way" that he has done. Accordingly he has set aside $100,000 to finance a nation-wide play contest and obtained the services of one hundred and ninety-two editors and critics to read the trainloads of manuscripts submitted. It would be difficult to find any document more completely the product of all the combined illusions of the marketplace than the little pamphlet which he has issued to explain the plan and aims of the contest: Since playwriting is regarded as an honorable trade there are certain negative conditions. The plays must, for example, be "clean" and they must not contain anything "of a salacious or sex nature"; but aside from this the only recognized criterion of success is the box-office returns. Mr. Golden hopes to confer upon us no blessing greater than another "Turn to the Right" or "Thank U." His motives are the best, but we very much fear that from the mountain of manuscripts produced only a mouse of a play will emerge—even if, by a stroke of luck, it manages to be one which, like some of his own pieces, will roar like a lion on Broadway.

EVEN NEW YORKERS cheered when the Senators won. They were getting a bit bored with pennants, after three years in which the world's series had been fought out between two New York teams. More than that, most New Yorkers are fresh-water-born, and even when they have learned to love the subway they still hide somewhere within themselves that jealousy of the nation's greatest city which makes the whole country root for the other side whenever New York's honor is at stake. Washington had to win this year to prove the romance of baseball. Not the scandal of greedy players alone but the disillusioning fact that the city of the greatest gate receipts had seemed able by sheer power of money to command the ablest teams worked against sympathy with the Gothamites. "Muggsy" McGraw has been putting too much science in baseball for too many decades; the fans were sick of his science. In the triumph of "Bucky" Harris, the boy player-manager, and of Walter Johnson, the dogged veteran who had played eighteen years of major-league baseball waiting for his world's series, they found what they needed to restore their faith in the great American game.

Ramsay MacDonald's Achievement

RAMSAY MACDONALD governed, but he never ruled. England's first Labor Government held office by permission of the Liberal Party, for the general election of December, 1923, produced a House of Commons without a majority. Labor took the helm because the Liberals preferred to support it rather than the Tories. MacDonald had to work with a House composed of 257 Conservatives,

192 Laborites,
158 Liberals,
5 Independents,
3 Nationalists and Sinn Feiners.

From the start, therefore, the Labor Government was hobbled. It knew that it could adopt no strictly Labor measures against the united Liberal and Conservative parties. England, putting it in office, was trying a cautious experiment, testing Labor's fitness to govern.

Labor has been tried for nine months—and not found wanting. Its is a record of accomplishment, with some mistakes and omissions, but an amazingly impressive record for so short a term in office. Let us summarize it:

Foreign Policy. 1. It has restored the atmosphere of peace to Europe. When it came in Poincaré was shrieking at Germany, throttling her with his grip upon the Ruhr. It is Ramsay MacDonald's accomplishment that France and Germany have begun to think as neighbors with common interests to work out, instead of as enemies. He began by astonishing Poincaré with his determined friendliness. He leaves office with the Franco-British breach largely healed, the Dawes Plan accepted on both sides of the Rhine, evacuation by the French troops begun, and Germany's admission into the League on a parity with France and England agreed upon. This is a massive achievement which already ranks MacDonald as one of England's great foreign ministers.

2. The Labor Government recognized Russia without conditions and then proceeded to negotiate a detailed treaty. The Russians recognized the claims of British holders of Russian bonds and agreed to further negotiations on the terms of settlement. The British Government promised that, following the signing of a second treaty embodying these terms, it would support a loan to enable Russia to meet her obligations. The present treaty also facilitates British trade with Russia and gives the British fishing fleet privileges in Russian waters.

3. Ramsay MacDonald opened the Fifth Assembly of the League of Nations in Geneva with an insistent plea for universal arbitration as the path to disarmament, and his determination was responsible for the calling of a world-wide disarmament conference.

Imperial Policy. 1. Imperial preference in tariff duties was abolished.

2. The Labor Government honorably insisted upon carrying out the pledge made to the Irish Free State in the 1921 treaty to appoint commissioners to negotiate a readjustment of the Ulster frontier. In forcing this measure through against bitter Die-Hard opposition Labor had warm Liberal support.

3. Immediately upon assuming office Ramsay MacDonald warned India that "no party in Britain will be cowed by threats of force or by policies designed to bring the Government to a standstill"; and during his term in office the Indian question has remained in suspense.

4. No progress has been made toward settlement of the questions reserved for later settlement when the British protectorate was withdrawn from Egypt in 1922. Labor has been as insistent as its predecessors upon retaining control of the Sudan and maintaining its troops in Egypt.

5. In general, Labor has made small change in imperial policy. Mr. Leach, the Under Secretary for Air, in admitting that bombing airplanes were still employed against the natives in Irak, declared: "I cannot honestly say that we have made any change in the policy of the late Government."

Domestic Policy. 1. The army and navy estimates were cut £10,000,000 in a total of more than £100,000,000; the project of constructing a great naval base at Singapore was dropped; the plan to build five new cruisers was continued, despite the opposition of the Liberals, partly as a measure against unemployment.

2. Mr. Snowden's budget abolished almost all the remnants of war-time protection; the McKenna duties on automobiles, musical instruments, clocks, and cinema film were dropped, and the food duties—on sugar, tea, coffee, cocoa, dried fruits, etc.—were cut in half or more.

3. A comprehensive education program was announced, including restoration of the national university scholarships abolished by the preceding Ministry.

4. A large-scale housing program, providing for state subsidization of the construction of 2,500,000 houses in fifteen years, was introduced; and the unemployment and old-age insurance schedules were liberalized.

5. The capital-levy plan was virtually dropped, there being no possibility of its adoption; a mines-nationalization bill was presented to Parliament, with full realization that it would be defeated.

That is the major part of the record of the Labor Government in its nine months of office. The Government fell on a question of minor importance, a hostile resolution for an inquiry into its conduct in dropping prosecution of a Communist charged with sedition. This was the occasion, not the reason, for the end. After the nine-months' truce politicians like Lloyd George and Winston Churchill were eagerly straining at the leash, longing for another battle at the polls.

How will Britain vote on October 29? The prophets foretell a gain for both Labor and the Conservatives at the expense of the Liberals—unless the Tories and Liberals join forces where Labor won three-cornered contests a year ago. Labor's progress for a quarter century has been stirring; it has made this amazing record:

Election of	Seats in Parliament	Total Vote
1900	2	62,698
1906	29	323,195
1910 (January)	40	505,690
1910 (December)	42	370,802
1918	57	2,244,945
1922	142	4,236,733
1923	192	4,348,379

Even so, Labor's last vote represented only a third of the electorate; it cannot expect at one leap to reach a majority. But England's electors must recognize the luster of Labor's record as contrasted with the dulness of Bonar Law and Baldwin and the shifty insincerity of Lloyd George. It has given other peoples as well a new confidence in Labor's capacity to govern. To the disillusioned post-war world it brought the first promise of dawn.

Mr. Fosdick and the Presbyterians

BACK of the widespread interest in Dr. Fosdick and his relations to the Presbyterian Church is something more than the usual human interest in a conflict. There is a deeper human interest in religion to which Mr. Fosdick has appealed to a quite unusual degree.

Harry Fosdick, a Baptist clergyman, as the regular preacher in the First Presbyterian Church of New York illustrated a practical kind of church unity. His ministry was most acceptable to the church and his eloquence attracted larger audiences than could be seated in the pews. This satisfactory arrangement might have lasted indefinitely had not Mr. Fosdick's modernism drawn the fire of both Baptist and Presbyterian Fundamentalists. The New York Presbytery refused to act against Mr. Fosdick, but last May the General Assembly, which is the highest court of the Presbyterian Church, fell under control of the Fundamentalists. Having captured the machinery of the Assembly they found constitutional difficulties in the way of the immediate drastic action some of their leaders had threatened. This reason, combined with the impressive defense of Mr. Fosdick offered by the New York Presbytery and his own high reputation, brought it to pass that those who had come to throw him out of the church ended by asking him formally to enter its ministry. Thus, they felt, they might put him under discipline.

Mr. Fosdick himself, as a Baptist, had never made any such creedal profession as is required of Presbyterian clergymen. On principle he was opposed not so much to the Presbyterian standards as to formal subscription to any ancient creed. As a man of honor he naturally felt a peculiar reluctance to swallow his objections in order to hold his pulpit. This position he has frankly and courteously made clear to his church and to the New York Presbytery. The Presbytery left the initiative to the First Church, and the church will give him up with great reluctance. But since Mr. Fosdick will not consent to become the center of a church quarrel it is virtually certain that his eloquence will no longer draw great crowds to the beautiful old First Church, and a valuable experiment in church unity will be at an end.

The situation goes beyond praise or blame of individuals. There is a logical case for the Fundamentalists in insisting that ancient creeds mean what to the plain man they seem to say, and that too free or symbolic an interpretation of them threatens intellectual integrity. There is also certainly a case for Mr. Fosdick's refusal to bind himself by a creed; for him to do so would be to fall short of his highest convictions. At the bottom of this whole tangle is a question far wider than the Presbyterian denomination. It is the question of the essential nature of Christianity and the place in it of time-honored creeds. On that question good men will continue to differ. But even Fundamentalists, as also those who find even Mr. Fosdick's free-spirited religion no adequate solution to the mysteries of life, will unite in the desire that his message of hope and comfort may be heard regularly in one of the pulpits of New York where are so many eager seekers after the truth that shall make us free.

Pedagogues in Revolt

NEW YORK CITY'S school authorities did not welcome the proposal of the Teachers Union that an experimental school be established within the public school system. The Board of Superintendents and the Board of Education decided that the proposed school would be contrary to law. No opinion was expressed by the board members as to the importance of the plan or as to the possibility of a change in the law.

This kind of quibbling and evasion of fundamental educational issues is only natural. It has become increasingly clear within recent years that those in charge of our schools are less interested in education than in administering the educational machine. Problems of school financing, salary schedules, statistics of grading and promotion, building programs, part- or full-time instruction, and more recently the bright discoveries of innumerable scale-makers and standardizers—these are the familiar and natural objects of interest and discussion wherever school men foregather to decide upon school policy. The administrator-politician has become adept in shutting off all discussion of theories of education. Current educational controversy has to do with appointments, or with propaganda to be introduced into the schools. As an instance of the latter, witness the effort of the United States Bureau of Education to help the American Legion turn National Education Week into a wholesale heresy-hunting junket.

But the growing amount of space given in press and periodicals to the "new schools" is evidence of a changing public sentiment. The increase in prestige and influence of such organizations as the Teachers Union shows that the workers within the ranks are also caught with the spirit of revolt. Seasoned old-timers of the classroom, inured to years of dragooning children through the preordained intricacies of the course of study, nodded approvingly when at a recent conference called by the union and its auxiliary Mrs. Marietta Johnson urged the banishment of school desks from the school-room and the postponement of formal work in the three R's to a much later period. It is this new social consciousness which may be counted upon to invade the administrator-dominated school system and eventually make its way through the teachers to the seat of power. Ultimately, even so radical a proposal as a free experimental school in a public-school system will be seriously entertained.

The Teachers Union with refreshing candor is outlining the problems to be met before experimental schools can be established with success. First, there will be the cost of such schools, which must necessarily be greater than that of the conventional sort; second, the scarcity of teachers intelligent and resourceful enough for so elastic a type of education; third, the static attitude of the members of educational supervising staffs; fourth, the probably organic connection between the creative activity movement in education and the evolution of a new social order. The Union had best tread softly on this latter point. If the schools should develop in children initiative or creative intelligence, where in a decade or two would the pedagogue-politician look for a job?

Anatole France

IT is a rare thing in any age for a man to be accepted as "the world's greatest living man of letters." Yet who was there to dispute that distinction with Anatole France? Shaw or Hardy? Gorky or Brandes or Hauptmann? Anatole France stood alone; and part of his eminence was due to the fact that he was so much more than a "man of letters." What he wrote of Chateaubriand might be written of himself: "The subtlety of the thought never disturbs the simplicity of the style. Nothing reveals the man of letters, which is a delight." Critic, historian, philosopher, novelist, he believed that "criticism, like philosophy and history, is a kind of novel for the use of discreet and curious minds; and every novel, rightly speaking, is an autobiography. The good critic is he who relates the adventures of his soul among masterpieces." The autobiography of Anatole France, the adventures of his soul among masterpieces and mediocrities, recorded in twoscore volumes, were great adventures.

His father was a bookseller, the son of an Anjou shoemaker; his mother was of bourgeois Flemish extraction. This father, François Noël Thibault—the son adopted his father's nickname as a surname when writing—had learned to read and write after he was twenty, while serving in King Charles's army; but he made himself a scholar, and the shop in which Anatole grew up was a center for an ardent group of defenders of a Lost Cause, the cause of the old monarchy. Anatole came to disagree with almost every one of his father's ideas, but he had learned from him not to run with the mob.

Anatole France seems always to have loved reason, yet known that men must live on illusion. He was young when he wrote: "The works that are least vain were created by those who best saw the vanity of all things. One must pay in sadness and desolation for the pride of having thought." He was old when he wrote: "I love truth. I believe that mankind needs it; but certainly it has still more need of the illusion which flatters it, consoles it, and gives it infinite hopes. Without illusion it would perish of despair and ennui." He was in his middle years when his Abbé Coignard concluded his instruction of Jacques Tournebroche: "Listen to what I tell you, my son. Truths discovered by the mind are sterile. Only the heart can make its dreams flower. It puts life into what it loves. It is feeling which sows the seeds of good in the world. The mind has not that power. . . . If you would serve mankind, put reason aside as a burden, and mount on the wings of enthusiasm. He who thinks will never fly."

So, doubting even his own doubts, he found a happiness denied to those who hope more violently and accordingly suffer more bitter disappointment. Men who believe too much in their own theories of goodness, he saw, do the most harm in the world. "The folly of the Revolution was that it sought to establish goodness on earth. He who seeks to make men good and wise, moderate and generous, inevitably ends wishing to kill them all. Robespierre believed in goodness; he made the Terror." France's mellow skepticism permitted him a rich gusto in living which is seldom combined with so urbane an intelligence. No one ever more perfectly married playfulness to melancholy. Epicurus and Saint Francis of Assisi were his heroes. There was in him an almost Rabelaisian earthiness, an Attic sunniness, a Latin lucidity, and the profound learning combined with creative imagination which are the property of the greatest historians—and he wrote with a perfection of language and cadence which is the despair of the schoolmen.

All the more amazement, therefore, when this skeptic scholar-artist plunged into the furnace of the Dreyfus Affair. It is difficult today to realize the smug bitterness of France a quarter-century ago, when Zola wrote his "J'accuse" and Anatole France, who had been elected to the Academy as safer than an anti-clerical, signed the Protestation des Intellectuels. That long struggle against the intrenched power of army and church convulsed the French Republic. It was as if a Catholic Ku Klux Klan held, undisputed, every office of state; and a handful of radicals set themselves against it. Anatole France left his study to preside at workingmen's meetings, to hail the opening of cooperative stores, to denounce the power of church and army. His polemic speeches and writings alone—apart from the more permanent satire—fill two thick volumes. He never lost this interest in politics. When he was within a few days of seventy-five he came out of his study to march under red flags in the working-class protest against the acquittal of Jaurès's assassin. Visitors to his hillside home in Touraine, dreaming in the peace of his eighteenth-century garden, were amazed to see a sudden flash in the old man's eyes when he turned from literature to politics.

There are contradictions in his writing. His mind was too large and too open not to record contrary moods, and he had not sufficient vanity to care for consistency. "Just as a large country has various climates," he once wrote, "so a generous mind must include numerous contradictions. To tell the truth, those who never contradict themselves frighten me. Being unable to suppose that they are never wrong I fear that they are always wrong, while a mind which does not pride itself on its logic may rediscover the truth."

"Today, as two thousand years ago," he wrote in the preface to "Jeanne d'Arc," "one must, if one wishes to look into the future, study not the powerful of the earth but the confused movements of the working masses." Then follows that magnificent declaration of faith: "I believe in the future union of the peoples, and I call for it with that ardent charity of the human race, which, born in the Latin consciousness in the days of Epictetus and Seneca, extinguished for so many centuries by European barbarism, has flamed again in the hearts of the greatest of modern times. And you will tell me in vain that these are the illusions of dream and aspiration; it is aspiration which creates life, and the future takes pains to realize the dreams of the philosophers." He knew even then, in 1908, that "the terrific industrial and commercial rivalries about us" meant that before the peoples united France would be engulfed in "a European or world conflict." But he dared hope.

Had he lost all hope, fourteen years later, when he wrote that he did not dare dedicate his last book to posterity because "we shall have no more posterity than had the last writers of Latin antiquity, and the new Europe will be too different from the Europe which is dying under our eyes to care for our arts and our thought"?

The Winning of the West

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Omaha, October 12

MINNESOTA, South Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa—the deeper I penetrate into the Mid-West the brighter seems the outlook for Robert La Follette. I am now certain that if the election were held tomorrow he would carry every one of those States, in addition to North Dakota, Montana, and Washington, which I have not visited. Wherever I have been, save only Kansas, the outlook seems brighter than the political analyses of the various newspapers portray it. Take South Dakota, for instance. Most of the writers have awarded it to Coolidge, and reports received at the La Follette headquarters in Chicago were not encouraging. But when I reached Sioux Falls I was in the company of two correspondents representing Coolidge newspapers. They were immediately told at Republican headquarters that La Follette would carry the State, and I got the impression from the Democratic leaders that they not only expected that result but that many of their followers were going to vote for La Follette in order to help defeat the President.

Not all the La Follette leaders in South Dakota are oversanguine. They are afraid that a good deal of Republican money will reach the State between now and election day and they are worried about the ballot, the form of which may cost La Follette ten thousand votes. There are four columns on this ballot, Republican, Democratic, Farmer-Labor, and Independent, but the La Follette electors do not appear in the Farmer-Labor column. Hence the belief that many simple farmer people will vote for the Farmer-Labor ticket without realizing that a mark in the circle at the head of it will mean that they are voting only for the State ticket and not for President. The La Follette organization, none too effective, and suffering like all the others from lack of funds, must now devote itself to making the electors friendly to La Follette understand the situation and how they must mark the ticket. Still another danger is the Indian vote, which runs to 16,000. The Coolidge Administration is leaving no stone unturned to get that vote. The Indian Commissioner is a native of South Dakota and the report is that the entire Indian Bureau machinery is bringing pressure to bear. The reassuring fact is that neither Mr. Burke nor the Administration is popular with the Indians, and that will in some degree offset the work of the Coolidge "missionaries" who are on duty among our original "Reds."

The encouraging news comes from the country districts in this section. In Ohio it is the farmer who is least converted to the Third Party. Out here the La Follette strength lies in the farming districts as well as in labor circles. Particularly is this true in Nebraska. I see that Arthur Henning of the Chicago Tribune writes that the only certain thing in Nebraska is that Senator George W. Norris will be reelected. Well, my belief is that the State is safe for La Follette and that that will be beyond doubt if Norris comes out for his colleague from Wisconsin and if La Follette himself makes a speech or two in Nebraska. It is amazing to me how well La Follette is known to the masses out here. It becomes increasingly plain that we Eastern journalists have had no conception of the way he had earned the regard of great masses in the West even before the war issue made people take notice of him. Some of the Scandinavian farmers in Nebraska and Iowa tell you that they have known about him and his work in Wisconsin for years and have long been hoping for a chance to vote for him. His opposition to the war has particularly endeared him to the masses out here of all races. I have often been taken to task for asserting that if we had had a referendum on the war question in 1917 the Middle West and West would have voted overwhelmingly against going into it. Everywhere I get proof of the correctness of this view. For instance, one hears from La Follette workers that the most popular plank in the Progressive platform today is the one pledging the party to a referendum on any possible war. In this section, as in New York, the heartiest applause comes when the speaker tells the audience that as long as Robert La Follette might be in the White House there would be no war and no drafting of their sons to fight a war abroad at the behest of American and foreign capitalists.

But it is a mistake to believe, as does Simeon Strunsky writing in the New York Times, that this pro-La Follette sentiment is merely a desire to wreak at this late day a feeling of spite because we went into the war. The Scandinavian farmers are more outspoken for La Follette than the Germans. Both groups remember the war less because it was a war against Germany than as a period of torture for themselves. Journalists writing from their easy chairs in New York can have no idea of the condition of terror brought about in these States by State Defense Committees to which the government of the States was turned over. These committees were invariably run by big-business lawyers and leaders who set an example of absolute lawlessness that makes the I. W. W. seem like the most earnest supporters of law and order. Men were ordered to travel hundreds of miles from their farms if the slightest rumor of pro-Germanism reached the committees and even if acquitted they were then compelled to subscribe to Liberty bonds or war-saving stamps far beyond their means and powers—and that was the least of what might happen to them. Not even their bank accounts remained inviolate, and no distinction was drawn between Scandinavians and Russians and Germans. These things sank deep. The huge farmer vote for La Follette is going to be, in part, due to them and not to any sympathy with Germany. It is to be a vote for law and order and the decent conduct of our government even in war-time rather than a vote of revenge. One hears in Nebraska the same story I heard told in Minnesota, of the Lutheran clergyman who was asked how his congregation stood on the Presidency. He answered: "Fifty fifty; half of my people will vote for La *Fo*llette and the other half for La Fo*llette*." Of course the recent distress of the farmer plays its part here, too.

What has Norris done in the Nebraska campaign? To date he has made only one speech and in that he unmercifully flayed the Republican Party and its President. If his attack was not as sensational as Brookhart's it has been quite as effective. He declared, for instance, that relief for the farmers was defeated by the lack of interest of Republican Senators, "usually after a conference at the White House." He advocated about everything that La Follete does and he was especially vigorous in condemning both Harding and Coolidge for appointing lame ducks to office and in denouncing the Republican corruption. It is hard to see how he can confine himself to that utterance for the rest of the campaign. An important Republican challenged him to say what he would do if the election should be thrown into Congress and he replied that he would vote in the Senate as his State voted at the election. Finally, in Nebraska as elsewhere, all the human interest lies in the third-party camp. La Follette is a great figure even with those who for party reasons oppose him. Nobody cares about John W. Davis, though he had some fine meetings on his trip to this part of the country. As for Coolidge, who could get enthusiastic about such a personality? Not the Republicans. Most of them admit that frankly. As for Dawes, in South Dakota as in Minnesota, there was universal agreement in all three camps that he was making votes for La Follette, by his attacks upon him and by his refusal to answer questions as to the Lorimer bank scandal.

In Iowa the La Follette forces have every reason to be well satisfied. Brookhart has dealt a deadly blow to Coolidge, but even without reference to him the State is in a most happy insurgency against the powers that be. I have before me the testimony of a staff correspondent of the Kansas City Times. A few days ago he thought the panic among the Republican workers uncalled for. Now he writes "after a long trip through the country districts in the war zone, and after talking with people down near the grass roots, this correspondent now is able to understand why panic has seized the Republican leaders." To the absolutely solid Scandinavian vote he attributes the chief defections, but he also admits (his paper is not for La Follette) that many old-stock Americans, suffering from the bad times, will vote for La Follette. The correspondent further avers that in the tenth and eleventh congressional districts in the northern part of the State, in which are one-fourth the voters of the State, the Republicans have simply abandoned the fight; they "wait for the blow to fall."

Only in Kansas, of the States under review, have the Republicans any right to hopefulness; even there pleasure is spoiled by the reflection that you never can tell what the "durned State" will do. The State of Mary Lease and of Sockless Jerry Simpson is just now mightily entertained by the fight being waged against the Klan by William Allen White, and there are those who think that his candidacy will be successful. He, too, is supporting Coolidge by "hitting him in the slats," as it was elegantly described to me, and saying nothing derogatory to La Follette. One hears, too, of farmers' meetings where no one would hear about anybody but "Bob" and where the local candidates displaying their wares had only one question put to them: "For whom are you?" If the answer was Coolidge the farmers' interest was lost. It may be that the revolt in Nebraska and Iowa will be duplicated in Kansas, but if it is no one will be more surprised than the La Follette workers.

The La Follette machine is poor, ineffective, and starved to death in all these States. In Kansas it seems even worse than that; there are suspicions as to its loyalty, just as one hears of railroad men who have been "reached" by the other side and learns of the Republican boast that they will own every German newspaper before election day comes.

In these States there are some of the same contradictory phenomena that have made the situation in other States so difficult to size up. There is much apathy, and yet among the farmers much interest. Meetings are small except when one of the Presidential or Vice-Presidential candidates appears. Congressmen draw only a handful of listeners. The Republican organization is very slow in getting to work; the Democrats are so ineffective that many people believe that their party will be all but wiped out this year. Money is scarce except with the Republicans. And there is a silent vote. Yesterday I was in a Kansas town where there are many railroad workers who are so terrorized that they do not dare to declare themselves or attend La Follette meetings. Among them are being formed Coolidge clubs, membership in which carries with it approval of the acts of the railroads, as well as a pledge to Coolidge. These workers are also being "reached" in other ways. Thus, President Hale Holden of the C. B. & Q. has just made a speech warning all his employees that the demagogue is abroad in the land and that the case for private ownership of railroads was never so strong as at this time. The speech was widely published and radioed. Yet these railroad men are keeping their mouths shut and are thinking and they know that their employers cannot find out how they will vote in the booths. That silent vote, I have come to believe, is largely going to La Follette.

It is curious how many men one meets who are convinced that La Follette will be the next President. You call their attention to the fact that all the middle-class business men and all the bank officers are equally certain that the election will not go into the House but be settled by a tremendous Coolidge sweep. "I know," is the reply. "You can't figure it out on paper, I'll admit. But I have been in this game for years and everything inside of me tells me we're going to win this time." Hope once more at its eternal game of will o' the wisp! And yet there are signs.

I reached Omaha last night in time to hear Mr. Dawes. The streets around his hall were shut off by the police in expectation of a huge crowd, and loud-speakers were attached to the walls for the waiting multitudes. But only twenty persons were listening outside, and they could easily have gone in. Mr. Dawes has unfortunate mannerisms of speech which, despite the amplifiers, made it impossible for more than one-half of his audience to hear him. He stamped, gesticulated, barked, and roared for twenty-two minutes. I have never heard a first-rank public man get as little applause as he did when he finished. It lasted, by my watch, exactly twenty seconds. The comments of the crowd were unflattering. Their amazement that the meeting was over within forty minutes was openly voiced. Dawes had nothing but his set speech. That the Reds menace our government and that La Follette will pull down the Supreme Court by order of the Socialists were his sole themes, save a long definition of the difference between a statesman and a demagogue, and a long quotation from Le Bon on the psychology of the crowd, to show that if you give the mob complete control of a government terrible things happen; witness the French and Russian revolutions. That went over the heads of his audience—a large and a fine one, with many working people in it. Only his final appeal to save the American home and hearthstone from the red flag of socialism stirred the audience at all. I am convinced by personal observation that Mr. Dawes helps the La Follette cause.

Be Brisk With Babbitt

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

II. Are Americans Timorous Tabbies?

I WAS so encouraged by the comparative ease of persuading Mr. George F. Babbitt to confide his opinions that I went, in the afternoon, to call on his friend, Mr. Paul Riesling, whom I knew as a rather fine, very sensitive little man, really (despite Babbitt's commendation) an excellent amateur violinist.

I found him in the office of his small factory for the manufacture of prepared-paper roofing. When I hinted that his friend Babbitt had sent me, he became reluctantly cordial.

"Vote?" said Mr. Riesling, "I'm going to vote for La Follette.

"So you saw Georgie Babbitt. Good man. He has all the reasoning of a child of eight. He's the real majority-rule Democrat—he repeats whatever he hears the majority of his friends in the Zenith Athletic Club and the Boosters' Club saying. And at the same time he's one of the kindest, most loyal, most trustworthy friends a man could have, and if you intend to make fun of him in your interview——"

"Not at all. I'm going to quote him without comment."

"Hm. With most of us, the unkindest thing an interviewer could do would be to quote us exactly, without comment. But anyway:

"Know why I'm going to vote for La Follette? Because I've had a lot of personal and business complications lately, and they've shaken me out of myself—made me think.

"We've all gone ahead, generation after generation, being cautious, being afraid, insisting that if the wrong people were married, or if an industry was underpaying its employees, or if a man that ought to be writing music stuck at his job of selling roofing, why, we ought not to take any chance on changing these conditions. Then opposed to us were a little group of left-wingers who wailed that if anything did exist at all, that was a sufficient reason for changing it right away. But in between there were people like La Follette, who weren't afraid of change but who did advocate a man's paying his debts and doing his work and being loyal to his friends.

"I don't know. I may be wrong. But it seems to me La Follette is almost the first presidential candidate since Lincoln (the first with a chance to win—that's why I leave out Debs) who has had greatness, who has combined a desire to let human life be free and happy with a hard, solid, practical, food-raising competence.

"Another thing. I've had the opportunity of getting a detached view of America. In fact, I've recently been in Europe."

"You went with Babbitt, didn't you?"

"Yes, but we were apart a good deal. As I said, Georgie (don't repeat this to him—it would hurt his feeling)—Georgie is the kindest fellow in the world, but he does have the habit when he's traveling of keeping himself from seeing anything by digging in with all the fellow members of the Boosters' Club that he runs into along the way. I remember him and some osteopath from Fargo standing in the middle of the Coliseum discussing wardrobe trunks!

"So I got the habit of sneaking away from him as much as I could and—— Oh, I don't know that I learned much. I'm afraid I never once did my duty as a tourist and saw the places to which you go, as Georgie always puts it, 'so you could say you'd been there.' I just wandered—talked to policemen, to bar-maids in pubs, to vergers in cathedrals, to a man I ran into at the British museum—apparently he was a retired British general—and to a Hyde Park communist orator, who walked along Edgeware Road with me and bought me a drink of milk! They were so friendly! They were so simple, so eager to find out what Americans really were like. . . . I used to pretend to them that I was a professional violinist.

"And it was just the same in Paris and Florence and Rome, with the people who spoke English—waiters and concierges and a few taxi-drivers. And everywhere, in all those queer old streets, where you felt that people would rather have ease and laughter than facilities for parking flivvers, there was such peace.

"You may not see how this touches La Follette. It's like this. It seems to me that he combines, and Wheeler combines, American adventurousness and initiative with the scorn of empty hustle and noisy professional good-fellowship which the Europeans have. Oh, for once we have running for the Presidency not an ambitious, trimming, boot-licking politician but a real man who wants us to go on clearing the fields as we've always done, but not to become pedlers. Gallant—that's the word I always think of in connection with both him and Senator Wheeler. . . . I wonder if we're actually going to turn them down for a Vermont undertaker and a husky college pipe-smoker who's never grown up?

"I have a queer notion that in this election the American people is showing itself up. We're going to announce whether we're a nation of Coolidges, of La Follettes, or of Brother Charlies. We're going to say that we're content to be known as tight, cautious, timorous tabbies; or as loose and confused and purposeless followers of a party which has no policy and which in a generation has had no great man except Woodrow Wilson perhaps; or as mature and fearless people who are no longer colonial shop-keepers."

III. "I've Done Very Well, Thank You!"

It was with hesitation that I sought my third Zenith interview—with Mr. Charles L. McKelvey, president of the Dodsworth-McKelvey Construction Company, which built the Zenith Union Station and the State capitol. McKelvey is a big, suave, immaculate, quick-thinking man; a baron of the new feudalism; a man to whom, I fancy, Babbitt is a counter-jumper and Paul Riesling a sentimental fool. McKelvey would be a far more suitable symbol for use on the dollar than any antiquated goddess of liberty.

I was admitted, not too glowingly, to his enormous house on Royal Ridge.

"I suppose you're going to vote for Mr. Coolidge," I said, with the meekness suitable to a journalist in the presence of a potentate who can borrow a million dollars between noon and three.

McKelvey glanced at me with that friendly, knowing, devastating eye which has enabled him to control legislators without buying them—much. He tapped his teeth with his thumb nail, he made a gesture with his cigar, and spoke abruptly:

"Nope. For La Follette."

"Eh?"

"I don't suppose you regard that as much of a boost for La Follette though! I have no doubt you believe that anybody whom I and my bunch of cradle-snatchers vote for must be a crook. Well—— Confound it, I don't enjoy supporting the man! But I've had a conversion.

"I'm what you people call a Big Business Man. I've done very well, thank you! And naturally I've always stood in politics for the candidates who would let me carry out my plans and not butt in. I've always admired men like General Dawes—a great executive, a man with a big vision in business and yet with complete practicalness, and, I imagine, the best fellow and the best friend in the world—a real he-man. I've certainly always been against La Follette—he struck me as a chap who didn't understand the hard fact that one honest-to-God executive was worth more than a thousand of the dub workmen whom you can replace just around the corner in half an hour.

"Then, I've always been against La Follette's asinine doctrine that monopolies have to be broken up. Yes, and I'd have been against it if I'd been a workman instead of a boss.

"It seems fairly evident to me that the days of small, competitive industries are dead as Moses. Deader! If the country wants to grab off the big companies and run 'em, all right—if they can!—but to go back to a one-man barber-shop kind of amateur business is simply childish. Why, we haven't even begun to consolidate! Before you and I pass out, we'll see international corporations that will make Ford and Standard Oil and Sir Basil Zaharoff's combinations look like lemonade stands at a county fair.

"And absolutely right. The old-time way was for any farmer who got tired of plowing to move in town and start a grocery store, and then out of sheer ignorance and laziness to sell dirty lettuce and rotten eggs till he failed and was replaced by some other boob. Today we have organizations in which an egg-seller is chosen because he does it well or he gets moved on to something he can do well. You talk about 'public service'! Why, good Lord, the United Cigar Stores give the people a kind of service nobody ever dreamed of!

"So I was against La Follette both because of sound self-interest and from a knowledge of economics. (Oh, they'll tell you in this town that I'm a hard-boiled grafting contractor. Well, I specialized in economics in the State University, and I bet that right today I read more economics and sociology than the whole bunch you'll find hanging around this arty, socialistic book-shop of Lloyd Mallam's put together!)

"Well, then I got the contract to put up the new block of dormitories at the U. The president had a good idea—he wanted the architect and me to talk with a bunch of students and get their notion of what they wanted in dorms. So I met a lot of the present brood of undergrads, and I didn't talk to them like an alumnus of the vintage of 400 B.C., either, but like a shop-mate. And politics crept in—this was here just the other day, beginning of the fall term.

"Well, I had a shock. I found that all the good, solid, football-playing birds were for Coolidge, but all in the same words—and when I asked 'em what they wanted in the way of dormitories, they answered like Mongolian idiots making a sound indicating they needed food. But the others—lot of 'em were girls, and a lot of those Jews, keen little devils, awfully honest and decent and hard-working, and Lord how they liked bawling me out!—they knew what dorms ought to be, and they all seemed to look at the La Follette campaign as if it were some kind of a damned crusade.

"Then I had to go on to New York, and while I was there I got dragged to a highbrow evening at the house of a parlor socialist, and the speaker of the evening was a pro-Soviet Communist—the whole works—left-wing as a rattlesnake. And he converted me to La Follette. By attacking him!

"It may raise cain with me, but still, it's been sort of a relief—sort of the old-fashioned rejoicing in salvation that my aunt used to talk about when I was a kid and used to visit her in a small town up-State—to be standing for a candidate who you think is necessary for the country, instead of always feeling you have to be a good loyal slave to the party and backing the lad who promises you to see your grafting doesn't get you into jail!

"This Communist explained to us that there were two philosophies of reform politics—the belief that everything was so bad that the only hope was a complete revolution, and the other a belief that perfection comes slowly. He was of the first faith—oh, something violent! It seems that La Follette, like Ramsay MacDonald, was merely trying to bolster up our wicked democracy and palliate the evil, and so keep the day of judgment from arriving quicker, and those of us that wanted to hustle up the blood and revolution should either vote for William Z. Foster (who, he admitted, would get fully seven votes outside of such members of the Liberator staff as took the trouble of voting) or else we ought to come out plumb for Coolidge.

"He was strong for Coolidge. Why, he was stronger for him than the Ku Klux Klan and the Rotary Club and the Bankers' Association put together. If we just elected Coolidge and a few successors like him, said my Communist friend, things would finally get so bad that we'd have the whole nation rising, and all American Institutions would be dumped into the garbage can, where they belonged, and the blessed Russian Institutions would be installed in the United States instead.

"In fact, he said, La Follette was as much of a boob, old-time, non-Marxian American as Jefferson.

"Well, when I heard this fellow (and a good fellow he was, too—bully to go hunting with, I imagine) I got so stirred up I almost forgot about the profits of the Dodsworth-McKelvey Construction Company. I felt I was an old-time American myself. I was ashamed—a little—of all the graft I'd pulled at various times. I felt that La Follette, like William Allen White, represented my own people and that I, who'd been croaking about Immigration and the Furriners, had been so closely associated with Hunkies and Wops—in the interesting position of their employer—that I'd forgotten to be an American.

"I started my own private movement for the Americanization of American Big Businessmen right then and there. And I got to thinking about La Follette on monopoly again. I realized—— I'm still agin him on that; but I realized that Coolidge and Davis hadn't any positions; they didn't mean anything whatever; whereas La Follette, right or wrong, did have things for which he stood. And that if he was wrong sometimes, he was only part of a movement.

"So, intellectually, I was pretty near converted to La Follette. But not quite. I still couldn't visualize myself voting for a knocker, and I had a hunch that my Board of Directors wouldn't care much for my new religion.

"Well, I walked down Fifth Avenue and passed a rich-man's club—the kind that I'd eventually belong to myself, if I moved to New York and got a little flabbier, and there was a whale of a big Coolidge and Dawes sign across the face of the building. I got to thinking. How few rich men sitting around clubs are for Davis, and how darn much fewer of 'em for La Follette! Struck me as kind of a give-away of my class. And the sign—"absolute devotion to our country," along with the names of Coolidge and Dawes—somehow it made me sore, the smug way in which they assumed that only their herd of sacred white cows could be devoted to America. So I did some more fretting, but I still couldn't see myself lined up with what I'd always called a bunch of cranks.

"I came back on the Twentieth Century Limited and happened to get talking to a man who hinted that he was the Klosmic Klamor or something like that of the Ku Klux Klan. And he ordered me both to join the Klan and to vote for Kloolidge—say, I must hand that slogan over to my orthodox Republican friends; ought to win a million votes:

KLEEP KLAREFUL WITH KLOOLIDGE

"Well—— It happens that an ancestor of mine, some darned old Scotchman that turned Catholic just out of pure cussedness had to flee to the Quakers in Nantucket to keep from being imprisoned by the holy Puritans in Massachusetts. Myself, I'm about as much of a Catholic as Rabbi Wise, but when this earnest soul on the train told me that if I didn't vote for Coolidge the Catholics would be appointing a cardinal (preferably a Negro one who lived kosher) as President of the United States, in 1928, why, it got my goat, and I told him I came from a line of Americans, ten generations or so, who'd taken chances on liberal thought, and I wasn't too badly scared that America would be ruined by the adventurers, and I guessed I'd vote for La Follette.

"But—it's been hell having to clean up my business and run it without bribery, as I've had to do since I came out for La Follette!"

(To be concluded next week)

The Banker Saves the Farmer

By PAUL HARWOOD MILLAR

"We bankers save the farmers, on the average, once a month."

"LOOK here, Frank," panted the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the Bankers' Association, as he rushed into the office of the Chamber of Commerce, "have you seen this?" He thrust a copy of the Crop Reporter at the County Agricultural Agent. "Unless we can do something, the farmer is ruined—absolutely."

"The poor farmer," moaned the Secretary of the Chamber; "last month it was the green gourd-vine blight, and the month before the drag-worm attacked the work stock right at breaking time. I forget what it was the preceding month."

"There were 2.2 inches more rain than normal," said the Chairman. "But what about the catnip situation? We must do something. The farmer faces another terrible crisis, and to fail him now would be a blot on the fair name of the bankers of this community."

The County Agent wheeled in his swivel chair and consulted File C of the bulletins of the Department of Agriculture.

"There is," he said, "a canker-resistant variety of catnip known as Surepopper 666. Fortunately it is a late variety."

"Go on," broke in the Secretary of the Chamber. "If planted immediately it would mature a bumper crop?"

"It would," replied the County Agent. "However, seed is very scarce."

"I thought so," said the Secretary. "The price is prohibitive, putting it beyond the reach of the ordinary farmer."

"Exactly," said the County Agent. "I fear the situation is hopeless."

During this colloquy the keen mind of the banker, accustomed to grapple with such difficulties, had not been idle.

"Boys," he said, calmly, looking both his auditors full in the face with a determined glance, "the farmer must be saved. It is well known that high prices of all products, and especially those bought and sold by the farmer, are due to the middleman. All we have to do, then, is to eliminate the Middleman's Profits. This can be done by buying seeds direct from the manufacturer in car-load lots. We shall then sell to the farmer at cost, and, on account of the emergency, extend credit to him at a nominal rate of interest—say 10 per cent or more."

"And how about security?" asked the County Agent.

"As to that," said the Chairman, "we shall not be hard to satisfy. All we want is a lien on the farmer's catnip crop, backed up by a mortgage on his farm."

"Fine!" cried the Secretary. "What beneficence! The agricultural interests will be deeply indebted to you big-hearted bankers. The first thing, now, is to get the news to the farmer that his catnip crop is a failure, and then to impress him with the serious crisis which he faces."

"Right O!" said the Chairman. "We must have a Plant More Catnip campaign, conducted along the lines of our Save the Bird Seed drive of last fall."

"Our Extension Department will be glad to cooperate," said the County Agent. "Also I think I can say the same for the Agricultural Department of the Hot Air Line Railway, and of the Pan-American Kidney Bean Thresher, Inc."

The Chairman of the Agricultural Committee was a man of action. Next day there appeared in the Press these headlines: "Farmers Face Acute Catnip Shortage"; and underneath the Chairman explained that, due to the inroads of the deadly catnip canker, the farmers' only salvation lay in replanting immediately with seed of the canker-immune variety Surepopper 666, which seed was to be ordered by the bankers in car-load lots and sold at cost, thus saving the Middleman's Profit. The Chairman also announced that tomorrow night there would be a Great Farmers' Rally held in the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce, at which time the farmer would be addressed by well-known agricultural experts. All farmers were urged to be present.

The Chairman also had posters struck, bearing the device:

SUREPOPPER 666
SAVE OUR CATS

and signed by each and every banker in the county.

Two copies of this were placed in each bank, one in the front window beside the agricultural exhibit, the other on the cashier's cage, where the Leading Business Men, about to deposit the farmers' hard-earned cash, could see it. There was also a copy in the post office, one in the ladies' rest room, and one on every telephone pole between the courthouse and the county line. Thus was the ground prepared for the Plant More Catnip campaign.

The day of the Great Farmers' Rally dawned bright and clear. Long before the hour the Chamber was taxed to its capacity. Occupying the first five rows were the members of the Bankers' Association. Behind them sat the Board of Trade, and then ranged in order came the Rotarians, the B. P. O. E.'s, the Z. Z. Z.'s, the K. K. K.'s, and the Lion Tamer's Club, which brought up the rear. A good many of the Leading Business Men, even, had to be turned away for lack of room.

The County Agent acted as chairman of the Great Farmers' Rally. He said that there were those present better qualified to speak than he, and accordingly introduced the Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, who spoke as follows:

> My friends: Our prosperous and progressive county faces a real crisis. But first let me say a word about our County Agent. We are indeed fortunate in having the services of such a live wire. All of us remember his work in our Stronger String Beans campaign, which by calculation of the Agricultural Accounting Committee saved the farmers of this county $375.75. I say we as farmers face a real crisis today. The catnip crop is a total failure. Do you realize, gentlemen, what this means? It means this—that unless another supply of this indispensable commodity is produced all the cats in this county will be deprived of that vital feline principle Mitabene Z, contained only and solely in catnip. Estimating this year's carry-over of catnip at 15,550 tons, it is evident that if every cat in Thomas County is to get five nips per day, which is the minimum ration for the average cat, 51,678 ton-acres of catnip must be either raised or imported next year.
>
> To import this amount spells financial ruin for us farmers. There is but one other way, and that is to raise it. Through the generosity of the bankers it is possible for us to buy in carload lots, thus saving the Middleman's Profits, seed of Surepopper 666, a canker-resistant variety from which we may yet harvest a bumper crop. The bankers are going to extend very easy terms, to wit, 10 per cent or more on moneys advanced. It is to be hoped that many of our farmers will take advantage of this generous offer.

The Secretary of the Chamber resumed his seat with much pep, and after the applause had died down the County Agent said he was glad to introduce the second speaker, the Agricultural Commissioner of the Hot Air Line Railway. There was no one, the County Agent said, who had done more for the advancement of agriculture than the Commissioner. In the Buy Bigger Billy Goats campaign he had rendered valuable service, placing the billy-goat industry of the county on a very high plane.

"It would be unfair to you, my friends," said the Commissioner, "did I not state that in my opinion you have right here the best County Agent in the territory of the Hot Air Line. I often recall how in our college days Tom and I had a vision of doing big things for the agriculture of this great State, and it is a pleasure now to witness the realization of these dreams for both of us.

"I love the honest farmer, the horny-handed son of toil. I was a farmer lad myself. Many a day have I followed Old Beck, and even now, gentlemen, I defy any man to plow a straighter furrow——"

Here the Commissioner was interrupted by cries of "I defy you" and "I challenge him," from the County Judge and the President of the Board of Trade.

"Very well, then, gentlemen," said the Commissioner, undismayed. "I invite you to a plowing match, tomorrow at 8 p. m. at the rooms of the Kiwanis Club. Is that satisfactory?"

"It is," they replied in unison.

The Commissioner continued. "But I have digressed. I believe that Catnip Culture was the subject assigned me. May I say a word about freight rates? Let us take, for example, a bushel of turnip greens shipped from Omaha, Nebraska, to Tampa, Florida. The items entering into the consumers' price are as follows: paid to the farmer, one-tenth of 1 per cent; to the commission men, 3 per cent; to the wholesaler, 1 per cent; to the retailer, 5 per cent."

At this point a Lion Tamer asked who got the rest of it.

The Commissioner replied that the railroad got the rest of it, but that this was justifiable, as the books would show that, with overhead and depreciation taken into consideration, there was nothing left after dividends had been declared.

"Who gets the profit on the bushel of turnip greens," continued the Commissioner, "and, if so, why not, and if not not, why so?"

There was no need of asking a second time. All over the house there arose cries of "The Middleman, the Middleman!"

"Exactly," said the Commissioner, "the Middlemen. And right here I want to pay a tribute to our splendid Chamber of Commerce for their work in organizing the Cooperative Corn-cob Marketing Association. That, gentlemen, was a splendid piece of constructive work. Let me say in conclusion that I am heartily in favor of the Plant More Catnip campaign."

The Commissioner bowed and resumed his seat. The audience arose and gave a Chautauqua salute, led by the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee. The County Agent and the Secretary of the Chamber leaned over and shook hands with the Commissioner.

The next and last speaker was the President of the Farmers' Bank & Bust Company. He said that it always gave him great pleasure to address such a body of stalwart farmers. Like the Commissioner of the Hot Air Line, he, too, had been a farmer boy, and it might be interesting to know that 99.7 per cent of all the eminent men had been raised on the farms. As for the Plant More Catnip campaign, he said that he was for it 100 per cent. He said that in applying for a loan from the Bank & Bust Company question 187 was "What is your catnip acreage?" and that as this followed question 186, "Do you intend to repay this loan?" it was evident what great stress he as a banker placed upon the production of catnip. It was his opinion that catnip seed should be planted with a grain drill, and not dropped by hand and covered with a hoe, as an average saving of eleven cents per acre was thus effected. In conclusion, he said he would like to hear from some of the farmers, and find out how they stood on this most important question.

"I feel," said the County Agent, as the applause subsided, "that this is a good suggestion. We shall now hear from some of the farmers."

The manager of the hardware department of Buggam Brothers' Big Store arose. "I want to indorse," he said, "every word that has been spoken here tonight, and I especially want to indorse what the President has said about the use of the grain drill. In this era of keen competition too much stress cannot be laid on keeping down the cost of production. Also, too many farmers overlook the possibility of up-to-date harvesting machinery, such as the catnip combine, which cuts and shocks the catnip and puts it in the barn, all in one operation."

"There is one thing of importance which has not been mentioned tonight," said the Assistant Cashier, "and that is the Dust Mulch. In my opinion the Dust Mulch——"

"Mr. Chairman," said the Grand Dragon of the Ku Klux Klan, "it is now well on toward midnight and some of us have other engagements. I move you, sir, that it is the sense of this meeting that a grave agricultural crisis has just been averted; and that in recognition of this fact a vote of thanks be accorded to all present tonight."

Once more had the banker saved the farmer.

"Politics Ain't What It Was"

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THERE just simply is no doubt that politics, in comparison with what it was, is sort of low in the mouth. Now, for instance, consider the good old campaign of 1840.

However, before considering it, let us consider this campaign. This roving and retrospecting reporter has been living lately in Chicago. Chicago contains the principal Republican headquarters. It contains the principal La Follette headquarters. It contains one of the three principal Democratic headquarters. It ought to be just all full of political frenzy.

To say nothing of the campaign of 1840, this writer out of his childhood remembers the campaign between Benjamin Harrison and Grover Cleveland in 1888. That campaign is more vivid in his memory than the campaign of 1840. In 1888, when there was nothing in the world between Benjamin Harrison and Grover Cleveland except the bloody shirt of the Civil War, twenty-three years gone by, the dismal, dreary topic of the tariff was more intense, was more fervent, was more exciting and tumultuous than this campaign of immensely greater issues. The issues are greater. The interest is smaller. The points to be decided are larger. The popular concern, the popular enthusiasm, is feebler—much feebler. In those days people would stay up, large numbers of them, late at night, for politics. Today not even the professional politicians will stay up.

This writer has tested it out. He has gone to all three principal political headquarters in Chicago at 10 o'clock in the evening. It may be that the Communist headquarters were open and thriving. Perhaps Bill Foster and Ben Gitlow were brooding and glowing over the prospects of the world in their headquarters, wherever they may be, at that hour. This writer must admit that he did not go there. He can speak only for the Republican headquarters and the Democratic headquarters and the La Follette headquarters. Among them the first two were stone dead. The third had three young men in it who were just about to depart for their beds.

Meanwhile the jazz-bands were cheering the Loop. The outside road-lining road houses were welcoming their guests. Theaters were in the midst of their business. The really late cabarets had not yet begun. The intense emotional interests of Chicago—many of them—were yet to come into play. Politics had gone to sleep. This writer called up the hotels of two of the principal managers of headquarters. By veracious testimony from bell-boys of his acquaintance he learned that these managers genuinely and actually had retired to their rooms for the night.

Nothing in the world can really be extraordinarily exciting if people abandon it at such an hour of the night. As an old, poor, political enthusiastic night-hawk, this writer looks with apprehension at an era when political managers go to bed at 10 o'clock in the afternoon. Everything in politics seems to have become regularized, standardized, formalized. Everything in politics seems to be now on the same side of the fence with all those other businesses—such as the business of the stock market or the business of the department stores—which are conducted during set hours in the daytime and which give way in the evening to those things which the human race seems to regard as a relief from those businesses. Even the pig-iron blast furnaces' business begins to appeal to this writer as a romantic business because it, at any rate, at least when pig-iron is mounting in price, continues through the night and irradiates the nighttime sky with flames and fumes of streaming and striking and uneasy interest.

In this writer's boyhood, although the bloody shirt and the bloodless tariff were the only political interests, people did not turn from politics in the evening to follow the jazz and to follow the radio. They did not go in for these modernistic, ridiculous campaigns for "bringing out the vote." They did not spend all their time, if they were interested in politics, in trying to bring people to the polls who were not interested in politics and who would vote ignorantly if they got there. They happened themselves to be interested in politics and they talked politics, whispered politics, breathed politics, and could stay away from the theater and out of bed to intrigue about politics just simply because they liked politics, not out of a low sense of duty but out of a high sense of joy and pleasure.

If ever we have to do politics just out of a sense of duty, we are at the beginning of the end. Yet that is the note—the note of a sense of duty—which begins to be stressed in this modernistic decadent campaign. People come around to other people and tell them that they ought to vote because it is a duty to vote. Think of it. Our ancestors agitated and more or less fought and bled and died to get the chance to have the sheer pleasure and amusement of voting. They wanted to vote because it gave them a good time. Any man who does not get a good time out of voting would probably better stay at home, because he will be only a left-handed nincompoop at the polls. The effectiveness of politics, like the effectiveness of religion or of anything else, is when you just simply cannot help doing it even if all the world tries, not to urge you to do it, but to prevent you from doing it.

Think of the log-cabin-cider-press-coonskin-cap campaign of 1840. Think of William Henry Harrison, who carefully avoided having anything in the world to think or to say—really—about the issues of 1840. Think of the imitation log cabins; think of the simulated cider presses; think of the fabricated and imitation coonskin caps that nevertheless went through all the streets and roads of America to float old Tippecanoe and Tyler too into the District of Columbia by the presidential and vice-presidential suffrages of a free and enthusiastic people.

Can anybody think that in this campaign, of immensely greater issues, there is any really nation-wide approach to the intensity of the campaign of 1840? Every campaign headquarters knows in fact the listlessness of the voter in this year 1924. Even the La Follette headquarters in its main headquarters city is dark when the city is bright. We are fallen upon large political issues and upon small civic days. That is the fact.

"Brother Charley"

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

OUT on the Platte they tell you that when it rains Governor Bryan takes the credit and when there is a drought he blames it on the Republican Legislature. It must be admitted that, while the name of Bryan has never been a synonym for diffident reticence, beside his younger brother William Jennings may fairly be described as coy and uncommunicative.

Trying to arrive at a balanced appraisal of the Democratic vice-presidential candidate in his own State is most trying indeed. Almost nobody in Nebraska pretends to be impartial concerning him or his achievements. Almost everybody professes either fervent loyalty or violent antipathy toward him. It is a natural consequence of his own temperamental attitude. One must be either for or against him—either with the heavenly hosts or with the legions of hell. He will not recognize neutrals. To him every skirmish is an Armageddon.

Nevertheless certain facts seem fairly free of reasonable argument. It appears above question, for example, that Bryan has persistently and successfully fought for cheaper gas, ice, coal, and gasoline for the people of his city and State, and that as Governor he achieved a material reduction in taxes. It appears with equal certainty that he has boasted so offensively, blatantly, and exaggeratedly of these reductions that some people would rather pay more than have to listen to him.

It is not seriously denied that personally he is honest, independent, energetic, and a capable executive, and that he is shrewdly practical. Again, it is plain that he is intolerant, bumptious, exigent, and possessed by a burning ambition to get on politically.

Because of that mortal weakness which demands that all our heroes be snow-white and our villains pitch-black, this portrait is bound not to satisfy, but you can neither tar nor whitewash Charles Wayland Bryan without manhandling the realities. The writer talked with the foremost two editors of the State, one a Democrat, the other a Republican; both know the Bryans. The Democrat said: "W. J. has principles; Charley has policies. William conceives an ideal and goes out to fight for it until the people accept it. Charley finds out what the people want and then fights for it until they accept him as their champion." The Republican said: "W. J. always deals in generalities of which he frequently knows nothing; Charley in practical propositions of which he knows a great deal."

The Governor is a big man, with the bald Bryan dome and piercing dark eyes. Notwithstanding his fifty-seven years, he possesses a physical and mental vigor which is simply terrific. He is quick, restless, rapid of speech, and sudden in his movements. His hands are never still. He keeps taking off his black slouch hat and slapping it on again. When he cannot wear it, he dons a skull cap. Nothing could be more inappropriate. He is as hard and rough and combative as an Airedale. A skull cap on him is as ludicrous as slippered pantaloons on Jack Dempsey.

This must be said in his behalf: His fame in the Northwest borrows nothing from the reputation of his brother. He is today, strictly on the basis of his own accomplishments, a far more potent and provoking factor than his brother is—perhaps than his brother ever was. It may be that he leans on him for advice; one is inclined to doubt even that. He is not the sort of man to lean on anybody for anything, and advice is one commodity of which he has a large surplus and which he constantly endeavors to market.

Prior to 1907 he had been engaged in managing the business affairs of the Commoner and in contributing occasional articles to it, although William J. was charged with the editorial function. His entry into the field of politics as a candidate was provoked by a campaign for cheaper gas in the city of Lincoln. The mayor said it would involve a long and costly legal fight. Bryan declared that any man with red blood in his veins and a genuine desire to help the people could do the thing in thirty days. On that platform he entered the race. By threatening to circulate petitions calling an election on a bond issue to build a municipal gas and electric plant, he apparently intimidated the company. The rate was reduced before the election, and Bryan was triumphantly elected by his grateful fellow-citizens.

As mayor he opened a free legal-aid bureau and a free employment agency, and sponsored street and park improvements, retiring at the end of his term. Two years later he again became a candidate, pledging the establishment of a municipal coal yard, ice plant, and municipal markets. Commission form of government prevailed, and the invariable precedent dictated that the candidate receiving the largest plurality become mayor. Although Bryan led the ticket, the only vote which he received for mayor when the new commission met to assign the departments was his own. Moreover, a majority of the commission voted down his proposals for municipal institutions.

Thereupon Bryan circulated petitions for a referendum on those subjects and also for the recall of the commissioners who opposed him. When those gentlemen found that he had more than enough signatures to call the election, they capitulated to the "will of the people," hastily deciding that it was unnecessary to have the election. They had no stomach for any further fight with this disagreeable customer.

Simultaneously, the local ice company announced a 50-per-cent reduction in the retail price, and the "muny" ice plant was not started. The public market was not established because of lack of funds. The coal yard, however, was opened and the price of coal cut from $14.50 to $10.50 a ton. The State Supreme Court, after the fashion of supreme courts, deciding that the city had no authority under its charter to operate a coal yard, Bryan closed it one evening as a public institution and reopened it the next morning under his private sponsorship, and he circulated petitions—he had become the most expert petition circulator west of the Mississippi—for an election to amend the charter, which was carried by 11 to 1.

Meantime, relieved for two years of his harassing presence in office, the gas company had reestablished its old rate. Bryan backed a suit which resulted not only in the restoration of the cut price but in rebates to the consumers totaling $450,000. He successfully opposed a proposal to increase the carfare of school children and made the express company extend the free-delivery zone. On the basis of these accomplishments he ran for Governor in 1922 and was elected by 50,000, while his Democratic running mate, Senator Hitchcock, was losing by 75,000. Hitchcock's friends have not failed to charge Brother Charley with duplicity in this campaign.

Then, too, with the stupidity which seems to have become the leading characteristic of Republican leadership everywhere since the death of Boies Penrose, the organization nominated to oppose Bryan a banker by the name of C. A. Randall. Mr. Randall was head of the State Bankers' Association, belonged to the best clubs, visited in the best homes, and ate with his fork. As a thoroughgoing 100 per center he had during the war supported the foreign-language law, a measure of persecution directed against the German-speaking population, which would have prohibited the teaching, even in parochial and private schools, of any foreign language to children who had not reached the eighth grade. Even the United States Supreme Court revolted and declared the law unconstitutional.

Bryan's administration as Governor was Bryan's administration as Mayor all over again, on a larger scale. He had a hostile majority in the Legislature. Notwithstanding, by using publicity as a weapon just as he previously had used referendum petitions, he clubbed his opponents more or less into submission, and succeeded in effecting economies in State government which resulted in a 13-per-cent reduction in the tax rate.

He threatened to open State coal yards, but the coal dealers, upon the advice of counsel who had carefully examined the decisions and the temperament of the State Supreme Court, told him to go where the price of coal had ceased to trouble. Acting as a private citizen, he offered to supply every cooperative, local committee, labor union, or other responsible agency in the State with coal at cost. He offered, and he carried out. The price fell $4 and in some places $6 a ton.

It was about this time that Governor McMaster of South Dakota opened his famous offensive against gasoline prices. When that occurred Governor Bryan was in North Dakota. Hastening home, he announced that he had that day sent a telegram to the officers of the Standard Oil Company at Chicago, warning that unless the retail price of gasoline was promptly reduced in Nebraska he would open public filling stations and sell at cost. The next morning the signs at the filling stations recorded a drop of two and a half to four cents a gallon, and there were ringing hosannas for Charley from Omaha to Coffee Siding, from Keyapaha County to Red Willow—which is the Nebraska equivalent of Dan to Beersheba.

To be sure there were scoffers. They pointed out that the reduction had occurred simultaneously and uniformly in a territory comprising eight States, and that Bryan's telegram, if indeed one had been sent, probably had about as much to do with the result as resolutions adopted by the Chattanooga, Tennessee, Browning Club. But the man with the Ford merely remarked that it was mighty funny how these things never happened until Charley took a hand, and always happened immediately when he did.

The picture, in all honesty, is not complete. Long before Mayor Bryan entered the field of public operation in Lincoln the present Republican Senator Howell had brought about the establishment of municipal ice, gas, and water plants in Omaha. And before Bryan moved against gasoline prices Commissioner Hopkins had reduced the price in Omaha by five cents through opening a filling station with gasoline bought wholesale for the Fire Department.

Thus it is charged that every important reform which he has advocated or effected has been a leaf stolen from the book of somebody else, that he never moves until he is certain of the direction in which political capital lies, that he capitalizes the discontent or unrest aroused by hardier and less selfish pioneers. It is difficult to make those distinctions clear to the farmer whose saving in reduced taxes and cheaper coal and gasoline amounted to a total of $300 last year. It is difficult to present them convincingly to the housekeeper who had her ice bill cut in half.

His is not an engaging personality. He has not the charm of Davis, not the impressive conviction of La Follette, not the debonair and reckless courage of Wheeler. He overstates his case; he claims too much.

Yet the record stands. One finds it difficult to believe that a man so obviously centered on himself can burn with his whole heart for the people. And he accepted Mr. Davis's progressivism all too willingly. But there is the record. He has fought for the people, and he has never fought for the interests. In the last analysis his best recommendation is the enemies he has made and the fear he has inspired.

October End

By WILLIAM A. NORRIS

Make the most of this late sunlight:
Thin gold on autumn leaves,
Branches not wholly bare.

We have this to remember—
Summer wind in the trees and no leaves falling,
Heat of the summer sun in the sleeping grasses;
And we ourselves picking flowers, growing weary of flowers,
Gathering grain, wading in golden brooks.

There is no sound now,
Only our hushed voices
And the click of leaf on leaf.

Autumn, Forsake the Hills

By FRANK ERNEST HILL

Autumn, forsake these hills and dwell in towns.
Change will not take you there. The year will go
Insensibly from summer into snow;
No tower will turn from green to golds and browns.
But here the slopes and hollows burn with death—
Scarlet of leaves, scarlet of butterflies
Flame to their ash . . . Last flowers shut their eyes.
Bronze bees go stricken in the frosty breath
Of blue-bright noon. Under the black wild grapes
White wine of brooks through leaf-drowned shadow ebbs.
Spiders hang frozen in gray spider webs.
What here was young and bright and swift escapes
In ruin that can never flame at all
Where life is changeless pavement, noise, and wall.

In the Driftway

THERE has been much discussion about our President; he has been called silent because he had nothing to say, and deep because he would not allow his depths to be sounded. This is now to be changed. Not that Honest Cal is to become loquacious all of a sudden; but in the quiet watches of the night, behind closed doors for all the Drifter knows to the contrary, it seems that Cal has been talking, maybe to himself. And his remarks are now made available for all good Republicans and bad non-Republicans to read and ponder on.

* * * * *

MR. ROBERT J. THOMPSON of Chicago has compiled the little book—"Adequate Brevity" he calls it—which gives Mr. Coolidge away. Mr. Thompson himself feels that it is safe to publish these maxims. "Mr. Coolidge," says he, "will be found to be all right—indeed a man to whom you would at all times, and unhesitatingly, trust your fortune, your business, your life, and your sacred honor." There is hardly a phase of life or opinion which is not touched upon, and in order that a busy soul yearning for counsel may have no difficulty in finding what he needs the thoughts are classified in alphabetical order: "America," "Bolshevism," "Character," "Deception," "Forgiveness," "Foreign Debts," "Our Fathers," "The Press," "Thought," "Unrest," "Welfare," and "World Problems," to give only a few of them. The book itself is a small volume about four inches by six, and has 122 pages of reading matter, so it is evident that in order to touch upon these and other topics of interest brevity must be employed indeed.

* * * * *

AND what does Mr. Coolidge think? The Drifter, turning the pages of "Adequate Brevity," started in by marking those passages which seemed especially worthy of comment; he found, however, that he was marking every one; it was evident that the President could not have a thought that was not—well, let him speak for himself:

> America is still the land of opportunity.
>
> Without a healthy, productive, and prosperous agriculture, there can be no real prosperity.
>
> The agriculture of the nation needs a greater supply and lower cost of fertilizer.
>
> Undivided allegiance to public authority must be required.
>
> Can those intrusted with the gravest authority set any example save that of the sternest obedience to law?
>
> Not all those who are working to better the condition of the people are Bolsheviki or enemies of society.
>
> Let everybody keep at work. Profitable employment is the death-blow to bolshevism, and abundant production is disaster to the profiteer.
>
> Invested capital is the result of brains.
>
> There is no surer road to destruction than prosperity without character.
>
> Civilization and profits go hand in hand.
>
> The supply of coal must be constant.
>
> Education is to teach men not what to think but how to think.
>
> There is an obligation to forgive but it does not extend to the unrepentant.
>
> Everyone is anxious for good highways.
>
> America must be kept American.
>
> Not all those who are attempting to conduct a successful business are profiteers.
>
> A great man comes from the devotion of a great mother.
>
> There is no place for the cynic or the pessimist.
>
> At the revelation of greed making its subtle approaches to public officers, of the prostitution of high place to private profit, we are filled with scorn and with indignation.

* * * * *

THE Drifter maintains that these are splendid sentiments; that they do credit to the home and fireside which produced them; and that the holders of them should be allowed to rule the land. As a matter of fact, they are.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mr. Mencken on the Sex Comedy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your instructive No. 3092 Mr. Bernard Sobel attacks the contentions that I set up in my article The Sex Uproar by arguing (a) that, despite their light and even jocose view of the sex comedy, the talk of men is nevertheless "very much like that which Mlle de Maupin heard when she masqueraded as a man," and (b) that despite the fact that men would work if there were no women in the world, there remains in them "the lurking hope that approbation and subsequent success will bring ultimate sex reward."

My contentions survive these caveats. I do not deny that men spend a great deal of time talking about women: what I argue is that they never talk about women until after they have exhausted all other subjects of common interest. Sex is simply the ultimate common denominator: all men are males. Lock up a Methodist bishop and a cowboy in a room together, and they will talk of women, for they have no other interest in common. But put the bishop with a bootlegger, and they will talk of Prohibition until they are exhausted. Where men of diverse and incongruous kinds are thrown together, as in Pullman smoke-rooms, jails, and clubs, the talk is largely of feats of amour. But where men who know one another and are interested in one another meet, such simian exploits are seldom mentioned.

The "lurking hope" that Mr. Sobel mentions simply does not exist. Why should it lurk, or be a mere hope? Any man, rich or poor, fat or lean, Christian or heathen, can find a woman to be kind to him. The rare man who fails is a man who would still fail if he were worth $8,000. I can only say that I have never met any such man. I doubt that a man who enjoys "approbation and success" is particularly attractive to women, save perhaps transiently. The man's success is always the enemy of the woman who loves him. The most lavish and caressing loves, I believe, are heaped upon men who, as other men see them, are failures.

Hohenzollern, Maryland, October 3 H. L. MENCKEN

[The name of Bernard Sobel, whose letter was published in last week's Nation, was erroneously printed as Bernard Sobe. —EDITOR THE NATION.]

Quaker Meant Friend

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: No newcomer at Essen was allowed to doubt that he was in the occupied territory. The railway station was gorgeous with French and Belgian flags, draped above shields of the republic. One heard the French tongue constantly in the streets, though the uniforms were few. The military had been largely withdrawn shortly after the election of May 11. Their withdrawal had eased the tension, my traveling companions told me; but one felt a different atmosphere than that of unoccupied Germany. The stranger who visits unoccupied Germany today, the inflation being over and prices high, must be a friend. In the Ruhr a stranger meant an enemy. Two women in the third-class compartment where we were together cautiously whispered to each other, their eyes on me. Everywhere were hostile looks. A group of school-children in the street approached me menacingly, and one young girl, looking me straight in the face, snarled like an animal. A man passing me on a bicycle spat with unnecessary vehemence.

I visited the little farm surrounded by big factories, and spoke again with Heinrich, the one-time prisoner of war who had worked for us in France, back in the days of the armistice. He had so changed and aged that he was quite unrecognizable. But he was by no means the most miserable that I had seen. He had his kind old parents with him and the farm was their own.

I was tired and discouraged as I started on the dusty two-mile walk that lay between me and the railway station. As I passed a wretched little roadside inn I caught a glimpse of green trees and wooden benches and turned in to rest. A drunken old man with red eyes who was in the bar as I passed through asked me at once my nationality, and a youth with long hair and a depraved face stared at me insolently. They both followed me into the shabby garden and stood beside my table. There they were joined by numerous others, the roughest group that I had seen during all my visit to Germany: men in their undershirts, frowsy women, and half a dozen dirty children.

"Sind Sie Französin?" they asked.

"Ich bin Quäkerin," I answered.

The effect was magical. I might have been a crowned queen among those miserable people. There was not one to whom the word did not have profound significance.

Quaker meant friend.

S.S. France, September 11 MARY KELSEY

La Follette and the Far West

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wonder if the four men on the Supreme Court of California who have just issued the decision barring La Follette from the ballot realize that in one day they have done more to convince the people—not only of California and the Pacific Coast but the whole country—that the courts should be curbed than La Follette could have done by arguing from now till the crack of doom? Isn't there something, somewhere, saying: "give a rogue rope enough——"? Well, the courts are hanging themselves. They might defend themselves successfully against La Follette, but that will avail them little if they cannot defend themselves against themselves. The American people demand, if nothing else, fair play. They possess their many faults, but one of them is not to approve of hitting below the belt. There may be fine legal points whereby judges and lawyers will be able to prove to their own satisfaction that this anti-La Follette decision is entirely legal and proper. But the plain people, who possess no such discriminating minds and to whom the law is fast by way of becoming a consummate ass, will have great difficulty in accepting this proof. For they will remember that this decision came at a time when the Coolidgeites had been jolted from the cocksure arrogance which followed their victorious May primary to a state of genuine alarm at the wave of sentiment rolling up for La Follette and Wheeler. They will look upon the situation created by this decision as they would upon a prizefight—a prizefight in which the man who, despite a heavy handicap, is getting the best of it in a fair encounter, is struck a foul blow by his desperate opponent. Therefore, the four justices of the California Supreme Court, by doing the California candidacy of La Follette a mechanichal injury, have done the La Follette cause throughout the country a great and growing good. That is the net result of this decision.

Now, what of the La Follette prospects here in the Far West? Well, whatever the rest of the country has done, the Far West—California in particular—has not lost its taste, thank God, for progressivism. Not the progressivism of the Chester Rowells, which, because it has not moved an inch or changed so much as a jot or tittle since 1912, is the reactionaryism of today. But the Progressivism of William Kent, of Fremont Older, of Rudolph Spreckels, and of C. K. McClatchy. The progressivism that is progressivism because it has kept pace with changing conditions. It will carry the three latter states for La Follette and Wheeler; and may even carry California despite the handicap erected by the Supreme Court majority. The Davis candidacy out here is scarcely noticeable. His adherents might just as well save the tally clerks extra labor by going fishing on election day. The fight is between Coolidge and La Follette; there is no doubt about that.

And how the Coolidge forces are working! They are desperate. Employees of the big corporations are being called in and gravely warned of the "dangers" of La Folletteism. They are also being called upon to contribute to the Coolidge campaign fund. A young aquaintance of mine who works for one of these concerns tells me he was called in the other day by his superior and asked to give two dollars to the Coolidge fund. "Why," said he, "I'm not sure yet that I'm going to vote for him." "Oh, that's all right; vote for whomever you please, but come through with two bucks for Coolidge," said his superior; who added half facetiously, as he took charge of the two "bucks": "If you're as smart as I think you are, you'll make up your mind for Coolidge."

Furthermore, the Coolidge forces have resorted to what some might call "strategy." They have turned over the party offices to men once known as progressives. Committee chairmanships, regional directorships, etc., are nearly all held by men belonging to what might be termed the "Johnson wing" of the Republican Party. This of itself is a confession of desperation; for a few months ago the real Coolidge crowd, the old reactionary anti-Johnson machine, was directing the Coolidge campaign and telling the Johnsonites to go way back and sit down. But with all their trading and angling they have not got the astute Hiram to announce for Coolidge. He keeps a somber and discreet silence. At times he may lose his temper and kick over the traces to his own political detriment, but most of the time he knows what is good for Hiram. He knows now, for instance, that the best thing that could happen to Hiram Johnson would be for La Follette to carry California in November. Consequently Hiram is, in the matter of silence, out-Coolidging Coolidge. It is true he did break silence long enough to denounce the decision barring La Follette and Wheeler from the ballot; but if the Coolidge forces can get anything besides discomfort out of that they are lucky.

Meanwhile, men like William Kent, Rudolph Spreckels, Francis J. Heney, Fremont Older, and C. K. McClatchy, and women of the same fine type, are out in the open giving their all to the La Follette cause. C. K. McClatchy, with his powerful newspapers, the Sacramento Bee and the Fresno Bee, is doing valient service; and Rudolph Spreckles, whom ten years or more of bitter fighting has not driven out of the banking industry of San Francisco, is out daily on the stump. And we are all—high and low, great and small—happy in the fight. Happy as we have not been for years. It is joyous to have once again something worth fighting for.

San Francisco, September 26 JOHN HARROWBY

Radio Censorship

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: During the Democratic Convention Congressman J. Lister Hill of Alabama delivered a terrific philippic from radio station WOR (Newark) against the Republican Party. He was continuously cut off in the midst of words and sentences. When "oil scandals" or "predatory interests" were mentioned without reference to the Republican Party the sentence went over uncensored. But when he said "at the Cleveland convention the Republican Party was dominated by the predatory——," he was cut off. During the ten-minute speech I only heard half which was sent out. Mr. Hill spoke to the empty air half the time.

I immediately phoned a leading New York paper. "What interest or news is there in that?" said the person at the other end. "Why, on a prohibition speech Hudson Maxim was cut off and the news featured—why not this?" "Wait a minute— . . . Well, our Newark man will get that news."

I read the paper assiduously after that, but saw no mention of the censorship. Isn't it a shame that we get only nationalistic and conservative propaganda over the radio?

Allentown, Pennsylvania, July 25 RALPH B. GUINNESS

We See Our Finish

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am a senior in college this year. I have studied political science, economics, history, and psychology. I have no particular ability, but do have a limitless ambition and am willing to work more than hard.

My ambition is to become the editor of either The Nation or the New Republic. How should I approach the proposition? Should I go to a school of journalism, and if so, which one, or should I grab the first cub-reporter job that I can get?

Richmond, Indiana, September 20 J.

Books

First Glance

A YEAR or more ago some verses by Edith Sitwell in the London Spectator aroused a controversy which filled that paper's correspondence columns for several weeks running. The meaning of the verses, if there was any, had been obscure to many readers, and the question raised was whether an editor has the right to publish a poem which he knows will mystify its audience. The editor in this case, who happened to be of Miss Sitwell's sex, closed the discussion by saying that she had chosen to print the poem not because of its meaning or lack of meaning but simply because it had seemed to her beautiful; though half of the lines had conveyed nothing to her mind, her impression of the whole was of something competent and rare and so she had given it space. The editor seemed to me at the time to have made her point, and now that the disputed verses come back to light as a portion of a long poem by Miss Sitwell, "The Sleeping Beauty" (Knopf, $1.75), I am surer than ever that the decision was sound. I could not for the life of me tell anyone the story of "The Sleeping Beauty." It might be about Jack-the-Giant-Killer for all I know, or about the afternoon of a faun. But it gives me pleasure which is real and continuous if not profound; to that extent it deserves praise. Its author is one of the few interesting radical poets in England today. As editor of the anthology "Wheels" she introduced Aldous Huxley and others to a reluctant public; and now that Mr. Huxley is mentioned it is worth remembering that Miss Sitwell in 1916 anticipated the title of his most important book with her poem "Antic Hay," inspired by a line of Marlowe's. In the pages of "Wheels" and elsewhere she spoke for a generation young yet very old, impudent yet very tired—a generation which hoped and still hopes to see the end of several great traditions in English poetry. In their hands, though not in others which by chance are better, the trunk of that poetry has rapidly rotted to a stump in mid-wood. "The Sleeping Beauty" is an uncertain day-dream wherein old men, dwarfs, Chinese ladies, a wrinkled gardener, and the shadow of Queen Anne move under ancient trees while sunshine speckles down on green gravel. All this—and more—to the accompaniment of strange music, the music of lines which now fly like splinters of light and now sleep beneath a coating of moss. But I cannot say in many cases what those lines mean, as a while back I could not say what was meant by the best lines in an equally beguiling volume by the present author's brother, Sacheverell Sitwell. There is still another Sitwell poet—Osbert, brother of these two; but he has made little of his work public since the first years after the war, when he promised to become a considerable satirist of the savage kind.

John Crowe Ransom is another poet who will present difficulties to such readers as want their message clear. His first volume, "Chills and Fever" (Knopf, $1.50), contains a number of pieces which connoisseurs already know from magazines, particularly from that extraordinary Southern magazine of verse, The Fugitive. Not a poem here, however, is in any easy sense charming, and not an idea is obvious. Mr. Ransom will be liked most by those who are appreciative in its proper place of nervous and surprising verse, who find virtue in a dancing line. He has been at pains to salt his rhymes and pepper his diction with fresh, realistic words; he has wrenched his cadences to fit his wayward thought; he has written with an original, an almost acid gayety. Thus, for instance, he begins an epitaph which is bound to be long remembered for its combination of irony and innocence.

> Here lies a lady of beauty and high degree.
> Of chills and fever she died, of fever and chills,
> The delight of her husband, her aunts, an infant of three,
> And of medicos marvelling sweetly on her ills.

MARK VAN DOREN

Spiritual Adventures

The Little French Girl. By Anne Douglas Sedgwick. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

ONE is at least free to suspect that the anglomania of Henry James may have been only a halfway house on the road to Gaul. For one so scornful as he of those who are merely déraciné a second transplating could hardly, of course, be risked, and so it was in England that he remained rooted; but he was not above a dignified tour and there must have been moments at least when he wondered if the voyage from London to Paris were not only another stage in that journey away from Puritanism and toward Grace one leg of which he had already made. It would have taken him at least another lifetime and many tortuous volumes to decide even in his own indefinite faint way upon the respective merits of the two civilizations, and in the end the puritan still in him might have rebelled against a paganism so thinly disguised as that of France—or the artist in his soul might have whispered that a way of life regulated so completely by standards exclusively aesthetic must miss the highest art in escaping so completely from the moral conflict. But be that as it may, he was at least still interested; though England was his home he wrote "The Ambassadors," and the question just where, if anywhere, Anglo-Saxon morality had a right of arbitration outside of and beyond the arbitration of taste remained for him, like all questions, undecided, and he never ceased to seek adventure in dim regions where he could balance the claims of the one against the claims of the other.

Miss Sedgwick is, of course, a disciple of James, and she is in addition the most able of them all. So firmly established, however, is her reputation that it would be less worth while to dwell upon the delicacy and keenness of her perceptions than to attempt to discriminate between her and her master; this was the purpose of the reflections above, since with them in mind the distinction is not difficult to make and consists in this, that whereas he had doubts she has none. In her last novel before this one an American girl was taken to England to be groomed into ladyhood and in the present work a jeune fille is snatched like a brand from the burning to be saved from the traditions of her country; but it is English society which stands as the absolute norm by which all other things are judged. The American may bring some crude ore worth the refining and the Frenchmen certain brilliants worthy of a better setting, but it is to England that such valuables must be brought if they are to exhibit their true worth. Upon this as upon other subjects Miss Sedgwick has come to a more clear-cut decision than the mind of her master was ever able to arrive at; the result is that her style can be less tortuously tentative than his—and that she can arrange confrontings of characters and situations in which the issues are more simply drawn. But the result is also that though she is one of the most interesting of contemporary novelists she is not quite so interesting as her master was. We feel as we never felt with James that she has no further real adventures in store for her in the field of international manners because her mind is too clearly made up.

By no means should the impression be given that her analysis is incomplete or unfair. On the contrary it is scrupulously complete. She can, for example, exhibit on the one hand that English absorption in "games" so distressing to the foreigner accustomed to regard them as the most important form of recreation and on the other hand that French habit of calm analysis so instinctive as to make even children seem surprisingly wise, at the same time that she can exhibit traits more flattering to the one or less admirable in the other. But her preferences are clear and, as one might easily suspect, it is the theory and practice of love which turns the balance. In a few pages of magnificent dialogue she confronts a romantic young Oxforder with a wise and weary savant who pleads like a master the Gallic views. To the one love is an exquisite art to be cultivated for the pleasures and pains which it alone can yield; to the other it is a half-exotic religion, exacting strange sacrifices and irrational forbearings. Nor is there for a moment a doubt that Miss Sedgwick prefers even the bungling performers of the religious ritual to the most exquisitely skilful practitioners of the art; and from that moment the problem is solved. Nothing remains but to save the poor little French girl from the traditions of her race.

The purpose of this brief criticism is far from being to say that Miss Sedgwick is wrong, to rebuke her for making a decision and then to make another. It is merely to point out that admirable as her work is it embodies a certain error of technique. In such a novel the source of greatest delight is in that sense which one always has in the case of James of adventuring with a sensitive soul and in balancing nuance against nuance without descending to the commonplace level of judgment. Every new observation is new evidence, swinging the scale now this way and now that but never definitely turning it to one side or the other before the end is reached. Yet Miss Sedgwick has not, to change the metaphor, kept her problem in solution. She has allowed it to crystalize too early into judgment and as soon as that has occurred the rest, however interesting, has lost one of the elements of its fascination. We have left only the story of the anglicization of a French girl—interesting enough as a story but no longer a spiritual adventure.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Value of a Survey

Greek Life and Thought: A Portrayal of Greek Civilization. By La Rue Van Hook. Columbia University Press. $4.

CAN the modern world know Greek culture without studying Greek? The rapid decline in the study of the Greek language has made this question insistent in the minds of teachers of the classics, and Professor Van Hook's book is the most successful of many recent attempts to solve it. His material is well selected, his style is lucid, his judgments in the main are sound and scholarly. He has, to be sure, most of the limitations of the academic habit of mind. He writes with more enthusiasm than imagination; he is unduly preoccupied with urging the claims of his subject upon the reader; he constantly draws "lessons" from ancient experience, careless of the changed conditions of modern life. He is, moreover, one of those humanists whom Horace M. Kallen aptly describes as "romanticists disturbed by their own times and fleeing for refuge to antiquity." His comments upon our "craze for novelty," our "love of variety and complexity, restlessness, and even exaggeration," our "jaded modern feeling" reveal this habit of mind, as does the spirit in which he approaches Greek culture, which is not that of the humanist who says "Nihil humanum a me alienum puto" but that of the seeker for an impossible Elysium, a world in which are found realized the "eternal canons of truth and beauty" by which all subsequent life and art are to be judged. Consequently the evils of Greek life are denied or minimized, and a perfection is unfolded which puts the reader in the mood of the Athenian citizen who voted for the ostracism of Aristides on the ground that he was tired of hearing him called "the just."

The habit of drawing lessons from ancient life is likely to prove equally repellent to the college student for whom the book is primarily written. Certainly the practice is a dangerous one in a world wherein history never repeats itself. A flagrant example of the fallacy which besets this procedure is Mr. Van Hook's remark that it is of "profound significance to the modern world" that the Greeks made no provision in their schools for vocational training—this with no mention of the bearing of slavery and other economic differences upon the practice of education.

Though the material of the book is admirably selected from the point of view of its intrinsic importance, such minor matters as dress, food, and burial customs being omitted in favor of fuller discussions of literature, philosophy, art, politics, and religion, still the ground covered is far too great to fulfil the author's purpose adequately. To a large extent the treatment is perforce reduced to a summary of information, and falls in line with that medieval overemphasis upon knowledge which is more deeply intrenched in the college curriculum than in any other part of our educational structure. There is slight value in telling the reader thus much and no more about Parmenides:

> Parmenides of Elea was a hearer of Xenophanes and of far greater originality as a thinker; he wrote a work on Nature, in hexameter verse, of which some lines are preserved. In this treatise he denied the possibility of change as expounded by his predecessors and maintained that Being alone exists. Whatever is, is, and cannot have arisen from nothing. Being is immovable, indivisible, continuous, and finite.

Or this about Isaeus:

> Isaeus specialized in the writing of speeches in will-cases and of these discourses eleven are extant.

The dry bones of fact regarding the Greeks contain little to nourish the spirit when stripped of the imaginative and emotional elements that are essential to Greek culture. Contrary as it is to the practice of American college education, there is something to be said for the view that a leisurely reading of one Greek play even in translation, supplemented by an imaginative interpretation of its relation to Greek life, or even a careful examination of a single Greek vase under competent guidance, would give the student more insight into the Greek spirit than a year spent upon a very excellent survey of Greek civilization.

CLARA M. SMERTENKO

The History of British Labor

An Outline of the British Labor Movement. By Paul Blanshard. George H. Doran Company. $1.50.

IN spite of the abundance of fugitive periodical literature on the British Labor movement there has hitherto been lacking any adequate summary of its history. This gap has now been filled by Mr. Blanshard's little volume, which supplies precisely the guide needed by any student who seeks a non-partisan and well-informed account of its achievements and aims. The writer, though evidently sympathetic, has wasted no space on glowing rhetoric, and has resisted all temptation to eulogistic comment. What he gives us is a compact and concise record in such a form as will make the book valuable for reference while none the less readable as a story.

Mr. Blanshard's detached position as an American observer enables him especially to note certain distinctive features of the movement which would have been likely to escape the eye of an English chronicler. His comparisons with the Labor movement in America are highly suggestive, and should be of interest to readers on both sides of the Atlantic. He reminds us, for example, that the English movement has the unity of race and geography. "Practically all the workers are British born and bred in Great Britain, with a common education and conception of life. . . . There is little opportunity for employers to play one national group against the other. There are no racial jealousies to divide the unions into quarreling factions." So, too, the smallness of Great Britain assists the unions. Employers cannot run away from them because there is no place to go, and the contagion of a strike or an organizing campaign may spread rapidly over the whole country. Mr. Blanshard emphasizes also the advantages possessed by British Labor in its practical exemption from attack by the legal weapons of injunctions and anti-boycott decisions and in its enjoyment of greater freedom of speech than is allowed in the United States.

In very few matters does Mr. Blanshard's estimate of the British Labor situation appear to call for revision. In his account of the political side of the movement he should have mentioned the recruits gained from that section of the Liberal Party which became unable to support it any longer after its abandonment of its old watchwords of "peace, retrenchment, and reform." When official Liberalism became Imperialist it took the wrong turning and compelled many of its most devoted followers to seek new party affiliations. In his chapter on the land problem, again, Mr. Blanshard seems to have missed the significance of the great change in the land-owning class that has come about in the last few years through the financial straits in which the territorial aristocracy has found itself and the consequent break-up of the big estates—a veritable agrarian revolution. When, too, Mr. Blanshard says that higher education in England has hitherto been "reserved for the upper classes" he repeats a popular delusion which would be dispelled by a census of the antecedents of the freshmen who have entered Oxford and Cambridge during the last fifty years. A few misspellings of proper names—such as "Kimmberly," "Myrther," and "Kier Hardie"—should be corrected in another edition.

HERBERT W. HORWILL

Spain's Chinese Revolution

Las Jornadas Triunfales de un Golpe de Estado. By Ramón Martínez de la Riva. Madrid-Barcelona: R. Molero.

IF the commander of the Western Division of the United States Army should telegraph around from San Francisco to his commanding colleagues elsewhere that the Coolidge administration at Washington had grown venal beyond endurance and oily beyond emulsion, and that he proposed to take the train to Washington and constitute himself chairman of a committee of major generals which would chase the politicians out of the capital and assume entire control of the executive end of the government; if President Coolidge, approving the general's modest plan, should at once wire to San Francisco that the arrangement met his heartiest approbation, and that he should be delighted to serve as dancing puppet president to the committee's piping if the generals should instal themselves comfortably at Washington, send Congress packing, discharge half the Supreme Court, declare the country under martial law, and proceed to announce a brand new public-school system, the abolition of trial by jury, the per cent of profit to be allowed provision dealers, and their choice for mayor of Indianapolis—the matter would no doubt cause considerable excitement, both in this country and elsewhere.

But General Primo de Rivera, Captain General of the Fourth Region, with headquarters at Barcelona, performed in Spain last September, mutatis mutandis, the exploits outlined above and others; and not only did the foreign press treat the incident with calm indifference, but Spain herself, accustomed of old to martial law and almost celestial in her skeptical equanimity in the face of governmental changes which dub themselves reforms, acquiesced without enthusiasm and went on about her business. Since America has heard so few details of General Primo de Rivera's really remarkable painless one-man revolution, a history of the movement's early stages fills a real want. Ramón Martínez de la Riva, a whole-souled admirer of the general, has made a volume out of little else than scraps of the dictator's magniloquent but vigorous pronouncements, plus fragments of newspaper comment, Spanish and foreign, with an occasional paragraph of naive comment which is, as often as not, miles ahead of his cited documents. Thus, beginning a chapter on Foreign Opinion with the assurance: ". . . the military movement has been viewed in foreign countries with unanimous satisfaction," he quotes "a great French daily" (not named) which, without a syllable of personal approval, remarks that "In the capitalistic centers and among business circles the coup d'etat has produced satisfaction" but notes that "The great mass of the population, as always, has given evidence of the most absolute indifference." The Gaulois, quoted next, is quite as non-committal, and the Times, mentioned as representative of the British press, cautiously opines that the well-known conservatism and common sense of the Spanish race will prevent the usurpation, concerning whose occasion and merits no opinion is expressed, from eventuating in bloodshed or disorder. The German papers are not quoted, but the admission is made that the socialist Lokal Anzeiger disapproves. We are informed that the American newspapers are "likewise favorable," but we are given no citations. And this is the entire chapter on the "unanimous satisfaction" of the foreign press.

We have the compiler's word and the general's, but not a trace of evidence, not a concrete fact or a figure, upon the purifying and regenerating effect of the coup. Yet we do have a readable account of the curious affair, enriched with photographs of all the important actors. ROY TEMPLE HOUSE

A Successor of Conrad?

Ordeal. By Dale Collins. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

JUST as word came of the death of Joseph Conrad, a first novel appeared by one who may prove to be his successor. "Ordeal," like almost any of Conrad's novels, shows men and women in the grip of implacable nature. The mid-Pacific is there, vast and impressive, with its burning trades and swift, fierce hurricanes, capricious and dwarfing to the human destinies that float across its surface. Its moods become natural agents in the progress of the tale. The tropic calm, the welcome rain, the storm which batters the fragile yacht and makes a derelict of her, all help to deliver the occupants of the Spray into Ted's cruel hands as the storm in "Victory" prevents Davidson from reaching the island of Samburan and precipitates the final catastrophe.

"Ordeal" tells how Ted the steward, by malign contrivance and with the aid of ocean calm and storm, achieved majesty on board a yacht. Ted was a "bully who had sulked through years of servitude and, whining bitterly the while, had ground hate to a razor-edge on the wheel of circumstance." In the perfection of his villainy he is reminiscent of Mr. Jones or of Ricardo.

To satisfy his lust for power he murdered the mate. He set passengers and crew against one another. His control of the Spray, complete in that moment of hurricane, stirred him at last to maniac delusions of grandeur like those which possessed Kurtz in "Heart of Darkness."

The situation is one that Conrad himself might have used. But the author of "Lord Jim" would have developed it from some romantic aspect, while Mr. Collins's treatment is cynical and realistic. He shows human nature reckless but unheroic in its moments of ordeal. The crude, primitive instincts—hunger, sex, self-preservation—are all that remain. So the wealthy passengers of the Spray are dazed and brutalized by the hardships through which they pass. Viola Thorpe, the exquisite, the magnetic, quarrels with her husband like any fish-wife, and Paul Thorpe, thinker and sensitive scholar, descends to beating his wife. Only old Lady Daley, sheltered behind the wall of deafness, maintains her balance, and by an act of glorified common sense accomplishes the downfall of the steward. For once danger is not alluring and peril does not elevate, and the passengers of the Spray are none the wiser for their experience. They have suffered no sea-change at the end of their six-weeks' struggle. Returned to his world, Thorpe and his friends accept the pink-and-gold comforts of the rescue-ship Ithalia as if there had never been a time when they longed for tobacco or prayed for an additional ration of water.

Though it lacks the grandeur of theme which one finds in the best of Conrad, there is sustained power in this harsh, straightforward narrative. It is told in cadenced phrases, with a wealth of shrewd imagery often as beautiful as Conrad's own. The shifting metaphors correspond to atmospheric changes and to the changing quality of human emotions. This habit of symbolism has certainly been derived from the elder writer. The marks of his master's hands are plain on Mr. Collins. ROSE LEE

Human Conduct

Pleasure and Behavior. By F. L. Wells. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

MR. WELLS has written a book that few can read to the end. All humanity is interested in his question: Is there such a thing as "pleasure"—something which can serve as a stimulus for adjustment? Is it something that we can strive for and attain, as we can technique in painting or in music or as we can material wealth? Or is "pleasure" merely a word carried along as a term mystical philosophers like to play with?

Unfortunately, with Mr. Wells the latter is the case. "Pleasure" with him seems to be an essence of some kind—a mental existence. It seems there can be both physical and mental pleasure. When we inquire searchingly into them we are virtually sent to school again to read introspective psychology.

"The chief pleasures arise from the operation of the major instincts. Such instincts serve a special end or goal and primarily meet a bodily need." Apparently the past ten-year onslaught on the concept of instincts at the hands of psychologists has passed lightly over Mr. Wells's head. It is evident that he still prefers teleology to modern science.

One must accuse Mr. Wells of being unsystematic and almost trite. At the end of each chapter, as at the end of the book, we hear ourselves saying almost aloud: Shall we never have a book on human conduct freed from scholasticism and mid-Victorianism—one based wholly upon facts gleaned from watching people live? JOHN B. WATSON

Music and Musicians

The New Encyclopedia of Music and Musicians. Edited by Waldo Selden Pratt. The Macmillan Company. $6.

THERE has long been a need for an abridged and up-to-date encyclopedia of music and musicians, one more international in tendency than that of the anglicized Grove's. Waldo Selden Pratt's work is an attempt to meet this need. Its stated aim is to combine in one volume of about a thousand pages "the essential values of the several lines of dictionary-making in the musical field." The material has been condensed and headed under three divisions, each division having its own alphabet and followed by its own appendix. According to the design outlined in the preface, the first division gives "the form and terms of musical art," with a survey of the bibliography relating to them. The second division gives biographical and statistical facts of "some 7,500 musicians who have been active during the last two hundred years, with a classified summary of the work of about 1,000 others before the year 1700. And the third division gives the principal musical organizations and institutions throughout the musical world, with a chronological list of operas and oratorios produced since 1900.

The material easily falls into the divisions outlined, and is fairly comprehensive, except in the Americana. Why, for intance, should Lambert Murphy, Florence Macbeth, Kathleen Howard, and Lila Robeson be mentioned and such equally prominent singers as Sophie Braslau, Jeanne Gordon, Mabel Garrison, Lucy Gates, Orville Harrold, Edward Johnson, and others be omitted? Why a paragraph given to Maud Powell and only a few lines to Leonora Jackson, who had an even more brilliant career and was probably the greatest violinist we ever produced? Indeed, the biographical section as a whole is exceedingly weakened by the editors' policy of trying to characterize and estimate their subjects. With the Russians, for example, Moussorgsky and Scriabin are listed as "eminent," Gretchaninoff "important," Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff "distinguished," Prokofieff "ultra-modern," and Stravinsky "eccentric." In Central Europe, Schönberg is merely "eccentric," while Schreker is "eminent"; and the two finest English composers, Holst and Bax, are introduced without any adjectives at all, though Vaughan Williams is "eminent" and Arthur Hinton "important." Or again, Offenbach and Sousa are "famous," while Richard and Johann Strauss, Schumann and Debussy are only "distinguished." Our own John Alden Carpenter is merely headed as "merchant and composer." Occasionally these biased headings stray into biased criticism, which seems strangely out of place in a volume that should adhere solely to impersonal facts. Moreover, such criticism may seem exceedingly absurd five or ten years from now when what appears "eccentric," "futuristic," and "important" to the editors today may appear very old-fashioned indeed to the world then. Nor will the "New" of the title be particularly appropriate, unless the editors contemplate a revision and addition every few years. The illustrations of instruments and musicians scattered throughout the volume seem to have been selected in a somewhat haphazard way, and might well have been omitted. But as the ideal encyclopedia has yet to make its appearance, one must, perforce, recommend this one in the meantime, for it is the best one of its kind that has come our way. HENRIETTA STRAUS

Books in Brief

The Authors' Thames. By Gordon S. Maxwell. Brentano's. $4.50.

The Thames, in John Burns's famous phrase, is "liquid history," and much of that history is literary as well as political. Mr. Maxwell has provided us here with a thesaurus of the river's literary associations from Julius Caesar to Jerome—the English Jerome. He not only records its connection with the lives of distinguished English writers who have made their homes in the Thames Valley but transcribes the numerous allusions to it in literature of every variety. He recalls even such incidents as Becky Sharp's throwing Johnson's Dictionary out of the window of the coach when she left Miss Pinkerton's Academy on Chiswick Mall. The book covers only the stretches of the river between Putney and Windsor, but Mr. Maxwell takes into account its tributaries also, and is thus able to bring in Box Hill and George Meredith. The compilation is a useful one, and the wonder is that no one has undertaken the task before.

Poe—Man, Poet, and Creative Thinker. By Sherwin Cody. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Mr. Cody's book is less important than its title would seem to indicate; one expects a study and gets an anthology. There are a brief biographical introduction and short prefatory comments to the different groups of selections, but more than three-fourths of the book is Poe's own, and Mr. Cody, very much of an enthusiast, does not illuminate greatly. Poe's personality, now overlaid with the successive coats of lamp-black and whitewash applied by his various biographers, is not made clearer and the relation between that character and his works is nowhere satisfactorily explained. The forces that wrecked his life also were responsible for his works, but that fact few of his critics have attempted to explain or even been willing to admit.

Footlights and Spotlights. By Otis Skinner. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

Among other things, an "old-school" actor is one of those who in boyhood were somewhat incongruously inspired by love of Shakespeare to go out and act Uncle Tom or something worse upon the contemporary stage. By this definition or any other one Mr. Skinner belongs to the old school. His father, a Universalist minister, knew Barnum, who was a Universalist because that was the only Christian sect which "believed in success," and, armed with an introduction from Barnum, Skinner set out upon his adventures. Looking back over the years he has many anecdotes to tell of barn-stormers and stars and many amusing adventures to relate. He writes not only with considerable charm but with a genuine modesty as well; his book is as amusing a volume of theatrical memoirs as has been seen in some time.

Gossip of the 17th and 18th Centuries. By John Beresford. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

A group of essays describing persons and incidents thoroughly characteristic of their time. The two papers which are based upon unpublished material are trivial, but in the best, January 30, 1649 (the execution of Charles I) and Anne Hyde, the author utilizes familiar contemporary and modern sources to sketch a story and evoke an atmosphere.

Drama

Melodrama and Aspirations

"IDEAS" are common enough in current plays. The reigning mode is inclined to favor them and if the playright, as is probable enough, does not happen to possess any of his own they can be borrowed as easily as any other theatrical material. Ideas, however, even stolen ones, unfortunately require to be at least assimilated if anything is to be made of them, and since the typical playwright really regards them as unnecessary nuisances brought into favor by tiresome aliens they tend, in his hands, to become only excrescences upon his native melodrama or his homely sentiment, and they resolutely refuse to grow into plays in their own right. The result is an effect not unlike that produced by the formula of the more pretentious movies: a symbolical title, a few highbrow inserts, and an abundance of the train wrecks and fist fights which constitute the real business of the piece. Theoretically the play has an idea, actually it possesses little more than a few pretentious labels.

Without any unfairness, "The Great Music" at the Earl Carroll Theater may be taken as a typical example of the thing under discussion. Martin Brown, the author, is an extremely capable writer of colorful melodrama, but he has no real passion for thought. He has merely been moved, like so many contemporary writers, by a vague feeling that he should deal somehow with great things, and accordingly he has borrowed, probably from "The Moon and Sixpence," a highly dramatic idea without having any great interest in it for its own sake or any real capacity for developing what he has appropriated. He starts out bravely with a young composer who decides, for the sake of the development of his genius, to break his word to his father and elope to Paris with a married woman who preaches the Gauguin morality and promises to aid him in the development of his talent. For a brief moment in the second act the author comes to grips with the intellectual and moral aspects of his theme and trembles for a time upon the edge of the genuine drama of ideas when he shows the hero realizing for the first time that his mistress has aided him, not because she really sets great store by his music, but because, like his parents, she was willing to use any means to hold him for herself. This scene is even well written, but it completely exhausts both the mind and the patience of the author so that he calls a quick curtain to his rescue and then plunges into a series of melodramatic events which, however interesting they may be in themselves, have nothing whatever to do with the problem in hand. Doubtless the scene in the harlot's quarter of Port Said, in which the drugged hero drags himself from a chair and fires a deadly bullet into the belly of a ruffian just about to commit a rape upon the sentimental prostitute, will send a shiver down the most blasé spine; doubtless also the closing act, which introduces the inevitable dark-skinned vamp of the Marquesas, has also its elements of simple appeal. But neither the one nor the other grows out of the supposed theme of the play or illuminates it in any way.

Budding though thwarted geniuses happen at the present moment to be extremely popular, and the introduction of one of them into a play is a sign that the author is taking himself seriously, but let us, for the purpose of experiment, remove him from "The Great Music" and substitute a more conventional figure—the disappointed lover who can go down hill for well-established reasons and who is quite untroubled by any of the newer ideas. Not one-fifth of all the present play would require any alteration to fit the changed state of affairs and not a single major event would need to be modified. In other words, "The Great Music" is merely imitation goods.

To such shoddy the work of Mr. Arthur Richman furnishes the best possible contrast. There is nothing brilliant about his conceptions and his moral ideas appear to be of the simplest, but they are nevertheless genuine and his real passion is for them; so that "The Far Cry" (Cort Theater), like his "Ambush," is the genuine working out of a simple idea instead of the bungling of a great or complicated one. Its conflict is again the conflict, this time happily terminated, between a good father and a frivolous daughter, but the sincerity and passion of the author freshen it, and Miss Margalo Gilmore gives an excellent performance in the role of the erring daughter.

Altogether "The Far Cry" is the play of the week most worth seeing, although the exquisitely beautiful setting which Mr. Lee Simonson has provided for the second scene of "Bewitched" (National Theater) is sufficient in itself to justify a visit to that entertaining play. "The Awful Mrs. Eaton" (Morosco Theater) is a play about Andrew Jackson. It will hardly entertain any save those naive enough to feel a patriotic warmth about the heart when the butler gives us stentorian assurance that the fat man in a brown suit is Daniel Webster or that the young lady in a white wig is to be considered, for dramatic purposes, Dolly Madison. Costumes and names are the play's sole assets.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

RAND SCHOOL

7 East 15th Street

Stuyvesant 3094

Saturday afternoon lectures

Oct. 25, 1:30 P.M. ..... Morris Hillquit
"Labor, Socialism and the Progressive Movement"

Oct. 25, 3:30 P.M. ... John Langdon-Davies
"Why Labor Rules England"

Nov. 1, 1:30 P.M. ..... J. F. Horrabin
"H. G. Wells and World History"

Nov. 8, 1:30 P.M. ..... Carleton Beals or Roberto Haberman
"Mexico of Today"

Nov. 15, 3:30 P.M. ..... J. Vint Laughland
"Is Religion Social or Anti-Social?"

Beginning Sat., Nov. 15, 1:30 P.M., "Current History," Scott Nearing.
Sunday, November 30, Darrow vs. Nearing,
"Is the Human Race Worth Working For"

EXTRAORDINARY LECTURE!

"WHY TROTZKY HATES MacDONALD; or, HOW LABOR RULES ENGLAND"

A frank exposition of the differences between the principles, aims and methods of the Labor Party of England and the Communist Party of Soviet Russia

by John Langdon-Davies

Labor Party Candidate for Parliament
Journalist, Oxford Lecturer
(First appearance in this country)

This Sunday, October 19, 8:30 p. m.

Cooper Union, 4th Avenue and 8th St.

Tickets 75c. (plus war tax)
On sale at the offices of or by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 5th Ave., N. Y. C. Tel. Longacre 10434-4447

. . . Announcing . . .

TRANSCONTINENTAL LECTURE TOUR

(January 1st to March 15, 1925)

of

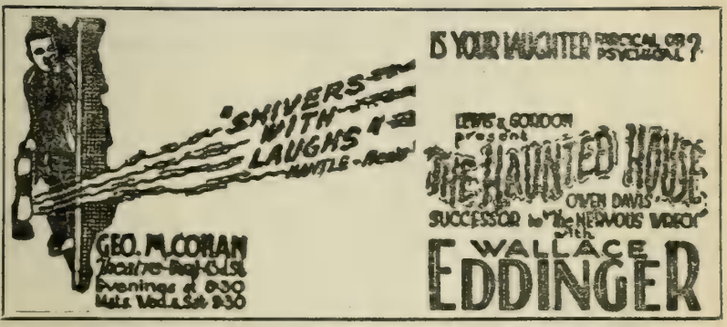
UPTON SINCLAIR

Clubs, unions, locals and other groups desiring to engage Mr. Sinclair for a lecture, write to us for dates, subjects, terms, etc.

Mr. Sinclair is making a very liberal offer of his books with each lecture, which will enable any group to cover the expenses of a Sinclair engagement through the sale of his books at his lecture

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
(Exclusive Management)
500 Fifth Avenue New York City

N. B.—Mr. Sinclair will lecture and debate in New York during February and March, 1925. Send us your name for announcements of these events.



The DEBATE of the CENTURY!

Is CAPITAL PUNISHMENT a Wise Public Policy?

Clarence DARROW says NO!
Famous Chicago Attorney in the Leopold-Loeb Case
VERSUS
Judge Alfred J. TALLEY says YES!
N. Y. Court of General Sessions
Chairman: LOUIS MARSHALL
Temporary Chairman, LEWIS E. LAWES,
Warden of Sing Sing Prison

Sunday Afternoon, October 26, 3 P. M.

Manhattan Opera House, 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.

Tickets $1.65, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30, $4.40.

On sale at Box Office, all branches of Tyson's and McBride's Ticket Agencies, or at the offices of and by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., N.Y.City. (Longacre 4447-10435)

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, send us their names.

The DEBATE of the SEASON!

SHOULD LITERATURE BE CENSORED?

JOHN S. SUMNER — Secretary, New York Society for Suppression of Vice versus
ERNEST BOYD — Noted International Author and Critic

Chairman: CLIFFORD SMYTH, Editor, International Book Review

SUBJECT:

RESOLVED: That limitations upon the contents of books and magazines as defined in proposed legislation would be detrimental to the advancement of American literature.

Mr. BOYD, Affirmative Mr. SUMNER, Negative

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1924, AT 8:30 P. M.

TOWN HALL—West 43d St., near Sixth Ave.

Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75, 3.30 (war tax inc.)

On sale at Brentano's, Macy's Book Dept. and Wanamaker's Book Dept., and at the offices of or by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., N.Y.City (Longacre 10434-4447)

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, send us their names.

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

General Hertzog's Policy

An Interview

By M. B. D.

ON August 4, at the request of The Nation, I interviewed the new Premier of South Africa in his office in the House of Assembly. General Hertzog was to leave for up-country on the following morning, not to return until the next session of the Union Parliament, which should open in February of 1925. I was sensible of his courtesy, very characteristic of the man, in making time for this interview on a day of such manifold businesses. The General, however, had not forgotten his meeting with the staff of The Nation on his visit to America, some years ago. He gave me a clear half hour of his precious afternoon, answering in careful, deliberate, unhesitating English sentences the questions I put to him. These, with the reply to each in his own words, follow:

QUESTION 1. What were the reasons which called the Nationalist Party into existence?

GENERAL HERTZOG. The Nationalist Party, which started in 1913, is due mainly to the fact that the old South African Party had become too much of a capitalist party influenced by the leaders of the mining industry, whose policy had been and was at the time calculated more to advance outside interests than those of the people in South Africa.

QUESTION 2. What is the basic difference today between the Nationalists and the South African Party?

GENERAL HERTZOG. The basic difference today is largely the same as in 1913, with an additional difference in their industrial policy—the South African Party being mainly representative of free-trade principles, whereas the Nationalists are unanimously in favor of protection and the fostering of South African industries.

QUESTION 3. Can English South Africans honestly join the Nationalists?

GENERAL HERTZOG. There is no reason whatsoever why Englishmen should not be as good Nationalists as any of the Dutch-speaking (South Africans). True, so far, the ranks of the Nationalists have been filled almost exclusively by the Dutch-speaking, but that is not due to anything inherent in the politics or the policy of the party. It is rather the result of past history. No doubt a great many of the English-speaking would have been members of the Nationalist Party were it not that the Nationalist Party has been held out by their opponents as being at the same time a republican party. This is only true in so far as the great majority of the members of the party do hold that the republican form of government would be the best for South Africa. This is, however, not a principle for which the Nationalist Party as a party stands.

QUESTION 4. What is your attitude toward other nations?

GENERAL HERTZOG. Our attitude is one of good-will and friendship to all nations; we have no aggressive imperialistic inclinations.

QUESTION 5. What are your relations with the Labor Party?

GENERAL HERTZOG. Our relations with the Labor Party have always been of the most friendly and sympathetic nature, holding as we do that one of the essential requisites for a country's welfare is the welfare and prosperity of its laboring classes.

QUESTION 6. What is your attitude toward the natives?

GENERAL HERTZOG. Of the native the party holds that he is a child, requiring all the care, but also the discipline, necessary for the child's welfare. We are convinced that the giving of the franchise to the native is neither to the advantage of the white man nor of the native himself. In order to advance his well-being it will be necessary for many years to come to follow a policy of differentiation as ever against the European (i. e., the white man) both politically and industrially; whereas social equality cannot be thought of.

QUESTION 7. What is your attitude toward woman suffrage?

GENERAL HERTZOG. The Nationalist Party has no objection as a party to woman suffrage, but it is not a question upon which the party has thought necessary to declare itself either way.

Savinkov's Story

THE sensational confession of the famous revolutionist and counter-revolutionist, Boris Savinkov, was referred to in press dispatches at the time of his trial. The actual text of his story, however, has not been printed at any length in American newspapers. The following summary of the confession by a correspondent of the International Press Correspondence appeared in its issue of September 11:

Shortly before the sixth anniversary of the attempt upon the life of Comrade Lenin, there stood as an accused before the military court of the Highest Court of Justice of the Soviet Union one of the originators of this attempt, one of the most desperate, active, and clever enemies of the Russian workers' and peasants' revolution, the former revolutionary and terrorist Boris Savinkov. His speech of defense occupied two whole days and in the mouth of Savinkov became a powerful, bitter, and annihilating indictment against himself, against the whole of European imperialism with all its Curzons and Poincarés, with all its MacDonalds and Masaryks. . . .

Those who are familiar with the life of Boris Savinkov will hardly be of the opinion that he abandoned his six years' fight against the revolution and compromised his former protectors and confederates in a most definite manner out of cowardice or from fear of the death sentence. Boris Savinkov was one of the most courageous revolutionaries during the time of the Czar and one of the boldest counter-revolutionaries in recent years, who very often risked his life. When he broke down and declared before the Revolutionary Court of Justice that he recognizes no other power in Russia but the Soviet power, it amounted to nothing less than the de jure recognition of the October Revolution on the part of the whole Russian counter-revolution. . . .

WHY SAVINKOV BECAME A COUNTER-REVOLUTIONARY?

Some days before the court proceedings, Savinkov submitted a written confession in which he sought to state the reasons why he, the former revolutionary who participated in the murder of the Czarist Minister Plehve and of the Grand Duke Sergei Alexandrovitch and who, as he said, had sacrified his whole life for the people, had fought with weapons in his hands against the Russian workers and peasants. He put forward four reasons:

> Firstly . . . I was a Social Revolutionary, consequently I was compelled to defend the Constituent Assembly; secondly, I believed that the prematurely concluded peace was fatal for Russia; thirdly, I believed that if we Democrats did not fight against the Communists, the Monarchists would capture power, and fourthly, we could not in the year 1917 foresee that the Russian workers and peasants would stand in masses behind the Communist Party.

These are the reasons which Savinkov puts forward. These reasons, however, Savinkov declared, have ceased to be valid.

> The Constituent Assembly has proved to be a mere fiction. The Communists have completely annihilated the Monarchists and rendered impossible a restoration, finally, and this was the most important, the Communist Party of Russia was supported by the workers and peasants of Russia, that is, by the Russian people . . . I have the courage to declare openly that my tenacious, prolonged fight, my life and death struggle with every means against you has been futile. This fact shows that the Russian people stands not behind us but behind the Russian Communist Party . . . I did not know that in the year 1924 the Communist Youth League would have one million members.

Savinkov begins his actual confession in the proceedings by describing how immediately after the outbreak of the October Revolution he began his counter-revolutionary activity. When he learned that generals Kaledin and Kornilov were attempting to organize a voluntary army against the Bolsheviki, he immediately joined them. The conditions in this army brought him his first disappointment.

I had the impression that nobody thought of the fatherland, that everyone was concerned with his own petty interests . . . I said that it was perfectly impossible to fight against you unless we had the support of the peasantry and unless we defended the interests of the peasants. To this Bogayevski answered: "No, the day of Democracy is past; we rely upon the bourgeoisie and the Cossacks."

In spite of this Savinkov and the other "Democrats" fought on the side of these generals. He was, however, not satisfied with the whole thing as it was, and seized the initiative himself. He formed the notorious "Union for the Defense of the Fatherland and Liberty." This also he intended should have a democratic form, but it turned out otherwise. The Union in its program adopted the standpoint of dictatorship.

THE PRESIDENT: Whose dictatorship?

SAVINKOV: That is not stated in the program. (Laughter.)

And then Savinkov related further how the Democrats, "the protectors of the people," fought in the name of democracy against the dictatorship of the proletariat in order to set up the dictatorship of the Monarchists. Savinkov, as an experienced revolutionary, began to create an illegal officers' organization on the lines of the old romantic pattern of the Social Revolutionaries.

THE PLOT AGAINST LENIN AND TROTZKY

Regarding his connection with the attempted assassination in the year 1918, Savinkov declared as follows:

I always held the view that if I was conducting a war, I must make use of every means. We desired before all an armed revolt, but we did not abandon terrorist acts. In 1918 we planned an attempt against Lenin and Trotzky, but very little came of it. Not because we did not desire it, but because we were not able to do it.

Savinkov described in detail the role of the French ambassador Noulens in the counter-revolutionary rising in Jaroslav and Rybinsk. The French financed the movement. They demanded, however, deeds in return for their money. Noulens ordered Savinkov to begin the revolt in Jaroslav or Rybinsk at the beginning of July, 1918, and promised effective support in the form of landing French troops. The revolt was commenced. The support, however, was not forthcoming.

THE PRESIDENT: Did the left Social Revolutionaries also take part in the negotiations with the French?

SAVINKOV: I was not in touch with the left Social Revolutionaries, but I know from French sources that they also received support from the French. . . .

MASARYK AND THE TERROR

THE PRESIDENT: From what source did you derive your money at this time and what was the amount?

SAVINKOV: I remember at the time I was in the greatest desperation, as I did not know where we could obtain money, when, without any solicitation from me, we were approached by certain Czechs, who handed me over a sum of 200,000 Kerensky rubles. This money saved our organization at that time . . .

THE PRESIDENT: Who was it who gave this money to you?

SAVINKOV: Klepando.

THE PRESIDENT: In whose name?

SAVINKOV: In the name of Masaryk.

THE PRESIDENT: Did you know under what conditions the Czechs paid over this money?

SAVINKOV: They declared as follows: They desired that this money should be employed for terrorist fighting purposes. They knew—I did not conceal the fact—that I recognized terror as a means of struggle, they knew that and gave us money, emphasizing that it should be chiefly used for terrorist purposes . . .

"THE CUP OF DEGRADATION"

The Russian patriots . . . could not help noticing very soon that the sublime friendship of the Allies was not for the sake of them personally but for the Russian petroleum wells and other mineral riches.

No matter how much I endeavored to obtain our admission to the discussion of the Treaty of Versailles, we Russians were not allowed to cross the threshold . . . We did not know what was being decided there, and what they thought. We were not invited to any conference, not even with advisory votes. It became obvious that they drove us on to fight at every opportunity, but did not want to help us. In fact, they gave considerable help to Denikin, but we had to drain the cup of degradation. . . . We had to beg for every pair of boots.

Savinkov succeeded in obtaining a certain measure of support from England. To the question of the president under what conditions he suceeded in getting this, Savinkov replied:

There were no actual conditions, but the English attempted to have their policy carried out. They spoke to me very persistently about its being desirable to set up an independent South-Eastern Federation consisting of Northern and Transcaucasia. They said this Federation would only be the beginning, as Azerbeidjan and Georgia would be joined to it later on. Here one smelt naphta . . .

Churchill once showed me the map of South Russia, in which the positions of Denikin's and your army were indicated with little flags. I still remember how shocked I was when I went to him and he, pointing to the Denikin flags, said suddenly: "This here is my army."

THE PRESIDENT: Did you make any reply to this?

SAVINKOV: I did not reply, but stood as if rooted to the spot. I was going to leave the room, but then I thought if I made a scandal here and shut the door on myself, our soldiers in Russia would be left without boots.

THE PRESIDENT: It is not clear from your statement for what purpose the English and French supplied you with these boots, shells, machine guns, etc.

SAVINKOV: Officially, they had very noble aims. We were faithful allies, you were traitors, etc. In the background there was the following: as a minimum: well, naphta is a very desirable thing. As a maximum: let the Russians squabble among themselves, the fewer there are left living the better, Russia will be all the weaker. . . .

THE "CHIEF ERROR"

The President again asked Savinkov what had prompted him to submit to such humiliations as, for instance, the conversation with Churchill.

SAVINKOV: When Churchill said to me, "That is my army," I turned icy cold. Yes, I had committed a great error, but my errors are only the consequence of my chief error, namely, that I turned against you in October. After the October upheaval I thought: The Bolsheviki are usurpers, they have not the people behind them. There, there reigns dissolution, murder, chaos—here, with the Whites, will be order, discipline, and idealism, here there will be no murder. And all this has proved totally false. And with horror I became more and more convinced that they thought not of the fatherland, not of the people, but only of their own class interests. A deeper disappointment was brought to me by the realization that a white movement was impossible without foreign aid. . . . I went through everything, I saw everything in this white movement and learned to hate it.

Savinkov forsook the white movement and began to organize the "green" peasant movement. He attempted to incite great peasant revolts, but here again he met with "disappointment"; his peasant movement degenerated into a band of brigands.

At the conclusion of his confession Savinkov summed up the results of his life and his struggle against the workers and peasants. He made use of all the arts of style of his poetic talents in order, apparently, not to convince the judges, but himself, that he was not a criminal, that even when he conducted a life and death struggle against the Russian workers and peasants he was convinced that he was fighting for the "people." This had involved a severe inner struggle. He quite broke down when he spoke of his revolutionary past:

I remember one summer morning. Petrograd. Ismainovski Prospect. . . . Upon the pavement there lies Sasanov, stretched out, wounded, his blood spurts out, and I stand beside him. Close by there stands the shattered coach of Plehve. A policeman approaches me excitedly, the revolver is in my hand. . . . I remember also the fortress of Sevastopol. Iron bars as now. The sentinel goes to and fro before my door. Death penalty as today. I remember all this. How happy I was at that time when I sat in the cell. How proudly my heart beat. I knew that the whole Russian people, all workers and peasants were with me and that there was not a single person in the whole of Russia who would not think of me when I died. And I stood with joy and pride before my judges. They did not hang me; I escaped. Now it is otherwise. Now I am overpowered by a deep gloomy feeling. I ask myself whether the Russian workers, whether the Russian peasants will understand my life, whether they will believe that I did not sin against them consciously but only from error. It is hard to die with this feeling. . . .

After a hard, long, and bloody struggle against you, in which perhaps I have done much more than many others, I declare without any compulsion to do so that I unconditionally recognize the Soviet power and only the Soviet power. And I call upon every Russian who loves his fatherland, I who carried on this bloody and hard struggle against you, I who repudiated you as no other: If you are a Russian, if you love your people, then submit to the workers' and peasants' power and recognize it unconditionally.

Contributors to This Issue

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD is traveling through the Middle West speaking for La Follette.

SINCLAIR LEWIS, who writes of political conditions in Gopher Prairie and Zenith for The Nation, sailed for Europe on October 8.

PAUL HARWOOD MILLAR is an analyst in the State Seed Laboratory at Fayetteville, Arkansas.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is on the staff of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

CLARA M. SMERTENKO is professor of English at Skidmore College.

HERBERT W. HORWILL is a British journalist who frequently contributes to The Nation.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE is head of the Modern Language Department at the University of Oklahoma.

JOHN B. WATSON is lecturer in psychology at the New School for Social Research.

HENRIETTA STRAUS is The Nation's music correspondent abroad.

The Fifth Avenue Restaurant

EXCLUSIVELY A LUNCHEON AND EVENING BANQUET RESORT ON THE GROUND FLOOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING, 200 FIFTH AVENUE TEL. GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907 INCL.

THEODORE KEMM, Proprietor

S.S.

PIONEERS IN SHIPPING

LIEBESGABEN (Relief Shipments)

Assortments from $5.00 up

Make up your own Assortment from our Price List
Ask for our Price List G

All Orders and Shipments Delivered FREE HOUSE!

SELF-PACKED PACKAGES

are FORWARDED WEEKLY and at rates commensurate with efficient service.

American Merchants Shipping & Forwarding Co.

H. von Schuckmann C. E. W. Schelling

30 Years' Shipping Experience with Hamburg-American Line

OFFICES: 147 S—4th Ave., cor. 14th St., New York City

HAMBURG OFFICE—KLEINE ROSENSTRASSE 10

The next two issues of

The Nation

both of which will be out before election, will contain a final summing up of the campaign by political experts in all parts of the country.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1924 No. 3095

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 455
EDITORIALS:
Can the Election be Bought?..... 458
Unto the Least of These..... 459
Gottlieb and Seiff..... 459
Heaven and Hell..... 460
SUMMING UP THE CAMPAIGN. By Oswald Garrison Villard..... 461
SHIPSTEAD TELLS SOME STORIES. By William Hard..... 462
BE BRISK WITH BABBITT. By Sinclair Lewis..... 463
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
On Love in Marriage. By Ludwig Lewisohn..... 464
WHAT IS WHEELER? By R. A. Haste..... 465
DIGGING UP CARTHAGE. By Elizabeth Knowlton..... 466
SONNET TO MINNA. By Maxwell Bodenheim..... 467
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter..... 467
CORRESPONDENCE 468
BOOKS:
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren..... 470
Hawthorne, Melville, Cabell. By Carl Van Doren..... 470
Willard Straight. By Nathaniel Peffer..... 471
The Story of Coal. By Winthrop D. Lane..... 472
Best and Worst. By Johan J. Smertenko..... 472
Welcome Reactions. By Temple Scott..... 473
Types of the Novel. By A. Donald Douglas..... 473
Books in Brief 474
DRAMA:
Two Experiments. By Joseph Wood Krutch..... 474
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
La Follette's Foreign Policy..... 476

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

INTO THE LAST LAP the campaign moves, and still the prophets are at sea. How much has the hullabaloo about the dear old Constitution—which has already been amended nineteen times without upsetting the Republic—alarmed the "silent voters" about the menace of La Follette? No one knows. How much has the picture of Republican complacency in the face of corruption burned into the hearts of the voters? No one knows. The electorate is becoming more and more of a mystery to the dopesters. The corner saloon is gone, and there is no political dope-shop to take its place. The women's vote is utterly incalculable. Increasingly of late years the voters have shown their complete indifference to the editorial views of their favorite newspapers, and newspaper opinion is no longer a safe yardstick. Straw votes indicate a surprising strength for a President who has not dared to name the Ku Klux Klan or speak his mind on a single important issue—but straw votes are almost always taken among the more prosperous sections of the population. Davis, the prophets agree, is surer of the border States than he seemed a month ago; but what can he win in the Northeast and how far East will the La Follette landslide carry? Those are the questions which the last week must answer. Meanwhile Davis and McAdoo, by their friendly tributes to La Follette's character, have introduced a healthy note of common sense into the campaign.

THE EAST thinks of ex-General Dawes as a valiant reactionary; a high-powered locomotive running rapidly in reverse. Wall Street thinks of him as a friend and ally. They don't know Charley as he is pictured out where the La Follette vote rolls up darkly across the blue sky of Republican confidence, out where farmers and ranchmen and miners and oil workers live and vote. For instance, he spoke one recent day in Casper, Wyoming. A two-page spread advertisement contributed by leading citizens and business concerns heralded his arrival, and revealed to the world Charles Gates Dawes—progressive, pacifist, radical friend of the workingman. The announcement read in part:

> Charles Gates Dawes moved to Lincoln from Ohio in 1887. He took a position as bookkeeper in a paper mill. Later he branched out into the law business. He was intensely interested in the anti-monopoly fight, became a live foe of the railroads and a recognized leader of the farmer movement for lower freight rates. . . . He was always a friend of the under dog. He was sympathetic and particularly fond of children. P. C. Spencer knew him in the early days, says that all the kids in town were his pals. . . . He became nationally and internationally prominent as a reconstruction agent working for a lasting peace. Dawes was nominated at the Cleveland Convention through the council of progressives.

We feel it our duty to let the bankers of the East know what a dangerous radical is this Minute Man Dawes to whom they have pledged their hearts and their dollars and their votes—or at least what he is when hunting votes in Wyoming.

WE HAVE OFTEN EXPRESSED the conviction that the American Legion should not take sides in politics, and on that account it seems unfortunate that Alvin Owsley, former national commander, and fourteen others prominent in the organization should have signed a statement arraigning the Republican Party for betraying our disabled ex-service men. Besides, the charge—when used as an argument for the election of Mr. Davis—is not strictly fair because the beginnings of this national disgrace took place in a Democratic Administration. Both old parties are implicated in this incredibly base and cruel scandal, and this fact alone ought to be sufficient reason why not only every ex-service man but every other decent American should blast Republicans and Democrats alike at the polls. The voter should remember, as the statement of this group of American Legion men says, that > Investigators have estimated that one-third of the money appropriated has been stolen by grafting politicians or wasted by incompetent office holders. A past director of the United States Veterans Bureau is under indictment for bribery. The present director is accused by leaders of his own party and by nonpartisan veterans' organizations of keeping incompetent department chiefs in power. For the first time in the history of our republic men were found low enough to rob the wounded.

These conditions, as the statement adds, are "intolerable and unforgivable"—and should not be forgotten or forgiven on November 4.

GERMANY TOO is to have an election. The long-drawn-out crisis has culminated in the decision that only a new balloting can give the country a government that will not be the plaything of party moods. With seven major political parties Germany has an even harder time than England to produce a coalition that can govern. Presumably this national election will show the same result as recent local pollings: the tendency, natural in time of increasing stability, to concentrate on the moderate middle parties. The extremists, both Left and Right, who made such great gains last May, are sure to lose ground—and the conservative Socialists, the Democrats, and especially the Catholic Centrists will gain. Somewhat will depend upon the outcome of the British elections. For it is a striking fact that today no country votes by itself alone. The outcome of the British election on October 29 may have some influence on the voting in this country on November 4, just as Ramsay MacDonald's victory in England a year ago paved the way to Herriot's triumph in France a few months later and as MacDonald's fall leaves Herriot shaky. Even political parties are coming to be international.

NOW THERE IS FIGHTING in South China as well as in the central provinces and the north. Press dispatches tell of a battle in the streets of Canton between "Fascisti" and "Red Armies," but this is oversimplifying. The Canton Merchants' Volunteer Corps is not fascist in the European connotation. It is an expression of Cantonese weariness with twelve years of revolutioneering by Sun Yat-sen and his cohorts. At one time the commercial elements of Canton were solidly behind Dr. Sun, morally and financially. They gave him numerous chances to practice the kind of government he preached. Instead war after war has been loosed on the city until its economic life has been paralyzed. Its population of two million or more has lived in constant terror of sacking by one side or another. When Dr. Sun, to further one of his political designs, brought into the province from a neighboring and traditionally hostile province undisciplined troops who subsequently looted a large district he alienated the Cantonese still further. The merchants—including the small merchants—organized, not for any political purpose but to rid the city of politics altogether. This threatened Dr. Sun's supremacy, and his troops tried to disarm the merchant forces, whence the collision.

CHINA IS NOT THE ONLY COUNTRY which would be happier if its politicians and soldiers were loaded onto a barge with a cargo of burning matches and TNT, but, being older, it has had better demonstration of the truth. Now, with three useless wars inflicting suffering on millions of innocent peasants all over the country, the point is being grievously labored. Whether Wu Pei-fu or Chang Tso-lin wins in the main conflict in the North, the country will be little better off. Domination by one general will be exchanged for domination by another. In either case China is weakened in resistance to foreign imperialism, which is the biggest issue before the Chinese nation. Fortunately, no pretext has yet been given for foreign intervention, despite the proximity of retreating bands of troops to the foreign concessions in Shanghai and Canton. Foreign property has been unmolested. Meanwhile our own Department of State, which has latterly been free with moral preachments to China on the subject of law and order, is happily silent. Election campaigns have their uses. With Mr. Secretary Hughes crediting peace in the Pacific to Republican achievement it would be embarrassing if American marines were to start shooting up Chinese towns. For the next few weeks Mr. Hughes will probably turn Nelson's blind eye on Chinese "chaos."

REAL ISSUES are hidden behind the effigy of unshaven Bolsheviks in the British elections even as in this country. If anything the English are a bit more picturesque. La Follette's opponents ask solemnly, "How much money has been sent from Russia through Mexico to help the La Follette campaign?" In England MacDonald's opponents sing

> Bolshevik, Bolshevik, where have you been?
> Over to England where the Reds are still green.

But the situation seems a little ironical in view of the action of the recent Labor Party conference in rejecting communism and Communists. After a three hours' debate the conference refused the affiliation of the Communist Party, refused to allow Communists to be indorsed as official Labor candidates or even to be members of the Labor Party at all. A recent Labor manifesto states that

> The Labor Party seeks to achieve the socialist commonwealth by means of parliamentary democracy. The Communist Party seeks to achieve the "dictatorship of the proletariat" by armed revolution. . . . The Labor Party holds a fundamental objection to tyranny quite apart from the social, political, or industrial standing of the tyrant.

In this country the Communists are denouncing La Follette as an arch-reactionary. Yet on both sides of the sea the bogy-industry seems to survive. Bogies are so much more interesting than issues.

THE PROSECUTION of Captain Robert Rosenbluth, charged with the murder in 1918 of his superior officer, Major Cronkhite, was made known to the country in columns of type and flaming headlines throughout the period of his indictments and trial. The final dismissal of the last indictment and Captain Rosenbluth's unconditional discharge were modestly noted in the press of October 15. They are worthy of more than passing attention. Never was a man more unjustly made the center of legal and extra-legal attack; never was government money more wantonly wasted. Captain Rosenbluth's career has been injured if not ruined; he has lived for years under the strain of indictments, threats, libels, and newspaper attacks. The Government, under Palmer and Daugherty, has spent some $200,000 in a vain effort to prove an innocent man guilty. Some good came out of the case; the best legal help in the country was freely offered for Rosenbluth's defense; citizens of the highest character offered their support and gave testimonials to his good repute. Robert Rosenbluth did not kill the man he was accused of killing; Major Cronkhite died of an accidental bullet wound from his own hand. But the persecution directed against Rosenbluth served as an indirect attack on all liberalism; his second indictment in 1922 served to prevent an inquiry into his case during the investigation of the Department of Justice then pending; the charges made against him were exploited by agents of anti-Semitism and international ill-feeling all over the country. Now, let us hope, their mouths are stopped. But it is too late to undo the harm that was done by the spectacle of legal bullying and by the bad blood stirred—just as it is too late to wipe out the injury to an innocent man.

WE ARE NOT FOND of rattling dead bones, but sometimes it is instructive to indicate how a fine institution can be and is being destroyed. It is as important to recognize and shun the technique of decay as to learn and put into effect that of growth. So we revert from time to time to Clark University, which ever since the election of Wallace W. Atwood as president has been deteriorating from a foremost institution of graduate research and scholarship into a glorified business college. In a recent university bulletin we read that "enlarged Clark" reopened on September 17. The first item describing this enlargement is noted under the head "Development of New Athletic Field." This, indeed, seems to be about the only justification for the boast: "When Clark University opens this fall it will be a larger institution in every way than ever before," because the enrolment shows not an increasing but a dwindling number of students. In 1922-23 the students numbered 379, in 1923-24 they dropped to 297, and this autumn the registration is only 274. The graduate department has been decimated, having dropped from ninety-four students two years ago to fifty-five this autumn. When Dr. Atwood advertised the new policy at Clark by stopping a speech by Scott Nearing he warned free scholars off the campus, and the warning has been heeded.

SOCIAL WORK is becoming international, and the question of immigration and emigration is shifting its center from the local to the larger movements of peoples. The International Migration Service is one of the pioneers in this field. It was started by the Young Women's Christian Association in 1921 as an experiment in international social work to give aid to women and children who had started for this country. Local charities in some of the European ports of embarkation gave temporary help to the emigrants, but an organization with a knowledge of law and legal procedure, with representatives in his homeland, in the port of embarkation, and in the country to which he was going, was needed. The International Migration Service filled this need and found itself investigating over 5,000 cases in a year—men, women, and children. This extensive service seemed to warrant an independent life for the bureau. Eventually, of course, this complicated question will have to be dealt with by an official international body.

FACTS ARE SAID TO BE stubborn things. But some people are so much more stubborn than facts that facts become non-existent to their prejudices and propaganda. The words défaitiste and défaitisme—coined in France in the bitter years of the European War—fill so evident a need in universal speech that they have been taken over into English as "defeatist" and "defeatism," and incorporated with suitable changes into other languages. Yet the French Academy, in a spirit, we suppose, of outraged patriotism voted the other day not to admit them to the dictionary. Likewise we note that Mr. Courtenay Guild of Boston has protested against the use of Leningrad instead of Petrograd or St. Petersburg on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra," he expostulates, "it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor." The Russian director disclaims any hand in the matter—as well he may. But we wonder what the excited Mr. Guild would say if someone in Holland should start a movement for addressing letters no longer to New York but to Nieuw Amsterdam.

WITH THAT DEGREE of serious effort and concentration attained only by college boys about their fun, Cornell is improving its organized cheering. Cheering has been "deplorable," it is charged, and a "definite body of rooters" must be built up. But here masculine college spirit runs head on into feminine college spirit, for the Cornell girls, it seems, demand and apparently take a place in the cheering section along with the boys. What can be done to suppress these viragos with their soprano cheers? The college paper is exercised over the question—and so are we. Feminine incapacity to shout in a hoarse bass against the November wind is undoubted. Nor can girls indulge successfully in cane rushes and hazing and military drill. Hope for the gradual growth of humor and intelligence in American colleges lies with the development of a spirit of unpatriotic aloofness in the less muscular members of the student body.

BLASCO IBANEZ, novelist of Spain, has announced with a flourish that he is about to begin a campaign against the Government of his country. His pen will hold back not one drop of ink, he declares, until the full iniquity of that dictatorship has been exposed. There can be no question not only that the present Government of Spain deserves the contempt of all writers who live under it but that any Government anywhere needs to be subjected from time to time to the passionate scrutiny of its men of letters. Yet several questions arise in connection with Blasco Ibanez's loud proposal. Why only now? It is perhaps a year since Miguel de Unamuno—a first-rate author—made his attack and suffered his banishment. Is heterodoxy safer today? How destructive are ideas which already have begun to be commonplace? And why an announcement? Original critics of the state have never announced programs for the simple reason that there was no audience which would know what the programs meant. Everybody now knows what Blasco Ibanez is preparing to begin to say; he has plenty of company. He would have more of our respect if he were a little lonelier.

CONSIDER THE PUSHCART. The New York City Department of Public Markets reports that in the congested Borough of Manhattan about 1,513,000 persons, or two-fifths of the population, are supplied with food by the pushcart. Nor is food the pushcart's only stock in trade. It offers pretty nearly everything else from framed pictures to tooth brushes, woolen socks, and babies' rattles. Its proprietor is willing to work a day of uncounted hours in scorching or frigid weather; he puts no money into advertising, he pays no tribute to landlords, he wastes nothing on expensive trappings or "service," and he is thankful to accept a profit that gives him the meagerest kind of livelihood—without thought of limousines or cabarets. There has been a determined effort to push the pushcart off the streets—chiefly on the part of those who seek more room for the gasoline pleasure cars of the well-to-do. Fortunately the effort has not been successful. All hail the pushcart!

Can the Election Be Bought?

LA FOLLETTE was right. There is a slush fund. The Republicans have admitted virtually every one of the Senator's charges about the attempt to buy the election. National Treasurer William V. Hodges admits that Pennsylvania's quota for this year's Republican campaign fund is $600,000, and adds that Illinois's is $400,000. The campaign manager, William M. Butler, admits that the total will be at least $3,000,000; but with the Pennsylvania and Illinois figures in mind it is difficult to take that figure seriously. It used to be reckoned that three-fourths of the campaign funds came out of New York City. The Republican National Committee admits raising and spending $1,714,317 before October 10—and every one knows that the vast bulk of campaign expenditures, including the expensive full-page newspaper advertisements, come in the last month of the campaign. Upon the admitted basis of the early stages, this expensive campaign may easily cost the Republicans as much as the great outpouring of 1920, when Will Hays distributed more than $8,000,000—no one yet knows quite how.

In one of those anonymous statements which everyone knows to be reports of the President's conferences with the Washington newspapermen we are told, after three days' sittings by Senator Borah's committee, that "a representative of the President" says that "the President is especially pleased with the showing that the finances of the committee have been handled with such care and regard for the law and the proprieties." This is in keeping with the tactics of the Republican campaign. From the beginning Mr. Coolidge has pursued a policy of intrepid silence about every disclosure of crookedness and rottenness in his party and in his Cabinet. Now among the campaign letters soliciting funds to reelect Mr. Coolidge was a famous letter sent out by the Massachusetts Republican Campaign Committee. There is "no limit to the amount an individual may give to the committee," this bare-faced letter said. "Large contributions will be so divided as to give full observance to the requirements of the statute which limits contributions from any one person." Could crookedness be franker? Could the determination of the President's party in his home State to buy the national election be bolder? Yet the President is "especially pleased" with the "care and regard for the law and the proprieties"!

Or again, there is the letter of George S. Ward, president of the Ward Baking Co., popularly known as the "Bread Trust." Mr. Ward in New York State, like Mr. Grundy in Pennsylvania, set out to raise money to buy Coolidge enthusiasm in the insurgent West. He sent a circular letter to the bakers and heads of allied industries in New York State. In this letter, with a cynicism worthy of the Massachusetts Republicans, he warned his friends that the law forbade contributions from corporations, and asked them to make their remittances on personal checks. But in order to identify the corporation he enclosed a separate blank, to be attached to the check, so that the Republican National Committee might know to whom to be grateful. Nor was Mr. Ward alone. Mr. G. Bluthenthal, "chairman of the Fur Trade Committee," at the request of the Republican National Committee wrote a similar letter to the members of his industry. Probably every industry was canvassed. "Corporations cannot contribute to campaign funds under the law," wrote Mr. Bluthenthal, "but I earnestly urge you and your associates to contribute liberally, using the enclosed blank to identify your check." Was that what Mr. Coolidge meant by "regard for the law and the proprieties"?

It is the old game of "frying the fat" out of the protected industries. Mr. Grundy, the president of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Association, put it plainly in his letters. "Pennsylvanians!" he cried, "Because you have enjoyed much you must contribute liberally." Enjoyed what? Why, special privileges, tariff favors—from the Republican Party, of course. And if big business wants more favors it must "come across." It is the old, old story.

If there is anything calculated to undermine faith in American institutions, to deepen the sense of class antagonism in American life, to create that class war against which the Coolidge orators fulminate, it is precisely this Republican plan to buy with money what they could not win by argument. It is a battle of rich against poor. Already, the Republicans admit, more than two hundred individuals have contributed to the party chest more than $1,000 each. William Wrigley, the chewing-gum man, gave $25,000; Mortimer Schiff, of Kuhn, Loeb and Co., gave $15,000; two members of the firm of J. P. Morgan and Co. gave $5,000 each; A. R. Carleton, president of the Holly Sugar Corporation, owning beet-sugar factories in three States (for which the Republican National Treasurer serves as counsel), gave $10,000. And so it goes. Last April, when the country was aroused at the revelations that Doheny and Sinclair had contributed liberally to both old-party campaign funds, Mr. Coolidge let it be known that he was opposed to contributions of more than $5,000 each. Today his party treasurer reports a score above that limit—and Mr. Coolidge is "especially pleased."

The Democrats also have a striking number of large contributions—twenty of $5,000 or more—although their total is far below that of the affluent Republicans. Contrast these figures with the poverty of the Progressives. They have collected a total of $190,525—a little more than a tenth as much as the Republicans—and have not yet spent all of it. More than 72,000 individuals contributed; most of the money came in one-dollar contributions. The largest donation was from the national treasurer, W. T. Rawleigh; only one other gift was above $1,000; and only three were of that size. There is a people's movement for you!

"There is in this country a great unrest," says John W. Davis. "There is stirring in the public mind of the United States a great protest, uninformed in part and unintelligent in part, yet which, like all such things, may mount and grow until it becomes an onrushing storm, uncontrolled and uncontrollable, carrying us on its bosom to ports we cannot know." If the Republican Party thinks it can safely return to the old days of unchecked graft, if it believes that with the free use of money it can buy up States which would be lost to it at an honest election, let it beware. The people of the United States will not stay bought. Sooner or later, by one means or another, the people will throw off their money masters. Senator Borah, still a Republican, said last spring:

> . . . So long as political parties seeking power or control of the Government accept vast contributions from those who are interested in matters of legislation or administration you will have sinister and corrupt and controlled government. . . . It all leads to that sinister and subtle influence which does more to break down representative government than any specific instance of open bribe.

There you have it! If there is ever a real danger of revolution in this country the Republican vote-buyers will be responsible for it.

Unto the Least of These . . .

ZIANG SUN WAN was just a poor "Chink," and circumstantial evidence seemed to point to him as the murderer of three men found dead in the Chinese Educational Mission in Washington, back in 1919. He denied it. Through days and nights the police stood guard over him in his hotel room, hurling questions, demands, affirmations at him. On the eighth day he was taken back to the mission and there examined and cross-examined for ten continuous hours. On the ninth day, at 5:20 in the morning, he was taken to the police-station and formally placed under arrest. There the gruelling continued. On the tenth day he was again taken to the mission, where an imaginary murder was enacted before his eyes. Finally, on the eleventh day, Wan confessed, and on the strength of that confession, which he later retracted, Ziang Sung Wan was convicted of murder.

In a decision which ought to strike at the roots of police terrorism the United States Supreme Court has just granted Ziang Sung Wan a new trial, on the ground that the alleged confession was extorted. "The undisputed facts showed that compulsion was applied," said Mr. Justice Brandeis, rendering the opinion of the court. "As to that matter there was no issue upon which the jury could properly have been required or been permitted to pass. The alleged oral statement and the written confession should have been excluded." A confession tortured out of a man is no confession in the eyes of the law, and the Supreme Court refuses to recognize it as such. We think of the days of the rack and pinion as long past, yet every day of the year, in almost every city of the country, the police apply, in greater or less measure, third-degree methods to force suspects to confess. Once in a great while something happens to concentrate public attention upon this survival of medievalism. Then dead apathy follows; the public forgets. Two years ago there was the case of Luther Boddy. Boddy was a young Negro, a rather shiftless young man who had fallen into the toils of what we euphemistically call the law. Once marked out by the police he was suspected of every petty theft in his neighborhood. Again and again he was taken to the station-house and "put on the grill." He had fallen into that luckless group of misfits who no longer have any rights that policemen feel bound to respect, for whom the ordinary police restraints no longer exist. One day when two detectives seized him by the arm and told him to "come along" Boddy pulled out his gun and shot them both dead. "I was so tired of being beaten up all the time," he explained.

Police Commissioner Enright stoutly denied the existence of third-degree methods at that time. The police officials always deny it. They denied it in Washington. But on the day on which Mr. Enright made his denial a prisoner appeared in court "a mass of black and blue bruises from his neck to his heels," obviously "terribly beaten," in the words of the police magistrate before whom he came for judgment. In that case the magistrate denounced the policeman responsible as not only a brute but a liar. The public, aroused for a moment, forgot. The policeman, we do not doubt, is still on duty. A Filipino was beaten up last July; "I'm a dark man and poor, so there's no hope for me," he told the priest who attended him; and he was right. Chicago had its moment of awakening in the early days of the Franks murder case. The Chicago police, before they discovered Leopold and Loeb, suspected two young instructors at the Lincoln School, and when the two instructors pleaded innocence they put them through what is known in the Chicago vernacular as "goldfishing." "Goldfishing," apparently, includes beating with a rubber hose. The instructors will not soon forget what they learned of the treatment meted out to the underworld. The Chicago papers rang for a few days with denunciations of the beatings; then all but the two instructors forgot.

It is time that something was done to make police officials remember that they too are required to obey the law. Doubtless it is true, as they allege, that some valid confessions are extorted by the third degree; doubtless the inquisitors of the middle ages, too, could point to some honest successes of their methods. But the defense is no justification. It does not excuse the starving and torturing, bullying and beating which go on defiantly in the name of the law. Officials who are guilty of such practices, however sincerely they may believe them necessary, in fact violate their oaths of office. It would be a healthy shock to law officials all over the country if a few such guardians of the law were themselves thrown into prison, and made to suffer the penalties which would befall ordinary citizens who beat their neighbors with strips of rubber hose. The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Ziang Sung Wan should give the sanction of the federal government to a movement to restore respect for law among the law enforcers. The fact that Wan was just a poor "Chink" should make his case all the more impressive.

Gottlieb and Seiff

"WHAT'S all this business about injunctions?" people ask. "You don't mean that injunctions are a real issue in the campaign?" There is a widespread effort to make it appear that the power of injunction is an unimportant matter. The best answer to this sort of propaganda is the plain story of one injunction.

Gottlieb and Seiff are partners in manufacturing children's coats. They are contractors for a larger firm in New York City and maintain their own business in Jamaica, Long Island. Thus they escape union regulations and union wages. They employ between sixty and one hundred workers, mostly Polish and Italian girls (they give the lower figure of the number of their employees; the union gives the higher), and they pay a wage scale substantially less than that which is paid in New York. The union alleges it is less than half the New York union wage. The existence of such shops as this menaces union conditions everywhere. It was natural, therefore, that the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union should take an interest in conditions. Dissatisfied employees joined its ranks and presented the usual demand for moderate increase in wages, a reduction of hours, and recognition of the union. The employers refused, and late in July a strike began.

As to the number of those who struck and the extent of dissatisfaction there is the usual difference in the statements of the employers and of the union. At any rate, the employers rushed to court to get a temporary injunction against the union. This they promptly got from Justice Cropsey on August 6, 1924. (Remember the date). It was a sweeping injunction, covering even peaceful picketing. It was based only on the employers' statement of the case. The temporary injunction and order "to show cause" finally came to a hearing before Justice John MacCrate. Both the employers and the union submitted affidavits and arguments by counsel. Justice MacCrate took his time; finally on September 3, he refused to grant an injunction. His opinion of the mass of affidavits before him and the strength of the employers' case is thus laconically summarized in his refusal to grant the desired injunction:

> One actual assault is specified. It is uncontradicted that the complainant was held equally guilty with those against whom he complained. The affidavits of the police officers cannot be disregarded, especially when it is noted that none of those who claim to have been threatened swear they have made complaint to the police.

The employers promptly appealed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, where the matter remains still undecided. Meanwhile, it might be supposed that the employees were free to go ahead with the peaceful conduct of the strike. Not at all. When Justice MacCrate had decided against them the employers went before Justice Young of the Appellate Division. As one of their counsel they retained a brother of Justice Rich, who sits on the Appellate bench with Justice Young. Justice Young, sitting by himself, without any hearing, reissued the temporary injunction on which Justice MacCrate had decided adversely! Some days later he held a brief hearing and continued the injunction, though no facts were brought out which had not been before Justice MacCrate when he denied the injunction.

In other words, from August 6 on the union has been enjoined from the effective conduct of the strike, in spite of the fact that the one judge who heard their case decided in their favor. When the Appellate Division finally reaches a decision on the merits of the original case, it is likely that there will be no real strike in existence. The Italian and Polish girl workers have neither the financial reserves nor the experience of union solidarity to carry on for months when the courts ally themselves with their employers; meanwhile their competition makes it harder for other girls to earn a decent living.

For this state of affairs courts established to do justice are directly responsible. The employees were restrained from perfectly legal acts without a reasonable hearing. One judge coolly nullified the decision of another. If no pickets were sent to jail without trial by jury that is only because the union obeyed the injunction. It is not because the injunction itself was just, nor is it certain that every union will always obey unjust injunctions. This power of our judges to come to the aid of employers in labor disputes is a dangerous barrier across the path to peaceful progress. In protesting against injunctions, the progressive movement and the labor unions behind it are standing not only for freedom but for a chance to win freedom without violence.

Heaven and Hell

THERE is nothing surprising in President Eliot's recently expressed opinion that he could not look forward with great pleasure to an eternity passed in any of the heavens imagined by popular theology. The remark is the sincere expression of a man who is drawing to the close of a long and active life and cannot imagine himself as content in even the most blessed idleness ever conceived. His is the natural reaction of the worker, and it is doubtful if anyone ever really longed for eternal rest unless he had been one of those temperamentally incapable of doing anything likely to make him need even a shorter repose.

The crudest imagination can picture a hell terrible enough to satisfy anyone's idea of a place unpleasant as an eternal residence. But men have come by slow stages to forget its existence, and it is not surprising that they should come to a point where they refuse to take seriously pictures of eternal bliss which, even when conceived by the most poetic minds, have always been singularly vapid, suggestive of a condition calculated to bore to extinction the most indolent man within the space of a very small fraction of eternity. The popular preachers, however, having on the whole an extremely low opinion of human character, give up reluctantly the threat of damnation; and, since most of them seem sincerely to believe that vice is attractive and virtue dull, they will be ready to abandon the world as inevitably lost if they can neither threaten nor bribe the ordinary man into being good. They have generally been more loath than laymen to admit that virtue is its own reward; but it really looks as though, for the future, the world would have to get along as best it may with men who, like President Eliot, are willing to work and work well—not in order to escape hell or to win eternal rest but simply because they find in work itself the only incentive they need.

Before we regret too much the good old days when heaven was heaven indeed and hell was boiling hot, it would be well to consider what was really believed. Our grandfathers may have been content with celestial harpers and heavenly choirs, but they themselves were, after all, degenerates from the primitive faith. In the days which were really good and really old imaginations were more vigorous and piety less emasculated by an unrighteous tenderness for sinners. If we wish to turn back, let us turn back to Tertullian, who pictured hell as a sort of peep show for the saved, guaranteed to furnish unfailing entertainment to the fortunate inhabitants of paradise, which—but his own vigorous style in the treatise "De Spectaculis" will give a more vivid picture:

> How shall I wonder! How shall I laugh! How shall I rejoice! How shall I triumph when I behold so many and such illustrious kings groaning with Jupiter their god in the lowest darkness of hell! Then shall the tragedians pour forth in their own misfortune more piteous cries than those with which they had made the theater to resound, while the comedian's powers shall be better seen as he becomes more flexible by the heat: Compared with such spectacles, with such subjects of triumph as these, what can praetor or consul, quaestor or pontiff, afford? And even now faith can bring them near, imagination can depict them as present.

To Tertullian eternity did not seem too long a time in which to make up for the kindness and forbearance demanded of him on earth.

Summing Up the Campaign

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

St. Louis, October 15

WHAT has the new Progressive Party achieved? It has injected into the campaign the only issues around which discussion could center. It has, by its definite challenge to the old parties, made the election campaign what it ought to be—a great quadrennial period of political education. It has furnished a rallying point to millions politically homeless who would otherwise have stayed away from the polls or voted in bitterness and disgust. It has revived hope, reinspired faith that political progress is not dead, that leaders can be found to assail the massed forces of wealth and privilege even as at different times and in different ways they have been challenged by Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. It has demonstrated that with but little support by the press the word of inspiration may yet reach the masses. Finally, the campaign has proved that we are politically in flux; that old party ties and names mean less than ever before; that men and women are more and more realizing the importance of financial and economic issues, so that the time is surely not far off when the much desired realignment along conservative and liberal lines will come to pass.

No one can travel in the Northwest and not be struck by the depth of the feeling of discontent of those who are in revolt. Vast multitudes are entirely content, entirely occupied with their four-wheel brakes and their radios. The others are losing patience. I am not thinking merely of the 600,000 farmers who have lost farms or gone into bankruptcy. I am thinking of great groups who feel more and more the difficulty of the struggle for life; who have fought fight after fight for better conditions only to be beaten again and again. They are convinced that America does not offer their children what it ought to. They are outraged by the spectacle of crass crookedness at Washington and by the indifference of our accidental President to the extent of wrong-doing, he who could only marvel that there were so few thieves and so little stolen.

So confused is it all that he who would prophesy is foolish. The honest correspondents admit that at the very moment they think they see Coolidge votes on every bush, in every branch. The truth is that while millions are utterly indifferent, other millions are in doubt as to how they will vote, and still others have decided but will tell no one. This is particularly true in Indiana and Missouri. In Fort Wayne, for example, the Republicans have failed to get 15,000 out of the 65,000 registered to tell how they are going to vote. Most of them, eager to tell in former years, bitterly resented the inquiry. Are they for Coolidge and ashamed to admit it, or are they concealing a startling new alliance? The politicians can give you no clue. They are as much at sea as anybody.

Everywhere the organizations are functioning so badly as to be almost laughable. You ask a clerk in the Missouri headquarters, with election only three weeks away, how things are going. He stretches, suppresses a yawn, and says: "I wish they'd begin the campaign!" Republican big business has considerably lost its grip in this contest. There is nothing that remotely suggests the machine efficiency of Platt, Quay, and Hanna. Frantic efforts to raise money the Republicans are making. It will do them little good, for they are without means of using it effectively. Since the La Follette revolt in the dangerous States is so largely agrarian they cannot use the money to buy votes in "blocks of fives" as in former years. The Democrats are still more inefficient—if that be possible. In many places they do not function at all. Their candidate arouses only the enthusiasm one feels for an able, attractive attorney picked to conduct a lawsuit. That is not altogether his fault. The issues given to him could make no one enthusiastic, and, as I have said before, it is fatal to be a middle-of-the-roader. His growing friendliness to La Follette and Wheeler must in part be due to the ever present possibility that the election will go into Congress. His entourage on his trips believes, I am told, that La Follette will carry ten States and that Davis will win in the House.

As for the Progressives, if they do not carry Kansas and Michigan it will be their own fault. Their machine is no better than the others, save that its workers are not old party hacks but often enthusiasts who take their leader and his doctrine to their hearts. Their machine has not functioned because it has never been properly assembled; their motor is not even in low gear. Thousands thirst for information, for the words of the prophet—in vain.

As for the groups, it is a bloc, almost a class campaign —we will surely have a straight-out class fight four years hence if the Coolidge government by and for plutocracy continues. The farmers, the labor groups, the Jewish, the Catholic, the German, the K. K. K., the Negro, the Wall Street, the Scandinavian, all of them are thinking, reacting, and moving as groups—but not each group alike in all sections.

The Negroes in Maryland and Indiana are drifting to Davis; in the Northwest and Central States their defection from Coolidge is slight. The Jews who are successful in business are for Coolidge without regard to the Klan; elsewhere they are moving to the liberals. The Germans are 90 per cent for La Follette in some districts and 60 per cent in others. Naturally conservative, the cry of dangerous radicalism is moving them back to the Republicans. Surprisingly many Catholics are ardently for La Follette. Even where high-church dignitaries have let it be known that they oppose it, Catholic teachers, lawyers, doctors, and business men are working for La Follette. As everyone knows, the farmers are not a unit, because the farming situation varies so greatly in different sections. Reliable farm organizers and workers report that great sections of farmers closed their minds on the Presidential issue months ago, just as soon as Senator La Follette was nominated.

This is especially true of Iowa. The lifting of not a single finger was required to win these votes. They came over spontaneously, these farmers, and then forgot about politics! Nothing has impressed these organizers and me more than the knowledge and understanding of great groups of farmers. In Iowa the credit for this belongs largely to Dante Pierce and his Iowa Homestead. But elsewhere the spread of the gospel has recalled to me what Booker Washington used to tell me of the uncanny, the mysterious, the inexplicable "grape-vine telegraph" among the Negroes, which carries within forty-eight hours to the remotest plantations word of anything important to the welfare of the colored race. This La Follette movement has gone similarly in sections where there is no press to represent it. The hearts of the masses are ready. I cannot doubt it, for I have spoken to hundreds and I shall never forget their eagerness for facts, facts, and facts.

So the campaign closes—the prologue, howe'er it ends, to great acts and great convulsions. As the John Brown raid was the curtain-raiser in 1859, so is this the peaceful curtain-raiser in 1924—the long struggle from Bull Run to Appomattox is just ahead.

Shipstead Tells Some Stories

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

IN Chicago I encounter Senator Shipstead. He has just returned from a speaking trip that took him to the Pacific Coast. He assures me that at Portland, in Oregon, by 8:30 in the evening the doors had to be closed to the hall in which he made a speech for La Follette, and there were six thousand people inside. He assures me that in Seattle, in order to prevent the hall from being overwhelmed, it was necessary to print notices in the papers to tell people who had radios to stay at home and hear the speech for La Follette and let the people without radios come to the hall.

In all this he is not speaking about himself but about La Follette. La Follette, according to Senator Shipstead, has an awful lot of folks with him in the Northwest.

I tell the Senator that I hear he had an altercation with Billy Sunday on a train. He admits that such was the case. It appears, according to what I have heard, that Billy Sunday came into the smoking compartment of the observation car and introduced himself and sat down opposite the Senator and in the presence and within the hearing of all the other passengers in the smoking compartment began to rebuke the Senator for joining La Follette in tearing down the Constitution and in taking orders from Moscow. It appears, I tell the Senator, that after Billy Sunday had done this for ten or fifteen minutes he shook his fist under Billy Sunday's nose and told him to "shut up" every time he tried to speak again during the next ten or fifteen minutes, during which the Senator, as I understand, explained that Moscow had nothing to do with it and that he, Billy Sunday, was a fine follower of the Carpenter of Nazareth and doubtless would have sided with the money changers when they got canned from the temple.

The Senator intimates that at least some of this awful scene did take place and exhibits the fist which brought the first known silence to Billy Sunday. He adds: "Then the passengers asked me to make them a speech in the auditorium—so to speak—of the observation car; and meanwhile there was a poll of the passengers; and all but two of them were for La Follette. Billy Sunday got on the wrong train."

"What do they like to hear?" said I. "Oh, well," said the Senator, "it's no good being technical all the time. It's much better to get down to the simple facts of the matter. Now there's the bee. I get on quite well talking about the bee. You see, in the spring the bee becomes radical and thinks of going off away from the hive to some hollow tree in the woods. The queen bee gets up in the air and the bee voter thinks of following. Then out comes the bee-keeper and beats a tin pan. He make a frightfully loud noise with it. He talks about the Constitution. The bee is thinking of the hollow tree. Then he explains to the bee that hollow trees in woods are not among our institutions. Bee hives are. Did the bee ever live in a hollow tree? Hasn't he always lived in a hive? Did he ever know a respectable bee that lived in a hollow tree? Thus the bee-keeper argues with the bee and keeps on beating on the tin pan.

"The bee, however, still shows signs of intending to go away. The bee remembers that all the previous summers he worked hard and then in the fall the bee-keeper came and took away almost all the honey he had made, leaving him just enough, just barely enough, for the winter. He remembers that this has happened to him each summer and each fall and each winter for a long time and that every spring he had used up all the honey that had been left to him and was obliged to go to work again either for the bee-keeper or for himself. In all previous years he has gone back to work again for the bee-keeper. This year he is absolutely determined to go to work for himself. He is determined to go to that hollow tree.

"Then the bee-keeper brings out his last argument. He brings out some sugar water. He sprinkles the sugar water around the bee. He raises the price of wheat. He raises the price of corn. He raises the price of hogs. He sprinkles the sugar water for the time being all around the bee.

"Then he says to the bee: 'Are you not prosperous? Look at the prices of all these things. Aren't they splendid? How can you think of a hollow tree? Think of all this sugar water right near the hive. Can you think of leaving this abode of luxury?'

"Then the bee is puzzled. Shall he go to the hollow tree and work for himself all the time or shall he stay in the hive and have sugar water at swarming time? I put it to you fairly and coolly and without passion. It is the issue—Republican and Democratic sugar water at election time or your own honey, all of it, in your own tree.

"I get on quite well with that bee. He makes things simple. People like him."

"But are they more interested in domestic economic questions or in foreign questions?" I asked.

"On that point," replied the Senator, "some people think I'm crazy, but I say foreign questions.

"I talk about the man who had a fight with another man and knocked him down and got him unconscious and went through his pockets and took his money and his watch and then went home. Then he summoned his neighbors about him and said: "I am for peace. I am an idealist. Our unconscious friend may come to. He may want his watch back. Let us form a league of neighbors; then if he tries to commit an act of aggression and tries to take his watch out of my pocket, we will knock him unconscious again and have a peaceful community. They get that. They don't know anything about this league protocol that you write about. They understand the main point. They understand the league of neighbors.

"And I find them more interested," concludes the Senator, "in the world situation than in anything else."

Be Brisk With Babbitt

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

IV. What Mr. Schnaufknabel Thinks

THE man whom I interviewed after Mr. Babbitt, Mr. Riesling, and Mr. McKelvey is unknown to glory. I had once known him as a garage mechanic, but he is now a foreman in the Zenith Steel and Machinery Company. His name is Schnaufknabel, August Schnaufknabel.

"Me?" said Mr. Schnaufknabel, when approached by Our Representative, "I'm going to vote for Coolidge, you can bet your sweet life on that!"

"But don't you think La Follette is much more pro-labor than Coolidge, and you take such an interest in labor unionism——"

"Used to, you mean. I've cut that out. That stuff was all right when I was on the jump changing tires or running my fool head off looking for monkey-wrenches for you fellows, but now I've got a job with some responsibility and a future to it, and I've got no time to waste looking out for the interests of a lot of lazy bums that are too inefficient to get on by themselves. I used to fall for this solidarity junk, but that was when I was a kid, and now— Why, say, here in couple more years I'll be able to strike out with a garage of my own, and I'll have men working for me, and suppose I want them pulling a lot of union talk on me?"

"So you've gone back——"

"Oh, I know what you're going to say. Nobody so strong for labor loyalty as a lot of you New York arm-chair liberals that never did a stroke of work in your lives and that couldn't wedge into even the Sandwichmen's Union. No, sir; I've got myself and my family to look out for, and Coolidge represents the kind of conservative enterprise that a man who's making a success of things ought to stand for. Then another thing," concluded Mr. August Schnaufknabel. "La Follette is sympathetic toward the Germans, and that's one thing that makes me hostyle. I'd have been in the war, if I hadn't had a family to support, and I hate any man who's so dumb he doesn't realize what devils all these Germans are."

V. Coolidge is "Almighty Careful"

I found Mr. Vergil Gunch, past-president of the Boosters' Club and Exalted Ruler of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in a snug corner of the Zenith Athletic Club, on a cozy settle of green-stained oak with a jolly colored-glass window let into the high back. He greeted me with breezy affability:

"I'll tell you how I feel. I feel that Cal is a fellow that takes his time before he makes a judgment and weighs all sides of a question. He never goes off half-cocked. He may not be as showy as Davis or Lodge or Volstead, but he's almighty careful, and that's what we need in times like these."

VI. "If I Could Make People Realize——"

Seneca Doane is a lawyer who has at once the worst reputation and the best reputation in Zenith. He is called a "dangerous radical," yet the wealthy cannot get along without him in criminal and divorce cases. It was he who got Sam Dodsworth's daughter her divorce from the bogus Vicomte de Montigny without having to pay that delightful almost-nobleman a cent of blackmail, and he who, within the year, was without fee defending the impoverished labor union which Sam Dodsworth had been fighting. He is a veteran single-taxer; a friend in old times to Golden Rule Jones, Tom Johnson, Horace Traubel, and Prince Kropotkin.

When I had seen him three years before, he had looked tired. A sense of the futility in all politics had enervated him; he was thinking of roaming round the world; of losing himself in Java or Italy.

I had trouble in finding him. He was not at his office, not at home. He would be, they informed me, at La Follette headquarters. But there I had to wait half an hour to see him, so many were the callers, so many the telephone messages. I found a new Doane.

He had the placidity which comes less from loafing than from exhilarating work. His eyes were gay, his voice gusty.

"We're going to do it!" he cried. "If we don't elect La Follette this time, we'll elect a Progressive candidate four years from now. I'm not talking propaganda; I mean it! And I think there's an incredibly good chance of electing La Follette right now. You see, a lot of cautious business men and careful workmen, who don't talk about it for fear people won't think they belong to the Conservative Church, are going to sneak out and vote for La Follette. It'll be as much of a surprise result as the last general election in Great Britain, when people woke up to Lloyd George and Stanley Baldwin. There's a magnetic heroism in La Follette, and it's only because we're all so sheep-like that more of us don't come out and shout for him.

"I'm enjoying this campaign—Lord, how I'm enjoying it! It's the first political fight since Tom Johnson's that has seemed to me not merely a throwing of lots between two puppets. I worked for the Committee of Forty-Eight, of course, and I admired the members, but that never seemed to me an authentic, spontaneous movement coming from the people—it was an artificial enthusiasm with too much intellection and too little blood and sweat. I wish I had a thousand tongues, so I could tell the whole country what the La Follette campaign means—the breaking up of the dry, hard rind that's encased our hearts all these years! If I could make people realize——"

VII. "See How I Mean?"

On the train east, I talked to the news-butcher. He wasn't one of the breed of blatting youngsters but a seasoned, professionally good-natured man of forty-five.

"Of course you're working for La Follette," I said.

"Well—" He scratched his chin. "I dunno. I haven't thought much about it yet. I'll tell you. I figure I got a lot of responsibility here on my job, and I tend to my business and let the fellows that understand politics tend to them."

"And that's how people may let Coolidge slip in," I reflected.

"Well, now look here. Don't know as that would be so bad, at that. I'll tell you. Maybe you never thought about this, but the way I've figured it out is:

"Coolidge is a man that maybe he isn't as showy as a lot of fellows that a man like me that's in the magazine business keeps reading about—birds like Ford and Sam Gompers and Nicholas Murray Butler and John Roach Straton and Frank Crane and Billy Sunday. But he's mighty careful; he looks at all sides of a question and takes his time before he makes a decision. Maybe that's something you never thought of. Oh, I don't believe in going off half-cocked. If I've been able to get along as good as I have by industry and knowing which kind of detective-story magazines different kinds of traveling men will buy—and believe me I ain't done so badly; we got a flivver at home and a new radio set and the Cross-Word Puzzle Book—why, I guess there's nothing wrong with prosperity and the way the two old parties have run things. I don't see any reason for getting all het up over La Follette. Trouble with a lot of you fellows is you don't think things over; see how I mean?"

Then to the brakeman I hinted:

"Working for La Follette?"

"You bet! He's the only candidate except Bill Foster that knows people like me are anything but machines done up in uniforms," said the brakeman.

So I came back from Zenith.

New Morals for Old

On Love in Marriage

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

UTOPIA is the loveliest of all countries; it is also the farthest away. One may make magnificent generalizations concerning the future of the relations of the sexes; one may set down truths that are theoretically unanswerable. Only one will change nothing, help not a single soul. Let me cling to a few humble facts. . . .

So far as anyone can see the habit of one man living with one woman will persist. The young will hear of nothing else, since they are under the sway of romantic passion which is, subjectively, exclusive and final; those who are older will hear of nothing else because experience has shown this method of life capable of securing the healthiest freedom from preoccupation with sex and the maximum amount of ordered activity. To be a rake or even a fastidious "varietist" is the costliest of occupations. Rational monogamy is in no danger. The trouble lies elsewhere; it lies in the fact that current notions of monogamy are, I use the word advisedly, insane.

Local bill-board advertisements of motion pictures have recently shown a ball-room in which an irate gentleman in evening-dress grasped the shoulder of another gentleman who looked crushed and crest-fallen. With an inimitable gesture of moral indignation the first gentleman pointed to a quivering female on the other side of the room. The caption of this stirring lithograph was "His Forgotten Wife." The exquisite absurdity of this picture is clear. It is significant of the way in which we are all brow-beaten by the sodden nonsense of the tribe that it took me some minutes of reflection to come upon the unreason of the thing. If the crushed-looking gentleman had forgotten the lady, she was not, of course, his wife and could never have truly been. If we are dealing with a euphemism and are to understand that he wanted to forget her, she may once have been his wife, but had, quite obviously, ceased to be.

In this motion picture there is illustrated what I call the insane view of monogamic marriage, namely, that it is put on like a shirt or a coat and must be kept on however ill-fitting, comfortless, unclean, or dangerous, and that in this mere keeping on there is virtue. There is the further implication that marriage has nothing to do with good behavior, which is rewarded even in penitentiaries, or with ill; that it is, indeed, an abstract kind of fate, a magical or infernal machine, a metaphysical trap. Once you are caught in it, you must stay caught. To wriggle is sin.

Do I seem to be discussing the matter on too low a plane? I wish I were. The truth is that cultivated and liberal people have not yet freed their minds from the concepts with which that amusing picture deals. It is in action, not in fire-side talk, that these things are tested. And it is true that even such people will pay an uninhibited respect to a depraved character, cruel, treacherous, stupid, who practices that moving-picture theory of marriage which, in ways no less real for being subtle and but half-conscious, they will be tempted to withhold from a person of the utmost spiritual grace and charm who practices that kind of marriage of which, theoretically and outspokenly, they so eloquently approve.

This very tentative argument, then, is not directed against marriage. I am not even ready to plead—that would be Utopian—that the relations of the sexes be withdrawn from social control. Our first step, at least in America, must be an attempt to sanitate marriage. This can be done—if it can be done at all—by relating marriage and its practice to certain notions of good and decency and honor that already have a tenure, however feeble, upon the public consciousness. Marriage, in brief, should be held to be created by love and sustained by love. I shall, of course, be accused of meaning passion. I mean that precise blending of passion and spiritual harmony and solid friendship without which, as even those who will not admit it know, the close association of a man and a woman is as disgusting as it is degrading. And marriage should be dependent, though this matter is included in the first, on good behavior. I will not keep a man or a woman as my friend whom I discover to be a liar, slanderer, thief. Much less ought one to keep such a person as husband or wife. Who is to judge, it will be asked? No objective judgment is needed. A subjective conviction on a point of this sort suffices to reduce the union in question to dust and ashes.

Here is the one practical point; here the one possibility of hope. To frame a rational theory of the relations of men and women is easy and agreeable. The very fashioners of such theories, being human, will be brought, under the discomforts of social pressure, to seem to assent to all that their minds most passionately deny. A man or a woman of the highest philosophic insight will struggle through the ignominy of the divorce courts not so much in order to dissolve a meaningless legal bond as to save someone whom he or she loves and reveres from the criticism of the vulgar. For we live in a vulgar world. There is no safe and ultimate escape; its vulgarity in precisely these matters will often affront us where we least expected it. To mitigate that vulgarity must be our first task.

I do not know whether it can be done at all. But if so, then it must be done by making an unhappy union disgraceful. People who are always bickering with each other, who are obviously unhappy in each other's presence, who always hold opinions acridly opposed, who are always trying either subtly or obviously to escape from each other—such couples must fall under social disapproval. And this disapproval must apply even though one of the two prefers possessiveness to either happiness or decency or self-respect. Similarly those who are deliberately unfaithful should be disgraced—not for the act of unfaith but for the hypocrisy of remaining in a union which that very act, which the temptation to that very act, shows to have lost its purpose and its meaning.

This sort of social control is not my ideal. Love is like religion, a matter for the individual soul. To change partners in love is very much like changing one's opinion on some deep and vital matter. The spirit must bear its own inherent witness. But I promised myself not to be Utopian. And may it not conceivably be brought home to a few people to begin with that the men who laugh so spontaneously when the song-and-dance man sings "My wife's gone to the country, hurray, hurray!" are leading immoral lives and reducing their partners to the role of disagreeable prostitutes and unsatisfactory servants?

I am not prepared to stress the point unendurably. True marriage, the true and lovely union of a man and a woman, body and spirit, is rare. But today it is not even an ideal, not even something admired and striven for. Love in itself is rare and married love is perhaps as rare as beauty or genius. Happiness, too, is rare, happiness in any relation. But even as a man or a woman has made an obvious and shattering mistake if his or her chosen work does not produce a reasonable minimum of lasting inner satisfaction, so may marriage also be tested by a reasonable minimum of lasting—let us say, preference and blessedness. To fall below that minimum is to cheat both the self and society, both the present and posterity, to sacrifice honor to a fetish and vitality to decay.

What Is Wheeler?

By R. A. HASTE

MONTANA is the third largest State in the Union. It is large in every way—it is long, wide, and high. It is filled to the lid with natural resources. It has gold, oil, and coal. It is one of the potential agricultural regions of the world and it has water power enough to run the machinery of half a continent. Having all these things it is not strange that it sent to Washington as United States senators two men who have within the last year challenged the attention and the admiration of the nation for their fearless exposure of corruption in governmental administration.

It is my purpose to give a somewhat close view of the junior member of this senatorial firm of Walsh and Wheeler, who, as the candidate for the Vice-Presidency on the Progressive ticket, with Robert M. La Follette is occupying a conspicuous niche in the public mind.

Why is Wheeler? What forces conspired to place this young man in the forefront of national affairs? What is the basis of that subtle appeal to the masses which brings out tens of thousands to hear him speak? What are the influences that have contributed to produce him?

Wheeler is of New England stock. He was born in the shadow of Bunker Hill monument and spent his matured years in the shadow of the Rocky Mountains. It is the opinion of this writer that the influence of Bunker Hill monument and the Rocky Mountains on Wheeler's character and career was in direct proportion to their size. After completing his law course in the University of Michigan he went West and opened a law office in Butte, Montana. Although the boy was born in Massachusetts the man was made in Montana. As in the old days the Southern Pacific Railroad dominated the affairs of California, so the Anaconda Copper Mining Company dominated the financial and political affairs of Montana. Arrogant, domineering, ruthless, the minions of that great company challenged the right of any man who entered the State to interfere with their sacred right of eminent domain. They expected every young lawyer who came within the precincts of their realm to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that Thrift might follow fawning." But young Wheeler was not made of servile stuff. His clients were the common men bent with toil and whitened by sunless days spent in the bowels of the copper hills. He championed their cause.

It soon became apparent to the management of the copper company and its allied interests that this young lawyer, with the Boston accent, might become troublesome unless he were taken into camp. He was therefore nominated and elected to the State Legislature as the best means of controlling his restless activities. But he flatly refused to wear a copper collar.

This was in 1910. Thomas J. Walsh was a candidate for the United States Senate. The Legislature was Democratic, but Walsh was not in favor with the "Company" and a deadlock resulted which was not broken until the last minute of the last hour of the session, when Henry L. Myers —a company satellite—was elected. Throughout this long and bitter fight Wheeler stood by Walsh.

In 1912 Wheeler was a candidate for Attorney-General but was beaten in convention by half a vote by the "Company" forces. Walsh, however, was elected to the United States Senate, and on taking his seat secured the appointment of Wheeler as United States Attorney for Montana.

Wheeler is a born prosecutor; all crooks looked alike to him. It made no difference whether he found them running a fake insurance company with the connivance of high State officials or tampering with a jury; whether they were guilty of branding a maverick or wrecking a bank—to him they were on a level before the grand juries and in the court.

Then came the war and its hysteria of hate. Wheeler refused to prostitute his public office to the demands of private vengeance and the opposition burst into flame. A resolution demanding the resignation of the United States Attorney was introduced in the Legislature but failed of passage. Then the Council of Defense, headed by a "hunter of home Huns," summoned Wheeler before them, but like Pilate they found nothing wrong with this man.

The first term of Senator Walsh was nearing its end. He was a candidate for reelection. Notice was served on him that he must sacrifice Wheeler or suffer defeat. To save Walsh, Wheeler resigned. The Administration offered him a federal judgeship but he declined it, preferring to fight the battle to a finish before the people of Montana.

In 1920 he was nominated in the Democratic primaries for Governor, and after one of the most bitterly contested campaigns in the State he was defeated in the Republican landslide that swept Harding into office. This proved a most fortunate event—it left the way open for Wheeler to stand for the Senate two years later, when he was elected by the largest majority ever given to a Democrat in the history of the State.

During the gubernatorial campaign of 1920 his record as United States Attorney was viciously attacked. He was accused of failure to prosecute the I. W. W. and others accused under the espionage laws. Two years later when he was a candidate for the Senate an attempt was made to revive this propaganda, but it was cut short by a letter from Federal Judge George M. Bourquin of the district of Montana, who as trial judge was familiar with all the facts during those turbulent times:

> I regret to hear that there is a revival of the unfounded charges that while United States Attorney you refused to prosecute persons guilty of sedition. The truth, as evidenced by the records of this court, is that you prosecuted many charged with that offense, most of whom, with no reproach to you, were not indicted by the grand jury or were found not guilty either by direction of the court or by the will of the trial jury. The times were favorable for loose, unfounded, and trivial charges of that character, many of them inspired by malice and for personal ends. Indeed a grand jury in this court refusing indictments on such charges finds in its formal report that before it such charges had been presented seeking private vengeance and private ends. A competent prosecutor will always refuse to conduct such prosecutions—refuse to prosecute; and in so far as you did so, it was with the sanction if not direction of this court in furtherance of sound public policy, and in vindication of your official oath and duty to yourself, to the court, and to society. You will remember you declined a like statement from me in the fall of 1918, and I make it now with no object but simple justice to an able, diligent, and conscientious prosecutor in a most trying period of our country's history.
>
> GEORGE M. BOURQUIN

On November 9, 1922, Judge Bourquin wrote Wheeler, congratulating him on his election to the Senate:

> In your election to the federal Senate I congratulate you and the people of the State and nation. I hope and believe that your service therein will redound to your credit and the people's benefit.
>
> Apropos of certain litigation of 1917, you were right—that "they" would "get" you, and I was right that if they did it would contribute much to your future advancement.
>
> GEORGE M. BOURQUIN

Judge Bourquin is a Republican, and among federal judges ranks with Amidon of North Dakota, Kenyon of Iowa, and Anderson of Massachusetts. The Republican press, however, still publishes the stories so completely refuted by the judge of the court before which Wheeler conducted his prosecutions before and during the period of the war.

Digging Up Carthage

By ELIZABETH KNOWLTON

IT is almost sunset, and very still. Bou Kernein, the two-horned sacred mountain of Baal, floats in a soft gray-blue haze beyond the more turquoise waters of the Bay of Tunis, and long shadows lie across the slopes of grass and rubble where once stood the great city of Carthage. Among broken columns and huge crumbling blocks of masonry an Arab goatherd is driving home his flock. That dark grotesque mound in the thickening dusk is a camel lying down, and nearby a Bedouin woman and child in rags peer out from their shelter in an old Roman cistern.

Of Carthage, the proud Phoenician trading city of almost a million, whose merchant-princes ventured the farthest seas, buying tin from the natives of Britain and ivory from the Guinea coast, whose wealth and power dominated the Mediterranean and terrified the young strength of Rome; of Carthage rebuilt after her destruction, to take a place of importance in the Roman Empire and become the home of martyrs and stronghold of the early Christian Church; of Byzantine Carthage; Vandal Carthage; of the early settlement of the Egyptians before Dido came; of all the great civilizations that down through the centuries have piled their temples and palaces on that sloping ground beside the Bay of Tunis, nothing apparently remains. A few heaps of stones, perhaps, a few fragments of marble shafts, and inscriptions—just enough to show that they were really historic fact and not a rumor and a dream.

But go back to these fields and hillsides by broad daylight. Dust and clamor, a scene as lively as an ant heap! Some seventy or eighty lean, brown-turbaned Arabs are busily at work, digging, carrying stones, sifting dirt, under the direction of sun-helmeted, putteed, active Europeans. Modern archeology has discovered Carthage.

The finds now being made are of a sort to capture the most hardened imagination. Not only because of the hundreds of centuries of history and the pot pourri of races represented, but, most especially, because the work is revealing a strange civilization, showing the life and customs of a people about whom almost nothing has previously been known. How often small boys and girls being drilled in ancient history must have wondered why descriptions of Roman ways and manners, photographs of Roman coins and vases and ruins, filled ad nauseam the pages of their books, but never a picture and scarcely a word about that brave and romantic city that produced Hamilcar of the oath of vengeance, and Hannibal of the elephants, picturesque in victory and defeat. "Carthago delenda est" was allowed to cover everything. The main reason for this conspiracy of silence was ignorance. Until today historians have had almost no material on the everyday life of the ancient Carthaginians.

It was fifty years ago that Pere Delattre of the Roman Catholic order of the White Fathers of Africa started excavation in the ruins of Carthage. Most archeologists then thought that he would have only his labor for his pains.

His problem was made especially difficult by the drift of desert sand which has engulfed all the remains, sometimes to a depth of fifty or sixty feet. Practically single-handed he carried on work for years, and he was rewarded by remarkable finds, which included many tombs of the old Carthaginian period, several Christian basilicas, and a Roman amphitheatre. Today Pere Delattre is a great and picturesque figure in the archeological world. Now over eighty, white-bearded and impressive, with a string of honors after his name, and a depth of archeological knowledge that is recognized by fellow scientists everywhere, he keeps the tireless eagerness and live enthusiasm of youth for the work in which he was the pioneer.

Stimulated by Pere Delattre's discoveries, other archeologists entered the field, and five years ago work was begun on a large scale. Already there has been revealed much material on those people of mystery, the Carthaginians. Living witness to their reported practice of human sacrifice has been found in the Temple of Tanit, with hundreds of urns containing the bones of children between four and twelve, burnt alive to the greater glory of the moon goddess Tanit and the sun god Baal Ammon. A glimpse of a few of these little bones makes one begin to sympathize with the Hebrew prophets, in their most violent fulminations against Baal! Votive tablets placed above the urns bear a regular form of inscription: "To the divinity Tanit, Face of Baal, and to the Lord Baal Ammon, a votive offering made by ——, son of ——, because he has heard the voice of the goddess, blessed be she."

The Carthaginians are proved to be an unusually luxurious people, as well as an unusually bloody one. Gold bracelets, necklaces, and other trinkets are found of a gorgeously barbaric type, and fragments of delicate rainbow glass and beads. Bronze razors and nail scissors, bronze mirrors, ivory hairpins, perfume bottles, rouge pots, and ivory eyebrow sticks—all these suggest the intricacies of a present-day toilet. An amazingly advanced material civilization is shown by such small remains as a little terra cotta model of a figure playing a very modern looking organ, and the discovery of a bona fide pair of spectacles.

That, in spite of their frequent love of crude color and heavy simple form, these Semitic trader-princes had some feeling for beauty, as Greece conceived it—a thing of exquisite restraint and quiet perfection—is shown by the recently unearthed high-relief figure of the priestess Arisatbaal. She stands easily, with dignity, quietly waiting; her garments fold about her like a sheath, strangely suggesting a flower bud not yet unfurled; and the face framed by the almost Egyptian headdress has a soft, still, cruel loveliness.

In the most recent excavation, stones have been found of such apparent importance that the leading living authority on Punic inscriptions has come from Paris especially to decipher them; and all signs point to discoveries of more and greater interest, until the Semitic Carthage whose intimate life has long been a blank on the page of history will be as well known as any other great civilization of the time.

Recent work has also revealed many remains from other periods of Carthaginian history—often neatly arranged in chronological layers, as if for the special edification of the ignorant. The Roman period is notably represented, not only by ruins of theaters, temples, baths, and villas (with the lead pipes of their plumbing still intact), and by large mosaic floors in a remarkably perfect state of preservation, but by relics of the early Christian Church such as cannot be duplicated in any other region of the world. Nowhere else do there still exist basilicas, tombs, and statues from such an early period of Christian history as those preserved here under the drifting sands of North Africa.

With the Count de Prorok, who is in charge of the digging, are gathered archeologists of some dozen nationalities, and a School of Archeology has been opened at Sidi-bou-Said near Carthage, so that the scientists of all countries may enjoy the unique opportunity to study at one spot relics from almost every civilization which has ever been of importance in the Mediterranean basin.

Sonnet to Minna

By MAXWELL BODENHEIM

Your face becomes colossal when your lips
Remove the small proportions with a throng
Of words that move the wounds of thought and song
To rise above sobrieties and quips.
Your healed and widened features leave the earth;
Your eyes are torches that devour time;
Your cheeks and forehead melt away and climb
Into a mountainous and mystic birth.

Stay with me in the throes and merriments
Of living, and revise your face until
It shrinks once more with freighted love and hate.
Life is a drill of dooms and spent intents
That slay their compensations when the skill
Of flesh no longer strides within their fate.

In the Driftway

PARIS has become a passion with Americans. They mutter dreamily of wandering over the Ile St. Louis at dawn or of sitting in the Luxembourg at sunset or walking along the Seine after dark; they discourse of Barsac and Chablis, of onion soup and wild strawberries (giving always the French names for these, of course), of the Odéon and the Beaux Arts, of boulevards and stone-floored rooms and the Place de la Concorde. Now the Drifter yields to no one in his delight in the grace and loveliness or the picturesque squalor of Paris; to him the sight of a gleaming brass spigot in a courtyard with moss growing between the cobblestones and a bust of Racine to set off the whole is a sight to make the heart leap; he never tires of watching the beggars along the river lying on potato sacks as they drink their red wine, and wash their clothes and scratch themselves slowly, doggedly, without ceasing and without complaint. Paris he loves, yet he objects to the wild eye, the sweeping gesture, the maundering tone with which most Americans dwell on its beauties. And more than all, he objects to the way, in extolling Paris, they at the same time slight London.

* * * * *

TO the Drifter, London is one of the most beautiful cities in the world. He knows full well the chorus of protest that will becloud the day and roll thickly off upon the ocean at such a theory. "London!" he hears; "but it is so dirty and full of people and smoke and smells and black alleys and gasoline motors. London, indeed!" Cheerfully he admits each one of these strictures and at the same time will defend his stand with his last breath. London, in spite of the dirt and smoke and the smell of beer and tobacco, and the electric signs that are rivaling those of New York, and the black-stained brick and stone of its buildings, is nevertheless to him supremely beautiful. This is partly because power is beauty; no one will deny London's power: it moves with a deep, steady, irresistible roar, as distinguished from the staccato energy of New York; it is partly because memory is beauty, and there is hardly a place name that is not associated in some way with the common past of England and America, and hardly a street, at least in the City itself, without at least one house that is historically memorable.

* * * * *

LONDON is old and has been great for many centuries; it has the poise and the confidence that age gives. If it has, in its slums, street after street whose only characteristic is a hideous and depressing monotony, it has also the Inns of Court—the Temple and Lincoln's Inn Fields—and fifty other gracious squares with plane trees four feet through to shade the pedestrian at noon; it has—but there is really no need of enumerating further. The Drifter knows that he will not be listened to; he knows that the air is full of sighs about the Tuileries and the Left Bank and the pot-au-feu at M. Procope's. For his part, he would like nothing better than to see Trafalgar Square in the rain, as it so often is, or to lie in the grass in Hyde Park and watch the sheep walk quietly from one square yard of thick turf to the next.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

La Follette and the Courts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One reason for the confusion in the public mind concerning the proposal to enable Congress to override by vote a decision of the Supreme Court holding congressional legislation unconstitutional is because the work of the Supreme Court in exercising this function is somewhat misunderstood. The present proposal is by no means a new one. Roosevelt, with his demand for the recall of judicial decisions, went much further.

The objection of certain forces in this country to the uncontrolled power of the courts over legislation has been connected primarily with decisions nullifying social or economic legislation on the ground that it violated "due process of law"—decisions nulifying the ten-hour bakeshop law in New York, the Kansas and federal law prohibiting discrimination against members of trade unions, the Washington law concerning employment agencies, the District of Columbia minimum-wage law for women. In the interpretation of so vague a phrase as "due process of law" the judges of the court, as pointed out by Chief Justice Taft in his dissenting opinion in the minimum-wage case, invoke their own social and economic views as against the social and economic views of the majority of the legislature. It is this power which the La Follette proposal desires to curtail, but in so doing it may be that the proposal is too broad in its effects. Were it confined to curtailing the power of the court to declare Congressional legislation unconstitutional on the "due process" ground, it would but restore the court to the power it exercised without thought of expansion down to 1868.

The provision of the Fifth Amendment that Congress shall deprive no person of his life, liberty, or property without "due process of law" was designed to prevent unlawful procedure, and was so regarded by the Supreme Court down to about 1885. The like provision of the Fourteenth Amendment, including "equal protection," limiting State legislatures, was designed for the protection of the Negro; but it was construed as broad enough to protect all classes against arbitrary proceedings taking away life, liberty, or property. The rate-making statutes led to a wider extension of the court's power in the interpretation of "due process." In the Munn case in 1876, when Illinois passed a law preventing any higher than a two-cent rate for grain elevators, Chief Justice Waite considered the claim that the rate was confiscatory as a State political question for the people to settle at the polls. In another case, some fourteen years later, the court reversed this conclusion, and ever since the court has assumed a revisory power over all State police-power legislation restraining the freedom of the individual, not merely to supervise its procedural correctness, but also its substantive agreement with the court's views of what is right and proper. It must be said that in many cases, especially in the period between 1905 and 1914, the Supreme Court has been more liberal in sustaining State legislation than have the State courts themselves, but such a result depends altogether upon the personal and economic views of the majority of the court at any particular moment. The centralizing power over all State legislation thus exercised by the court has enabled the views of a few men on social and economic questions to prevail over those of legislators throughout the country. Though on the whole the power of nullification has been sparingly used, it is nevertheless a very great power, and the agitation to limit it has been growing for many years.

The La Follette proposal embraces only a narrow part of the court's power, namely, that over legislation of Congress, but it is not confined to police-power legislation. Congress passes only a limited amount of legislation which invites challenge under the "due process" clause. The minimum-wage case, the Adair case prohibiting discrimination against members of trade unions, illustrate this legislation. Were Congress given the power to reenact such legislation over the court's veto, probably no great harm would be done. Mr. Justice Holmes has said that he did not think that "the United States would come to an end" if the court lost its "power to declare an act of Congress void." On ordinary police-power legislation the economic views of the members of Congress are probably entitled to as much weight as those of the members of the court.

But there are parts of the Constitution which should be left to the final and conclusive interpretation of the Supreme Court. Those clauses which lay down the lines of competence between the federal government and the States need one centralizing interpreter, in order that neither federal government nor State may invade the jurisdiction of the other. The States are by the Constitution assured a certain amount of local autonomy. The interstate commerce clause, perhaps more than any other, has welded us into one nation. It would be dangerous, I believe, to deprive the court of its judicial control over legislation, whether State or federal, which is challenged as overstepping the line of demarcation between the two governments. The guaranties of individual liberty against legislation by Congress in the first eight amendments are fairly clear, and little opportunity for dispute has arisen because of the court's power over legislation involving these amendments—exclusive of the fifth, relating to "due process." The real subject for debate is the propriety of making the court the final and conclusive interpreter of such a nebulous phrase as "due process of law" in connection with social and economic legislation under the police power. It is probable that the present agitation will exercise a restraining influence on the courts against holding such legislation, whether State or federal, unconstitutional.

New Haven, Connecticut, October 17 EDWIN BORCHARD
Professor of Law, Yale University

"Our Despotic Courts"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. La Follette wants to amend the Constitution so that an act of Congress, held void, shall take effect if passed a second time. I do not criticize him for "assaulting" an instrument which has been so many times amended with general approval. But would the change be so slight as your article headed "Our Despotic Courts" suggests? Take the child-labor and white-slave laws. Would you want Congress to confine itself, as hitherto, to punishing the innocent acts of transporting across a State line an article made in a factory where a child has worked or a woman with intent that she shall on a later occasion do something immoral? Did a State legislature ever deal with burglary by punishing going from one town to another after committing a burglary or riding in a taxi on the way to commit one?

The only way to prohibit effectively or justly is to prohibit directly. Will not Congress, on the plea that its new power was given to be used when needed, deem it a right and a duty to make its laws just and effective by directly forbidding child labor and the traffic in women? Will not the public sentiment that has put the amendment through demand it of them?

This would be all to the good so far as it led Congress to act forthrightly and thoroughly instead of, as now, by reaching through the commerce clause around a corner. But if the foes of child labor would welcome the La Follette plan, so would those who want to proscribe the Roman Church, to forbid criticism, to loosen up the Eighteenth Amendment, to have national control of education, and especially the people who, now that the Commerce Commission has found that the railroads are worth nearly twenty billions, want the government to take them or fix their rates on the basis of the lowest sum that seems decent to a majority in Congress.

Suppose Congress tomorrow decrees that The Nation, when sent beyond New York, shall sell at five cents. You continue to charge fifteen cents; and, when prosecuted, set up in defense that such an attempt to impair your "freedom of contract" deprives you of liberty without due process of law, and that consequently the act was beyond the authority of Congress and you owed no duty to obey it. The court must decide whether your defense is true. Holding it true, it must decline to punish you. It may seem despotic to some in thus refusing to enforce the legislative will to bring enlightenment within reach of the masses, but its despotism is a necessary incident of your immunity from the legislative despot who is trying to put you out of business. Under the La Follette plan, if your adversaries can pass the act again, you go out.

Mr. La Follette would make Congress the judge on appeal in its own case. This is no new attitude for a progressive. Progressives often favor unrestricted governmental power because they want to use its power for their reforms. So they backed the Caesars and the Star Chamber. They prefer speed to safety and don't like it when courts protect men from their governors.

Urbana, Illinois, October 1 Frederick Green

College Lecture Courses

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Much of the criticism offered by the Dartmouth student committee on the educational methods in use in our colleges today would be accepted as valid and valuable by all progressive college teachers.

An interesting aspect is to be found in the anomalous position occupied by the "lecture course" in our educational thinking. It has entered our college curriculum by two different doors: on the one hand, as a substitute for the classroom recitation or discussion rendered impossible by the increase of the student body and by the size of popular elective courses; on the other, as an importation from Europe, a means of raising our colleges to a higher intellectual plane and of making them more definitely of university rank. Unfortunately the lecture course under these two influences has tended to become a hybrid having the weak rather than the strong points of each system. In the foreign university the lecturer merely presents some phase or aspect of the subject studied, his object being to give the student method of approach and bibliography or the results of his own research. The student attends or not according as matter and method are well presented and bibliography valuable. No examination is ever founded on such a course; when the student is examined before receiving his degree it is on the whole subject or definite phases of it with which he must be thoroughly familiar and for which he must prepare himself by individual reading and study. With us the examination follows immediately on the completion of the course and is almost invariably founded entirely on it, nothing being included in the paper which has not been treated in the lectures. This method naturally tends to make the student a mere passive recipient of information and opinion, the slave of his notes or of the convenient digest; it affords no stimulus for any but the best to make use of the bibliographies of sources and lists of parallel readings.

If the student expected to be examined on the Elizabethan drama, the French Revolution, or labor problems in the United States instead of on what Professors X, Y, and Z had said on these subjects in the classroom, there would be an immediate change in his whole attitude toward his work, and many of the desires expressed by the Dartmouth students would be at once fulfilled. It would "make the acquisition of the necessary information the concern of the student rather than that of the instructor," putting on the former the responsibility for his own progress and success and leaving the latter free to give his class the benefit of his best knowledge, to treat in detail the most important or most interesting aspects of his subject instead of almost forcing him to give a rapid and necessarily superficial survey of the whole, as is now the case. Harvard has taken a wise step in demanding from every undergraduate candidate for a degree an examination on his major subject of study without reference to the courses pursued in it.

Vassar College, August 16 M. P. Whitney

In Honor of Mrs. Kelley

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Friends of Mrs. Florence Kelley are planning to hold an anniversary dinner in honor of her twenty-five years of leadership of the National Consumers' League, on November 14, at the Hotel Astor. The dinner will be in recognition not only of her quarter century with the League, but of a life-time devoted to the furtherance of social justice. A wide response to the plan of holding this dinner has already been received; one hundred and fifty persons have accepted membership on a general committee for the dinner.

Tickets at $3.50 per cover can be obtained from Mrs. H. A. Ingraham, care Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, 45 East 63rd Street, New York City.

New York City, October 16 Josephine Goldmark

Clam Chowder on Olympus

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: How about some sweet olive oil and parsley in that clam chowder? Undoubtedly Alfred forgot all about these two most necessary ingredients to a successful Greek clam chowder.

But I forget that he is a New Englander and maybe knows nothing of how chowder was prepared for the gods of Olympus.

Galveston, Texas, October 14 H. Economidy

Books

First Glance

THE thing called Nature has been responsible during the past century or so for some of the best English prose and for some of the worst. The classics are lamentably few. There is Gilbert White, of course, and there are Thoreau, Burroughs, Hudson, and John Muir; but in addition there have been writers by the dozen who, playing with what seemed an easy subject, made it contemptible to self-respecting minds. The subject as a matter of fact is one of the most difficult ever invented by the imagination, calling as it does for a combination of knowledge, modesty, and tact which must necessarily be rare. The cheaper authors are those who have known so little about their common mistress as to suppose that she was infatuated with them, that her pleasure was to wait upon their little moods and flatter their little fancies by echoing back the pretty sentences in which these were expressed. Her "lovers," and —worse yet—those unspeakable persons who have found a moral in her, have all but discredited her in the eyes of readers who, if they had got their Nature pure, would have had to acknowledge pure delight. For there is both a solid and a delicate delight to be had from someone's scrupulous account of how an adder lay all morning on a rock, or how a weasel ran across the road with a squeaking field-vole in its mouth, or how a robin mated, or how a woodchuck scuttled to his cave, or how a grizzly plundered a bee-hive. All this providing there is no "interpretation" to break the spell. Thoreau intruded a philosophy, and Burroughs, Hudson, and Muir—increasingly as they grew old—could not refrain from commentary; but these four packed the world with pictures that must always be clear because they are unaffectedly true.

It happens that among the Nature-books recently come to hand there are several which illustrate the better and the worse procedure. To begin with the worse, three of these books suffer the incurable handicap of having been written by amateurs, that is to say by persons inexperienced in the austerely patient observation of Nature without which she cannot be worth talking about. The "Isles of Eden" of which Laura Lee Davidson writes (Minton, Balch: $2) are camping-places in Canada remembered with a wholly commonplace enthusiasm. There is a dash of woodlore, and there is much literary stuff—stock items of bird-song and leaf-fall; but Nature, who never of her own will plays a part, is humiliated by being given the role of playfellow in vacation time; little or nothing is observed. Equally empty of experience is Helen Swift's "Where Green Lanes End" (Huebsch: $1.50), through which there runs a pleasant enough patter of morning and evening impressions but nowhere in which is there anything that might be treasured as a record. The trouble again is that the author has been interested more in calling Nature names—Arcady, for instance —than in scanning her uncommunicative and fascinating face. E. L. Grant Watson is a finer writer than either of the foregoing, but his title, "Moods of Earth and Sky" (Boni and Liveright: $2.50), is suspicious; and he comes true to form by announcing near the start that "things seen are of little importance. It is what they reveal with which I am concerned." Mere "appearances" he deprecates in a later passage. But the great naturalists have been content with mere appearances, and the most valuable revelations they have made have been revelations of fact. It is for its store of facts that "Animal Life in the Yosemite," by Joseph Grinnell and Tracy Irwin Storer (University of California Press: $7.50), to come finally to the better kind of book, is so welcome to a lay reader. The California Museum of Vertebrate Zoology commissioned Mr. Grinnell and Mr. Storer to make a report in untechnical terms of all the "terrestrial vertebrate animals" they could find in a certain section of the Sierra Nevada—a section, by the way, which John Muir wrote an unsurpassable book about. They found three hundred and fifty-five, and here all these are—birds, rats, beavers, and bears—in straightforward alphabetical order, coolly and accurately described. There are no flourishes, there is no apparent poetry; on his own page the beaver goes quickly and quietly to work. But the result is literature. Nature left to herself is bound to be literature.

MARK VAN DOREN

Hawthorne, Melville, Cabell

Straws and Prayer-Books: Dizain des Diversions. By James Branch Cabell. Robert M. McBride Company. $2.50.

From the Hidden Way: Dizain des Echos. By James Branch Cabell. Robert M. McBride Company. $2.50.

THE pattern by which James Branch Cabell has for twenty years been weaving his lustrous tapestry now pretty clearly reveals itself. "Straws and Prayer-Books" appears as the Epilogue, as "Beyond Life" was the Prologue, to what is henceforth to be called the Biography of Manuel of Poictesme, Count and Redeemer of the imagined province, and ancestor of all the characters in Mr. Cabell's world. "The Lineage of Lichfield" worked out the lines of descent from Poictesme through England to America; in revised editions the earlier novels and tales have with a few touches been made to fit into the central plan; the poems of "From the Hidden Way" are now ascribed to Robert Etheridge Townsend, hero of "The Cords of Vanity"; "Straws and Prayer-Books" gathers up the fragments and utters the valedictory. The most ambitious scheme ever undertaken by an American romancer is at last virtually complete.

The scheme rests, of course, upon a definite opinion regarding human life. Mr. Cabell sees his fellows upon the planet as creatures engaged, with not much variation from individual to individual, in a recurrent comedy. The protagonist of every action is born, aspires, succeeds or fails, and dies. His child, in the flesh or in the spirit, inherits his role and plays it in the costume of the next generation; but only the costume is different. Having hit upon a personage so interesting as Manuel, Mr. Cabell has not felt the need of forever inventing other personages, when variants would do as well. He has merely studied Manuel in his transmigrations. But there still remains the mystery of the instinct which has kept the annalist of Manuel, aware of the futility of the process as he is, busy for two decades with his annals. "Straws and Prayer-Books" attacks that mystery. Ultimately it is perhaps insoluble; practically it comes down to the fact that Mr. Cabell has in this manner been diverting himself, as all men must divert themselves along the gray corridors by which they approach the black gate of death. "The artist . . . is life's half-frightened play-boy." Among the noises of thunders and of battles, among the silences of stupidity and despair, he plays with ideas and passions. However explicitly he may allege, at some later time, that he had another purpose, he merely lies, so far as the actual creative hour is concerned.

This particular play-boy, by his own analysis, has made sport with common-sense and piety and death, the martinets which would like to regiment mankind. Believing that literature is a criticism of life in the sense that "prison-breaking is a criticism of the penitentiary," Mr. Cabell has never hesitated to leave the cleared fields of realism for the adventurous frontiers of romance, where magic is the only science. Noticing that all the poets have worshiped the outcast god Pan, Mr. Cabell has deliberately amused himself with such rogues as Jurgen. Understanding that death is abhorrent to all men, Mr. Cabell has done what he could to create some deathless thing able to cheat oblivion. These points he argues, and around them he has built up, in "Straws and Prayer-Books," a joyous structure of examples and illustrations. With that economy which is an article of his creed he has worked into his Epilogue his reviews of "Messer Marco Polo" and "Tyll Eulenspiegel" and "The Queen Pédauque" and "Fantastica"; his studies of Joseph Hergesheimer and George Moore; his interview with the author of "The Eagle's Shadow"; and his stories, "The Thin Queen of Elfhame" and "The Delta of Radegonde"—to say nothing of numerous other fine ears of corn now submitted to the artful mill. The effect is, in a way, the effect of the Biography: that of a magnificent miscellany of beautiful things arranged on an intelligent and orderly plan.

It is possible enough that Mr. Cabell will yet choose to elaborate other portions of his mosaic, but, at this end of a chapter, he may by the most hopeful critic be estimated with reference to the work now finished. There seems to be no longer any reason for not associating him with the only comparable American romancers, Hawthorne and Melville. Unlike the others as each of these three may seem, they have all at least this much in common, that they are engineers of escape from the universe of compromises and half-measures to the universe in which both the reason and the imagination would prefer to live. Hawthorne was perhaps more strictly bound to the actual world than either of the others, yet he too breathed uncomfortably in it, and kept sending his imagination back to times in which it could function without the daily handicaps which fretted him. Only in the dim world of old Salem could he imagine the proud spirit of Hester Prynne rising up and cracking the stiff frame of the Puritan code. Melville, less touched by Puritanism than Hawthorne, fled from his world not along the track of time but along the track of space, sending his imagination to a cannibal paradise in the Pacific, to the wild borders of the remote ocean where his countrymen wrestled with angels and demons. Mr. Cabell, more systematic than Melville or Hawthorne in his undertaking, is more thorough in his art. He has left behind both his own place and his own age, and has taken refuge in an imagined realm where the very shadows are brighter than the sunshine of Virginia. He pays for this greater detachment with a certain rarefaction; Hawthorne is more solid, Melville more robust. It is in wit and loveliness that Mr. Cabell matches them.

Melville, to be sure, is one of the wittiest of romancers. But he never won for his wit a full emancipation from the fears that had been planted in him by his moral training. He fought with the beasts of conscience; he tortured himself with speculations about immortality; he could carry even Captain Ahab only as far as to the sulphurous brink of blasphemy. With conscience and immortality and blasphemy Mr. Cabell's wit plays as intrepidly as with less formidable prejudices. It has no fears. It stares open-eyed at the blazing sun and good-humoredly strokes the beard of Jehovah. There is, consequently, none of that violence which goes with Melville's robuster and racier comedy. So are there in Mr. Cabell none of the touches of provincialism which go with Hawthorne's solider grasp of human character. Is Donatello a faun? Jurgen is, too. But whereas in the substantial tissue of Donatello the sense of sin takes root, Jurgen slips through earth and heaven and hell as unassailably as if Luther had never died to make men forever conscious of the moral bearings of all experience. Mr. Cabell is thus as free to admire loveliness wherever he finds it as to discover the possibilities of mirth in whatever theme. He finds beauty glittering in the midst of ugly sins, and snares it in his tolerant net. He builds fresh beauty about ominous symbols, inventing or enlarging them if need be. He does not, like Hawthorne, feel the obligation constantly to check the wings of his vision by comparing it with reality. Mr. Cabell, by questioning the reality of reality, has been naturalized in the world of dreams till he moves about there without the scruples lasting over from another allegiance. Thus the beauty of his Poictesme is double-distilled. Those lovers of beauty who must now and then come back to earth for renewal will occasionally gasp in Poictesme, wishing the atmosphere would thicken and the brilliant colors change. But always Poictesme hangs above the mortal clouds, suspended from the eternal sky, in the region where wit and beauty are joined in an everlasting kiss.

CARL VAN DOREN

Willard Straight

Willard Straight. By Herbert Croly. The Macmillan Company. $6.

ONCE in the dismal days of the Washington Conference, when the outlook was dark for China and the Chinese delegates were losing all of their illusions and most of their hopes, an old and distinguished Chinese official, one of the advisers to his delegation, was talking to an American who had known Willard Straight intimately and long. "Ah, if only Willard Straight were still alive!" he sighed. "Then it would be different."

This biography by Herbert Croly explains the Chinese statesman's sigh. There are on the whole just two kinds of men who go to China, or to other Far Eastern lands for that matter. First are those who may be called the practical men, diplomatic and other officials who go to further the interests of their governments and business men who go to further their own interests. Second are those who may be called impractical men—"idealists" is a better term. They are drawn by the imaginative appeal of the East, they appreciate its point of view, and they become habitual defenders of China and the Chinese even against their own people if necessary. Seldom is there one who comes under both classifications, one who is both practical and efficient on the one hand and on the other is able to see the point of view of the Chinese and is impelled by his instincts to pursue their advantage as well as his own. Such an exception was Willard Straight.

Mr. Straight was, as Mr. Croly says, a many-sided man. He was artist, civil servant, war correspondent, diplomat, organizer, entrepreneur, banker, and, finally, soldier. His was a personality that made for fast and lasting friendships among men of all races and classes. He was of the type more frequently found in England than in America—well born, but a man in whom a sense of social responsibility not restricted to his own class is more compelling than the instincts of acquisitiveness and self-advancement. All this may be said of him, but essentially his fame is founded on his work in China. He left his mark there.

Mr. Straight was American Consul-General in Mukden in the crucial years after the Russo-Japanese war when Manchuria was the center of Asia and the forces were being cast that have made the Far East of supreme importance to America, as it will be eventually to the rest of the world. He foresaw the direction those forces were taking and he sought to call attention to it. Almost single-handed he fought against Russia's encroachment on the one side and Japan's on the other. He foresaw that international cooperation would have to supplant competitive national aggression as the basis of the West's relation to China if successive wars of partition were to be averted. Cooperation, further, would have to be founded on the principle of China's welfare as well as on that of Occidental profit. He gave his vision constructive form. It was his enthusiasm, energy, and persistence that made the first international banking consortium a reality. If the consortium has fallen short of his vision in purpose and method, the principle of international cooperation as a technique of relations between the strong Powers and weakened China has at least been set up. A new turn has been given to the history of the Far East.

Something of the quality of the man is shown in his letters from France while serving as a staff officer. He was keenly pro-Ally and pro-war, but he never lost sight of the fact that the object of the war was not victory alone. And his prescience told him what millions of his countrymen have only found to be wisdom after the fact. A month before the armistice he wrote: "What I'm afraid of now is that the British and French may kick over the traces. They have tasted blood and may demand their pound of flesh. . . . We stand in a fair way of having fought the war, lost thousands of lives and millions of dollars, upset everything, and of not getting the peace we started for. . . . We should have made our bargain with the Allies when we first came in—or at least when we began to send troops in such numbers. Now we will be apt to get nothing—not even the peace we fight for, but a peace which will, instead of being founded on a League of Nations, have the foundations for other wars." Change the tenses and there is a description of Versailles in 1919 and all of Europe in 1924.

Mr. Croly has written more than an interesting story of one man's life. He has also given a scholarly and authoritative account of Far Eastern history in the eventful years after the opening of this century. As he is not a specialist in Far Eastern affairs it is a highly creditable achievement. In balance and perspective his book is superior to many which have been written by specialists. NATHANIEL PEFFER

The Story of Coal

The Coal Industry. By A. T. Shurick. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

LESS than twenty years ago wildcats howled at night and bears lumbered through the wilderness in places where today man has built unending stretches of coal-mining villages. The romance of coal lies in part in the very novelty with which it is mined in some sections of the United States. Where solitude once reigned over ranges of forest-topped hills, and man was seen only in settlers' huts, mine cars now whizz in and out of holes in the hillside, railroad sidings run in many directions, and village after village of coal-mining operations extends before the eye. You can ascend river valleys to their sources without being out of sight of a tipple, where the coal is dumped into railroad cars, or of a miner's cottage. Whole counties are given over to coal almost exclusively. Much of this recent opening of coal mines has been done in West Virginia, Alabama, eastern Kentucky, and other regions. Unless one lives near such places one does not ordinarily think of an industry so old that miners were being impressed for service in England in 1296 as having been so recently started in large areas of our modern world. In these places the transformation has been magic. Peace has given way overnight to activity, solitude to bustling communities, and virgin wildness to scarred hillsides.

To a dweller in modern cities who steps over a coal chute placed across the sidewalk coal-mining can become a fascinating subject. Mr. Shurick has attempted to treat every stage of the industry from the earliest times down to the latest word of the United States Coal Commission. Never before has a single volume, designed specifically for the layman, covered so wide a field. The author lives in Athens, Ohio, in the Ohio coal fields, and evidently has been interested in coal operations. He traces mechanical equipment and engineering methods from their primitive beginnings, describes the ways in which coal is marketed, enumerates economic factors such as costs, ownership of mines, and types of company organization, discusses the miner's life and social conditions, and describes the various coal fields in this country. To one who has seen electric cutting and loading machines making short work of a face of coal deep underground today it is a far cry to the time when only the outcropping on the hillside was taken or when women crawled on their hands and knees along low passages, chains bound around their waists and baskets of coal pulled by these chains behind them.

In discussing the opening of bituminous coal fields, the author hardly pays enough attention to the manner in which lands were acquired, and in discussing ownership he pays little attention to the tendency of large industrial corporations to secure great holdings and to the effects of absentee ownership; in respect to anthracite mines, confined to a small part of Pennsylvania, he is better. He describes with much detail the technique of taking a deposit of coal out of the ground without letting the earth fall down about your ears. In writing about miners and their job he is fair in saying that the average earnings of the miner for the year are not adequate to maintain the American standard of living, but he paints a somewhat too pleasant picture of the comforts of miners' houses and community life. No space is given to the whole structure of wage-fixing and to the important periodic negotiations between mine owners and the United Mine Workers of America; this subject has been separately treated in a recent book by another author. Although drawing largely upon the reports of the Coal Commission for many disturbing facts about the industry, Mr. Shurick makes the surprising statement that "in all essential respects the Commission has given the coal industry a clean bill of health"; surely this is too roseate a summary of that body's findings. He has tried to write an impartial book, and has in large measure succeeded. Living as he does in a unionized field, his evident acceptance of the United Mine Workers as a desirable factor in the industry is valuable, as is also his prophecy that the union will ultimately succeed in organizing all of that battleground of mine unionism, West Virginia. Mr. Shurick does not write vividly or skilfully, and the absorbing human interests in the story of coal mining are implicit rather than expressed. Fortunately much is accomplished by a generous use of pictures. WINTHROP D. LANE

Best and Worst

Looking at Life. By Floyd Dell. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.25.
Latitudes. By Edwin Muir. B. W. Huebsch. $2.
Taking the Literary Pulse. By Joseph Collins. George H. Doran. $3.

I SUSPECT that it was Floyd Dell who assumed the role of Apollo and marked Dr. Collins with the attributes of an ass when this modern Midas had the temerity to dissent from a universal judgment on lyric values. At any rate, the scorching contribution to "F. P. A.'s" column in which "F. D." ridiculed the pretensions of "the noted neurologist" to the post of arbiter literarum for the general was written with the holy fervor and the humorous faculty that Mr. Dell brings to the discussion of life and letters. It was like him to treat the question of competent criticism by materializing a superannuated bartender and conjecturing that Paddy's comments on literature would be less verbose and no less valid, more amusing and no more asinine, than those of Dr. Collins; it is like Floyd Dell to present a hypothetical saloon-keeper, Russian friend, or modern knight and thus personalize an abstract problem.

The obvious result of this method is to lose in interest what is gained in conviction so that, for one who needs not be convinced of the censor's triumph in the cinema, the meaning of feminism for men, and the necessity of freedom for women these simple excursions into the maelstrom of thought are a trifle dull because they never venture beyond the broad belt that forms the edge of the whirl. They are dull with that lively monotony of a choppy sea which characterized The Liberator—from which a number of these essays have been culled—when it determined to make an appeal to the "peepul." Mr. Dell is writing down to the miner and the financier's wife, the country schoolmarm, the Greenwich Village intellectual, and the college adolescent—to those, in brief, who have to be coaxed to think; in "Looking at Life" his purpose is to educate the Philistines rather than to discourse with civilized people. It is really an expert feat, this treading of the swirl of life in such a way as to stay on its surface and out of reach of the funnel when the current on either side is both deep and strong. As Edwin Muir puts it, "to the profound, depth is a necessity and a torment. They long for shallowness, and to remain on the surface." Mr. Dell is here taking a vacation from profundity and obviously enjoying it—but he constantly betrays the fact that he belongs among the depths.

Mr. Muir himself achieves simplicity, but he never approaches the shallows. His simplicity is a tour de force turned by a monumental knowledge of Anglo-Saxon monosyllables which are used with a precision that permits no misunderstanding and by an equally enormous capacity for intellectual research, for that weighing, tasting, comparing, and reflecting which uncovers the unique and the universal, reducing them to their uncommon quality and to their common denominator. This is high praise and may seem extravagant; I hope it does, for the only way to distinguish genius from talent is by the amount of frantic extravagance it inspires. The greatness of Mr. Muir's power may be judged by the number and variety of the subjects he interprets. He has sought—and found—the secret of Burns and Conrad, Ibsen and Dostoyevsky (here with the assistance of M. Lavrin), Nietzsche and our contemporaries; he has speculated—to some purpose—on art and optimism, on love and suffering and superstition.

To capture the essence of Mr. Muir's work and his contribution to literature it is necessary to revise the current conception of critic and philosopher; it is vital to recognize that a critic may work creatively upon ideas and that a philosopher may concern himself with living material rather than metaphysical formulae. Mr. Muir's conception of criticism is illustrated in these two sentences: "Criticism should reject the vulgar and irrelevant personal detail, and find its inspiration in the interaction and collision of minds, in the cold and passionate ardor of the activities of the spirit. . . . Criticism can only become a thing unique and fruitful, however, by becoming something else than history or sociology, by treating literature purely as the emanation of spiritual entities, and by analyzing, or rather divining, the essence of these entities." His view of philosophy cannot be compressed into so small a compass; it is better expressed in the epigram: "Every philosophical problem has thus far been settled by solving another."

It is a fortunate coincidence that three of Mr. Muir's essays should be extended reviews of the books of Janko Lavrin, whose "psycho-critical" studies antedated the work of Dr. Collins. One is able thus to find substantiation for the view that Dr. Collins not only fails to achieve his object but also fails to understand the method whereby this object may be achieved. If psychological analysis is more potent than old-fashioned diagnosis of the obvious surface symptoms in interpreting the work of a great author or in disclosing the secrets of his mind, this is only because it undertakes to examine a mass of documents which the other method ignores, because it speculates on the connection between the personal experiences of the man and the creative expressions of the writer, and finally because it coordinates these speculations with a sound critical diagnosis of the older type.

Now Dr. Collins does none of these things. He establishes his premises on insufficient data both in cases where more information is available and in instances where the writers have not published enough to permit intelligent generalization. He is not only insufficiently acquainted with literature but lacking in the fundamentals of criticism: an understanding of aesthetic standards and an appreciation of artistic achievement. And, most important of all, he comes to the subject of literature with utterly irrelevant prejudices in the fields of politics, religion, and morality which influence tremendously, because he has neither self-control nor detachment, his attitude toward the writers he discusses. But, though it is sufficient to damn a much wiser man than Dr. Collins, this is not all! Worse yet is the fact that he writes—and knows that he writes—for readers who do not care two hoots for a profound interpretation of literature. They seek—and he gives them—both the direct and the vicarious enjoyment which is to be had in the description and condemnation of perversions and pornography and which is justified in their eyes by his show of pseudo-scientific method. In the work of Dr. Collins we may see the green-grocer morality and mentality passing judgment on what it cannot understand, and the effect is, to fall back once again on Mr. Muir, "a general impression that the road which leads to ineffable, eternal glory is very broad and convenient, and packed with the bourgeoisie."

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Welcome Reactions

Gentle Reactions. By Gabriel Wells. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

GABRIEL WELLS is a name not altogether unassociated with the world of letters; but it is in the distribution of books rather than in the creation of them that the name is thought of. Amid the book-auction fraternity and among the book-collecting cognoscenti it is familiarly abbreviated to the initials G. W., a manner of address which, while it implies appreciation of the book-dealer, ignores the man. I have always suspected that there was a soul somewhere hidden in this efficient bookseller, and the reading of these "Gentle Reactions" confirms me in my suspicion. It must have been a real relief to Mr. Wells, from the occasional monotony of his business, to express himself in these letters to the newspapers, for the reading of them is both a diversion and an education. His "reactions" to the questions of the day may be "gentle," but the gentleness is rather in the manner of their expression than in the matter the expressions convey. What Mr. Wells thinks of Lloyd George, Poincaré, prohibition, woman suffrage, the League of Nations, and other momentous subjects which are concerning the statesmen of our time may not disturb their complacency, but what he says is, nevertheless, both well said and wisely said. His appeal to America to take her proper part in the settlement of European affairs is as competent in its argument as it is eloquent in its statement.

TEMPLE SCOTT

Types of the Novel

The Political Novel. By Morris Edmund Speare. Oxford University Press. $2.25.

The Historical Novel. By H. Butterfield. Cambridge University Press. 5s.

The Modern German Novel. By Harvey Hewett-Thayer. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $2.50.

THE political novel may be a thing in itself and Mr. Speare would like to give it an importance hardly less than that of the historical novel. Yet the curious fact remains that the political novel has not thrown its net about any deep-sea monsters. Mr. Speare has dredged up stolid flounders like Winston Churchill and a flying fish like Disraeli. He fails to show an octopus or a whale on his list. Politics has produced any number of politicians and no masterpieces. A whole chapter given to Mrs. Humphrey Ward fails somehow to convince one of her genius. Trollope will not live by his political novels, and "The New Machiavelli" is not Mr. Wells's best book. One must, however, admire the industry which has sent Mr. Speare in search of first principles for the political novel and made him take writers like Mrs. Humphrey Ward, Churchill, and Disraeli with such profound seriousness. One learns with stupefaction that "the publication of 'Coningsby' was an event of no less importance in the history of the novel than the appearance of 'The Doll's House' was to modern dramatic literature."

Seduced by his imposed necessity of proving a case, Mr. Speare expends a vast scholarship upon Disraeli's novels. He gives a hundred and fifty pages to things like "Coningsby" and "Sybil" and a whole chapter to Paul Leicester Ford (of all people) without once mentioning Dreiser. Mr. Butterfield, however, does not overlook art and life in his search for definitions. He is less interested in inventing a horrendous dialectic than in discovering the relations between the facts of history and the art of fiction. He does little more than formulate commonplaces, but he writes with a genuine passion for great literature and he does not fall into the error of disjoining the novel from its own purpose and making it a guide to history. Like any kind of novel, the historical romance transmits the color and rhythm of life into dramatic appearances and haunting apparitions. It is "historical" only in that it works through the pathos of distance. Mr. Butterfield is able to estimate the peculiar distinction of writers as opposed as Dumas and Hewlett and to assign the historical novel its importance as one of the most fascinating inventions of art.

In "The Modern German Novel" Mr. Hewett-Thayer is less ambitious than either Mr. Speare or Mr. Butterfield. He does not so much seek first principles as give very full information on the method and the plots of the more important German novelists of the past fifty years. Writing with an admirable fairness Mr. Hewett-Thayer compiles a source-book packed with particular details. He has no case to prove except the case of good literature. He discusses the realist Fontane, the naturalist Kretzer, the romanticist Huch, the aristocrat Ompteda, the Swiss Zahn, the war novelists, and the novelists (such as Wassermann) who did not write about the war. He sets up no absolute standards; he is content to describe the plots and contents of the more important books, to suggest their excellencies and their defects, and to relate them to the work of men like Zola and Flaubert, Dickens and Dostoevsky.

A. Donald Douglas

Books in Brief

Our American Kings. By Frederick L. Collins. The Century Company. $2.50.

This book should be re-christened "The Shirts of the Mighty." For the fourteen living governors who stalk through its pages are metaphorically, and often literally, revealed in their shirt-sleeves—now rolled up, now held aloft by armlets. It may, of course, be argued that all this hurdy-gurdy rhetoric is "both instructive and entertaining." Al Smith, for instance, is blessed with a head shaped like an "inverted Bartlett pear," and he "likes his fun to be funny, with pie in the face and pins in the pants"; Percy Baxter, bachelor governor of Maine, writes letters to school-girls which elicit such replies as: "Thank you for your letter. It will make me a good girl." One suspects that Mr. Collins has thumped down his message of cheer for Rotarians on a second-hand Oliver. A chortling preface assures the reader that the author has met all kinds of Americans, from governors and professors to barbers and bootleggers. If he continues to labor hard, twenty-five years hence he ought to be able to write a good book about bootleggers.

You Takes Your Choice. By Clinton W. Gilbert. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

A disinterested mind expressing itself in a breezy, newspaper style is a rare phenomenon. Mr. Gilbert concedes—and his book proves it—that with one unimportant exception he does not "give two pins" for any of the presidential or vice-presidential candidates, A.D. 1924, whom he so keenly and carefully dissects. While the author of "The Mirrors of Washington" fully lives up to his claim of being "a specialist in recognizing limitations," he is nevertheless thoroughly impartial and even tolerant. He cheerfully admits that "singed cat" Coolidge had nothing to do with the settlement of the Boston police strike; that he himself is "going to contribute to [Davis's] election by showing later in this book that the evidences of his greatness are superficial and should not count too much against him"; and that La Follette will almost certainly be defeated because, among numerous other reasons, he "has never recognized the validity of 'The smile that wins.'" If this book attains wide circulation a grave danger will threaten the Republic—even fewer votes will be cast this year than were cast in 1920.

Bashan and I. By Thomas Mann. Translated by Hermann George Scheffauer. Henry Holt and Company. $1.75.

The author of this book is described by the publisher (whether ignorantly or disingenuously) as "a famous Austrian novelist." But Thomas Mann is nothing of the sort. He is a German of the Reich, and a North German at that, though the Latin strain in his make-up may partly account for his singularly lucid and graceful style, which is here rendered into supple English. This book is a study of the mind of a dog. Mann wrote it during the war as a refuge and a relief, very much as he has since turned to spiritism as an escape from the woes of peace. One can hardly begrudge him these flights from the man-made mess which is Europe. Bashan is a short-haired setter, presented in all his canine reality and not in the least anthropomorphically tricked out. Dog lovers will readily accord him a place in the hall of fame beside Rab, Krambambuli, Bob Son of Battle, and the various collie heroes of Mr. Albert Payson Terhune.

The Sailors' Union of the Pacific. By Paul S. Taylor. The Ronald Press Company. $2.50.

International Seamen's Union of America. By Arthur Emil Albrecht. United States Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The sailor is not yet a free laborer, and discipline at sea is still maintained by a caste system—borrowed from naval life—that in civilized countries has virtually disappeared from industry ashore. Yet the advance from the Yankee "hell-ship" and the "bucko" mate and master of fifty years ago is so notable that it is well worth while to have the facts in regard to the organizations that have been most influential in bringing about the change. Those facts, compiled from hitherto scattered and to most persons inaccessible sources, are gathered together in the two studies listed above. Successful organization came first on the Pacific coast—in 1885, according to Mr. Taylor. In 1892, Mr. Albrecht records, the Sailors' Union of the Pacific brought together a convention in Chicago out of which grew a national institution.

Drama

Two Experiments

MR. STARK YOUNG has a passion for intangible values, and like most mystics he finds in ritual the only possible outlet for those feelings which, though shared by thousands, have never yet been set down in words. Had he been born in some other place and time he might have found contentment in endless repetition of the complicated "offices" of some monastic order, but cast as he has been upon the modern world he cannot be naive enough to accept any one ritual as complete or absolute and it is, accordingly, the idea behind all ritual which fascinates him. He knows that wherever men have gathered together for any prayer, dance, or game which has become traditional with them the gesture has released somehow their emotions, and so the slow Procession of the Virgin through the crooked streets of the Mexican town affects him neither more nor less than the stereotyped antics of clown and pantaloon upon the village stage or even the flickering image of Charlie Chaplin, who seems to combine and reinterpret the traditions of many generations of clowns. Each seems to him to have been sanctified by use, to have been for so long the channel through which the common emotion flowed as to have become in the truest sense religious, and his dream is of a theater which shall purge all the complicated emotions of the modern man by becoming a comprehensive ritual which has absorbed all other rituals, from solemn mass to rowdy pantomime.

His new play, "The Saint" (Greenwich Village Theater), centers about one of those mystics to whom rightness is all and who is paralyzed in the world of action because nothing which he can take is worth the taking and only those things given or received can count. From the plains of Texas, where he had caught in the winds a faint whisper of the great mystery, he has come to the school of a monastery and he has found there in the Procession of the Virgin another glimpse of the great truth. He passes thence into a group of strolling players who catch—hardly more fitfully—the same magic in the mocking tragedy of their conventional pantomime; and in the end he returns, battered and deepened by the world, to the door of the monastery to ask again that the procession give up its secret. Receiving, as usual, but a fragmentary answer, he goes upon his way to question the winds once more; and though they, to be sure, will not satisfy him, he will return to some ritual, solemn or rejoicing, and find in that ceremonial union with the rest of mankind a temporary outlet for his overmastering emotions.

Thus the intention of the play is clear and admirable. It is meant to be at once the exposition of a fundamental human need and an illustration, through its processions and pantomimes, of the method by which that need may be satisfied. But though it succeeds well enough in making clear what it is intended to do, it does not always quite do it. At the beginning of the second act where the players rehearse their pantomime author and actors together catch the requisite rhythm and rise to heights which, if sustained, would make the whole a triumphant achievement, but at other times they falter together; and not even the competent playing of Leo Carrillo can animate the prosy woodenness of the first act. The Provincetown group has had a way of disappointing its admirers, of failing, save in rare instances, to fulfil the promises which innumerable productions have vouchsafed; and on the whole "The Saint" is not more than a very promising promise.

To one observer at least "The Saint" seemed on the whole nearer to solid achievement than the more garish experiment "The Murder in the Whistler Room" (Provincetown Theater), though it would be easy enough to give a theoretical defense of the method of the latter play. Granting the fundamental Freudian premise that our dreams reveal in metaphor our deepest reactions to reality, nothing could be more logical for a psychological dramatist to do than to dramatize the dream life of a subject, but the fact remains that in spite of all his elaborate machinery Mr. Edmund Wilson has achieved little more than a fairly conventional satire upon stale culture.

Theatergoers less interested in experiments will find "The Red Falcon" (Broadhurst Theater) a highly effective melodrama of sixteenth century Sicily and "The Fake" (Hudson Theater) a problem-melodrama which is always suavely performed and sometimes stirring. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Nation's La Follette-Wheeler Campaign Fund has now reached $6,512.49. We urge all our readers who have not yet obeyed an impulse to contribute to this fund to do so now, as the last days of the campaign are important and expensive.

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

THIS SUNDAY AT 3 P. M.

The DEBATE of the Century!

CLARENCE DARROW versus JUDGE A. J. TALLEY

Famous Chicago Lawyer NEGATIVE — N. Y. Court of General Sessions AFFIRMATIVE

SUBJECT:

Is CAPITAL PUNISHMENT a Wise Public Policy?

Chairman: LOUIS MARSHALL

Temporary Chairman, LEWIS E. LAWES, Warden of Sing Sing Prison.

THIS SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26TH, 3:00 P. M.

Manhattan Opera House, 34th St., near 8th Ave.

Tickets $1.65, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30. Box seats $4.40

On sale at Box Office, Tyson's, McBride's and all other ticket agencies, or at the offices of and by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave.,N.Y.City (Longacre 10435-4447)

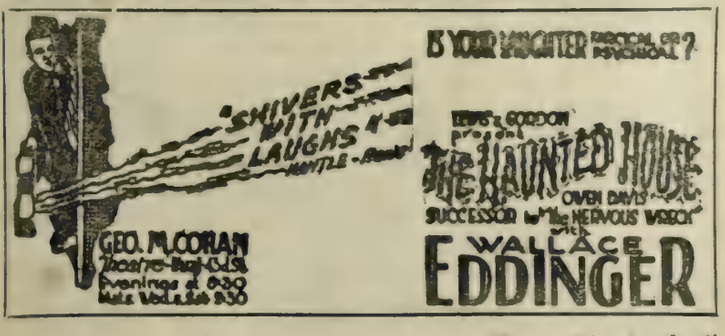
N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, should send us their names.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.



OPEN FORUM

Sunday, October 26th, 8 P. M.

"THE ELECTION"

Speakers: Elisabeth Marbury, Democratic Party
Ogden L. Mills, Republican Party
Arthur Garfield Hays, Progressive Party

Sunday, Nov. 2, "The Ku Klux Klan," Prof. John M. Mecklin

SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, 2 West 64th St., N. Y. C.

The Public is invited

RAND SCHOOL

7 East 15th Street

Courses beginning
Nov. 10, 8:30 P.M. ..... Marius Hansome "The World We Live In"
Nov. 11, 8:30 P.M ..... Algernon Lee Senior Seminar "Social Theories and Movements"
Nov. 13, 7:00 P.M. ..... Scott Nearing "Current Opinion"
Nov. 14, 8:30 P.M. ..... Herman Epstein "With the Great Composers"
Nov. 15, 11:00 A.M. and 1:30 P.M. Scott Nearing "Dynamic Sociology" and "Current History"
Nov. 26, 8:30 P.M. ..... Johan Smertenko "Current Drama"

Beginning Nov. 1st
Saturday afternoon lectures J. F. Horrabin on "H. G. Wells" Carleton Beals "Latin America," Roberto Haberman "Mexico," Vint Laughland "Social Religion" Clarence Darrow "Crime."

DEBATE—Nov. 30—Clarence Darrow vs. Scott Nearing "Is the Human Race Worth Working For?"

The DEBATE of the Season!

SHOULD LITERATURE BE CENSORED?

JOHN S. SUMNER versus ERNEST BOYD

Sec. N. Y. Soc. for Sup. of Vice — Noted Int. Author and Critic

Chairman: CLIFFORD SMYTH, Editor, International Book Review

Temporary Chairman: John Farrar, Editor of The Bookman

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1924, AT 8:30 P. M.

TOWN HALL, 121 West 43rd Street

Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75, 3.30 (war tax inc.)

On sale at Brentano's, Macy and Wanamaker Book Depts. and at the offices of or by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., New York (Tel. Longacre 10434)

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, should send us their names.

International Relations Section

La Follette's Foreign Policy

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE, in his speech at St. Louis on October 14, discussed the World War and concluded with the most comprehensive and detailed statement of his views on foreign policy that he has made since his nomination. Owing to the interest of many of our readers in Mr. La Follette's probable attitude toward foreign affairs, should he be elected President, we print the speech in full below:

The time has come to return to fundamental American principles and traditions in the conduct of our foreign policy, as well as of our domestic policy.

For more than one hundred years this Government constantly pursued a policy which had been defined early in the last century by the greatest American statesmen. Its principles involved a wide departure from the traditions and practices of European diplomacy, which were based upon imperialistic intrigue. They were as original and unique as the principles of representative government, upon which our domestic policy was based. It was truly an American policy.

Its fundamental doctrines were, perhaps, most tersely expressed by Thomas Jefferson in his first inaugural address, when he declared for "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none." They were indorsed by Washington, Franklin, and other great statesmen. Only Hamilton and his followers, who desired a monarchy in the United States and an alliance with Great Britain, dared to oppose them.

This did not mean isolation from friendly intercourse and cooperation with other nations. For a hundred years the United States displayed a constant readiness to cooperate with other nations to promote the peaceful settlement of international disputes. Its reassertion will not imply any unreadiness to act with other nations in removing the causes of war.

Early Principles

To this basic statement of American foreign policy should be added three other general principles, which were enunciated during the early years of the century: (1) Recognition of foreign governments without intervention in their affairs. (2) The Monroe Doctrine safeguarding the American continents from imperialistic exploitation. (3) Absolute neutrality toward foreign nations involved in war.

The doctrine of war neutrality was formulated and proclaimed under the Administration of George Washington. England, then at war with France, sought to stop our shipments of food to the latter country. Thomas Jefferson, Washington's Secretary of State, in a letter to the United States Minister to Great Britain, stated the doctrine of neurality, as follows:

"Reason and usage," said Jefferson, "have established that when two nations go to war, those who choose to live in peace retain their natural rights to pursue their agriculture, manufacture, and other ordinary vocations; to carry the produce of their industry, for exchange to all nations, belligerent or neutral, as usual; to go and come freely without injury or molestation; and, in short, that the war among others shall be, for them, as if it did not exist."

In order to make the meaning of this doctrine quite clear, I desire to quote from Jefferson's interpretation set forth in another part of the same letter, where he says:

"Were we to withhold from her [France] supplies of provisions, we should in like manner be bound to withhold them from her enemies also, and thus shut to ourselves all the ports of Europe where corn is in demand or make ourselves parties in the war. This is a dilemma which Great Britain has no right to force upon us, and for which no pretext can be found in any part of our conduct. She may, indeed, feel the desire of starving an enemy nation, but she can have no right of doing it at our loss, nor of making us the instruments of it."

These were the fundamental doctrines upon which American foreign policy was based. They were adhered to for more than a century. Webster, Clay, and Lincoln were among the great statesmen who insisted upon their maintenance inviolate. They made for peace, and, in spite of the relative weakness of the American nation at the time they were proclaimed, gave to the United States a position which commanded the respect of all the world.

Imperialism Has Crept In

Today there is not one of these fundamental principles that has not been ignored, violated, or utterly rejected. Those who have controlled our foreign policy during the last ten years have departed entirely from American traditions and American principles, and permitted our policy to be shaped by the imperialistic maxims and precepts of European diplomacy.

In order that we may understand the causes which have led to the abandonment of these principles, and in some measure appreciate the dire consequences arising therefrom, I wish briefly to review a few outstanding facts and events.

It is true that our departure from the traditional American policy began with the development of imperialism under William McKinley, following the Spanish-American war. The breach was broadened under Roosevelt and Taft. The establishment of colonial possessions and dependencies, the rape of Panama, and the establishment of "dollar diplomacy" were all violations of the best American traditions. Slowly but surely we were entering upon the path of imperialism, which leads only to international discord and to war.

Nevertheless, it is my opinion that the complete abandonment of the true American foreign policy came under the Administration of Woodrow Wilson and has been continued and expanded under the present Harding-Coolidge Administration.

Wilson was elected as an anti-imperialist and did, in fact, do much during the first two years of his Administration to check the tendency toward imperialism by using his influence for Philippine independence, by curbing the extension of dollar diplomacy, and by his attitude toward the Mexican revolution.

When war was declared in Europe in the summer of 1914 President Wilson declared for "absolute neutrality—neutrality in thought, word, and deed." This was a true American policy. If this doctrine had been adhered to we would never have been drawn into war. We would be free from every form of foreign entanglement; we would have avoided at home the dire consequences of the last few years.

America's War Losses

Sixty thousand American boys would still be alive. We would have no colossal war debt. We would be free from our heavy burden of taxation. We would have no problem of caring for hundreds of thousands of wounded, diseased, and shell-shocked veterans. We would not have American agriculture prostrate and demanding speedy relief. We would have had no such concentration of wealth in the hands of a few as we have witnessed in recent years. Above all, we should have preserved our proud distinction of a nation steadfastly devoted to peace. Had the plain principle of international law announced by Washington and Jefferson been followed we would not have been called upon to declare war upon any of the belligerent nations of Europe. The fatal error came in the failure of President Wilson to treat the belligerent nations of Europe alike—the failure to reject the unlawful "war zones" of both Germany and Great Britain!

I do not doubt that President Wilson was sincere when he declared for absolute neutrality. I know the influences which surrounded him and which, day after day, month after month, brought the heaviest imaginable pressure to induce him to abandon his position of neutrality and throw the strength of the United States openly on the side of the allied governments.

The publication of the memoirs and letters of Franklin K. Lane and Walter H. Page and other documentary evidence gives us a picture of the insidious methods which were used to induce the President to abandon his declared position.

In establishing our position of neutrality during the early years of the World War two alternative courses were open, either of which led directly to peace. One was to insist upon the maintenance of absolute freedom of the seas and to resist any action on the part of either Great Britain or Germany which encroached upon our rights as a neutral nation to sell our food and other non-contraband articles to any nation. This line of policy was the one upon which Washington and Jefferson had insisted in their dealings with Great Britain and France in 1793. It was sanctioned by international law and clearly recognized in the Declaration of London, in which this field was more fully and definitely covered than in any other preceding document.

The second path that led to peace—the other alternative which was open to us—was to withdraw our commerce from both belligerents during the period of hostility and limit our trade to neutral nations.

The Path to War

We followed neither of these paths to peace. Instead we trod timidly and hesitatingly at first, and later boldly and aggressively the path that led to war.

We permitted Great Britain to mine the entire North Sea. We permitted her to cut us off entirely from legitimate commerce in food and other non-contraband articles with Germany, and to interfere with and restrict our trade with the neutral Scandinavian countries. It is true that we protested against this denial of our international rights, but we did not insist.

We permitted England to stop our shipments of food while women and children, old men, and other non-combatants were starving in Germany. We permitted our ships consigned to neutral ports to be seized and searched by the British Navy. We wrote notes of protest to the British Government, but always with the knowledge that the American Ambassador at the Court of St. James's was making it clear that these protests need not be heeded by the British Government.

Everything that followed was the inevitable consequence of this failure to observe genuine and absolute neutrality.

I need not review those consequences. They are known to every American citizen—to every man, woman, and child. They know the broad events, but they do not, in my opinion, understand their significance or their causes.

I would not now refer to them except that they have a bearing of the utmost importance, not alone upon our present foreign policy but upon our domestic policy as well.

It is my opinion that our foreign policy at the present time is being dictated and controlled by the same forces which were responsible for the abandonment and withdrawal of American neutrality during the World War.

It is my opinion that the private monopoly system was primarily responsible for the abandonment of our traditional foreign policy; that this system forced us into the World War; that this system is now driving us at breakneck speed along the paths of imperialism that lead inevitably to war and to the ending of free government at home as well.

Morgan and the War

I am convinced—I was convinced at the beginning—that we abandoned our policy of neutrality through the influence of J. P. Morgan & Co., the fiscal agent of the British Empire, who, in the early spring of 1917, turned loose the press and agencies of propaganda to drive us into the war.

At that time the credit of the Allies with the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. had been overdrawn to the extent of $400,000,000, while contracts to the amount of $800,000,000 more were maturing, which could only be paid by bringing America into the war. Hundreds of other banks were in the same perilous situation. They, too, had underwritten British and French bonds. If the Allies were defeated, these debts would not be paid. The bonds of the Allied countries would fall in value, and might possibly be worthless. The House of Morgan could only be saved by being underwritten by the United States Government. This was done. It was for this reason that America abandoned the policy of Washington, the policy of Jefferson, the policy of every President of the American people for a hundred years.

You need not take my word for this. Here is the written statement of Oscar T. Crosby, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury during the war. In an article in the Atlantic Monthly he says under his own signature:

"I shall not soon forget the blunt declaration, made to me ten days before Sir Cecil Spring-Rice took the first fruits of our efforts, by a member of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.:

"'We have scraped the bottom of the box. They owe us and our associate banks $400,000,000—practically an overdraft, since we cannot sell the collateral remaining in our hands without making a panic on the New York stock market. You people in the Treasury must now bear the whole burden. We can do no more.'

"Six weeks later, we learned that, in addition to this cash commitment, the Allies had contracted for about $800,000,000 worth of goods deliverable within six months."

That was the reason that Morgan—now, by the grace of the British King, Sir John Pierpont Morgan—forced America into the World War. Then came the Treaty of Versailles. It was to end war. Instead, it is the mother of war. It gave Great Britain command of the seas and of Africa, Asia, and the resources of the world as well. It made France a militaristic, imperialistic power. It violated the terms of the armistice—an armistice entered into in good faith, by Germany at least, and to which the victorious nations were in honor pledged.

The Treaty of Versailles

The Treaty of Versailles is a treaty of shame. By reason of it, the assurances of the American people to a defeated foe became as a scrap of paper. All Europe was made a tinder box ready to burst into flame as a result of this dishonorable treaty—a treaty which must be revised if peace is again to reign on the earth.

Who were President Wilson's close advisers during the making of this treaty? Thomas W. Lamont of the firm of Morgan & Co. and other affiliated international bankers. Have you forgotten that the bankers had copies of the treaties before the Senate was permitted to see them? The international bankers used every influence at their command to force American ratification of this treaty and thus involved us inextricably in the intrigues and wars of Europe.

The abandonment of our traditional policy did not end in 1919. The present Republican Administration was elected upon a pledge to abandon the foreign policies of the preceding Administration and restore America to the same paths which had previously been pursued.

This pledge has been completely repudiated. The same forces that controlled American foreign policy when Lansing was Secretary of State, the same forces that plunged us into the World War, now dictate the policies of Secretary Hughes.

It is said, "No man can serve two masters," but Secretary Hughes, in his direction of the foreign policy of the United States, can and does serve two masters. He serves both Standard Oil and Morgan & Co. with constant fidelity. From the beginning of the Harding-Coolidge Administration our foreign policy has been shaped in the main in the interests of one or the other of these two affiliated groups.

The first act of Secretary Hughes as a member of the Cabinet was to urge the ratification of the treaty to pay Colombia $25,000,000 because, as Secretary Fall and Senator Lodge coldly stated in their advocacy of the treaty, it would give our oil companies preferential chances in securing concessions in that country.

The present Republican Administration was elected upon a pledge to recall American marines from Haiti and Santo Domingo and to right the wrongs which had been done to other Central and South American countries. Instead of redeeming these pledges, the Department of State, under the dictation of Morgan and other international bankers, has extended financial imperialism into new countries and has done nothing to redress the grievous wrongs of the previous administration. American taxpayers have borne the cost of collecting the debts and protecting the properties of American exploiters in these countries. American marines have been sacrificed and thousands of natives killed. America has been disgraced for the profit of private interests.

The present Republican Administration was elected upon a pledge to avoid entangling alliances. But under that Administration the United States has been involved in a compact with the three great imperialistic nations of the world, England, France, and Japan, which commits the United States to support those nations in the exploitation of Asia. This compact—the Four-Power Treaty—was negotiated under cover of the so-called Disarmament Conference. It is a peril to the American people and a direct threat to world peace. The international bankers, oil companies, and other exploiting interests alone will profit from it.

The Hughes Policy

The foreign policy of our State Department under Secretary Hughes has been guided by private interests. In South America, in the Near East, in Mexico, and in Asia the American Department of State has been an agency of American bankers on the one hand and the Standard Oil Company on the other. The Interior Department is not the only department of the Government that has betrayed the people's interests to enrich the oil syndicates.

As Standard Oil has shaped our foreign policy during the present Administration in matters relating to natural resources, so Morgan & Co. have shaped its policy in questions of international finances.

Thus, in foreign as in domestic affairs, the invisible government has become visible. The financial oligarchy controlled by Morgan and Standard Oil openly dominates our governmental policies in both fields.

It is for this reason that the Progressives declare that their first purpose is to break the power of the private monopoly system over our Government and return it to the people.

When I am elected President of the United States it will, therefore, be my first task to begin to restore this Government of ours to the people. That is the basic step in our program of housecleaning—a program that includes justice to all classes, to the farmer, to the worker, to the independent merchant and manufacturer, to all those unprivileged millions who have been politically voiceless during the last ten years, and who have suffered most from the war and the period since the war.

The Progressive Program

We would end war by ending the causes of war. In ending these causes of foreign war, we will in large measure reestablish our liberties at home.

First: We will end secret diplomacy. Secret diplomacy in effect makes it possible for our State Department to involve us in commitments and obligations, in acts of aggression, and in entanglements which involve the honor of the nation. Under secret diplomacy war becomes an accomplished fact before the nation is aware of even its possibility.

Second: Should war be forced upon us we would end all profit from war. Sacrifices at the front and in the home would be paralleled with equal sacrifice in the banking office, the counting room, and the munitions plant. We would enlist wealth if we enlisted men.

Third: If war is forced upon us, we shall leave no heritage of debt on subsequent generations. We shall pay for war as we go. Our taxes will not be taxes on the hunger of the poor, on necessities and comforts, on recreations and amusements. Our taxes will be levied on war profits, on unpatriotic dividends, on incomes, inheritances, and excess profits. This, too, will discourage war.

Fourth: We will not annex the territory of any other nation. We will not invade the territory of our neighbors. We will not impair their sovereignty by a display of armed force. We will not menace the integrity of Mexico. We will withdraw our marines from Haiti, from Santo Domingo, and from the Central American states. We will not join in the dismemberment of China, or seek to coerce China or any other dependent people to permit us to share with other Powers in their despoliation.

Fifth: We will give self-government to the Philippines, thus fulfilling the solemn promises of our Congress. In place of conquest we will offer help and encouragement to these peoples to establish self-government, to the end that they may enjoy the same liberties that we seek for ourselves at home.

Sixth: We will provide for a referendum on war, except in case of armed invasion—an emergency which I cannot conceive to arise. We will make no more wars by the act of the Executive Department alone; we will make no more wars by dragooning the Senate and the House of Representatives into war. We will make no war until those who are to offer their lives and who are to make the sacrifice vote their approval of war. Such a war would not require the subversion of the Constitution, the trampling under foot of civil liberties, and the denial of the rights of free opinions.

Seventh: We will seek the whole-hearted cooperation of the nations of the world to reduce armaments to a defensive basis.

Eighth: We will end financial imperialism. We will divorce the State Department from imperialistic financial agencies. We will repudiate the doctrine that the American flag shall follow the investor. American youth shall no longer be sent to the tropics, to Mexico, to Santo Domingo, or Haiti. They shall not be used in Europe or in other continents as a collection agency for private debts.

This is a constructive policy—a policy of peace on earth and good will to all mankind—a policy that would mobilize the world for peace, that would free the world from conquests, and release its workers for the production of wealth and for its enjoyment unpoisoned by fear.

La Follette's Cincinnati Speech

Senator La Follette also discussed America's foreign policy in his speech in Cincinnati on October 10. On the subject of financial imperialism he said:

America has become the credit reservoir of the world. We have 40 per cent of the gold of the world. The whole world is knocking at our doors for loans. Since the war eight billion dollars has been invested abroad. It has gone to Europe and to Asia, to Africa and to South and Central America. J. P. Morgan & Co. has become the dictator of the destiny of a great part of Europe. It fixes the terms on which governments may endure. It determines whether ministries shall rise or fall. It dictates the terms of peace and holds the fate of European democracy in its hands.

The financial power of Wall Street showed its hand in Haiti and Santo Domingo when American marines were sent to protect its investments. Should its precarious investments in Europe, Africa, or Asia be imperiled it will demand that American boys be conscripted for their protection.

The doctrine that the flag follows the investor is a bankers' doctrine. It was conceived in the British Foreign Office seventy years ago. It was this wicked doctrine that destroyed the liberties of a great part of the world; it led to the bombardment of Alexandria and the invasion of Egypt; it made Tunis, Algiers, and Morocco subject to France. It seized on the richest provinces of China. It laid its hands on all of Africa. It inspired the Boer war. It lay back of the conflict over the Bagdad Railway and the conquest of the Mediterranean.

Dollar diplomacy, financial imperialism, the doctrine that

By the Author of "Bunk"

Lottery

By W. E. WOODWARD

"PURITANISM is vice dreaming that it is virtue," says W. E. Woodward—and he avoids it as he would the plague. In this compact, swiftly moving novel is the same delicate and light-hearted satire that is in "Bunk"—plus a force only hinted at before. "Lottery" is a fresh and gay and faithful picture of American life and a novel of genuine significance besides.

Wherever Books Are Sold, $2.00

HARPER & BROTHERS

Publishers Since 1817 New York, N. Y.

OXFORD BOOKS

ISRAEL BEFORE CHRIST
By A. W. F. Blunt Net $1.00
"Mr. Blunt has developed his subject with a keen interest in its human and social as well as its historical values."—New York Times.

PROTESTANT MODERNISM IN HOLLAND
By E. C. Vanderlaan $1.75
Intended for those interested in Theology and Philosophy.

CATULLUS
Translated by Sir William Marris $1.70
This beautiful book, of vest-pocket size, carries, charmingly translated, all the quaint conceits of that merry, though sometimes irascible Latin poet, Catullus. They are agreeable and acceptable respite in the hustle and scurry of this day.—New York Evening Post.

INTRODUCTION TO MODERN PHILOSOPHY
By C. E. M. Joad Net $1.00
Reviews for the layman the conclusions of modern thought explaining in non-technical language the attitude of modern schools.

SHAKESPEARE AND SPIRITUAL LIFE
By John Masefield Net 75c
The Romanes Lecture delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, June 5th, 1924.

RELIGION SINCE THE REFORMATION
By Leighton Pullan Net $3.75
"In these fascinating pages Religion since the Reformation passes in review." The Expositor.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
American Branch
35 West 32nd St. New York City

VOTE! VOTE! VOTE!

FOR LA FOLLETTE AND WHEELER

GIVE! GIVE! GIVE!

TO LA FOLLETTE HEADQUARTERS
25 WEST 43rd ST., NEW YORK CITY

SEND! SEND! SEND!

TO 114 EAST 31st ST., NEW YORK CITY, FOR FREE COPY OF THE ARBITRATOR CONTAINING THE PRINCIPLES OF SIX POLITICAL PARTIES.

A Half Hour Well-Spent

A well informed state of mind on the world's affairs is no more than a matter of half an hour's reading.

The source of information must, however, be reliable; news presented must be facts not fiction; editorial opinion must be reasoned judgment not insinuating propaganda.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

presents in compact form all the important news of the world without suppression or distortion of facts.

During more than a hundred years The Manchester Guardian has earned a unique reputation among the world's journals for its frank and unbiased editorial opinion, no less than for the accuracy of its news.

Today, in more than sixty countries, readers find that given a half hour of time each week The Manchester Guardian Weekly keeps their knowledge of the world's affairs in repair and enables them to maintain an intelligent outlook on all vital matters.

.....MAIL COUPON BELOW.....

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England, commencing with the current issue.

Name .....

Address .....

the flag follows the investor, is responsible for the great war itself. For thirty years prior to its outbreak the concession hunters, exploiters, imperialists of England, Germany, Russia, and France, backed by the foreign office, supported by secret diplomacy, were at war all over the unprotected world. It was the irritations and the conflicts, the fears and the hysteria, the propaganda of the munition makers and the press that brought on the great war that left ten million youth in the trenches, that maimed and crippled twenty million more, and brought the civilized world to the very brink of destruction.

The Treaty of Versailles which we were asked to ratify was a treaty of financial imperialists, of exploiters, of bankers, of oil monopolists, who sought through mandates to sanctify and make permanent a redistribution of the spoils of the world and to cement forever the strangle hold of the power of gold on the defenseless peoples of the earth.

America has become the creditor nation of the world. We are standing at the threshold of a parting of the ways. We are menaced by our own imperialism, by that imperialism which destroyed the great nations of the past. It was imperialism that destroyed Greece. It destroyed Rome.

Contributors to This Issue

LUDWIG LEWISOHN, contributing editor of The Nation, is now in Europe investigating conditions in the Jewish communities.

R. A. HASTE is a Montana newspaper man who has served as Senator Wheeler's secretary in Washington.

ELIZABETH KNOWLTON has contributed articles on her travels to various current periodicals.

CARL VAN DOREN, literary editor of the Century and contributing editor of The Nation, has written a book on James Branch Cabell which is shortly to appear.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO is a New York man of letters who frequently reviews volumes of fiction and literary criticism for The Nation.

A. DONALD DOUGLAS is the author of "The Grand Inquisitor," a novel to be published this coming winter.

NATHANIEL PEFFER has lived in China and written for The Nation and other publications on Far Eastern politics.

WINTHROP D. LANE has made extensive investigations of conditions in various mining districts and is the author of a book, "Civil War in West Virginia."

Anatole France

The Unpopular Frenchman by Ernest Boyd
The Host by Pitts Sanborn
The Immortal by John Macy

in next week's issue of

The Nation

The
SUPER-CITY

A CHALLENGE TO YOUR SINCERITY AND COURAGE

READ ABOUT THE WORLD'S MOST BEAUTIFUL
and
EFFICIENT CITY

A CITY WITHOUT POVERTY OR SLUMS

HAS MANY NEW FEATURES such as the
NEW CITY DOMICILE—THE RESIANCE
NEW CENTER OF SERVICES—
THE SERVISORIUM
A NEW AND ADVANCED CITY CENTER
NEW COMMERCIAL FACILITIES, ETC.
$2.00

At bookstores, or direct. R. Kern, The Iowa, Wash., D. C.

THE POLITICAL NOVEL
Its Development in England and in America
By MORRIS EDMUND SPEARE
Net $2.25

A fresh and vital interpretation of English prose fiction of the nineteenth century and after. Dr. Speare deals with the novel as a commentary on Politics both here and in England. Much space is given to Disraeli. Other authors dealt with are Anthony Trollope, George Eliot, George Meredith, Mrs. Humphry Ward, H. G. Wells, Winston Churchill and Upton Sinclair.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
American Branch
35 West 32nd Street, New York City

The Fifth Avenue Restaurant

EXCLUSIVELY A LUNCHEON AND EVENING BANQUET RESORT ON THE GROUND FLOOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING, 200 FIFTH AVENUE TEL. GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907 INCL.

THEODORE KEMM, Proprietor

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1924 No. 3096

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 481

EDITORIALS:

Aftermath 484
A Jolt for the Judges 485
In the Air 485
The Few vs. the Good 486
The Nation's Poetry Prize 486

MASTER ANATOLE. By John Macy 487
THE UNPOPULARITY OF ANATOLE FRANCE. By Ernest Boyd 488
ANATOLE FRANCE—THE HOST. By Pitts Sanborn 489
NOSTALGIA. By David Morton 490
THE CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT DOES ITS BIT. By Max Stern 491
THE LINE-UP IN WASHINGTON STATE. By John Nicholas Beffel .. 492
CRYSTAL-GAZING FOR PARTIES. By William Hard 493
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 494
A COMMUNICATION 494
CORRESPONDENCE 495

BOOKS:

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 497
A Tribute to a Master Mind. By Joseph Jastrow 498
Casanova and Galahad. By Joseph Wood Krutch 499
Eagle Forgotten. By David E. Lilienthal 499
Imaginary Souls. By R. F. Dibble 500
A Savage Kaleidoscope. By Alexander Goldenweiser 500
Books in Brief 501

DRAMA:

Two Comedies. By Joseph Wood Krutch 501

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Fight Against Opium 503
British Labor and Chinese Brigands 503

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Managing Editor Literary Editor

ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager

Contributing Editors

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS

JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

PUBLICATION OF THE INCOME-TAX returns aroused a ridiculous furore. Back in civil-war days income-tax returns were made public, and business survived. It is difficult to understand the bitterness and violence of the outcry. Possibly some men of great wealth have been educated to the point of being a little ashamed of their own wealth; others may dislike the suspicions inevitably associated with their low payments. Blackmail is possible only where there is something to be concealed. Mr. Mellon, who paid an income tax of $1,173,987, will of course meet mocking laughter if he continues to argue that the present rate is too high to be productive. Publicity might, indeed, go further still. It would be a healthy thing to know just how much tax-exempt income the large taxpayers have; something is needed to awaken the country to the gigantic loss of income due to the continued issue of tax-exempt securities, supplying a government-guaranteed escape from taxpaying for those who are satisfied with the low return on such bonds.

ONE PART OF THE OUTCRY is justified: the complaint against the incredibly bungling way in which the publication of the tax-returns was handled. Mr. Coolidge's message approving the tax bill expressly suggested that he would attempt to have the publicity provision repealed before it went into effect, and there was plenty of time to do that. The Treasury, however, without warning, released the figures; then, after the newspapers had set the tables in type, issued a second proclamation declaring that while the tax statements were open to public scrutiny they must not be printed in the newspapers! Some newspapers printed them; some did not. After a night of reflection the Treasury changed its mind again; the question of legality, it declared, was doubtful; newspapers printing the lists must do so at their own risks. Such amateurishness is inexcusable. There may be room for two interpretations of the law but the Treasury should have decided which it would support, and the senators who passed the publicity clause by a vote of 48 to 27, only the Old Guard dissenting, will have cause for indignation if its plain intent is smothered by an official ruling.

WHAT MR. COOLIDGE DID or didn't do in the Boston police strike in 1919 is again under discussion because of objections raised by the Post of that city to statements put out by the Democratic National Committee. The Post, an occasionally Democratic newspaper, came out for Mr. Coolidge this year, but showed more zeal than information in trying to make the police strike redound to his honor and to the discredit of Andrew J. Peters, mayor of Boston at the time of the trouble. The Post was obliged to retract its statement that Mayor Peters spent the night following the walk-out incomunicado at his country home, and has not been able to prove that Mr. Coolidge, the Governor of Massachusetts, told Mr. Peters previous to the strike that he was ready to call out the National Guard if the mayor would ask for it. The only adequate, first-hand story of the strike is contained in the report of the citizens' committee headed by James J. Storrow, of Lee, Higginson and Company. This report, the truth of which has never been disputed by Mr. Coolidge, states that Mr. Peters and other members of the citizens' committee called on the governor on the day before the strike "and expressed their strong conviction as to the necessity of troops to the number of not less than three to four thousand to be present in Boston on the following day at 5.45 p. m., either upon the streets or ready in the armories." To this the governor sent a formal reply the next day which concluded: "I am unable to discover any action that I can take."

ALL THIS is only a minor issue. The important point is that Governor Coolidge did not break the strike nor restore law and order to the city after it. We presented the facts in an article in The Nation of December 10, 1919, and discussed them in considerable detail again in an editorial in the issue of August 15, 1923, directly after Mr. Coolidge became President. Before the police strike actually took place public sentiment in Massachusetts was fairly evenly divided on the issues, and Mr. Coolidge, although unquestionably opposed to the police, did not dare for political reasons to take a public stand. The police walked out on Tuesday, September 9, and that night there was disorder and rioting. The next day Mayor Peters called out that part of the State Guard which was quartered in Boston, the law giving him the authority to do this in the face of riot but not otherwise. "By Thursday morning order had been generally restored in the city," says the report of the citizens' committee. "On Thursday afternoon, September 11, the governor assumed control of the situation, as indicated by his proclamation of that day." In other words, Mr. Coolidge waited until it was all over and then mobilized the entire State Guard. Why? Because in the presence of disorder public opinion had finally swung strongly against the police and Mr. Coolidge saw political advantage in such action. His bombastic phrases about "law and order" were circulated throughout a nation that knew nothing of the basic facts, and thus was built the myth —the falsehood—that made Calvin Coolidge Vice-President and eventually President of the United States.

IT WAS TYPICAL of Calvin Coolidge that he should make his chief address of the campaign before the United States Chamber of Commerce. It represents the kind of business which he sincerely believes holds the destiny of the nation in its hands. His speech, too, was typical of him. It was long-winded and wordy, which, we are coming to learn, is characteristic of "Silent Cal." It did not mention oil, labor, the Ku Klux Klan, campaign contributions, or the scandals in the Cabinet—and on these matters he has earned the right to be called "silent." Mr. Coolidge repeated Mr. Mellon's curious argument that "a larger amount of money can be collected from large incomes at a moderate rate than at a high rate." The figures for 1922—the last available—showed that the present rates were not, as Mr. Mellon had argued, too high; the return, even from the largest incomes, is increasing, and the people are content with that situation. Mr. Coolidge proceeded to argue that high taxes had checked business, and then lauded our present economic situation to the skies—which was hardly consistent. He compared wage scales in Europe and in America, and suggested that the difference was due to our high tariff—forgetting, apparently, that Europe had just been through a war and in addition had high tariffs of her own.

MARTIN W. LITTLETON, attorney for Senator Newberry and for John F. Sinclair, has discovered a plot. The La Follette movement, he says, is a Moscow product. Unlike T. V. O'Connor, who charged at Buffalo that Moscow money sent via Mexico financed La Follette, and at Washington pleaded that he had heard only "rumors" and could not remember from whom he had heard them—unlike Mr. O'Connor, Mr. Littleton is ready to produce a name and a date to prove his story. A man named Schwarzkopf, who once went to Washington with Ludwig Martens, he solemnly asserts, is now "second in command" of La Follette-Wheeler local headquarters in New York City. In the language of Huckleberry Finn, one is tempted to mutter "Gosh!" Mr. Schwarzkopf, who was an assistant district attorney under Theodore Roosevelt, says he was seeking contracts from Martens, and he recalls that Mr. Littleton's client, Harry Sinclair, has been to Moscow seeking oil contracts from the Bolsheviks. If going to Washington with Martens proves him a Communist, Schwarzkopf says, Sinclair's oil concessions must make him "arch-agent of the Moscow Government and chief kleagle of the big Red plot." Meanwhile, George R. Lockwood, the man who helped Daugherty invent the Wheeler indictment, has made up a new one. La Follette, he says, is in the pay of Wall Street —his paper has accepted advertising from the sugar trust and the telephone trust and the radio trust! These Republican orators seem to step on each other's toes. Must we assume that the soviet agent is in the pay of Wall Street? If we must read fairy-tales we would rather stick to Hans Christian Andersen and the Brothers Grimm.

THE EXPECTED IS HAPPENING in China. The Powers, eagerly shepherding the property rights of their subjects, are beginning open intervention. How much "suggesting" and underhand aiding they have already done is disputed. The Japanese insist that the Americans have illegally supplied Wu Pei-fu with arms; the Americans and British charge the Japanese with aid to Chang Tso-lin; and probably both are right. Meanwhile Feng Yu-hsiang, the "Christian general" (what an advertisement for Christian missionary work!), has turned against Wu and quietly seized Peking for Chang. This has already led the Japanese to talk of reinforcements, and the American Government has sent a small expeditionary force to Peking. That is likely to be only the beginning; it gives particular significance to Mr. Bertrand Russell's article in this week's International Relations Section. Doubtless we shall be treated to floods of highly prejudiced and inflammatory news from China. State Department officials, like the few correspondents of the big news agencies, see through the colored eye-glasses of American business interests. We must be on our guard lest these officials play us such a scurvy trick as British Foreign Office officials seem to have played upon Ramsay MacDonald. Apparently they accepted as genuine a forged letter from Zinoviev to British Communists, and persuaded Ramsay MacDonald to protest against it to the Soviet Government—a proceeding which weakens him with both Left and Right in the electoral campaign.

I. W. W.'S CONVICTED EN MASSE in 1918 of violations of war-time laws are gradually dribbling back into civil life—if they are lucky enough not to be aliens. If they are aliens they are handed over to the Secretary of Labor for further investigation as to their desirability. The Secretary of Labor, according to a law passed five years after their conviction, has carte blanche to deport aliens released from prisons, and few questions are asked. Four such men—Herbert Mahler, William Moran, Pietro Negra, and Joseph Oates—are going on November 8 unless the Secretary of Labor sees the unfairness of the procedure leading to deportation and grants them a rehearing. The Federal Council of Churches summarizes the case as follows:

> The case [against deportation] was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the hearing before the Department of Labor inspector there was no showing that the men were undesirable or desirable residents and they were given no opportunity to prove their desirability. The Supreme Court recognized this point and, reversing the lower court, said that there was no showing in the warrants that the men were undesirable. The Court then pointed out two lines of conduct open to the Secretary of Labor. He could either institute new proceedings so that at the hearing the desirability or undesirability of the alien in question might be demonstrated or he might amend the warrants to say that they were convicted for violation of a war-time law as proof of undesirability. The warrants have been thus amended without any new hearing. With such power in the hands of the Secretary of Labor the very least that can be asked and granted is a rehearing.

FOR SEVERAL SUCCESSIVE YEARS we have been able to record a drop in the number of lynchings. Before 1919 the average number was 107 a year; since then, according to figures given out by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the figures have been: 1919—83, 1920—65, 1921—64, 1922—61, 1923—28; 1924 (to date)—9. The sharp decline in the last two years is startling. In these days of the flaming cross and the white shroud, when intolerance and violence appear to dominate public thought and action, it is hard to account for so sudden a growth in restraint and order. What is behind it? Is it the threat of federal action, and the vigorous campaign carried on in behalf of the Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill? Is it the widespread emigration of the Negro from the South and the consequent need of placating those who remain? Is it the effective publicity given each outrage in the Northern press and the Negro papers throughout the country? Probably all these elements have combined to achieve this miracle of improvement, together with the quiet work of a growing number of fine and courageous Southerners, who face the hatred of bigots and Klansmen to help make the South a home of freedom and fair play. Indeed, it is worth noting that the last lynching—in which, as often, the wrong man suffered—occurred in Chicago.

WINTER IN THE COAL FIELDS, especially when the mines are largely closed down for lack of orders, is seldom a time of productive enterprise. Occasional cheap movies, less occasional resorts to the native "white mule"—these and physical hardships and much tiresome idling consume the time of the unemployed or half-employed coal worker. But in Sub-district 5 of the United Mine Workers, in Southern Illinois, a new regime has begun. The workers voted in convention to organize adult education throughout the district under the direction of Tom Tippett, former mine worker, and since August classes have been in progress. The choice of courses is interesting. The workers, few of whom have finished grammar school, decided to spend the first three months on ancient history combined with English and public speaking, and the next three on American history with special reference to the history of the American labor movement. The program for the winter will include classes and public lectures in the mine villages conducted by prominent teachers from outside the district. This is workers' education of a real and stirring sort; in it there is no hint of uplift, no tinge of propaganda. These people want to know more about the world and the causes of their own difficulties, and they are going about it with the intelligence born of a real need.

VALIANT AND UNDISMAYED, the ignorance of S. Stanwood Menken goes marching on. Facts do not daunt him, he is untroubled by the dictates of decency, and his patriotism takes the form of making the United States appear foolish in the eyes of the world. Countess Catherine Karolyi, wife of the first and only president of the short-lived republic of Hungary, who is honoring this country with a visit, is, he says, a Bolshevik and a friend of Bela Kun; Red Catherine, she is called in the dark communist limbo from which she comes. So says the sturdy Mr. Menken in a protest to Immigration Commissioner Curran against the admission of the Countess. What matters it to him that the Count and Countess Karolyi went into exile when the Hungarian Bolsheviks took power, that they are ardent pacifists and publicly during its progress opposed the war against the Allies; that they are democrats and republicans—neither Communists nor Monarchists—and have paid for their faith by the loss of their estates in Hungary and by years of utter poverty on the Continent and in England. Luckily for the world and for Countess Karolyi, the United States is not populated solely by S. Stanwood Menken. She will be welcomed and listened to by hundreds of Americans who, like herself, are interested in democracy and freedom and peace.

IF MRS. GEORGE G. MACCURDY is right, the comic-paper view of primitive man will have to be revised again. Already science has taken the joy out of these charming pictures we used to see in which a little prehistoric boy led a gentle Diplodocus about on the end of a string. The last Diplodocus, science insists, was dead a long time before the first little boy who might have used him as a pet had appeared upon the scene. Now Mrs. MacCurdy, returning with her husband from an excavating party in France, tells us that the Caveman has been sadly misjudged. Instead of doing his wooing with a club and using an ax to obviate the need of a divorce court he was, she assures us, a gentle creature who let his wife do most of the thinking for him and was in addition disposed to honor her as an embodiment of the Creative Principle. To judge by her description, he was rather hen-pecked. If science insists on this, what will become of the convenient term by which the romantic lady novelists describe their masterful heroes? Language being so much more conservative than science, perhaps we shall not be compelled to give it up. At least it will be long before the comics will note of a particularly meek and obedient husband: "He is a regular Caveman."

SOME FIFTEEN YEARS AGO a novel of Laura Jean Libbey's was appearing serially in the New York Evening Journal. Now Robert W. Chambers, Blasco Ibanez, Virginia Terhune Van de Water are the novelists so published. This does not mean that Laura is no longer read—her novels have merely moved on to that great crowd of ten-cent romances sold in certain fixed-price stores. The story in the Evening Journal was about a lovely girl who worked in a mill and was beloved of the mill-owner's handsome son; difficulties beset the path of true love but in the end, when the mill (if memory serves) was destroyed by a flood and the lovely girl had towed to dry land the unconscious form of the handsome and wealthy young man, then all was well. The proud father's objection to the match vanished and they lived happily ever after. Of course the Journal's modern novelists, catering frankly to the tastes of their public, would scorn such a romance. They set their stories in the most exclusive New York society, or in Mexico, or any other place strange to their readers; they introduce modern inventions to make their tale realistic; but they are as careful to allow the heroine to fall into the hero's arms at the proper time and never at any improper time. The result is not so different from Laura Jean Libbey. She, dying with eighty-two novels and forty plays to her credit, would salute them all as brothers, albeit with a new cut to their coats.

Aftermath

WHILE we await the counting of the ballots let us take stock and look ahead. First let us give thanks that the Progressive campaign has been waged, and that it has been carried on upon such a high plane of principle. The most despondent should take heart that our democracy in this emergency was able to furnish two such leaders as Senators La Follette and Wheeler. Their campaigns have been beyond criticism; not even their narrowest antagonist has denied that. The attacks of Republicans and Democrats alike have been aimed at the platform, but not at the manner in which it has been presented. More than that, to the Progressives alone belongs the credit for putting issues and constructive proposals before the public. But for them the campaign would have been the mere comparing of the personalities of Messrs. Davis and Coolidge. We should have had once more an election by disgust, the choice of Democratic fire or Republican frying-pan.

Millions have been compelled to reexamine the bases of their faith, to explain to themselves where they stand and why they hold their beliefs. The fundamental issue has been clarified to multitudes. Thanks to the revelation of the Republican campaign fund, the effort of the privileged to hold by the weight of millions of dollars the positions they have achieved and fortified is so obvious that none can deny or close his eyes to its significance. A long, long step has thus been taken toward the realignment for lack of which America suffers and is a laggard upon the path of progress. More Americans than ever before realize the essential oneness of the ownership of both the old parties, that oneness which Theodore Roosevelt defined when, as an expert witness, he declared that "the crooked control of both the old parties by the beneficiaries of political and business privilege renders it hopeless to expect any far-reaching and fundamental service from either"—a truth as sound today as when it was uttered in 1912. It was this same truth that Woodrow Wilson thus voiced without contradiction: "The Government, which was designed for the people, has got into the hands of bosses and their employers, the special interests. An invisible empire has been set up above the forms of democracy." For all the smoke screens raised by the defenders of the old parties, for all the almost incredible misrepresentations of the Progressive aims to which such party prostitutes as Charles E. Hughes and Charles G. Dawes have stooped, the truth has reached more and more people that this is no new and dangerously radical or visionary crusade, but the renewal of the old fight against the "invisible empire."

It is no short battle in which American liberalism is engaged. It would not be won should Senator La Follette achieve success. It is a long, long row because Americans have not been thinking politically or economically, because few have worked out a philosophy in keeping with the times and corresponding to the country's ever expanding economic and social needs. That a political upheaval must and will come no sound-minded person ought to doubt. Whether it will come upon a country unprepared is the fundamental question—perhaps the gravest one. Just a year ago the leaders of the British Labor Party were hoping they would not be compelled to take office. After years of preparation and study they felt themselves still unprepared for the responsibilities which later they accepted and bore so nobly. If they were unprepared, what of our Progressives? Where are the groups in America that are setting themselves to solid thinking on fundamentals? Where are those who are biting deep into problems upon the solution of which depends the question: Will democracy master the financial and industrial juggernaut, or will its enslavement to the invisible empire be permanent?

This almost utter lack of political inquiry, speculation, and study makes the necessity of permanent organization the immediate duty of the hour for the Progressives. This movement originated not with any one man but out of the aspirations of great bodies of workers. Its essential democracy has been its profoundest asset. But the new party will need greater self-sacrifice, greater wisdom, and tactical skill than the campaign has developed. We do not underrate the wonderful spirit of loyalty, devotion, and readiness to subordinate self or organization which the Progressive campaign has brought out. But even more will be required, both of leaders and rank and file, when the convention of the Conference for Progressive Political Action meets in January, 1925. It will be no easy task then to formulate a short and terse platform upon which the allied groups may unite. It will be still more difficult to assign to each the role it should play. The initiative in this campaign came from the railroad brotherhoods. Will they be willing to relinquish their control for the common cause of an American Progressive or Labor Party? Can the great groups of foreign-born citizens who joined the movement for diverse reasons be permanently woven into it? Can there be agreement on a few fundamental economic issues between men as diverse as the Gompers set of labor leaders, the farm-labor groups in the Northwest, the Socialists, and the liberals?

The answer can be Yes, but only if the patriotism of all concerned is so intense, their recognition of the transparent needs of the hour so complete, that they will set themselves unreservedly to the task of finding fundamentals upon which they can agree. We hope that the beginning of this search after the least common denominator will not be left until January. The campaign has aroused in the breasts of millions the hope and the belief that a new and a clean weapon is to be forged by which they may control their destinies and those of the country. Any disappointment of these hopes would further increase abstention from political life, spread widely a contaminating cynicism, arm the extremists, and drive into deeper despair the hundreds of thousands who are now plunged into economic misery and see no way out.

For the Progressives who have fought this brave and worthy fight the opportunity remains tremendous. They have truly served their country; they have stood above pelf or party; they have quickened the faith of millions. Upon them rests, as Bertrand Russell has pointed out, a tremendous responsibility. Our liberals have not only to win their own country. It is their task by winning it to save the world from the domination of that baleful American financial despotism against which in our domestic strife the Progressives have, whatever the result at the polls, struck another great blow.

A Jolt for the Judges

TEN years after the passage of the Clayton act, and at a time when hope had been virtually abandoned among workers that its provisions could be used to protect them against injunctions, the United States Supreme Court has upheld the statute in a way that will sensibly reduce judicial abuses in the future. It will commonly be possible for anyone accused of violating an injunction issued in a labor dispute by a federal court to obtain a trial by jury instead of being fined or imprisoned for contempt by the arbitrary ruling of a judge.

The provisions of the Clayton act in regard to injunctions seem to be entirely sustained in so far as they go, and this will be a definite advantage to workers conducting strikes henceforward. Unfortunately, the Clayton act does not provide a jury trial for accused persons in all cases of federal labor injunctions, nor for every contingency under any one, and so we shall have to await subsequent tests to know the exact value of the decision to organized labor. In his opinion Justice Sutherland says of the Clayton act:

> It is of narrow scope, dealing with the single class where the act or thing constituting the contempt is also a crime in the ordinary sense. It does not interfere with the power to deal summarily with contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, and is in express terms carefully limited to the cases of contempt specifically defined.
>
> Neither do we think it purports to reach cases of failure or refusal to comply affirmatively with a decree—that is, to do something which a decree commands—which may be enforced by coercive means or remedied by purely compensatory relief. If the reach of the statute had extended to the cases which are excluded, a different and more serious question would arise.

Thus it appears that in order to obtain a jury trial under an injunction one must be accused of having done something which without the court order would be punishable as a crime. Of course an injunction should by right never prohibit any except criminal acts, but it is the shame of the United States that many do. We commented last week, for instance, on the case of Gottlieb and Seiff, in which even peaceful picketing was prohibited. In this the judge went entirely beyond the law, as peaceful picketing is not a crime in New York State. Apparently, therefore, it is still possible for a judge to escape the limitations of the Clayton act, provided his injunction is sufficiently outrageous and extra-legal in its prohibitions! It is precisely in his most despotic acts that he can refuse a jury trial and act under the ancient tyranny of contempt of court.

Still, with all its limitations, we are intensely glad that the injunction provisions of the Clayton act have been upheld just at this moment when the powers of the courts are under public scrutiny as a result of Senator La Follette's proposed limitations. The authority of the courts to overthrow legislation has perhaps worked larger public mischief than their power to punish individuals for contempt, but the latter is even more despotic and in its possibilities perhaps equally threatening to democracy and freedom. A reader has written us lately objecting because in an article in The Nation of September 24, entitled Our Despotic Courts, we said that the bench was now the sole possessor of the ancient "divine rights of kings." We have no apologies to make. We had in mind precisely this power to punish for contempt, which is a direct carry-over from the prerogatives of royalty and absolutism. Punishment for contempt is not only not provided for by the Constitution but it is in plain violation of that document. The Sixth Amendment says: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury." Good, reply the judges, but contempt of court is not a crime. Well then, we return, how about the Thirteenth Amendment which provides: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States"? Either contempt of court is a crime and carries the right to a jury trial, or it is not and to imprison a person for it is a monstrous injustice and a direct assault upon the Constitution.

Doubtless it is true that, except in labor-injunction cases, contempt proceedings have not so far been frequent nor had great public effect. But there is every sign that unless checked they are soon going to become the means of a widespread attack upon freedom of speech, of public assembly, and of action. We believe that in place of the contempt power there should be laws making it a crime to obstruct or disobey a court order. Other than this the courts need no protection or assistance outside of existing law. Talk of preserving "judicial dignity" or upholding the "majesty of the law" is sheer balderdash based on traditions and trumpery that can be genealogically traced without a bar sinister to the "divine rights of kings."

The decision on the Clayton act will, we hope, direct interest toward this question of contempt of court and lead eventually to abolishing the power root and branch.

In the Air

WHEN the Robert brothers started skyward from the Tuileries one hundred and forty years ago, carrying silk-covered oars with which they hoped to row their way through the air, they probably felt sure that a few decades would bring realization of the ancient dream of human flight. Our progress must seem slow to them. Yet we may imagine that at last we have launched upon a sudden boom-period of air flight. Five years ago the world gasped in successive months when the NC-4 made its interrupted flight across the Atlantic in May; when Alcock and Brown in a Vickers-Vimy bomber shot across the ocean and plunged into an Irish bog in June; and when the R-34, modelled on a captured Zeppelin, floated painfully over the sea in July, and then drifted back to England. There followed a series of disappointments. The ZR-2 exploded over the Humber in England in 1921; the Roma burned here in 1922; the Dixmude disappeared in mid-Mediterranean in 1923. The airplane developed; but the dirigible airship seemed hopeless.

Now, following the triumph of the Shenandoah, designed by American naval engineers after a model of the Zeppelin L-49 captured by the French in the middle of the war, comes the magnificent victory of the ZR-3, beating all records—even that of the R-59's 4,000-mile mid-war trip into the heart of Africa—with a non-stop cruise of 5,066 miles completed in 81 hours. Apparently we may expect more progress from German designers working in American shops with American capital behind them.

As a matter of fact, the rest of the world must confess that it is just catching up with the Germans, and that but for post-war hates and hindrances the conquest of the transatlantic air might have come sooner. The Allies refused—until the United States forced permission for the ZR-3—to permit the Germans to continue their Zeppelin experiments. That inventive nation was cut out from the progress of the world. And accordingly the world limped. For the Germans had mastered the problem of the Zeppelin before the war. They had hardly built a dirigible since—but the ZR-3 was the one hundred and eighth Zeppelin built in that country. Count Zeppelin sent up his first huge rigid ship in 1900; after various partial successes he was able to establish regular commercial air traffic in 1911, and in the year before the war ten Zeppelins and a number of the smaller Parseval ships were making regular commercial cruises from Berlin to Hamburg and to Frankfurt. Tickets for Zeppelin trips could be bought at any tourist agency in Europe. Then came the war; the Zeppelins were put to evil uses, and their bad name endured.

Overnight, almost, it has become a commonplace to expect air cruisers carrying passengers overseas for a week-end, linking San Francisco and Honolulu in a single day. Doubtless we shall live to see it—we who have seen the telephone and the automobile and the radio become unnoticed necessities in the daily life of millions. To our children they may seem as matter-of-course as a steamship to us. One indecent thought intrudes itself upon this self-congratulation: our dirigibles were developed by our navy as Germany's were by her war-men. Eagerness for new potentialities of destruction has achieved this miracle. When shall we be ready to spend millions as lightly for peace?

The Few vs. the Good

SCARCELY anybody needs to be told that this is an age of satire. More and more of the best books published each year let fly with irony or with open scorn against whatever thing is considered evil. And what, judging by such books, does this age consider evil? Evidently enough, it is not badness of the classical sort, for the days when Juvenal lashed the cardinal vices—lechery, gluttony, extravagance, and such—seem very remote. Few up-to-date readers are interested in the standard English satirists for any other reason than that they were superb writers; Pope is remembered for his epigrams, not for his rather florid diatribes against vanity and venality, and Swift is commended oftener as a master of narrative prose than as a clergyman who vented his savage indignation against abstract meanness, selfishness, and hypocrisy. Mark Twain, perhaps the last of the classical satirists, filled hundreds of pages with denunciations of human depravity which, now that they are appearing posthumously in the third decade of the twentieth century, have an old-fashioned if a truly terrible sound.

The change seems to have come about in Mark Twain's very lifetime. Two English men of letters contemporary with him announced that the most formidable modern evil was beginning to be not too much badness but too much goodness. This was a paradox, but Samuel Butler and Bernard Shaw have succeeded so well in their endeavor to make it an axiom that among the members of a fairly large class today excessive goodness, or even goodness in a rudimentary form, seems something to be ashamed of. The word "noble" is a term of reproach, and some would almost rather be caught killing their mothers than being kind to them.

Butler was a profoundly sensible man, and so is Shaw. Some of their followers have been less profound and sensible. But all of them have performed a service by demonstrating that there is no such thing as an abstract vice, that, in fact, every one of the traditional vices can somehow be brought under the head of stupidity. Guile and hypocrisy are interesting myths, but an examination of many minds fails to find them actually existing. It is inertia of spirit and heaviness of soul which keep society unhappy. And since stupidity chiefly dwells in the mass of the middle class, the new satire turns upon the average man. Whereas this man once stood by and smiled while the few and the great were attacked—a Roman emperor, a dissipated prince, a son of the idle rich—he now is the target himself; the only circumstance to render the reversal incomplete being that the few who attack him are his superiors intellectually, not socially.

As to the degree of popularity which this sort of satire is likely to attain only time can pronounce. Will the triumph of the intellectuals be as brief as it is brilliant? Not if the average man can be persuaded to despise his own virtues and forget the fascination of others' vices. Perhaps the conclusion is obvious. At any rate it ought to be pointed out that the Empress Messalina, one of Juvenal's most awful heroines, reigns in the season's movie houses, while no billboards announce a new novel by the author of "Main Street."

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Master Anatole

By JOHN MACY

IN the last years of his life Anatole France was the acknowledged master of French letters, the dean of European letters. None could match his venerable achievement except perhaps Thomas Hardy. And even Thomas Hardy has not so completely obliterated the boundaries of states and established himself as an international figure, as a great European. As a slight indication, though no final test of merit, the Nobel prize inevitably was awarded to Anatole France. It is conceivable that it may never be awarded to Hardy, who is now the supreme surviving genius of that passing but never passing generation of men of letters—with Georg Brandes sitting at the other side of the desk. Who else?

Anatole was universal, European, but he was the most French of Frenchmen. He belonged to the breed of Rabelais, Montaigne, Voltaire, Renan, of his contemporary Remy de Gourmont. That kind of intellect could not have been born and nourished anywhere in the world but in France. That combination of grace and profound erudition is Latin and it is peculiarly the gift of the French branch of the race, though other nations can show examples of it. And his rationalism was French, albeit the reasoning faculty is not an endowment exclusively bestowed upon any one people.

The more obvious qualities of this highly organized genius have been many times noted and analyzed: skepticism, irony, pity without sentimentality for the human being, wit, humor, a fantastic imagination governed by serene wisdom, a style lucid and brilliant and easy. Though these qualities are obvious to the most casual reader, it is worth while to reconsider them, both to remind ourselves what they may contain that is not quite obvious and to recall some of the books in which they are embodied.

The skepticism of Anatole France, like all truly critical philosophic doubt, is not mere negation, not mere standing in the middle of the road or facing both ways; it is a positive philosophy. The attitude of doubt is an assertive attitude, and denial is affirmation. "I doubt" is of course not so strong as "I deny"; the relation between them is somewhat like that between "I believe" and "I know."

Anatole France wrote no systematic work of philosophy but put his beliefs and disbeliefs into the mouths of fictitious characters and more directly into some of the essays in the miscellaneous collection, "The Literary Life." An example of his method, of his habit of mind, of the positive declarative mood of skepticism in adroit indirection is that exquisite little story, The Procurator of Judea. Two old Romans, retired officials, are talking about earlier days when they were in active politics in Palestine. One of them is that famous governor who asked the question (which Anatole France asked all his life): "What is truth?" They recall a beautiful dancing girl who stopped dancing to follow a preacher who seemed to take a strong hold on some of the people. Who was he? The veteran Roman governor cannot even remember his name. And so is dismissed the person, god or man, who for two thousand years was the most revered and influential individual who ever lived on earth or in heaven. The story is not blasphemous, not irreverent, for Anatole France was too skilful to play a false note; it is no doubt an historically accurate account of what a Roman aristocrat would have thought, and the element of doubt is innocently transferred from the mind of Anatole France to the mind of the gouty old ex-governor.

But the old governor remembers the dancing girl. And there—not to dwell too long on one little story in a dozen volumes of masterpieces—is a sample of Anatolean irony. It is not the rhetorical device of saying one thing and meaning another. That trick, to be sure, he plays, as when he calls his story of a blameless old scholar "The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard." But in that book and in many of the other novels the irony is not verbal; it is the irony of fact. In "Thaïs" the holy man converts the prostitute but loses his own soul. In "M. Bergeret in Paris" the anti-Dreyfusards ruin their case by being absurd. And notice that Anatole does not parody, does not exaggerate or raise his voice, when he is dealing with his intellectual opponents. There is a deadly quiet in his manner, and only in that sense is his irony "gentle"; there are often sharp claws under the soft manner.

Irony, satire (the words are not synonymous but they overlap) are at their best in "Penguin Island," a devastating portrayal of the French, specifically, but more broadly of mankind. I had the pleasure of introducing it to Mark Twain with the comment that there are only two other books which so soundly spank the human race: "Gulliver's Travels" and "The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg." I never heard whether Mark Twain read the book, for he was then old and ill, but he would have chuckled over it. I will invite controversy by saying that as a humorous representation of what fools we mortals be "Penguin Island" is superior to Gulliver. Swift's Yahoo is terrible, annihilating, the most laughless humor ever written. When Anatole France starts us off in the guise of those solemnly ridiculous birds, he makes you laugh at once by the picture of the male penguins chasing the female penguin who has covered her natural feathers with some kind of garment; and then he keeps you smiling as he comes down through history with a sort of comic symbolism to that terrific ending, his most appalling page, in which the world after all its struggles toward civilization is destroyed and begins all over again upon the same old cycle.

"Penguin Island" is transmogrified history, for Anatole France was a great historian though never technically a professor of it. His finest work, in which the humorist has taken off his motley and put on his scholar's gown, is "The Life of Joan of Arc." Here our skeptic and rationalist shows himself as the true romantic. The story is the more wonderful because it has the accent of reality, the conviction of facts carefully studied and analyzed. The conventional legend of The Maid will not do. We no longer believe in miracles. Yet something amazing did happen in France in the fifteenth century. Let us examine all available evidence, not only the character of the girl but the conditions that surrounded her, the states of mind of the soldiers that followed her and of all other classes in that century. The book has been called anti-clerical; it is not, it is anti-superstitious. Whenever a writer touches even the outskirts of a religious question he is sure to be misunderstood, and that is more or less true of purely secular historical questions. The late Andrew Lang found fault with "The Life of Joan of Arc." I do not remember the objections that he raised. And it does not matter. Anatole's portrait of his great countrywoman and her times is a magnificent work of art and will survive any errors it may contain.

In general all the relations of the sexes are for Anatole a rather pathetic joke; certainly he has no interest in a mere love-story, and I do not remember that he ever wrote one. His feeling for human beings is not passionate but is genuinely sympathetic in a somewhat remote philosophic way. Evidently there was a conflict in him between satire and tenderness—this is a not uncommon conflict; we have familiar manifestations of it in Thackeray and Mark Twain. If Anatole France did not know passionate love (and that is perhaps why his skilful verses are not poetry of the first order) neither did he blaze with hate or with righteous indignation. Though he was in all the fifty years of his literary life unmistakably Anatole France, and in a sense did not develop because he was a master from the beginning, yet in his later years he did become more mellow and one of his ripest and richest books is "The Gods Are Athirst." Another late masterpiece which has afternoon glow is "The Revolt of the Angels."

For fifty years a master, an infallible master of style. He may have been born with it. He certainly cultivated it very carefully with self-conscious criticism, and in a passage on style he speaks of a "beautiful and desirable simplicity," which indeed defines his own merit. His simplicity is not so simple as it seems, but it is elaborately worked out, and the most subtle ideas are expressed through a transparent medium which looks easy to manage—after he has managed it. His thought is often deep but never obscure; his touch is light but never flippant or undignified. Intensely individual and modern, he carried on the ancient classic tradition of France.

The Unpopularity of Anatole France

By ERNEST BOYD

EVER since the Dreyfus case, which dragged Anatole France into the political arena, his socialism had made him abhorrent to all conservative Frenchmen, but at the time of his death he had survived long enough to encounter another sort of unpopularity, which will seem surprising to those who think of him as a consecrated name and an already established classic of modern French literature. He had lived long enough to become the bête noire of all the smart young men who are building up a French literature basely largely upon maudlin Catholicism, eccentric syntax and typography, and a strange combination of homosexualism and sport-mysticism. These aggressive youths, led by a generation masticating the cud of stale controversies dating from the Dreyfus affair and the separation of church and state, constitute today a well-organized opposition to Anatole France and all that he represented. By some mental process, known only to themselves, these young prodigies adored the tub-thumping jingoism of Maurice Barrès; the socialist platitudes of Anatole France excited their contempt. The one was credited with political genius, the other with senile demagoguery. Obviously neither should be judged by political tests, but while there is always an excuse amongst the younger generation for Barrès the chauvinist, there is none for France the socialist.

This triumph of Bergsonian intuition was, of course, in the act of development before the war, an event which came appropriately to test the protestations of mystic patriotism and anti-rationalism which marked the literature of the generation which was to be practically exterminated before peace was declared. But their successors, the writers who were not articulate in 1914, always under the safe tuition of the sheltered survivors of the Dreyfus pogrom, carry on the proud tradition which consists in "conspuing" Anatole France. He, it will be remembered, volunteered for active service, whereas Barrès talked and wrote the war to the bitterest end. They are adept pupils of that school of abuse of which Léon Daudet is the laureate. As witness Philippe Soupault:

> Anatole France's name falls from my pen like a blot. All his books, or at least all those that I forced myself to read, pursued me for some weeks like nightmares. I ceased to write myself. This rose-water skepticism, this cheap perfection of style, represents to me all that is worst in literature. I fled in terror.

An older commentator, the celebrated caricaturist, André Rouveyre, a great friend of Guillaume Apollinaire, wrote shortly before the celebration of France's eightieth birthday:

> The most significant representative of those writers who have paraded the greatest vanity and ostentatiously displayed their own superiority is undoubtedly Anatole France. . . . He is the last and most perfect type of what seems to us most out-of-date. He is the witty trifler, with a set, beatific smile, the elastic man whose curves are soft, the image of instability, both because of his poverty of original ideas and systematically: a rhetorician to the marrow of his bones, whose Nirvana is vague and inexpressive. . . . His great official renown has made him impressive, but is not connected with any genuine, positive, human action, precisely because the talent of an Anatole France is made up entirely of scholastic acquisitions, with nothing original which might contain the profound spiritual fire of this epoch. The time has passed for such feeble, servile copyists.

Both these quotations are typical, including the muddy, redundant style of Rouveyre, which is not altogether preserved in translation. They will suffice as specimens of a certain criticism which, if remotely traceable to the politics of the Dreyfus case, has now evolved into a semblance of something more important than politics. It is not mere royalism, for Rouveyre is no Camelot du Roy, and Charles Maurras, the only intelligent royalist in France, is not only a lifelong admirer of Anatole France, but is actually the writer whose mind is most nearly allied to his, the one person, in fact, who should succeed to his chair in the French Academy. It is an attitude engendered by aesthetic Catholicism and dadaism, using the latter term in its most general sense to describe incoherent writing, disordered thinking, and a total lack of all humor and urbanity—the Fascist spirit in literature, which corresponds in Europe to Ku Klux Kriticism in America.

The chief exponent of the neo-Catholic revolt against Anatole France is that medieval inquisitor of letters, Henri Massis, editor of La Revue Universelle and literary critic. Massis's pursuit of demons is not limited to France, for it extends to André Gide and the Nouvelle Revue Française group, which is remote from Anatole France and includes some of his least sympathetic critics. Gide as a Protestant, of course, is even more hateful to Massis than the pagan Anatole France. Thus he accuses the former of "demoniality," but the latter is an "inhuman humanist," a pitiful victim of the superstition that Greek civilization was beautiful and that Christianity drove the joy of life and beauty out of the hearts of men. Being older and more educated than the irrepressible Monsieur Soupault, Henri Massis makes no effort to be unnecessarily ludicrous by denying Anatole France's supreme qualities as a master of French prose. In fact, when he dismisses him with Voltaire as a wretched man who misused his gifts, one hardly feels it necessary to continue the discussion. It is better, I should say, to be dismissed with Voltaire than to be classed with Claudel. Aesthetic Catholicism has its reasons which reason cannot understand. It is interesting to note that Charles Péguy, one of the few authentic Catholics in the front rank of French literature, had no doubt as to the importance of Anatole France, who gave "Crainquebille" and other contributions to the Cahiers de la Quinzaine, that enduring achievement of Péguy's editorial genius.

The unpopularity of Anatole France, in other words, is neither a political nor a religious question, although both elements enter into it. He did not shock the deep, elemental Catholicism in Péguy nor has the monarchical Maurras ever allowed himself to misunderstand the real significance of the Dreyfusard who created M. Bergeret and Jérôme Coignard. But neither of these writers is an obscurantist, and political and aesthetic obscurantism are the order of the day. Anatole France disturbed the two groups, so they coalesce in defense of all the aborted literature to which his own luminous French is the retort courteous, and of all the faded dogmas to which his clarity and wit meant destruction. His career itself was a negation of the hasty, half-baked, modern method of forcing a way that has not been prepared into literature. It is forgotten, as a rule, that he was nearly forty when he wrote "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard," his first contact with the general reading public and his first success. Even his first book of verse was not published until he was within a year of thirty.

That long apprenticeship, that gradual maturity are often overlooked by critics like Ortega y Gasset, who accuse him of a monotonous perfection that has never advanced beyond its earliest culminating point. If he had only rushed in where nowadays nobody fears to tread, his rawest efforts would not only serve to measure publicly his progress, but would serve to earn him immediate laurels as a genius. By so doing, of course, he would have sacrificed all that ease and balance and dignity, that deft assurance in his ideas and in his craft, which are his enchantment. He would have fumbled and groped, and thus escaped the hatred and mistrust which superior men excite in their inferiors.

Anatole France—the Host

By PITTS SANBORN

IT was by grace of Jean Longuet that I got to see Anatole France. Old friends of the sage of the Villa Saïd had told me that he was approachability itself if fate happened to lead one into his presence, but that otherwise no man on earth was harder to reach.

"The maître is at his town house now," Longuet told me. "If you want to see him, the thing to do is simply to go out to the Villa Saïd and call. No preliminaries of any kind, no attempt at forewarning, above all no letter-writing. I will give you a card of introduction; hand it to the maid who opens the door. I can't guarantee anything, but I believe that if the maître is at home, he will receive you."

I discussed further ways and means with Philip Moeller, who had just come over to Paris from London, and we decided, inasmuch as audacity seemed to be the note, to time our call (Moeller had consented to accompany me) just before the probable luncheon hour of the great man. Thus he would be least likely to escape us.

So, late one dazzling morning at the beginning of August, 1920, we two Americans were jogging out in an old-fashioned, horse-drawn fiacre through the airy spaciousness of the Champs-Elysées and the embowered opulence of the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne toward that intimate, tranquil byway off the Avenue du Bois where Anatole France lived when in Paris. One has only to open "Le Lys Rouge" to find numberless glimpses—by day, by night; in sunshine, in rain—of the very section of Paris we were driving through.

Our fiacre turned off through the lawns and shrubbery of the Avenue du Bois and came to a stop before one of a row of pale little stucco houses, miniature specimens of those hôtels particuliers that are almost a rarity in Paris. Our objective was a long way from the dingy paternal bookshop by the Seine, in the heart of old Paris, where Anatole France had spent his boyhood. But the glistening neatness of the small house nestling in the verdure of the Villa Saïd as in a sacred grove was no less typical of the Parisian Anatole than the bouquiniste's stall on the Quai Malaquais.

A maid responded to our ring—frowzy, but what maid that isn't frowzy ever opened a door in Paris? As if the matter were of no possible moment to her she said she would ask whether M. France was in. Presently she returned and bade us enter. Nothing could have been more characteristic of the master than the two rooms of his house that we were permitted to see. The one we entered from the street was a square hall or overgrown vestibule. Through a large rear window the sun of noon poured in. The room was empty of everything except the sunlight and an antique marble that occupied its center—the heroic torso of, I think, an Aphrodite, whose whiteness was dark against the golden flood that poured around it. Here was Anatole the perfect classicist. By a door on the left we passed to a square salon of impressive size. Here was Gallic Anatole. This room, furnished just enough and richly, was as French as the anteroom was Greek.

Those who are aware of the fact that much of Anatole France's ample fortune he owed to his expert knowledge as an antiquarian and his ability to buy and sell will not be surprised to know that this room was a model of artistic taste. Without belonging rigidly to a period it tended toward the semi-severity of régence. It might almost have been the salon of any wealthy bourgeois of Paris, except that no one of that species would have proceeded with the inevitable fineness in selection and the inevitable sense of space and measure that marked the achievement of the first French prosateur of our time. If it be true that the house expresses the man, no two rooms could have more veraciously expressed the cultural idiosyncrasy of Anatole France, stemming straight back through French centuries to Rome and Athens.

But the figure that soon entered the salon through the door that had admitted us had no part in Rome or in Athens. The narrow, long-nosed visage, as of knotted ivory, and the knotty whiteness of the beard were of a magician from far eastward of the Ionian sea, and to this necromantic head a turban of crimson velvet imparted the final touch of Oriental wizardry. So much for the East. The sustaining pillar of the head could have happened nowhere but in France. The spare body of the ancient sage was attired in pepper-and-salt trousers, whose holding braces passed over the dark blue of a very negligée shirt. He wore a collar and a tie, but of coat or waistcoat there was none. A buttonless dressing-gown of brownish yellow replaced both, and a pair of carpet slippers completed the extraordinary costume.

Of course the stranger who is admitted at all to a Frenchman's house is admitted to the bosom of a family whose members do not go on dress parade in honor of the admittee. As we gazed at the master of the house in the Villa Saïd, somehow the sage got the upper hand of both the wizard and the Frenchman, and what we really seemed to see was a high priest of Israel standing before us in the intimacy of his home!

Immediately France began talking, and in the easiest and most casual way imaginable. Our visit fell just at the time when he was strongly impressed by Moscow. "The future of Europe is dark," he said at the very outset. "The one hope for Europe is the triumph of socialism, and the one hope for socialism is the triumph of Russian Bolshevism. Lloyd George and Millerand are ignorant men. I observe that Lenin and Krassin are very intelligent." And then the skeptic and ironist emerged: "But, after all, the Russian Government is discouragingly like any other government. I observe that it too makes war!"

France was unsparing of what he termed clericalism in America. "The Protestants," he said, "are liberal only when they are weak. When they become strong, they become as Catholics." Liberals in Europe had awaited Woodrow Wilson as the herald of a new world, but he turned out a Protestant pastor admonishing his little flock. France condemned prohibition: "Men have fermented liquors and partaken of them since the world began. Bacchus and Dionysus were names of a great god of antiquity. Greece and Rome did not fall because of drunkenness." He dwelt on the depopulation of Rome through her unceasing wars and pointed the moral for today. "We have been overrun with armies of soldiers," he declared, "and to what end? At one time we were overrun with armies of strikers. Did they accomplish anything? Jaurès did not believe in strikes as a means to justice, and I have long agreed with Jaurès."

One of us put the question, foolish, if you like, but hardly escapable, whether the maître thought world revolution of the bloodless kind possible, or was resigned to a less pacific march toward the light.

"Do you know 'Cinna'?" he asked. "Very well! . . .

C'est un ordre des Dieux qui jamais ne se rompt,
De nous vendre un peu cher les grands biens qu'ils nous font.
L'exil des Tarquins même ensanglanta nos terres,
Et nos premiers consuls nous ont coûté des guerres.

"Beautiful verses, aren't they?" he concluded.

I might add that while this conversation, a few of whose high points I have attempted to throw into relief, was in progress to the intense interest of the visitors the bosom of the family had not been entirely passive. A clatter of dishes that seemed suspiciously deliberate came from the probable direction of the dining room, and once the maidservant who had opened the door to us announced at another door that luncheon was ready. Impatiently the maître sent her away, at the same time waving aside our expressed willingness to depart at once. But as he talked on, despite the rattling china and the importunity of the maid, another and more formidable voice was heard from beyond the doorway. This was the property of that devoted housekeeper who only a few weeks later became the second Mme Anatole France.

"Come in, Mademoiselle; don't be afraid; I'm with friends here; there's no hurry about luncheon," our host spoke with a reassuring cheeriness evidently meant for us. Nevertheless, Mademoiselle did not come in, and as soon as we well could—there was no waning in France's cordiality and talkativeness—we said the good-bye that had become imperative on our part and went out into the sunlit verdure of that Paris which now more than ever seemed the personal domain of Anatole France. Almost his last words to us were the heartiest of invitations to call on him again whenever we wanted to. I could not help saying to him that this call had made the day one never to be forgotten.

"Hush!" he interrupted. "You must not say things like that or really I won't see you the next time you come."

Nostalgia

By DAVID MORTON

I know how autumn will be coming, there:
With haze and sunlight . . . and the long, dark rains,
With smell of wood-smoke blowing in the air,
And dead leaves huddled in the shivered lanes;
There will be starlight when the dusk comes down,
On gray, hushed meadows reaching to a hill
Far from the lighted windows of the town,
Where walked a lover once—who loves them still.

My mind as well might be a plot of ground
Edged with dark trees and gray with ghostly light . . .
Or old roads where a soft and lonely sound
Of rain is wandering in the autumn night—
For this is all my thought on nights like these,
When other rains are stripping other trees.

The California Supreme Court Does Its Bit

By MAX STERN

IN California the four to three decision of the State Supreme Court denying La Follette electors place as independents on the ballot emphasized once more the seriousness of allowing the courts to block the obvious will of the legislature. Here we have the possibility that one California judge, a political appointee of a reactionary governor, may be the deciding instrument in the election this fall and give us four years more of Coolidge and the Grand Old Party.

The ruling was on the question of the right of La Follette independent electors to be placed on the ballot by petition. On September 1 union labor of California had undertaken to obtain the necessary number of signers to the petition. The question as to whether the thirteen electors could be nominated under the direct primary law in a group or whether they must be put on singly caused labor to circulate two petitions: one the group and another to which the signer must append his name thirteen times, or once for each of the thirteen electors. When the workers on Labor Day added 50,000 signers' names to the La Follette independent ticket they actually brought in 700,000 signatures—an unheard-of demonstration of popular will.

At the first opportunity the La Follette electoral group sought to get its giant petition filed with the Secretary of State through the various county clerks. The State direct-primary law had never been invoked for the nomination of an independent presidential candidate's electors and the law, although framed and passed by the progressives in 1909, did not specifically mention presidential electors. It did declare that in all questions of doubt the statute was to be interpreted liberally so that the real will of the electors should not be defeated, and the assumption was that presidential electors, being State officers, were to be nominated like all other State officers—by petition. However, they decided on a test case to remove all chance of subversion of "the will of the electors." A Marin county clerk refused to accept the petition, and mandamus proceedings were brought before the Supreme Court.

The case was filed on the earliest possible date. Three weeks later, on September 22, the Supreme Court made its ruling. It was a thunderbolt to the people of California. Over the protest of three Supreme Court judges the majority of the court ruled that the great La Follette petition had no standing before the law. Presidential electors were not State officers but mere "messengers" and could be nominated only by party convention. The direct primary law providing for nominating State officers by petition did not hold in their case.

A storm of protest arose. Senator Hiram Johnson, who was the first governor under the law, and C. C. Young, the present lieutenant governor, both declared the ruling to be contrary to the spirit of the law and to block the obvious will of the people. The three dissenting justices all took into consideration the widespread sentiment of the people and applied this to the clause placing a mandate on the court to interpret the law in spirit rather than in letter.

"To construe statutes strictly when the statute demands a liberal construction is," said Justice Thomas Lennon, "in cases of this character to defeat not only the will of the Legislature but 'the real will of the electors' as well."

"To unequally obstruct the independent electorate from exercising its will is contrary to the principles and precepts of a republican form of government," said Justice Emmett Sewell.

"The rule of construction provided by the primary act places the duty on the courts to interpret the law so that . . . one group of citizens may not be denied rights enjoyed by other citizens," said Justice William P. Lawlor.

For the benefit of those who hold Supreme Court decisions to be the will of God it may be said that the majority four are all "regular" Republicans, three of whom hold their seats by appointment of Governor F. W. Richardson, the present executive of California, known as friendly to the corporations. Of the three dissenting judges, one, Lennon, is a progressive Johnson Republican and the other two, Lawlor and Sewell, are progressive Democrats.

Chief Justice Myers and Justice Shenk come from Los Angeles, where political matters are indirectly in the hands of the business interests and directly in those of the "Better America Federation," the State's open-shop propaganda organization. Former Chief Justice Curtis Wilbur, Mr. Coolidge's Secretary of the Navy, held up his resignation until after the inauguration of Governor Richardson so that Richardson might appoint Myers to succeed him.

Justice Richards owes his promotion to the supreme bench, as do Myers and Shenk, to recognition by Governor Richardson. Myers, Shenk, and Richards are running with both old party nominations for election this November. Some are unkind enough to wonder whether they held off their ruling on La Follette until the day before closing time for independent candidates to file against them so that their own elections might not be hampered by a revengeful electorate.

Justice Waste is what is popularly known as a "good man." He is a director in the Y. M. C. A. and was at one time thought to be a progressive. He is president of the Commonwealth Club of California, an organization of business men, described recently by the Los Angeles Record as "an organization given to service in the vineyards of the ruthless exploiters."

Up to the time of the decision every indication was that California was headed toward a break in the Republican corral. Conditions were similar to those of 1916, when California turned the trick for Woodrow Wilson. In spite of the big Republican registration, and the fact that the leaders were giving lip-service to Coolidge, the rank and file of the party were for La Follette. Hiram Johnson had not come out for Coolidge and the bulk of his army—union labor—was actively in the field for his colleague, "Fighting Bob." The Hearst straw ballots were showing La Follette well in the lead in northern and central California and running even south of the Tehachipi.

Did the decision come in the nick of time to whip California back into the regular Republican fold? This depends on how well the new propaganda can be put over with the voters. The La Follette movement, denied representation on the ballot in an independent column, has been forced to accept the offer of the Socialist Party to indorse La Follette as the only means of getting their candidate before the people of California. This extremity has been, of course, seized upon by the reactionaries who shout that the La Follette movement is radical. Typical of this propaganda is the utterance of California's governor: "Every bolsheviki, every anarchist, every socialist, will rally to the La Follette banner," he announced.

The defeated thirteen independent electors—one of whom is a millionaire and only one a Socialist—are stumping the State explaining that they are not "reds" and urging the people not to permit the decision to influence their choice for President. They are making the point that if, as the decision says, an elector is merely a "messenger," no one will commit himself to socialism by voting for Socialist "messengers." And while the California reactionaries are denouncing La Follette as a "red," William Z. Foster has been out here denouncing him for being a conservative.

The Line-up in Washington State

By JOHN NICHOLAS BEFFEL

LA FOLLETTE is opposed tooth-and-nail by the Federated Industries of Washington, which is backing Colonel Roland Hartley, wealthy employing lumberman, for governor on the Republican ticket. One confusing factor in the campaign was the appearance of three so-called La Follette parties, all allegedly spurious, in addition to the authorized La Follette group. One of the superfluous parties remains in the field with a State ticket, another collapsed of its own weight, and the third was barred from the official ballot by the State supreme court, after testimony revealed that this party held its "convention" in a hotel lobby at 1:15 a. m. on primary day, with only ten persons present.

The race here is manifestly between Coolidge and La Follette. This is made plain by Hartley's backers. Fear of victory by the Wisconsin Senator is upon the State's big financial and industrial interests. In a confidential letter to the 3,152 members of the Federated Industries John McIntosh, its manager, writes: "In so far as the State's future progress and prosperity is concerned it would be a calamity if the La Follette crowd, with its communistic principles, were to get control of either State or nation."

Three issues stand out in the State campaign—the Bone water-power bill, the compulsory public-school bill, and the Centralia case. The Bone bill would permit municipalities to operate hydro-electric power plants and sell surplus energy outside their corporate limits. Washington is prodigiously rich in water-force; publicly owned plants in Seattle and Tacoma sell power at the lowest rates in the country. Bone's measure is called "vicious and socialistic" by the Federated Industries. Louis Benedetti of Seattle was convicted of conspiracy to defeat the Bone bill by substituting fraudulent signatures for genuine ones on petitions supporting it. Initiative No. 49 would compel every child between seven and sixteen to attend the public schools, under severe penalties. This would eliminate all private and Catholic schools.

The Centralia case involves the liberties of eight I.W.W. members serving twenty-five to forty years in prison for the death of Warren Grimm, Legionaire, killed when the Centralia I. W. W. hall was attacked by an Armistice Day mob. Two newly found eye-witnesses swear that Grimm was shot while breaking in the hall door; six jurors admit that they were terrorized into convicting the defendants. For a year defense speakers have told audiences throughout the State that no man could be elected governor who would not agree to liberate the eight defendants.

But the prospect of any willing action in the Centralia case by the next governor is slim. Hartley, with the strongest machine and with plenty of money, bitterly opposes the I. W. W. Mayor Ben Hill of Walla Walla, Democratic candidate, apparently has little chance of winning. State Senator J. R. Oman, Farmer-Labor candidate, whose party is pledged to free the Centralia defendants, might win except for the fact that he must share the Progressive vote with three other candidates—Emil Herman, Socialist, who has long urged liberation for the Centralians; David Burgess, Socialist-Labor nominee, who is similarly pledged; and William Gilmore, self-invited "progressive," who was compelled by the courts to drop the La Follette label from his ticket.

Hartley is frankly against freeing the Centralia men. "Probably there was a raid on the I. W. W. hall before the shooting," he told me last June. "There ought to have been a raid. I believe in raiding I. W. W. halls if we can't get rid of the Wobblies any other way. They are a menace." Defeated twice at the primaries because of his open-shop activities, Hartley is now patting labor (except the I. W. W.) on the back and approving the eight-hour day. He has sworn that only $1,918.75 was spent with his acquiescence in his 1924 primary campaign. But a Democratic investigation shows that Hartley advertising throughout the State cost at least $25,000 and that $2,125 went for newspaper space in Seattle alone.

The Democrats are backing the Bone bill, and their platform is fairly liberal. But they have a weak machine and a weak press. Their candidate, Hill, is not well known, and old-timers say he comes from the wrong end of the State. For Walla Walla is east of the mountains, a psychological wall in Washington politics.

Edward Clifford, supported by the State Federation of Labor for the Republican gubernatorial nomination, ran a bad third. Letters supporting Clifford, sent out by George Vanderveer, attorney and head of the Seattle Central Labor Council Legal Bureau, drew a terrific backfire from the "conservative" interests. Vanderveer defended the Centralia I. W. W., and it was now widely charged that Clifford had promised Vanderveer that he would free the eight imprisoned industrialists.

W. D. Lane, Bruce Blake, and Justice William Pemberton, running for places on the State Supreme Court, also were supported by Vanderveer and the Labor Federation. These utterances aroused the "conservatives" to fever pitch. Blake and Lane were defeated, and Chief Justice John Main and Justice John Mitchell were renominated. Pemberton ran fourth and must contest with the third man, Judge W. D. Askren, at the November election. Main and Mitchell were both members of the Supreme Court when it upheld the verdict of guilty in the Centralia case, despite proof that John Wilson, trial judge, suppressed a great mass of evidence which would have shown that there was a conspiracy of business men to raid the I. W. W. hall.

Crystal-Gazing for Parties

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

MR. LA FOLLETTE says truly that parties are born, not made. They are born out of the womb of environment; and even thereafter they are not made—hand-made—by the mere will and wish of their owners and operators. Having been conceived and brought to birth by environment, they are nurtured, they are developed, they are matured, by environment. An important part of this environment consists of other parties, which are their rivals.

When our present prospective new party in America, having been born, as it is hoped, out of this campaign, gets its cradle and its nursery and its christening next year, it will find the Republican Party and the Democratic Party existing about it and affecting and conditioning it. The new party will endeavor to be what is called "progressive" and it will endeavor to be a national party, reaching every section of the union. What help, or what hindrance, will it have from the two older parties in the consummation of its ambitions?

It can safely be stated that from the Republican Party it will receive help. The Republican Party, under its present management, is in effect as ardent for a clear cleavage and a perfect split between "progressives" and "conservatives" as any La Folletteite could possibly be. The present Republican management not only wishes the Republican Party to be purified of the whole La Follette element, but it also would like to see it purified in Congress of all those temporizing conservatives who failed to confine themselves to the pure milk of Coolidge's word and of Mellon's food in the matter of the method of taxation reduction. It would also like to purify the Republican Party in Congress of all those demagogic characters who voted for such things as the bonus for ex-soldiers and the pay increase for postal employees.

The people who at present are the top-dogs in the Republican Party are all out for producing a party built on purely business principles. Compared with them, the Mark Hanna Old Guard consisted of demagogues, conscienceless and time-serving and afraid of popular prejudices. The New Guard, much more than the Old Guard, believes that the Republican Party need make no sacrifices to popular prejudices and that if it does what is right from the business standpoint the electorate will follow and approve.

Thus, up to the moment at which these words are written, the White House has issued no statement commending the Senators and Representatives of the Republican Party and asking for their reelection. Such a statement, by precedent, should long ago have been issued. The present Republican Party management, however, is far from being in love with the mass of the present Republican Senators and Representatives. Its immediate interest is to elect Calvin Coolidge. It concentrates on that interest. If it gets a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House of Representatives during the next two years, it will not order any sackcloth or call for any rain of ashes. It will hope, in 1926, to produce a Republican Congress from which many anti-Coolidge conservative Republicans will have been eliminated and in which the Republican majority will be overwhelmingly composed of Coolidgeites correct and convinced and obedient.

This course of policy is by no means unfavorable to the growth of the new progressive party. If the Republican Party under its present management is dissatisfied with even that paragon of conservatism, Representative A. Piatt Andrew of Massachusetts, because he quarreled with Mellon about Treasury statistics, and if it is dissatisfied, as it is, with even the stalwartness of Henry Cabot Lodge, because he voted for the bonus, where will Republicans less conservative and less stalwart go?

At that point certain powerful and quite numerous Democrats will endeavor to prepare an answer. One of the great quiet but determined political efforts of the next four years will be by the Democratic elements which followed William Gibbs McAdoo to wrest all control of the Democratic Party away from the influences which they describe as "Wall Street" and "The Bosses." Their bitterness against the concentrated capitalism of New York and against what they regard (incorrectly, this writer believes) as the anti-progressive and anti-honest politics of Boss George Brennan of Chicago is as intense as any that could be felt by Senator Brookhart or Morris Hillquit.

They back this bitterness with a willingness to toil to vent it. They are determined to toil. They do not intend merely to protest against what they call the reactionary part of the Democratic Party. They intend to try to kill that part of the party. They want to make it into a corpse and tie a ton of lead to it and throw it into the river. Nothing will satisfy them except the utter demise and disappearance of the Tammany element and of the Brennan element from all power and all place in Democratic Party management in the future.

The elements entertaining this view and entertaining this ambition exist widely in the South and widely in the West; and in some degree they exist also in the East. They are not to be despised for bulk or for courage or for energy. They include notable Democratic leaders, and they are angry, and they are all painted up with war-paint and are ready to set forth on the trail, and they have some wampum.

They maintain that "The Bosses" of their party are mere agents of wicked wealth and that wicked wealth either does nothing at all for the Democratic Party or else double-crosses it when it pretends to do something for it and that the correct policy for the rank and file of the Democratic Party is to make an end, once for all, of its whole connection, direct or indirect, with all the wicked predatory privileged interests which do only insincere reverence to the memories of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson.

They may achieve a certain success in forwarding this policy. They rely with some reason upon the existence of a considerable pro-labor sentiment, for instance, now—or still—within the Democratic Party. They note that while the La Follette national organization was able to indorse only three new Republicans now trying to get into the House of Representatives, it was able to indorse sixty-two new Democratic candidates, while at the same time it indorsed only twenty new "independents." They think that they can compete with the new party for the allegiance of "progressive" labor and "progressive" agriculture.

In any case, if the Klan issue subsides, they may readily be in numerically firm control of the next national Democratic Convention. Then we shall have the new party appealing to "progressives"; and we shall have the dominant element in the Democratic Party appealing to "progressives" and trying to expel the "conservatives" from its reservation; and we shall have the dominant element in the Republican Party trying to expel even "middle-of-the-roaders" from its party counsels and appealing strictly to chambers of commerce, with the conviction that the people will follow that leadership.

Such a situation might give us again three parties in 1928, with the "progressives" split and the Coolidgeites trimphant at the polls. Therefore in the prophetic crystal there may perhaps be discerned during the next four years certain conferences of accommodation between "progressive" Democrats and the leaders of the new party.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter does not mind confessing that most of his experience with big-game hunting has been in the library. There he has read with breathless interest and burning indignation the tale of some intrepid hunter who sneaked through the African bush and returned with seven lion skins, twelve pairs of elephant tusks, an alligator's eye tooth, and the left hind foot of a hippopotamus. His sporting blood is easily aroused, but it is aroused always in sympathy for the animal against the hunter. So far there is no immediate danger that the human race will become extinct; therefore, the Drifter is on the side of those species for whom extinction is a very real possibility. The massive elephant, the lumbering rhinoceros, the sinuous lion—he would cheerfully sacrifice an occasional member of the genus homo to provide any one of these with a good dinner. And if that member be an ordinary big-game hunter, with no interest in the animal except the "sport" he derives from pursuing and killing it with weapons immeasurably superior to the animal's own, the dinner would doubtless be all the sweeter.

* * * * * *

THERE are, however, certain hunters of wild animals for whom the Drifter has only respect and envy. These are the ones who, leaving their rifles behind for some kind friend to hold, advance armed only with a camera and return with trophies infinitely more valuable than a hide or a tusk. Nor is this sport one to be sniffed at as too easy. The man with the camera gets closer to the animal than the man with the gun, and has only his two legs and his wits to carry him out of a situation that may easily become critical. Thanks to the activities of the "sportsman," the African elephant, for example, has become so timid that he almost never appears except at night. In the day time he stays safely in the almost impenetrable bush, and the eye of the camera can find him in the open only at dawn and not often then. Even the slight click made by the closing shutter frightens the largest living animal; he plunges about in his excitement; sometimes he runs away; sometimes he runs toward this little creature in front of him that has just made such a queer noise. At this moment, were he in the photographer's place, the Drifter hopes that his dignity would not desert him.

* * * * * *

FROM time to time, as he read that there were only a few herd of giraffe left, or that the rhinoceros was becoming scarcer and scarcer, or that the bounty on lion skins in one section of the African jungle was high enough to bring in hundreds of specimens every year, the Drifter has wished that he had a few miles of territory which he might fence around and allow wild animals to roam in unmolested. And to his great delight, he learns that just that has happened, although through no agency of his. The Belgian Government has set aside 250 square miles of territory near the Uganda district; in this sanctuary not a beast nor a plant will be killed or removed by man, although scientists will be permitted to make observations and to take pictures there. The Drifter has already bought his ticket; as soon as the modern Garden of Eden is announced as officially ready he will take his leave. The rest of his life will be spent with his brother the bison and his cousin the gorilla; from time to time he will climb up and peer into one of the three volcanoes that are included in the sacred territory. Doubtless he will often see a zoologist with a camera or a botanist with a microscope. He will remember having seen such an animal before, but will be sure that it is not indigenous to his present abode and will pass it by warily, not quite comfortable until he sniffs its strange scent no longer.

THE DRIFTER

A Communication

The Dawes Plan—The Knell of Internationalism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The isolationists are right, more right than they themselves know. The sooner we can rid ourselves of economic relations with Western Europe, the better for us. What economic throes Europe may experience inside of a decade may make her chaos of the last five years fade into insignificance. Oddly enough, I make this prediction at a moment when a large international loan to Germany is achieving brilliant success, when almost everyone in every country expects a great future for the Dawes plan, and when a genuine spirit of optimism for the restoration of the world's economy is developing in all lands. But the reason for my prediction is simple enough. It is that the people of the world are inherently incompetent to deal with the large problems of international business organization.

Prior to the war this fact was not manifest, chiefly because no difficult problems in international commercial organization had come to the fore. For many decades there had been no first-class war to disarrange seriously the currents of trade and industry throughout the world. The delicately adjusted system of international exchange of goods prevailing in 1914 had developed more through organic growth than through the will of specific individuals. Little conscious planning took place.

Then the war of 1914 shattered that system. During the last five years the world has yearned to have it back again. But the system showed no signs of reviving by the organic process through which it first evolved. How could it? For the social organism was diseased. The poisonous emotions of nationalism and race hatred were fed by the poisonous nostrums concocted at Versailles, St. Germain, and Trianon.

So the world decided to try to think out its problem rationally. A group of business men, with some trained economists as assessors, was assembled from various countries. Let us try to put ourselves for a moment in their position as they assembled.

They saw most of the people in the Allied countries and the United States convinced that Germany needed only the will to make large reparation payments. They saw certain Germans, like Dr. Schacht, pathetically eager to make the limit of concession to the Allies in order that the existing impasse might end. So the pressure on them to fix fairly large reparation amounts was strong. But they also saw the fundamental economic blindness of the world. They saw that the Allied countries, while continuing to shout, "Pay us!" would never make it possible for the German goods which would constitute the payments to get inside their borders. And more than that—and it is a serious charge to have to make—they undoubtedly saw that the German Government could not hope to raise in taxation anything but trifling sums over and above its expenditures on German domestic economy.

In essence then, their problem was this: "Shall we, for the sake of order in the immediate future, gamble on the ultimate future? That is, shall we, knowing full well that Germany cannot pay, fix on compromise reparation sums in order to get international economic recovery started, hoping against hope that the process of trying to pay will educate the world to the fact that payment by its very nature is impossible? Or shall we confess candidly that we believe Germany cannot pay and announce that we can do nothing until the world seems a little more intelligent?" They chose the first course. Their philosophy was that the world would learn from this huge scale experiment that large international payments cannot be made unless the receiving countries are willing to modify considerably their own industrial systems. To this end they provided that instead of Germany having to furnish the currencies of her treaty creditors as best she could mobilize and deliver them, as heretofore, the Western governments themselves should shoulder this task, through a Transfer Committee responsible for getting the payments across Germany's borders.

If the German Government itself were likely to have a surplus available for reparation purposes, the scheme might succeed. The Allies would have only themselves to blame for their failure to be paid, and in a few years would presumably offer handsomely and generously to cancel the German reparation debt. However, responsible members of the committee were aware that the chances of a German surplus of receipts were negligible in fact, however much could be demonstrated on paper. And yet they brought forth a plan which makes possible the sale, sooner or later, of billions of dollars of new German securities to the credulous citizens of the western world! I have heard this plan referred to as a stock promotion scheme which if it were on a smaller scale and operated by private individuals, would land its originators in the penitentiary. It might be well to have an international blue-sky law against Dawes plans and similar international get-rich-quick schemes.

If we are right—those of us who are convinced that the Transfer Committee will never have any money to transfer—the problem becomes: What will the Allies and the United States do when their widows and orphans find their German bonds worthless? Mayor Hylan, in writing to President Coolidge on the subject, is no such fool as the New York press would make him out. Granted that at the present time Britain, and to a certain extent the United States and France, are tolerant toward Germany, what will they be when the mails are full of letters asking that Germany be forced to make good her bonds? Our own action toward small Latin-American countries that have occasionally defaulted on loans suggests that we shall demand an official receivership. Why not an Allied-American financial occupation of Germany? "We will administer the German finances until we have put them into sound condition. Then we shall withdraw." The old story. The trouble will be, of course, that any interference with Germany's international affairs, beyond the already drastic participation contemplated by the Dawes Plan, will instantly cause political trouble in Germany, followed by economic breakdown and a more bitter disillusionment than even the past five years have witnessed. The reaction on the rest of Europe would be bitter enough too. Unleavened hopelessness would logically be Europe's portion until an entirely new generation should come to manage her affairs.

And so the Dawes Plan contemplates a fearful gamble with Europe's fortunes. In effect, if it is fully carried out, it converts a rather shadowy inter-government obligation into bonds for which private citizens the world over will have paid out their savings. If Mr. Dawes et al. win, they will have contributed greatly to solve the greatest problem of the day. If they lose, they will have their proximate stability at the cost of ultimate disruption. Europe will be plunged into a darkness compared with which the present degree of light over there is dazzling. And being perhaps naturally pessimistic and desirous of protecting my private fortunes, I say, let us cut loose from Europe as soon as it is convenient.

Washington, D. C., October 25 CONSTANT SOUTHWORTH

Correspondence

Science or Superstition?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: After a tremendous response from all over the country to my limited appeals, the anti-fundamentalists of San Francisco met together last week and organized the Science League of America (California Division) to combat the efforts of bigots to eliminate textbooks on evolution from the public schools and generally to oppose the substitution of superstition for science. At present the textbook question is in the hands of a committee of nine college presidents, five of these nine colleges being under denominational or other religious influence. The epidemic of medievalism that has swept several Southern States now menaces California, and must be averted by the effective work of all friends of scientific freedom in and out of the State.

I wish that all who are interested in joining with us actively or in giving us their support and cooperation would write me at Box 573, San Francisco. MAYNARD SHIPLEY

San Francisco, September 1

From a Friend of Gandhi

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: No doubt, Mr. Kunz's letter entitled Against Gandhi will have been answered long ago in your paper, but your readers may care to have the opinion of one who has been with Mahatma Gandhi, both in South Africa and in India, and has not always seen eye to eye with him. While I acknowledge that Mr. Kunz, at the distance of Australia from India, and with very meager newspaper information at his disposal, could draw the picture he has drawn in all good faith, yet to us, who have been with Mr. Gandhi in India all the while, it is strangely out of proportion and perspective. Mr. Kunz does not understand one very simple fact, that if Mahatma Gandhi had not stood absolutely for non-violence, after the crowning horror of Amritsar in 1919 there would have been bloodshed and anarchy of the worst description. Again he has not realized that even at Amritsar itself, in December, 1919, Mahatma Gandhi's influence alone turned the scales at the National Congress and carried a vote for an acceptance of Reform Councils and a readiness to cooperate in working them. It was the whitewashing Punjab Disorders' Commission, and the Prime Minister's treachery to his promise to India about preserving the Turkish homelands intact, that turned Mahatma Gandhi into a non-cooperator and made him call the bureaucracy "satanic."

I was present in the midst of the Moplah area during the late rebellion and it is an absurd thing to make Mahatma Gandhi responsible for that. There have been about twenty rebellions in the last eighty years in that area, if my memory serves me rightly. The ultimate causes are always agrarian trouble and police tyranny. The proximate cause, in the late rebellion, was anger at the treatment of Turkey. If Mahatma Gandhi had been allowed to visit that area, it is probable that there would have been no rebellion at all.

I do personally feel that Mahatma Gandhi unconsciously encouraged violence by burning the foreign clothes at Bombay. It was on his part utterly unconscious; but it had that effect. Yet he made the most noble amends for this; and when violence again broke out at Chauri Chaura, he called off the whole aggressive movement just at the time when nearly everyone of his party was for pressing forward with mass civil disobedience. No political leader, except one like Mahatma Gandhi, would ever have done that. It was the supreme and final test of his sincerity.

Since his release from prison he has done more than anyone to put down violence in any shape or form, in thought and word and deed. He is unquestionably the one supreme personal force in India today which prevents bloodshed. For non-violence is with him, not merely a creed, but life itself.

Santiniketan, India, September 24 C. F. ANDREWS

The Department of Justice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In an editorial appearing in The Nation of October 8, last, the following statement is made: "Within a week the Department of Justice dropped a group of indictments against Remus, 'the King of the Bootleggers,' who recently made a statement in behalf of Harry Daugherty." The implication is, I think, quite obvious. The facts have been widely published and could have been easily ascertained by inquiry here. The "group of indictments" referred to were two, among five, counts of the indictment on which Remus was indicted and convicted in Cincinnati. They were dismissed "not within a week" but on July 17—nearly three months before the date of the editorial in The Nation.

At the trial of the indictment in Cincinnati Remus demurred to the two counts in the indictment, and the demurrer was sustained. It was therefore impossible to try him at that time on these counts. Remus was placed upon trial on the remaining three counts and convicted. Meanwhile, an appeal had been taken from the judge's determination on the first two counts and the determination of the trial court was reversed on appeal.

Also upon the same evidence, Remus and others were again indicted in the District of Indiana and that indictment still stands against him. In the meantime, and before the dismissal of the two counts referred to on July 17, Remus, together with his wife and sixteen others, was again indicted in the Eastern District of Missouri for conspiracy to violate the National Prohibition Act in connection with the Jack Daniels distillery warehouse. This indictment still stands and will be tried as soon as Remus can be placed on trial. There are several indictments pending against the W. P. Squibb Company, which was controlled and organized by Remus.

After securing the indictment in Indiana and in Missouri some of the minor defendants convicted with Remus at the Cincinnati trial would have become entitled to their parole but for the fact that the two counts stood of record against them. In view of this fact, and in view of the fact that the Government had an indictment against Remus upon the same set of facts in Indiana, and a new and much more important indictment against Remus and others in Missouri, it was deemed advisable to dismiss the two counts in Cincinnati so that the minor defendants, who were in a very real sense victims of Remus, might become eligible to parole. Remus will not be eligible to parole so long as the indictments in Indiana and Missouri stand against him.

I am trying to give a decent, honest, and straightforward administration to the Department of Justice. The Nation knows that. If it doesn't, it ought to know it. One of the most serious obstacles which I have to overcome is the false and misleading reports of the activities of the Department of Justice given out by responsible newspapers. It is of the first importance that public confidence in the administration of justice should be restored wherever the facts warrant it. Is it too much to expect that a paper of the character and aspirations of The Nation should make sure of its facts before publishing false and misleading statements calculated to destroy confidence in the administration of the Department of Justice?

Assistant Attorney General Willebrandt, who gave the instructions to dismiss the counts in the Remus case, is no more capable of committing a dishonest or corrupt act than you are.

I sometimes wonder how long the American people can count upon the services of decent citizens in public office when they are the victims of false and misleading statements such as have been repeatedly made with respect to this department and its personnel since I took office.

Washington, October 14 HARLAN F. STONE
Attorney General

[The Nation has never had any question of the decency, honesty, and straightforwardness of Attorney General Stone. It has not the same faith in subordinates who were able to serve under Harry Daugherty. It is glad to print Mr. Stone's letter clearing the record of the department in the Remus case from the disagreeable implications of the newspaper reports on which it based its comment.—Editor THE NATION.]

Anti-La Follette Arguments in California

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your readers may be interested in a little glimpse of how the campaign against La Follette has been carried on by the reactionaries in southern California.

Two weeks ago we had a mass meeting in the high-school auditorium addressed by Mr. Lew Head, a Pasadena newspaper man, and myself. About seventeen hundred people turned out, which was quite a shock to this "millionaire city." Something had to be done about it, so this morning I open my Los Angeles Times and find the headline:

LA FOLLETTE IS HIT BY W. C. T. U.
CHAMPAGNE BOTTLE SOUVENIRS SCORED BY WOMEN

The Times tells that a Coolidge lady at a gathering of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union "related to the convention that certain mothers of high-school boys had complained to the Pasadena High School principal that little champagne bottles, bearing the words, 'champagne,' and 'made in Germany,' were distributed among high-school boys and others at a recent La Follette-Wheeler political meeting in the high-school auditorium. The temperance workers resented distribution of such souvenirs at a political meeting and especially among boys, and on motion of Mrs. Elizabeth Paine adopted a resolution against such souvenirs."

This was the first the La Follette-Wheeler committee had heard about these champagne bottles; neither of the speakers saw any such bottles, neither did any member of the committee or any of the workers who distributed literature at the meeting. My wife was in and out of the hall all through the meeting and afterward, and saw no champagne bottles. Needless to say, no member of the La Follette-Wheeler committee had anything to do with giving out champagne bottles, made in Germany or elsewhere. It is evident that somebody who had an interest in injuring La Follette thought of this brilliant plan to do it; maybe some bottles were secretly passed around by such persons. Mr. Lew Head tells me that as soon as he heard of the story he appeared before the W. C. T. U. convention and stated the facts, and that the convention passed no resolution "against such souvenirs," but that it did pass a resolution appointing a committee to cooperate with the La Follette-Wheeler committee in tracing down the matter. If the facts are ascertained possibly the Los Angeles Times will publish them, but if so it will be the first act of decency committed by the Times during the eight years that I have been living in southern California.

Pasadena, October 18 UPTON SINCLAIR

Free the Air!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Radio Corporation is the radio trust. It has control either directly through ownership or indirectly through its affiliations with the other dominating concerns in the radio-communication field of most of the basic radio patents upon which broadcasting depends. This combine includes the General Electric Company, Westinghouse, Western Electric, and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, as well as other large concerns in the industry. Through its control of the basic patents and more especially through its connections with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, which controls 97 per cent of the telephone lines in this country, it has the power to create one single system of broadcasting stations and services throughout the whole United States under the sole ownership of this private bloc.

If this monopoly were under strict governmental control and authority, it could, through its control of patents and engineering facilities, be of great service to the people But the trouble is that large combines having monopolies and special concessions by law have a habit of getting out of hand and then it is necessary to start "trust busting" to give back the people their inheritance. In fact, the combine has already been under investigation by the Government; and radio broadcasting is only three years old!

Yet I suppose that if the Government had complete control of broadcasting, the followers of Anthony Comstock would see to it that the Government would exercise proper censorship compatible with their ideals and their interpretation of the constitutional provision allowing free speech. Neither the Government nor private interests should have the slightest influence over this means of communication. The air should be really free. But since technical limitations and patent monopolies for the present make that unattainable, the control of the air will have to be fought out between the Government and the radio combine.

New York City, July 18 MORRIS KLOSNER

Contributors to This Issue

JOHN MACY is the author of "The Critical Game" and "The Story of the World's Literature" which has been announced for early publication.

ERNEST BOYD is an essayist and critic and the author of "Ireland's Literary Renaissance."

PITTS SANBORN is musical critic on the New York Evening Mail-Telegram.

MAX STERN is Pacific Coast correspondent for the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

JOHN NICHOLAS BEFFEL has been studying political conditions in the West and Northwest.

JOSEPH JASTROW is professor of psychology at the University of Wisconsin.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL is a lawyer in Chicago.

R. F. DIBBLE has achieved a reputation as a biographical essayist by his book "Strenuous Americans."

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER is lecturer in anthropology and sociology at the New School for Social Research, and is the author of "Early Civilization."

Books

First Glance

LONG before his death Anatole France was the victim in his own country of literary source-hunters who, inspired sometimes by pedantry and sometimes by malice, came out with articles or dissertations tracing his indebtedness to earlier authors. That is to say he was already a classic, and though to be treated so must upon occasion be flattering, it may also humiliate. It is not recorded what he thought of the various books written about him in English during his last years. If he saw them, doubtless he was kind. But none of them was entirely satisfactory. Lewis Piaget Shanks was heavy if comprehensive, and Lewis May, whose "Anatole France, The Man and His Work" (Dodd, Mead: $3) anticipated the death of its subject by the narrowest of margins, has rendered a service which at best is trifling.

Mr. May is the translator of two volumes by the man whom he calls The Master, and his critical study is published uniformly with the standard English edition begun by the house of John Lane. It scarcely deserves the distinction—as perhaps no study which it is possible to write at present would. Mr. May is frankly a worshiper of Anatole France, and for that he will, of course, be pardoned. He is most enlightening, indeed, when he is most abandoned to adoration—as when he relates with awe how one evening in London the great Frenchman threw consternation into the members of the Fabian Society by kissing Bernard Shaw on both blushing cheeks, or when he trembles to tell how The Master once "took my hand in both of his and smiled a smile of such kindly warmth that the glow of it is with me yet." Such tributes to a literary hero show the measure of his contemporary fame. But they do not take us very far into the mind which merited that fame. Neither the biographical nor the critical part of Mr. May's book attains to penetration. The biography is little more than a chain of quotations from Anatole France's four volumes of memoirs; when these do not help a bit of gossip is thrown in, or else whole pages are filled with argument about matters upon which most readers already agree. It was scarcely necessary, for instance, to defend Monsieur France against the authors of the Index. The criticism is weakened by a failure to understand or appreciate the merciless author of "Penguin Island"—that is, the satirist—and by a rather sentimental preference for the beguiling author of "My Friend's Book" and "Pierre Nozière." Mr. May is conceivably right when he predicts that "The Revolt of the Angels" and "The Reine Pédauque" will eventually be forgotten; but his almost exclusive occupation with Anatole France the poet and stylist, the maker of Virgilian music in modern prose, leaves him little space in which to demonstrate that this is so. Especially when he has covered so much valuable paper with summaries of novels that do not submit to summary.

Anatole France, after all, is one of those great writers about whom either nothing or everything must be said. A little critic has literally nothing to say about this man who was perfectly clear; what is there to explain, and what is there to add? His best books were what Plutarch said all good works of art are, old as soon as born yet bound to be fresh as long as there is any audience to look or listen. On the other hand, a great critic has everything to say about this man whose easy thought sped over all the fields which the imagination is accustomed to cross, and whose works, therefore, must tempt one ripest reader to infinite commentary. Doubtless it cannot be expected of Georg Brandes at this late day that he should add two volumes on Anatole France to his others on Goethe and Shakespeare. But his successor at the head of European criticism, whoever that may be, will be commissioned sooner or later—and there is plenty of time—to erect an equivalent monument.

MARK VAN DOREN

BIRMINGHAM PUBLIC LIB

A Tribute to a Master Mind

Chance, Love, and Logic. By the late Charles S. Peirce, the Founder of Pragmatism. Edited with an Introduction by Morris R. Cohen. With a supplementary essay on The Pragmatism of Peirce by John Dewey. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE belated recognition of one of the most brilliant intellects in American thought finds expression in this notable volume. It contains two groups of essays, the first on the logical theme (1877-1878) and the second on the philosophical order of nature, cosmic and human.

> Few nowadays question the great value of these pioneer minds; and it is often claimed that universities are established to facilitate their work and prevent it from being lost. But universities, like other well-managed institutions, can find place only for those who work well in harness. The restless, impatient minds, like the socially or conventionally unacceptable, are thus kept out, no matter how fruitful their originality. Charles S. Peirce was certainly one of these restless pioneer souls with the fatal gift of genuine originality.

This editorial comment reflects upon the imperfect provisions for the intellectual life in America, academic or otherwise—a costly failure to provide stimulation for its master minds. A modest offer from a courageous college president would have sufficed in Peirce's case, with what result is now a vain regret or an idle speculation. For Peirce's was a versatile mind. His longest service was upon the United States Geodetic survey (he became an authority on the pendulum); he was a mathematician as was his distinguished father, an astronomer, a logician, a philosopher versed in the history of science and in philology, a reviewer in many fields, a contributor to encyclopedias. For many years he lived a detached life with few contacts and an uncertain income.

The first group of papers in "Illustration of the Logic of Science" present a model of lucidity, directness, and originality and are to be placed among the classics of scientific exposition —an impression confirmed a half-century after their first publication.

> We come to the full possession of our power of drawing inferences the last of all our faculties, for it is not so much a natural gift as a long and difficult art. The history of its practice would make a grand subject for a book. . . . Every work of science great enough to be remembered for a few generations affords some exemplification of the defective state of the art of reasoning of the time when it was written; and each chief step in science has been a lesson in logic.

The theme oscillates between the technique and temper of the logical procedure—proof, evidence, types of inference—and the psychological processes of response—inclination, belief, doubt, habit, action. The solution called truth is often a compromise between the objective and the subjective demands. Man is presumably by nature a somewhat rational animal; and practical pressure (reenforced it may be by natural selection) pushes him toward logicality; yet he uses any slack in the stress of living to fill his mind "with pleasing and encouraging visions," which measure of optimism may likewise have survival value. So logical method gropes its way through the earlier trends of tenacity and inclination, of believing what seems aesthetially attractive and conformable to reason similarly motivated, to the more aggressive method of authority—itself the expression of the social enforcement of the belief-process (for we live together by common belief-habits even more really than by common customs, and are divided by wars of ideas as disastrously as by conflicts of interests)—but slowly yielding to the scientific method of objective proof. "Liberal civilization is a consequence of scientific rationalism."

Through the cultivation of the trend toward rationality always struggling with the emotional urges (anticipating the contrast of the Freudian reality principles with the pleasure and phantasy principles), the order of the universe is established and the scientific mind finds its occupation and expanding orbit. Chance remains and love lingers, yet logic rules. "The character of things" must be related to "the perceptions of and active powers of living beings." The world must be not only one of uniformities but one of uniformities "interesting and important." Otherwise there would be nothing to ask, nothing to puzzle about, nothing to shape conduct or inject it with significant consequences. "The actual world is almost a chance world to the mind of a polyp. The interest which the uniformities of Nature have for an animal measures his place in the scale of intelligence." It is this story, at times technical, at times dramatic, always original and infused with a human interest, that runs through Peirce's notable series of presentations.

In the later group of essays the philosophical replaces the logical focus in Peirce's thinking; yet the germinal ideas—and they are many and the pragmatic formula but one of the many —are logical in temper and inspiration. Whether "the world makes an exact poem or not" is another question; how far is it ruled by chance or love or logic? The stars are not randomly splashed on the firmament; yet they are set by no precise system either. But philosophies are human products (or guesses) and themselves emerge not so much by systematic evolution as by happy thoughts. "To postulate a proposition is no more than to hope that it is true." On the one side the pattern of thought supplied by the rigid conclusions of mathematics which fit and work, and the temptation of metaphysics —"the ape of mathematics"—to posit its conclusions as of like status; on the other the chance spontaneity and variety of biological evolutionary forces. Which contains the clue to the riddle of existence? Is reason inherent in vitality? "The hind legs of a frog reason when you pinch them." Habit is the law by which ideas acquire the power of exciting reactions. Physical events may even take on the appearance of "degraded or undeveloped forms of psychical events." The mystical interpretation invites; and William James referred to Peirce's later speculations as "flashes of brilliant light relieved against Cimmerian darkness." Peirce remarks that "the atmosphere of Cambridge held many an antiseptic against Concord transcendentalism," yet acknowledges that some "benignant form of the disease" may have been "implanted in my soul, unawares, and that now, after long incubation, it comes to the surface, modified by mathematical conceptions and by training in physical investigation." The trend culminates in the concluding essays on "Man's Glassy Essence" and on "Evolutionary Love." It takes almost a mind of Peircian range and reach to follow and reconcile the positions attained, to bring molecules and protoplasm to common terms, and to see the common forces thus objectified again operative in the social world of human sentiments and human needs historically embodied. Mathematical formulae give way to moralized sentiments, and theories of kinetics to criticisms of the Christian gospels. Churches as well as academies are justified by their works: "I willingly confess to having some tincture of sentimentalism in me, God be thanked!" The moral value is recognized, and the idealist emerges. The menace of greed is foreseen, the menace of the too typical human who "wants his Mammon flavored with a soupçon of God." There is also prophecy, but with the date set too late: "The twentieth century, in its latter half, shall surely see the deluge—tempest burst upon the social order—upon a world as deep in ruin as that greed-philosophy has long plunged it into guilt. No post-thermidorian high jinks then!"

Just how far Peirce brought to more systematic expression the essential principles of his philosophy, and in what directions, will appear when the contemplated publication of his manuscripts takes form. The present volume is sufficient meanwhile to serve as a tablet in the Hall of Fame of American thinkers.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Casanova and Galahad

The Green Hat. By Michael Arlen. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

Young Archimedes. By Aldous Huxley. George H. Doran Company. $2.

THE reviewer knows no book more suave and accomplished than "The Green Hat" in the employment of a subtly beautiful style to describe the doings of the most talented of contemporary wasters and to satirize with matchless impudence both those who follow the conventions and those who hope, by breaking them, to escape the absurdity of life. When the story, bubbling with wit, is finished there seems nothing more to say. One could hardly confront such people with the sorry commonplaces of morality or preach to them solemn homilies upon the conduct of life; one knows that either would be annihilated with unanswerable skepticism. And yet, as the characters themselves demonstrate, the life of wit and pleasure alone ends in despair when the maddest music is no longer mad enough to banish the boredom of an aimless life. Beside this novel Mr. Huxley's new collection is thin and harmless, since "The Green Hat" is almost worthy to be compared to "Antic Hay" while the new volume by the author of the latter book is not. The stories which make it up are amusing and charming, but in them he is not, as both he and Mr. Arlen sometimes are, powerful as well.

At their best both of these writers are clearly distinguished from certain other sophisticates of both England and America whom it would be ungracious to mention. While these last are cultivating their irresponsibility with a desperate earnestness and congratulating themselves upon each immorality which their ingenuity succeeds in inventing, the former seem to be chaotic in spite of themselves and actually to hanker after the permanent values which they have so much difficulty in finding; so that their cynicism seems to flow from some source of disillusion beyond their control. Mr. Arlen, indeed, comes out frankly for the simple virtues as the only possible refuge, and in reading even the most nihilistic of Huxley's writings the reader cannot escape the feeling that the author would willingly trade many a destructive flash of wit for some conviction which sophistication could not shake, some standard of values by which life could be judged and found not wholly without meaning. Thus both these writers are at once more destructively brilliant than their rivals and less content with destructive brilliance.

In so far as it deals with any one thing the story of "The Green Hat" is the story of a loose lady who admired chastity, and her predicament is characteristic of all who find themselves in Mr. Arlen's milieu. His personages, one and all, are incapable of leading any but aimless lives, but since aimlessness does not satisfy them the author can swing into something very like moralizing without ceasing to be ultra-smart:

> The Place Vendôme is a paradox in gray stone. Spacious, noble, monumental, it is cast, even at the stranger's first glance, in an everlasting mould. The Place Vendôme is, without doubt, one of the very few things about which we may say with certainty: "That will last." And yet, monumental and everlasting though it is, what do we find in the Place Vendôme? Do we find therein the practice of the seven liberal arts, the learning of the nine humanities, the study of any one among the august array of sciences, nay, the application of any one among the Ten Commandments? We do not. We find forty-eight motor-cars and one coach-and-six. We find that it is given over only to the frivolities of the trivial of two worlds and to every sort of "high-minded depravity" that may occur to the enfeebled wits of the exquisites. We find, in other words, that the Place Vendôme is the center of that floating population of a few thousand dressing tables, sables, and Cachet Faivre of which, under the lofty title of l'aristocratic internationale, the Chevalier Gilulio di Risotto [a restaurant-keeper] is the ultimate survivor.

Thus the distinction of Mr. Arlen lies in the fact that while he is an immoralist in manner he is nevertheless a moralist in matter.

Perhaps the English, unlike certain continentals, are temperamentally incapable of getting along without morality or of casting off conscience with good grace, and perhaps it is because of this fact that the two writers who have best described the ultra-sophisticates of that country have ended by a longing for the purity which seems to both largely a myth. If one may judge from their work the young of their group have lost their innocence but not their sense of guilt, so that while they have destroyed their faith in all of the illusions by which human nature has maintained its sense of its own importance they are not happy without them. They lack no kind of "emancipation" in conduct, yet they are not content in the world. They cannot achieve or at least cannot be satisfied with that light-hearted grace and that perfect gesture which among other peoples makes triviality seem to justify itself. Unsatisfied with gallantry, they push on to debauchery; and it is not strange that the writers who describe them turn quickly bitter. Schnitzler can tinge his pictures with sentiment, Anatole France with a tolerant acceptance of human limitations and frailties; but their seasoning is gall and the reason is plain. Casanova and Galahad are, in their respective ways, almost equally attractice persons; but a Casanova with a conscience or a Galahad who must indulge himself in an occasional fling is not pleasant to contemplate. One may escape the cankering conviction of sin in either of two ways—but one must not wander from the road he has chosen.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Eagle Forgotten

Altgeld of Illinois. By Waldo R. Browne. B. W. Huebsch. $3.

ALTHOUGH he was a man of great influence during a critical period of American social history, Governor John P. Altgeld is today obscure, if not unknown. In Mr. Browne's book we find, for the first time, not only the life-story of this significant figure, but what is of even greater importance, the first accurate picture of the social and economic stage upon which he played his tragic role.

The dominant note throughout the life of this man is that of deep, unrelieved tragedy. His boyhood and youth were cramped and dismal; his refusal to sell the government of Illinois to the public-utility interests for a "million-dollar bribe" resulted in the loss of his entire personal fortune; his stand for his convictions in the anarchists' pardon and in the Pullman-strike cases brought down upon him a terrific storm of foul vituperation and personal abuse which shattered his already fragile health and made him a hated figure throughout the land. His views on the social problems of his day, while not of particular penetration, were prompted by a genuine love of mankind; yet his reward was always frustration, calumny, and disaster. Perhaps there is no more cruel and disillusioning story in all the annals of American public life.

Two incidents in Altgeld's administration as Governor of Illinois from 1893 to 1897—the pardon of the anarchists and the Pullman strike—brought him before the entire country under dramatic circumstances. Mr. Browne has gone into these matters with admirable thoroughness, so that for the first time we are given the complete story of those acts which caused both the mob and the "respectables" to vilify this man with a ferocity rarely equaled. It will be remembered that of the eight men tried and convicted for implication in the Haymarket anarchist riot of 1886 all but three had been executed by the time Governor Altgeld came into office. He pardoned these three men, not as an act of mercy, but because he was convinced that their trial had been grossly unfair and clearly illegal. Because he thus dared to assert the right of even the lowliest to the benefit of a fair trial the lupine mob was set upon him by a vicious press, and to the day of his death he was generally regarded throughout the country as a bloodthirsty and dangerous person. Because he sought to save a vital principle of democracy he was, ironically enough, pictured as an ardent anarchist!

The storm of abuse which the pardon brought down upon the head of this courageous man was beginning to subside when his encounter with President Cleveland over the Pullman-strike situation again aroused the hounds to baying, and with redoubled fury. President Cleveland had sent federal soldiers to Chicago when the railroad workers under Debs had nearly won their strike; the coming of the troops, together with the famous "omnibus injunction," soon broke the strike. Altgeld protested against the troops upon the ground that the carriers had not made a single request for State military protection, and that he, as Governor, had not asked for federal assistance. Even as recent a historian of this episode as McElroy portrays it as the triumph of virtue and patriotism—Cleveland—over a tiresome and inconsequential, if not actually traitorous, windbag—Altgeld. It is significant that the full facts in this controversy have never before been set forth by any recognized historian.

Mr. Browne makes no attempt to canonize Altgeld, and offers no "interpretation" of his life. His book is a notable contribution to our biographical literature, and should be widely read. It is not too much to hope that it may be the medium whereby the memory of John P. Altgeld may, in the end, become precious to a nation which during his life so despised and mutilated him.

> Sleep softly . . . eagle forgotten . . . under the stone.
> Time has its way with you there, and the clay has its own.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Imaginary Souls

Bare Souls. By Gamaliel Bradford. Harper & Brothers. $3.50.
Imaginary Lives. By Marcel Schwob. Translated by Lorimer Hammond. Boni & Liveright. $2.50.

IT would be difficult to find two books which better illustrate two very popular and almost utterly different tendencies in present-day biographical essay-writing than do Mr. Bradford's and M. Schwob's. The "psychographic method" of Mr. Bradford is of course not at all new, in spite of a great deal of foolish criticism that has been written about it; every generation fondly imagines that it has discovered some new method of intellectual approach to the types of art. Essentially Mr. Bradford's method is as old as Plutarch, if, indeed, it is not older. Exposition and analysis, a careful balancing of individual virtues against individual vices, and a constant effort to discover universal traits in particular foibles—these ancient-modern devices form the essence of his art. And one freely agrees that he is probably the best practitioner in this special branch of writing. He is tolerant, perspicacious, and not infrequently shrewd; his phrases often sing; and he possesses that rare form of self-skeptical humility which turns its own weapons upon itself. In short, he is a terribly adequate writer.

His defects are largely the defects of the type. More and more Mr. Bradford interests himself too exclusively in "souls"—his three most recent titles prove the point. He might well have been one of the monks who instructed Fra Lippo Lippi: "Your business is to paint the souls of men. . . . Paint the soul, never mind the legs and arms!" He can be concrete, and even flesh-loving, on occasion; but he deliberately chooses to be abstract—to philosophize rather futilely on the "insoluble mystery" of existence as illustrated in his clinical subjects. His eight essays, structurally considered, resemble a series of equations: Voltaire = vitality (in this, that, and the other); Walpole = dilettantism (in this, that, and the other); Cowper = hell-dodger (in this, that, and the other); and so on.

If Mr. Bradford is too much the monkish instructor, M. Schwob is Fra Lippo Lippi himself. "Thales might have said 'Know thyself' as well as Socrates, but he would never have scratched his leg in precisely the same manner before drinking the hemlock draught." Art, says M. Schwob, "does not classify, it unclassifies." His book is a magnificent demonstration of his creedless creed—one can actually agree with almost all the effusions printed on the jacket. He does not, Bradford-like, attempt to pigeon-hole individualities in a nicely tabulated and labeled series of generalities; he believes—so far as he believes anything—that the artist should draw "generalities so that they should seem to be individual." Claiming no originality of method, admitting indeed that good old Aubrey is chiefly his master, he, like Strachey, endeavors to shoot "a sudden, revealing searchlight into obscure recesses hitherto undivined." His twenty-two essays are extraordinary examples of terseness, lucidity, and elegant ease. Too wise to be a mere literary dandy, too sober to be always cynical, M. Schwob ranges with perfect facility over the multifarious careers of "priests, criminals, or nobodies." He is equally at home with a Greek god, a Renaissance mystic, an Elizabethan rogue, or a rip-roaring pirate. From Empedocles to Captain Kidd, from Petronius to Pocahontas, he wings his flight with no apparent effort, his eagle eye detecting every essential detail of the particular landscape over which he is hovering. He has that rare wisdom which realizes that a myth is often more true than what we are pleased to call history. "The science of history leaves us uncertain as to individuals," he remarks.

Mr. Bradford invites dangerous comparison by writing about writers who have already been written almost to death; his eight "bare souls" remain as essentially inexplicable and well-clothed as ever, for, after all, he has given us little but the creations of his own mind. M. Schwob has wisely gone fowling after rarer game. He differs from Mr. Bradford chiefly, perhaps, in this: Mr. Bradford points rather laborious morals for his readers, while M. Schwob, assuming an intelligent audience, chastely narrates individual episodes which throw a flood of light on the dark corners of morality. "While he scratched himself with his uncut nails he observed the twofold profit, as he called it, of wearing down these nails to their proper length while relieving his itch at the same time." One trembles to think what the psychographic method might have made of this incident in the life of Crates the Cynic: "Metrocles . . . lacked tranquillity. Troubled continually by a flatulency he could not control, he resolved upon suicide. Learning of his ailment Crates went to him after first eating a quantity of lupine. When Metrocles confessed himself no longer able to support the disgrace of his infirmity, the cynic showed his disciple how all men are submitted by nature to the same evil." One reader, at least, finds more of the consolations of philosophy in that passage than he would expect to find in silver-mounted psychographs of all the saints in glory.

R. F. DIBBLE

A Savage Kaleidoscope

Pearls and Savages. By Captain Frank Hurley. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $7.50.

STUDIES of primitive life with the aid of a hydroplane and a moving-picture apparatus—such is the last word in twentieth-century ethnography. Captain Hurley has achieved a marvel of photographic description. Not that his word-pictures, inspired by many an experience among New Guinea natives, hospitable as well as cannibalistic, are lacking in vivacity or, for that matter, in accuracy. But these are put in the shade by the superlative excellence of his photography, which thrills the imagination with an entirely new force. Examples may be cited at random.

The portrait of Hamoji, chief of the Sambio tribe, bears witness that an eater of man may yet possess a countenance no less dignified or intelligent than that of an eater of cows and chickens. Nor is this fact wholly to be accounted for by the Semitic features of the gentleman, a circumstance to which the captain seems to ascribe undue weight. Such "Semitic" faces are found the world over, from South America to the South Seas and China; their presence need not arouse hazardous speculations about ancient invasions by representatives of the Chosen People. In the modern world experiments in communal living have usually resulted in dismal failure. Not so in primitive days. The Typical Communal Long House which extends like a gigantic caterpillar at the lakeshore of a forest brings material evidence how two tribes, even though distinct in language, may yet live under one roof no less harmoniously than do the host of birds which serve to fill the rest of the picture.

The fact has often been noted that primitive man, while mystical in his philosophy, can apply himself to the concrete tasks of technology with all the matter-of-factness and concentration of a "civilized" expert. No one would suspect magical proclivities behind the interested and businesslike demeanor of the two Babai men, one a teacher, the other a learner of the art of making arrow-heads. Yet magic is merely lurking behind the corner, for the Babai, like other savages, lay aside the craftsman's matter-of-factness as soon as the arrow is finished and call upon magic to explain the mortal effect of the weapon. The coastal folk of New Guinea, like all their Melanesian and Polynesian brethren, are water men. They move about, in and upon the water, with the grace and confidence of aquatic creatures. A beautiful long-range view of their activities is given in the Orokaiva Fishing Fleet, while a close-up at short range of the Goaribari Canoe leaves no doubt as to the athletic prowess of the warrior oarsmen or as to the speed of their slender craft. Many of the natives of New Guinea share with other tribes of Northern Melanesia the institution of the Men's Clubhouse, taboo to women and often devoted to sacred and secret ceremonies. One of these houses, the Great Dubu of the Urama, is seen looming behind rows of warriors. The immoderately tall gable of the entrance suggests the wide gaping mouth of a crocodile ready to destroy any careless uninitiated who may draw too near the sacred precincts.

As between people and people, terror and humor are convertible terms. One wonders whether the risibility of the Urama would be aroused by the humorless hoods of the North American Klansmen as ours is by the sight of their Taboo Goblins, immensely tall masks woven out of palm leaves with grotesque faces on the top which are employed by the old men of the Urama "to keep the village in control and to guard certain fruits and vegetables for use at festival time." To the Urama, at any rate, these goblins are terror-inspiring.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER

Books in Brief

The London Adventure. An Essay in Wandering. By Arthur Machen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

A third volume of extremely diluted autobiography by this over-rated mystic of Wales and London.

Master Richard Quyny. By Edgar I. Fripp. Oxford University Press. $3.35.

A laborious attempt to make William Shakespeare of Stratford real through a portrait of one of his fellow-townsmen. The connection is tenuous and the achievement negligible.

Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic. By Charles Sears Baldwin. The Macmillan Company. $2.10.

Examination by an authority into Greek and Roman theories of composition, with emphasis upon a classical distinction, now too often ignored, between oratory and poetry—perhaps the only rhetorical distinction that ever had a meaning.

A Bibliography of the writings of H. L. Mencken. By Carroll Frey. With a Foreword by H. L. Mencken. Philadelphia: The Centaur Book Shop.

The most revealing survey thus far of the uncanny literary labors undergone by America's most methodical and most inspired journalist. The Foreword gives a hint of the new sort of books which Mr. Mencken expects to write within the next few years.

Why the Weather? By Charles Franklin Brooks, with the collaboration of John Nelson and Others. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Popular meteorology, conveniently and accurately purveyed.

The Depths of the Universe. By George Ellery Hale. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

A reprint of three admirable magazine articles upon sunspots, dark nebulae, and the distances between the stars.

Drama

Two Comedies

TO even the most capable actors and the most intelligent directors we are accustomed to give credit for no more than an "interpretation" of the author's work, thus assuming that they cannot, at best, do more than call to the attention those things which, even though latent, the author must have managed somehow to suggest. We forget that the playwright, unlike the novelist, is directly responsible for only a small part of the sum total of impressions which we receive at any theatrical performance and that for many of them he may not deserve, even indirectly, the credit. It is quite possible for the director, the designer, and the company to take hold of a relatively barren script and surround it with gestures, intonations, and backgrounds sufficiently significant in themselves to transform the work, exactly as a novelist may transmute, by his style, his descriptions, and his asides, an unimportant narrative into a charming piece of belles lettres.

Perhaps it was a desire to prove something of this sort which led the Theater Guild to begin its season with a piece so unimportant in itself as Molnar's "The Guardsman" (Garrick Theater). The piece was never more than a bit of ingenious theatricality and time has made it as outmoded almost as "Divorcons"; but Philip Moeller, Lynn Fontanne, Helen Westley, and Dudley Digges have, working together in marvelous harmony, made it one of the current plays indubitably worth seeing. To them, not to Molnar, belongs the credit. Not one word do I remember of the speeches allotted to Mr. Digges, but I have a very vivid memory of the suave cynicism of his Critic; similarly Miss Fontanne is charming and seductive not because of the text she speaks but because of herself; and Miss Helen Westley is never funnier than when, as in the brandy-sipping scene, she has nothing to say, but can make the most of her opportunity to speak with grimaces as eloquent as her delightfully raucous voice. One can hope perhaps that in the future the Guild will confine itself to more important plays, but if it does we shall never again have so good an opportunity of realizing the creative talent of its members.

Decidedly it is fancy rather than research which is responsible for Mr. Edwin Justus Mayer's highly diverting comedy, "The Firebrand" (Morosco Theater). Its hero does indeed resemble in some respects the Benvenuto Cellini whose name he bears, but the author has not burdened himself with history. The Florence of the sixteenth century is, so he must have argued, sufficiently remote to furnish a local habitation and a name to that fanciful city of ideal gallantry where all love to take, in Lamb's phrase, "a moral holiday," so that they may kill their enemies with impunity and love widely without regret. Moreover, the costumes are picturesque beyond all others; so why not father upon Benvenuto the joyous fancies of a poet's brain? The result is a comedy as amusing as it is naughty.

Though the real Italy would have turned his stomach, Congreve would have appreciated Mr. Mayer's vision of it; and Mrs. Behn would have burned with jealousy to think that not she but another had conceived a scene so comic and so luscious as that in which the Duke and Duchess, each in robe de nuit and each with a candle in hand, are brought to an unwilling tête a tête by the mysterious disappearance of their respective lovers, who, as the audience is delightedly aware, have flown to one another's arms. Even to the presence of a fausse ingénue the piece is thoroughly Restoration; yet, were it not for the fact that the intellectuality of pure wit somehow antisepticizes impropriety, "The Firebrand," though that is supposedly sophisticated, would seem innocent entertainment by comparison with Wycherley and Vanbrugh. So charmingly unreal is it, however, that the present reviewer could no more believe that real blood flowed from any of Benvenuto's victims or that more than a few witty indecencies passed between the persons hidden in the Duke's bed than he could imagine the Pure Ideas of Kant guilty of an indecency. And so, speaking for himself, he can say that he was diverted but not corrupted; though in the interest of truth he must confess that when Benvenuto, on the morrow of his one great romance, turned to his work with the sad exclamation "Night does not burn with that ecstasy but once," there arose from the darkness of the theater a sigh, feminine and middle-aged, which seemed to say: "How true that is!"

The only unfortunate feature of the evening is the acting of Mr. Joseph Schildkraut, who seems somehow to stay outside of his role and to achieve no more than mechanical and humorless swagger. Frank Morgan is, however, excellent as the amiable but degenerate Medici who gets a reputation for leniency because he cannot remember to hang those whom he has decided to execute; and Hortense Alden as the fausse ingénue, always eager and eternally innocent, is as good as she was in a somewhat similar role in "Liliom."

"The Farmer's Wife" (Comedy Theater), a placid but amusing comedy of Devonshire, is somewhat broadly acted by the Coburns. "Cock o' the Roost" (Liberty Theater) is a brightly written comedy in which two young people decide that money is not necessary to happiness and then are saved the necessity of testing their theory by achieving wealth with that celerity common to all young men in the domestic pieces manufactured for Broadway.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
ETHEL BARRYMORE
in Pinero's famous drama,
"The Second Mrs. Tanqueray"
CORT Theatre, W. 48th St. Evenings at 8:20. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30.

RAND SCHOOL
7 East 15th Street

Courses Beginning
Nov. 13, 7:00 P.M. ..... Scott Nearing
"Current Opinion"
Nov. 14, 8:30 P.M. ..... Herman Epstein
"With the Great Composers"
Nov. 15, 11:00 A. M. and 1:30 P. M., Scott Nearing
"Dynamic Sociology" and "Current History"
Nov. 26, 8:30 P.M. ..... Johan Smertenko
"Current Drama"

Debate November 30—Clarence Darrow vs. Scott Nearing
"Is the Human Race Worth Working For?"

Just Published!
THE STENOGRAPHIC AD VERBATIM REPORT of
Is CAPITAL PUNISHMENT a Wise Public Policy?
The DEBATE of the Century!
CLARENCE DARROW versus JUDGE A. J. TALLEY
Attorney of the Leopold-Loeb Case N. Y. Court of General Sessions
Preface by LOUIS MARSHALL
Foreword by LEWIS B. LAWES, Warden of Sing Sing Prison
Held in New York on Oct. 26, 1924, before an audience of 3,500
Illustrated with portraits of the debaters Price $1.00 postpaid
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Avenue Dept. N. New York

"REINCARNATION"
Free Lecture, Sunday, November 2, 8:15 P. M.
UNITED LODGE OF THEOSOPHISTS
No. 1 West 67th Street
(Hotel des Artistes)
No Collections. Public Cordially Invited.

The DEBATE of the Season!
SHOULD LITERATURE BE CENSORED?
JOHN S. SUMNER versus ERNEST BOYD
Sec. N. Y. Soc. for Sup. of Vice Noted Int. Author and Critic
Chairman: CLIFFORD SMYTH, Editor, International Book Review
Temporary Chairman: John Farrar, Editor of The Bookman
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1924, AT 8:30 P. M.
TOWN HALL, 121 West 43rd Street
Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75, 3.30 (war tax inc.)
On sale at Brentano's, Macy and Wanamaker Book Depts. and at the offices of or by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., New York (Tel. Longacre 10434)
N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, should send us their names.

OPEN FORUM
Sunday, Nov. 2, 8 P. M.
"The Ku Klux Klan,"
Prof. John M. Mecklin, Dartmouth College
Sunday, Nov. 9, 8 P. M.
The Rebellious Theatre,
Rachel Crothers, Equity Players
Helen Arthur, Neighborhood Playhouse
Kenneth Macgowan, Provincetown Playhouse
SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, 2 West 64th St., N. Y. C.
The Public is invited

DEBATE on PROHIBITION!
CLARENCE DARROW versus REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
(Against) (For)
Chairman, Hon. Royal S. Copeland
Sunday, December 14, 3 P. M.
Manhattan Opera House, 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.
Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75. Box Seats $3.30.
On sale at the office of or direct by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. (Longacre 10434-4447)
N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate should send us their names.

The Nation's La Follette-Wheeler Campaign Fund has reached $7,112.24. Last-minute gifts are most precious!

International Relations Section

The Fight Against Opium

WE reproduce below a single page of the great petition which will be presented to the opium conference at Geneva this month. This page includes the names of several of India's most noted leaders, among them Mahatma Gandhi, Rabindranath Tagore, R. Chatterjee, editor of the Modern Review of Calcutta, and K. T. Paul, President of the All-India Christian Council. The signature of C. F. Andrews, writer and friend of India, whose opinions of Gandhi are printed elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, appears below that of Gandhi. The Anti-Narcotic Society and the American representatives at the Geneva conference will fight for the abolition of narcotic drugs except in a limited amount for strictly medical use.

Petition of the White Cross, Nº 1846

International Anti-Narcotic Society, Seattle, Washington, U. S. A.

To the International Opium Conference

The undersigned, viewing in the growing addiction to narcotic drugs a deadly menace to individuals and to nations, an insidious, rapidly spreading poisoning of the human race, which can be overcome only by cooperation among all nations, respectfully petition the International Opium Conference assembling in November, 1924, to adopt measures adequate for total extirpation of the plants from which they originate, except as found necessary for medicine and science in the judgment of the best medical opinion of the world.

DIRECTIONS: All persons of voting age may sign. When signatures are secured party in charge please return to White Cross International Anti-Narcotic Society, Seattle, Washington, U. S. A., for transmission to International Opium Conference. Blank forms for petitions and further information sent on request. Additional sheets may be attached to this. Use one side of paper only. WRITE PLAINLY. USE INK WHERE PRACTICABLE.

Name of Organization, Firm or Person	Address	No. of Members in Organization
m k gandhi	Sabarmati
C. F. Andrews	Santiniketan
Ramananda Chatterjee	Santiniketan
Rabindranath Tagore	Santiniketan
Fernand Benoît	do.
H. P. Moore	do.
Balvir Singh	Santiniketan
Kanakarayan T Paul.	President, All-India Christian Council.

British Labor and Chinese Brigands

THE connection between civil war in China and European imperialism and the responsibility of the British Labor Government for the continued disorder and the suppression of the liberal movement of Sun Yat-sen are discussed by Bertrand Russell in the following article which we take from the New Leader (London) for September 19:

British policy in China illustrates some of the difficulties of constitutional as opposed to revolutionary socialism. I make no doubt that not a single member of the present Government has the least idea of what is being done by British officials in China, for China is considered unimportant, since its population is only about the same as that of Europe. It is impossible for any one in England, even the Prime Minister, to know the truth about any event in China until six weeks after it has happened. The telegraphic agencies, and the British diplomatic and consular representatives, transmit such news as they think good for us, not without a certain economy of truth. It is true that the Russians have established their own telegraphic agencies, which give opposite propaganda, but are equally indifferent to fact.

Many war-lords contend for mastery in China; each governs in some province or group of provinces; and seeks to extend the area of his authority. They are merely ambitious men, despised by all decent Chinese, but their rivalries are convenient to the Powers. . . .

There is one exception, and only one, to the rule that the Chinese war-lords are merely ambitious brigands. That exception is Sun Yat-sen, who holds power in Canton. He is a veteran leader of Chinese radicalism, the pioneer of republicanism. He led the revolution of 1911, which overthrew the Emperor, and decreed a parliamentary regime. But he stood aside after the revolution had succeeded, in the hope of preventing civil war. This hope proved vain, not through his fault. Since 1920, he has been in power in the south. Some of the best authorities maintain that his is the only legal government in China. His policy has been enlightened. He has favored the proletariat, done all that was possible to suppress opium and gambling (the twin vices of China, encouraged by foreigners), and endeavored for years to cooperate with the Soviet Government, which has only recently received formal recognition from Peking.

This man has been singled out by the British in Hong Kong for a bitter and unscrupulous enmity, partly by means of propaganda, partly by fomenting rebellion. The temper of the official world in Hong Kong is illustrated by the fact that two years ago a British naval officer stationed there was compelled to retire because his wife was opposed to the continuance of slavery in Hong Kong—and this in spite of the fact that the agitation with which she was connected was successful. Our conflict with Sun Yat-sen began over the Cassel Agreement. This was an arrangement which we had been negotiating with the former government, by which the British would have acquired a virtual monopoly of the railways and mines in the province of Kwangtung (the hinterland of Canton). When Sun Yat-sen acquired power this agreement was awaiting ratification. Very properly he refused to ratify, and from that moment we regarded him as our enemy.

Early in 1922 a great shipping strike broke out in Hong Kong, and received support from Sun Yat-sen. The British authorities resisted until the whole Chinese population of Hong Kong set to work to leave the town in a body; then they were compelled to give way. (Of course the strikers were wholly in the right.) This incident did not increase the love of the British officials for Sun Yat-sen. Recently he has been in conflict with certain of the merchants in Canton, who have received from Hong Kong such support as our officials dared to give. This incident is too recent for the truth to be as yet wholly ascertainable. It is known that a Fascist militia, intended to carry through a rebellion against Sun Yat-sen, has been organized among the merchant class of Canton, and that a Norwegian cargo of arms intended for their use has been seized by Sun Yat-sen's Government. Certain further facts are given in a well-informed article in L'Humanité (September 8). It appears that the leader of the Fascist army in Canton is a manager of the Canton branch of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, which represents British power in the Far East. . . .

Communists mistakenly represent the Canton Government as a proletarian government, engaged in the class war. This view is altogether un-Chinese. Only an infinitesimal minority of the population of China is employed in modern industrial undertakings, and Chinese questions are therefore not such as Communists are in the habit of considering. The outlook of Sun Yat-sen and his Government is more analogous to that of our Liberals of forty years ago. He would like to diminish abject poverty, but does not aim at an economic revolution. His chief crime, in British eyes, is that he wishes to retain what is left of Chinese independence. The Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, which decides what shall be thought about Chinese questions by English people (whether Labor ministers or not), naturally wishes to control as much as possible of the railways and mines of China. Sun Yat-sen has the support of practically all the genuine public-spirited Chinese, and if he were to succeed China might be in a position to resist foreign aggression. . . .

How Books are Sold in Chicago

PUBLISHERS:

As you know, books are sold rather than bought. There is no mad clamor for books; no "book riots" as there have been bread riots. Still, the market is always receptive, and books are not hard to sell —if brought to the attention of buyers through efficient mediums.

That publishers who follow this line of reasoning in Chicago are making a success is reflected in the distribution of book advertising among the Chicago newspapers. Chicago is a vast and ever growing market—and The Chicago Daily News is its outstanding medium for the sale of books, as this table shows.

Book advertising in Chicago papers for the first nine months of 1924:

	Agate Lines	Comparison Agate Lines
The Daily News	80,565	80,565
The Daily Tribune	54,704	54,704
The Post	48,522
The Daily Herald-Examiner	3,021
The American	782
The Journal	44
The Sunday Herald-Examiner	7,192
The Sunday Tribune	5,111
The Daily News leads the next highest score by		25,861

This has been going on for years, and is of significance and value to all publishers of worth while books. Selling more books in Chicago is largely a matter of increasing your advertising appeal in a medium to which the greater part of literate Chicago looks for book information and guidance.

The Chicago Daily News

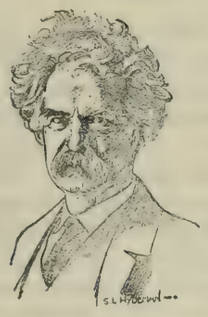
First in Chicago

Note.—If you will "listen in" any Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock to Radio Station W M A Q—The Chicago Daily News' own broadcasting station—you will hear Book Editor Harry Hansen of The Daily News "telling the world" about books.

The Daily News was the first newspaper to broadcast book talks, and the response from the public has been gratifying. The talks further stimulate interest in The Wednesday Book Page.

Important Harper Books

"Probably the most interesting autobiography of the twentieth century."



MARK TWAIN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

"As Mark Twain speaks to us again the glamor that was always his to evoke falls about us like a cloak," writes Cameron Rogers in the World's Work. "His book ranges at its own sweet will, always spontaneous and filled with enthusiasm. It reads like a series of enthralling conversations with the man himself. It is as if his passing were a deception, for he is here, infinitely to be honored once again, and infinitely to be loved." In two volumes, with photogravure frontispieces, boxed.

Bare Souls

By Gamaliel Bradford
Author of "Damaged Souls"

"Mr. Bradford is the creator of a new literary form. It is more like St. Beuve's than like anything in English literature. It is a very great divining gift, that of this master of all psychographers, one that America, in the years to come, must be increasingly proud to cherish." — The Boston Transcript. $3.50

Leviathan

By William Bolitho

"Bolitho is more nearly the ideal writer from Mars than anyone who has appeared in journalism to look upon the world the war left behind it. He achieves contrast, irony, indignation, pity and derision, and he is a highly flavored stylist."— Saturday Review of Literature. $2.00

Distressing Dialogues

By Nancy Boyd
With a Preface by
Edna St. Vincent Millay

This is an outrageous little book, by an author known for higher things. If immoderate laughter hurts you, avoid it! $2.00

Fiction

Lottery

By W. E. Woodward
Author of "Bunk"

"A new novelist for intelligent people to keep up with," said The Nation when "Bunk" appeared. "Lottery" is even better than "Bunk"—a fresh and gay satire upon the career of a hero of modern business, by a man who writes from the inside of the financial and advertising world, and whose pen is dipped in wit, in joyousness and in pity. $2.00

Isles of the Blest

By Wilbur Daniel Steele

Here at last is a novel by this distinguished short-story writer—an extraordinary drama of human loves and hates in a brilliant tropical setting. Out of a strange situation is developed a climax as unexpected as it is deeply true in its understanding of the complexities of the human heart. $2.00

Julie Cane

By Harvey O'Higgins

"Julie and her father stand out, true, living, loved and lovable—two characters about whom there will be much talk. A real story which deeply probes the psychology of real people—a most distinguished novel," exclaims the Boston Transcript. $2.00

Political Parties of Today

By Arthur N. Holcombe

An impartial, authoritative analysis by an expert in government, which gets behind campaign speeches and party platforms. Mr. Holcombe traces the development of the party systems in the United States, and discusses the constitutional, economic and sectional basis of national politics. $3.00

The Causes of Industrial Unrest

By John A. Fitch

An investigator of twenty years' experience has here brought into a single volume all the available data regarding the conflict between labor and capital, illumined by a thorough understanding of labor psychology. $3.00

The Black Golconda

By Isaac F. Marcosson

"Intensely interesting from cover to cover, full of enlightening facts and human incidents," says the Christian Science Monitor of this story of world oil. $4.00

R. F. D. No. 3

By Homer Croy
Author of "West of the Water Tower"

"Very vivid and poignant—strangely saturated with the stuff of which the hearts of men and women are made," says John Clair Minot in the Boston Herald. $2.00

Talk

By Emanie N. Sachs

"The book rings with essential truth throughout. More than this, the telling is masterly," writes Clement Wood in the Literary Review of this wise and witty best-seller. $2.00

HARPER & BROTHERS Publishers Since 1817 NEW YORK, N. Y.

The fighting which is going on in the neighborhood of Shanghai is of little immediate importance. It is part of the struggle between Wu Pei-fu and Chang Tso-lin, which has been going on for years. Chinese battles are seldom bloody, and wars are waged with little effect on the general population. Even the Times, never too friendly to China, remarks that the fighting "leaves time and energy for movements of a very different kind. Commerce and agriculture persist. Nothing seems to stop the growth of the remarkable educational movement in China, which is now being extended to the poorest villages by means of a simplified script" (September 11). In the same issue, however, the Times points out with approval how, under Western influences, war is beginning to become as serious as in Europe. The pet of the British and Americans in China is the so-called "Christian" General, Feng Yu-hsiang, whose army, the Times states, "is out and away the best in China, and his 10,000 troops, who are not afraid to come to close quarters and use the bayonet, would walk through any provincial troops, which in general are disinclined for anything but long-range fighting." This, apparently, is what Christianity is understood to mean in China: military discipline and the bayonet.

There is one very simple question which one would have hoped to see satisfactorily dealt with by the present Government, and that is the question of Wei-hai-wei. By the terms of the lease, we were to hold it as long as the Russians held Port Arthur, which they lost nearly twenty years ago. Nevertheless we are still there. It is admittedly totally useless to us. Nevertheless we are still there. Lord Balfour, at the Washington restored to China at once. Nevertheless we are still there. . . .

It is clear that, in regard to a distant country like China, which is not in the forefront of British politics, we cannot hope to see any policy such as the Labor Party can approve carried out while the Government works through officials who are opposed to all its aims. Ministers are far too busy to go behind the information supplied to them, but those who supply it have such a strong bias that they are certain to color their reports, even when they intend not to do so. I do not think Labor's policy will ever be adequately carried out until a certain number of men who are in sympathy with it are placed in important official posts, both in the Foreign Office and in the diplomatic service.

I do not urge that we should actively support Sun Yat-sen; I urge only that we should be genuinely neutral. It is not desirable to interfere in the internal affairs of foreign countries, even on the right side. At present, in China, we interfere surreptitiously, but always on the wrong side. The bulk of the British in China prefer the most corrupt and reactionary elements among the Chinese, and are never weary of inveighing against those who have had a Western education. The true ground of their objection is that educated Chinese are better able to see through and resist Western intrigue. Unless some special effort is made to check the information derived from British banks, British merchants, and British officials, our Government is bound to continue to serve the interests of capitalism in China, however little Ministers may wish to do so.

The Nation for November 26

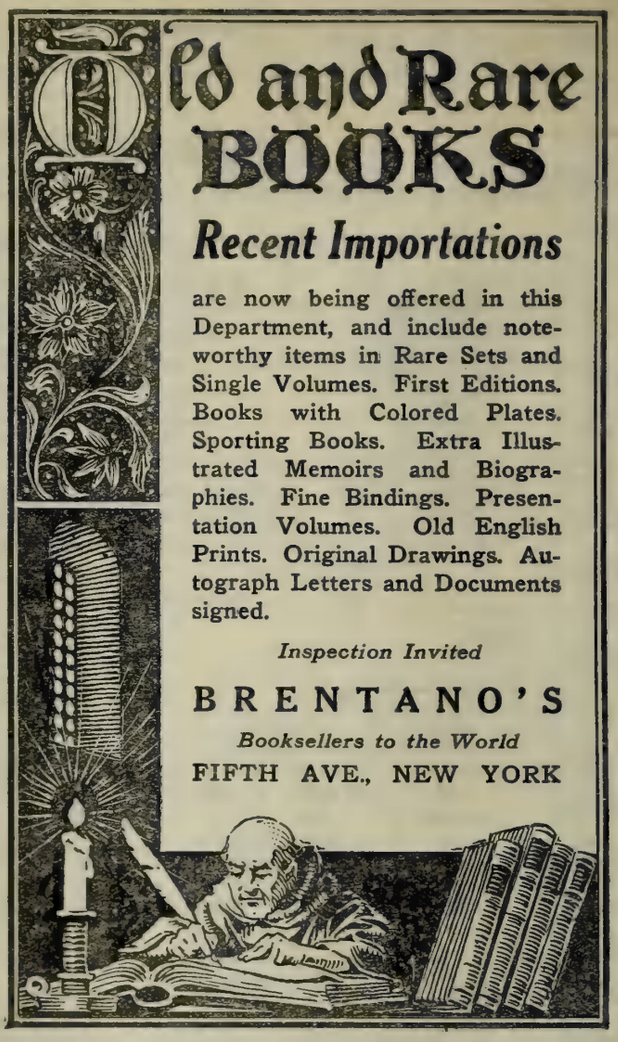
Will Be a Special

Russian Number

LEAVES FROM A RUSSIAN DIARY

The remarkable story of Kerensky's Secretary, who found himself, after the dissolution of the Constitutional Assembly, hunted as a "reactionary," a "counter-revolutionist" and a "dangerous enemy" of the Soviet regime.

By PITIRIM SOROKIN. Price $3.00. E. P. Dutton & Co.



Old and Rare
BOOKS
Recent Importations
are now being offered in this Department, and include noteworthy items in Rare Sets and Single Volumes. First Editions. Books with Colored Plates. Sporting Books. Extra Illustrated Memoirs and Biographies. Fine Bindings. Presentation Volumes. Old English Prints. Original Drawings. Autograph Letters and Documents signed.
Inspection Invited
BRENTANO'S
Booksellers to the World
FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

Help Build
the SUPER-CITY

The WORLD'S MOST BEAUTIFUL
and
EFFICIENT CITY

Read about the
NEW CITY DOMICILE—THE RESIANCE
NEW CENTER OF SERVICES—THE SERVISORIUM
AN ENTIRELY NEW DOWN TOWN SECTION
A NEW ORDER OF INDUSTRIAL, COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL FACILITIES.

$2.00

Order from your bookseller or direct,
R. KERN, The Iowa, 13th and O Sts., Wash., D. C.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1924 No. 3097

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 507
EDITORIALS:
- Business Wins 510
- England's Choice 511
- Breaking Ranks 511
- Anatole France Again 512

PATRIOTISM THAT PAYS. By Will Irwin 513
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
- Men Who Understand Women. By Florence Guy Seabury 516

EUROPE TURNS TOWARD PEACE. By Robert Dell 518
COUNTESS KAROLYL By Emil Lengyel 520
THE POINT OF THE ELECTION. By William Hard 521
THE WISE. By Countee P. Cullen 522
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 522
CORRESPONDENCE 522
BOOKS:
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 524
- A New Genre. By Clifton P. Fadiman 524
- Tartar History. By Emil Lengyel 525
- An Englishman to Excess. By Hartley C. Grattan 525
- A Religious Pollyanna. By Norman Thomas 526
- "H. D." By Irwin Edman 526
- Books in Brief 527
- The Nation's Poetry Prize 527

DRAMA:
- An Accomplished Actress. By Joseph Wood Krutch 527

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Scandinavia Moves to Disarm; France Takes Alarm 529
- A Peace Conference in Berlin 529
- Friendship Week 530

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor MARK VAN DOREN, Literary Editor

ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager

Contributing Editors

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS

JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

"AS YOU WERE" was the command of the voters, not only as to the Presidency but as to the constitution of Congress. The Republicans gain slightly, but the La Follette insurgents still hold the balance in both houses. There were no startling overturns. David Walsh made a splendid fight against former Speaker Gillette for the Senatorship from Massachusetts, and may even overcome a Coolidge lead of 300,000—returns are still incomplete as this issue of The Nation goes to press. Thomas Walsh appears to have carried Montana, despite early pessimistic reports, and Montana is spared the disgrace of depriving the nation of so excellent a public servant. Idaho has done its duty in returning Senator Borah, and Nebraska turned out magnificently to show its affection for Senator Norris. South Dakota, electing former Governor MacMaster, has probably added one to the insurgent group in the upper house. Fortunately Mr. Fall's friend Senator Bursum seems to have lost in New Mexico. Wisconsin again returns a complete set of La Follette congressmen except for one or two Socialists; and New York City reelected Fiorello La Guardia, the lone La Follette supporter from the East in the lower house. In the new Congress are no new figures as picturesque as those who enlivened the last, but there is ground for encouragement; the progressives will still be able to dominate the legislative situation in Washington, and if they use their opportunities effectively the voters will ultimately appreciate it.

JUDGE BEN LINDSEY was defeated in Colorado—and thereby Colorado loses a man who has made his State famous in the annals of the national juvenile-court movement. The Klan turned out against him, and in Colorado the Klan counted. In Kansas William Allen White, who "kicked the Ku Klux joss in the slats" in a colorful campaign, ran behind both the candidates who accepted the Ku Klux label. In Indiana, too, the Klan candidates swept in victoriously. Former Governor Walton was defeated for the senatorship from Oklahoma, although Davis carried the State, but Walton's record as governor had been enough to discourage the bitterest Klan-haters from voting for him. Across the border in Texas "Ma" Ferguson rode into office despite the power of the Klan. In its old strongholds that hate-ridden organization is beginning to weaken, but its influence is spreading northward and westward—and as it spreads its influence may be dissipated. Wyoming probably matched Texas in the choice of a woman for governor; but the feminist can find scant ground for enthusiasm in the election of two women who stepped into their husband's shoes and made their campaigns on the records of their male companions—Governor Ferguson had been impeached and thrown out of office; Governor Ross had died. Mrs. Mary Norton, a wet Democrat elected to Congress in Jersey City, was the only woman elected to high office on her own merits, although several able women were elected to hold seats in the various State legislatures.

WHAT DEMOCRATS WILL POINT TO as their one great victory is the reelection of Alfred E. Smith as Governor of New York. It is, in fact, an impressive and a satisfying victory, but it is in no sense one for the Democratic Party. "Al" Smith won not on his party label but because of his personality and his record during two previous terms in Albany. Indeed, his triumph may almost be called a rebuke for his party, since it was insured in no small degree by his strong anti-Klan stand, a position which the Democratic National Convention did not dare to indorse. Governor Smith announced his candidacy late, and did not make the spectacular campaign that was waged by young "Teddy" Roosevelt, his opponent. The latter showed great strength outside of New York City, but the metropolis stuck by its own authentic product so well as to carry Governor Smith to success. Although his majority was smaller than two years ago, he ran ahead of Davis by more than half a million votes. Unfortunately, the State Legislature will probably be Republican in both branches instead of divided as at present. Thus Governor Smith will have a hard row to hoe. But he is a good hoer, and we wish him luck.

IN THE CAMPAIGN just closed the Republicans expended not only the official fund of some $3,500,000, but uncounted and uncountable sums paid out by various individuals for electioneering activities of their own. Among these latter the largest amount of publicity per dollar spent was probably netted by the trip to Washington of John Drew, Al Jolson, and other footlight favorites. The newspapers, whatever their politics, loaded their columns with stories of the breakfast of griddle cakes and maple syrup with which Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge entertained their guests, and the Sunday photographic sections pictured the event elaborately. It was so touching that busy Broadway stars should be sufficiently devoted to "Cautious Cal" to spend their money in going to Washington and that Al Jolson should have so exerted himself as to make the President "laugh out loud." It was so touching—until it came out that the expenses of the devoted actors had been paid for by Rhinelander Waldo, formerly police commissioner of New York City, as his gift to the Republican campaign. But after all, the trip did its work. Nothing succeeds like publicity; and few who read the first stories, or saw the Sunday pictures, will ever know that the happy event was bought and paid for like other campaign propaganda.

HELENA HILL WEED'S Independent candidacy to succeed the late Senator Brandegee at the special election in Connecticut is important. Her father, Ebenezer J. Hill, represented the southwest corner of Connecticut in Congress for twenty-six years. He was too progressive for the railroad-controlled Republican State machine, which finally cast him aside and picked Brandegee for the Senate in his place. Mrs. Weed, however, has a record of public service all her own. She was one of the suffrage pioneers. She has been an active worker in the cause of international peace and through long experience has acquired familiarity with legislative work in the national capital. She is now president of the Norwalk branch of the Connecticut League of Women Voters. This year she resigned her position as a member of the Republican State Central Committee to become an active worker for the La Follette-Wheeler Independent ticket, heading its list of Connecticut electors. A straight colonial ancestry running back eleven generations has rooted Mrs. Weed in the finest American principles. It is consistent with her family traditions that while her only son is a lieutenant in the United States Navy she has been outspoken in her opposition to American imperialism. She made a notable presentation of the case of Haiti at the Williamstown Institute of Politics in 1922. A weakness of the present Progressive movement to date has been its failure to give adequate recognition to women. Mrs. Weed's candidacy offers a splendid opportunity to retrieve the situation and to add to the Progressive bloc in the United States Senate a well-equipped and conscientious public servant.

SCORE ONE FOR THE LEAGUE! It has provided the machinery for a peaceful settlement of the dispute between Great Britain and Turkey regarding the Turco-Irak frontier in the Mosul region. That poor frontier has been kicked all over the map. During the war the Allies, in one of those conferences at which they attempted to avoid post-war conflicts by dividing the swag before they got it, allotted Mosul to France. The British knew the Mosul region to be rich in oil; Clemenceau apparently did not, so Lloyd George was able to arrange a shift in the frontier by which Mosul came under British sway—still hypothetically. British troops did not occupy Mosul until long after the armistice, when a British fleet was safely anchored off Constantinople. Of course, the Treaty of Sèvres gave Mosul to England, but the Turks never ratified that document. The Treaty of Lausanne, signed after the Turks had driven the Greeks out of Asia Minor, left the Mosul question, still too hot to handle, for future settlement, merely prescribing that England and Turkey would observe the status quo.

LORD CURZON USED TO INSIST that England must remain at Mosul to protect the inhabitants against the Turks, but when the Turks suggested a plebiscite the British hastily intimated that the inhabitants were beneath the voting level. However, the English encouraged certain Christian tribes to settle across the Turkish frontier, where they had never dwelt before, and undertook to protect them. The Turks protested, and enforced their protest with an army which paid little respect to the agreement made in far-off Switzerland. Local British and Turkish captains were on the point of starting a war when their home offices checked them and agreed to refer the question to the League. A League committee headed by Mr. Branting, Sweden's able Socialist premier, has drawn a temporary compromise line which both sides have agreed to observe; and a commission is to study the question and draw a permanent frontier. Our bet is that any League body will make peace by leaving the oil to Great Britain.

THE RECOGNITION OF RUSSIA by France did not save the British Labor Government from defeat, but it will have a useful effect. It will certainly make it difficult for a Conservative Ministry to take any backward steps in that respect; France cannot be left to play with Russia alone. There are, for instance, important iron mines in the Ukraine; there are timber and flax, and there will be grain to export. Ramsay MacDonald made excellent terms for England in his trade treaty with Russia, and no government once in office, no matter what its preelection protest may have been, will dare repudiate them, especially with France in the process of negotiating its own terms of economic friendship. All of which is well understood by European statesmanship, given to acting on realities rather than on indignations and abstract theories. The United States, rooted in Mr. Hughes's idea of what should constitute a Russian Government, stands alone. Even the commercial appeal fails to touch or corrupt that large, empty vision. Not what Russia is, not what the Russian people want, not what Europe recognizes as the stable and existing fact, not these, but something lurking in the head of the Secretary of State holds America in its position of foolish isolation. Can we endure four more years of this?

NOBODY ABLE TO UNDERSTAND the English language can read the statement of Attorney-General Stone in regard to income-tax returns without deciding that publicity is unqualifiedly mandatory in so far as concerns the amount paid by any person. This is all that the newspapers have been publishing or demanding, and the Attorney-General's proposed suit can serve no purpose except to suggest to the public that there has been some excuse for the withholding of such information by certain collectors of customs when, in fact, such action has been a plain attempt to defeat the law by officials who happened to disapprove of it. Mr. Stone's comment that the law does not expressly authorize publication by the newspapers is naive. The law does not need to. The newspapers are entitled to print any information to which the public has access. They cannot demand any information to which John Doe is not entitled, but they cannot be put off with less. In other words, a person may demand public information as John Doe or as a reporter for the Daily Bazoo. In either case he is entitled to the same facts and he is free to print them. Any law or administrative order which attempted to abridge this right would be in clear violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution, guaranteeing freedom of the press. Without waiting for Mr. Stone's suit, a newspaper or any person who is denied information in regard to the amount of an income tax, or required to give a reason for his demand, should ask the nearest federal court for an order compelling the collector of customs to obey the law.

MOST APPALLING ARGUMENTS are being put forward in opposition to the Child Labor Amendment, apparently in the confident belief that no one will investigate. If their fears have been stimulated sufficiently it is hoped the legislatures will act upon their "best interests." The immediate cause of the publicity about the proposed Twentieth Amendment is that during 1925 a majority of the State legislatures will vote for or against ratification. Enemies of the amendment are painting pictures of extravagant waste in the administration of such a law, of boys and girls loafing in the streets unable to lift a finger until the magic 18-year mark is attained, farmers' children reading novels while their parents work extra hours doing all the chores, schoolboys with summer jobs forced by an inexorable Congress to sit in idleness, children obeying Congress instead of their parents. These are no exaggerations. Read the Georgia resolution refusing ratification:

> The amendment would destroy parental authority and responsibility throughout America, would give irrevocable support to a rebellion of childhood which menaces our civilization, would give Congress not only parental authority but State authority over education. . . . It would place Congress in control in every home in the land between parent and child.

Read the pamphlet published by the National Association of Manufacturers; then read the amendment, and the literature sent out by the Federal Council of Churches; and you may learn how far are the facts from the expressed fears.

THIS IS THE THIRD ATTEMPT by Congress to establish some minimum standard below which no State can fall. Honest argument against the amendment may be based on the contention that the question is not serious enough for federal action. We believe that it is. In support of that belief we reprint the figures from the Census of 1920—1,060,858 children between the ages of 10 and 16 were gainfully employed in that year—one child in every twelve and in some States one in four. One glance at the civil codes of Mississippi, North Carolina, or Georgia ought to be convincing. As Father Ryan says in the Catholic World: "Only thirteen States have statutes which are in all respects as good as the laws enacted by Congress in 1916 and 1919; nine States do not prohibit all children under 14 from working in factories and stores; eleven States allow children under 16 to work from nine to eleven hours a day, while four States permit children under 16 to work at night." Read the last few lines again; that is what is meant by "child labor." When you hear those wonderful arguments about Bolshevist origin, administrative expense, State rights, violation of parental sovereignty, remember the children working eleven hours a day and often through the night.

AMERICAN ELECTIONS are rather tame affairs compared to the expressions of the people's will in England. Here a man who interrupts a candidate with a question is regarded as a rowdy and thrown out; there heckling is a fine art, and it takes thoroughgoing "hustling" to arouse disapproval. Some of the American correspondents reporting their first British elections have been much stirred by the sight of candidates with bandages on their heads or with their arms in slings. Apparently these guileless chroniclers had assumed that all Englishmen are such harmless gentlemen as inhabit the lecture platforms of America. As a matter of fact, England has a tradition of red-blooded electioneering methods which would put an American frontier community to shame. In the good old days before pacifist ideas began to pervade politics a candidate counted it a regular part of his election expenses to hire mobs to pelt his opponents with stones and rubbish. To howl down an opposition candidate was one of the simplest of tactics. The Manchester Guardian, indeed, digs an interesting item out of the expense account submitted by his campaign manager ("election agents," the British call them) to Sir F. Deval, candidate for the Andover seat in 1786. It read: "To being thrown out of the George Inn, Andover, to both my legs being thereby broken, to surgeon's bill and loss of time and business, all in the service of Sir F. Deval, £500." Nor was there any wave of popular indignation against such treatment. At the polls Sir F. Deval received precisely seven votes.

ACCORDING TO THE NEWSPAPERS, "Nick Carter" is dead. It is the third time in two years. In May, 1922, he committed suicide in the Hotel Broztell, New York; in July, 1924, he died a natural death; and now, on October 28, he passes away once more, this time in a county infirmary in Ohio. The news is startling, but a little investigation solves the mystery. John R. Coryell invented, so it seems, the character, but soon passed it on to Thomas C. Harbaugh, the last to die, who wrote most of the weekly stories from 1880 to 1890, and then resigned the tremendous task to Frederick Van Rensselaer Dey. In addition to "Nick Carter," both Dey and Harbaugh wrote many of the books published under the name of Bertha M. Clay, and each produced an incredible amount of work, Dey being credited with more than 1,076 stories, or more than 40,000,000 words, and Harbaugh with more than 300 volumes. Though both must have enormously increased the prosperity of their publishers, neither seems himself to have profited greatly, for Dey, finding himself destitute, committed suicide and Harbaugh, too, died in poverty. Anxious mothers may have preferred "Little Lord Fauntleroy," the famous author of which has just ended a prosperous career, but boys, impatient of the mild perfection of her little hero, usually slipped away to peruse in the privacy of the coalshed the more exciting adventures of the unbeatable detective.

Business Wins

IT was both deep as a well and as wide as a church door. For present purposes it will do and do well. For once the political prophets in the press, the straw ballots, and the betting accurately forecast the result. Yet not Coolidge but business wins. Will Rogers put it exactly when he said that the United States voted to be let alone. The public, misled and deceived about actual conditions in Washington and the country generally, decided to have things remain as they are. "Business as usual" and a cessation of politics was the slogan that carried. Millions, trembling for their jobs while observing the unemployed about them, voted for Coolidge lest a change take their work from them. They clung not to a full dinner pail, but to a partly filled one, and their fears were still further preyed upon by the skilful use made of two of the La Follette proposals. Once more the Democratic Party did not even interest the electorate, and as a result that party seems wiped out in most of the West.

All of which is not without a certain amusing side. When one thinks of the terrible dread the little Progressive Party caused in the breasts of the Republicans and the way the latter shouted themselves red in the face that the country was in danger of immediate collapse or bolshevism overnight, it is impossible not to smile. Late in October in more than one Northwestern State the Republican leaders were privately admitting their defeat—doubtless they are still rubbing their eyes. As for Mr. Davis, whose high-grade and dignified campaign with its unusually fine sportsmanship we are happy to recognize, he must admit now that myopia candidata, if we may coin a term, is the easiest of human maladies to catch. He was persuaded that he would win and he solemnly declared that he knew Mr. La Follette would carry ten States. Where stands he now? If this was apathy, well, make the most of it, as was said after the Roosevelt election—and Mr. Coolidge evidently knew how to. As for ourselves, we thought the prairies were beginning to catch fire, and so they did at the edges, but the blaze must be fanned a good deal yet before it will drive the coyotes and the timber-wolves into the open. This year the back-fires easily held the flames in check.

Yet we would not for one moment appear to belittle the magnificent achievement of Senators La Follette and Wheeler. Contrasted with that of Roosevelt in 1912 it is nothing less than amazing. Roosevelt had popularity, wealth, and a tremendously powerful daily press on his side, and many experienced politicians went over to him, taking the party machinery with them. If the 1924 Progressives have received $300,000 it will surprise us. With every bit of machinery to erect and no money to do it with, a necessarily double-headed organization to set up overnight, with only the Scripps papers on their side, La Follette and Wheeler none the less rolled up 4,000,000 votes, obtaining 400,000 votes in conservative New York State alone. It was the La Follette movement which contributed the brains, the life, the color, and some of the real issues to the campaign. When it is known that until October 7 the party could only place seventeen national speakers in the field to talk to a hundred million people, that on one day the national treasurer received only $15 from the entire country, and that in many cities it could not organize at all; when one recalls that the Republicans had $4,000,000 at their disposal, there is not the slightest ground for discouragement. It was a noble and patriotic achievement and we have nothing but the most heartfelt felicitations for Senators La Follette and Wheeler. Against incredible odds they took their cause to the people. It gained steadily and what they accomplished will endure to their lasting renown. It will not be their fault if their clean and high-minded and unselfish appeals to the electorate do not result in the organization of a third party. To our minds, with the incomplete returns before us as we go to press, the results show so widespread a desire for a new deal that we believe no time should be lost in organizing on a permanent basis. Certainly we do not see how Mr. La Follette and Mr. Wheeler can continue to function in their former parties, and the millions who followed them have a right to demand that their independent leadership continue.

No, for us this hour brings no discouragement, and much cheer, side by side with inevitable regrets. No realist believed that the third ticket would win; it would probably have been in some respects a misfortune if it had, for its very newness would have made the control of the government vastly difficult. The British Labor Party did not consider itself equipped to take over the Imperial Government last January—yet it is years and years ahead of our labor movement in ability, integrity, and clear-cut constructive program. A truly great labor party in this country can only be built up by years of travail and by agreement upon certain definite aims as to which many of the leaders are as yet in the kindergarten stage. We cannot deny our disappointment that labor, which first talked of a million-dollar fund, appears to have given less than $100,000; that in a city like Philadelphia only 34,000 working men and women voted for Mr. La Follette. Loyalty to the cause was not always observable, which is hardly surprising when one thinks for how many years so-called labor leaders have taken Republican and Democratic money or jobs. Only a magician's wand could alter these conditions in the twinkling of an eye.

As for President Coolidge, we do not alter or abate our opinion of him one jot or tittle. We are still of the opinion we expressed when he took office—that with him the Presidency stands low indeed. To us he remains a myth. We still believe him to be lacking in the ability, in the finer sense of honesty the American people have a right to demand of their Chief Executive. And we are clear in our minds that Charles G. Dawes is morally unfit for the high office to which he is elected; his campaign verged on blackguardism. We are, however, not at all sure that four years more of the crass materialism now enthroned in Washington, of the soulless Republican exploitation of the people for the benefit of the rich and privileged, of the licensing of corruptionists to proceed if only they do not get caught, and of the loosing of our financial imperialism upon the world will not bring about an early reaction and a bitter awakening for the masses. We do not—we cannot lose heart; we can only see the need for greater and greater efforts, for persistent, continued, and devoted patriotic service to the end that all the people shall see where lies salvation and where is the high road to American ideals.

England's Choice

ENGLAND has voted the Tories back into power. She did not reject Labor; she rejected the Liberals whose tacit support of Labor had kept it in office. Labor gained; but the Tories, who were the strongest single party before the election, emerged stronger still, while the Liberals suffered collapse.

In Parliament the Tories have an overwhelming majority; but in the country they are still a minority party. Advocates of proportional representation will find plenty of fuel for argument in the contrast of these figures: The Tories elected more than two-thirds of the members of the new House, but only 47 per cent of the voters cast Tory ballots. The Liberals are reduced to 36 votes, about 6 per cent of the whole; but 18 per cent of the people voted for them (as compared with 30 per cent a year ago). Labor lost forty seats in the Commons, but a million more people voted Labor than did so last time—35 per cent of the total number of voters, as compared with 31 per cent in 1923. The election was not, then, a defeat for Labor, but it turned the minority Labor Government out of power.

Probably the Tories would have gained in any case, but they gained unfairly by a dastardly last-minute trap into which Ramsay MacDonald fell. The Zinoviev letter, apparently forged, calling upon the British Communists to prepare for armed insurrection, was thrown into the campaign at the last minute. A Tory newspaper had the letter before the Government had it; and fearing the possible effect of its exposure MacDonald permitted the Foreign Office to denounce it without waiting for its authenticity to be proved. Its genuineness was still in doubt when the ballots were cast. Undoubtedly it aided the bolshevik scare which was the great Tory campaign argument. If it was genuine, MacDonald's Russian policy was obviously wrong—he had pledged government support to a Russian loan. If it was false he had blundered egregiously. In neither case could he make a brave appearance to the voters. As it turns out, it was almost certainly false; and the people of England must feel that they have been tricked by a lie.

Without that trick, however, a Tory Government, perhaps aided by the Lloyd-George Liberals, had seemed likely. The nine months of the Labor Government had done much to crystallize party lines in England. The Liberal Party was left without a program or an issue, and the voters naturally tended to one or the other of the two parties which plainly knew where they stood. In England, even more than here, there are essentially two parties—one conservative, one progressive; and the British Liberals had ceased to stand clearly for progress. It was impossible that they should continue to keep Labor in power without becoming merged with Labor; and the election proved, as expected, that while Labor's constituency is growing the bulk of England still prefers Tories to Laborites.

What will the Tories do, now that they have a clean majority of 200 in Parliament? It is possible that there will be little change. Tradition is strong in England; governments bow to its will regardless of their party labels. It is doubtful if the Tories will dare go far toward restoring the tariff system which was so violently repudiated a year ago. They will hardly think seriously of restoring the veto power of the House of Lords. MacDonald, in his short term of office, left scant impress upon the educational policy of the country; and the civil servants of the Foreign Office carried on the imperial tradition much as before. The Tories may, of course, resuscitate the plans for an enormous naval base at Singapore; and they may further exacerbate imperial relations by a deliberate policy of no compromise in Egypt and in India. They have the power to do great harm in Ireland. MacDonald's greatest achievement was the restoration of cordial relations with France and the promotion of Franco-German peace; that was, however, not so much a matter of party principle as of personal spirit. Certainly the Dawes plan was no ideal Labor program, and the Tories will hardly seek to undo it. They should be able, now that he has made the way easy, to carry to fruition what MacDonald began. The Nation regards the Tory victory as a loss for England; but Mr. Baldwin, if dull, is no jingo. If the Tories have the wisdom to stick to him and do not let their wild men, the die-hards and the Churchills, control party policy Tory rule will be no tragedy.

For five years, barring accidents, the Tories will rule England. Those may be very fruitful years for England and for the Labor Party. Labor grew strong in opposition; it proved its mettle in the seat of power, and returns to its habitual role of opposition strengthened and tempered. If for five years it can continue to develop its resources of leadership and increase its popular prestige as it has done in the five years since the peace was signed, it may return to power a majority party, and so able a group as to revive the world's waning faith in political democracy.

Breaking Ranks

ACCORDING to a gloomy friend the doctrine of free speech is doomed to a speedy repudiation. Born of democratic enthusiasm, it is the direct opposite of what nearly all organized bodies have professed, and even the lip-service which most moderns pay it is speedily to pass. Already it has become, he points out, a mere formula and the attacks made upon it by the politicians on the one side and the moralists on the other are destined to success because almost no one in his heart really believes it sound. Gradually, he says, the meaning of "disloyalty" will be extended until it covers every unorthodox utterance concerning society, and the various moral censorships will extend themselves until the official imprimatur is attached to every book which issues from the press. The Justice Fords will make common cause with the Admiral Plunketts when they see clearly that their individual objections to "immorality" on the one hand, and to lèse majesté, on the other, rest upon the common assumption that there is one standard opinion to be accepted by all.

Having realized that, they will accept the Bryans as comrades because, whatever their private opinion on the subject of evolution, they will understand his acceptance of their common doctrine. Against the united front of the millions who hold that in one particular or another freedom of expression should be limited the scattered few who hold no single opinion which they would back by law will be powerless. The official newspaper, the sound thesis, the clean book, and the municipal radio will reign supreme. Every citizen will be ignorant that dissent even exists and some new Saint Thomas Aquinas will fix in some greater Summa the answer to every question which man can propound.

None can deny the facts with which our acquaintance justifies his gloom. Never during the hundred years just past has the right of dissent been attacked in America from so many different quarters as in our decade; never have suppressions figured so frequently in the news of the day or been accepted so complacently. A book disappears from the shelves of the public library, a theatrical manager modifies or withdraws a play, and the process of censorship comes to be, by mere repetition, accepted as a normal process. But though these facts may not be questioned the interpretation put upon them may be. If suppression is common, so, by the same token, are the things which the orthodox feel called upon to suppress. If throughout the nineteenth century the theater in America escaped the official censor his absence was in part due to the fact that only safe plays were written and if no "clean-book bill" passed even a State legislature it may have been because no accepted author was ever minded to write a book which the most prurient could consider "unclean." Where rebels are being suppressed the spirit of rebellion must be abroad, and, similarly, every "radical" arrested gives proof that a "radical" exists.

In truth the battle is not yet won, but tolerance is being submitted to its severest test, because never before was the conservative called upon to tolerate so much. The solid ranks of safe respectability are breaking all along the line and accordingly the drill-masters are attempting to enforce more strictly their wavering discipline. Mustachioed generals and timid clerical corporals shout their frantic orders, but the individual stands doubtful whether he should listen or no. The ideal of regimentation and the ideal of freedom are struggling for mastery, but, the arguments of our gloomy acquaintance notwithstanding, the battle still hangs in the balance.

Anatole France Again

IT was Anatole France himself who said that "A beautiful verse is like a violin bow drawn across the resonant fibers of our souls. It is not his own thoughts but ours that the Poet sets singing within us. When he tells us of a woman he loves it is our own loves and griefs he awakens entrancingly in our souls." Anatole France always despised attempts at objective criticism. "We have in us, every one of us," he said, "a copy of each of our poets which no man knows and which will perish utterly and forever with all its variants when we shall cease to feel and know. And do you suppose we should love our lyric bards so fondly if they spoke to us of aught but our own selves?"

It would seem natural to Anatole France that the criticism poured forth upon his death should betray rather the idiosyncracies of his critics than the master himself. Anatole France "despised men tenderly," like his Abbe Jerome Coignard, and he would have smiled tenderly enough at the caricatures of himself which formed in his readers' minds. Here is an American critic who imagines Anatole France laughing aloud at his own penguins, as any American would. Here is Henry W. Nevinson, English to the last, picturing Anatole France "setting out at daybreak in the sweet air of the Somme or the Loire with fishing rod and wicker basket, from which the neck of a wine-bottle wrapped in a napkin emerged, laid beside a foot or two of bread and scraps of veal pinned on a wooden skewer . . . sitting beside the quietly running water all day, to return contentedly at sunset with the basket empty as the bottle." Here is Clive Bell reporting that "he looked like a sixteenth-century scholar, smiled like a Chinese sage, and talked like one of his own books," and that his conversation was "perfect"; and here is Theodor Wolff noting that he lacked the French gift of conversation. And finally, here is Stuart P. Sherman, deeply concerned with the problem of France's effect upon the morals of American youth.

Mr. Sherman, in whom a purposeful Puritanism still struggles, cannot believe that Anatole France's "conquest of Puritan Christendom" can be explained by "his sense of pity, pathos, and futility." These all are too negative, he thinks; and "the leader of a revolution must be a positively seductive person." Some of Anatole France's seduction, he finds, lies in his clear and musical style, and some in the richness and variousness of his culture; these, however, are hardly adequate to explain his fascination. Mr. Sherman's third explanation is "the seduction of his point of view, which is that of an immensely sophisticated loiterer in the garden of Epicurus . . . believing that if paradise is to be regained it will be by yielding to temptation and avoiding satiety only in order to preserve desire." Mr. Sherman obviously shudders at this, as he calls it, disintegrating point of view, but he is as obviously fascinated by it. Perhaps the youth who are turning to Anatole France would say somewhat the same thing in another way. There is something exciting in the boldness of Anatole France's mind. It cuts clear; it accepts nothing on faith; it has no hidden reverences; it can smile even at what it loves most. It rejects only after the test of experience. Some of Bertrand Russell's earlier writing communicates the same zest of adventure in intelligence. Possibly there is a seduction, to a generation which has lost faith in its old gods and codes, in mere intelligence. Possibly the war, forcing so many to think who never thought before, coercing unwilling minds to endure the miseries of disillusionment, has also developed a taste for the exercise of intelligence which a Puritan age stifled. And intelligence is close kin to a "sense of pity, pathos, and" at least a willingness to accept "futility."

Our pity has been "choked with custom of fell deeds." Anatole France penetrated behind the custom. The shams of the day, consecrated by venerable age, never deceived him. He had the uncanny gift of looking at old institutions through eyes which combined the fresh simplicity of Riquet, M. Bergeret's dog, or of Crainquebille the pushcart vendor, with the mellow culture of the centuries. The result is sometimes catastrophic to old standards and idols. But is it a sign of moral disintegration, or of mental toughness, that a new generation is able to delight with Henry Nevinson in such a passage as this?

> "Do you see, my son," exclaimed the holy Mael, "that madman who with his teeth is biting the nose of the adversary he has overthrown, and that other one who is pounding a woman's head with a huge stone?"
>
> "I see them," said Bulloch. "They are creating law; they are founding property; they are establishing the principles of civilization, the basis of society, and the foundations of the state."
>
> "How is that?" asked old Mael.
>
> "By setting bounds to their fields. That is the origin of all government. Your penguins, O Master, are performing the most august of functions. Throughout the ages their work will be consecrated by lawyers, and magistrates will confirm it."

Patriotism That Pays

By WILL IRWIN

PROBABLY the readers of this periodical understand the true inspiration of anti-Bolshevik propaganda in America and the uses of its by-products. I merely summarize here. When the war was over certain powerful and well-supported societies which had engaged in whipping up "national resistance" found their occupation gone. Happily for them and their professional secretaries, bolshevism had broken loose in Russia. Denunciation of bolshevism, exaggeration of our own imminent peril, appealed strongly to the timid old ladies and gentlemen whose funds had supported these organizations. And the pack was off, on the trail of the Reds. They had difficulty in scratching up enough actual American Communists and Bolsheviki to make a respectable straw man. But by patching out the list with all persons holding views which differed from those of Henry Cabot Lodge, these societies made a splendid showing of national peril. Mr. Ralph Easley of the National Civic Federation repeated that bolshevism, anarchism, socialism, pacifism, the British Labor Party, and so-called liberalism were the same thing, until even he grew weary. This process had splendid practical uses, at first almost unperceived. By tagging all forward-looking opinions and movements with the Red label you discredited them in a body. It seemed a sharp weapon to fight strikes, the closed shop, municipal ownership, the child-labor amendment, and all such "unconstitutional" frills. Before this campaign was over, pillars of the stock exchange together with uninstructed and impressionable citizens of the back country believed in their souls that all these fancy ideas had their origin in the brain of Trotzky.

Then Brigadier-General Fries of the Chemical Warfare Service put a cap-stone to this structure, and opened up new vistas for the professional patriot. In Washington Fries is known as the Junker of the Army. Long ago he had proved to the satisfaction of all stockholders in chemical companies that poison-gas warfare is humane, beneficent! "Little jail breaks, little strikes, and little lynchings, in themselves, are of little importance," he wrote once, "but if back of the United States Government there is not sufficient force to quell these little disturbances we might get a conflict of internal war that would overturn the government." His inclusion of jailbreaks, strikes, and lynchings in the same category illuminates the profound clarity of the gallant general's social views. And speaking one day at a public luncheon, General Fries revealed a startling fact. He had it on incontrovertible proof—the word of a woman in California—that the National Council for Prevention of War was financed, inspired, directed, from Moscow.

This organization is a kind of holding company for all peace societies in the United States. Among its vice-chairmen were at the time President Lowell of Harvard University, President Hibben of Princeton, and William Allen White. Mrs. Gifford Pinchot, wife of the Governor of Pennsylvania, served on the Executive Committee. Startling charges these! Yet upon any timid person who had kept up with the literature of his favorite anti-Bolshevik society burst a great light. Had not the presidents of Harvard and Princeton permitted Reds, advocating or expounding such dangerous measures as municipal ownership and the British Labor Party, to address the students? Had not William Allen White shown a complaisant interest in the scheme of that invidious Pink, Woodrow Wilson, to barter away our national sovereignty at Paris? As for Gifford Pinchot, some of his political vagaries and assaults on property—such as his socialistic conservation policy, foiled before it was too late by the right-minded Secretary Fall—now stood explained. For years he had been listening to the counsels of a Bolshevik wife! Unhappily for this campaign, certain persons of high station saw Secretary of War Weeks about the matter, and the Secretary somewhat reluctantly silenced General Fries. Silenced him officially, that is. He may no longer bawl his opinions from the front door, but he may, as will presently appear, whisper them out of the window.

Here was new and magnificent bunk to put new pep into the campaign! Long before this the professional secretaries of these societies had educated most of their members to believe that pacifism—which means in their language any doctrine looking toward the possible abolition of war—is exactly the same thing as bolshevism. General Fries gave these opinions a kind of official approval. The pack was off again, on the trail of the Red pacifists.

None pursued more valiantly than the American Defense Society; its four years of running down industrial Bolshevists was but training for this more congenial task. This society and its soul-mate, the National Security League, sprang into existence during the preparedness agitation which preceded our entry into the war. After we entered, they served as scourges to lash up the war spirit and as centers of volunteer spy-hunting. Both, sharp on the armistice, overhauled plants which had been making sausage of pacifists, pro-Germans, and conscientious objectors, to make mince-meat out of Reds and Pinks. The Security League, very active in 1919-1920, has seemed of late rather lax toward its duties.

But the American Defense Society has been on the job night and day, unrelenting in its pursuit, sleepless in its vigilance. While in circular letters it offers to make itself for a fee of five dollars a year the agent of the private citizen in the fight against bolshevism and Red radicalism, its real backer and angel is Elon H. Hooker, the multimillionaire who recently entered the Muscle Shoals bidding against Henry Ford. Mr. Hooker is one of our greatest chemical manufacturers; and a strong army, adequate to defend our institutions from external and internal enemies, will need a great deal of poison gas. He, however, merely gives his benediction, his name, and his money; for three years ago he made a great discovery. One day the late R. M. Whitney, a newspaper man, got access to William J. Burns's "Red file" in the Department of Justice. I have reason to believe that this file is more than a trifle inaccurate. It is a "privileged" record, not supposed to stand the merciless light of publicity. Perhaps, therefore, Mr. Burns's flatfeet may be pardoned if, knowing on which side their bread was buttered, they touched things up a bit. From this and other similar sources Mr. Whitney wrote his masterpiece, "The Reds in America." The Boston Transcript performed its first sensational act in a century of conservative respectability by publishing this work in full. In the Back Bay and Beacon Hill regions it scored a mad, riotous success. It had all the thrills of an old-fashioned dime novel; and much of a dime novel's literary style. The Back Bay trembled as it read, fascinated. And in this work Mr. Whitney showed himself a pioneer of thought. Long before General Fries he "discovered" the "sinister connection between Russian bolshevism and American pacifism." Americans agitating for universal peace, he declared again and again, were only playing into the hands of Moscow—breaking down our national resistance against Red conquest. Mr. Hooker reads the Transcript. He was delighted, transported. He caused "The Reds in America" to be printed as a pamphlet; and its author got a permanent job at once as leader in the American Defense Society's White Crusade.

"The radicals, it was learned," said Mr. Whitney in one of his pamphlets, ". . . working through pacifist and religious organizations and backed by an adequate radical fund, were desperately trying to cut down military preparedness to a point where no opposition could be offered the Reds when the time came for their armed revolution against the United States." That is the text for Mr. Whitney's subsequent activities.

Of course, this campaign had its sympathizers in the Government; now and then Mr. Whitney got more than passive support from the constituted authorities. I have mentioned his access to the "Red file" in the Department of Justice under the Daugherty-Burns regime. Last year, it would seem, the War Department helped a bit.

Paxton Hibben, captain in the U. S. Reserves, conducted during the Russian famine a relief organization in rivalry with that of Secretary Hoover and somewhat more closely allied to the Soviet Government. Also, he has urged resumption of trade relations with Moscow. "The Reds in America," as published by Mr. Whitney in the Boston Transcript, attacked him with special energy and virulence. Hibben sued the Transcript for libel. Shortly after that Secretary of War Weeks haled him before a board of reserve officers with a view to canceling his commission. "Captain Hibben has been charged with holding beliefs favorable to the enemies of the United States Government," said the Secretary in a statement to the press; ". . . . these charges are to the effect that while serving in the Russian relief he had expressed himself in terms friendly to the Soviet Government as interpreted by the State Department." While we do not recognize Russia, we certainly are not at war with her; but in his phrase "enemies of the United States Government," Secretary Weeks seems to have declared hostilities on his own account. In the course of the trial, a curious fact appeared. The Intelligence Department folder on Captain Hibben and the statements in the Transcript were almost identical in content—"even to two purely imaginary points," writes the captain.

The notion that all peace movements in the United States were a conscious part of the Moscow plot seemed ridiculous enough when General Fries first broached it. Those newspapers which noticed his statement at all merely scoffed and gibed. But reiteration is the soul of successful advertising. By harping on this string, Mr. Whitney and his associates cast discredit here and there on the peace sentiment of the country. They had long viewed with alarm the spread of "pacifist foolishness" among our women. For example the League of Women Voters, with an exceptionally intelligent membership of two million, had made world peace and international cooperation the livest issue on their program. Scenting danger, Mr. Whitney swung into action with a pamphlet on "pacifist" women. Among six million or more, he discovered about fifty with a background which could fairly be called "radical"—as the American Defence Society defines radicalism. At about this same period, the militarists among our army officers broke loose again from the tolerant control of Secretary Weeks. Brigadier-General A. J. Bowley, addressing the Columbus, Ohio, Chamber of Commerce, exposed the details of the "bolshevist plot" against our national security. First asking the reporters to keep his remarks out of print, he averred solemnly that Frederick J. Libby, secretary of the National Council for Prevention of War, had been educated by Bolsheviki in Moscow for the purpose of leading the social revolution in America, that he had taught communism in a Pennsylvania college, that his every move was directed from the Third International. Warming up to his subject, the General alleged that S. E. Nicholson, Mr. Libby's friend and close associate in peace work, figured as sub-villain in the plot. Mr. Libby and Mr. Nicholson, he informed Columbus, took turn and turn about in Washington and Moscow, the one getting instructions from the Soviets and the other putting them into operation. And the worst of it is that the general seemed to believe what he said.

Now as a matter of cold truth, Mr. Libby holds no strong political views except his overwhelming conviction that war should be abolished by international agreement. Certainly he is not a Communist—not the "reddest of the Reds," as General Bowley called him. And he was never in Russia in his life. At about the period of General Bowley's address, Mr. Nicholson was just visiting Moscow for the first time—as head of a Quaker reconstruction unit. A hide-bound, hard-shell Indiana Republican, the close political friend of Senator Jim Watson, he testifies with pride that he has never even scratched the party ticket except on the liquor issue. But misstatement of this kind always has its temporary effect; members of the League of Women Voters say that the general made many converts in Columbus.

Secretly, the Gas Warfare Service had already wriggled back into the game. The agent, this time, was not General Fries, but his librarian, Miss Lucia B. Maxwell. At some time in 1923, she compiled a sort of patriotic poster—a curious document, difficult of description and impossible of reproduction. In the circles which she and Mr. Whitney frequent, it is called "The Spider Web Chart." At its top shines the legend, "The Socialist and Pacifist Movement in America is an absolutely Fundamental and Integral Part of International socialism; (Lusk report, page 11)." Down its center, in neat typewritten boxes, runs a list of women's societies active in the cause of peace, including the Y. W. C. A., the W. C. T. U., and the National Council of Jewish Women. In corresponding boxes on both sides stretch the names of twenty-one American women suspected of radicalism in its various degrees, together with their "records." The name of each woman in the list, and the name of that society which she is "tainting," are joined by a straight line. Similar lines run from the societies to the head of the chart where like accusing fingers they point at two names—Frederick J. Libby, mentioned before, and Mrs. Maud Wood Park, chairman of the League of Women Voters. They—it is made graphically to appear—are head and front of the "socialist-pacifist plot." I have shown already where Mr. Libby stands. To anyone who knows Mrs. Park, the accusation of Red radicalism is just funny.

In the lower right-hand corner of the chart runs a rhyme of Miss Maxwell, distinguished alike by its political profundity, its haunting meter, and its original grammar:

> Miss Bolshevik has come to town,
> With a Russian cap and a German gown,
> In women's clubs she's sure to be found,
> For she's come to disarm AMERICA.
>
> She sits in judgment on Capitol Hill,
> And watches the appropriation bill
> And without her O. K. it passes—NIL
> For she's here to disarm AMERICA.
>
> She uses the movie and lyceum, too,
> And alters text-books to suit her view,
> She prates propaganda from pulpit and pew,
> For she's bound to disarm AMERICA.
>
> The male of the specie has a different plan.
> He uses the bomb and the fire brand,
> And incites class hatred whenever he can
> While she's busy disarming AMERICA.
>
> His special stunt is arousing the mob,
> To expropriate and hate and kill and rob
> While she's working on her political job—
> AWAKE! AROUSE!! AMERICA!!

This document, apparently, was never intended for general circulation. But reproduced in photostat, its admirers placed it where it might do the most good. When President Harding died in San Francisco, a copy lay among the papers on his desk, awaiting his return from the West. Among the builders of the Bolshevik straw-man, it created a furore. That odd group of reactionaries centering round the Woman Patriot, journalistic ghost of the old anti-suffrage cause, threw transports of joy. Mr. Whitney started an agitation to get Miss Maxwell the Distinguished Service Medal. Attorney-General Daugherty remarked that he did not know how he could do his work of running down Red Radicals without Miss Maxwell's valuable assistance.

To show the spirit in which Miss Maxwell did her work, let me cite my own family record in the Spider Web Chart. Toward the lower right hand corner Miss Maxwell polishes off my wife as follows:

> Inez Haynes Irwin (wife of Will Irwin) member International League for Peace and Freedom, member I. W. W. Defense Committee, made an appeal for funds for the I. W. W. Defense (see Lusk report). Member National Woman's Party. (Will Irwin was the Socialist candidate recently defeated in California.)

Now to be very charitable, these statements are mainly—mistakes. My wife does belong, though inactively, to the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. She has been active in the Woman's Party—though what this organization has to do with the case does not appear. She has never been a member of the I. W. W. Defense Committee. To the best of her memory, she has never appealed for funds for the I. W. W. defense. In 1918, certain I. W. W. were arrested in Chicago as draft obstructors and were being put through the mill—not, everyone knew, because they hampered the war as charged, but just because they held radical opinions. Thereupon, my wife, who had been doing rather more than most American women to help win the war, signed a manifesto asking that these men be given a fair trial. Perhaps asking a fair trial for people accused of political offenses has become in these later days un-American. At any rate, she was placed on the Tory blacklist; parrot-like the builders of the Bolshevik straw-man have passed on from list to list, from manifesto to manifesto, the charge that she is an active and Dangerous Red Radical. Whereas, she is just a writing woman, interested relatively little in politics and very much in her job of creating fiction. As for me—I have never belonged to the Socialist Party. I have never run for office. I have not lived in California for twenty years. I should have voted for Wilson in 1916 had I not been at the British front; and I came out for Davis this year. However, this ingenious invention appears not only in the Spider Web Chart but in one of Mr. Whitney's pamphlets. In my case, the explanation is easy. I am a vice-chairman of the National Council for Prevention of War.

I have in my possession letters from eleven of the women listed in the Spider Web Chart. All but one call attention to some glaring inaccuracy of the same kind. And the wise political discrimination which infuses the whole document may be judged by a passage in the "record" of Mrs. Raymond Robins: "led a Red Demonstration May 20, 1907, consisting of 3,700 cheering, boisterous Socialists, anarchists, trade unionists, members of liberal societies, etc., in Chicago. . . ." There you are again; trades unionism and liberalism all part of the hellish socialist-pacifist plot. Also the Spider Web Chart, in common with much other militarist literature, makes much of the "slacker's oath" proposed at a convention of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. This pledged the members never in any way to engage in war or to assist war even by relief work. But the Spider Web Chart fails to mention that the motion to adopt the "slacker's oath" was defeated by an overwhelming majority.

Then some outsider secured a copy of the Spider Web Chart, and hawked it to the press. With its talent for getting off on the wrong foot politically, Henry Ford's Dearborn Independent published the interesting document virtually in full. Shortly afterward, the League of Women Voters, meeting in convention at Buffalo, took official cognizance of this attack on Mrs. Park, their active leader. Just in time to prevent a storm, the Secretary of War burst into action. On behalf of the department he repudiated the Spider Web Chart as full of "glaring misstatements"; ordered General Fries to destroy all copies in possession of his office and to call in for destruction all outstanding copies. However, it had probably done its little work. The builders of the Bolshevik straw-man have carried its misstatements and insinuations to every corner of the country. The copy of the Dearborn Independent was scarcely off the press before a manufacturers' association in Kentucky, engaged in fighting unions and the child-labor amendment, had reprinted its version of the Spider Web Chart as a pamphlet. And I can personally testify to the time I wasted during the subsequent few weeks in answering letters which asked me if the charge against me could possibly, possibly be true.

Yes, the Bolshevik scare, worked up by so much honest industry and creative imagination, is paying magnificently.

The Better America Federation of Los Angeles, whose chief object is to put I. W. W. in jail, defeat progressive legislation and maintain the open shop, uses it every day. Abolition of child labor, compulsory education up to the sixteenth year, the eight-hour day, the forty-hour week, prohibition of night work for women and children, minimum wage, the right of labor to organize, the initiative and referendum—all these measures, according to the Better America Federation, are entering wedges for bolshevism. One of its staff-orators goes round telling women's clubs that she who reads the books of H. G. Wells, Sinclair Lewis, and James Harvey Robinson, or attends certain plays by Bernard Shaw, Eugene O'Neill, and Channing Pollock, more menaces society than he who preaches out-and-out socialism from a soap-box. The official organ of the Republican National Committee roared weekly, even to the moment of its untimely death, the charge that those senators who started the Teapot Dome investigation and ejected Secretary Fall got their instructions straight from Moscow. Ex-Attorney General Daugherty, sharp on his involuntary resignation, took the platform to prove that Moscow did it; that the assault on his just and honest administration was a first step toward the social revolution. Jim Curley, running on the Democratic ticket for Governor of Massachusetts, had indorsed the child-labor amendment. Suddenly the Roman Catholic church of Massachusetts came out strongly against the measure. With the church against it the Democracy of the Bay State is lost. Curley had to duck into some hole. He picked the anti-Bolshevik dugout. "It has been brought to my attention," he announced officially, "that this amendment was conceived in Moscow."

It all seems a little futile to me. But I bow to expert knowledge; the piece must draw, or such skilled showmen would have taken it off long ago. Perhaps this late, hysterical activity in laying to Bolshevik Moscow all the ills that afflict political or financial privilege is a case of cashing in before the game closes down. For Russia is settling back from her Bolshevik jag to a more or less orderly socialized republic. She is resuming production, preparing to develop enormous resources. Soon we shall have to trade with her or pay the penalty in loss of foreign commerce. By that time, certain gentlemen now most afraid of bolshevism will find it convenient to alter their views. And it will not be diplomatic to cast aspersions on Russia's past.

Meantime, what is an American Bolshevik? From the clear wisdom of childhood comes the answer. Gifford Pinchot's son, aged eight, quarreled with a little girl. "She's a Bolshevik!" he told his mother. "Why do you call her that?" asked Mrs. Pinchot. "Because I don't like her," replied Pinchot, Jr.

New Morals for Old

Men Who Understand Women

By FLORENCE GUY SEABURY

IF Clarissa Harlowe could have stepped out of her pre-Victorian world to witness some of the women stevedores and "longshoremen" now at work along the New York water front she would certainly have fainted so abruptly that no masculine aid could have restored consciousness. If we can believe the 1920 census, a goodly number of Clarissa's timid and delicate sex are toiling gloriously in the most dangerous and violent occupations. Nor are they only engaged in handling steel beams and freight, running trucks and donkey engines, but as miners and steeplejacks, aviators and divers, sheriffs and explorers—everything, in fact, that man ever did or thought of doing. They have proved, moreover, as successful in such a new occupation as capturing jungle tigers as in the old one of hunting husbands, as deft in managing big business as in running a little household.

But the census bureau, compiling all the facts of feminine industry, forgot to note that woman might perform these amazingly varied operations, outside the home, without changing in any measurable degree the rooted conception of her nature and activities. She may step out of skirts into knickers, cut her hair in a dozen short shapes, and even beat a man in a prize-fight, but old ideas as to her place and qualities endure. She changes nothing as set as the stereotyped image of her sex which has persisted since Eve.

The Inquiring Reporter of the New York Sun recently asked five persons whether they would prefer to be tried by a jury of men or women. "Of men," cried they all—two women and three men. "Women would be too likely to overlook the technical points of the law." "Women are too sentimental." "They are too easily swayed by an eloquent address." "Women are by nature sentimental." Almost anybody could complete the list. Ancient opinions of women's characteristics have been so widely advertised that the youngest child in the kindergarten can chirp the whole story. Billy, aged ten, hopes fervently that this country may never have a woman President. "Women haven't the brains—it's a man's job." A. S. M. Hutchinson, considerably older than Billy, has equally juvenile fears: that the new freedom for woman may endanger her functions in the home. Whatever and wherever the debate, the status and attributes of women are settled by neat and handy generalizations, passed down from father to son and mother to daughter. For, so far, most women accept the patterns made for them and are as likely as not to consider themselves the weaker vessel, the more emotional sex, a lay figure of biological utility.

Optimists are heralding a changed state in the relationship of men and women. They point to modern activities and interests as evidence of a different position in the world. They say that customs and traditions of past days are yielding to something freer and finer. The old order, as far as home life is concerned, has been turned topsy-turvy. Out of this chaos interpreters of the coming morality declare that already better and happier ways have been established between man and maid.

It sounds plausible enough, but the trouble remains that, so far, it isn't true. The intimate relationship of men and women is about as it was in the days of Cleopatra or Xanthippe. The most brawny stevedorette leaves her freight in the air when the whistle blows and rushes home to husband as if she were his most sheltered possession. Following the tradition of the centuries, the business woman, whose salary may double that of her mate, hands him her pay envelope and asks permission to buy a new hat. Busts and bustles are out, flat chests and orthopedic shoes are in, while the waist line moves steadily toward the thigh—but what of it? Actualities of present days leave the ancient fantasies unchanged.

Current patterns for women, as formulated by the man in the street, by the movies, in the women's clubs and lecture halls can be boiled down to one general cut. Whatever she actually is or does, in the stereotype she is a creature with only one function. The girl on the magazine cover is her symbol. She holds a mirror, a fan, a flower and—at Christmas—a baby. Without variety, activity, or individuality, her sugary smile pictures satisfying femininity. Men are allowed diversity. Some are libertines, others are husbands; a few are lawyers, many are clerks. They wear no insignia of masculinity or badge of paternity and they are never expected to live up to being Man or Mankind. But every woman has the whole weight of formulated Womanhood upon her shoulders. Even in new times she must carry forward the design of the ages.

One of the quaint hang-overs of the past is that men are the chief interpreters of even the modern woman. It may be that the conquest of varied fields and the strain of establishing the right to individuality has taken all her time and energy. Or it may be that the habit of vicarious expression has left her inarticulate. Whatever it is, in the voluminous literature of the changing order, from the earnest tracts on "How It Feels to Be a Woman" by a leading male educator to the tawdry and flippant syndicated views of W. L. George, masculine understanders take the lead. And the strange part of their interpretations is that they run true to ancient form. Old adages are put in a more racy vernacular, the X-ray is turned on with less delicacy, but when the froth of their engaging frankness disappears hoary old ideas remain thickly in the tumbler.

Take the intimate life story of a girl of the younger generation—Janet March—written by that good friend of women, Floyd Dell. The blurb on the jacket of the book announces that she moves toward "not a happy ending but an intelligent one." And the end? Janet finds her mate and the curtain falls to the soft music of maternity. "One has to risk something," Janet cries. "All my life I've wanted to do something with myself. Something exciting. And this is the one thing I can do. I can"—she hesitated. "I can create a breed of fierce and athletic girls, new artists, musicians, and singers."

As a conclusion this is acceptable to any one with a heart, but wherein is it intellectual and not happy? Queen Victoria, the Honorable Herbert Asquith, or the Reverend Lyman Abbott would be equally pleased by its one hundred per cent womanliness. And how does it differ from our cherished slogan "Woman's place is in the home"? Only in that Floyd Dell cuts Janet in a large, free-hand design. The advance pattern calls for a wealth of biological and gynecological explanation, pictures the girl as a healthy young animal who "smoked but drew the line on grounds of health at inhaling," and, following the fashion of peasants in foreign countries, consummated the marriage before it was celebrated. Yet Janet, who claimed her right to all experience and experiment, finally raises her banner on the ancient and familiar platform of fireside and nursery.

Despite its unquestionable orthodoxy, Janet March was retired from circulation. But no one has successfully dammed the flowing tide of W. L. George. He draws with somewhat futuristic effect, at times, but his conclusions are those of the old masters. "No woman," he enunciates authoritatively, "values her freedom until she is married and then she is proud to surrender it to the man she has won." Or take this: "All women are courtesans at heart, living only to please the other sex." Wherein does this differ from the sentiment of Alexander Pope, who, one hundred and fifty or more years before the birth of W. L. George, declared:

> Men, some to business, some to pleasures take,
> But every woman is at heart a rake.

H. L. Mencken, stirred by debates about the intelligence of woman and her newer activities, essayed "In Defense of Women," to put his old wine in a fancy bottle, but it was the same home brew. Generously conceding brains to women, he proves his point on the evidence that they are used to ensnare men, who, weak-minded and feeble in flight, are usually bowled over in the battle of wits. "Marriage," he says, "is the best career a woman can reasonably aspire to—and in the case of very many women the only one that actually offers a livelihood." . . . "A childless woman remains more than a little ridiculous and ill at ease." . . . "No sane woman has ever actually muffed a chance." . . . "The majority of inflammatory suffragettes of the sex-hygiene and birth-control species are simply those who have done their best to snare a man and failed."

In H. L. Mencken's favor is his absence of the usual gush about feminine beauty. He declares with refreshing honesty that in contrast to the female body a milk jug or even a cuspidor is a thing of intelligent and gratifying design. Of woman's superior mental ability he says: "A cave man is all muscle and mush. Without a woman to think for him, he is truly a lamentable spectacle, a baby with whiskers, a rabbit with the frame of an aurochs, a feeble and preposterous caricature of God." What a pity that women use all these advantages of superior mentality and ability only in the age-old game of man-hunting. But do they?

D. H. Lawrence shares this philosophy of the chief business of women, and he is much more gloomy about it. In fact, he is decidedly neurotic in his fear of the ultimate absorption of man. Woman he describes perpetually as a great, magnetic womb, fecund, powerful, drawing, engulfing. Man he sees as a pitiful, struggling creature, ultimately devoured by fierce maternal force. "You absorb, absorb," cries Paul to Miriam in "Sons and Lovers," "as if you must fill yourself up with love because you've got a shortage somewhere." The Lawrence model, madly, fiercely possessive, differs from older forms in the abundance of physiological and pathological trimming. His conclusion, as voiced again by Paul to Miriam, is: "A woman only works with part of herself; the real and vital part is covered up." And this hidden reality is her terrific, destructive, fervid determination to drown man in her embrace.

So it goes. To Floyd Dell woman is a Mother, to H. L. Mencken a Wife, to W. L. George a Courtesan, and to D. H. Lawrence a Matrix—always specialized to sex. There may be men who are able to think of woman apart from the pattern of female, but they are inarticulate. Most of them spend their lives associating with a symbol. The set pieces they call Mary, Martha, Elaine, or Marguerite may follow the standardized design of grandmother, mother, or aunt. Or, in more advanced circles, the pattern may call for bobbed hair, knickers, and cigarette case. Under any form of radicalism or conservatism the stereotype remains.

The old morality was built upon this body of folk-lore about women. Whether pictured as a chaste and beautiful angel, remote and untainted by life's realities, or more cynically regarded as a devil and the source of sin, the notion was always according to pattern. Naturally, the relationship of men and women has been built upon the design, and a great many of our social ideals and customs follow it. The angel concept led, of course, to the so-called double standard which provides for a class of Victorian dolls who personify goodness, while their sisters, the prostitutes, serve as sacrificial offerings to the wicked ways of men. The new morality, as yet rather nebulous and somewhat mythical, has fewer class distinctions. The angel picture, for instance, has had some rude blows. As portrayed by the vanguard of radicals and interpreters, however, the changing conventions have their roots in the old generalizations and fantasies.

Perhaps this is only to be expected, for the man or woman does not exist whose mind has not become so filled with accepted ideas of human beings and relationships before maturity, or even adolescence, that what is seen thereafter is chiefly a fog of creeds and patterns. If several hundred babies, children of good inherited backgrounds, could be brought up on an isolated island, without a taint of superimposed custom and never hearing generalizations about themselves, never having standardized characteristics laid heavily upon their shoulders, perhaps a different type of relationship founded upon actualities would be evolved. Without a mythology of attributes, based chiefly upon biological functions, real human beings might discover each other and create new and honest ways of comradeship and association. As it is today, we do not know what the pristine reactions of individuals, free from the modifications of stereotype, would be like.

It was the development of means by which beliefs could be separated from actual facts which brought modern science into being and freed the world from the quaint superstitions of the ages. Not until the nature of substance could be proved and classified in contrast with the mass of ignorant notions which clogged ancient thought was the amazing mechanical, economic, and scientific advance of the last century possible. The world of antiquity had standardized life and tied thought down to speculative creeds. Empirical science discarded all supposition and centered itself upon building up another picture—life as an examination of its actual nature proved it to be.

In the creating of a new order which will bring with it a different type of social and personal contact something similar must take place. For most of our ideas, even those classified as liberal and advanced, are built upon the reactions of an alleged, not an actual human being. Men have suffered from pattern-making, but never have they been burdened with the mass of generalizations that are heaped upon women from birth. Nobody knows what women are really like because our minds are so filled with the stereotype of Woman. And this picture, even in the interpretations of those who claim to understand the modern woman, is chiefly one of sex, not character. It is impossible to create a satisfying relationship between a red-blooded individual and a symbol. A changed morality cannot successfully emerge when half of those who participate are regarded not as people but functions. As long as women are pictured chiefly as wife, mother, courtesan, or what not—defining merely a relationship to men—nothing new or strange or interesting is likely to happen. The old order is safe.

Europe Moves Toward Peace

By ROBERT DELL

Geneva, October 2

THE fifth Assembly of the League of Nations has been quite unlike its predecessors and for the first time since the League was founded it is possible to hope that it may become a reality. For this is the first time that the League has made a serious attempt to do the principal work for which it was founded, namely, to take measures for the prevention of war. Ramsay MacDonald must in the first place have the credit of the change. His speech, so refreshingly undiplomatic, so different in its blunt frankness from the speeches to which we have been accustomed in past years, transformed the atmosphere of the Assembly. At previous Assemblies the English and French delegations concealed their differences in public and worked against each other in private.

If Ramsay MacDonald initiated the change, other men, when he had left Geneva, carried to fulfilment the work that he had indicated. Two reputations have been made at Geneva—those of the French Socialist delegate, Paul-Boncour, and of M. Politis, the Greek Minister in Paris. The Protocol was Paul-Boncour's idea and it was in great measure thanks to his tact, persuasiveness, and skill that it was successfully piloted through the committees. One knew him to be a man of ability, but he had not been suspected of the great qualities of statesmanship that he showed at Geneva. Paul-Boncour is a man whose career deserves watching. He is likely yet to hold high office in France. M. Politis was already known to students as an authority on international law, but Geneva made him known to the European public. His speech on the difficulty and inadequacy of economic "sanctions," which is believed to have converted Ramsay MacDonald to the view that some use of military force was necessary, was one of the most remarkable delivered during the Assembly.

Of course, what has been done at Geneva could not have been done without the change in French policy. As to the reality of that change even the most skeptical became convinced before the end of the Assembly. It is clear that the present French Government sincerely desires peace. It would be difficult to imagine a greater contrast than that between the attitude of Viviani at previous Assemblies and that of Paul-Boncour, and even of Briand, this year, to say nothing of Herriot himself. Moreover, the French Government has said quite definitely that it wants Germany in the League and is prepared to give her a permanent seat on the Council. It is now seen by the French in power that a political and economic understanding with Germany is necessary to France. An economic understanding is made necessary by the situation of Alsace-Lorraine, which needs German coke and German markets, and a political understanding is necessary to an economic one. It may yet be that Alsace-Lorraine, after having been for centuries a bone of contention between France and Germany, will become a bond of union between them.

The fifth Assembly has been an Assembly of one subject and has done one thing—the Geneva Protocol—but that one thing is incomparably more important than anything done at any previous Assembly. If it be ratified by all the Great Powers, including the United States, a long step will have been taken toward making war impossible and a great reduction of armaments made possible. The Protocol is very different from the Draft Treaty of Mutual Assistance which Ramsay MacDonald wisely rejected. It is widely different from any previous measure with the same purpose in that it includes compulsory arbitration for all international disputes. This in itself is an immense advance—an advance undreamed of even a year ago. The whole difficulty of determining the aggressor in a dispute disappears. The aggressor is the Power that has refused to go to arbitration or has disregarded an award. This principle, which was that of the American plan, was advocated years ago by Jaurès and has since been the official policy of the French Socialist Party. It is not surprising that when MacDonald proposed it at Geneva it was at once accepted by the French delegation.

The two chief objections urged against the Geneva Protocol are that it includes the use of armed force and that it interferes to some extent with national sovereignty. For my part I was as convinced by the speech of M. Politis as Ramsay MacDonald is believed to have been, and I am sure that the French are right in saying that the power of using armed force in the last resort against an "aggressor," as defined, is necessary. Nor do I understand the objection to it on the part of people ready to admit the use of economic "sanctions," including a naval blockade. If there is a ruthless and effective form of force, it is a naval blockade, as every German knows. Air raids are less merciless. Besides, the French are surely right in their view that, if all countries agree to the use of armed force, it will probably never be necessary. The threat will be enough, for what nation will dare to risk war with the whole civilized world? It is not true, by the way, that Lord Parmoor ever put the British navy at the disposal of the League of Nations, but the Protocol involves its use in certain circumstances and must involve it. In what circumstances, is a question depending on the degree of acceptance that the Protocol obtains. If the United States unhappily refuses to accept it, England will not pledge itself to any use of the British navy that would involve a conflict with America, perhaps over an alleged breach of the Monroe Doctrine. In such a case England might agree to the use of the navy only in Europe.

That the Geneva Protocol involves a certain limitation of national sovereignty is true, but peace is impossible without such limitation. As the Belgian Senator Lafontaine said at a previous Assembly of the League, national sovereignty means the right to make war, and it is just that right that the Protocol denies. Absolute national sovereignty is incompatible with permanent peace and we must choose between the two. How could we have social peace without limiting the sovereignty of the individual? The claim to absolute national sovereignty is in fact a claim on the part of a nation to do as it likes, regardless of the rights and liberties of other nations. Permanent peace involves a super-national authority of all the nations to which they must all submit so far as their international relations are concerned. There are even questions of internal politics that are not merely internal questions. Such are questions of immigration and of the rights of racial minorities subjected to a government of another race. I think that the authors of the Protocol were conscious of the danger that the Japanese amendment might prevent the United States from signing the Protocol, but they felt nevertheless that the amendment was justified.

One great danger there is—that the Protocol may tend to stereotype existing territorial arrangements in Europe, some of which are manifestly absurd and unjust. It is right to prevent their alteration by force, but there must be some means of revising treaties and frontiers. The Covenant of the League gives the Assembly the power to revise treaties but, so long as unanimity is necessary, that power will never be used. On this point the Protocol needs amendment. The German Government, in its reply about the Draft Treaty of Mutual Assistance, made the excellent suggestion that a special arbitration tribunal should be set up for this purpose. If and when the inhabitants of some particular territory show a desire to be transferred to another allegiance, there must be some tribunal to consider the question and, if necessary, hold a plebiscite in the territory concerned. The prevention of war cannot be allowed to become the permanent consecration of such injustices and absurdities as the Polish Corridor through Germany or the annexation of German South Tyrol to Italy.

Too much must not be expected from the disarmament conference. Total disarmament is not yet, and can come only naturally, when nations have become accustomed to settling their disputes by arbitration and feel themselves secure. Moreover, total national disarmament involves an international police force. The aim should be to reduce armaments to the minimum necessary to fulfil the obligations of the Protocol and, above all, to abolish conscription. Without the universal abolition of conscription any so-called reduction of armaments will be a farce. No country can have a larger army than one composed of the whole of its able-bodied male inhabitants. A great reduction of armaments would be an immense financial relief, although it would not in itself make war impossible. War will not become impossible until every nation recognizes that war is not to its real interest, just as normal individuals recognize that it is not to their real interest to take the law into their own hands. Such recognition would be aided by the removal of the economic causes of war, of which protectionism is the chief. Until all the markets of the world are opened to all nations by universal free trade, the competition for new markets must continue and bring about quarrels between nations. If the Geneva Protocol becomes a reality, and compulsory arbitration is universally accepted, it must lead to the recognition of that fact.

As regards the League of Nations, it still needs to become universal before it can be really effective. The absence of America, Germany, and Russia from the discussions of the Protocol has been a serious drawback. It seems likely that Germany will apply for admission to the League. If so, a special session of the Assembly will be held in December or January to consider the application, and Germany will be elected. There will probably also be an application from Turkey and it is not quite impossible that Russia, too, may decide to apply for membership.

Countess Karolyi

By EMIL LENGYEL

COUNTESS MICHAEL KAROLYI, the former Countess Catherine Andrassy, is one of the strongest and most picturesque personalities the European upheaval has produced. The story of her metamorphosis from a feted beauty in pre-war Hungary to an exiled apostle of pacifism is crowded with romance.

While living in the castle of her step-father, Count Julius Andrassy, the Countess Catherine took part in the gay life of the high aristocracy. But even then, in a series of articles published in one of the London magazines, she drew a somber picture of the empty life which her friends were leading. Their favorite book was the Almanach de Gotha. Their minds were occupied with hunting parties, imperial receptions, and petty court intrigues.

The home of Count Julius Andrassy was a meeting place of those members of the Hungarian aristocracy who took an active part in politics. His father had been the most distinguished minister of foreign affairs Francis Joseph ever had, and at the Berlin Conference had so manipulated the European balance of power that Austria-Hungary won the permission of the great Powers in general and of Disraeli, the English prime minister, in particular, to occupy Bosnia-Herzegovina, a former Turkish vilayet, and thus obtained the privilege for Austria-Hungary of giving the world a pretext for plunging into war half a century later. Five decades after the signing of the Bosnia-Herzegovina pact the son of the "great" Andrassy, Count Julius Andrassy, the step-father of Countess Michael Karolyi, became the last foreign minister of the moribund Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. In the house of the Andrassys the countess, who was to become the wife of the first president of the Hungarian republic, imbibed that feudal spirit which the Andrassy family has preserved throughout the centuries in its medieval purity.

At the time of his marriage to the Countess Andrassy Count Karolyi was one of the most prominent of Hungary's aristocrats. He had immense landed properties scattered all over the country. The union of Hungary's richest young nobleman and most beautiful girl was a sensation throughout the country. Nobody would have dared to think at that time that ten years later these conspicuous members of Hungarian society would be driven out as "radicals" and "pacifists."

Before his marriage Count Karolyi had been a typical "dissolute youth" whose political career seemed to be predetermined not so much by his achievements as by the imperative necessity of giving high office to the bearer of a name which ranked so prominently in the Almanach de Gotha. After his marriage Count Karolyi became, suddenly, a profound student of sociology and one of the most serious-minded politicians of the monarchy. Then as the war progressed both he and his wife became ardent pacifists.

The conversion to pacifism of these two prominent aristocrats was an important event in the monarchy. In the whole territory of the Central Powers Count Karolyi and his wife were the only conspicuously placed members of the upper class who not only avowed their pacifist aims but actively carried on a crusade against the war. They were surrounded by a host of spies employed by the German and Austrian supreme army commands.

When at last the revolution and the end of the hostilities came Count Karolyi became the first president of the Hungarian republic. On the surface it seemed that this democratic state was firmly founded. The former rulers flocked to swear allegiance to the "People's Republic"; Joseph, the Hapsburg prince, was seen almost every day in the offices of the National Council assuring the leaders of the new Hungary that he would make every sacrifice in order to aid the cause of Hungarian democracy. Yet Count Karolyi and the other leaders of the new government had well-founded forebodings. The soldiers of the succession states continued to march against Hungary. Their politicians would not heed the assurances of the Hungarian revolutionary leaders that democratic Hungary would not follow in the footsteps of the old reactionary regime which had deprived the nationalities of their most elementary civic rights. Meanwhile reaction was rapidly and quietly preparing to punish the champions of Hungarian democracy who, so they charged, had permitted the enemy to invade their country. The oath of allegiance of Joseph the Hapsburg did not mislead Count Karolyi and his supporters. After a brief, tragic struggle to maintain their young democracy they gave up and the Bolshevists took over the Government. The Count and Countess went into exile and when the Soviet regime was replaced by the white terror Count Karolyi was officially declared a traitor.

Thus, Count and Countess Karolyi, penniless and exiled from their own country, wandered about the countries of Europe and looked for a place where they could settle down. In his memoirs Count Karolyi says that but for his wife he could not have survived the trials of the last years. Down in Dalmatia, where they took refuge, the countess operated a small ferryboat to supply a bare living. Even in London, where they have been living, their condition has not improved materially.

In Hungary, where the reactionary enemies of the Karolyis are still in power, a well-organized campaign of slander, financed by the government, was recently undertaken against Countess Catherine. A reactionary member of the Hungarian Parliament "discovered" the alleged diary of the Countess. It was given wide publicity, although it developed subsequently that its entries were copied from an obscene novel. Fortunately this maneuver had the opposite effect from the one intended. A spontaneous popular demonstration took place in behalf of Countess Karolyi, and six workers of the Debreczen tobacco factory, poor girls themselves, retained a lawyer to vindicate her honor and to prove that the alleged diary had been forged. It was proved, and the six tobacco workers were swamped with presents from anonymous donors all over Hungary.

Countess Karolyi has come to America with a message of peace, but the Hungarian Government is quite naturally afraid to have her story heard. They succeeded at first in inducing America's consular representative in London to refuse her a visa. The consul was made to believe that she intended to propagate "bolshevism" in the United States. Finally Countess Karolyi's American friends intervened and the visa was granted. Even the more recent efforts of Mr. S. Stanwood Menken and his National Security League to have her deported as a Red upon her arrival in New York have been laughed into thin air. America is ready to hear the message of this countess who is also a pacifist and a democrat.

The Point of the Election

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THESE words are written before the election. One thing, though, is sure—one supreme thing. The point of this election will be in the vote for La Follette in the industrial region between Chicago and Boston. That is the only new point. Or, to put it more accurately, it is the only new point in the contribution made by this election to the history of radical departures in America. Never before has the eastern industrial region given any notable support to a western agrarian presidential candidate.

It is just to call La Follette a western agrarian presidential candidate. He certainly comes from the West; and the base of his strength in his State has been among its farmers; and his this year's platform owes little, if anything at all, to ideas not natively current among the western Greenbackers and Anti-Monopolists and Populists of the thirty years succeeding the Civil War.

This statement is not meant as any reflection upon La Follette or as a compliment to the Greenbackers, Anti-Monopolists, and Populists. It is meant as, and it is, only a neutral statement of sheer historical fact.

The further fact is that in spite of the labors of Professor Turner of Wisconsin and Harvard universities a most inadequate degree of justice is done by almost all political observers and narrators to the radical and even revolutionary character and career of the American farmer. It was he, in the valleys of the Alleghenies, that gave to Thomas Jefferson his decisive backing for the overthrow of primogeniture, of the established church, and of other "special privileges" of the capitalistic coast. It was he, in the valleys and plains beyond the Alleghenies, that gave to Andrew Jackson his decisive backing for the overthrow of the United States Bank and its capitalistic Philadelphia and New York supporters. It was he, on the prairies of the Northwest, that gave to Abraham Lincoln his decisive backing for the overthrow of slavery. It was he, in his Granges, that first gave us regulation of railroads. It is he today that has laid the hand of governmental regulation upon grain exchanges and stockyards. It is he today that out of the last flare of the subsiding American frontier gives us Robert Marion La Follette.

We have had, in a sense, no geographical western American frontier since 1890. By that time the tide of settlement from the Atlantic Coast and the tide of settlement from the Pacific Coast had pretty well met and flowed over the previously unoccupied frontier land.

The frontier political spirit, however, survived. It has continued to give us the mass of our governmental innovations, all the way from purely political ones like direct primaries to economic political ones like graduated income taxes. The eastern States, brimming with wage-earners, have given little effective originating support to these innovations. They have given little support at the polls to the candidates of indigenous American radicalism.

When James B. Weaver of Iowa, who was to his age what La Follette is to this age, ran for President on the Greenback ticket in 1880 he had a platform plank extremely favorable to labor; but he polled less than half as many votes in New York State as in Texas. Running again in 1892 as the presidential candidate of the Populist Party, with a platform again sympathetic to labor and again containing quite a few ideas subsequently translated into legislative fact, he polled in New York State only one-sixth as many votes as in Texas and one-tenth as many as in Kansas.

New York State never gave to any radical "new party" candidate any appreciable number of votes till there had appeared in this country, and had been politically organized in it, the imported radicalism of Karl Marx. Weaver in 1892 polled in New York State just 16,429 votes. Debs in 1920, as the candidate of socialism, polled in New York State 203,201 votes. He did this while most of the leaders of regular trade-unions were actively hostile to him and to his creed. Yet he did it; and he was to eastern proletarian radicalism what Weaver was to western agrarian radicalism.

This year Weaver and Debs melt into La Follette. They melt into him with the added ingredients and flavors of Warren S. Stone and Samuel Gompers.

The vote for La Follette west of Chicago will be—in a sense—an old, old story. It will be one more page in the book which started with the writings of those inland characters, Jefferson and Jackson, against the money lenders of the Atlantic seaboard. Let the reader, however, take his pencil and jot down the returns of the votes given to La Follette in the cities and in the manufacturing and mining towns and villages from the southern tip of Lake Michigan to the northern edge of Boston Bay. Or, roughly, let him take the total La Follette showing in the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts.

If it is really large, then the reader may with absolute historical truth say to himself:

"I witness an epochal novelty. I witness the capitulation in America of Karl Marx to Jefferson and Jackson; and, along with that capitulation, and in size eclipsing it, I witness in any case the first successful effort by western American agrarian radicalism since the Civil War to provide itself with eastern wage-earning allies."

The reader may further with absolute historical truth say to himself:

"American radicalism—the really decisively innovating part of it—from its home in the frontier part of Virginia under Jefferson retreated under Jackson to Tennessee and under the Populists to a headquarters in Kansas; and then, with Kansas cooled off, it retreated into the Northwest. There La Follette, out of its antique principles, has developed modernistic applications for it and has given it its last truculently surviving citadel. Out of that citadel he now, in an industrializing age, reaches back into eastern mines and mills and shops to transmit to them—perhaps—the innovating activity which in this country, in fact, has arisen decisively among us only from the frontier farm. That is the point of this election. That is the place of La Follette in American history."

The Wise

By COUNTEE P. CULLEN

Dead men are wisest, for they know
How far the roots of flowers go,
How long a seed must rot to grow.

Dead men alone bear frost and rain
On throbless heart and heartless brain,
And feel no stir of joy or pain.

Dead men alone are satiate;
They sleep and dream and have no weight,
To curb their rest, of love or hate.

Strange, men should flee their company,
Or think me strange who long to be Wrapped in their cool immunity.

In the Driftway

NOW that the election is over and the ballyhoo is stilled for a time, the Drifter feels free to go about his own more important businesses, not the least pressing of which is his Bill for the Elimination of Hotel Clerks. The Drifter's own invention to take their place consists of a handsome metal keyboard on which a key for each room is hung; the keys will be in three colors: white for the most expensive rooms, blue for those of a more moderate price, red for the least and lowest. If a key is on its hook, it signifies that the room may be rented; no more will guests have to return their keys to the desk on leaving the hotel for fifteen minutes, in order that the clerk may satisfy an entirely unnecessary curiosity as to whether or not the room is occupied. The advantages of this method are obvious: the Drifter will rush to the keyboard, snatch a red key and mount to his room, feeling himself still an honorable and reasonably respected member of the human race.

* * * * *

AS things now are, when he approaches a hotel desk, a young man, patently able to buy out the hotel and give it away the same day, advances with a kindly smile and sweeps the registry book to the Drifter's hand. "A room, sir," he asks brightly, "or perhaps a suite? We can take care of you very nicely in number forty-two, bedroom, sitting-room, bath. Boy, take the gentleman's bag." The Drifter grasps his bag firmly, refusing to relinquish it to the obliging boy; he takes a long breath, straightens his collar with his free hand, clears his throat. Already a cloud is passing over the face of the opulent young man. "I don't care for a suite," mumbles the frightened victim; "I'm staying only a short time. Something quite small will do—without a bath." This last he adds timidly and in an almost inaudible voice. But the clerk is far from inaudible. "We have no rooms without baths," he announces loudly, clearly, coldly. Passing guests look at the Drifter and do not trouble to hide a smile; they have only just escaped themselves. A telegraph boy sniffs; the maître d'hôtel, passing to the dining room, raises his eyebrows and coughs behind his hand. By this time the Drifter is reduced to ashes and water. "Any room will do," he says in desperation, and clutches at the key passed out to him with an icy stare. He does not ask the price; he would not dare. He enters the elevator feeling like a criminal on his way to prison for life.

* * * * *

FROM hints dropped by friends, he gathers that he is not alone in his cowardice. One man assured the Drifter that he frequently spent a good ten hours planning his approach to the hotel desk. He would, so he planned, advance briskly, fix the clerk with a severe eye, and in a firm, confident voice say: "I want a small, cheap room. If you have one for two dollars, give it to me." But of course this never happened. Always his determination oozed out through his shoes at the first gleam from the dazzling smile of welcome. There are, of course, other creatures who should go forever with the clerk. Waiters in large restaurants could well be spared, taxi drivers who growl at the size of their tip, vendors of neckties and shirts who are inconsolably hurt to find that their customer wants something less than the most costly. These, however, the Drifter usually manages to avoid. He eats in a place where self-service is the rule; he walks; he wears last year's clothes, unfortunately a process which cannot go on forever. But the hotel clerk cannot be avoided, and he has the same nature in Zanesville, Ohio, as in New York's largest and most princely hostelry. He is incontrovertible proof of the decline of civilization; where once Mine Host himself hastened out to greet the weary traveler, personally superintended the serving of his dinner, and with his own candle conducted him to his room, we now have the Haughty Hotel Clerk, denying even civility to honest poverty and deriding those persons who are, in any other situation, considered upright and decent. The Drifter does not anticipate any difficulty in the passage of his bill.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

An Incoming-Tax on These Foreigners

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Here is an important communication from my friend Smith of Rotaryville, Ohio, who recently returned from Europe on the same ship with me. He has asked me to read it and then forward it to you in the interest of sound Americanism.

HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

Westport, Connecticut, October 12

SIR: Perhaps Sinclair Lewis (whose real name, so I am told, is Sidney Lewisohn) may think that he has been very funny when he wrote that interview with Mr. George Babbitt, but I can't see it. To me it seems good sound common sense and I know of what I speak, for I have just come back from Europe myself and I can agree with everything Mr. Babbitt said.

But that is beside the point. I am the editor of one of the largest dry-goods house-organs printed west of the Mississippi. Perhaps we are not exactly what you would call "highbrow" but we have a circulation of 200,000 copies a month and that is more than some of the so-called organs of "liberal thought" can say.

Well, the wife and I came off the boat and had to pay all sorts of duties because we had bought a few things in Paris. Now, I am not kicking. I know it costs the U. S. A. a lot of money to maintain an adequate army and navy and I'd just as soon pay my money right at the gate as afterwards in the form of taxes as they do in old Europe. But what got me sore was the idea that our tariff is so unevenly distributed. If my wife is obliged to pay out good money for a bit of Belgian lace or a little Paris gown, why should other foreign products go in without paying a cent? I refer, as you have undoubtedly guessed, to the foreign "authors" who seem to have got a monopoly on our literary market.

There is Heinrich Mencken, who hates the United States, and Josef Hergesheimer, who writes about Cuba, and Eduard Bok and Juan dos Passos and Theodor Dreiser and that Swede Andersen. There is an Italian whose name escapes me just now who is allowed to write every day in the Evening Post and there is that Turk, Achmed Abdullah, who has no business in a Christian nation anyway. The same is true of "Konrad Bercovici," which is said to be a nom de plume for a beautiful Gypsy girl who stabbed herself several years ago for the sake of her lover, and there is Karl van Vechten, with his un-American love for cats, and there is the "Van Doren Literary Trust"—a whole family of performing Dutchmen who dictate to us what we shall read and what not, and there is Hugh Lofting, whose Dr. Dolittle is merely a thinly veiled bit of propaganda for the Prince of Wales, and there is Deems Taylor (whose real name, so I am creditably told, was Dominik Schneidermeister), and there is that fellow van Loon, whose cheap theories about "evolution" have literally made him millions of dollars, and there are a score of others—foreigners all, whether naturalized or not—who exploit our country, debauch our children, and force our women to read their radical ideas, and all for the sake of our American gold.

This may be a joke to your Mr. Lewis, but we out here in the West feel differently about it.

If I am made to pay 80 per cent on a pair of English trousers, and 90 per cent on an imported Edam cheese, why shouldn't the Government place an adequate tariff on those foreigners who merely compete with our home talent and can work cheaper because they do not have to live up to the American standard? The same goes for musicians and painters and opera singers and all the other dancing-masters who come to our shores to fill their pockets with our dollars.

I once talked about this with one of our leading educators, himself of German descent, and therefore biased. "It is a great pity," he answered, "but as long as those fellows can write and sing and fiddle and dance and compose better than we do, I suppose there is little hope." I think that that fellow was wrong. We can better do without this foreign invasion than expose our country to their unfair competition. Meanwhile, until we have caught up with Europe in those useless arts (for which unfortunately there seems to be such a great demand) why not put a great big fat incoming-tax on every writer and artist who drags his foreign name across our boundary? A flat rate of 100 per cent on his net earnings would be a good beginning.

Sign the Opium Petition!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The array of illustrious names from India which you published last week in support of the White Cross petition against narcotics was a veritable Southern constellation—Mahatma Gandhi; the poet and philosopher Tagore; K. T. Paul, native leader of the All-Indian Christian Council; Chatterjee, the publicist and editor; the missionary C. F. Andrews, who is the most influential Englishman in India; and others who are laboring in the field of Indian education. These names show how ill-informed are those who declare that India sees nothing wrong in opium.

We used to hear the same about China, how the country "would rise in insurrection" if opium were taken away, "the streets would run with blood," "peaceful settlements would be turned into hell"; whereas when the Chinese got the chance to break their slavery they celebrated the day with banners and music, processions and gala festivities, and old smokers burnt their pipes for thank offerings in stacks as high as the houses.

This remarkable Indian expression is to be presented to the International Narcotics Conference at Geneva by the president of the White Cross in person, together with thousands of other names, as a visible expression of world conviction. If readers of The Nation who have not had the opportunity of signing the petition will send their names to William K. McKibben, secretary of the White Cross, care Hotel Belmont, New York City, they will be forwarded to the International Opium Conference provided this is done immediately. Sessions of the conference begin this month.

New York, November 1 William K. McKibben

Feminists Must Fight

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In a recent issue of The Nation there appeared, under the title A Women's Bloc? a thoughtful and yet I believe somewhat confused criticism of the election policy of the National Woman's Party. That policy had been announced as an effort "to elect all women nominees, irrespective of their political affiliations, who seem qualified to sit in Congress and who will support the Equal Rights Amendment and a general feminist program." Your writer held that this was good publicity but bad politics, that while it was possible to hold women as a disfranchised group together in a fight for the single issue of their enfranchisement, across party lines and irrespective of economic and class interest, such tactics were no longer possible. Now that women were voters economic and class interests would prove stronger than sex interests. "There are other revolutions going on in the world besides the women's revolution."

"For every party job," the writer concedes, "for every political office, for every legal change in the direction of equality, women will have to fight as women. But the lines will be drawn inside party lines, not across them. Inside the party organizations the women will have to wage their own battle for recognition and equal rights."

At this point some very careful thinking must be done. It is probably true that the battle for "recognition," political and official, will have to be fought inside party lines. If women want to be in politics they must be politicians, they must choose their party and play the political game from the ground up. But it seems to me most emphatically not true that the battle for "equal rights" must be fought within party lines. It can never be won there. It must be fought and it will be fought by a free-handed, nonpartisan minority of energetic feminists to whom politics in general, even "reform" politics, will continue to be a matter of indifference so long as women are classed with children and minors in industrial legislation, so long as even in our most advanced States a woman can be penalized by the loss of her job when she marries.

If I am right about this distinction, then perhaps it is unfortunate that the National Woman's Party has undertaken for the moment a double role. But the principle of the Equal Rights Amendment is supremely important. The very passion with which it is opposed suggests that it is vital. To blot out of every law book in the land, to sweep out of every dusty court-room, to erase from every judge's mind that centuries-old precedent as to woman's inferiority and dependence and need for protection, to substitute for it at one blow the simple new precedent of equality, that is a fight worth making if it takes ten years.

And I expect to see the writer of your editorial, who is I am sure a feminist, backing the National Woman's Party in this fight long before the time is up.

New York, October 30 Crystal Eastman

The editors of The Nation wish to give their hearty thanks to those who have contributed to the La-Follette-Wheeler campaign fund. A total of $7,243.74 was received.

Books

First Glance

"MARK TWAIN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY" (two volumes, Harper: $10) will be disappointing to anyone who expected a consecutive or otherwise ordered account of Mark Twain's life. How much order anyone had a right to expect from the mind of this man is a question; but the fact remains that the book as it now appears is a jumble of things some of which are consequential and some of which are not. Mark Twain was obsessed for years with the idea that autobiography is an impossible art, and he only gradually evolved what he called a method, which was to "start at no particular time of your life; wander at your free will all over your life; talk only about the things which interest you for the moment; drop it the moment its interest threatens to pale, and turn your talk upon the new and more interesting thing that has intruded itself into your mind meantime." Even then the mass of the writer will remain hidden—"it and its volcanic fires that toss and boil, and never rest, night nor day. These are his life, and they are not written, and cannot be written." Add to this confession the circumstance that the book was written or dictated over a period of almost forty years in places as different from one another as Vienna, Florence, Fifth Avenue, New Hampshire, and Connecticut, and not very much will be looked for in the way of consistency either of tone or of material. Unpublished articles and other scraps on hand were shoveled in to make the manuscript "complete." The sections were arranged in the order of their composition, not in the order of the events related. Fifty of the seven hundred pages deal with the marketing of General Grant's "Memoirs"; thirty are given to a description of the Florentine villa in which Mark Twain was living in 1904; the rest are covered with whatever reflections or reminiscences occcurred to the author on the day he composed. Strictly speaking, "Huckleberry Finn" is better as autobiography than this, for at least it is complete within its limits, and limits were good for Mark Twain. The present volumes do not even reproduce all of the available manuscript; Albert Bigelow Paine's introduction hints of a third volume yet to come.

Neither are the disclosures of Mark Twain's private opinions as stirring as the public was induced to hope. The book was to be a voice "from the grave," yet no one will shudder upon reading it. Certain very pessimistic passages about human nature have been anticipated in earlier posthumous works if not in "The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg"; and the few outbreaks here against obscure individuals of Mark Twain's acquaintance attain no new height of rage. The bitter criticisms of Theodore Roosevelt, General Wood, and General Funston are, to be sure, very welcome, being just; but any reader will say that they would have been ten times more important, because ten times more useful, if they had been published when they were timely. No explanation of their author's curious ideas as to the impossibility of being frank in this world will explain their failure now to be impressive.

But the "Autobiography," shapeless and disappointing as it is, must still be called a great book. Perhaps by very reason of its imperfections it reveals, in the plainest and most naked way, the quality of Mark Twain's literary sinew. Unclothed, his genius seeks the company of Fielding, Shakespeare, and Rabelais, and is accepted there. He shares with those men their vast riches in the mine that is so indispensable to a writer of the first rank, the mine of eloquence. This is shown here not only in numerous paragraphs and pages which mount to the top pitch of expression, not only in eulogies and diatribes which sweep the reader from his bearings, but more convincingly yet in the evidence everywhere that Mark Twain's interest in the arts of language was unbounded. He is always coming back to language—now analyzing the oratory of his various friends, now professing an enormous relish for profanity in all its forms, now making game of the German tongue, now slipping into a disquisition upon grammar and the literary rules, now seeking to establish that newspaper English is the best English in the long run, now letting himself go on the subject of narrative style. A quotation bearing upon the last point will both reveal his theory and prove his gift:

> With the pen in one's hand, narrative is a difficult art; narrative should flow as flows the brook . . . a brook that never goes straight for a minute, but goes, and goes briskly, sometimes ungrammatically, and sometimes fetching a horseshoe three-quarters of a mile around, and at the end of the circuit flowing within a yard of the path it traversed an hour before; but always going, and always following at least one law, always loyal to that law, the law of narrative, which has no law. Nothing to do but make the trip; the how of it is not important, so that the trip is made.

This is first-rate writing, or perhaps it should be said first-rate talk. For it has been pointed out that Mark Twain's language at its most powerful moments is the language of passionate and impetuous speech; significantly enough the section of the "Autobiography" which was written at Vienna is indistinguishable in manner from the section dictated at Florence. More than he ever was aware, no doubt, Mark Twain was concerned with the art of writing without art, and it is conceivable that critics of his books a century hence will be more concerned as to how he made his long, triumphal trip than as to the obvious fact that he made it.

MARK VAN DOREN

A New Genre

Mark Only. By T. F. Powys. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE Cranford myth consists in the belief that the English countryside is politically a charming hangover from the manorial system, aesthetically a well-arranged geometrical pattern of clipped hedge-rows, and socially a region largely inhabited by two classes: well-mannered Oxfordian curates with a lovable mania for tea, and quaint rustics who dance on the village green, raise caps to the squire, and drink their four-ale, all in the most approved genre manner. On the surface Mr. Powys may appear merely as the leveller of a lance against this Cranford myth, one of the prosaic band of "uncompromising realists" who are at present engaged in inaugurating a new controversy. His three books of fiction, "The Left Leg," "Black Bryony," and now "Mark Only," present pictures of life as it is lived in the south and west of modern England. Mr. Powys, ruthless, Dante-visioned, bitter with the agony of long and continuous contact with the environment he describes, strips this life of every possible idyllic association. We arise from these novels of the most exquisite realism with a vision of the mutilated corpse of the gentle Mrs. Gaskell, who saw life steadily but saw it over the rim of a teacup.

Those, however, who have read Mr. Powys's early book of confession, "The Soliloquies of a Hermit," and who have patiently endeavored to define for themselves the rare, if bitter, savor of his novels, are convinced that he is more than a crusader against sentimentality. It is true that in "Mark Only" the hero Mark Andrews is technically a moron, the villain Tulk a despicable satyr of the most fiendish type, and the other characters either wandering in their wits or mudded with brutality. It is true that the story itself is a compound of every horror-inspiring melodramatic device known to the hack of fifty years ago. It is true that a bestial passion creeps through the pages of the story like a dirty white fog, compelling our nostrils to an involuntary quiver. Granted—Mr. Powys is not for the weak-stomached. He may very well be presenting a faithful, if revolting, portrait of country life; or he may not be. He overdraws at times, being given more particularly in "Mark Only" to piling horror upon horror with the persistence of a Sophocles.

But all this does not so much matter—the importance of Mr. Powys is that his concern is with deeper things than mere truth to externals. What, for example, is the aesthetic problem that he has so successfully solved?

The people in Mr. Powys's world move so slowly that they seem to compose an almost static society. Their lives are so intensely primitive and simple that the intrusion of drama into them seems an impossibility. They are all governed by one or two elementary desires, or rather obsessions—the poor halfwit Mark by a half-realized desire to keep his life running or creeping in the old channels familiar to him, the lame Tulk by an uncomplicated lust for power over his immediate fellow-creatures, Emmie the little servant by a tragic and childlike sexual curiosity that masters her like a Greek Fate, Mr. Beggwell, prosperous farmer, by an overweening pride in the enormity of his prize mangelwurzels, and so on. The minds of these people stir like the thick mud at the bottom of a stagnant pond; it is as if they were being put through their paces by the operation of a slow-motion camera. Nothing surprises them. The flame of life has burned so low that they are the most passive of receptacles for the most limited of experiences. They do not seem organic; they are the agents through which operates a continual and relentless process of petrifaction. They live in a worn world; their environment is sessile. So quiescent are they, so slow in reaction, that it seems impossible to find any conflict among them—and narrative is born of conflict.

Mr. Powys in describing this negatively accelerated universe with sympathy and power has performed an amazing technical feat. He has synchronized the volatile motions of his brain with the unbelievably impeded tempo of the village of Dodderdown. His style is carefully graduated so as to approach monotony but never quite reach it. It is one of stark simplicity where the lacunae of human speech count for more than the words themselves, where omission lights up emotion. He wastes little time in reflection, none in characterization. He stamps his characters with the decision and accuracy of a minting machine: "Mr. Thomas had a wife who was in ill-health and made the most of it." Never is there the slightest concession to fine writing, although the flame of a twisted and tender beauty flickers through these pages. Mr. Powys, in short, has presented an organic picture of an almost static society. He is a splendid example of the adaptation of the artist to his material. And it must not be thought that his people are dull. They are fascinating. We enter into their squalid but intensely poignant lives as if we were making an excursion into the mind of primitive man. Kinship we cannot feel, but the Balboan thrill of discovery is ours. Mr. Powys has described, it may be invented, a new world where Mr. Peach and Mr. Tolly discourse of the soul "which do be a hedgehog," where old Mrs. Andrews, patting her thin and greasy hair, gibbers the story of a tragic girlhood, where Mr. Hayball the parson escapes unwitting from the life around him by indulging a queer antiquarian taste for rainfall statistics. Mr. Powys has invented a new genre—the tragi-comedy of rustic life seen by one as over-sensitive to ugliness as the flayed Marsyas was to pain. CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Tartar History

A Thousand Years of the Tartars. By E. H. Parker. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THERE are many uncharted regions in the national history of the Tartars. For a time one of the most powerful peoples of Asia, they crowned the long row of their successes, which they had achieved in their native territory, by subjugating a considerable part of Europe. This climax of their military achievements was at the same time the beginning of the decay of their power. They were too sparsely settled on that immense territory which spread from Kamchatka almost to the Atlantic coast of the Eurasiatic continent to enable their leaders, however powerful they might have been, to preserve their authority over the unruly tribes whom they had conquered.

Mr. Parker was among the first who went back to Chinese sources in an effort to explore the early history of the Tartars and to gather information on their racial origin. In the present volume he describes the events of importance in the life of the tribes which are commonly designated as Tartars from the second century before the Christian era until the death of Tashih in 1136. Strictly speaking, therefore, the book gives more than it promises in its title. Apparently the author was of the opinion that the period described by him was a complete chapter which, considered as a whole, would permit students of Tartar history better to understand its further developments and the subsequent spectacular role which the Tartars played in Europe under Bathu Khan. Moreover, the nature of the material which was placed at his disposal by a chief judge of Shanghai—and which was limited to Chinese sources—made him select as the topic of his book that part of the history of the Tartars in which their orientation was toward China.

One of Mr. Parker's discoveries is that the Hiung-nu, Scythians, Huns, and Turks trace their ancestry to the same root. In the "empires" which the Tartars set up these branches of the same race alternated with one another, permitting a further intermixture of the different racial elements. It was the Tartars, according to Mr. Parker, who imported early Buddhism into China. Contrary to the formerly current opinion that the moral code of early Buddhism found its way to China through Tibet, the author insists that it was mainly through the Punjab and the Pamir that the new religion took its way. Mr. Parker reminds the reader that modern Chinese is derived to a considerable extent from the Tartar language. If one bears in mind that in that period of Chinese-Tartar history which the author describes Tartars and Chinese fought for the hegemony around and inside the Chinese walls, and that their struggle resulted in a more or less periodical alternation of rulers in Northern China and Tartary between members of both peoples, the great importance of Tartaric in the evolution of the Chinese language can be better appreciated.

Mr. Parker has given a powerful impetus to a further study of Tartar history and ethnology by making accessible contemporary Chinese sources. As might have been expected, his side of the narrative presents chiefly the Chinese attitude toward the Tartars. Today there are living about three million Tartars scattered over European and Asiatic Russia. The story of their origin is one of the most interesting chapters in human history. It is to be hoped, now that one aspect of their ancestry has been taken care of by Mr. Parker, that their relation to the Turks, Scythians, Huns—with whom, it is argued, they are in many respects identical—will be as elaborately and as interestingly treated. EMIL LENGYEL

An Englishman to Excess

Contemporary Criticisms of Dr. Samuel Johnson, His Works, and His Biographers. Collected and Edited by John Ker Spittal. E. P. Dutton & Company. $6.

TO discover and publish what the reviewers of one of the major magazines of his time had to say about Samuel Johnson and his writings, and to collect, also, their comments upon the books that were published about him, has been Mr. Spittal's purpose. The result is a valuable addition to existing Johnsoniana. It is fortunate that Mr. Spittal was able to know Johnson's own opinion of the source chosen, for Johnson remarked to George III that the Monthly Review was the most carefully written of the magazines then appearing, although its principles on religion were not above question. What the reservation signifies is very apparent to Johnsonians.

Not the least striking fact brought to light is that the vast superiority of Boswell's "Life" was immediately recognized and hailed, and that there was no question in the mind of a contemporary reviewer that Johnson deserved so meticulous a record. It is unwise to generalize from the views of so partial a writer, but there is no trace here of that sneering depreciation of Boswell's genius that Macaulay made the fashion but which under the blows of Mr. Tinker is passing. Concerning Boswell's qualifications for his task it was remarked: "Among the literati of the present age, and particularly those who were intimately conversant with Dr. Johnson, we know of none better qualified, from a personal acquaintance with the hero of the story, than is Mr. B. for a complete execution of the task which he had imposed on himself, in writing the life of this extraordinary man."

The general lineaments of Johnson emerge from the ordeal by criticism not at all changed from those which are familiar. Mr. Tinker lately devoted an essay to discouraging the idea that Johnson was a dictator to all literary London of his day. No review here of his critical writings fails to note his biases and prejudices as vitiating the value of his dicta, and there is frequent complaint that some of the prejudices verge on childishness. But a clear appreciation of his defects does not exclude an equally clear appreciation of his merits. In the whole range of his writing he was greeted with serious attention. Not in all respects was it granted that he had supreme facility; as a moralist, not as a literary man, he was praised in greatest measure. The tragedy "Irene" was little valued as a stage drama, but the sentiments were applauded. The heaviness and pomposity of his style was pointed out, and one reviewer approvingly quoted a stylistic comparison of Johnson and Addison which favored the latter. The hardest censure fell upon the political pamphlets. The reviewer of "Taxation No Tyranny" was of the opinion that Johnson's "present performance will yield no considerable addition to his credit, either as a writer or as an honest, independent friend of his country. . . ."

Some of the selections of course are more interesting than others, and some are so dull as almost to defy reading. Incidentally they offer a commentary on the eighteenth-century manner of reviewing. The notice of Boswell's "Life" extended over three issues of the "Review" and covers thirty-five pages in this reprint. That Johnson's absurdities were constantly noticed and sometimes deprecated has been indicated, but much of the interest in Johnson arises out of them and Boswell's biography is the great source of examples. Johnson without Boswell would be nothing, and even with Boswell what would he be if he was not, as Boswell remarked in regard to his prejudice against the Scotch, "to some degree of excess a true-born Englishman"? Something of this was realized by his contemporaries, for they in a measure perceived that it was as a man that Johnson was to go down to posterity.

C. Hartley Grattan

A Religious Pollyanna

Why I Am a Christian. By Dr. Frank Crane. Wise and Company.

"WHY I AM A CHRISTIAN" achieves the distinction of being "modern" and yet probably acceptable—in small doses as put up by the doctor—to almost every Rotary Club. Any syndicate writer or popular magazine editor will tell you that such achievement spells success.

Dr. Crane has given us such a book as Pollyanna might have written after a short course in William James's pragmatism and a shorter and somewhat critical course in Tolstoi's non-violent ethics—always assuming that Pollyanna could have mastered Dr. Crane's readable newspaper style.

An extended review of the book would involve a careful consideration of the adequacy of popular pragmatism as a philosophical defense of religion in general and Christianity in particular—a subject on which the present reviewer is skeptical.

Dr. Crane reduces the matter to its lowest terms: "I am a Christian, not because I know the Christ story is true but because it produces its beneficial effect upon me when I act as if it were true." But he nowhere satisfactorily explains what the Christ-story is which he thus believes or just what—beyond a general decency of life—is meant by acting as if the story were true.

For the rest, Dr. Crane believes in God, human nature, and himself. Difficulties in the way of his simple faith are easily disregarded. The tone of the book is fairly indicated by a paragraph like this: "The world God said He loved was not a Christian world. All its people were just plain ordinary human beings; God loved them and thought they had sense enough to understand what He told them. So do I."

The significance of such a book is that it popularizes the modern version of Christianity—a Christianity so different from the historic Christianity of the church in its philosophy and creeds as to be almost a new religion. In this attempt Dr. Crane's happy way of stating platitudes and his skill in steering his bark away from the swirling deeps of human experience may be useful.

Most assuredly the record of his religious life will not go down to posterity along with Augustine's or Bunyan's or Pascal's or Newman's or John Woolman's. But then the late editor of the American Magazine might not have asked them to write such a book. He did ask Dr. Frank Crane. And that is a testimonial no critical reviewer can gainsay.

Norman Thomas

"H. D."

Heliodora and Other Poems. By H. D. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.50.

QUARRELS about free and formal verse seem singularly irrelevant in the presence of these magnificent poems. H. D. writes with indiscriminate perfection. She uses the freer rhythms with flawless art and the more formal meters with skilful and spontaneous rapture. It is futile, too, after reading these poems, to argue the distinction between poets whose hypnosis lies in music and those in whom images are the charm. Her lines sing always, and her phrases break constantly into images so vivid that they fairly hurt with beauty. It would be absurdest of all to talk of classicism and romanticism. Here is passion patterned to the serenity of form, and form so sinuous, sensitive, and fluent that it seems the native ungarlanded language of passion itself. H. D. is, in short, a poet of the first water, and it would be stupidity on the critic's part to try to classify her. The most that one can hope to do is to indicate some of her special beauties, and to define the special flame that sings in this small fine book.

H. D. is, in the first place, what I suppose might be called a thoroughly Greek spirit. By that I do not mean simply that her themes are Greek, as many of them are. That no more constitutes her a Greek than owning a library turns a man into a man of letters. Nor is she Greek in the eighteenth-century sense of faded calm. She is Greek in simplicity and directness, and Greek, too, in the terrible rapture out of which these are distilled. She is a poet in her own right whose imagination happens to have been fired by Greek legends and whose art gives fire to the favorite Greek themes of Helen and song, love, wine, and the salt sea.

If any unique quality of her verse demands pointing out, it is the urgent persistency of its music. Below the carefully modulated rise and fall of the phrases there is a surging undertone which sings itself steadily through whole stanzas or whole poems. "What is this secret of sound?" one asks, "and how does she manage this subtle music?" Some of the external mechanics are obvious, but the secret, I suppose, will always be her own. It is an unteachable cadence, the voice of a clear mind and uncorrupted ecstacy. Sometimes the device is very simple, the repetition of a phrase or the chant-like reiteration of a word:

> Better the wind, the sea, the salt in your eyes, > than this, this, this.

Sometimes the wave of the music is secured by the skilful unexpected ring of a rhyme, a barely perceptible assonance:

> All Greece hates
> the still eyes in the white face, > the luster as of olives
> where she stands > and the white hands.

Heliodora, the title poem, is pure magic of sound, of visual loveliness, and of an almost stinging passion. It is the dramatic conversation of two friends debating the perfect epithet for the beauty of a girl. Included is a translation from two epigrams of Meleager:

> He said:
> "I will make her a wreath,"
> he said,
> "I will write it thus:
> I will bring you the lily that laughs,
> I will twine,
> with soft narcissus the myrtle,
> sweet crocus, white violet,
> the purple hyacinth, and last,
> the rose, loved-of-love,
> that these may drip on your hair
> the less soft flowers, > may mingle sweet with the sweet > of Heliodora's locks, > myrrh-curled.

Certainly the surge and thunder of the Odyssey has never been more finely caught and wrought into English verse than in the beautiful translation of the opening lines. The Look-Out is recommended to those who wish an example of how agony can be poured into the mold of verse, how it may be pictured in beautiful postures and carried by coherent music. H. D.'s own lines in the introductory Wash of Cold River form the best commentary on her work:

> rare, of pure texture, > beautiful space and line,
> marble to grace,
> your inaccessible shrine.

IRWIN EDMAN

Books in Brief

Fundamentals of Social Psychology. By Emory S. Bogardus. The Century Company. $3.50.

This is a general account of the principal features of social behavior couched in rather traditional terminology. Very little use is made of the exact work of modern psychology or of the contribution which psycho-analysis has made touching the close relationships between the social environment of the individual and his behavior. Moreover, the author unfortunately mixes sociological and psychological concepts without discrimination. The classifications strike one as unduly academic and far too minute. But the book possesses excellent illustrative content. It deals with concrete matters of interest such as fashion, custom, public opinion, conflict, assimilation, and leadership. Falling midway between the more rigid treatises on psychology and sociology and the popular discussions of these topics so common today, it may prove of use not only to beginning students but to the lay reader as well.

More Obiter Dicta. By Augustine Birrell. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.25.

Mr. Augustine Birrell's writings always seem to suggest that their author is a gentleman. Perhaps that is why we in America have difficulty in taking Mr. Birrell seriously as a critic. He is always easy, unruffled, accomplished, unpedantic, and unprofessional in his manner. This new miscellany, the harvest of many years of literary journalism, is not different in quality from the first series of "Obiter Dicta" which appeared forty years ago; there is no "early," "middle," and "later" Birrell for us to cope with. Obviously, Mr. Birrell is not warmly contemporaneous. It is rather his pleasure to recount his adventures among the lesser masterpieces and his tramps on the lower slopes of Parnassus.

The Diary of a Country Parson: The Reverend James Woodforde. 1758-1781. Edited by John Beresford. Oxford University Press. $4.20.

A classic of the commonplace. The hero was as undistinguished as he is unknown, yet he set everything down, even to the last penny he paid for his servants' port. Pepys without a sparkle.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

An Accomplished Actress

"L'AIGLON," the play, would hardly be worth discussing at so late a date were it not for the fact that the badness of the piece encourages the badness of Madame Simone's acting and plays into the hands of her most cherished defects. From this story of Napoleon's son, a hopeless weakling who, dreaming of conquest, gets no further than a white uniform and an old cocked hat, a master psychologist might possibly extract some meaning; but even he would have at best a sorry theme and be compelled to deal, not merely with a failure, but with a failure essentially mean. If he found, as Rostand found, his central figure pathetic, he would have to ask our tears in behalf of a self-pitying cipher who felt himself wronged because denied the opportunity of amusing himself with bloodshed and cannon; our psychologist would probably find his pathos verging toward satire as he realized how fortunate it was for the world that it was spared a Napoleon without genius.

Rostand, however, bourgeois to the core and loving rhetoric as only a man incapable of poetry can love it, has never been accused by even his admirers of being a master psychologist and he is never in danger of looking deeply enough into his theme even to perceive its defects. His situations like his images are palpably false and so completely external that they manage to escape criticism from himself or others. When, for example, the Duke enters the court he enters at the very moment when one of the ladies is reading aloud a passage which seems to refer to the situation in which he finds himself; such fortuitous occurrences constitute nearly all the supposed "moments" of the play. At the appropriate instant the bodyguard dresses himself in Napoleonic uniform, wooden soldiers in semblance of the grande armée appear upon the table, or L'Aiglon himself treads accidentally upon a cockade. Such, in the mind of the author, are the labored puerilities which constitute the art of dramatic writing.

The method of Madame Simone is the one perfectly adapted to such inanities. She is what is sometimes called an accomplished actress, and by that is meant that she has learned a series of gestures, vocal and manual, much as the bright infant accustomed to annoy his parent's guests has learned them; and at the appropriate times she trots them out. Doubtless they are all classified in her mind for purposes of ready reference, so that when she studies a role she merely dresses it up with appropriate effects much as an expert costumer dresses a character from the stock on hand. With her, all is imposed from the outside; she would no more think of letting an inward emotion work itself out in a natural and purely individual gesture than an old-time stock manager would have thought of designing a new scene to fit the mood of a play. Just as he, looking over his stock, would select "an elegant drawing room" or "a road in the mountains," so she drags forth from the storage room "haughty disdain" or "sudden despair" as the occasion may demand. An actress working upon this method may, if her stock be large enough, be "accomplished"; but to those who expect to find life in the theater she is certainly dull.

Moreover, Madame Simone's performance, as she gives it at Henry Miller's Theater, is cheaper, even granting her method, than it needs to be. So obviously is the central character a weakling that the patriotic appeal of the play is somewhat mitigated, but Madame Simone, wishing no doubt to give the sad compatriots who come to see her as much comfort as possible, forgets sometimes that he is not even potentially a hero. Accordingly she rises a good deal higher in her declamation than the occasion calls for and she moves the critical auditor to remind her that the Duke is, even by the title of the play, merely an eaglet and not, as she seems sometimes to suggest, an eagle.

"Tiger Cats," another French play, is presented at the Belasco Theater with the somewhat oppressive opulence characteristic of its producer. It has the advantage of being more up to date in the style of its theatricality, but it is, like so many of the modern plays imported from Paris, glittering rather than profound or true. The theme is strikingly like that of the "Amoureuse" of Porto-Riche, but the story of the great man ensnared and destroyed by the sinister physical attractiveness of his wife is made the occasion of sensational scenes rather than of a serious study. Katherine Cornell and Robert Loraine, unlike Madame Simone, struggle against instead of yielding to the artificiality of their roles and do as much as could be done to make the play moving. At the National Theater Miss Florence Reed returns from the movies but brings a good deal of their spirit with her, and in "Ashes" suffers as only a movie mother can. Her play has, however, the modest virtue of being unassuming in its obviousness.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

The DEBATE of the Season!

SHOULD LITERATURE BE CENSORED?

JOHN S. SUMNER versus ERNEST BOYD

Sec. N. Y. Soc. for Sup. of Vice — Noted Int. Author and Critic

Chairman: CLIFFORD SMYTH, Editor, International Book Review

Temporary Chairman: John Farrar, Editor of The Bookman

SUBJECT

RESOLVED: That limitations upon the contents of books and magazines as defined in proposed legislation would be detrimental to the advancement of American literature.

MR. SUMNER, Negative MR. BOYD, Affirmative

THIS SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, AT 8:30 P. M.

TOWN HALL, 121 West 43rd Street

Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75. Box Seats $3.30

On sale at Box Office (Bryant 9447), Brentano's, Macy and Wanamaker Book Depts. and at the offices of or by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., New York (Tel. Longacre 10434)

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate, should send us their names.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

ETHEL BARRYMORE

in Pinero's famous drama,

"The Second Mrs. Tanqueray"

CORT Theatre, W. 48th St. Evenings at 8:20. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30.

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL

Course 4: American Literature. Five lectures by John Macy, formerly literary editor of The Nation. Thursdays 8:30 p. m., at 239 E. 14th St., beginning Nov. 13: "Poe, Whitman, and American Poetry." Fee $1.50.

Course 1. A History of Art. Illustrated. By Dr. Will Durant. Wednesdays 8:30 p. m., at Second Ave. Baptist Church, Second Ave. at 11th St. Sg. adm. 25c. Nov. 12: "Gothic Architecture."

Course 2. The Development of the Drama. By Dr. Will Durant. Sundays 5 p. m., 9 Second Avenue. Sg. adm. 25c. Nov. 9: "Shakespeare."

RAND SCHOOL

7 East 15th Street

Courses Beginning

Nov. 13, 7:00 P.M.....Scott Nearing "Current Opinion"

Nov. 14, 8:30 P.M.....Herman Epstein "With the Great Composers"

Nov. 15, 11:00 A. M. and 1:30 P. M., Scott Nearing "Dynamic Sociology" and "Current History"

Nov. 26, 8:30 P.M.....Johan Smertenko "Current Drama"

Sat., Nov. 8, 1:30 p. m.....Carleton Beals, "Mexico"

Sat., Nov. 15, 3:30 p. m...Vint Laughland, "Social Religion"

A Dinner for Nation Readers

Thursday, Nov. 13

Is America So Bad, After All?

Speakers—

Hendrik Van Loon
Author, "The Story of Mankind"

Glenn Frank
Editor, The Century

Chairman,
Lewis S. Gannett
Associate Editor, The Nation

Tickets $2.50
See page vii for details

International Relations Section

Scandinavia Moves to Disarm; France Takes Alarm

RECENT moves toward disarmament or reduction of armament in Sweden and Denmark have excited grave fears in France, where any move in that direction seems to be regarded as a threat to peace. The leading article in the Temps (Paris), the semi-official organ of the French Government, for October 11, consisted of the following illuminating comment on the Scandinavian proposals—casting light both on Scandinavia and on France:

There is a contemporary movement in the Scandinavian countries which deserves attention, for it is characteristic of a state of mind which, from a general point of view, is disturbing. The recent legislative elections in Sweden, indicating a distinct gain for the Left, and the incredible program of total disarmament which was revealed at the Assembly of the League and which has just been presented to the Danish Parliament by the Socialist Cabinet are two facts which should be stressed. Only the change in the conditions of existence and the overturn in social values can explain the developing current in these northern countries, where a high general level of culture and political maturity seemed to protect the masses from simple mistakes and risks of adventure. One wonders whether the immediate neighborhood of Russia and contact with the most active elements of the Soviet regime have not had a moral influence upon the Scandinavian countries the effect of which is only now becoming obvious, giving birth to the most dangerous illusions in these nations noted for their judgment and common sense.

The military question played a prominent part in the electoral campaign in Sweden, where the Conservative Ministry led by Mr. Trygger had been governing with the support of the Liberals. The Trygger Ministry failed to persuade the old Chamber to adopt a military budget of about 50 million kronen. The Government, however, considered that the minimum indispensable for the national defense and to enable Sweden to fulfil the obligations which will fall upon her if the principle of mutual assistance is definitely fixed as the basis of the international order. The Socialists, encouraged by the advanced Liberals, expect to obtain a considerable reduction of the war budget by a military reform which would consist essentially in replacing the standing army by a militia system. The results of the recent election will probably assist the realization of that policy. In any case the Swedish people did not seem to understand the reasons which require it not to risk any weakening of its means of national defense under present circumstances, since the Socialists, who were the strongest party numerically in the old Chamber, have gained several seats at the expense of the Liberals. With the aid of 5 Communists they will number 109 in the new Chamber, against 65 Conservatives, 23 Agrarians, and 33 Liberals—the latter divided into two groups—a total of 121 for the bourgeois parties. But since, probably, most of the Liberals will support the Social Democrats in the new Chamber, the Trygger Ministry will doubtless give way to a Socialist Cabinet which, while representing only a minority of the country, will have the power of imposing its program of immediate realizations and especially of asserting its theories as regards the national defense.

In Denmark the situation is still more serious. The Socialist Cabinet headed by Mr. Stauning governs there with a majority of two or three, including the one German elected from North Slesvig. The Chamber of Deputies consists of 55 Socialists, 45 members of the Moderate Left, 20 Radicals, 28 Conservatives, and one German, aligned as a Socialist-Radical bloc of 76 against a Conservative-Liberal bloc of 73. Under these conditions the Stauning Cabinet presented its program of virtually total disarmament on land and sea. In outline it proposes suppression of real military service and of the ministries of war and of the navy; dismantling of all the fortifications, and suppression of the munitions factories; finally, creation of a police corps, to maintain order and tranquillity, which could not in any case be used in a struggle against regular enemy forces. This would amount to suppressing all national defense and depriving the country of the practical means of opposing aggression. . . .

It appears that the Socialist Government has no chance of inducing the Chamber of Deputies to accept its strange program, for even its Radical allies are disposed to ask the maintenance of at least a minimum of the forces indispensable to the safeguard of the territory. The disarmament of Denmark will not come so rapidly if it ever comes at all, but the serious fact remains that the responsible government of a country which has always had the greatest respect for its duty to itself and to others has been able to arrive at such a point of view, and to risk recommending to Parliament a proposition of which the least that one can say is that it implies absolute failure to recognize the obligation of every nation to look out for its security and to maintain the dignity of its independent existence.

This is a striking example of the general danger created by the ideology and phraseology of the revolutionaries, by which the grandiloquence of demagogues misleads the masses. All this literature concerning disarmament as the only effective means of destroying war, which grows out of the most mediocre demagoguery, tends to upset simple-minded people and unstable minds. A pretext is sought to avoid the primary duty to one's country, to escape all international obligations which might interfere with sacred egoism. At the bottom of this movement for spontaneous disarmament is the idea that even in case of aggression a people should refuse to defend itself and rather submit to the rule of the aggressor than expose itself to the harsh test of war. The principle that it is better to give up any national defense if one is not in a position to guarantee oneself against an aggressor is the beginning of that collective resignation which inevitably leads to every failure.

Whatever the audacious suggestions of its temporary leaders the Danish people has certainly not come to that. . . . What use would it be to provide for all the nations mutual assistance against any aggressor state if those who think they have nothing to fear begin by reducing to nothing their means of action and thus destroy any possibility of effective assistance by them to the victims of aggression? In such conditions the theoretical organization of peace would be a monstrous deception for the nations of good faith. The red wave now rolling in the Scandinavian countries will break against the solid dike of national feeling and of popular common sense. There as elsewhere the reflux will finally come, carrying with it the puerile hopes and easy dreams which please the spirit of revolution.

The point of view of the Temps is doubly interesting in the light which it casts upon the possible effect of the Geneva protocol upon the hope for disarmament in Europe. Apparently disarmament is regarded by the partisans of the Geneva program as an obstacle to their program!

A Peace Conference in Berlin

THE twenty-eighth International Conference for World Peace (an assembly of representatives of the world peace movement) was held in October in Berlin, the opening meeting being held in the Reichstag Building. Ferdinand Buisson, president of the League of the Rights of Man, Professor Victor Basch of the Sorbonne, and Marcelle Capy were among the French delegates. Senator Henri Lafontaine of Belgium presided, Mrs. Pethick Lawrence was one of the English delegates, Fridtjof Nansen was present, and delegates came from most of the European countries. The following extracts are from a report in the Wochenblatt of the Frankfurter Zeitung for October 9:

Senator Lafontaine said: "We hail the fact that we are meeting in the capital of the German Republic, in the Reichstag Building, as a sign of the times, as a hope and an encouragement." [After outlining the horrors of the next war and suggesting the slogan "Kill War" he continued:] "A few days ago that cry rang out at Geneva from the rostrum of the League of Nations, and it is for us to study whether the means recommended by the diplomats are really fitted to prevent war. The partial disarmament promised is only a modest first step on the path to the complete liberation of mankind. Economic disarmament must begin simultaneously, for the existence of customs frontiers is a constant cause of conflicts and a strong barrier to the development of a world market. Moral disarmament can only follow economic and military disarmament. Those nations which have been forced to disarm should congratulate themselves and attempt to bring about a free exchange of goods. It is our task to follow attentively the discussions of the Geneva Disarmament Conference and ourselves to make suggestions. We must so influence the education of the masses and of the youth that the will to peace shall be dominant in them. The League of Nations must be inspired with a democratic spirit and turned into a great republic of humanity. The uprightness of the peoples which compose the League will stand in direct proportion to the uprightness with which democratic ideas are realized in their various countries. The League must include all the peoples; that will make its power and give it respect. The ideal of solidarity and brotherhood which it should realize will be granted to mankind only when the League of Nations has become a league of peoples, an all-inclusive home of mankind, and each of us thinks of himself as a citizen of the world. . . ."

Fridtjof Nansen said: "The Geneva Assembly of this year was the most important since the foundation of the League. It was a great step toward a better future for Europe. It now seems as if that future were not so hopeless as it had seemed. We are now seeing the glimmerings of dawn, and I believe that the sun will yet rise again over the Western countries. We shall experience a new day, in which the peoples of Europe will work together as citizens, in which war will be a crime, and in which the word 'enemy' will no longer exist."

Friendship Week

THE following account is taken from the Vossische Zeitung of August 22:

A young Dutch student in Paris worked alone for a year in preparation for an International Friendship Week to be participated in by French and Germans. Her work bore fruit after many struggles and difficulties. In the lovely valley of the Chevreuse, two hours from Paris, on the estate of Dr. Demarquette, the leader of the Society of the Friends of Nature—the Trait d'Union—a village of tents was erected from July 27 to August 4, for the fifty to sixty young people from France, England, Germany, Holland, and other countries. Wibina Boisevain, the young Dutch woman, was assisted by Dr. Demarquette, who acted as leader of the camp, and Dr. Dumesnil, the leader of the Christian-pacifist movement of France.

Besides the special lectures very earnest work was done in conference, private talks, and in silent meditation. The poet Duhamel pointed out the foundations of a new ethics, which is based on individual responsibility. Dr. Dumesnil showed that peace between nations is one of the demands of Christianity; Hein Herbers reported on the peace movement in Germany. Various delegates told of the movements with which they were affiliated, and which in purpose were similar to the meeting being held. The Dutch Youth Movement, called the Practical-Idealists, the work of the French teachers, the German Youth Movement for the voluntary rebuilding of northern France, the French Naturalist Movement, all were described in pertinent way. . . .

It is unnecessary to mention the fruits that grow from such a conference. The particular significance of the conference was not in the work, but much more in the fact that for the first time since the war, perhaps even at any time, the Roman and Teutonic, the French and the German were united in a simple brotherhood after the manner of the European Youth Movement. As one of the speakers expressed it: "An hour spent in a common activity unites more than an hour in a lecture." The working together, fetching water and wood, cooking, playing, dancing, singing, tramping, living together and holding common worship, it was this which put the stamp on the week. It was more than a conference; it was a community of spirit which will remain after the individuals have scattered again. . . .

The spirit of the conference is pictured most clearly in the manner in which the last day began. It was the tenth anniversary of the declaration of war. Gerd Knoche told how as a German soldier in the World War he had experienced both the cruelty and the goodness of mankind; then Dr. Demarquette gave similar experiences as a former French soldier. More than through any ethical discussion or through a set program were these meetings shaken by these simple, and yet in most cases, cruel facts. After this Dr. Dumesnil epitomized the mind of the group as he read the words: "If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not love, then I am as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." And finally: "There remains faith, hope, and charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity."

A circle, a joining of hands, a silence. The conference was at an end.

In an early issue of The Nation
"Canada and the Empire"
By Owen E. McGillicuddy.

Contributors to This Issue

WILL IRWIN is a writer who was several times decorated for his services during the Great War.

FLORENCE GUY SEABURY is a contributor to current periodicals.

ROBERT DELL represented The Nation at the recent meeting of the League Assembly at Geneva.

EMIL LENGYEL is a Hungarian journalist living in New York.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is in charge of the English department at Urbana University School, Urbana, Ohio.

IRWIN EDMAN, assistant professor of philosophy at Columbia University, will publish his first volume of poems this fall.

NORMAN THOMAS was the recent Socialist candidate for Governor of New York.

Just Published!
THE STENOGRAPHIC AD VERBATIM REPORT of
The DEBATE of the Century!
Is CAPITAL PUNISHMENT a Wise Public Policy?
CLARENCE DARROW versus JUDGE A. J. TALLEY
Attorney of the Leopold-Loeb Case N. Y. Court of General Sessions
Preface by LOUIS MARSHALL
Foreword by LEWIS B. LAWES, Warden of Sing Sing Prison
Held in New York on Oct. 26, 1924, before an audience of 3,500
Illustrated with portraits of the debaters Price $1.00 postpaid
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Avenue Dept. N. New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1924 No. 3098

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 531
EDITORIALS:
- Why Should the Democratic Party Survive? 534
- Our Claims Against Germany 535
- Our Own Vikings 535
- Burning Forests 536

WHAT EVERY VETERAN KNOWS. By A. Hamilton Gibbs 537
HENRY CABOT LODGE—A SCHOLAR IN POLITICS. By Oswald Garrison Villard 539
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
- Women and the New Morality. By Beatrice M. Hinkle 541

SONNET. By Marie Luhrs 543
COWS. By Marie Luhrs 543
WOMEN IN THE PROGRESSIVE MOVEMENT. By Isabelle Kendig 544
SHE DOES NOT LIST SO MUCH. By William Hard 545
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 546
CORRESPONDENCE 546
BOOKS:
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 547
- Aspects of Politics. By William MacDonald 547
- A Specialist in Souls. By Angus Burrell 548
- General Botha. By Ruth S. Alexander 548
- The Persistent Illusion. By Allen Tate 549
- When Hope Was Young. By Henry Raymond Mussey 549
- Books in Brief 550

THE FEIS CEOIL. By Henrietta Straus 550
THE NATION'S POETRY PRIZE 551
DRAMA:
- Pinero the Timid. By Joseph Wood Krutch 551

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Western Imperialism in China 553
- Marshal Foch on Peace 554

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
Contributing Editors
ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

WE CANNOT WIND UP our comment on the election without a word of appreciation of the admirable way in which the press of the larger cities, notably of New York, reported the La Follette campaign—in the smaller towns suppression was often the rule. The sponsors of the new movement were fearful from the beginning that they would not receive adequate metropolitan reporting. They were agreeably disappointed. If there was some slackening in the last week, that was probably explainable by the belief that the campaign was over, and won and lost. Whether this changed attitude of the press was a fortunate result of the recent severe criticisms of our dailies, or due to a realization that there were millions behind La Follette and Wheeler and therefore additional circulation to be won, or whether it was owing to a recrudescence of fair play, it was so delightful a change as to warrant a hearty word of appreciation. Particularly the New York Times deserves thanks for its full reports.

A GREAT MANY CHICKENS were counted in the newspaper offices on the morning after election without waiting for the hatching. The chorus of rejoicing over the defeat of Smith W. Brookhart for United States Senator from Iowa was one of the largest and loudest choruses which New York ever raised over anyone from Iowa. It held the front pages and spilled over on to the editorial pages for three whole days—and on the fourth day small notes in obscure columns reported that Senator Brookhart had been reelected after all. Minnesota's choice took almost as long to determine, but in the end Magnus Johnson lost to former Representative Thomas D. Schall, running as a regular Republican. Schall, however, is about as regular as Senator Borah. Complete returns show the Republicans much stronger than in the last Congress, but the Old Guard will have no easy sailing—the Republicans will have 55 or 56 seats in the Senate, which is enough to take the balance of power out of the hands of the out-and-out Progressives (La Follette, Norris, Ladd, Frazier, and Brookhart); but whenever Couzens or Schall or MacMaster or Capper or Borah or any of the mild Progressives join them they, with the aid of the Democrats, will be able to tip the scales. Much the same situation prevails in the lower house.

JUDGE LINDSEY was reelected in Denver after all, despite the Klan sweep which gave Colorado two Republican Senators and turned Governor Sweet out of office. Klan referenda intended to close the parochial schools were defeated in Washington and in Michigan, but it elected most of its candidates in Texas, and it showed the power of its teeth in Oklahoma, Kansas, and Indiana. Women seem to have been elected to State legislatures as never before, and two wives of former governors become chief State magistrates, but Congress has to content itself with its usual one lone woman. Mrs. Norton of Jersey City is the fifth woman to be elected to the House, but no two of them have been triumphant at the same polling. In the East the Klan showed no strength at all. Indeed the two outstanding rocks of opposition to the Republican tidal wave were the magnificent votes cast for Governor Smith in New York and for Senator David I. Walsh in Massachusetts. Senator Walsh was defeated by 10,000 votes, but he ran more than 400,000 votes ahead of John W. Davis. It is plain that in any but a tidal-wave year his State would prove its affection by electing him, and it is to be hoped that he will soon have an opportunity to fill the seat which Senator Lodge's death vacates. Massachusetts showed a mood of reaction too; it overwhelmingly defeated the child-labor amendment.

EUROPE'S POLITICAL POT is boiling again. The electoral triumphs of the conservatives in England and the United States have given fresh courage to continental reactionaries just when fascism's course seemed run and its normal crop of chaos seemed ripe for the reaping. In Italy General Peppino Garibaldi, grandson of the great Garibaldi, has challenged Mussolini to a duel because of a fascist attack upon unarmed ex-soldiers; in Spain Primo di Rivera is losing the little grip he had upon that unhappy country. He has arrested many of the heads of the Opposition, but the country is turning against him. Germany, meanwhile, is in the throes of a new national election, following only seven months on the heels of the last, and monarchist restoration is again in the forefront of Bavarian discussion—there is small doubt that the Bavarians are ready for it, but fear of the Allies deters. MacDonald's fall weakened his liberal ally Herriot in France. On the eve of the British election Herriot recognized Soviet Russia; two weeks later he made a new treaty, this time with J. P. Morgan and Co. The French Government is to get a loan of $150,000,000, in return for which it promises to follow a "conservative fiscal policy." Herriot is now at grips with the budget, the severest test of French statesmanship. Millerand's hot pronunciamentos are not likely to hurt him, but his own supporters may shy at the tax burden which he will find necessary.

MORGAN'S LOAN TO FRANCE reveals once more the dominant part being played in Europe by American bankers. "Wall Street dictated the terms to the French Government," says the New York World's Paris correspondent, "obliging it to follow a conservative financial policy, much as it obliged the London Reparation Conference to accept its conception as to how the Dawes Plan should be put into operation." "Wall Street's" influence is also evident in Austria and Germany. A general strike on Austria's railways has stopped all but food trains, and the Government, although many of its members sympathize with the strikers' demands, has resigned, because to increase the railwaymen's wages would endanger fulfilment of the Geneva program, under which the international bankers granted Austria her reconstruction plan. Such situations are likely to recur. Indeed there is already threat of a German railway strike, and reports indicate the dire need of the workers. Henceforth in such struggles the workers are likely to find lined up against them not only their own employers and their own governments, but the enormous power of international finance. Unfortunately, Europe judges America by the decisions of our bankers.

STANLEY BALDWIN'S NEW CABINET is as good as a Tory Cabinet could well be. Indeed there are names in it that give hope that an English tradition, of letting the Tories realize the reforms for which their opponents have fought, may be revived. Neville Chamberlain, who was offered the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer, has taken instead the lesser office of Minister of Health, with the announced determination at last really to do something about housing. The erratic Winston Churchill takes the position which Chamberlain declined, a guaranty that Baldwin does not intend to return to the policy of protection which lost the 1923 election. Churchill may have shifted in every other principle he ever had, but he remains true to free trade; his enormous vanity is appeased by his assumption of the office his father abandoned forty years ago. Lord Curzon and the Marquis of Salisbury, die-hards both, receive purely ornamental positions, Austen Chamberlain taking over Curzon's task in foreign affairs. Indeed there appear to be fewer peers in this than in MacDonald's Ministry. Austen Chamberlain, who was out of the last Tory Ministry because of his coalitionist sympathy; Churchill, whom Baldwin fought at a bye-election only six months ago; and Baldwin will be the dominant triumvirate. The nominations of Lord Birkenhead as Secretary for India and of Mr. Amery as Secretary for the Colonies portend trouble in the Empire; but among the more encouraging names is that of Lord Eustace Percy as President of the Board of Education.

STEPHEN V. GRAHAM, U. S. N., is captain of the Brooklyn Navy Yard but he talks like a radical:

> It does not require a very exhaustive review of history to show that business has been the underlying cause of every war that has ever been fought. Humanitarian causes have always been given prominence during a war, for the purpose of stimulating the zeal and patriotism of the participants, and in recorded history after a war, because it appears too sordid to record that the great devastation of war has been only on account of business.

This appears in a Navy-Day article printed in Brooklyn, the organ of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce. Captain Graham continues:

> The very life of the world is so organized that business is its prime necessity. Without business how should we live? Can anyone conceive of the condition that would prevail if there were no business in the world? What is more natural than that wars should be fought on account of business? . . . Make it your business to see that your business is protected by the only means that can adequately protect it, that is, by an adequate navy.

Business makes all wars, and that is right and fitting; therefore, we should have a bigger navy. It's curious logic.

THE OFFENSIVELY NATIONALISTIC and illiberal character of the program drawn up for American Education Week, November 17 to 23, was the subject of editorial comment in our issue of October 1, and we are glad to see that the sponsors of the movement were called sharply to account by a large number of educators, while the Young Women's Christian Association, which took part in two previous programs, declined to do so this year. Some of the program, the association said, "seemed to be inconsistent with the position of the board in relation to world peace and international cooperation." John J. Tigert, United States Commissioner of Education, has been especially criticized for apparently allowing the American Legion to dictate the character of an effort which should be entirely beyond partisan manipulation. Charles W. Eliot, president-emeritus of Harvard University, is among those expressing disapproval of parts of the program for American Education Week. In a letter on the subject he wrote:

> The red flag is a symbol in some nations, and perhaps in some communities, of all the woes described in the program, but denunciation of it does not seem to me appropriate in the government's program for American Education Week. Indeed, it ought not be mentioned in the same section with the flag of the United States.
>
> There is an objectionable inference under the heading of "Illiteracy Day." Is it only illiterates who become "a tool of the radical"? It seems to me that the educated are quite as apt as the uneducated to depend on second-hand, and therefore inaccurate, information.

IN THE WINTER OF 1922, Wallace W. Atwood, the newly elected president of Clark University, stopped a lecture before the student body by Scott Nearing. His action was followed directly by the resignation of several of the strongest professors on the faculty and by a loss both in morale and in numbers among the students. And now, two and a half years after the event, comes a report by a committee of the American Association of University Professors which condemns Mr. Atwood both in regard to the Nearing incident and in his policy of attempting to change the academic character of the university without consultation with or support from the faculty. The committee, which consisted of Arthur O. Lovejoy of Johns Hopkins, John M. Brewer of Harvard, Robert K. Root of Princeton, and H. S. White of Vassar, says:

> Voluntary student organizations for intellectual purposes, for the study of social problems, or for becoming acquainted with contemporary political and social movements, especially those current among social groups other than that to which most American college students belong, ought to be encouraged in every possible way; they are among the most welcome evidences that a student body is both intellectually and morally alive. . . . Dr. Atwood, however, expressly holds that a less degree of freedom of speech on public questions should obtain in universities than in the community at large; the process of education seems to him so delicate and mysterious and the danger so great that the minds of university students will be infected with error through even a single brief exposure to it, that an open forum where all kinds of ideas may be aired, though useful elsewhere, is inadmissible in a university. He conceives it, in short, to be a function of a university to protect students against even hearing doctrines which to the president or faculty seem pernicious; and consequently regards it as an important part of the duty of a university executive to act as a chief of quarantine with respect to political, sociological, and economic ideas.
>
> Such a conception seems to the committee to betray a failure to understand either the spirit of a university or the ordinary workings of human nature.

THE COMMITTEE is no less severe in passing upon Mr. Atwood's general administrative policy than in commenting upon the Nearing incident. It admits that the new president of Clark found himself faced with serious financial difficulties. But instead of building upon the foundations already laid, the trustees, without the knowledge of the faculty, adopted the policy of eliminating or reducing several of the existing departments in order to establish a new School of Geography, of which President Atwood is head and to which more than 30 per cent of the departmental funds are devoted. The trustees and president defended this as enabling Clark to make a new and distinctive contribution in a field where it would not be in competition with larger and wealthier institutions, but the committee thinks that the presumption against so radical a change was strong, and that it has not been justified by success:

> The present position of the university, with respect to its post-graduate departments, is inferior to that which it held in 1919-20, and has lost much of the character which once constituted its special distinction. That matters of educational policy should not be decided by a lay governing board of a university without ascertaining the opinion of the educational staff is a usually accepted principle; if it were commonly disregarded the future of American higher education would not be hopeful. . . .

"TAX NOT THE ROYAL SAINT with vain expense" began Wordsworth in a marvelous sonnet directed against those who lamented the money wasted in the building of magnificent churches, and, agreeing with the poet, we have no theoretical objection to cathedrals. Nevertheless when Bishop Manning renews his drive for the $12,000,000 still necessary to complete the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Morningside Heights we do not kindle as we should. We do not kindle partly, perhaps, because we cannot quite see the fire-eating bishop as the saint of Wordsworth's line. Some day when mankind is once more united in a common faith, temples may rise again as they rose before, soaring and beautiful, but the creed of Bishop Manning, aristocratic and bitterly partisan, is fortunately the creed of too small a part of the American nation to endow with meaning the vast fabric of a cathedral. Doubtless he and his little group have money and to spare—enough to build a dozen temples in the best of imitation gothic—but millions whose religion is warmer, kindlier, and more humanitarian will remain outside. His cathedral will lack the only thing which has ever made a cathedral great—the united soul of a people.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, in creating for Robert Frost a life fellowship by the terms of which he is required to do nothing more than remain in residence and write poetry, has done a handsome and liberal deed at the same time that it has assumed a rather formidable responsibility. It has subsidized an artist of the finest quality in a day when such subsidies are all too rare—when the institution of the private patron seems dead beyond revival and when the question of subsidy by the state is at best but feebly discussed. But what shall be its attitude toward Mr. Frost, who so eminently deserves the favor bestowed upon him? It is to be hoped that there will be no attitude at all. Ann Arbor's business henceforth is to let Mr. Frost alone—to dine him very seldom, give him no work to do, make no complaint when he is not productive, and above all refrain from suggestions as to the kind of poetry he shall write. Even the best of institutions, and the University of Michigan is a good university, are capable of censorship when they least suspect it. Pressure can come from the gentlest of academic atmospheres, and the wildest poet there can grow too tame. Mr. Frost is anything but a wild man, yet he has a character. Ann Arbor will prove worthy of its trust if in keeping hands off that character it shows itself superior to individual patrons, who are always capricious, and to states, which are sometimes stupid.

WITH PLEASURE we record the giving of a testimonial dinner in New York on November 14 to Mrs. Florence Kelley, so long secretary of the National Consumers' League. No tributes could adequately portray the public-spirited service that Mrs. Kelley has rendered, not only to the League, which she has served as secretary for twenty-five years, but to a host of other good causes. In such a discouraging political hour as we have just lived through it is especially heartening to be reminded not only of the devotion of such as Mrs. Kelley, but of her extraordinary record of actual practical achievement. The truth is that no one has any right to be discouraged as long as we have such patriots as this. The daughter of a distinguished father who served his country well in Congress, Mrs. Kelley has approached every problem with wisdom and understanding and has faced every public issue without fear. As a result she has at times been honored by the criticisms of the super-patriots and the would-be blood-letters, most of whom are not worthy to touch the hem of her skirt, into whose narrow brains there can enter no true conception of the amount of patriotism and devotion it takes to give one's self year in and year out to the unending grind of fighting with inadequate means for a great cause. When the professional patriots have long since been forgotten the name of Florence Kelley will be cherished with increasing gratitude and appreciation by the numerous groups which she has served so faithfully without thought of self.

Why Should the Democratic Party Survive?

THE more one studies the election returns the clearer emerges the desire of the average business man to be let alone in order to sink himself completely in the making of money. From this point of view the voter was right in turning to the Republican Party, for Mr. Coolidge typifies what this state of mind desires; hundreds of thousands voted for him because of his negative qualities and characteristics, because they believed that he would do nothing and accomplish nothing. There was very little enthusiasm for the President personally, according to the daily press, and victory parades were few, which may perhaps be explained by a discounting in advance of the Republican success. Mr. Coolidge's reported determination not to call an extra session of Congress but to mark time for a whole year will undoubtedly be a popular decision. We are witnessing, for the moment, the apotheosis of stand-pattism, the exalting of one-man government, without the unpleasant features usually attending upon fascism. In the record-breaking stock sales and the evidences of a boom in industry the Republicans, from Mr. Coolidge down, find the most gratifying results of their victory.

The one-sidedness of that victory brings with it, however, its own dangers to the victors. The Republicans have won tremendous victories before, as in 1888 and in 1920, only to lose much ground within the next two years. Their margin of control of the Senate is still too narrow to make it possible for them to ride rough-shod. Already, therefore, the Coolidge machine is at work further to strengthen its hold upon Congress in the election two years hence. But as to that there will be factors operating during the interim which not even Mr. Coolidge or Mr. Butler can control—we refer particularly to economic conditions abroad, and these, despite the Dawes Plan and its excellent beginning, are far from being satisfactory. Short after-election booms are not unknown in our business history because of the holding up of orders prior to election. For lasting prosperity there must be wider and sounder bases. At present there are too many deep-seated symptoms of business ill-health to make it likely that they can all be waved aside as if by a magic wand because Mr. Coolidge is to have four years more in the White House. A party which bases its appeals upon its ability to create prosperity pays a high price when prosperity lags. But for the present the business man is wholly wedded to the Republican Party. The question is even to be asked whether we are not today in far more danger of one-party government in America than government by three parties.

All of which brings up anew the question of the Democratic Party. Why should it survive? We are aware, of course, that the New York Times heralds the election as proof of the triumph of the two old parties and their system, and that the World is complacent in its belief that the Democratic Party will survive because nothing can shake the hold of that party upon the South. The World's attitude on this issue was one of the curiosities of the campaign, quite enough to cause Joseph Pulitzer to turn many times in his grave. For it can be demonstrated by endless citations from its own editorial columns, in the days of Cleveland and later, that the Democracy in the South, buttressed as it is by a grave violation of the Constitution, by fraud, chicanery, and deceit, is an impossible stumbling-block to its progress as a party. Upon no such foundation can a liberal party be built, not even if the South purges itself of the K. K. K. No; the Democracy of today consists only of the Irish Catholic city groups, the advocates of the League of Nations, and the Southerners. Each year the latter are less and less Democrats at heart, and, by reason of economic changes, more and more eager to divide normally rather than upon the outworn issue of Negro domination—a news service reports efforts to form a political-economic bloc in the South to back President Coolidge.

The fact is that the Democratic Party is practically wiped out beyond the Mississippi River. Taking seventeen of the States west of that river, including Minnesota but omitting Missouri, which is naturally one of the border States, the amazing fact develops that the Progressive Party, which came into being on July 4 last, polled in these States in round figures 1,829,000 votes, while the historic Democratic Party with its long-created machinery polled only 957,000 votes—about one-half as many, and 364,000 votes less than Governor Cox polled in the same States in 1920. In California Mr. Davis's vote was one-fourth that of Mr. La Follette. In only five of these seventeen States did Mr. Davis obtain more votes than Mr. La Follette. Taking the country as a whole, the figures show how ridiculous was the charge made by the frightened World in the last week of the battle that La Follette was wrecking the Davis campaign. In only nine small States did the combined La Follette and Davis vote exceed Coolidge's; the forty-two electoral votes of these States would not have affected the result had they been placed in the Davis column. Even if it be granted that many voters were frightened into supporting Coolidge through fear of La Follette, it is still impossible honestly to allege that the third party elected Coolidge. On the other hand, the true measure of the wreck of the Democratic Party lies in the fact that Davis carried only one State more than Cox did. Practically, Davis carried only the Southern States that had nowhere else to go. Why should the Democratic Party survive? What function can it fulfil?

Obviously, the only excuse that can be put forward for continuing it is the hope that another Grover Cleveland or Woodrow Wilson may breathe the breath of life into the corpse. The Baltimore Evening Sun, a Democratic newspaper, has just shamed the devil and told some refreshing truths about its party. The Democracy, it says, > has become an inchoate grouping of men of many minds on important matters. What little coherence it has is given not by devotion to any fixed principle or political action, but solely by the desire of professional politicians . . . to get as close to the feed-bag as possible. The differences of opinion which developed at the New York Convention . . . are ample to demonstrate that the party has no chart to guide its course.

True. The Democratic Party is deservedly wrecked because it is without principle. Indeed, its speakers were so wholly without a program as to be compelled to mouth the most commonplace generalities and platitudes—they appealed for honesty, virtue, humanity, and good-will abroad ad nauseam. Even Mr. Davis had nothing concrete to offer that really stirred the imagination or inspired his listeners. It is very easy for people to say that the Democratic Party is now going on triumphantly. Who is going to direct it? The World admits that Mr. Davis cannot, and Governor Smith we believe to be too canny to allow the party to be wished upon him, as some are already trying to do. Whatever receiver is finally found, he will take the party over bankrupt financially as well as morally. With the internal dissensions—between its Catholics and its anti-Catholics, between its Southerners and its Northerners, between its progressives and its conservatives, between its tariff reformers and its high protectionists, between its imperialists and its anti-imperialists—entirely unhealed, the receiver will have to deal daily with stupid and visionless if not corrupt bosses of the type of Brennan and Taggart, who do not object to the Democracy as a minority party because they batten on the many privileges a minority party obtains. Why try to reorganize and resurrect any organization like this? It would be infinitely better for the Southerners to form their little bloc and flock by themselves, and to let the progressive Democrats come over to the new party which furnished the only vitality, the only enthusiasm, the only really forward-looking platform of the campaign.

Our Claims Against Germany

ONE of the most important conferences of the post-war period is now going on in Paris. It was called among the Allied Powers and the United States to supplement the London Conference on the Dawes Plan, for the purpose of distributing the industrial and railroad bonds to be issued by Germany in execution of that plan.

For the United States the conference is of the utmost importance. The Secretary of State has announced that we are making a claim for $500,000,000 of these bonds, half to cover the cost of our Rhine army and half to cover the claims now being settled by the Mixed Claims Commission in Washington. We make this claim under Part XI of the Dawes Plan, which provides that > the sums denoted above comprise all amounts for which Germany may be liable to the Allied and Associated Powers for the costs arising out of the war, including reparation, restitution, all costs of all armies of occupation, clearing-house operations, . . . commissions of control and supervision, etc. Whenever in any part of this report or its annexes we refer to treaty payments, reparation amounts payable to the Allies, etc., we use these terms to include all charges payable by Germany to the Allied and Associated Powers for these war costs.

This journal in its issue of June 4, 1924, was the first to suggest that in view of the fact that the Dawes Plan imposed an absolute maximum of payments to be exacted from Germany over a long period of years, the United States must for the payment of its claims share in the so-called Dawes bonds, or forego their collection for at least two generations. It will be recalled that our share of the Rhine army costs, which was paid in full into the reparation fund by Germany, was appropriated by the Allies, and that when we demanded our share we were told by Poincaré that as we had not signed the Treaty of Versailles we were not entitled to be reimbursed. Maintaining the position that our demands did not depend on the treaty, but on the fact that the service was rendered to the Allies, the Secretary of State obtained a compromise by which we were to share to a limited extent in future payments to be effected by Germany.

The Dawes Plan requires a revision of this compromise to the extent of substituting German bonds for the paper agreement with the Allies. And now, under the Dawes Plan, we include a proper demand for the payment of our pecuniary war claims against Germany. We did not insist upon this claim at London, evidently because of an apprehension that it might give France an excuse to break up the conference. Now we advance the claim in Paris, and although Germany is anxious that we be paid we are informed that France will oppose our claim.

It is to be hoped that the Secretary of State will successfully defeat any such opposition. But for the United States, France would not have had one cent of reparations; yet when we demand our modest share of the Dawes bonds, as provided for in the Dawes Report, we are informed that as we did not sign the Treaty of Versailles we are not entitled to reparations. The New York Times, overlooking the fact that Germany has already paid $5,000,000,000, and asserting in the face of the Dawes Report that we "declined to take any responsibility in making Germany pay" —how more could have been extracted from Germany its editors do not suggest—seems to criticize our position by asserting that our "just claim" will cause us to be hated. This is a remarkable position for an American newspaper to take. The Allies since 1919 have ignored and even thwarted the interests of the United States. They have sought to influence us to confiscate the private property held by the Alien Property Custodian, contrary to American tradition and interests. The fact that the Allies confiscated private enemy property elicited a resolution of the International Law Association at Stockholm denouncing the practice as "a relic of barbarism worthy of the most severe condemnation."

It is time for the Department of State to do some plain speaking.

Our Own Vikings

THE U. S. S. Trenton has been sent north by the Navy Department to look for the long overdue Leiv Eiriksson and her crew of modern vikings who, it is feared, have been either lost in the Arctic ice or driven to take refuge at some obscure point whence no word can be dispatched for perhaps many months. The Leiv Eiriksson is only a tiny sloop in which three amateur sailors set sail from Norway early last July to follow the path of the original vikings by way of Iceland and Greenland to North America. The adventurers thus setting out were William Washburn Nutting, Arthur S. Hildebrand, writer, and Eric Todahl, painter. They made the trip safely as far as Julianshaab, Greenland, leaving there for Labrador on September 8. The distance is not much over 500 miles, and in any ordinary circumstances should not have taken even a small sailboat more than a couple of weeks, but the date of departure was rather late for crossing Davis Strait, and the polar ice may have reached out and trapped the voyagers, leaving no hope of survival unless by escape over the floes to land.

The voyage of the Leiv Eiriksson is only one of several brave adventures in small boats with which the imagination of wall-bound city dwellers has been haunted lately. The November number of Yachting contains the first part of the story of Frederic Jay Wells, who with his father and a few others undertook this same viking journey almost simultaneously with the Nutting party. Indeed, Mr. Wells recounts meeting Mr. Nutting in Bergen, sailing thence only a few days after the Leiv Eiriksson. Mr. Wells and his party made a successful crossing by way of Iceland, Greenland, and Labrador in a 47-foot yawl-rigged vessel called the Shanghai, but they were driven on the rocks of the Nova Scotia coast in the hurricane that blew up out of the Caribbean late last August. The Shanghai was lost, although all aboard were able to clamber up the cliffs to safety.

These viking voyages have especially captivated the imagination of the public because the route is the same as that described in such detail in newspapers at the time of the world flight of our army airplanes, but they are only instances of a kind of adventure which seems to have gripped individuals in all parts of the world in the last few years. From 1914 to 1918 the European War drew into it, willy-nilly, about all the lust of danger of which the world was capable; but six years have flown by since the armistice, and human hardihood is demanding new outlets from the mechanistic civilization to which most of humanity finds itself bound. Hence the especial fascination of voyages to the remotest of the South Seas, or of trips through Arctic ice in the path of the vikings. Only this year, too, Alain Gerbault, a Frenchman, accomplished the remarkable feat of sailing alone across the Atlantic Ocean in a small boat. After terrific experiences with gales and unruly seas he brought his craft into New York harbor, where he began fitting it for a voyage around the world. In this latter ambition he is essaying to follow in the wake of Captain Joshua Slocum, whose achievement a quarter of a century ago, when he sailed alone around the world in his little yawl Spray, stands as the most remarkable adventure in single-handed seamanship of which we know. Captain Slocum owed his success partly to the excellence of the boat, which he himself built and rigged, and partly to his skill and resourcefulness as a sailor. But neither one nor the other was proof against fate, for he sailed away on another voyage from which no word has ever come back.

These long voyages in small boats through tumultuous seas are not only making interesting epics of the ocean; they are leading adventurous souls to study and build craft especially adapted to them. The Shanghai, of which we have already spoken, was built in the port of that name by a group of young Danes, who then proceeded to sail their boat around the Cape of Good Hope to their native land. The desire of amateur sailors for more seaworthy small boats is leading designers away from the old smooth-water, fair-weather models and back to the days when all ocean voyages were made by sail, mostly in what nowadays would be regarded as ridiculously small vessels. Thus in yachting we are getting further and further from the saucer-hulled defenders of the America's Cup, which so long dominated the construction of our pleasure boats. The closing of the famous Herreshoff boat-building yard at Bristol, Rhode Island, recently was more than the end of a famous plant. It was the end of an idea—of an era—in yachting. The idea was splendidly suited to the particular end in view—the defense of the America's Cup—but it was a blight upon the development of seaworthy pleasure boats. Fortunately the old human craving for adventure by water—as strong today as when the vikings made their voyages—has turned us back toward a craft more worthy of our spirit.

Burning Forests

FOREST fires are an American invention. Those appalling holocausts which sweep bare mile after mile of ancient forest, driving the frightened animals before them, darkening the sky by day and turning the sun into a dull red ball, lighting up the sky by night, are unknown in Europe. There they know that wood is too precious. Here we are beginning to learn it. The prohibition of hunting in a dozen States this autumn is indication that at last we are awakening to the menace and are ready to put public interest above private pleasure.

We have been lavish with our resources; forests seemed cheap and abundant. Our great American pastime—camping—has lent itself to the work of destruction. Campers, who should most cherish the woodland which gives them their joy, are often least careful. They build bonfires where small fires would do their cooking better and be safer; they neglect to dig away the leaves about their fireplaces; they leave the embers smoldering. The campers must learn better. It is a glorious thing that along with the increasing urbanization of America has gone a great movement to open up country playgrounds. The national forests and State forests which have been set aside in recent years, largely to protect the watersheds, have become at the same time summer playgrounds for millions of city-dwellers. Automobiles have brought close to the cities regions hitherto inaccessible. New York now has two million acres of State forests and parks; Pennsylvania a million; Michigan, South Dakota, and all the New England States have set aside some of their choicest mountainsides. New York's voters at the last election authorized the expenditure of $17,500,000 more to buy and develop State parkland. Three States are cooperating to make a park of the deep valleys and wild mountains of the Taconics, where New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut meet. Already the weird bluffs and lovely tarns of Montauk, the tip of Long Island, have been saved for the people.

Close observation by national and State foresters is rescuing much forest land which a decade ago would have been lost. New York newspapers this autumn carry daily reports from the State foresters of both large and small forest fires in the State. A few years ago many of these would have done their irreparable damage unnoticed. The berry-pickers who used to burn the hilltops every third year in order to avoid the shade which ruined their crops today would not dare admit the crime which was recently a matter of course. Fire protection has become so much a recognized industry that there are sinister rumors of fires set by men eager for jobs as fire-fighters.

We still cut each year, in the United States, four times as much timber as is reproduced, but the work of reforestation has begun. The carefully supervised national forests—160,000,000 acres of them—now show a slight balance of receipts over expenditures. Even the cities are beginning to have their own forests. Fitchburg, Massachusetts, has begun to make its forest pay. Rochester, Gloversville, and Glens Falls, N. Y., have their city forests, and those who have strolled through the beautiful city forests of German towns know how much they may add to a city's resources. Within another decade, although the South and West will still be deforesting themselves, the East may be gaining on itself. The next generation of American small boys will not be without woods in which to play Indian.

What Every Veteran Knows

By A. HAMILTON GIBBS

THE date of the next war has been variously set for 1929, 1934, and 1939. As, of course, it is going to be a world war the question of who will declare it against whom is unimportant.

What matters is what we are going to do about it—"we" meaning you and I, individual citizens. The last one as the war to end war was a conspicuous failure. The admission of this failure was made on Armistice Day. Since then the proof of the evaporation of whatever will to peace there was can be partly found in the purely physical expression of death rays, amphibious tanks that are faster than cavalry, and gas bombs that will exterminate cities. Then, too, there is oil. At the moment it is underground in more senses than one. But economically and psychologically we are in status quo, and a little bit more so.

They sprung that last show on us too quickly. Most of us hadn't time to do any thinking. Only those who were on the inside were able to jump to cover. The rest were in from the drop of the hat. But from now on the other fellow isn't going to do our thinking for us. In case the next war should break in five or ten years from now, we have got comfortable time to decide whether we shall be brigadier generals, profiteers, or temporary members of a government prison.

That is the purely personal equation. The wider and really important aspect of the problem is whether we shall let it happen at all.

Supposing the show should begin in 1949. How would you like that corking little boy of yours to be the Unknown Soldier of the next war? Incidentally, do you think he would like it any more than you would have? Of course now the Unknown Soldier is enviably enshrined in marble in the capitals of many nations; and statesmen and generals bear him official wreaths and orations—which is as it should be. But before that the Unknown Soldier, lousy and soul-battered, went over the top and stopped a shell. The chances are that he didn't die at once. He probably lay there for hours, pursuing his motionless way through aeons of pain, calling on Jesus to put him out of his agony and let him die. . . . In the last show, you remember, you and I passed hundreds of them as they lay screaming and disemboweled. We hadn't time to stop and try to bandage them. There was a war on and so we had to pretend not to hear them. But we still can at night sometimes.

So I say again, what are we going to do about it, you and I who know that war is "the bunk"? Something or nothing? Are we going to remain inert and let another generation fester and rot in shell holes while we, with sadistic sorrow, salute the flag and say: "I have given my son!"?

If anybody has read thus far, I can imagine him saying: "Who is this fellow? What does he know about it, anyway?"

I can only refer him to the English military records which show that I was in France in 1914 as a private and, after four and a half years fighting on various fronts, was demobilized as a major of artillery with a trifling disability on account of being gassed and a souvenir in the form of a silver cross that was pinned to my chest by His Britannic Majesty in one of the somewhat crowded rooms of Buckingham Palace—a rather more trying experience, in some ways, than the strafe which got me the cross.

It will be admitted, therefore, that I am, unimaginably enough, what is known as a veteran of the World War; one of those young-old persons into whose hands a rifle was thrust with the words: "Go out and fight, hero!"—young enough then to believe that I was helping to end war by fighting, old enough now to know better.

One of my numerous brothers was a war correspondent. He was honest enough, in writing an introduction to a war book that I wrote immediately after the armistice, to say that although my protest voiced the opinion of millions of fighting soldiers, still that protest was incoherent; that neither they nor I had found the answer.

He was right.

But six years have elapsed since then. We've had time to let our experience crystallize, to let all the emotional froth blow away, and to be able to assume a thoughtful, reasoned attitude toward this next war which, we are told calmly, will wipe out civilization. Personally I think that is entirely absurd. The economic system, as we now know it, may go to smash. A number of so-called sovereign states may lose their sovereignty. But civilization, which wrung its hands a few years ago at the cry of Armageddon and bemoaned the youth of the world lying dead on the battlefields of France, is still humping along, and still will be long after the conclusion of the next war.

The point that I wish to make is that apart from its being a repetition of wholesale murder, the next war is not only a waste of time, a completely unintelligent spending of energy, but a confession of our utter lack of gray matter. Why? Because there need not be a next war! If you don't believe this, ask H. G. Wells, or Frank Simonds, or Norman Hapgood, or my brother, or any shrewd observer who is not in the political scramble, who has not got some ax to grind.

After all, what is war? It used to be a tribal excursion either for food or revenge. In feudal days it became a baronial picnic. After the industrial revolution it was assumed to be the ultimate economic weapon. Today it has been proved not only economically unsound but ethically criminal. Every nation engaged in the World War spent millions of dollars in publicity in the effort to disclaim any responsibility for starting it, and other millions in camouflaging the real issues.

It seems to me obvious, therefore, that some psychologists to the contrary notwithstanding, fighting is not an instinct like sex and hunger. Mankind breeds and feeds in the same way as it breathes and sleeps. It has to. But it only fights if the breeding or feeding is interfered with. In other words, it needs a reason to fight, an appeal to the mind first and the emotions afterwards. And that, if civilization means anything, is the proof that there is no need for a next war.

There was, of course, absolutely no need for the last one. If all the White Papers and foreign-office files were examined, you would find that eight million people were killed as a result of misunderstanding and misrepresentation. The trouble is that nations, like individuals, do not like to admit having made fools of themselves; and though we are all united in declaring war a crime and, more importantly, that it does not pay, yet there is no one nation with courage enough and brains enough to make the gesture of chucking the lethal weapons away and to announce that it intends to sink or swim on a peace plank.

It is almost time someone tried it out. The Bible says that those who live by the sword shall perish by the sword—but nobody believes in the Bible any more. All right. Take up a history book. You'll have a hard time disproving Christ's statement. A few years ago when the Wrights tried to fly everybody howled with laughter and said that they were crazy, going in the face of nature. Today there are air mail boxes in the streets of New York. Flying is a part of our daily life. Yesterday every nation spent every nickel it had in building instruments of warfare in order to end war. Tomorrow the only instruments of warfare left in the world will be in museums.

Is tomorrow such a long way off? The idea of living without war is much less fantastic than the Wrights's idea of flying, and they were successful for two very simple reasons: they were not afraid, and they kept on working.

Judging by the contempt with which the word pacifist is uttered, one would imagine that to work for peace was a shameful and cowardly thing. Oddly enough, I can't remember ever having heard Christ called a coward. For that matter it would be quite unbecoming to call the veterans of the World War cowards, and yet I don't believe there is a single one of them who is not a pacifist. Incidentally, every militarist is really a pacifist, too, only he doesn't see that he is going all round the bush. He wants to impose peace by destruction. The non-militarist wants to bring it about by construction. That's the only difference, except that the militarist has a blind spot in that he won't see that it will take him a far longer time to reach the objective.

Here we are, then, all desirous of peace, each group convinced that its way is the only way of getting it. At the moment the non-fighters are far outnumbered by the fighters and the non-combatants. I lump these latter with the fighters because it has been well and truly said that war has no fury like a non-combatant. As far as the next war is concerned it looks as if the "ayes" have it; but, and this is also true, the non-combatant may be likened to a third political party which, knowing that it can not get into power, will vote for that one of the other two parties whose promises sound better. It is human, after all, to expect a quid pro quo. So it is not unreasonable to suppose that if we veteran ex-militarists offer the non-combatant group a better quid than the militarists we may get our numerical share of the quo.

In a nutshell the situation is this: The militarist, who is preparing now, says: "The next war may wipe out civilization. We are going to fight to save it!" You remember how successful he was in the war to end war! The non-militarist, on the other hand, seems to be on pretty firm ground, logically, when he says: "If none of us fight there won't be a next war. Civilization can't be wiped out!"

The defense rests.

How naive to say: "If none of us fight"! I can almost hear the howls of derision, the yells of "How are you going to stop it?"—which, after all, is only another way of phrasing my own question: What are we going to do about it?

There are a great many things which you and I, with the background of our war record, can do. Most of us have in a drawer somewhere an old tunic on which are sewn wound stripes and decorations. It is locked away out of sight for the same reason that most of us have kept our mouths shut and refused to utter a word about the Great War. I would say then, first of all, let us come out of our silence. Let us tell the truth as we have learned it in sweat and blood—the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help us God! We know that war is "the bunk." If we don't know it, who does? With the weight of veteranship behind us every word that we say will have to be listened to. Except for a few isolated voices here and there the world has never had the truth about war dinned into its ears. It has had a vast amount of untruth and a quantity of half-truth, which is, perhaps, the most insidious of all. There is no one to blame but ourselves. We have retired into that obstinate conspiracy of silence from which, as yet, nothing has been able to drag us. As a form of self-protection it was permissible during that brief period when the peace-idea was fashionable. But that has been discarded now and there is more than talk of this next war. The newspapers print photographs of new guns that will shoot farther than the Big Berthas. Every day brings its invention of a new ray or gas, its mention of a bigger fleet of war planes; and behind it all are the impotence of the League of Nations and the edginess between government and government. Of course, one appreciates the tremendous difficulties that block the path of those who run a country but, to a pseudo-intelligent onlooker, the only possible conclusion to be drawn from the recent breaking of a certain Gentleman's Agreement is that because some flatulent politician saw fit to make a grand gesture, with nothing more admirable in view than winning a few votes for his party, another generation may have to march to an unnecessary and unspeakable death.

Shall we still remain silent?

Then there is another weapon against war that has never been used—laughter. War can be laughed, ridiculed, off the face of the earth. Think of "the glory of the trenches," the "living bayonets," the "privates who would rather fight than eat." The ghastly humor of all that stuff appeals to us. We know! But the non-combatants don't. They take it all literally—as it was intended that they should in order to keep the game going. They still believe that war is glorious, that generals are heroes, that we went over the top eagerly and joyously, filled with a righteous and blessed hate of the enemy. They still believe in "the Hun atrocities" and all the priceless inventions of the various bureaus of propaganda. Of course they believe it. We did, too, until we got into the firing line and saw the joke for ourselves across barbed wire decorated with corpses. That's why I've suggested that if we are only going to take the next war personally we've got ample time to decide whether we'll be generals, with all the "kudos" and none of the risk, or profiteers with government backing who can clean up safely from the outside, or join the small but determined band who will march to the nearest prison and demand government hospitality during the course of hostilities.

One cannot particularly blame those generals and profiteers in the last war. They were not entirely aware of what they were doing. But two blacks don't make a white, and if any of us, knowing what we know, should do it in the next war our name would be worse than mud. Most of us, however, are taking it a little more seriously than that. We have come to the conclusion that living for one's country is, after all, a great deal more useful, and far harder, than dying for it. And although, as yet, we have observed no guaranteed cure for war-cancer, we can at least apply the modern treatments of truth and ridicule. We can show it up to our friends, write about it, contradict the lies that are told on public platforms, and do much to destroy the popular sentiment about it that exists only from thoughtlessness and ignorance.

All those things can be accomplished in the ordinary process of everyday living. If we feel it deeply enough to set ourselves a real and constructive task, we can see that our children are not educated in mere flag-waving, but grow up in the belief that not only they personally were born free and equal, but that all men are, independently of race and country. We can see that our politicians live up to their responsibilities—by rubbing their noses in it any time they perpetrate a grand gesture. And we can see to it that similar loud-mouthed utterances on the part of foreign politicians are not interpreted as expressions of that nation's feeling, but are merely read as the indulgence of the individual ego of a man who has fallen down on his job.

We have proved already that we are not afraid. There will be no next war if we keep on working.

Henry Cabot Lodge—A Scholar in Politics

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THUS Henry Cabot Lodge was hailed when first he entered political life—a scholar in politics. A man of more than comfortable means, he had taken his A.B., LL.B., and Ph.D. at Harvard, had been for three years editor of the North American Review, for two years editor of the International Review, a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and had written several excellent biographies, besides a useful short history of the English colonies in America—all this before he was thirty-three years old. Men like Carl Schurz, Edwin L. Godkin, George William Curtis, and Governor Boutwell looked with profoundest satisfaction upon Lodge's coming into public life as they did upon the political debut of his friend Theodore Roosevelt. Together with others of the same caliber, their appearance gave rise to the hope that a new and golden era in our politics was at hand. It was a delusion for those who placed ideals above party loyalty, for both Lodge and Roosevelt, after fighting staunchly at the Republican convention in 1884 against the nomination of James G. Blaine because of his unfitness, after declaring that they would bolt if he were chosen to lead the party, finally decided that they would make their fight for reform within the party and violated their consciences by swallowing the man they had declared hopelessly blemished.

Not unnaturally, the then editor of The Nation could not refrain from pointing the moral when the news came that Henry Cabot Lodge had been defeated for Congress at the 1884 election, which placed Grover Cleveland in the White House. His words are worth reprinting for several reasons:

> The defeat of Mr. Cabot Lodge for Congress in Massachusetts is to be regretted because he would undoubtedly have made a good legislator; but it is to be rejoiced over because it is a distinct discouragement to his kind of politician—we mean the kind furnished by nature and art with every assistance in being better than they are, but who refuse it vigorously, and insist on being bad or mediocre. It is the special function of such men to make a good show of moral fiber at great crises, and when they fail there is really nothing left of them. It was undoubtedly due to Mr. Lodge's influence that Mr. Theodore Roosevelt threw away the admirable position he had acquired in the politics of this State last spring, by not only coming out for Blaine but going back on Governor Cleveland. They put their heads together and thought they would show the theorists a wonderful "wrinkle" in the way of practicalness, and now they are both out in the cold, and their natural friends and allies are not sorry, and the real "practical men" are laughing at them. It is, however, never too late to mend.

The hostilities thus established never ended during Mr. Lodge's lifetime. As long as he was editor of The Nation Mr. Godkin lost no opportunity to use grape upon the renegade scholar from Massachusetts—and there were plenty of good opportunities, for Mr. Lodge was elected to Congress in 1887 and immediately began to make himself felt. In that year he defended the sale of the governorship of Rhode Island to a rich New Yorker by the gang of corrupt politicians who then, and for many years thereafter, controlled that State. "The American stump has seen many strange things," wrote Mr. Godkin, "but nothing stranger than a man of fortune and a scholar, a Harvard graduate and quondam instructor, and an author of some repute, perorating publicly against the people who object to this degrading [Rhode Island] spectacle as 'guilty of a mixture of sham morals and false issues which is revolting to any honest-minded man.'" Mr. Lodge's apostasy to the cause of tariff reform which he had championed in his biographies of Hamilton and Webster and his final swallowing of the extreme protection doctrine similarly brought down upon him the editorial thunder, and so did his extraordinary vagaries in the matter of the gold standard and in the field of international politics.

Strange as it may seem, this man, who was in his later years voted an Anglomaniac, began his political career as a most deliberate and determined tail-twister of the British Lion, in which pastime no Fenian exceeded him. He was for war with England not once but a dozen times. As far back as 1895 he announced in the Senate that we were "a part of the European balance of power. As in 1778 and 1812, we shall find ourselves in practical alliance with Russia and France, and in practical hostility to England and the Dreibund [Austria, Germany, and Italy]." His reason for this was that "Halifax is a menace to us, Bermuda is a menace to us, and so is Kingston. . . ." Therefore we must enter an alliance with France and Russia "because, so long as Great Britain remains a power on this continent, in Canada, we can be nowhere else" than hand in glove with Paris and St. Petersburg. When Grover Cleveland sent to Congress his amazing and still inexplicable Venezuelan Message which so nearly precipitated war with Great Britain, Senator Lodge fairly threw himself into Cleveland's arms—up to that time he had assailed and maligned him at every opportunity. They became brothers before the war-god. Curiously enough, his change of opinion as to England came while he was writing his "Story of the Revolution" in 1897. At the outset the book abounds in the conventional violent abuse of England's conduct as the ruler of the American colonies. "When he began to write," a reviewer declared, "it was the fashion to curse England, and he cursed her soundly. When he ended everyone was falling on England's neck, and he fell, blubbering with the rest."

Until that conversion Senator Lodge injected his hatred of England even into economic and monetary discussions. Incredible as it will now seem to Wall Street, Senator Lodge was for years an ardent pro-silverite and opponent of the gold standard. To oppose the latter he wanted on April 6, 1895, in a speech in the Senate, to boycott England, if not to war upon her. These were his words—not the words of Bryan:

> The gold monometallic policy of Great Britain, now in force among all great civilized nations, is, I believe, the great enemy of good business throughout the world at the moment. Therefore, it seems to me, if there is any way in which we can strike England's trade or her moneyed interest, it is our clear policy to do so in the interest of silver.

All of which did not prevent the Senator from Massachusetts from joining, just fifteen months later, in the hue and cry over William Jennings Bryan for taking the same position. Nobody could have been more unctuous than Henry Cabot Lodge or held up his hands in holier horror over the rude and violent Nebraskan whose sole offense was that, like Mr. Lodge prior to the Democratic nomination, he did not want humanity crucified on a cross of gold. Commenting on Senator Lodge's Carnegie Hall speech on September 28, 1896, The Nation, after quoting from the Herald that Mr. Lodge received the ovation of the evening for his "terse and scathing arraignment of the sponsors of the silver movement," pointed out that "he should have included himself in the arraignment, for no man has ever been more reckless or shameless in pandering to the silver party and inflaming it to the point of desperation."

Indeed, so superficial is the usual thinking among our financial and social leaders that such lapses in Senator Lodge as well as his inconsistencies and his deliberate turning his back upon traditions and standards to which he was pledged by birth, antecedents, and training were hardly noted by the powers that be in Massachusetts. True, a vigorous minority of conscience ever fought him, and in his last campaign for reelection he won by a mere handful of votes. But State Street and the Back Bay could find nothing wrong when he backed the Force Bill in 1889 and 1890 and declared that he was willing if necessary to place a file of United States soldiers at every polling-place in the South. When he sought to gerrymander the State of Massachusetts in the most outrageous way in his own interest it seemed to them the right thing to do. They found no fault with his belligerency against England, his persistent imperialistic policy in regard to the Philippines, the South American countries, and the rest of the world. They were certain that the interests not only of New England but of the whole country were safe in his hands, and so he became, with the lapse of years, one of the leaders and dictators of the Republican Party, a chieftain of the Old Guard, a maker of Presidents, and the bosom friend and adviser of more than one. No one could question his ability, his political skill, his historical knowledge, or his power.

To the average politician he remained the cold intellectual, the "highbrow." And yet they came to value him as one of the greatest window-dressers of their party and defenders of its misdeeds. Take, for instance, the postal scandals in 1903. His defense then reads exactly as would have read his defense of the scandals of the Harding Administration had his health permitted him to take part in the campaign which has just ended. Thus, he was certain in July, 1903, that the postal scandals could only have a favorable effect upon the fortunes of the Republican Party. He did not, of course, dwell upon the fact that a gang of Republican rascals and thieves had been enriching themselves at the expense of the government, but, like Calvin Coolidge, he stressed the fact that some of them had been found out and that the party was in the process of punishing them.

When the war came Mr. Lodge was once more compelled to throw himself into the arms of a Democratic President whom he loathed. He who had wanted for so many years to war against England warred side by side with England with all the enthusiasm he had lavished upon his efforts to force us into hostilities with her. His war speeches, now separately published, give the Wall Street side of the war to perfection and the British case in all its passion and all its falsity. He was then a regular of the regulars—until the Treaty of Versailles. As to that, politics never made stranger bedfellows than the cause which put under the same blanket Senator Lodge and the editors of The Nation—he hated it as much as we. Of course Lodge's personal dislike of Wilson had much to do with his opposition to the treaty, but there was sincerity in it, too. He acted according to his lights and he stood his ground, though he came in, for the first time, for a tremendous amount of personal abuse, some from old friends. All of which he received with characteristically sharp cynicism. It was his last great fight and he enjoyed his triumph to the brim, believing that he rendered to his country his greatest service. Some will never forgive him for it; to others it outweighs his sins.

But as the years passed by some things did happen to Henry Cabot Lodge which must have made many of his triumphs turn to ashes in his hands. True, he remained the darling of the Back Bay. There were men, like the late Professor Barrett Wendell of Harvard, who believed to the end that Henry Cabot Lodge was the finest modern product of American statesmanship. His hold upon big business was never shaken until 1924. The great mill-owners, protected manufacturers, and banking houses knew he was theirs, so much so that they did not have to tell him what they wanted. He knew instinctively. Was he not one of them? But when he favored the soldiers' bonus, and voted for it even over the veto of President Coolidge, State Street rose in anger and Mr. Lodge knew what it was to experience popular ingratitude, or rather ingratitude at the hands of those whom he had served most faithfully. It is the irony of fate, too, that this blue blood of the blue bloods, this Brahmin of the Boston Brahmins, this pillar of Harvard University and the church and every other venerable institution, this worshiper of the god of things as they are, should have been edged out of his commanding position in the party by another Massachusetts man—Calvin Coolidge—his very antithesis in breeding, training, and tradition. At the last Republican convention Henry Cabot Lodge was a pitiful figure. He was occasionally called to the platform publicly for consultation, but he was a feeble old man whose power had so evidently passed that his fall was the subject of various letters by correspondents who witnessed it. This veteran pilot of his party President Coolidge dropped, sent over the side, knowing full well that the pilot had lost his skill and his strength and that he was at the end of his career. It was the farmer's boy who gave the final push to the scholar in politics.

What is the moral of it all? What encouragement is there to be drawn from the achievements of this scholar in politics? Precious little for those who believe that all would be well in America if only all the offices could be filled with aristocratic gentlemen of ancient lineage, men of wealth, writers of pleasant essays, representatives of success in business, favorites of "society." There is nothing in Henry Cabot Lodge's career to furnish a text to youth, to inspire young men. He was a compromiser of compromisers; for office and party loyalty he sold himself not once but endless times. On the side of the privileged and the larger battalions he, save only once, invariably trimmed his sails to favoring breezes. Men will read his books, a few his speeches; they will find nowhere the divine afflatus and never will it be truthfully claimed for him that he broadened the range of American idealism, or brought the achievement of our ideals an hour nearer, or advanced in any way the brotherhood of man.

New Morals for Old

Women and the New Morality

By BEATRICE M. HINKLE

IN the general discussions of morality which are the fashion just now, sex morality seems to occupy the chief place. Indeed, judging from the amount of talk on this subject one would be inclined to think it the outstanding problem of our time. Certainly the whole of humanity is concerned in and vitally affected by the sexual aspect of life. Sexuality in its capacity for transformation is the source of power underlying the creativeness of man. In its direct expression, including its influence on human relationships in general, it is woman's particular concern. The position of importance it is assuming seems, therefore, to be justified, regardless of the protests of the intellect and the wish of the ego to minimize its significance.

A general weakening of traditional standards of ethics and morals and their gradual loss of control over the conduct of individuals have long been observed in other activities—in business affairs and in the world of men's relations with each other. This has taken place so quietly and with so much specious rationalizing that sharp practices and shady conduct which formerly would have produced scandals, shame, and social taboos now scarcely cause a protest from society. These aspects of morality belong to the masculine world in particular and produce little agitation, while the upheaval in sex morals particularly affects the feminine world and by many people can scarcely be considered calmly enough for an examination. The changes in this field are the most recent and are being produced by women; they are taking place in full view of all with no apologies and with little hesitation. They appear, therefore, most striking and disturbing. It can be said that in the general disintegration of old standards, women are the active agents in the field of sexual morality and men the passive, almost bewildered accessories to the overthrow of their long and firmly organized control of women's sexual conduct.

The old sex morality, with its double standard, has for years been criticized and attacked by fair-minded persons of both sexes. It has been recognized that this unequal condition produced effects as unfortunate for the favored sex as for the restricted one, and that because of this it could not be maintained indefinitely by a psychologically developing people. As a matter of course, when people mentioned the single standard they meant the standard governing women, ignoring the fact that it is easier to break down restrictions than to force them upon those who have hitherto enjoyed comparative freedom. Furthermore, it was not realized that a sex morality imposed by repression and the power of custom creates artificial conceptions and will eventually break down.

This forced morality is in fact at the present time quite obviously disintegrating. We see women assuming the right to act as their impulses dictate with much the same freedom that men have enjoyed for so long. The single standard is rapidly becoming a fait accompli, but instead of the standard identified with women it is nearer the standard associated with men. According to a universal psychological law, actual reality eventually overtakes and replaces the cultural ideal.

Although this overthrow of old customs and sex ideals must be chiefly attributed to the economic independence of women brought about through the industrialism of our age, it is safe to say that no man thought ahead far enough or understood the psychology of women sufficiently to anticipate the fruit of this economic emancipation. As long as women were dependent on men for the support of themselves and their children there could be no development of a real morality, for the love and the feeling of the woman were so intermingled with her economic necessities that the higher love impulse was largely undifferentiated from the impulse of self-preservation. True morality can only develop when the object or situation is considered for itself, not when it is bound up with ulterior and extraneous elements which vitiate the whole. The old morality has failed and is disintegrating fast, because it was imposed from without instead of evolving from within.

A morality which has value for all time and is not dependent upon custom or external cultural fashions can arise only from a high development of the psychological functions of thinking and feeling, with the developed individual as the determiner of values instead of general custom or some one else's opinion. The function of feeling and the realm of the emotions have universally been regarded as woman's special province; therefore it is women who are specially concerned with testing out moral values involving sexual behavior.

Women have been reproached by men again and again as being only sexual creatures, and they have meekly accepted the reproach. Instead of examining the statement, they have adopted the sexual problem of men as their own, and with it the weight of man's conflict and his articulateness. For sexuality as a problem and a conflict definitely belongs to man's psychology; it is he primarily who has been ashamed of his domination by this power and has struggled valiantly to free himself; his egotistic and sexual impulses have always been at war with each other. But whoever heard of women being ashamed of yielding to the power of love? Instead they gloried in the surrender of themselves and counted themselves blessed when love ruled. It is this need of man to escape from the power of the sensual appeal that has made him scorn sex and look upon the great creative power of life as something shameful and inferior—made him treat it as a joke or with the indifferent superficiality which betrays emasculation and inadequacy.

One has only to "listen in" where any large group of men, young or old, are gathered together in easy familiarity (the army camps were recent examples on a large scale) to discover the degree to which sexuality still dominates the minds of men, even though its expression is confined so largely to the jocose and the obscene. Many men can corroborate this report from a military camp: "We have sexuality in all its dirty and infantile forms served daily for breakfast, lunch, and dinner." It is the inferior and inadequate aspect of masculine sexuality that made it necessary for man to conceive of it as something shameful and unclean, and to insist that woman must carry his purity for him and live the restrictions and suppressions that rightly belonged to him. Woman on her part became an easy victim of his ideas and convictions, because of the very fact that the function of feeling and the emotions so largely dominate her psychology. The translation of feeling into thought-forms has been slow and difficult. About herself woman has been quite inarticulate and largely unconscious. This inarticulateness inevitably made her accept man's standards and values for her, for little directed thinking is achieved without form and words. Because of her sexual fruitfulness woman had no sexual conflict; therefore, man easily unloaded his psychological burden upon her, and claimed freedom for the satisfaction of his own desires.

Thus woman was made a symbol or personification of man's morality. She had to live for him that which he was unable to live for himself. This was the reason for his indignation at moral transgressions on her part. She had injured the symbol and revealed his weakness to him.

This lack of adequate self-consciousness in woman, her general inability to translate feeling into forms capable of being understood by the masculine mind, accounts for her acceptance of the statements made about her by men. There is no doubt that woman's inarticulateness about herself, even when her feelings were very different from those she was told were normal, has been responsible for a vast amount of the nonsense written about her.

When women discovered, however, that they could be economically independent of men they commenced to find themselves interesting. As they have gradually come to think for themselves about fundamental questions there has begun a tremendous activity and busyness in regard to the very subject which was previously taboo.

A recent writer boasts that men have changed their attitude toward sexual problems very little and are not much concerned in the new interest of women. This is probably true, for man has contributed all he has to give to the subject. He has laid down his taboos and externalized his restrictions, chiefly applicable to the other sex, and he is finished with the subject—bored by having it thrust forward as an unfinished problem needing reconsideration. All of this knowledge or understanding of the sexual aspect of life—the aspect underlying human creativeness, the faulty development of which is responsible for a large part of his woes, "can be told in two hours to any intelligent sixteen-year-old boy," another writer recently stated. It is this youthful ignorance and assurance that the last word has been spoken on this subject that has awakened women, no longer dependent economically, to the fact that they must also become independent of men intellectually if they wish to gain expression for their knowledge or to form rules of conduct based on their own psychology. In the true scientific spirit of the age they are now experimenting and using nature's method of trial and error to find out for themselves by conscious living experience what feeling has vaguely told them. This is the first step toward objectifying and clarifying woman's intuitive knowledge.

With the revolt of women against the old restrictions and the demand for freedom to experience for themselves, there has appeared a most significant phase of the changed morality—the new relation of women toward each other. The significance of this enormous change which has been taking place very quietly and yet very rapidly is scarcely appreciated. When one realizes that only a generation ago the newspapers were still publishing their funny paragraphs at the expense of women ("The dear creatures; how they love one another") the great difference in their relations today becomes evident. The generally accepted distinction between the personal loyalties of the sexes can be summed up in the statement that women are loyal in love and disloyal in friendship, while men are loyal in friendship and disloyal in love. It is this attitude of women that is gradually disappearing with the awakening of a new sense of themselves as individuals.

Their changed attitude toward each other—the recognition of their own values, and the growing realization that only in solidarity can any permanent impression be made on the old conception of woman as an inferior, dependent creature, useful for one purpose only—constitutes the most marked difference between their present social condition and that of the past.

As long as women remained psychologically unawakened, their individual values were swallowed up in their biological value for the race. They were under the unconscious domination of their sexual fruitfulness and an enemy of themselves as individuals. Weininger gives as the chief difference between the masculine and feminine creeds that "Man's religion consists in a supreme belief in himself—woman's in a supreme belief in other people." These other people being men, the sex rivalry among women that has so long stood in the way of their further development is easily understood. It has been a vicious circle which could only be broken by women's gaining another significance in the eyes of the world and in their own eyes. This other significance is their new economic importance.

It makes little difference within the social structure how many individual women have forged a position for themselves and have won a freedom and independence equal to that possessed by the ordinary man, so long as they are isolated phenomena having little understanding of the peculiar difficulties and problems of women as a whole, and no relation with each other. These women have existed in all culture periods, but they have produced little effect upon the social condition or psychology of women in general. There was no group action because the majority of women were inarticulate. The woman who was different became abnormal in the eyes of the world.

This passive acceptance of the opinions of others has been most disastrous for woman's development. Her superior psychological processes consist of feelings and intuitions, and when these are stultified or violated by being forced into a false relation, or are inhibited from development, the entire personality is crippled. The inadequate development of the function of thought and the dominating role played by the function of feeling in the psychology of woman have produced an obviously one-sided effect and have caused men to postulate theories about her which are given forth as though they were the last word to be said—fixed and unchangeable. Indeed, the statement that women are incapable of change and that no growth is possible for them is one of the favorite assertions of masculine writers on the subject of women's psychology. As the present is the first time in our historical period in which there has been any general opportunity for women as a whole to think for themselves and to develop in new ways, the basis for this assertion does not exist, and it obviously conceals an unconscious wish that women should not change.

The effect of collective ideas and cultural traditions upon the personality is immeasurable. The greatest general change that is taking place today is the weakening of these ideas and the refusal of women to be bound by them. Women are for the first time demanding to live the forbidden experiences directly and draw conclusions on this basis. I do not mean to imply that traditional moral standards controlling woman's sexual conduct have never been transgressed in the past. They have very frequently been transgressed, but secretly and without inner justification. The great difference today lies in the open defiance of these customs with feelings of entire justification, or even without recognizing a necessity for justification. In other words, there has arisen a feeling of moral rightness in the present conduct, and wrongness in the former morality. Actually the condition is one in which natural, long-restrained desire is being substituted for collective moral rules, and individuals are largely becoming a law unto themselves. It is difficult to predict what will be the result of the revolt, but it is certain that this is the preceding condition which renders it possible for a new morality in the real sense to be born within the individual. It has already produced the first condition of all conscious psychic development—a moral conflict—and woman has gained a problem.

In the general chaos of conflicting feelings she is losing her instinctive adaptation to her biological role as race bearer, and is attempting adaptations to man's reality. She is making the effort to win for herself some differentiation and development of the ego function apart from her instinctive processes. This is the great problem confronting woman today: How can she gain a relation to both racial and individual obligations, instead of possessing one to the exclusion of the other? Must she lose that which has been and still is her greatest strength and value? I for one do not think so, although I am fully conscious of the tremendous psychic effort and responsibility involved in the changing standards. It is necessary that women learn to accept themselves and to value themselves as beings possessing a worth at least equal to that of the other sex, instead of unthinkingly accepting standards based on masculine psychology. Then women will recognize the necessity of developing their total psychic capacities just as it is necessary for men to do, but they will see that this does not involve imitation of men or repudiation of their most valuable psychic functioning. The real truth is that it has at last become apparent to many women that men cannot redeem them.

It is not the purpose of this article to deal with the practical issues involved in the new moral freedom. One thing, however, is clearly evident: women are demanding a reality in their relations with men that heretofore has been lacking, and they refuse longer to cater to the traditional notions of them created by men, in which their true feelings and personalities were disregarded and denied. This is the first result of the new morality.

Sonnet

By MARIE LUHRS

Time, of all artists, draws most clear, most true;
He washes out the false and careless line;
What should be red he never kills with blue;
His pictures are not Ikons for a shrine.
He paints this unsung queen beloved and soft,
And that one hard for all her sonneteers;
Beneath his brush Caesar is drawn aloft
And little men are shadowed by their fears.
And when I am composed within Time's dream
I shall be drawn in shadow dark and blue;
I am no queen who lost a throne for you;
I am another leaf spun on a stream.
Still, queens in love were light leaves only. They Quivered and cried—there is no other way.

Cows

By MARIE LUHRS

Tethered they trample a field without bars,
Petals and green leaves, red fruit and white stars
Under their hoofs till the boy with the shears
Cuts the unraveling rope of their years.

And where they will pull up their grasses then
Is the cud they have chewed since God knows when;
Their jaws are still working, their mouths look wise;
Did you ever see the tears in their eyes?

Women in the Progressive Movement

By ISABELLE KENDIG

THE criticism which I heard most frequently of the Progressive Party concerned the position that was accorded to women in the movement. It was pointed out with truth that out of fourteen members of the national joint executive committee, which directed the campaign, only two were women; that the recommendation of the national women's division to enlarge the committee to give equal representation to women, together with the twelve additional names of women nominated for it, received a pocket veto; that no women served as State chairmen, though in at least one State the logical choice was a woman; and that women on the whole played a small part in shaping the policies of the campaign. It was pointed out, to the disparagement of the Progressives, that both the Republicans and the Democrats were more generous in their treatment of women, and gave them equal positions on all committees.

The truth of these charges unfortunately had to be admitted, but we claimed, and I believe truly, that while both old parties have been forced to concede increasing position and power to women, political opportunity for women lies in the development of a new liberal movement. This is because both the Democratic and Republican parties crystallized years ago—and crystallized without embodying the viewpoint of women.

The failure to play a bigger part in the Progressive campaign, despite their devoted work for the "Cause," had two reasons at bottom. First, the lack of organized demand for greater recognition on the part of the women themselves; and second, the reluctance of the men to concede equal power to women.

A conference of Progressive women is to be held in Washington in December to consider the advisability of permanent organization. Two plans will undoubtedly be discussed—the maintenance of a women's division or women's bureau within the movement; and the abolition of all women's divisions and the insistence on working side by side with men on an equal footing.

In the Progressive campaign women functioned through national and State women's divisions, except in the States of Washington and Ohio, where they worked directly with men. Results varied in the different States according to the degree of cooperation between the general campaign committees and the women's committees. In general, however, the result was to sidetrack the women's activities. Being in a department of their own, they found themselves excluded from conferences and discussions on all questions of general policies. Even their autonomy in their own department was curtailed by their dependence on the general committee for finances, as it was part of the plan in the national office and in many of the States that the women's divisions, though separate, should not maintain separate treasuries. Thus in most instances the women in the campaign found themselves out of the main current of the movement entirely, or asked only to perform minor functions, frequently social, in typical "ladies' auxiliary" fashion. As a result of such experience, I believe that the consensus of opinion among Progressive women will be strongly opposed to the continuance of women's divisions or bureaus in any future party or campaign organization.

The swing to the other extreme, which is to work in the liberal movement side by side with men, without organization, however, also has its dangers. It undoubtedly represents the ideal, for it puts women into politics as human beings and not as a sex. Even now it probably brings greater advancement for the individual woman who enters politics on this basis, but it does not solve the two present fundamental problems—getting women into the Progressive movement and securing adequate recognition for them.

It is generally recognized that women lag politically. For some time to come a special effort will be necessary to enlist women in politics. But once enlisted, how do they fare? They experience at once the unconscious antagonism which any governing class bears toward the encroachments of a new group. Conceding men their full share of generosity and tolerance, it is still too much to expect that they will relinquish their centuries of vested interest in politics and government without considerable pressure. They recognize the need for women's votes. Their sense of justice and fair play leads them to offer women certain honors. But they retain and, perhaps more or less unconsciously, intend to retain the key positions in their own hands. Women may receive full honors as chairmen of women's divisions; they may secure the chairmanship of unimportant mixed committees or the nomination for minor offices. But the chairmanship of all important committees and party indorsement for all major offices which there is reasonable hope of winning inevitably go to men. In general, when the history of the emancipation of women is written, this period will be known as the period of her Vice-Chairmanship!

Since these conditions are based on human nature, they exist not only in the old parties but in the Progressive movement as well, and may be definitely expected to manifest themselves in any new party which may be formed. It is therefore not enough merely to abolish the women's division idea and substitute work together within the movement on an equal footing. During this period of transition while women are slowly finding their place in the world of politics and government, their individual efforts must be supplemented by the work of a strong independent organization of liberal women affiliated with the movement but outside the party organization.

The functions of such an organization would be twofold—to bring women into the movement and to secure full recognition for them. Its program would include enlistment and organization of women in the Progressive movement between campaigns as distinguished from the work of the mixed campaign or party committees which would put these women to work in any particular election. It would stand and work for equal and democratic representation for women in campaign and party councils, special indorsement of qualified women candidates for public office, and emphasis on inclusion in party platforms of policies which especially appeal to progressive women.

To have real weight, such an organization must be a recognized part of the liberal movement. It should be affiliated with the Conference for Progressive Political Action, if that continues to be the organized expression of the various progressive groups, or with a new party if one is formed. In this way it would have the same relation to the movement that affiliated farm and labor organizations now have. The sine qua non of its effectiveness, however, will be its independence and its control over its own funds.

She Does Not List So Much

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE customary contemporary picture of the American ship of state shows the ship with a Coolidge crew of hardy conservative mariners all gathered near the starboard rail and pressing the rail down almost into the happy water, while on the port or left or radical or progressive side of the ship there is virtually nobody visible any more.

This picture is a considerable exaggeration. Under our form of government, which has its own peculiar merits, and under our illogical party system, which again has its own peculiar merits, the American ship of state may list like everything in the election statistics and then list hardly at all in practice on the waves of legislation.

The next Congress, in this writer's judgment, will be unlikely to pass any radical legislation and will also be unlikely to pass any reactionary legislation.

The President, in this writer's judgment, will be unlikely to ask the next Congress to pass any reactionary legislation.

The President is not a reactionary.

In order to qualify as a reactionary, a man ought to want to go back from something in the present to something in the past. He ought to sneer at universal suffrage and speak favorably, even if hopelessly, of restricting the suffrage to the well-educated and well-heeled. Or he ought to be in favor of reacting from the civil-service law back to the spoils system. Or he ought to want to abandon direct primaries and again have all nominations made by conventions. Or he ought at least to want to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment.

Any fairly good reactionary wants to repeal the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, Seventeenth, Eighteenth, and Nineteenth amendments. The President, on the contrary, wants to adopt the Twentieth Amendment, although the people of his own State have just rejected that amendment as unduly progressive and centralizing.

Moreover, the President, although he is against centralization and federalization, continues to be in favor of his federal Department of Education. The President also allowed the Republican platform to contain a railroad plank which in apt terms describes the principle of the Howell-Barkley bill (demanded by the railroad trade unions for the reform of the relations between employers and employees on railroads) and then commits the party to that principle. The President additionally is in favor of taking my money and the money of other taxpayers and lending it to farmers who want to buy cows and chickens and pigs and "diversify" their farm output—an idea which to me, who have some capacity for being a reactionary, is shocking in the extreme. I would as soon think of lending governmental money to department stores in order to help them multiply and "diversify" their departments.

As a reactionary, Calvin Coolidge, to my mind, is a substantial disappointment. He wants to go forward to some new things; and I cannot name, and nobody else can name, any old thing to which he is likely to ask Congress to go back—except lower taxes.

To do him justice, although he cannot properly be called a reactionary, he might with some propriety be called an *in*actionary. He sincerely, in spite of some lapses, does think that this inveigling the federal government into doing more and more things should stop.

Suppose, though, that the President did recommend a bill for financing five-and-ten-cent stores to "diversify" themselves into being five-ten-and-fifteen-cent stores. A bill of that sort, according to all the congressional advocates of lending governmental money to farmers, would be very wicked.

How far would the President get with it? How far would he get with—let us say—a ship-subsidy bill? Well, bills still have to go through the Senate in spite of the last election; and anybody who thinks that senators will do what a President says simply because he got a big majority in an election has studied senatorial history with invincible optimism. Certainly in the next Senate, even if the President should recommend any so-called reactionary legislation, which is extremely improbable, there will not be forty-nine senators to give it a majority and an enactment.

In the next Senate suppose that there are as many as fifty-five Republicans. From that fifty-five deduct the five outcasts—La Follette, Ladd, Frazier, Norris, and Brookhart. Then, on almost all sorts of so-called reactionary legislation, deduct Couzens of Michigan, Norbeck of South Dakota, McMaster of South Dakota, Howell of Nebraska, Capper of Kansas, Borah of Idaho, and—but why go on?

The Democrats will almost unanimously vote against any controversial recommendation by the President, especially if it can be called reactionary; because the Democrats are angling for the progressive vote of 1928; and on the Republican side the number of senators favoring reactionary or wicked legislation, on behalf of citizens other than farmers, will not rise to forty-five. The truth is that such legislation will in all probability have just no chance at all in the next Senate.

Meanwhile in the House the Democratic Party will be steering a course filled with large splashes of oratory against reaction and wickedness. There will be 148 Democrats in the next House. One hundred and thirty of them will be there with the indorsement and support (during this last campaign) of the La Follette national congressional organization presided over by Mr. L. E. Sheppard of the Order of Railroad Conductors. Relatively few Republicans had his indorsement, but many Democrats had it. These Republicans and Democrats together constitute much more than one-third of the next House.

Such a House can hardly be said to indicate that the American ship of state will now have nobody on her decks flirting with the left or port side of things where the red lights are. These leftists, for sincere reasons or for insincere reasons, will give the public plenty of warning if they see the Washington Monument being given away to anybody whom they do not like.

The President is going to be sincerely and conscientiously a considerable inactionary about legislation. The Senate is going to contain pretty nearly its usual percentage of wilful men unamenable in any case to presidential dictation. The House is going to contain a large percentage of persons flirting with the prospective possible assets of the proposed new party. The outcome would seem likely to be not much legislation; and the ship will go quarreling on with, as usual, a quite mixed crew.

In the Driftway

WHEN the Sunday newspapers were carrying full-page advertisements portraying in lyric language the delights of the gorgeous new bachelor hotel just built in New York's East Side the Drifter read them without a single leap of the pulse. Pictures of a swimming pool intended to shame the Baths of Caracalla, of apartments furnished, according to the taste of the occupant, in Louis Quinze or Colonial American, of a smoking-room decorated with onyx, jade, and black marble all left him cold. This was partly because the price of this magnificence was far, far beyond his own modest means. But if a windfall had come to him at that moment he would not have had the slightest temptation to establish himself in those quarters where every comfort was assured him, including that of restricting members of the female sex to the first floor only.

* * * * *

A YOUNG woman of the Drifter's acquaintance developed the same theme for her point of view with uncommon eloquence. She had come from a three weeks' sojourn at a hotel in Washington for women, by women, of women. Women waited on her at table, women ran the elevator, women sold papers in the lobby; even the head waiter, that monarch who rules without the aid of parliament or councilors, was smiling, graceful, female. Heatedly the Drifter's young friend denounced her own sex, not because she was so fond of men but because the human animal, she felt, was only endurable by contrast. Which is just about the way the Drifter feels about it.

* * * * *

ACCORDINGLY, the Drifter is amused but by no means injured to learn that the luxurious bachelor hotel, referred to above, is now open to women also. He has no doubt that a few confirmed women-haters now living there will leave in a huff. Unfortunately their places of refuge are becoming scarcer and scarcer; already they complain that the sacred smoking-car is invaded by the female barbarian. But the Drifter does not feel sorry for them. If women wish to smoke, what better place than the place provided for that purpose? If they are interested in bathing, should they not also be admitted to the Baths of Caracalla provided they have the price of a ticket? The men who say No to these questions are simply actuated by fear. Now, the Drifter would not go as far as Mr. H. L. Mencken, whose bravery in saying he understands women perfectly is admirable to a degree; but he will say, boldly and fairly distinctly, that he is not afraid of women. If they wish to establish themselves in the retreats which he favors, they may. If they, on the other hand, prefer a place where he and his sex cannot come, he feels only pity for them, for they are victims of fear, also.

* * * * *

THERE will, of course, be certain men who will stand aghast at this temerity. There will be women who will narrow their eyes and set their teeth in a threatening manner, determined to show this little whippersnapper what is indubitably what. But the Drifter is not even afraid of them. He is attired in armor-plate that no bullet can pierce; if any of his acquaintances should be curious as to the reason, he does not mind telling them: he knows a place where he can go at any time. He can, if he wishes, take anyone he chooses with him; if he wishes, he can go alone, and no one, not even a woman, can accompany him. No, he will not on any account disclose the location of this paradise!

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Now That the Smoke of Battle . . .

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To conform with the vindication of the present Administration I would suggest that Messrs. Fall, Daugherty, and Forbes be returned to their former status and that Mr. Bascom Slemp be made chief of the proposed federal Department of Education.

Stapleton, S. I., November 6 I. S.

La Follette Carried Cleveland

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Robert Marion La Follette carried Cleveland, the city where Calvin Coolidge was nominated. And in coming through, Cleveland crashed down the gates of rotten politics, of dishonest judges, of intolerance. Despite some election judges, who, according to Peter Witt, independent councilman, "went stone blind for three dollars," Cleveland, to its everlasting glory, gave the Senator from Wisconsin a plurality of 5,000. One judge was too drunk to count. He was taken home.

Thousands upon thousands jammed Public Hall and listened to the returns. Three months ago an old man was chosen there to lead an infant party. A week ago he returned—and the ovation he received brought tears to his eyes and to others.

"They'll forget," boss Republicans said, "they'll forget him." But they didn't forget. They went to the polls before they went to work. Most of those who voted for La Follette work. They cast their ballots, and went their way.

Some of the ballots never saw the inside of the ballot box. La Follette had no watchers in the booths. The State Supreme Court, at the last minute, ruled against them by a vote of four to three. Watchers were allowed only to parties. La Follette did not lead a party. So the majority of four said. They were Republicans.

Some of the ballots had been marked before they were given to the voters—and subsequently were declared illegal. In the Negro section of the city Republican ward leaders passed out literature in the voting booths—passed out literature and marked ballots.

But Cleveland came through.

La Follette buttons have not been thrown away in Cleveland. Some still are worn by men and women who would like to try clean politics.

La Follette is not a broken myth.

He will come again.

Cleveland, Ohio, November 5 RALPH A. LOVELAND

Who Has These Letters?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should appreciate the privilege of copying any letters or manuscripts written by or about Francis Preston Blair, Sr., Francis Preston Blair, Jr., and Montgomery Blair. All originals will be returned to the owners. If the originals could not be sent to me personally, or through the Department of History, the owners might be willing to have copies made for me at my expense.

W. E. SMITH

University of Wisconsin, Madison, October 27

Books

First Glance

SINCE the gipsies are subject to no census, except in the case of those few who live in houses on the edges of cities, they cannot be studied from documents collected around a desk; hence remarkably little is known about them. Everybody has one or two ideas about their origin or their character, and certain superstitions about them will probably never die, but—leaving out of the count scholars who study their language—hardly one man in a million is possessed of a single fact based on observation. We see them down the road and we turn off in haste, perhaps; or at best we cast a curious glance into the darker depths of the van as we go by. They remain a fascinating race whom we are content to know from occasional books written by Romany Ryes—gipsy gentlemen—devoted to the task of making their favorites our familiars.

The eminence among these gentlemen of the author of "Lavengro" and "The Romany Rye" grows greater with all time. Not only is this half-mad giant with the snow-white hair more and more impressive as a figure in the imaginations of British and American readers; the astounding energy of his style, the berserker enthusiasm of his mind, comes more and more positively to seem unique. Only a portion of that energy was caught by Charles Godfrey Leland in "The Gypsies" (Houghton Mifflin: $3), reprinted this year in commemoration of its author's centenary. "I have enjoyed gipsying more than any sport in the world," wrote Leland, "and I owe my love of it all to George Borrow." And he wrote handsomely enough of his chosen people. He made real contributions to knowledge concerning their origins and their language; he left racy accounts of meetings with them in Russia, Austria, England, Wales, and the United States. But the prevailing tone of his rhapsody is fainter and more artificially romantic than that of the burly man whom he calls "Father George." "Now as you wander along," he will say, "it may be that in the wood and by some grassy nook you will hear voices, and see the gleam of a red garment, and then find a man of the roads, with dusky wife and child. . . . These people are like birds and bees, they belong to out-of-doors and nature." To the greater writer "these people" were always men and women—endowed, to be sure, with tremendous faculties, but never birds or bees.

To Irving Brown, the latest American champion of the world-old vagrant race, they are men and women to be passionately envied because they do not live in houses. In Mr. Brown's new book, "Gypsy Fires in America" (Harper: $3), he confesses to "the strange thrill" they give him: "From where the road curved over the brow of a hill I caught a glimpse of several tents, with the blue smoke lazily rising and melting into the mist. My heart began to beat excitedly and my breath to come faster. I felt all the mingled joy and timidity of the lover. I wanted to run down the hill or shout; but instead, I stood there breathless, my feet lagging, as in a dream." A certain nostalgia, when he was an undergraduate in the Middle West, drew him into the company of a people both simple and mysterious; and as often as possible since that day he has haunted gipsy camps, perfecting himself in the ancient language, passing himself off as a pedigreed Romany, studying passions and habits at close range. If the result in the present volume is not a piece of great writing, it is at least a body of information not to be found elsewhere. The United States by common consent is the richest field for gipsy study today; more kinds are here than are in any other country, and all are undergoing rapid changes. Mr. Brown records the changes—the Fords, the high-powered cars, the occasional madness over money—without fear that they are final, and proceeds to the indestructible things—trickery, music, and love—upon which another book or two will make him an amateur authority.

MARK VAN DOREN

Aspects of Politics

Politics: The Citizen's Business. By William Allen White. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Personality in Politics. By William Bennett Munro. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

IT is a pity that Mr. White, who can write the English language very well when he chooses to do so, should have allowed both the best and the worst of his newspaper manner to appear in this his latest book, for while the book itself is not likely to be much read now that the November election is out of the way, the parts of it which are Mr. White's own are worth reading in connection with that event. The first chapter, rather misleadingly entitled Our Unwritten Constitution, and the second, The Super-Citizen's Duties, deal with the portentous multiplication of organizations, political, social, industrial, religious, and what not, outside of party lines but nevertheless with a more or less direct political purpose, through which the citizen expresses his own political opinions and molds the opinions of others. The American Federation of Labor, the Anti-Saloon League, the Federation of Churches, and the Ku Klux Klan are only a few of the many organizations through which the citizen may, if he will, and to an imposing extent actually does, cast a kind of supplementary vote for candidates or policies in addition to the formal vote which he deposits on election day. There is no part of the land in which the influence of several or many of these extra-political societies is not felt, and to the extent that their power is recognized and exerted the actual importance of parties tends to decline. The point is not a new one, of course; it is in substance only one more dragging to the light of Woodrow Wilson's "invisible government," and governments of low visibility or none at all had engaged the attention of students and the public before Wilson attacked them; but neither the nature nor the power of these political agencies has as yet been sufficiently studied, and Mr. White does well to call attention to them. The only regret is that, knowing as much about them as he does, he did not devote the whole book to them.

For the rest Mr. White reproduces, apparently without material alteration, the newspaper articles in which he reported the Cleveland and New York conventions of the present year, filling out the remaining .60 per cent of his pages with the texts of the Republican, Democratic, and third-party platforms and of certain speeches which the first two of the conventions heard. Mr. La Follette's statement to the Conference for Progressive Political Action is also included. The press reports are keen and racy, and take one behind the scenes in the personally conducted fashion that the average citizen doubtless enjoys, but their greatest usefulness in the form in which they are here presented should be to make every reader of them vow a solemn vow that never again, Deo volente, shall such conventions be tolerated. The party platforms will perhaps be useful for reference, but the kindest treatment that could have been accorded to the keynote speeches at the Republican and Democratic conclaves, the debates on the League of Nations, and the remarks of Mr. Bryan and Mr. Bainbridge Colby about religious liberty and the Ku Klux Klan was to let them die.

Mr. Munro's lectures on the Weil Foundation at the University of North Carolina bear the subtitle Reformers, Bosses and Leaders: What they do and How they do it. The book is one of those rare pieces of popularization which betray at every turn the sound knowledge and mature judgment of the scholar. The dissection of the weaknesses and foibles of reformers will be disturbing to some who have gloried in that name, and the bold challenging of certain popular notions about the way in which political betterment is achieved will doubtless irritate many who like to think that the practice of politics is a more elevated pursuit than it actually is. The main point which Mr. Munro enforces is that the largest factor in politics is personality, and it is by this standard that he measures the failure of many reforms and the success of much political bossism. For illustrations he draws particularly upon the history of recent elections, especially those in certain large cities, the latter field being one in which he is admittedly an authority. The book is a model of sound sense and inspiriting suggestion, well adapted to catch and hold the attention of readers for whom more bulky treatises have no charm. WILLIAM MACDONALD

A Specialist in Souls

Arnold Waterlow: A Life. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

GERTRUDE ATHERTON and Rebecca West have had occasion to reproach May Sinclair for the eroticism in "Anne Severn and the Fieldings." They have explained it by saying that she has sought literary expression for her frustrated desires because she has been unadventurous in her personal life. But the question whether May Sinclair has been protected from life is irrelevant. It is more to the point that little of life is protected from May Sinclair.

It is not life in its panoramic fulness but life in its more restricted intimacies that Miss Sinclair's disturbing mind is curious about. "Arnold Waterlow" analyzes a family relationship stripped of everything extraneous to the psychological patterns and compulsions of Arnold's relation to his mother. She holds him to her, not by an unmixed love—as she believes—but by appealing in her unconscious selfishness to the most decent qualities in his nature. This relationship, which was amusingly enough treated by the Victorians under the innocuous phrase "the apron-strings," is looked upon now as a really sinister tie, and we symbolize it, with a truer regard for its terror, in terms of the umbilical cord.

According to the Freudians, unless the cord is cut, unless a man is born again, he cannot live. To this assertion Miss Sinclair would certainly subscribe. The whole of her work may be offered in support of the statement. For indeed the psychic distress arising out of the necessity for this severing has been May Sinclair's chief interest. She is a naturalist of souls. Her specialty lies in diagnosis of this soul sickness, in offering elaborate documentation for its fatality, or in suggesting complete and partial cures.

The first part of the present book is particularly well done. One wonders whence Miss Sinclair derives her startling knowledge of the vivid workings of the child Arnold's inner self. There is so much of this, and it is done with such certitude. It has the fascination of a splendid trick—this showing forth the setting of the patterns of the child's life that are to be the cause of so much of the man's misery. It is clear to the three-year-old baby that his mother "was tender to Arnold because he was a little thing, but it was Richard that she loved." And one night when he asks for the kind of affection his mother has just shown Richard, and asks in vain, "he turned his face slowly from Richard's bed and cried, not like a child, but slowly, quietly, as mature people cry." This realization that hurts him when he is three hurts him when he is forty-three; it is the basis of his life of self-sacrifice and defeat.

Arnold's fight is to hold his mother off as best he can. Against her will, of course, he marries, finds a brief mixed happiness, and then—tragedy. His wife Linda leaves him to go on with her career as a violinist, and to support the temperamental pianist Max, body and ego. Arnold's mother hauls him up then with a sharp turn, and he has no way of saving his soul except through an adventure into idyllic adultery with Effie. There are a few years of happiness. But Linda returns and Arnold takes her back—not before Effie conveniently turns her face to the wall and dies.

In the moments singled out to present Arnold's spiritual struggle for integration, sharp stress is given to his isolation. When as a little boy he sees God in the sunset and is moved to rhapsodize with William Blake, he encounters the literalness of his mother's barren outlook, and he turns, bruised, for what solace his inner self affords. Later in life, when he turns desperately to Kant and Spinoza and finds there dubious aid, he flings himself back upon his own soul. And so the torture goes on.

Yet through this torture he is brought to salvation. He finds it during one magnificent moment when, in Devon, on the cliffs overhanging the sea, living in open sin with Effie, he experiences a mystical ecstasy and sees God again, this time with a more sustaining difference.

> Suddenly something shifted in his brain; the wave drew back, and in an instant, a flash, everything changed. He saw the same hills, the same green fields, the same white river, but as if lifted to another level of reality, and shining with another light; light intensely still, intensely vibrating . . . While he looked his whole being was filled with a poignant, exquisite, and unearthly bliss.

One remembers similar passages in "The Three Sisters," in "Mary Olivier," in "The Dark Night." Some readers seem to feel it reprehensible of May Sinclair to write beautifully of the same experience in so many books. Yet these same persons do not cry out in the middle of a concert that they have heard Stravinsky's Fire-bird music before.

The people in this book have the touch of reality upon them. In a sense, and it helps to make them more real, they have the touch of unreality. For what we ordinarily call reality is not the only reality to May Sinclair; her people do not become wholly real until, as an affirmation and extension of this dimensional world, they experience a contact with a world of more mystical consciousness. ANGUS BURRELL

General Botha

General Botha. By Earl Buxton. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

THE first requisite in a proconsul, the world has agreed, is discretion. It is a quality with which Lord Buxton, who from 1914 to 1920 was Governor General of South Africa, showed himself, during those peculiarly troubled years, richly endowed. "The Governor General," as he tells us here, "should strive to acquire two useful accomplishments—how to ride on the snaffle and how to skate over thin ice." Lord Buxton's popularity and usefulness during his term of office in South Africa testify to his skill in both these accomplishments.

Whether, however, discretion is the first requisite of a biographer is a matter for question. That sensitiveness of the spirit which, with an instinctive good manners of the heart, unhesitatingly refrains from certain violations of the privacy the dead can no longer command may prompt the chronicler of another's life to reticence on certain matters. But it is a reticence which, while it may make the resultant book less appealing to the gutter press and the gutter mind, yet presents and preserves the essentials of the character portrayed with a delicate care for the truth—the truth of which these very reticences are a component part.

Lord Buxton's discretion is of another order. He has, indeed, as is obvious on every page, a very genuine affection and respect for his subject. He dedicates his "account of a great man and an outstanding personality" to Mrs. Botha, and is at pains to remind us in his introduction that this book is in no way a life of General Botha, and that his authorized biography is in preparation. But the man who for six critical years represented the King in South Africa, and formed the constitutional link between the Imperial Government and the Union, must of necessity have made discretion, the official discretion of a man in a high official position, a veritable habit of mind. And the official attitude is not lightly shaken off. So wholly does it inform this book that whole sections of it read like so many extracts from a blue-book, with exactly that careful compilation of carefully selected facts which makes blue-books irritating to all those who possess inquisitive rather than well-regulated minds. "It has been my anxious desire," Lord Buxton tells, "when touching on controversial subjects, . . . to deal with them as far as possible in a non-controversial way." There speaks His Excellency, and it is fair to say that he has succeeded. The consequences are, however, that of the events of the rebellion in 1914, of the rise and growth of the Nationalist Party, of all or any, indeed, of the political history of South Africa during his term of office, nothing new is to be learned from the pages of Lord Buxton.

When Lord Buxton turns from the political events of Botha's career to a consideration of the character of the man himself, the limitations of his power "to depict him so that he may live to those who knew him not" become very obvious. These are owing partly to the blinkers imposed by the official attitude and partly to the lack of real contact with others inevitable to one in Lord Buxton's position. His very uprightness and conscientiousness, coupled with a certain white simplicity strongly manifested in his writings, have kept from him the full realization of this fact. He does not seem to be aware that it is the penalty of governors general to live in the territories under their command more solitary than their humblest subject. Even to the Prime Minister and his Cabinet the fact of the status of the Governor General is inescapable. Reading Lord Buxton's recollections, and even Lady Buxton's letters, we cannot but feel that we have before us a full-dress photograph rather than a revealing portrait. Botha's physical courage, his gift of leadership, his personal charm, do emerge; but his personality was altogether less simple, less standardized, than Lord Buxton apparently believes.

Even a lightly handled blue-book is not the most entertaining literature possible. Lord Buxton's "General Botha," on the whole, is a dull book. Here and there the author lets himself go and gives us a mildly entertaining story, of which we are always glad. He tells us, for instance, how in the time of the rebellion, when martial law was strictly enforced throughout Pretoria, "unauthorized meetings were prohibited, and anyone using seditious language or spreading alarmist reports was liable to be severely punished." In a footnote he adds: "One of my staff, constitutionally a pessimist and alarmist, was given a special permit by the police allowing her to 'use words calculated to create alarm or despondency' without making herself liable to be 'severely punished.'" Surely a paternal officialism could no further go.

RUTH S. ALEXANDER

The Persistent Illusion

The World of Souls. By Wincenty Lutoslawski. Preface by William James. Lincoln MacVeagh: The Dial Press. $3.50.

WINCENTY LUTOSLAWSKI has written philosophical books in nearly every modern language; he writes English with amazing ease and lucidity. But the present collection of essays, most of them written before 1900, would doubtless have received more enthusiasm from the last decade of the nineteenth century than can be hoped for from this generation. What might have been an importance shrinks, after thirty years, to a significance. But it is a significance worth considerable attention. It displays anew a well-known phase of the state of European metaphysics after the bankruptcy of Kantianism, and it places the aspirations of the preceding age in sharp contrast with the more cautious philosophic ideals of our own.

Lutoslawski derives formally from Leibnitz and Plato, but he repudiates essentials from both: the intellectual determinism of Leibnitz, which he probably found too confining, and Plato's humility before the transcendental authority of the Idea, a libel no doubt on "the infinite dignity of the human soul." The Monad, without "windows" and functionally predetermined, becomes an autonomous Substance (Idea), metaphysically identical with itself and immortal. But he uses his sources only for the setting up of a schematism on which he drapes a Romantic weltanschauung familiar in its varieties since the downfall of scholasticism. Spiritually Lutoslawski is contemporaneous with the sentimental Neoplatonism of the Renaissance, with a typical mystic like the younger Pico of Mirandola. "In this career of souls prizes await us . . . raising us from the rank of men to that of gods." The rhetorical assimilation of the Human into the Divine characterizes broadly any period of so-called liberation in thought—the freedom from the jargon of German Idealism no less than the end of the fifteenth century. And in the nineteenth century this megalomania precipitated a host of rhapsodists who hypostatized Truth and Love and Nature and Being: "vital illusionists" like the author of "Le Bovaryisme," and writers like Vaihinger who, to his credit and unlike Lutoslawski, made no esoteric claims for his fiction but offered it as somehow necessary though ontologically worthless. When Lutoslawski writes: "True reason . . . confirms the noblest and best feelings," we see that the converse would be the more accurate account of the process, and immediately connect him with tendencies in Bergson. And we understand, likewise, the approval he gets from William James in the preface (1899).

The author makes a particular virtue of an identity of his present views with his attitude of about thirty years ago. The aspiration of the closing decades of the last century and "the infinite dignity of the human soul" as it has conducted itself since 1914 are hardly identical. Lutoslawski confesses to what is possibly, he says, a "persistent illusion"; his humanitarian idealism is one facet of a desire to be in tune with the world, and we are expected to infer that he is; but we are entitled to the suspicion that he has reified a persistent euphoria and mistaken it, despite his wide contacts with men, for the world itself. "The World of Souls" carries a significant moral, and that is probably all it has to say to a civilization already undone by the materialistic consequences of an idealistic and humanitarian Romanticism.

ALLEN TATE

When Hope Was Young

The Industrial Worker: 1840-1860. By Norman Ware. (Hart Schaffner and Marx Prize Essays, No. 37.) Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

TO the student of social thinking the years following 1840 constitute one of the most interesting periods in American history. The impact of the industrial revolution was making itself felt in full force in our Eastern towns. Largely in consequence, there were reforms and "movements" of all kinds everywhere. Mr. Ware's brilliantly written introduction is an interesting interpretation of the period; the body of his book consists of the mass of supporting facts, gathered largely from little known labor sources.

The industrial revolution in this country, as Mr. Ware clearly shows, brought with it a great degradation in the status of the industrial worker. The control of manufacture passed out of the hands of independent artisans into those of a new race of proprietary capitalists who had acquired their wealth in trade. The "price" of labor went down, in many occupations very sharply; but, even more important as a cause of discontent, the worker lost ground as a person. Helpless in the grip of economic forces that he could not control, he saw himself losing his old-time position of independence and consideration in the community. Hence the waves of labor revolt of the forties. Hence the extraordinary series of talkative reform movements as the intellectual friends of the worker showed him the way out of his troubles, whether by the road of association in a Fourieristic phalanx or of land reform with each man on his inalienable quarter-section. The pushing, centralizing capitalists, inevitably acquiring economic and social dominance, were upsetting the good old tradition of egalitarianism so stoutly maintained by the workers and their friends. "The forties represented the last struggle of the liberal spirit of the eighteenth century in conflict with the exploitative spirit of the nineteenth." Then came the California gold discoveries; the new spirit definitely triumphed, the idealism of the labor and reform movements was drawn into the anti-slavery struggle, and specially favored groups of workers turned their effort during the fifties toward the humdrum task of making trade gains for themselves as wage-earners through their craft unions. Mr. Ware has given a suggestive interpretation of a fascinating period, supporting his view with a wealth of detailed material.

Discouraged reformers of our own time will perhaps take fresh courage as they read again of the almost unbelievably bad living and working conditions of those good old American days. Despite the distant frontier and Horace Greeley's fervid appeal to the young man to go west, population piled up in the cities till the cellars of New York in the fifties were said to house a twentieth of the entire population of that city. Factories, like dwellings, were unventilated and insanitary; hours were long (above twelve a day in New England, despite the epic ten-hour movement of the forties); wages were scandalously low, and every sort of abuse prevailed in the manner of payment. Even the idyllic beauty of Lowell was not without its shadows in those years, and irreverent skeptics like the redoubtable Sarah Bagley went so far as to view the chaste pages of the Lowell Offering itself with a certain suspicion. Students need no reminder, though affrighted statesmen do, that at this time immigration reached the highest point in our history relative to population. The whole story is much like the English industrial revolution once more, a tale of wealth accumulating while men decay, a record of the attempts of those men first to escape back into the old order and then, failing that, to snatch for themselves what they could of the new wealth. Mr. Ware's careful study will help remove some misconceptions regarding the early days of industrial America. It may not be without encouragement and suggestion to the growing band of workers by hand and brain who toil at the new-old task of making industry serve the ends of life. HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Books in Brief

Social Politics in the United States. By Fred E. Haynes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

A history of modern democracy, firmly grasped and clearly written, would show among its interesting exhibits what a large share of social progress, slowly struggled for, has been achieved through the impulses of obscure and isolated figures or groups moved by convictions they thought were capable of advancing the economic welfare of "the great society." The combination at Cleveland of numerous dissenting groups, including the Socialist Party, under the platform of a single leader able to synthesize their diverging doctrines for "progressive political action," is one case out of many. We have long needed a good single-volume history of these organizations and their leaders representing the impulses of discontent with the existing order. For many of them, after general reprobation, have attained the dignity of "third" or even "first" parties. They are important chiefly because of their little-appreciated influence in liberalizing static political tendencies. In one form or another they have very often forced their tenets upon major-party platforms and into the accepted law of the land. Such a book is Haynes's "Social Politics in the United States." Although brief, it is an authoritative and useful account of the radical political movements in American history since 1775.

Slapstick and Dumbbell. A Casual Survey of Clowns and Clowning. By Hiler Harzberg and Arthur Moss. New York: Joseph Lawren.

A spirited but scatter-brained account of the best buffoons between Cro-Magnon days and Billy Sunday.

The Tragedy of Mr. Punch. A Fantastic Play in Prologue and One Act. By Russell Thorndike and Reginald Arkell. Introductory Essay by Max Beerbohm. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

The tragedy of Mr. Punch is that although he feels himself to be a terrible fellow and wants to be feared he is destined forever to be only laughed at, and to be loved by children. So the two playwrights. But Max, who was never in better form than he is here, refuses to find tragedy in the famous killer of babies and beadles. He is still the "great sinner," with a "frank glad smile"—almost the last really joyous bad man left on earth. And even he is passing, Max laments. What shall the world do to be saved for sin? "Preachers, please note."

Stalking Big Game with a Camera in Equatorial Africa, with a Monograph on the African Elephant. By Marius Maxwell. The Century Company. $9.

A thrilling study at close range of the elephant, the giraffe, the hippopotamus, the rhinoceros, the buffalo, and the zebra. The photographs are among the most brilliant ever taken.

Critical Studies of the Works of Charles Dickens. By George Gissing. With an Introduction and Bibliography of Gissing by Temple Scott. New York: Greenberg. $3.

Nine essays written by Gissing as introductions to volumes in a collected edition of Dickens. Valuable as supplementing one of Gissing's best books, his "Critical Study" of Dickens.

Bandello. Tragical Tales. The Complete Novels translated by Geoffrey Fenton. Modernized and edited with a Glossary by Hugh Harris. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

The Epic of the Beast, Consisting of English Translations of the History of Reynard the Fox and Physiologus. With an Introduction by William Rose. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

The Poets of the Greek Anthology: a companion volume to The Girdle of Aphrodite. Translated by F. A. Wright. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Three more volumes in The Broadway Translations, a series which, if it continues to grow in bulk and in popularity, will soon make scholars of the multitude. Here are represented the Renaissance novel and the medieval beast-tale—father of Uncle Remus; and here is a brilliant group of sketches resurrecting personalities out of the "Greek Anthology"—portraits by a scholar and poet of Meleager, Palladas, Paul, and others hitherto but dimly seen behind their poems.

The Feis Ceoil

By HENRIETTA STRAUS

I STRUCK Dublin during the week of the Feis Ceoil, or Music Festival, and so learned of a musical Ireland. To have gleaned it from the surface of events alone would have been well-nigh impossible, as, except for the Feis, nothing musical seemed to be going on at all. There was, it is true, a large poster of Galli-Curci on a billboard outside of a theater, announcing a concert by that singer in the distant future, and leading one to surmise that such celebrities occasionally visit Dublin. And there was, too, much talk of a concert recently given by a Colonel Fritz Brase and his band. This Colonel Brase, it seems, had been the ex-Kaiser's bandmaster at Potsdam; yet it is doubtful if he was ever as much appreciated then as he is now in his less exalted state. He has been giving the enthusiastic Dubliners high-class band concerts of Wagner and other classics, and he has also been giving them excellent instruction in instrumental playing. And in so doing he has supplied a double need; for there is a dearth of good orchestral music in Dublin, and of good teaching. The money so necessary to support both is no longer to be found there, most of the wealthy families having left on account of the civil wars.

This condition is not peculiar to Dublin alone, however, as I learned from the Feis Ceoil; for the Feis Ceoil is not a music festival in our sense of the term, but rather a national competition in music which takes place annually under the auspices of the Feis Ceoil Association. The association itself is composed of non-resident as well as resident members, but the competitors must be resident. As the latter are drawn from all over Ireland, and as the competition embraces almost every branch of musical art, one is fairly safe in judging the teaching standards of the country by the results one hears at the Feis. Talent shines through in spite of these mediocre standards, and the Feis, by stimulating public interest in music in such a practical way, is gradually attaining one of its original objects, which is "to promote the general cultivation of music in Ireland."

The main purpose of the Feis Ceoil Association, however, is "to promote the study and cultivation of Irish music" and "to collect and preserve by publication the old airs of Ireland." To this end, prizes are offered for the best solo singing of Irish songs, in English and in Irish; for the best choral and quartet singing in Irish, accompanied and unaccompanied; and for the best rendering of Irish instrumental music on the small Irish harp, the Irish pipes, and the Irish fiddle. In the field of composition there is competition for the best arrangements of Irish airs (from the Feis Ceoil Collection) for violin, 'cello, and voice solos with piano accompaniment; for voice, with accompaniment by the small Irish harp; and for piano alone. And besides these, prizes are offered for the best collections, respectively, of unpublished Irish folk tunes (three of which must be with words) and Irish traditional airs, hitherto unpublished, which may be "sung, whistled, performed on any instrument, or sent in as MS."

Were it not for this annual encouragement by the Feis Ceoil, it is doubtful whether interest in the old Irish airs and their traditions would be so general or so alive as they are today. The speaking of Gaelic itself, I have been told, until the Irish Free State came into existence, has been systematically discouraged for years, not only by the British Government but also by the Catholic church. And as the country people especially had come to look upon its use as a disgrace, this presented the greatest difficulty in the way of keeping alive the traditional singing of old Irish airs.

The musician who told me this has been laboring for years in small Irish villages to revive the making as well as the use of the small Irish harp as the accompanying instrument to this traditional singing. This harp is, of course, ideal for the purpose, as it has a charming tone, can be held on the lap while played, and presents so few intricacies that it can easily supply the simple string accompaniments which all folk songs, for that matter, require. The old Irish airs especially need such settings because of their constant tendency toward the quarter tone—particularly the folk songs of the islands, which, I am told, by those who have had the opportunity to hear both, are as wild and as beautiful as those which have been gathered in the Hebrides.

The instrumentalists seem to have preserved these traditions better, on the whole, than have the singers, for they possess a fire and abandon that the latter often lack. Indeed in the renditions of this music, as well as in the music itself, one finds that utter unreserve of expression and intensity of feeling, those extremes of humor and melancholy, usually associated only with the Slavic and Magyar races. These qualities were also in evidence in the various other contests of the Feis. While there seemed to be no one of great, outstanding genius, the general average showed sensitiveness to their art and an abundance of what we call "temperament." And perhaps the best proof of all that Ireland is fundamentally musical is that in spite of civil wars, poverty, and a general lack of musical experience and opportunity the Feis Ceoil has an unbroken record of twenty-eight consecutive years, with entries, this season, numbering more than eight hundred.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

Pinero the Timid

THE interest to be found in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" (Cort Theater) is almost exclusively of the sort called historical. To come upon it in a chronological reading of Pinero's work is to understand why its relative freshness and its relative truth made it seem important, but, transferred to the contemporary stage, it cannot stand comparison with even the fairly conventional plays of today; its grasp upon a social problem seems singularly timid instead of strong. Pinero himself and many more vigorous writers have helped to establish a tradition of incisiveness which even second-rate dramatists can easily follow; but a second-rate play now is likely to be superior to "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" in the very qualities which made that play famous. Its author seems to stand aghast at his temerity when he advances some now commonplace premise and to turn cautiously aside from the not very startling conclusions which stare him in the face.

Pinero's view of the demi-mondaine is sentimental and outmoded. Like most of the gallant gentlemen who rushed to the defense of the female outcast when she first became a popular figure in polite literature he did not understand her in the least, and because he would have been frightened out of his wits by any hint of the possibilities of character which lay outside the range of his observation and sympathy he assumed, for comfort's sake, that when such a person was worth any consideration at all she was merely a conventional woman whom unfortunate circumstances had led into regrettable courses. He never grasped the fact that she is interesting only when, as is often the case, her career is an expression of her character and she represents a personal defiance of the world in which she lives. Accordingly, when he wished to put this somewhat dangerous personage upon the stage he made her typical neither of the eternal harlot nor of the rationally rebellious modern woman (both real and interesting phenomena) but merely of the wronged and sentimental prostitute of the Camille tradition, who, if she ever existed, was profoundly uninteresting because profoundly weak. His Paula, having chosen the career of a spectacular demi-mondaine, never utters a syllable which would explain the demi-mondaine's philosophy or account for her life. A mere vulgarian, she longs ardently for respectability and can think of no greater joy than to have about her own table the very class of men who had used and then scorned her, but whom she admiringly describes as "the kind of men who cannot be imitated."

The problem of the misalliance with which the play deals is still an interesting one, but its center of gravity has shifted. To us a man who, like the hero, is seriously concerned over the possible disapproval of his man-servant when a lady calls at eleven p. m. is so obviously not the man to undertake social experiments that his failure hardly convinces us that the task which he undertook is one necessarily impossible of performance; a demi-mondaine who seriously considers her marriage a failure because the curate does not call is merely a very trivial person who had no business to break the major provision of the social code when in her heart she respected its minutiae. Doubtless the most daring gentleman married to a woman whose temperament was that of the born bohemian would have interesting and difficult problems to face, but to buck society while fundamentally accepting all its prejudices and all its judgments is merely folly. Pinero proves only that you cannot live outside and inside society at the same time—a fact so patent as to offer but little interest. The only question worth discussing is the question whether or not it is worth while for the sake of love, liberty, honesty, or what not to live wholly outside it; and that question Pinero has never asked because he has never understood its bearing either upon conduct or upon art.

Miss Ethel Barrymore, it would appear, despaired of making anything of the play as a play and determined to carry it over purely on the strength of her own personality. During the first half of the piece she speaks at least twice as loudly as any other member of the cast, with the result that she never seems to be living in the same world with them at all; in the third act the rising tension of the scene brings her own lines and the rest of the company up to the level of her declamation. The result is a rather distressing failure for a play which is probably in any event dead beyond revival. Paula is an impossible character, and Miss Barrymore's vocal gymnastics combined with various queenly gestures do no more than emphasize its unreality.

Mr. Ziegfeld's "Follies" (New Amsterdam Theater) have been somewhat refurbished for the fall season and are still on the whole the most gorgeous and the most lively of the reviews, although "Dixie to Broadway" (Broadhurst Theater), the new Negro musical comedy, surpasses it in one respect. Mr. Ziegfeld's beauties obviously condescend to perform their evolution, but their darker sisters (one may imagine) sometimes dance and sing for their own amusement. Accordingly "Dixie to Broadway" has a touch of what always should be but seldom is the raison d'être of such entertainments, namely, something very like ecstasy.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

DEBATE on PROHIBITION!

CLARENCE DARROW versus REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

(Against) (For)

Chairman, Hon. Royal S. Copeland

Sunday, December 14, 3 P. M.

Manhattan Opera House, 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.

Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75. Box Seats $3.30.

On sale at the office of or direct by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION

500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. (Longacre 10434-4447)

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate should send us their names.

CLARENCE DARROW SCOTT NEARING

"Is the Human Race Worth Working For?"

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30, 2:30 P. M. Town Hall

Tickets, $2.00 to $1.00 113 W. 43rd

On sale at RAND SCHOOL, 7 E. 15th St. (and at box office)

Second Nation Dinner

Friday, December 12, 1924
Fifth Avenue Restaurant, 200 Fifth Ave.

Is the Press Kept ?

Speakers:

HERBERT BAYARD SWOPE, Executive Editor, The World.

ERNEST GRUENING, former Managing Editor, Boston Herald, New York Tribune, The Nation

Chairman:

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD.

Tickets $2.50, sold only to Nation readers and their guests. The Nation for a year with a ticket to the dinner for $6.50.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

HARRY ALLEN OVERSTREET, A.B., B.Sc.

Professor of Philosophy, College City of New York.

"Philosophy in Present Day Life"

COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM

Park Avenue and 34th Street

SIX LECTURES

Thursday Evenings, Dec. 11, 18, Jan. 8, 15, 22, 29, at 8:15

Course Ticket, $3.50, can be secured at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue. Single Admission, 85 cents.

OPEN FORUM

November 16th at 8 P. M.

UNIVERSITIES AND WORLD PEACE

Virginia C. Gildersleeve, Dean of Barnard College, President of International Federation of University Women.

November 23rd, "Farmers Cooperatives," Aaron Sapiro

SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, 2 West 64th St., N. Y. C

The Public is invited

RAND SCHOOL

7 East 15th Street

Courses beginning

Nov. 15, 11 A.M. & 1:30 P.M. Scott Nearing "Dynamic Sociology" "Current Events"

Nov. 17, 8:30 P.M..... August Claessens Public Speaking and Debating"

Nov. 18, 8:30 P.M..... August Claessens "Elements of Social Progress"

Nov. 22, 3:30 P.M. "Community Ideals" H. W. L. Dana

Nov. 29, 3:30 P.M. "Gandhi" Savel Zimand

International Relations Section

Western Imperialism in China

BERTRAND RUSSELL'S article in the New Leader on China, which The Nation reprinted in the International Relations Section of its issue of November 5, has aroused much comment in the English-language press of the Orient. Reporting and commenting on this the Japan Weekly Chronicle says:

Mr. Bertrand Russell's recent attack on the British Government's China policy has drawn the expected response from the leading British papers at the treaty ports. According to the telegraphed report, Mr. Russell, writing in the weekly organ of the Independent Labor Party, the New Leader, declared that the rivalries among the Chinese Tuchuns—whom all decent Chinese despised—gave excuse for interference in Chinese affairs on the part of the Powers and for the extorting of concessions in return for support. The only exception to the rule that the Tuchuns were merely ambitious brigands, he affirmed, was Dr. Sun Yat-sen, to whom he paid a warm tribute as the pioneer of republicanism in China and the friend of the proletarians. The comment of the Peking and Tientsin Times on this article is largely a calling of names, which that paper often finds a convenient substitute for reasonableness. "An absurd effusion"—"the kind of tosh which we would expect"—"warped ideas"—"Bolshevik ideas"—"theorists and Bolshevik sympathizers"—such are the phrases that run through a short article. This yelping is not likely to trouble a man of Mr. Russell's standing in the world of thought. Coming down from the highest step of the pulpit of abuse, the editor proceeds to the dogmatic statement that Dr. Sun Yat-sen has done China a disservice by leading it to republicanism.

China certainly has her trouble today, though we get a very exaggerated idea of the disturbances by reading the reports of a little war, which hitherto has affected only an insignificant proportion of the people. A reasonable person would attempt some comparison of the present struggle with those of other countries after they had overthrown the power of a corrupt and effete tyranny, and a comparison also with the open sores of Manchu rule. But the Tientsin editor contents himself with the assertion that republicanism must be bad for China because the people are conservative and illiterate, and that therefore "nothing could be more fantastic" than to praise Dr. Sun Yat-sen.

Again he says that conditions in Canton disprove the "fiction" that Dr. Sun Yat-sen is the proletarian's friend. Yet it is a fact that organized labor in Canton has stood behind Dr. Sun steadily for the past few years. Two years ago the great complaint of the British papers in Hongkong, Shanghai, and Tientsin was that the leader had been too good a friend to the proletarians who went on strike in Hongkong, some of whom, leaving for their homes toward Canton, were fired upon in cold blood by the British police on the border of the British territory, with mortal result. The Tientsin editor can hardly have forgotten how Dr. Sun was reviled at that time for giving succor to the strikers. The readers of the New Leader at least will understand what Mr. Russell means when he calls Dr. Sun Yat-sen a friend of the proletarians.

The North-China Daily News of Shanghai is much fairer to Dr. Sun Yat-sen. It says:

> We agree with Mr. Russell to this extent that we believe Dr. Sun Yat-sen to be entirely free from sordid desires to put money in his pocket, and personally to be sincerely convinced of the doctrines he preaches. But none the less it is difficult not to think that the republicanism he pioneers is essentially "Sun Yat-senism." The record of his doings in the past few years suggests very strongly that he can believe in no system of government other than that of his own conception and that any difference of opinion he dismisses as flat blasphemy. There is no character in modern China more difficult to judge fairly than Dr. Sun Yat-sen. While we respect him as a man, the plain fact is that he has been nothing but a cause of strife and unhappiness to his fellow-countrymen; and as for Mr. Russell's flowery description of him as "the proletariat's friend" we need only point to the state of Canton and Kuantung under his administration.

The editor, like his colleagues in Tientsin, overlooks the abuse that his own paper showered on Dr. Sun a couple of years ago for his friendship toward the proletarians in the Hongkong seamen's strike and subsequent general strike. The comment is not, however, so illogical as it appears. The two editors are not at all impressed by the active support given to Dr. Sun by the articulate leaders of organized Labor. They probably consider that the masses of the people would be happier in peaceful slavery than with a Moses leading them from their fleshpots out into the desert to seek freedom. Bearing this in mind, the reader will find the Shanghai editor's tribute to Dr. Sun's honesty truly eloquent.

The most serious point on which the papers assail Mr. Russell's criticism is that of the inclination of the Powers to take advantage of dissensions among the Chinese. The North-China Daily News, after quoting the report of Mr. Russell's contention, above mentioned, says: "This is nothing else but a deliberate attempt to arouse the worst section in China against the foreigner. . . . As for concessions extorted 'in return for support,' we challenge Mr. Russell to point to one single example of such a thing since the republic began." The Peking and Tientsin Times offers a similar challenge: "We should be interested to learn of a single instance since the end of the Great War in which a civil war in China has been made the occasion for interference and the extorting of concessions by the British Government."

Both editors are careful to confine their challenge to a very limited period. It appears from the report that Mr. Russell was simply pointing out a tendency. Even if the denials of the editors were valid—we believe they are not—the very manner of their challenge admits that the tendency has existed. If it has been held in check for a few years, that is no guaranty that it will not assert itself again now. The Powers have been too busy with affairs in Europe for some time to put their fingers into the China pudding. But Europe is becoming calmer, and China once more looms large in the eyes of the great Powers. As for the bankers' consortium, its power to restrain international rivalry for the plums is at least open to doubt.

But take the challenges as they are: Would the editors deny that the wireless contracts over which British, American, and Japanese firms have been in conflict were in the nature of efforts to extort concessions during a time of civil strife in China? The concession to Mitsui of Japan came first. It was contracted in February, 1918, when the Anfu Party was in power. Now the "China Year Book," issued by the editor of the Peking and Tientsin Times himself, records that the Anfu Party was enabled to maintain a precarious hold of office by the financial support of Japan, and this has been admitted also in the Japanese Diet. Japan claims that the concession gave the Mitsui Company a monopoly of wireless for the whole of China—a country comparable to Europe in area and population, be it remembered. Was this not a case of extorting a concession in return for support to one party in the civil strife?

However, the Tientsin editor confines himself cautiously to absolving Britain from such dealings. But what of the Marconi concession, obtained from the Chinese Ministry of War in the following year? This has also been claimed as a monopolistic concession. The agreement was signed in May, 1919, at the time of the strong agitation against the Anfu Party's government—an agitation which compelled some of the leaders to resign, though the party as a whole retained office for some time longer. It has been proved in a British court that the Marconi company resorted to bribery to obtain the concession. (The successive governments at Peking for some time have been so corrupt that it is doubtful whether any concessions have been obtained without bribery.) It would be hardly correct to describe bribery as a process of extortion, but the concession was obtained by support—silver bullets—granted to one of the parties engaged in political strife in China.

To continue the story, it was late in 1920 that the Anfu Party was overthrown and it was in January, 1921, that the Federal Wireless Company of the United States obtained a concession for building wireless stations in China. Since that time America and Japan have had a standing dispute over this matter, with periodical wordy warfare. What support, if any, Marconi has had from the British Government is not clear. But the general character of these transactions alone seems to justify the apprehensions of Mr. Russell that the Powers, acting either in concert or in rivalry, will find excuse for intervention and the winning of concessions during the present civil war.

If we go back over the history of China since the revolution we find additional convincing evidence. It will suffice to mention the international loan granted to Yuan Shih-kai against the protest of the Parliament when the republic was formed, the placing of the salt-tax collections under international control (1913), the notorious "Nishihara" Japanese loans to the Anfu Party already mentioned (1918), and, on the part of Britain, the attempt of the Cassel interests to get a very extensive mining concession in South China from the enemies of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. It will be remembered that the British Government backed this scheme, though it was not carried through.

Naturally the two British editors in China miss the main point of Mr. Russell's article—his sympathy with the Labor Government struggling to devise a liberal international policy when the sources of its information for the most part are the writings of such editors and correspondents as those whom we have quoted and the dispatches of diplomats who take a similar point of view. The Government is truly to be pitied. But it is difficult to see any way out. The Labor Government would be foolish to send out a force of Labor diplomats until its position is very much stronger, and Labor news agencies cannot afford to maintain correspondents all over the world as the great capitalist papers can do. Moreover, Labor representatives of the type that Mr. Russell seems to have in mind would be but voices crying in the wilderness in a country like China. Their own country's gunboats and garrisons, concessions, loans, and immunity from Chinese laws and from many of the taxes would place them in a false position from the outset. They would be helpless unless they had a government at home with the conviction and courage to take a stand against the whole machinery and the very ideal of imperialism.

Marshal Foch on Peace

MARSHAL FOCH was interviewed recently by the Revue Hebdomadaire (Paris) as follows:

Q. On what conditions does the Marshal think France might put its faith in the League of Nations?

A. The Marshal has always believed that the League lacked two things: (1) The European nations most interested in the maintenance of peace and in European affairs should have a preponderant voice in the Geneva assemblies; (2) the League of Nations should possess practical means of forcing respect for its decisions, either by means of an international army or, in some manner to be determined, by control of the national forces of one or several countries.

Q. Does the Marshal believe that the League will some day be able to provide a system of international guaranties which will lighten the military burdens of the nations?

A. Yes. But the two conditions just mentioned must first be fulfilled. Reduction of armaments can only be a corollary of guaranties of security, and these will be vain unless the Powers directly interested in the maintenance of peace have a predominating influence in decisions made at Geneva.

Reduction of armaments for France is further dependent upon the disarmament of Germany. Supervision of the disarmament of Germany cannot be confided to the League until (1) the inventory of German armament and the complete execution of the treaty clauses, which have been asked by the Allies, have been accomplished and checked up; (2) until there has been a definition of the methods by which the League shall exercise the right of investigation granted but not defined by Article 213 of the Treaty of Versailles. The application of this clause involves problems which must be solved if international supervision is not to be a mere illusion. Until they have been solved Article 213 cannot be regarded as an effective guaranty of peace.

Q. One often hears the suggestion of replacing the motto: "Si vis pacem para bellum" (If you wish peace prepare for war) by another: "Si vis pacem cole justitiam" (If you wish peace do justice). What does the Marshal think of it?

A. The Marshal thinks what all soldiers of heart think of it: that nothing is more desirable than to establish the reign of justice; that war-making is an abominable profession; that it is frightful to shed blood and to destroy wealth, and that everything must be tried to prevent the return of such calamities; that the League of Nations is a generous idea, seductive, perhaps full of possibilities, but that it must be strengthened by time and by men before it can be trusted alone to guarantee peace.

The signatures of Mahatma Gandhi, Rabindranath Tagore, C. F. Andrews, and others to the White Cross anti-opium petition, a facsimile of which was printed in the International Relations Section for November 5, were obtained through the efforts of Taraknath Das, author of "India in World Politics."

Contributors to This Issue

A. HAMILTON GIBBS is a brother of Sir Philip Gibbs, the war correspondent, and of Cosmo Hamilton (Gibbs), the poet. He fought through the entire period of the World War, entering the British army as a private and coming out as a major of artillery with a decoration.

BEATRICE M. HINKLE is a physician and psychoanalyst, the author of "The Re-creating of the Individual."

ISABELLE KENDIG, formerly membership secretary for the National Woman's Party, was executive secretary of the National Women's Division of the La Follette-Wheeler campaign.

WILLIAM MACDONALD, formerly an associate editor of The Nation, is the author of numerous books on American history and politics.

ANGUS BURRELL is one of the authors of a recent volume, "Dead-Reckonings in Fiction."

RUTH S. ALEXANDER is a journalist in Cape Town.

ALLEN TATE is associate editor of the Fugitive, a magazine of verse published in Nashville, Tennessee.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is professor of economics in Wellesley College.

HENRIETTA STRAUS, The Nation's music correspondent, is at present in Sweden.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1924 No. 3099

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 557

EDITORIALS:
- Shall the Progressives Organize? 558
- Uncle Sam as Air Boss 559
- Introducing Our Ancestors 559
- The Going of M. Jusserand 560

THE STANDARD OIL'S DEATH FACTORY. By Mary Ross 561

TRY IT ON WITH SHIPS. By William Hard 563

THE NEPMAN IS PASSING. By Louis Fischer 564

KUZBAS IN 1924. By Ruth Epperson Kennell 566

A RUSSIAN SUMMER RESORT. By Max Eastman 568

AUTUMN. Translated by Max Eastman from the Russian of Alexander Pushkin 570

THE FIGHT AGAINST FAMINE. By Jessica Smith 570

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 571

CORRESPONDENCE 572

BOOKS:
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 574
- Russia's Foreign Relations. By Leon Talmy 575
- Making Good. By Joseph Wood Krutch 575
- A Scholar Astray. By Avrahm Yarmolinsky 576
- Refugee Psychology. By Charles Recht 577
- Books in Brief 577

THE NATION'S POETRY PRIZE 578

DRAMA:
- The God of Stumps. By Joseph Wood Krutch 578

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Russia's Industrial Progress. By Leon Talmy 582
- Lenin the Man. By Maxim Gorki 584
- The Agricultural Offensive 585

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN, LITERARY EDITOR

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS

JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

RUSSIA STILL PLAYS a colossal role in the world-struggle between human values and property values. After seven years in which the Soviet Government has repelled the combined attack of the Western Powers and consolidated its power at home Mr. Hughes still so hates the ideas upon which it rests that he refuses it even de facto recognition. One after another the other Western governments have yielded; even England's Tory Ministry, after winning an election on the anti-Bolshevik issue, is treading in Ramsay MacDonald's footsteps and seeking to negotiate a friendly treaty with Russia. Within the vast frontiers of Russia, meanwhile, a process of adaptation to capitalism is going on. How far that process will go we do not yet know. Russia is too enormous for easy prediction, and its economic backwardness as well as its potential economic wealth makes comparison with the course of other European countries meaningless. In the process of creating a people's republic on the ruins of Czarism there has come bitter injustice, but of this we are sure: Russia is hated in the West not because of occasional outbreaks of cruelty, but because of the ideals which her rulers have steadfastly followed. Here for the first time in history are dictators determined to destroy their power by educating the masses. And it is because we know of no land where men have suffered so much for so striking an ideal that The Nation dedicates this, its third Russian number, to Soviet Russia.

SPEAKING OF LAW ENFORCEMENT, one of our friends in New York City received the following card through the United States mail:

JUST A REMINDER

We are still doing business from Columbus 0000, where we are ready to serve you as we have in the past.

FOR SERVICE AND QUALITY

CALL COLUMBUS 0000

1 case lots	$13.00	25 case lots	$11.50
5 case lots	12.50	50 case lots	11.00
10 case lots	12.00	100 case lots	10.00

Thanking you for past favors and a continuance of same, we are,

Very truly yours,

THE UNITED WHOLESALE DEALERS SUPPLY CO.,

JOHN KELLY, President.

We were curious enough to call this enterprising company on the telephone—we withhold the number only so that it shall not be flooded with orders—and were assured that its gin was entirely reliable, that its champagne was of the best (at $65), and that while it was temporarily out of whiskey that would soon be remedied. All of this in the City of New York, in which millions of dollars are being spent for law enforcement and every official responsible for the enforcement of our laws and Constitution swears until he is black in the face that everything possible is being done to suppress bootlegging and bootleggers!

WE ARE PROFOUNDLY INTERESTED in the rumors that a determined effort will now be made in the South to break away from the political shackles which have chained the manhood of that section to the Democratic Party and have virtually prevented it from playing a worthy and useful role in the political life of the nation. While the ostensible purpose at present is the formation of a financial and industrial bloc to back President Coolidge, we hope that it will lead in other directions as well. One of the most striking statements that came out of the South during the campaign was that of Dr. Henry Nelson Snyder of Spartanburg, S. C., president of Wofford College and one of the foremost educators of the South. After attending a Democratic campaign meeting he declared that the South would soon have an independent political party. "All thinking men," he declared, "are coming to this viewpoint. When we have to sit and to listen to such stuff as we heard at yesterday's [Democratic] campaign meeting—with not a constructive idea advanced—we are confirmed in the opinion that the time for another party is at hand." The La Follette vote in the South, which approximated 100,000, is further evidence of this desire for a third party—for nowhere in the South was it possible to undertake any real organization work for it or to raise any money with which to campaign. In Louisiana 5,000 votes were cast, although there were no electors printed on the ballot. Indeed, there were many signs that, as the South can for historical reasons never vote for the Republican Party, its eventual freeing may yet come from a third party without a past but with a future.

THIS STIRRING IN THE SOUTH finds another expression in editorials in the Journal of Social Forces by its editor, Howard W. Odum, which are striking in their frankness and plainness of statement. Dr. Odum declares that the South is not thinking enough or learning enough or reading enough or working enough or leading or following enough, and that it is too proud of its non-progressive fundamentalism. He dwells particularly upon its lack of knowledge concerning social situations and the social sciences and quotes a Southern leader who recently declared that "we must deal fairly but firmly with anarchists, bolshevists, socialists, and sociologists" as proof of the ignorance of men who ought to be informed, since they are in high places. With this joyous person are classed a senior bishop who declares that the Child Labor Amendment is "unadulterated bolshevism" and a legislator who has just proclaimed that no man needs more than three books, the Bible, a hymn-book, and an almanac. Naturally, Dr. Odum dwells upon the evil influence all this has upon the creative impulse in the South. The lack of interest and appreciation of Southern writers has long driven men of talent into the North when they ought to be leaders within their communities. These are refreshing utterances which Dr. Odum has penned, for they are in themselves evidence that the South is awakening and applying to itself the first precept of reform, which is "Know thyself."

AFTER ALL THE HULLABALOO about getting out the vote we learn that only 52.8 per cent of the eligible voters actually cast their votes in this year's American election. It is a figure which would shock Great Britain or Germany or France, but it is greeted with enthusiasm here because it marks an increase of 3.7 per cent over the minority vote of 1920. An analysis of the figures compiled by the National Association of Manufacturers reveals even more shocking data. Only 8 per cent of the eligible voters in South Carolina voted; only 10.1 per cent in Georgia and 10.8 per cent in Mississippi; and the figure is below 20 per cent in Louisiana, Virginia, Alabama, Arkansas, Tennessee, Florida, and Texas. Yet all of these States where the blacks are disfranchised and the whites do not bother to vote have their full representation in Congress. In virtually all of these Southern States the vote was even smaller this year than in 1920—only in Mississippi, and in Texas, where the governorship fight called out the voters, were there slight gains. Indiana tops the list with a turnout of 83.2 per cent; Kansas follows with 80.3 per cent; and in West Virginia, Minnesota, North Dakota, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Delaware, and Missouri also more than two-thirds of the voters voted. The States which showed the largest proportionate increases as compared with 1920 were Kansas, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Wyoming, but in general the percentages follow, roughly, the order of 1920. Today only two States cast as large a proportion of the possible vote as the whole country cast in 1896. Disfranchisement in the South and apathy in the North are still at work.

TO SEE OURSELVES as others see us is not only difficult but at times extremely unpleasant. If any of the one-per-cent literate Persian women or five-per-cent literate Persian men happened to read the New York Times's editorial on the Persian indemnity they would surely smile. Vice-Consul Imbrie, it will be remembered, was killed by a fanatical mob. Details about the incident were confused; some blamed Major Imbrie for exposing himself and others blamed the Persian authorities. Our State Department demanded the death of the murderers, $60,000 indemnity, and reimbursement for the expenses incurred in sending a man-of-war to Persia to bring back the body of the murdered man—and Persia met the demands. It cost $110,000, it seems, to transport the body from Persia to Washington, and we heartily approve the State Department proposal to use that amount to establish scholarships in this country for Persian students. But to make such an act a pious label to cover our whole diplomatic procedure is a little too much. The Time's editorial said:

> It must seem a strange sort of requital to an Oriental mind which still demands an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and a life for a life.

We were, indeed, establishing scholarships—but after we had demanded three lives for one and in no uncertain terms. Actually we are saying to the Persians "Be careful and touch not an American; three lives will be demanded for one American."

IS ENGLAND IN INDIA starting on the path trod in Ireland under the Black-and-Tan regime? It is a hideous thought; but the appointment of Lord Birkenhead as Secretary of State for India coupled with recent events in Calcutta point in that direction. Fifty-six Swarajist leaders have been arrested. Coercion has been revived. English papers maintain that a revolutionary conspiracy in Bengal could have been broken up in no other way. They state that since July five attempts have been made to assassinate high officials, and that ordinary courts of justice could not operate because the Swarajist militants terrorize the witnesses. Hence the arrests and the request for additional legislation similar to the old Defense of India Act. But there is already in force an act under which revolutionaries may be arrested by order of the executive and kept indefinitely in jail without being brought to trial. This is now held inadequate. The new act is similar to the hated Rowlatt Act, which was finally repealed. It provides for closed trials before three commissioners, from which there is an appeal to the High Court; the accused is told the nature of the evidence but no names are disclosed; the statement of a person before a magistrate is admitted as evidence, though that person be dead, lost, or incapable of giving evidence. If Swarajist militants terrorized witnesses before, this act certainly will not stop them. But what else will it do? It might be well for Great Britain to stop and ask.

JOHN JAY CHAPMAN has a pungent and a fearless tongue. At the annual dinner of the Harvard Business Review last May he wittily denounced the commercialism of America and of the universities, as typified in the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration. The United States, he said, "is a mill that turns everything into business—love, art, leisure, science, innocent recreation, and religious contemplation are ground up into business packages and marketed as soon as nature—prodigal, unabashed, procreant nature—produces them." Whereupon he read passages from a business-school pamphlet upon Mr. Wrigley and his chewing-gum. Harvard, he said, is tending to merge the university into State Street and Wall Street. It must have been as exciting an annual dinner as the Business Review is likely ever to have. Now Mr. Chapman is on the war-path again, this time because of the fact that James Byrne, a Catholic, is a fellow—a member of the governing board—of Harvard College. He objects that "the outspoken purpose of the Roman church is to control American education," says that this "is one of the larger issues of our epoch," quotes Cardinal O'Connell's recent expression of doubt as to the character of instruction at Harvard, and adds that "liberalism presupposes freedom of discussion and under present conditions of Protestant speechlessness the presence of a Roman Catholic on the governing board of a non-Catholic college or school makes it impossible for the board to discuss this great issue frankly."

HARVARD'S OTHER SIX fellows will be amazed to learn from Mr. Chapman what they have suffered from Mr. Byrne. Mr. Byrne has been on the board for more than four years, and it is probable that some of his fellow-members had forgotten that he was a Catholic, just as they are probably uncertain of the church connections of others. Mr. Chapman's Ku Klux doctrine is ridiculous. It is doubtless true that some Catholics would like to control the public-school policy of the country in the interest of what they conceive to be a truer education. It is also true that a more active educational menace to this country comes from certain Protestant groups which have actually forced the legislatures in several States to prohibit the teaching of evolution—a length to which, so far as we know, the legislature of no Catholic country has yet gone. The most potent bigotry in this country is Protestant. We do not mean to argue that all Methodists should be barred from the governing boards of all universities because some Methodists advocate statutory bars upon the process of education. Let the universities continue to select their trustees, as they have done in the past, on their individual merits without inquiring into doctrinal beliefs. If there is a Catholic menace to education in America it is in the existence of a separate educational system over which the general public has no control. That, too, is paralleled by a separate educational system of private schools for the education of the children of the rich. The remedy for both evils lies in the development of the public-school system. When that becomes flexible enough to make private experimental schools unnecessary and so excellent that those who miss it will lose thereby, worry over the private schools will vanish.

EVER SINCE Hendrik van Loon warned us of the danger to American artists from clever foreigners who manage to pass Ellis Island we have kept our eyes open, and his fears seem amply justified. Hundred-percenters will note with horror and alarm that the $13,500 novel-prize offered by Dodd, Mead and Company, the Pictorial Review, and the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation has been won by Miss Martha Ostenso, a young school-teacher of South Dakota, and that her history confirms the worst suspicions aroused by her name: Miss Ostenso was not even born in America. If our American writers know which side their bread is buttered on they will not stand tamely by and see their infant literary industry strangled by foreign competition. They will establish friendly relations with Mr. Solomon Stanwood Menken and see what can be done to stop this flood of foreigners with creative imagination. Surely we need to add another test to the list of those to which our would-be immigrants are subjected. For the sake of our writers no one should be allowed to enter who cannot prove complete and incurable illiteracy.

BY AWARDING THE 1924 NOBEL PRIZE in literature to Wladislaw Reymont, a Polish novelist none too well known either in America or in Western Europe, the Swedish Academy proves once more that it is interested in authors for other reasons than their measure of international fame. An Irishman of 1924 might ask: Who is Wladislaw Reymont? But a Pole of 1923 might have asked who William Butler Yeats was, and a Scandinavian of a few years ago might have had to investigate the identity of the poet Carducci, who instead of the better known D'Annunzio was chosen out of Italy to receive the prize. There is significance perhaps in the fact that Reymont is the author of a series of novels dealing with Polish peasantry and in effect reviewing the history of Poland; in other words, he is a national novelist. Certain generalizers about literary law will thus be confirmed in their belief that greatness begins at home, that international reputations must in the nature of things flower out of local soil. The only question is whether the committee at Stockholm is not liable to grave error when it declares that a given local genius has claims upon the world. Bernard Shaw has never been granted the Nobel prize, yet his works of their own momentum have taken two continents; and no Russian has been recognized in the face of the fact that Gorki and two or three others are known everywhere. The American public will be given an opportunity this winter to read "The Peasants" and decide for itself about Reymont. In the meantime one may wonder if the prize at present does not owe its prestige largely to the association with it of a few names like that of Anatole France.

NO BRAVER ADVOCATE of the truth than Edmund D. Morel, whose death has been reported from London, ever walked this earth. In 1904 he put all humanity under obligation by his revelations of the atrocities in the Belgian Congo—had they been revealed eight years later Belgium would not have had the sympathy of the world in her struggle against Germany, for no blacker crimes were ever committed upon helpless human beings than those perpetrated by the Belgian officials in the Congo. To set them forth required unending determination and no little personal risk on the part of Mr. Morel. When the war came on Mr. Morel was not one of those who was fooled, for he determined to find out facts for himself, and the researches he made into the origins of the war and into the diplomacy leading up to it convinced him that his country was as guilty as Germany or anybody else—in fact, he thought more so. In the face of tremendous public feeling he published facts all through the war and maintained an opposition to the struggle which led to his being arrested and imprisoned for six months. A founder of the Union of Democratic Control and of Foreign Affairs, which he edited with great ability, he defeated Winston Churchill at Dundee in the election of 1922, and when the MacDonald Government came in he was appointed liaison officer between the British Foreign Office and the League of Nations. Always Mr. Morel faced abuse and calumny with complete fortitude, allowing nothing to swerve him from his purpose of uncovering the crooked diplomacy of the past in the hope of preventing disasters in the future. The world can ill afford to spare such a man.

Shall the Progressives Organize?

TO us it seems ridiculous even to ask this question. The Progressives who fought for the election of La Follette and Wheeler must organize. Their speakers and their candidates gave most solemn pledges during the campaign that the movement would not end with the election or defeat of the ticket. Senator La Follette since the election has publicly declared that he has only just begun to fight. We cannot believe that he means to ignore what has been done or to resume his fight within the Republican Party, which Theodore Roosevelt so correctly characterized as "a party the machinery of which is usurped and held by the powers that prey." We are aware, of course, that many liberal-minded people supported the Democratic ticket and that they live in hopes that it can be made the weapon of progress which they desire. That, as we have pointed out, seems to us an impossible dream. We are, therefore, happy to record the news that the Progressives have already organized permanently in Ohio, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and that a first organization meeting has been held in New York.

Definite organization of a national party will, of course, have to be postponed until the convention called for January by the Committee for Progressive Political Action. That committee is the creation of the railroad brotherhoods to whom belongs the honor of leading in this whole movement; out of deference to them no other step will be taken until their convention has decided whether it will go on or not. Should it decide not to, then the work of organizing nationally must proceed through the several State organizations with representation on both a geographical and occupational basis. But, so far as we can learn, the brotherhoods are anxious that the movement continue. Their headquarters are in Cleveland and there the movement is in a strong position, since La Follette carried that city. There they propose to capture the City Hall and then move on the State Capitol. One of the difficult questions which will arise at the coming Cleveland convention is as to the respective roles to be assigned to the several elements in the movement. Labor should, of course, be the nucleus and take a leading, though not the dominating part. We cannot feel that all its leaders are sufficiently educated politically, and politically trustworthy enough, to take the lead. What place the Socialists will take is for them to say. They fought well for the ticket, showing loyalty everywhere and a readiness to subordinate themselves. The Farmer-Labor organizations of the Northwest, too, must receive every consideration. They have done years of hard work, and despite their defeats because of the Coolidge landslide they are strong and vigorous, and they are the only opposition to the Republicans in Minnesota and in North and South Dakota.

While the enemies of the movement are insisting that it will be impossible for such diverse groups to work together, we can see little trouble in the way if only the fine spirit of cooperation which marked the campaign, with the exception of the conduct of certain of the American Federation of Labor unions, can be maintained. More difficult it seems to us will be agreeing upon a platform. What is needed is the adoption of five or six fundamental principles rather than a long platform with numerous planks. The platform-makers at the convention which nominated Mr. La Follette laid aside four hundred requests for additional planks. Obviously, a long program will hurt and not help. But there are certain deep-lying policies and principles which, once stated, carry with them their own connotation, such as, for instance, the conservation of national resources and government control of them and of superpower. We ourselves wish that the coming platform might contain an out-and-out free-trade plank; it must at least contain Grover Cleveland's winning issue of a tariff for revenue only, and it must be unequivocal in its declarations for peace, disarmament, and the complete reversal of our anti-imperialistic policies in the Caribbean and elsewhere. With these fundamentals agreed upon, specific issues to be taken up at any particular time or place may well be left to the future. It is not difficult to state briefly the real issue which confronts the American people, which is whether special privilege and the favored few shall rule America or not. Despite the election, we have confidence that more people than ever before now realize the true nature of the struggle and that they will join a third party at once if they can be convinced that it is sincere and honest in its warfare upon the powers that control this country, upon that "invisible government" which Woodrow Wilson denounced but failed to destroy.

But how is the campaign to be financed, we hear our readers asking? We believe that the State organizations can raise at once modest budgets for the carrying on of permanent headquarters with a few paid officials. Then as the organization grows it should of course be put on a dues-paying basis. There is an enormously important work to be done by pamphlets and by speakers to educate the American people politically, and even if a permanent organization should prove impractical at the present time we should still advocate the setting up of local headquarters to serve as propaganda centers and to prepare for permanent organization in a later campaign. Liberals must realize the enormity of the task before them and see how much more difficult it will prove than the educational work which led up to the successes of the British Labor Party. We have no such background and knowledge in our labor movement as they had, and the mere geographical size of our country makes it enormously difficult to inform the electorate.

The alternative is to do nothing; to assume a purely critical position and resign ourselves to the present mastery of the country by big business; to delude ourselves with the hope that some time, somehow, from somewhere will appear a leader to revive the not-to-be-revived Democratic Party—in other words, to acquiesce in the chains that have been laid upon us. That is a position which surely no patriot of liberal persuasion wishes to assume. Tremendous strides in popular education and in organization can be taken during the next four years if only the necessary money can be forthcoming. Probably nearly five millions of Americans wished to vote, or did vote for the La Follette ticket; there can be no question that the bulk of them are ready to go on, or that they afford a wonderful nucleus, not only in numbers but in enthusiasm, earnestness, and readiness for change, for the organization that must be undertaken if America is not to drift along indefinitely until it comes face to face with a movement extreme in its desires and extremely dangerous in its methods.

Uncle Sam as Air Boss

AVIATION today is so bound up in the public mind with armaments that its value to society as a speedier medium of communication and transportation is overshadowed by its utility as a war machine. This tendency is apparent in the movement for a national code of air laws and the many bills introduced into Congress during the past five years which have urged legislation as a means of building up our air defense. Air laws are unquestionably needed in this country, but this constant appealing to nationalistic fervor and the use of such slogans as "building up our air defense" has obscured the civil worth of aircraft.

No one who has seen the French, British, German, or Dutch air lines in operation can question the importance of aviation in the every-day life of any country, regardless of what military value it may have. Air liners, on regular daily schedule, connect Paris with the important cities of all Europe, as far east as Warsaw and as far southeast as Constantinople. The English Channel air lines operate as regularly as the steamers. The German air lines connect Berlin with Moscow, the Baltic States, Scandinavia, Holland, and Great Britain.

The fact that most of these air lines are government-subsidized may be disregarded, for whether subsidized or not they have reduced Europe to about one-third its pre-aviation size, and today no two cities are separated by more than a daylight airplane flight. The possibilities here are even greater with our wide expanse of territory, ranges of mountains, and lack of customs barriers. Our aerial mail has shown what aviation can do in shattering distances.

Not too much is asked of Congress in urging the passage of the Winslow air bill. Its main object is (1) to provide through a proposed Bureau of Civil Aeronautics for uniform federal supervision of safety inspection of aircraft and airdromes, with regulation of the qualifications of aircraft crews, and the establishment and enforcement of air-navigation rules; (2) to furnish aid to air navigation by approving and charting air routes, establishing air light-houses and signal stations, supplying suitable weather reports, and providing at the government fields, in cases of emergency, supplies and repairs at their fair market value.

Like most of its unsuccessful predecessors the main object of the bill is to provide for federal regulation of air navigation. In theory we have a Congress whose business it is to provide laws regulating and promoting commerce and industry, but here we have an operating system of communication and transportation, covering the entire country, even if spasmodically, and involving the lives and property of the general public without even the beginning of national regulations. There is no working code of air laws in the country today, no air routes or weather reports for airmen, no government terminals excepting military fields, although there are 124 aerial companies and 162 private airports, with some 1,200 airplanes in operation, covering over three million miles during the past year, carrying 81,000 passengers and 208,302 pounds of freight.

The United States is the only large country in the world today without national air legislation. As for the need of air laws, in the past three years there have been 470 crashes, resulting in 221 deaths. These crashes have been due to unairworthy machines, errors in piloting, lack of terminals, routes, and weather data. Government reports attribute 91 per cent of all the accidents to the itinerant fliers who operate without a fixed base, "through inexperience and the use of cheap and unsafe equipment." The itinerant fliers—the "gipsies"—on their part insist that they are the real pioneers, covering the most remote corners of the country, roughing it most of the time over uncharted courses. Yet no one denies that regulation of air traffic would reduce the number of accidents. The following experts' list of "six requisites for safe flying" provides the soundest reason for air laws:

1. A machine, sound aerodynamically and structurally.
2. A reliable engine of sufficient power.
3. A competent, conservative pilot and navigator.
4. Airports and emergency landing fields, sufficiently close together to insure gliding to safety.
5. Nation-wide weather forecast, specialized and adapted to the need of fliers.
6. Adequate charts of air routes.

Any man familiar with aviation will at once recognize the danger of taking passage in a machine which has not been thoroughly tested and without some proof of the pilot's ability, but such professional caution should hardly be expected from the general public. Passengers rarely stop to question the seaworthiness of a steamship or the competency of its captain. They rely wholly upon the government safety regulations, and the government in its turn has provided a detailed system of inspections and examinations. The control of sea traffic is now automatically accepted as a governmental function. The scope and nature of aviation make the control of such traffic as imperative.

Introducing Our Ancestors

THE munificence of Mr. and Mrs. Robert W. de Forest, donors of the new American wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City, will fan the flames of ancestor-worship which have been burning high. For here our Puritan forefathers appear in a pleasant and unfamiliar light: as artists unawares, as craftsmen, lovers of color and beauty. We have been learning of late years that the dour early New Englanders knew a thing or two that we do not; the countryside has been combed for slatback chairs and hook rugs and gooseneck andirons and old iron hinges, simple things with a decorative charm which grew directly out of a human love of comfort. But part of our liking for these things has been mere antiquarianism.

Here, however, is assembled an amazingly gay picture of life in the old colonies. Here is a free use of color which most of us, were it not guaranteed authentically ancestral, would look upon with doubt and regard as "Greenwich-villagey." Our ancestors, it seems, liked to stain their furniture black or a bright brick red—or both. In the old Hart house in Ipswich, built in 1640 (the lovely parlor or "keeping-room" of which is reproduced in the de Forest wing), a molded band of red and black dentils runs across the fireplace opening, and similar bright bands sheathe the ceiling and the great summer-beam overhead. The men who carved the chests and chairs of the earliest colonial furniture were plainly not sour souls with their eyes set on heaven alone; they worked long hours to make life pleasant in the here and now.

Indeed, the inventories of those old days reveal a degree of creature comfort and an eagerness for lavish color which is surprising to those who have grown up on the tradition that the early New Englanders frowned upon the niceties of life. Anne Hibbins, who was surely an authentic early New Englander (for she was the third person to be executed for witchcraft in those pious days), left behind her in 1656 "a green say cushion, a violet pinckt cushion, a velvet (10s) and a wrought cushion with gold (5s), a wrought cupboard cloth, a green say valance, a green cupboard cloth with silk fringe, a green wrought do. with do., one wrought valliants, five painted [India] calico curtains and valence, one cupboard cloth with fringe, and one wrought Holland cupboard cloth." A year later Theophilus Eaton, first governor of New Haven Colony, had an inventory made of his goods which reveals that he, too, had a taste for color. He counted his goods in the "greene chamber" and in the "blew chamber" among his other rooms; he had pottery and glass (undoubtedly the lovely colored glass which is now so rare), silver, brasses, and wrought iron—and 253 pounds of pewter utensils, which was not bad, considering that six years later Samuel Pepys complained of a dinner at the Guildhall in London on Lord Mayor's Day that "It was very unpleasing that we had no napkins, nor change of trenchers, and drank out of earthen pitchers and wooden dishes." Harvard College was founded less than ten years after the first white man had looked upon the Charles River, and its founder was comfortable enough to leave it, after providing for his family, £729/17/2, in addition to a library of 260 volumes, including, besides the saints, such frivolous authors as Terence, Juvenal, and Horace.

Walter Prichard Eaton has recently commented in the American Mercury upon the artistic genius of the men who built old Nantucket—"a God-fearing, hard-working, close-fisted, and none too literate people, who knew a vast deal more about whales than they did about art," yet who, "when they built a town of their own, achieved an artistic unity of effect unknown today; they wrought every detail not only fittingly but beautifully." But, rages Mr. Eaton,

> Then came the sophisticated moderns, laughing at the Puritans, scorning the Puritan attitude toward art, blaming on the Puritans, in fact, most of the childishness or crudity of American artistic expression—and the best these moderns could do were hideous casinos, sprawling cottages with verandas stuck all over them helter-skelter, houses with . . . gingerbread trimmings, and nothing, anywhere, that had repose, unity, beauty of outline or detail, or even adaptability to its site.

Mr. Eaton concludes, naturally, that the Puritans, expressing art in the creation of dwellings, ships, furniture, pots, pans, and hinges, were truer artists than the self-conscious gentlemen who today spell Art with a capital A. In that he is undoubtedly right. And Demos is awakening to it. Wealthy pants-makers are today following Mr. Eaton's example in buying up and restoring abandoned farms; agents of the metropolitan shops are buying out the farmers' parlors and refurnishing them from the mail-order catalogues; little colonial mansions adorn all the Main Streets of the United States, squeezed in upon one another as closely as their predecessors, the imitation castles. The Metropolitan Museum has chastely canonized our ancestors' good taste. But barring all this copying of old models, how is a generation too busy and too tired to whittle to acquire a craftsmanship of its own?

The Going of M. Jusserand

WE have withheld comment upon the retirement of Ambassador Jusserand from the post he has filled with such success for so many years in the hope that the Herriot Government would reconsider and order the ambassador to remain. The doyen of the diplomatic corps, he has been on duty in Washington for so long that one has come to consider him as much an institution as the mounted statue of Jackson or the Washington Monument itself. Modest and unassuming, he has typified the best there was in the old diplomacy and he has combined this with a literary skill, a versatility, and an authority which have made him deservedly conspicuous in the world of letters. We have too few of his type in our citizenship or any other residing among us.

There are still other reasons why we hold M. Jusserand in admiration. He might well have been forgiven had he laid aside his modesty and altered his simple bearing when the war came. The tremendous exaltation of his country in American eyes as the war progressed because of the heroic struggle of the masses of the French people against such disaster and suffering as were theirs might well have led another to assume an aggressive or even a presumptuous attitude. There is surely no higher praise that we can bestow upon the ambassador than to say that, so far as we can recall, he struck not one single false note, made no imperialistic or provocative speech, and in no wise undertook to tell us how we should conduct our affairs. We have often had to complain of the pro-French propaganda carried on in this country by M. Gaston Liébert and others, but our quarrel was not with M. Jusserand, and the responsibility for their objectionable propaganda rests not upon him but in Paris. Undoubtedly the correctness of his bearing was due to his own innate qualities, but it may surely be attributed to his understanding of us, an understanding in which he has been surpassed by only one other diplomat—Lord Bryce.

Glancing over one of his war-time speeches we note that Ambassador Jusserand quoted Marcus Aurelius as follows:

> Never value anything as profitable to thyself which shall compel thee to break thy promise, to lose thy self-respect, to hate any man, to suspect, to curse, to act the hypocrite, to desire anything which needs walls and curtains.

Those are admirable sentiments. Had they governed the Allies and especially his own Government in the years following the war the history of Europe would have been different. But no one can hold the ambassador responsible for the policies of his country. The fact that we wish to stress today is that he has not been an inciter to hate while in America and that he has ever worked for the right relations between this country and the great republic he represents. So we end where we began, with the expression of our intense regret that M. Herriot could not have seen his way clear to permitting the ambassador to remain still longer in active service in the country which has come to regard him with affection as well as high respect. Nor can we personally forget that his brilliant pen has occasionally contributed to these columns. The fact that our views have necessarily diverged from his since war-time days has not diminished, but rather enhanced, the regard in which we have always held him.

The Standard Oil's Death Factory

By MARY ROSS

ON Friday Ernest Oelgert went "loony" at work. Someone was following him, he complained. Then he dodged about the Standard Oil plant at Elizabeth, N. J., shouting that three men were coming at him at once. They took him to the hospital in Elizabeth. He died there the next day, in convulsions.

Others who had worked beside him in what the men called the "loony-gas building" acted strangely. William McSweeney went home from work sick and so violent that his sister called a policeman. When the policeman came he had to get in three other men to put McSweeney in a strait-jacket. They say William Kresge lost twenty-two pounds in four weeks during which he had worked in the building. Walter Dymock, ill at home, got up at night and walked out a second-story window. A passerby found him and called an ambulance. On Sunday these men and one other, Herbert Fuson, were taken to New York to the Reconstruction Hospital, which specializes in the treatment of industrial diseases and accidents.

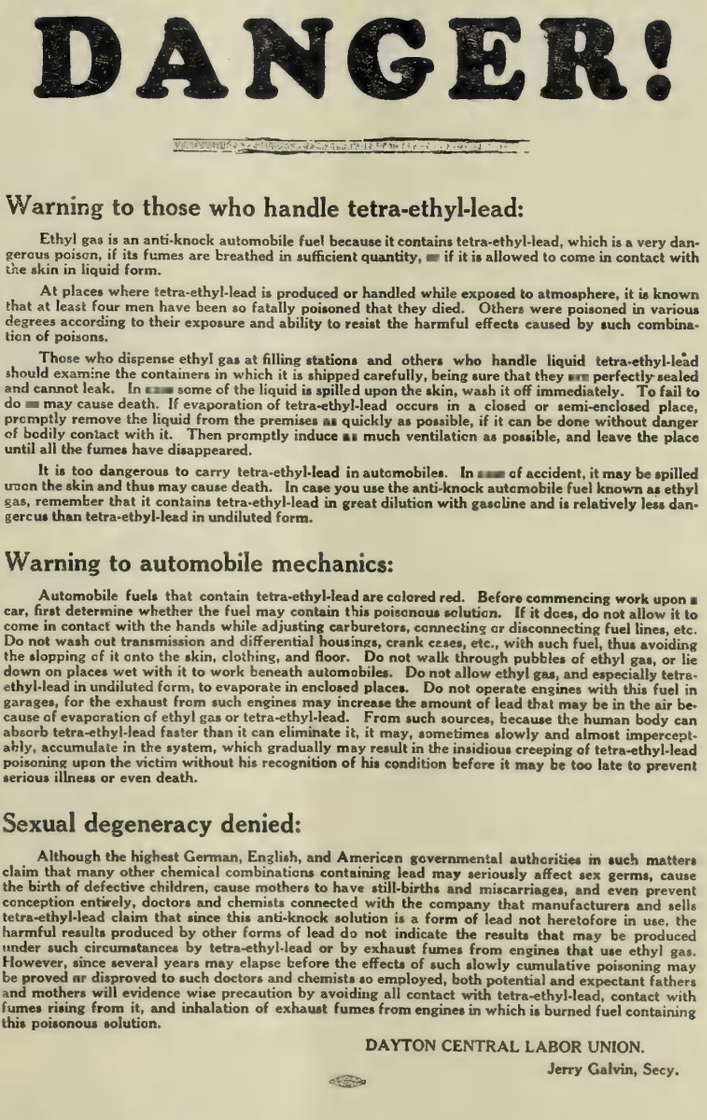
Dymock died on Monday in a violent delirium; McSweeney, who until a year ago had been a brigadier general in the army of the Irish Free State. died the next day; Kresge on Wednesday; Fuson, strait-jacketed also, on Thursday. The "loony-gas" story came back to the first page of the New York newspapers. Thirty-six other employees of the Elizabeth plant of the Standard Oil were placed under observation in hospitals, eight others in their homes. Some of them showed no symptoms, others had headaches, "mental disturbances," dreams, or delirium.

With the deaths of the fourth and the fifth man came statements from the Standard Oil, one of whose executives had declared on the first day that "the men probably went insane because they worked too hard." The "loony-gas" was, in fact, no mystery, but lead tetra-ethyl; its manufacture, in a so-called research building, was the try-out of a new commercial undertaking on the part of the General Motors Chemical Company and the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, which together own the Ethyl Gasoline Company. The substance, known to chemists for more than half a century, and known as a deadly poison, is added to gasoline to keep engines from knocking. This ethyl gasoline, according to the Standard Oil Company, had, without waiting for fuller experimental tests, been put in use in 10,000 filling stations and garages.

From other sources came other bits of information. The discovery that lead tetra-ethyl would increase the power of gasoline and prevent the formation of carbon and knocking of the engine was made at the plant of the General Motors Chemical Company at Dayton, Ohio. It is claimed that gasoline in which a small amount of it is dissolved will give an 8 per cent increase in power with an increase in cost of only 6 per cent. Multiplying that gain by the billions of gallons of gasoline burned in the country's twelve million automobiles will give some idea of the profits at stake in the commercial exploitation of this discovery.

But lead tetra-ethyl is so poisonous that a little rubbed on a man's hand will lower his blood pressure, perhaps even make him unconscious, before he can cross the room to wash it off. Its poison is absorbed in this way through the skin, or inhaled through the lungs from fumes which escape from large retorts during the course of manufacture. These fumes, according to Dr. Gilman Thompson, who is consulting physician for the Standard Oil Company, cause a congestion of the brain which results in symptoms not unlike those of delirium tremens. The Standard Oil Company declares that no accidents have been reported from the use of the treated gasoline in which the lead compound is present in dilution, though Dr. Yandell Henderson, professor of applied physiology at Yale University, believes that handling this gasoline or breathing the exhaust from an engine in which it is burned constitutes an insidious menace to health, possibly even to life.

Two years ago the General Motors Company asked Dr. Henderson, who is an expert in this field, to give his opinion on the use of tetra-ethyl lead gas. He reported that lead thus volatilized attacked the brain and nerves rapidly, resulting in the most dangerous form of lead poisoning, with delirium, paralysis, and other severe symptoms char-



DANGER!

Warning to those who handle tetra-ethyl-lead:

Ethyl gas is an anti-knock automobile fuel because it contains tetra-ethyl-lead, which is a very dangerous poison, if its fumes are breathed in sufficient quantity, or if it is allowed to come in contact with the skin in liquid form.

At places where tetra-ethyl-lead is produced or handled while exposed to atmosphere, it is known that at least four men have been so fatally poisoned that they died. Others were poisoned in various degrees according to their exposure and ability to resist the harmful effects caused by such combination of poisons.

Those who dispense ethyl gas at filling stations and others who handle liquid tetra-ethyl-lead should examine the containers in which it is shipped carefully, being sure that they are perfectly sealed and cannot leak. In case some of the liquid is spilled upon the skin, wash it off immediately. To fail to do so may cause death. If evaporation of tetra-ethyl-lead occurs in a closed or semi-enclosed place, promptly remove the liquid from the premises as quickly as possible, if it can be done without danger of bodily contact with it. Then promptly induce as much ventilation as possible, and leave the place until all the fumes have disappeared.

It is too dangerous to carry tetra-ethyl-lead in automobiles. In case of accident, it may be spilled upon the skin and thus may cause death. In case you use the anti-knock automobile fuel known as ethyl gas, remember that it contains tetra-ethyl-lead in great dilution with gasoline and is relatively less dangerous than tetra-ethyl-lead in undiluted form.

Warning to automobile mechanics:

Automobile fuels that contain tetra-ethyl-lead are colored red. Before commencing work upon a car, first determine whether the fuel may contain this poisonous solution. If it does, do not allow it to come in contact with the hands while adjusting carburetors, connecting or disconnecting fuel lines, etc. Do not wash out transmission and differential housings, crank cases, etc., with such fuel, thus avoiding the slopping of it onto the skin, clothing, and floor. Do not walk through pubbles of ethyl gas, or lie down on places wet with it to work beneath automobiles. Do not allow ethyl gas, and especially tetra-ethyl-lead in undiluted form, to evaporate in enclosed places. Do not operate engines with this fuel in garages, for the exhaust from such engines may increase the amount of lead that may be in the air because of evaporation of ethyl gas or tetra-ethyl-lead. From such sources, because the human body can absorb tetra-ethyl-lead faster than it can eliminate it, it may, sometimes slowly and almost imperceptably, accumulate in the system, which gradually may result in the insidious creeping of tetra-ethyl-lead poisoning upon the victim without his recognition of his condition before it may be too late to prevent serious illness or even death.

Sexual degeneracy denied:

Although the highest German, English, and American governmental authorities in such matters claim that many other chemical combinations containing lead may seriously affect sex germs, cause the birth of defective children, cause mothers to have still-births and miscarriages, and even prevent conception entirely, doctors and chemists connected with the company that manufacturers and sells tetra-ethyl-lead claim that since this anti-knock solution is a form of lead not heretofore in use, the harmful results produced by other forms of lead do not indicate the results that may be produced under such circumstances by tetra-ethyl-lead or by exhaust fumes from engines that use ethyl gas. However, since several years may elapse before the effects of such slowly cumulative poisoning may be proved or disproved to such doctors and chemists so employed, both potential and expectant fathers and mothers will evidence wise precaution by avoiding all contact with tetra-ethyl-lead, contact with fumes rising from it, and inhalation of exhaust fumes from engines in which is burned fuel containing this poisonous solution.

DAYTON CENTRAL LABOR UNION.
Jerry Galvin, Secy.

acteristic of the poisoning, which may cause permanent damage to the body when they do not kill. He believed that the exhausts from automobiles using this fuel in heavy traffic might well poison pedestrians on the street; in a garage the results would be even more disastrous. The fumes are especially dangerous, as symptoms may not develop at once and serious harm may be done before the victim realizes his peril.

A year ago the companies interested in ethyl gasoline asked the Bureau of Mines to investigate it with a view to determining its toxicity and the effects of the exhaust fumes. At the time of the Elizabeth accidents, the results of that study had not yet been made public. Its conclusions indicate that the substance is not dangerous as a motor fuel, but no report has been made yet in regard to danger in its manufacture.

The companies had also asked the research staff at Harvard University to undertake another analysis, but that request was refused. They also asked a report from the recently established department of industrial hygiene at Columbia University. Work there has been carried on for several months but still is incomplete.

But the companies did not wait. Manufacture went on. Two workmen died at the Dayton plant. The Du Pont plant in Wilmington, which makes lead tetra-ethyl on a commercial scale, also killed some of its workers. Manufacture was started on August 1 at the Elizabeth plant on a small scale; it was planned to carry the work on in a research building for six months as a temporary expedient to develop a commercial technique which could guide the company in the building of a large permanent factory, probably in Chicago. The tragedy which closed its doors on October 25 involved the death or hospitalization of virtually every man who was then employed in the "loony-gas" plant, and efforts are being made to determine whether or not the suicide of a chemist who jumped to death from his boarding-house last September and the illness of others who quit during the fall are to be traced to the same poison.

Manufacture on a commercial scale, according to Dr. Gilman Thompson, consulting expert for the Standard Oil, involves "processes still more or less in a stage of development. . . . This has occasioned unforeseen accidents, which, as processes and apparatus are further perfected, should be avoidable in the future."

Work at the Du Pont plant has apparently suffered a somewhat similar development. Its president is quoted as saying:

> The Du Pont company, during the experimental period, experienced much trouble with the men becoming poisoned, even to the extent of fatalities. During the past year of production, when more than 100 men have been employed continuously, the difficulty has diminished steadily. In the past several months, under full production, only slight difficulties have been encountered. Experience has taught the necessary protection, both in plant and medical care.

An experience, however, bought dearly at the expense of those unfortunate enough to incur a "fatality"! And what, in human terms, are the present "slight difficulties"?

In the light of Mr. Du Pont's assurance that "workmen cumulatively poisoned by this material invariably indicate it in the incipient stages, before any harm is done, by a marked symptom," it is difficult to harmonize the collapse of the whole working force at Elizabeth on successive days with the statement of the Standard Oil that its men were protected by every safeguard of equipment and supervision. Investigations have been started by the prosecutor of Union County and the New Jersey State Department of Labor to determine whether or not proper ventilating devices, medical inspection, facilities for washing and for changing work-clothes, and similar measures were in force. Rumors of neglect must be sifted. The workmen who were poisoned and died were not scientists working open-eyed in the investigation of a dangerous substance; they were common laborers, hired at eighty-five cents an hour, to carry out a new method of commercial manufacture for the profit of the Standard Oil. When an accident involves the whole plant it is difficult to accept such an excuse as that offered in the case of the two deaths at Dayton, where it was said that "without desiring to attach any blame to the employees" it was "very difficult to get the men to make use of safety devices provided for their protection by the company."

In due time the legal machinery probably will grind out a decision placing the blame for the deaths of the five men. In due time, also, scientists will provide at least a majority opinion as to whether or not the new fuel, ethyl gasoline, is fit for use, humanly speaking. The health department of New York City and health officers in parts of New Jersey have barred its sale. The Standard Oil's original idea of having it tested scientifically before trouble had been reported was good, but any member of the general motor-using public will inquire why, with one adverse judgment and two other investigations still incomplete, the company rushed forward and put the suspicious substance on sale in those 10,000 filling stations of which the company itself speaks.

It is to be hoped that the Standard Oil's assertion that there are no reports of untoward incidents in the use of ethyl gasoline, with its fraction of one per cent of lead tetra-ethyl, means that none have occurred. The case of the nine or more men who have met death in its manufacture in the last few months, and of the several times that number who have suffered serious, perhaps permanent, disability, offers unfortunately no room for optimism. They were human material, bought in the labor market at eighty-five cents an hour, and scrapped in the feverish rush to try out and market a new product which promised tremendous financial returns. It is always in such crises that the safeguards that protect human life suffer the worst disasters; when manufacture becomes routine and is carried on on a large scale public control comes to bear more effectively.

These men, however, are dead. To men still alive other questions, which judicial investigation can settle, are pertinent: Can the manufacture of ethyl gasoline be made safe enough to be tolerated in a civilized community? Was the wisdom learned by tragic experience at Wilmington applied at Elizabeth? Were the men told the history of work at Wilmington and Dayton so that they knowingly risked their lives for a wage and a nine-days' newspaper wonder? And finally:

When human lives, reckoned in dollars and cents, are cheap, and vast financial stakes are at issue in a venture demanding quick and risky action, are there any but the workers themselves to insist that commercial progress shall not be bought at an indefensible cost to their minds and bodies?

Try It On with Ships

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THERE is great promptness in government work at Washington. This promptness shows itself at twenty-nine minutes past four every afternoon. The number of clerks who can conclude their day's work, put on their hats, and get out of the doors of a government building between four twenty-nine and four thirty-one every afternoon without fail is one of the country's great spectacles of dispatch in the conduct of human affairs.

Government business reverses the cruel practices of private business. In government business the underneath people in multitudes are totally exempted from overwork, while the top people are frequently condemned to dreary drudgery.

Interstate commerce commissioners, those great and lofty characters who with a wiggle of their little fingers make and unmake rate-structures and the fortunes of the transportation system of the mightiest country on earth, sir, can be seen going home under the burden of large piles of documents which they must peruse in their evening hours.

Justices of the Supreme Court can be seen transforming the court into an intellectual sweat-shop of unceasing toil, especially if, like Mr. Justice Brandeis, besides reading everything about the cases which they have to decide, they feel it necessary to read everything else in order to get further light on the cases.

Presidents also have to work, even if, like the present President, which seldom happens, they know how to analyze and organize their work so well as to be able to get to bed at ten o'clock every night.

Top people at Washington, for the most part, perform labor, really. The first problem in public ownership and operation of anything at Washington is to provide the rank and file of employees with inspiring and compelling reasons for jazzing up the pace of their endeavors. Advocates of public ownership and operation might well address themselves to this problem. They confine themselves usually to trying to achieve public ownership and operation of something now privately owned and operated. This writer suggests to them, and to his boss, the editor of The Nation, that he and they might happily expand their propaganda to the point of trying to bring it about that something already publicly owned and operated at Washington should be operated well.

This writer, who looks with a cold eye at public ownership and operation of anything, is willing out of courtesy to go farther and to point out a specific instance in which public ownership and operation at Washington is in need of every assistance that the advocates of public ownership and operation can give it. This instance is ships. Why worry about public ownership and operation of gigantic water-power plants not yet built? Why not pay a little attention to the gigantic fleet of merchant vessels already in public hands and already being managed for weal or for woe by a government department? The thing for the advocates of public ownership and operation to do is to concentrate their energies upon our governmental merchant fleet and show us old weather-worn cynics at the national capital how to make this undertaking an undoubted and glittering success.

The first problem to be solved will be the one to which reference has already been made. It will be necessary to create in the Shipping Board and in the Emergency Fleet Corporation the situation which exists today in most private companies and which enables underneath people to rise readily into being top people. Today, for instance, most railroad presidents rise from the ranks. Today, in a company like the great Standard Oil Company of Indiana, virtually every director, and perhaps absolutely every one, started at some such level as being the driver of a tank-wagon.

We must fix it so that the clerk who is filing manifests for the voyages of government freighters can readily see himself becoming a member of the Shipping Board. At present the law provides that two members of the Shipping Board must come from States on the Pacific, two of them from States on the Atlantic, one of them from a State on the Gulf of Mexico, one of them from a State on the Great Lakes, and one from "the interior." It further provides that not more than four of them shall be from the same political party.

Under a similar system the Standard Oil Company of Indiana would provide that three of its directors must come from Indianapolis and one each from Terre Haute, South Bend, Evansville, and Muncie, while one must come from some Indiana county neither on the Ohio River nor on Lake Michigan, and that if a director who was a Republican died he should be succeeded by a Republican and not by a Democrat. In practice further, if the Standard Oil Company of Indiana were managed like the Shipping Board, it would provide that the only sure way of never becoming a director of the company would be to enter its service as a rank-and-file employee.

It happens that at this moment at least fifteen distinguished persons are being considered by the President of the United States for appointment to the office of Secretary of Agriculture. It teaches every government clerk a lesson to notice that not one of these persons is a Department of Agriculture rank-and-file product.

Speaking roughly, and brutally, the under dog at Washington has just no chance at all ever to be really top dog. That must be changed if the Shipping Board service is ever going to be as alluring to young talent as the service of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana is.

Next, the Senate and the House of Representatives must be persuaded to be willing to pay for talent in the jobs that lie between the top and the bottom. The top people, like Cabinet members, have glory. The people just under them, and above the grade of clerk, have little glory. What compensation of nation-wide fame comes to a man for managing a government bureau or a government ship? Such men in such positions are forever fleeing from government employ to find refuge—and appreciation—in the service of ruthless private capitalists.

A multitude of other problems in the technique of successful government ownership and operation await solution. Why not descend upon Washington and solve them? Most of our ocean-going merchant ships seem likely for many years to be governmental. Perhaps, if the advocates of public ownership and operation would turn in and make the public service as attractive and as effective as private service is, those ships would remain governmental forever.

That's the challenge.

The Nepman Is Passing

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, September 23

THERE have been seven years of Bolshevik Russia and four of the New Economic Policy. To what extent has the NEP eclipsed the revolution? To what extent has it fortified the achievements of the revolution?

For the moment we are not interested in the NEP as an economic phenomenon. The NEP released a spiritual force, a highly demoralizing spiritual force, which is making its influence felt on the machinery of state and even on the hitherto unassailable heights of the Communist Party. No mystery envelops the source of this evil. The NEP reintroduced and placed official sanction on the inequalities of remuneration and of manner of living which the system of 1917-1921, the system of "military communism," had sought, ofttimes successfully, to eliminate.

Take the flagrant offenses of Krasnoschokov, the director of one of the largest government banks in Russia. He was a devoted Communist; had been president of the Far Eastern (Chita) Republic. But under the lure of the NEP he misused state funds to entertain sumptuously, to give gipsy parties, in general to live as befits the head of a big financial institution in a capitalistic country. The money he appropriated was a mere bagatelle. His real crime consisted in having succumbed to the temptations which the NEP put in his path. No man in Moscow would have found it possible to do in 1918 what Krasnoschokov did in 1923. Not that luxuries and comforts were unattainable. But Communists and many Soviet sympathizers disdained them. Now all do not.

From Pravda (Moscow)

Chicherin Staggering Under the Weight of Recognition

We do not ask the Communists to toe an ascetic line. They deserve the good things of the earth much more than some other persons. In their devotion multitudes do deny themselves these satisfactions. But the wrong inherent in the NEP is that it dangles objects of desire before the servants of the Soviet state while withholding from these individuals the possibility of obtaining them through means that are beyond reproach. Sometimes the consequent irregularities are as serious as bribe-taking; sometimes of a much more innocent nature yet fundamentally as corrupting. There are tens of thousands of Russians in high official positions who have resisted these temptations, and we should say that the great majority of the Communist Party are still as honest and as puritanical as Lenin would have had them be. Yet an increasingly large percentage of responsible persons in Russia is succumbing to the slow siege of NEP standards.

Elsewhere many of the sins we refer to would be usual and regarded as natural. It is a common failing the world over to be pulled by "pull" and to give a ready ear to one's friends and relatives. But somehow it strikes the observer as particularly discordant in Soviet Russia. A Communist has a single room in a government dormitory and wants another. He promises a position in his office to the brother of the commandant of the house and his wish is granted. This is the sort of transgression which inspires these remarks. Because it is the more frequent form and the less apprehendible, because the perpetrator is inclined to make light of the act, it is morally as dangerous as outright graft. Yet every day in Moscow an X-ray eye and a radio ear could probably discover hundreds of such cases.

This is the canker which is eating at the healthy marrow of the revolution. To the Soviet sympathizer it is a most disappointing development. It hurts to see these things, especially since one understands that they are not the expression of a sudden perversion on the part of the individuals concerned. They are the apparently unavoidable concomitants of the NEP system. Krasnoschokov is a type of NEP victim. He is indeed one of a myriad of victims and one of a thousand who are caught and punished.

One of the worst features of this evil, perhaps the worst from the moral standpoint, is the spying which it encourages. It is more or less axiomatic that under present conditions anyone may be enticed to sin. Therefore, everyone must be watched. Accordingly each individual employee appoints himself spy extraordinary. Everyone spies on everyone else. The Communist Party has been described as a "mutual espionage society." Unfortunately the trusts and syndicates must be that, and the party has been caught in the same mesh.

If it were not for these regrettable features the NEP would be an altogether welcome phenomenon, for it made it possible for the Bolsheviks to remain in power and for the reconstruction of the country to proceed apace. The NEP has proved to all the world that state socialism or state capitalism, which is the same thing, can be practicable and profitable. Despite the fact that some Soviet industries are still working at a deficit there is sufficient proof on hand—proof in the form of increased production in all but two unimportant industries during 1923-24, in the form of many profit-earning industries, in the form of reduced state subsidies—to establish the principle, a principle which first-hand knowledge of individual enterprises confirms, that state-owned factories, mines, oil fields, etc., can be efficiently and gainfully operated. Six months ago the Government was prepared to grant Baku to an oil concessionnaire. Today the field is working so well under state management that a concession seems to have faded into the dim distance. This situation is paralleled in many other instances, and it may well be that by the time the big capitalists of the universe decide to apply for Soviet concessions some Soviet consulate in Europe will inform their agent that his trip to Russia would be futile.

We must not minimize the difficulties. The Soviet industries suffer most, especially from an impoverished market, yet this is really only one sector of a vicious circle within which they find themselves. Generally, the cost of production in Soviet factories is above normal. Therefore, prices must be high; therefore, people do not buy. Accordingly, Dzerzhinsky, the chairman of the Supreme Economic Council, made a bold move. He is slashing the prices of almost all manufactured articles. In the last month there has been a government-decreed cut in the retail prices of shoes, leather goods, rubber goods, kerosene, cotton, woolen and linen goods, paper, matches, and silk. In some cases the reductions have amounted to 25 per cent and more.

From a narrow viewpoint this step has no economic justification. But its purpose was to break through the vicious circle, and this it is fairly certain to accomplish. It will get rid of a condition which has existed for years.

The present cut-price campaign will entail an immediate money loss to many industrial units. But it will widen their market, and to meet the increased demand they will have to produce more. Large-scale production will introduce naturally low prices to replace the artificially reduced prices of Dzerzhinsky. It is hoped that the "anti-expensiveness" crusade will thus not merely help to liquidate the surplus stocks on hand, but also justify an intensification of production by raising the buying capacity of the rural and urban population.

No sooner, therefore, had the "anti-expensiveness" war commenced to show results than Dzerzhinsky, with characteristic energy, launched a campaign for a rise in individual and group productivity. The consequent economic improvement should this year offset the effect of the poor harvest along the lower reaches of the Volga, and next year make for considerable positive progress.

The increase in the productivity of the Soviet industries is pregnant with a significance which transcends immediate monetary advantage. In the long run the twin anti-price-more-work campaign will have the effect of widening the scope of Russian industries and hence of reinforcing the ranks of the Russian proletariat. This is the touchstone of Bolshevik success. If they are able to further the industrialization of Russia and thus its proletarization they do not merely insure the perpetuation of their regime; they guarantee it against the conservatizing influence of the peasantry.

The trade unions made an interesting contribution to the debate on increased productivity. In a polemic with Dzerzhinsky the unions argued that to increase a man's output you must give him a better wage. Dzerzhinsky replied that the workers would receive better wages only when they demonstrated their ability to increase their output. Here we see Dzerzhinsky as the capitalist, the employer, and his psychology is akin to that of any other employer, for theoretically all the evils of private capitalism are inherent in state capitalism. Where there are employer, wages, and employee there must be exploitation. Naturally, there are degrees of exploitation, and to work for an exploiter who supplies the exploited with rooms at a nominal rental, free carfare, free insurance, free medical care, often free sanitariums and summer resorts, is quite different from being exploited by the United States Steel Corporation. Moreover, there is a distinction between working to enrich a private industrial Mogul and working to strengthen a workers' state whose strength will ultimately, if not in this generation then in the next, make for the improved comfort of the individual. Yet fundamentally and now the evil is the same. How will the Communist state solve the problem of labor in its own capitalistic industry? Shall we witness the coming of syndicalism (the principle of which the Bolsheviks loathe) or perhaps the development of guilds, which are really producers' cooperatives, and thus the rounding out of the cooperative commonwealth? Already some have broached the subject of trade-union participation in the management of industry.

The last season has seen feverish activity in the field of consumers' cooperatives. The conference of the Communist Party in May gave its regular annual blessing to the NEP, this time in more unmistakable language than ever, yet it simultaneously ordered a general attack on private trade. The paradox is only apparent. The NEP means freedom of the peasants to sell their grain as they see fit; it legalized private commerce and state manufacturing for profit. This license the Government has no desire to cancel. The general attack on the NEP did not take the form of a legal enactment or of the annulment of a previously promulgated edict. It is an economic measure. The Bolsheviks have gone out on the economic field of battle in an attempt to limit the scope of private trade but not, as yet, to extirpate it. Their weapon is the development of cooperatives. But they also employ administrative measures. They tax private merchants heavily, and handicap them in the buying and selling of their goods. The result is that private stores have been disappearing much faster than cooperatives and state stores can take their place. Even so good a Communist as Lomov, the head of the Russian oil syndicate, avers that any further shrinkage of private trade will have a detrimental effect on government industry by blocking the channels through which the factories can dispose of their products. But the Soviets, as Lenin once said, always make progress by advancing two steps and retreating one. The crusade against private trade during the last six months has been too successful. Soon probably an order will go out to retire to a second line and retrench. A year from today there may be another advance and another gain.

The next few years will see innumerable exhibitions of this tug of war between private capitalism and state capitalism. At best the Nepman, the private capitalist, will hold his own. But with the rehabilitation of Soviet industries and the strengthening of Soviet finances, both of which are proceeding apace, the disadvantage of the Nepman increases. The writer is convinced that even by economic methods alone the Government could now withdraw all the country's trade from private merchants and hand it over to the cooperatives. Just at present they could not assimilate the gift. Two or three years from today they may be able to. The year 1922 and the early part of 1923 were the heyday of the Nepman. He was rich and flaunted his wealth in the thoroughfares. He had his gambling casinos and cabarets. This is the period of his decline.

The steadily growing success of the state industries and the restriction of private trade: these are the Bolshevik achievements of the past year. There is another front to conquer; the demoralization of the NEP period must be stemmed.

Kuzbas in 1924

By RUTH EPPERSON KENNELL

Kemerovo, Siberia

THE autonomous industrial colony of Kuzbas at Kemerovo, Siberia, is now in its third year of existence, and already it seems a far cry to the early days of strife and uncertainty.

The opening of the chemical plant on March 1 may be considered as an announcement to the world that the colony is no longer an experiment but a successful enterprise. The plant had been designed by French and Belgian engineers and was built ten years ago by Austrian war prisoners, but had never been completed, although vitally necessary in the industrialization of Siberia. It is of small value to Siberia that one-fourth of the known coal deposits of the world lie in Kuznets Basin, because the fuel coal cannot be transported. It therefore becomes essential to convert this coal into by-products which can be shipped where they are needed.

When the American colony took over the management of the enterprise in February of last year there was a Russian "spetz" in charge of the chemical plant who had been promising for years that it would soon be running, but was actually blocking the program by deliberate acts of sabotage. One of the first steps of the new management was the appointment in his place of Dr. Mahler, who went at once to Germany to purchase machinery and equipment and engage other chemical engineers.

But the people only laughed. "It will never run," they said, and it did seem quite improbable that this great sleeping plant would ever come to life. Yet on March 2, one year after the American colony assumed control, we celebrated the formal opening of the "Chim Zavod." The day was perfect for an outdoor celebration: typical mid-winter Siberian weather—cold and still with dazzling sunshine. Standing on the steps of the office building, we watched the parade approach. Bands were playing and the red banners waved against the all-enveloping white of the snow. In the prevailing winter costume of sheepskin shuba, occasionally drawn close at the waist with a bright scarf; sheepskin mittens, huge fur hat, and clumsy felt boots, the crowd which gathered about the speakers' stand appeared somewhat grotesque. But so clothed we were able to be outdoors at thirty below.

I had hoped that on this momentous day I was at last going to see a Russian meeting through to the end. But I know now that such an accomplishment is impossible for one of my temperament. My feet began to get cold even in the cozy felt boots, my neck became stiff from standing for almost three hours, and there was no reason to expect that the next speech would be the last. So I decided to go inside.

It gave me a thrill to see the plant awakening from its long sleep and to hear the whir of machinery in the massive buildings where birds were nesting in the summer. By the time we had come to the coke ovens the meeting was ended and the parade was passing into the plant. Above, on top of the ovens, stood Dr. Mahler and other engineers. The dramatic moment of the day had come when the heavy door was lifted and in a burst of music, with clapping of hands and waving of banners, the flaming coke poured forth. A cloud of smoke from the red-hot mass hid the scene.

Several months have passed since that day. The chemical plant is carrying out its program and is producing benzol, coal tar, pitch, naphthalene, light and heavy oil. Five million poods (100,000 tons) of Kemerovo coal and three million of Kolchugina coal are being converted this year into coke, which is used chiefly to feed blast furnaces in the Urals. Other by-products which the plant will produce are ammonia, creosote, sulphuric and nitric acids.

Housing conditions continue to be unsatisfactory. New workers are constantly coming into the mines and chemical plant, and it is impossible, on account of insufficient labor and materials, to provide adequate housing for them or even to relieve the congestion among the old inhabitants. This congestion is aggravated by the immigration of the workers' relatives, who flock from the villages, hoping to find better living conditions in Kemerovo, and quarter themselves in the one room assigned to a worker and his family. When I visited the new Tartar barrack at the central shaft I was pleased with the improvements: a wide hall eliminates the evil of adjoining rooms, the stoves open into the hallway, and each spacious room has a separate pantry. But when I stepped inside one of the rooms I noticed two cradles, and when I learned that two families, comprising four adults, two infants, and seven children, lived in that one room I retreated in dismay, feeling that here was something almost as bad as a New York tenement!

As we walk through the streets and lanes of Kemerovo Rudnik and quaint Kemerovo Village, past rows of log barracks and little, fenced-in cottages where the door-yards are cluttered up with pigs, chickens, sheep, cows, and geese, there seems to be a baby at every window. The birth-rate in Kemerovo is staggeringly high—and so is the death-rate. The other day I met a woman who had given birth to nineteen children, two of whom survived; it is not uncommon to find mothers who have had eight or ten children with perhaps two living. It is a survival of the fittest. Ignorance, unsanitary conditions, improper food and care make an infant's life extremely precarious. But if he survives the early days of suffocation in a hot, air-tight room, and perpetual motion in a cradle hung from a limber birch bough, his "pacifier" perhaps an ingenious contrivance made of the dried teat of a cow and tied to the end of a horn—if the baby lives through all this he is of rugged stock, and the simple, primitive life thereafter is conducive to health and happiness.

The babies of the workers in the enterprise are brought into the world much as American babies—in a modern hospital. The mother is given free medical attention, twenty rubles from the social insurance for infants' clothing, and a sum of money for milk during the first year. These benefits, added to the eight weeks' vacation before and eight weeks' after childbirth, might be said to encourage maternity; but laws against birth control go further. Up to a year ago the Soviet Government had made birth control legal, but now Russia takes her place with other civilized nations on this issue, under the old misconception that an increased birth-rate (which the Government desires) necessarily means a like increase in population.

Notwithstanding this rather dark picture the standard of living has improved considerably in Kemerovo in the past two years. It is now possible to buy more of the necessities and conveniences of life, not only because they are now available in the cooperatives and markets, but also because people have more money with which to buy. The stabilization of the currency put an end to the constant losses the workers suffered because of the rapidly dropping paper ruble, and moreover there has been a steady increase in the wages of Kuzbas workers. The wages in 1923 averaged 20 per cent and in 1924 50 per cent higher than they were when the colony took over the industry.

It has been exasperating to colonists, accustomed to the enterprise and efficiency of an American store, to buy anything from the cooperative, and, in fact, few had the time to indulge in the experience. The store seemed to close its doors when a rush of business was imminent; for example, the day before a holiday or at hours when the workers were free. A long line of customers, sometimes extending to the road, was usually on hand, and the bored clerks showed no interest in selling their goods. When the customer finally reached the counter and selected his purchases, there was a long wait while the clerk laboriously figured up the bill with his Chinese counting-frame—a Russian clerk's inseparable companion. Next he must wait in line at the cashier's desk, a particularly long process in the old days before the ruble became stable and when the rate changed every day. (Those were the days when we carried huge bundles of paper money running into millions of rubles to buy our butter and eggs.) With his receipted bill clutched triumphantly in his hand, the customer now joined the third line which was waiting to have its orders filled.

At this point the greatest patience was required. I once watched a new clerk weighing out honey for the woman ahead of me. The scales were balanced with numerous small objects such as match boxes and nails, which it took him some time to adjust. Then he proceeded to weigh her earthen jar and ladle out the honey. But first it was too heavy, then it was too light; he would add a ladleful and take out a ladleful, drop it back into the barrel, scoop up another ladleful, take it away again, and so on and on. I was almost screaming with impatience, but the housewife seemed unperturbed. At the closing hour, three o'clock, the line of customers was turned ruthlessly away —even the line with receipted bills.

Although much the same procedure is still observed, it is carried on at doubled speed; the store is open when you want it to be and the clerks show a gratifying desire to accommodate. This great transformation can be partly attributed to insistent agitation and complaints started by colonists; but it is also, of course, a local indication of the general improvement in business and industry throughout Russia.

A radical step toward community life was the opening of a dairy, with the first milk delivery I have heard of in Russia. The head of the Farm Department, W. H. Kingery, proposed that the management solve the problem of the cattle, which overran the town, by purchasing them and operating a community dairy which would sell milk to the inhabitants, giving reduced rates to workers on low categories with large families.

But it so happens that the family cow is a sacred institution in the villages and often the chief sustenance of a family. Each little cottage or portion of a cottage has its cow, which wanders about the streets or grazes in the community gardens. In summer grazing land is provided for the cows and herd boys drive them back and forth to pasture morning and evening. In winter they block the footpaths or, straying off the paths, stand knee-deep in snow, looking forlorn and unkempt. Although they are a public nuisance, it is hardly to be expected that the people would at this stage consider the welfare of the community above their individual livelihoods.

Protest meetings were held and the owners of cows voiced their indignation at the Americans who would force them to sell by depriving them of grazing land. The management soon gave up the idea of putting through the whole program at once. Pastures were furnished at some distance from town, land was extensively fenced, and the Farm Department is buying from those who wish to sell. The number of these will increase as the advantages of obtaining milk from the dairy become more apparent.

So now in the early morning a familiar echo of civilization falls upon our waking ears: the rattle of milk cans as the dairy wagon passes. The wagon itself should charm the eyes of the doubting inhabitants; it is inclosed with wire screen and looks tantalizingly like an ice-cream wagon in America. The fresh milk flows from the faucet of a big tank, the customers furnishing their own receptacles.

For the leisurely minded the theaters offer frequent (and prolonged) entertainment. A few weeks ago I dubiously bought a ticket—being assured that this performance would begin early—to a play given by the Workers' Club for the benefit of the Red army invalids. At 8:30 the actors began to arrive, so we decided to brace ourselves for the evidently long siege ahead by a brisk walk over the open ground about the little log theater.

At sunset we went inside. It was then ten o'clock and the house was full—a well-dressed and festive crowd. The blaring orchestra played encouragingly for one hour, after which, with seeming reluctance, the curtain rose. It was an elaborate production of "The Bright God." As the intermissions between acts were longer than the acts, I found it hard to keep my interest in the play. However, to a majority of the audience this waiting has become a part of the entertainment. Between acts they repaired to the outdoors and promenaded in the mild twilight of the Siberian summer night in their accustomed cheerful way. It was three o'clock when the fourth act was over, and there was still one more. The band moved outside with the crowd and played its most strident selections to keep up our spirits. It was now bright daylight; the long procession of the villagers' cows was moving toward the pastures; snowy geese were strutting about the door of the theater with their goslings, the color of pussy willows, and hissing at us; a sow and her pigs were having a glorious time in the mud by the pumping station.

The third and last warning bell sounded. We returned to our seats. It was an oriental scene and the lights were red to give a mystic effect. But in through the windows streamed the bright morning sunshine. In the matter-of-fact daylight the dusky make-ups shone forth greasily. It was like seeing the side-show of a circus in the daytime. Although it was four o'clock before the performance was over, many stayed for the dance which usually follows a play.

While the American colony to a large extent lives apart from the Russian population, we work together and have no social life to speak of apart from theirs. The hostility seems to have disappeared with the complete elimination of the old "spetz" in the industry. Even the community dining-rooms have become public boarding-houses in which only about half of the diners are colonists.

A few weeks ago the colony cooperative voted to abolish the 60-per-cent system and went over to a basis on which each person pays a flat rate for his food, instead of 60 per cent of his category. Thus passed the last remnant of our experiment in pure communism—the actual practice of the maxim: "From each according to his ability; to each according to his need." One objection to the system was that it did not always work according to this rule, since men on piece-work and overtime often earn as much as others on the highest categories, and yet paid only 60 per cent of a lower category. But, since it was impractical to charge 60 per cent of the total earnings, and there were continual labor troubles in the kitchens (the labor being more or less voluntary, because a wife received her food "payok" whether she worked or not), the "100-per-cent system" passed with little opposition. The rate for meals was made low enough to accommodate all workers and the management agreed to subsidize the children of colonists.

Yet I would not go so far as to say that our adventure in communistic life was a failure. The colonists on higher categories voiced no objection to paying more for their food than those on lower wages; but the board of management of the colony cooperative requested the change because of the complicated bookkeeping such a mixed economic system made necessary and the other difficulties it created.

The colony now consists of 400 members, of whom 230 are men, 100 are women, and 70 are children. About 25 of the women are "Russian wives." Of the 600 persons who have come to Kemerovo from America since January of 1922, 200 have left. The colony has, for some months past, been operating at a profit, which during the coming year is expected to amount to a million rubles.

A Russian Summer Resort

By MAX EASTMAN

THE best place to find out what different kinds of folks in Russia think about the Government is a summer resort. All classes of the population are there. The working class is there in thousands, occupying the majority of the big cottages, which have been turned into "sanatoriums" for workers under the direction of the Commissariat of Public Health. The "government servants" are there, occupying the rest of the big cottages. The Nepmen are there in the big summer hotel, which also pertains to the Commissariat but is used to make money to support the sanatoriums. The "servant class" is there, working in the hotel just as they used to. The old petit-bourgeoisie is in the little cottages, owning them again if they are very little, and clinging on in the capacity of caretaker if they are big enough to have been taken over by the all-devouring commissariat of Dr. Semashko. The bandits are on the mountains surrounding, and the peasantry drive their goods in every day to the little fly-beloved market in the public square. It is all there, the whole Soviet civilization.

Moreover, if your summer resort happens to be on the shore of the Black Sea, and you arrive by boat from Batum, you can go forward and have a talk with the sailors. Sailors are always a little revolutionary. Sailors in Russia take the breath out of your mouth with the rapid and reckless force of their disquisitions on the significance of the Soviets and the fall of world capitalism. They have absolute confidence in their Government, understand perfectly the "retreat" involved in the New Economic Policy, can explain it with as masterly a practicality as could Lenin himself, and far more clearly. There are a hundred and seventy of them on board one of those steamers, healthy, happy, brown, smiling at world events and feeling triumphant. You get to thinking that the opinions of the passengers amount to very little when you see these big, strong, unhesitating, convinced men.

* * * * *

I stopped at Sochi, and went first to the big hotel, where I stayed long enough to get well acquainted with the new Russian money-aristocracy, the successful Nepmen. They have left me with an impression of something rude, fat, and feeble in the enjoyment of life. They remind me of Art Young's pictures of capitalists. A man who can explain his having a little money by saying that he is an engineer, or the head of a government-owned "trust," is happier. To be an expert engineer in the service of the Government, and then speculate on the side and get rich—that is real selfish beatitude in Russia. To be merely a rich man is a little unpleasant. The present is inglorious and the future uncertain. It is so, that is to say, if you are a sensitive person. The result is that the Nep class is composed mainly of unsensitive persons. Their attitude to the Bolshevik Government is crude and childish. Its principal stock in trade consists in calling the Bolsheviks "the comrades."

"We used to have napkins," your hostess apologizes, "but the comrades took them away from us."

* * * * *

I spoke of the speculating engineer as a happier class than the Nepmen—a class that carries off the aristocratic bearing a little better, at least, under these trying circumstances. There was one of these engineers in my summer hotel, a tall clear-headed man of strong thoughts.

"The Soviet Government," he told me frankly, "is what stands in the way of the economic and cultural revival of Russia." I asked him if he thought it would be better if there hadn't been any Soviet Government.

"I wouldn't say that," he said, "and I will tell you why. If it hadn't been for the extreme policies, and the intrinsically foolish and impossible policies of the Bolsheviks, the old regime would have come back. Nobody wants the old regime to come back. No thinking man in Russia wants any more of the Czar. History will thank the Bolsheviks for cleaning that stuff out so thoroughly that it has become unthinkable. Everybody knows that Russia will be a republic and the land will belong to the peasants. We can thank Bolshevik fanaticism for that."

I told him that it had been a cherished belief in America that the Russian peasant so loved the "Little Father" that he could never get along without him.

"That is all pure nonsense," he said. "It didn't make five minutes difference to the Russian peasant whether he had a czar or not. People take those things as they come. What the Russian peasant wanted was the land."

I saw an illustration of his statement a few days later in the little market. There is a scarcity of paper bags in Russia, and groceries that you buy are poured into little cones made out of the pages of all sorts of old books and magazines—everything from higher mathematics to the poetry of Pushkin. I have an impression that all the pre-revolutionary culture of Russia is dribbling out of existence in this manner. One day an old man who was selling red and white cherries under a shaggy burlap umbrella turned up a page containing the picture of that poor, whiskered, meaningless face of Nicholas, with all his medals under his chin. A younger man was selling cutlery across the alley.

"Look out, papa, you'll be arrested!" he shouted. And as the old man looked a little nervous, he pointed to the Czar sitting there in the basket.

The old man knew it was a joke, but he didn't know what to do. Maybe he had some lingering feeling that things about the Czar were important. He stood the Czar on his head in the cherries first, and then changed his mind and pulled him out, turned him this way and that, and finally offered him for sale.

The young man left his booth and came across the alley. "Citizens, the Czar!" he cried. "Two rubles for the Czar! Two rubles off if you take the Czar with a pound of cherries!"

From the Projector (Moscow)

The Boulevard Aviation Society

A laughing crowd gathered around, and one of them bought a pound of cherries, which the young man wrapped up in the Czar's face. The old man cheerfully accepted two rubles less than his price, waving the "Little Father" away with a comical gesture of good riddance.

* * * * *

The man who runs the hotel is a gentle-talking, kindly, gray-haired philosopher, very sympathetic to my idea of finding out what Russians think about Russia.

"I'm not political," he says. "I stood aside from it all. I saw seven different governments come and go here, before they got it settled. The Reds put me in jail the first time, when the Cossacks were in the mountains, and things were very tense. That was just on the general principle that I was a bourgeois. They let me out as soon as it was over."

"I suppose they shot some who were actively opposed," I said.

"They shot about a hundred," he said.

"Did the Whites shoot too?" I asked.

"No," he said, "but only because there weren't any Reds here to shoot."

"Do you think the Bolshevik regime is a success?" I asked him.

"It's a political success," he said, "but there's no industry. Things are bad—they couldn't be worse—and they're not getting any better."

"Do you expect another revolution?" I asked him.

"No," he said. "No."

"But you don't think things are going to improve under the present regime?"

"I don't see how they can," he said.

"What do you expect, then, in the future?" I urged, and he smiled at my urgency.

"I don't expect anything in particular," he said. "It is hard to tell what the future contains."

When a Russian says that things are in ruin and are not likely to get any better, it does not mean that he is in a state of despair. It does not mean that life has come to nothing, as it would if an American said it. It means that he will turn from the idea of progress to some other idea, or some feelings, perhaps intrinsically more interesting. He never was entirely eaten up by that idea, as we are. It was an interesting Western importation, this insane absorption in becoming. He is more oriental, more contented with being. If "progress" is a failure, why, then, perhaps something else will succeed better!

* * * * *

You wander along in a reflective mood until you arrive at a little sort of Childs' restaurant on the other side of the market. Standing in front of this restaurant in the attitude of a proprietor you will see a black-eyed, black-bearded gentleman, with the swarthy complexion and great big dangerous-looking nose of these Caucasus mountain races.

"What did you come to Russia for?" he asks you. "I'd get out of here in an hour and a half if I had the chance. It's a damned hopeless place. I know what it is. You needn't say anything. I've lived abroad too."

"You've got some reasonable kind of freedom there," he goes on. "I know. If I live in America and I hate a man, I can go and kill him, can't I, and then explain myself to the police." He brushed his thumb over his fingers in a gesture which is international. "What can I do here if I hate a man?" he asks you eloquently.

You are at a loss for an answer, and he continues:

"Why, even in Finland—I've traveled, I've lived in Finland—there you can kill a Russian if you've got twenty-five gold rubles about you. Here in Russia if you kill somebody the Government comes right along and kills you!"

"I suppose they've had a good deal of trouble establishing order," you suggest timidly, "and they had to be strict at first."

"Order!" he shouts. "What kind of order is that? They don't give you any chance to explain yourself. They just clap you right in jail, and then when they get ready they try you for murder and shoot you. That's no kind of order!"

You draw out your notebook in silent admiration.

"A government," he concludes emphatically, "ought to take a man's feelings into consideration."

Autumn

TRANSLATED BY MAX EASTMAN, FROM THE RUSSIAN OF ALEXANDER PUSHKIN

October at last has come! The thicket has shaken
The last leaf lingering down from the naked branch.
Autumn is breathing cold, the road is frozen—
The brook still runs with a murmur behind the mill,
But the pond is still; my neighbor is up and away
With a hunt, away to the farthest dreaming field,
Where the winter wheat will suffer from his mad sport,
And the bark of dogs will startle the forest oaks.

It is my time now! I never could love the spring,
The dragging thaw, the mud, the stench—I am sick
In spring: my blood's astray, my mind is oppressed
With a yearning pain. Winter is better for me.
I love the serious snow-fields under the moon!
How the light run of the sled is swift and free,
And the hand of a love down under the sables warm! . . .

And Oh the run, to be shod with the sharpened steel,
And glide on the glassy face of the standing river!
The shining alarm of a winter holiday!
But still there's a limit in things!—A half year's snow—
Even at last to the old cave-dweller, the bear,
It is long enough! You can not forever and ever
Slide in a sled with the beautiful young Armida,
Or sulk behind double glass by a friendly stove. . . .

They commonly scold the last days of autumn: to me,
My reader and friend, they are dear; their beauty is quiet,
Their modesty brilliant; they draw me to them like a child
Whom the family does not love. I will tell you frankly:
Of all the seasons of time I can love but one;
I find in her—I am not a vainglorious lover,
Though wilful of fancy—I find in my love much good.

How shall I tell you? She ravishes me
As a dying virgin, perhaps, might ravish you.
Condemned, and bending meekly, and murmuring not.
Not angry—a smile on the fading lips—
She does not perceive the abysmal opening mouth
Of the tomb—the purplish light on her features, plays—
Today she is here—she lives—and tomorrow not.

Sweet mournful days, charm of the dreaming eyes,
Your beauty is dear to me that says farewell!
I love the sumptuous decline of nature's life,
The tents of the forest adorned with purple and gold,
And loud with the sound of the faster breath of the wind,
A billowy curtain of fog concealing the sky,
And the sun's rare beam, and the early frost,
And the threat of the gray-head winter standing off!

With every autumn that comes I bloom again;
It is good for my health, it is good, this Russian cold;
I fall afresh in love with the habit of being;
Sleep flies early, and hunger is in its place,
The blood romps joyfully through my heart,
Desire seethes up—I laugh again, I am young,
I am living life—such is my organism
(If you will excuse me, please, the prosaism).
So saddle my horse; and into the plentiful open
With fluttering mane he will carry me flying, and under His body his glittering hoofs will ring like a tune
Through the frozen valley, will crackle and crash on the ice—
Till the brief day dies! And then the chimney, forgotten,
Will waken again with fire—will pour sharp light,
Or dimly glow, while I sit reading long,
And nourishing the long thoughts in my soul. . . .

The Fight Against Famine

By JESSICA SMITH

I BOARDED one of the comfortable little steamers that plies up and down the Volga at Nijni-Novgorod last August, and went southward through the prosperous central section, where the peasants were gathering the best crops they had had in years, to the lower districts where the higher banks of the upper river flatten into wide fertile plains which produce enough grain to feed all of Russia when there is plenty of rain, but which hardly return the seed that is put into them in the frequent years of drought.

It was a leisurely half-freight, half-passenger steamer, not one of the swifter, more luxurious craft which carry Nepmen and workers to the watering places of the Caucasus. That meant that we stopped long hours at all the landing places and had plenty of time to go ashore and see for ourselves how extensive this year's crop failure had been and how it was being handled. There had been some panic among the peasants early in the summer, and there were rumors in Moscow of a repetition of 1921, over a much smaller area. But the aspect of the villages was nothing like that I had known in the grim famine days. The Government had taken swift measures to relieve the worst suffering. Our boat was carrying some of the seed which the Government was distributing among the peasants who had suffered most, to secure them for next year. Even in the worst districts the peasants had something to go on. They had had good yields of potatoes and vegetables, and there was lively trading in all the market-places. The cooperatives, which have been crowding out the small private trader at an extraordinary rate all over Russia, were filled with customers. Rosy-cheeked peasant girls were trying on bright platoks of red and orange and green before the mirrors. This was the surface impression. Underneath, of course, there was an enormous amount of suffering and need as there always will be until the Russian peasant has learned something more than the old primitive methods which leave him absolutely at the mercy of weather conditions.

The stern of the boat was filled with peasants, stolid, illiterate old mujiks who had been through famine after famine and had somehow amazingly survived the diet of weeds and fried leather, and the younger, more alert peasant lads, many of whom had been through the efficient educational system of the Red army. An earnest young Communist, sent down from the center of the famine region to make sure that the relief measures were executed promptly, was explaining the Government's reconstruction program to a group of peasants who had been complaining bitterly. He was pointing out that there always would be famines and distress among the peasants until they learned and applied modern methods of cultivating the soil; that the Government realized this and had already appropriated 260,000,000 gold rubles to be used partly for temporary relief, but chiefly for a reconstruction program which would mean extensive irrigation and reforestation of the affected regions, and, even more important, for education which would teach the peasants more intensive cultivation of the land, through crop rotation, fertilization, improved seeds, and dry-farming methods. Finally, that they were organizing credit in order to provide the peasants with the machinery necessary to carry out these methods.

An old mujik spoke up. "This credit now—What good does it do us? The Government must have its money back. We understand that. But if they must have it back next year or the year after, what good does it do me? Perhaps there will be a drought again next year and the year after. My crop is not even enough to feed my family and pay my taxes. That will mean that I cannot pay for the horse or machine I have bought and I must give it back again."

"But Tovarischi," another young peasant put in, "you should all do what we are doing in our volost. We peasants have lost so much that we cannot work separately any more. But if Ivan has a horse and Matvey a plow and Sergey here nothing but his two strong hands, why they can all join together, and there will be a harvest. And after that perhaps we can all buy a tractor together, and the Government will help us. Take a broom now—when you tie it to an iron handle, why you can turn stones over with it, and you can't break it with an ax. But if you break it up into its twigs, it's a mere baby, it can do nothing. . . ."

Later in the summer I visited a district still further south, in the rich country just north of the Caucasian Mountains, where the Russian Government has just granted three Soviet farms, comprising 15,000 acres of land, to an American group of agriculturalists and educators who will contribute trained personnel, capital, and machinery, and will operate these farms jointly with the Agricultural Department of the Soviet Government, teaching American methods to the Russians.

These Soviet farms, or Sovhoz's, as they are called in Russia, are the old landlord's estate which were taken over by the Soviet Government at the time of the revolution to be operated as model experimental farms by the Government, to serve as examples to the peasantry of the superiority of large-scale, collective production over their inefficient individualistic methods, and as actual training schools for the peasants. Originally the Soviet Government held several thousands of these estates, but it has gradually relinquished the land of the less favorable ones to the peasantry, and rented out others, keeping in its own hands only the best. The three Sovhoz's I visited, which the Soviet Government is turning over to the American group, belong to the latter class.

Matveyeff, the manager of the group of estates of which these three are a part, entertained us with true Russian hospitality in the old mansion house. He was making a success of the farms. The yield of grain was three or four times as great as that of the land of the surrounding peasantry, but the motive power was still oxen. What machinery he had was already old-fashioned in America. He was delighted when he learned that the American group was planning to build up an industrial farm and school where young peasants could come and learn to operate modern machinery by actually using the machines; how by organizing cooperative groups they could purchase machinery themselves when they went back to their own villages.

Up and down Russia this movement of the peasants toward cooperative production is going on. Outside of almost every village you come upon groups of peasants building new settlements, so as to live right on the land they cultivate. They are moving away from the villages where their houses are all built together far from the land which is split up into innumerable plots and strips and operated in the most inefficient and primitive way possible. And they are moving away not as individuals, but as groups, united not merely for cooperative selling but for cooperative production. This is the real fight that is going on in Russia against the constantly recurring famines, a fight which means far more than temporary relief, and will eventually guarantee the Russian peasant the full product of his hard-won land.

In the Driftway

THERE are times when the Drifter wishes he were a great financial genius. Such a time occurred just after election; he read of feverish buying in the Stock Exchange, of stocks bounding up like india-rubber balls, of a general state of bliss if not of peace in the vicinity of Wall Street. Why, he pondered, had he not had the prescience to take a little flier on election eve? To be sure, his vote was going the other way; but there was no reason why his savings, such as they were, could not have been placed where they would do him the most good. He even went so far, in his mental speculation, as to spend the money which he might so easily have obtained. His thoughts skipped lightly from place to place or lingered on a few places: the Neapolitan bay at noon with the white city curving up like a dish behind it and Vesuvius, purple and smoking at one end; or the scrubbed bricks of Delft; or the Berkshire Hills, steel-blue in the subtle November light.

* * * * *

THESE day dreams, however, are never long-lived. This particular one ended even more abruptly than usual. Rashly the Drifter consented to accompany a friend to the bank for November coupon-clipping—the friend's, not his own. In a daze he saw his companion manipulate the little device which detaches the coupon in one movement; he in his clumsy way was helping by means of the scissors. With even more amazement he watched the knowing one as he deftly sorted out certificates marked "exemption claimed," or "exemption not claimed," "fiduciary," or "individual not resident in the United States," "tax to be paid at the source," or not to be. The Drifter marveled to see that his friend knew which kind he must have, and seemed to be not at all hesitant in making his choice. But the experience was quite enough. If a little job of coupon-clipping was so mysterious to him, the Drifter had the sense to realize that a career in high finance was not to be his.

* * * * *

HEREIN is evident the great felicity of poverty: it is simple. Life's problems, desperate as they seem at times, are nevertheless limited to a well-kept circle. A man must eat; the poorer he is, the simpler this problem and the more simple the diet. There are no perplexing choices between boned pigeon and terrapin, or even between roast beef and roast mutton. The very poor in Ireland have tea and potatoes for breakfast, dinner, and supper; their only real excitement arises when one or the other of these fails to materialize. So it is even when the dead-line of starvation is considerably farther away. A property-owner of the Drifter's acquaintance was asked what he would do if he should suddenly find himself a millionaire. "Well," he began enthusiastically, "I'd have the roof fixed ——"

* * * * *

ON the whole, the Drifter considers that imaginary money is the most pleasant to spend, and certainly the easiest to manage. It needs no bank or vault; its owner is not troubled by importunate bond salesmen or the price of United States Steel common; and its chief asset is that having been thoroughly dissipated for some bauble which has turned out to be a fraud, it can, with no pain or trouble, be spent all over again for something else. On the other hand, the Drifter, as he indicated in the beginning, sees a lure in the amassing of wealth. To make money must be great fun; to have it in quantity must be a great nuisance. The simple solution would seem to be to make it and then give it away. And in that case probably the last person to refuse a moderate share would be

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Liberal Who Won

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The city of Rochester is a highly industrialized community of approximately 330,000 inhabitants It is a beneficiary in practically all of its manufactured products of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. Its Republican orthodoxy is impeccable.

City, county, congressional, and presidential tickets go through with enormous majorities listed under the emblem of the Eagle. Al Smith has been a fly in the local Republican ointment, but on November 4 even Al trailed behind a 14,300 plurality for young Teddy Roosevelt in the county. Meyer Jacobstein, Democratic Congressman with Progressive and Socialistic support, carried the Thirty-eighth District by a majority of approximately 30,000 over his Republican opponent, while Coolidge piled up in the same area a majority of about 23,000 over Davis and La Follette combined.

Why this errant Republicanism, so shameless and so enthusiastic? There are three answers to this question—the man, the city, and the issues. Visualize a slight spare man in his early forties with a rather scholarly pallor about his face, black hair, dark eyes, a sensitive mouth, an honest and utterly disarming smile that flickers on and off as the mind deals now with humorous and now with serious matters. Born of Jewish parents who had been reared in Poland, Meyer was the fifth of nine children. Throughout his course in the Rochester public schools he was a newsboy on Main Street. He left school for a time, but was led back into the channels of education by people whom he met in the work of the Boys' Club of the First Unitarian Church. The story of that Boys' Club and of the influence of Dr. W. C. Gannett, pastor of the church, upon this Jewish lad and his friends is a part of the great American epic of immigration in which the Antins, the Schurzs, the Boks, and the Pupins have written worthy sections.

The ambitions awakened in the boy by these contacts carried him far. An A.B. from Columbia, a Ph.D. in economics from the same institution, a traveling fellowship won by merit, which gave him a year in Europe; a professorship in economics in the University of North Dakota and then in the University of Rochester, then the position of labor manager in the Stein-Bloch Clothing Company—these constitute the main items of his pre-congressional career.

In Washington his service was unique. He established a Rochester office where during his absence all of his constituents, even the humblest, might bring matters to his attention. He carried on a most extensive correspondence with his constituents, consulting business men and labor leaders regardless of party about the bills with which they were concerned. His industry was indefatigable. He was an independent Democrat in the House as Borah was an independent Republican in the Senate, bringing every vote to the bar of his own conscience and judgment. Upon the adjournment of Congress he published at his own expense a report to the voters of his district, in which he recorded his position on every important measure and the reasons for it.

This independent liberal Democrat took with conservative Republican Rochester. The community liked him primarily because Rochester is an old-fashioned American city, and in Meyer Jacobstein it had an old-fashioned American for whom to vote.

Rochester, New York, November 11 JUSTIN W. NIXON,
Pastor of the Brick Church

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Up in Rochester, where not to be a Republican is not only a political but a social offense against good form and right thinking, the amazing has happened. A Jew, sufficiently convinced that this is not the best of all possible worlds to be called a radical by his opponents, politically a Democrat, professionally a teacher, has been reelected to Congress in the Thirty-eighth District.

Meyer Jacobstein did the impossible two years ago when running against a colorless politician-lawyer he won by the scanty but triumphant majority of 1,629 votes in a district which polls close to 90,000, the vast majority by training, tradition, belief, and apathy Republican. Jacobstein went to Washington imbued with the singular idea that a representative was supposed to represent. He opened an office at home at his own expense—he is a poor man—and there a competent secretary listened to anyone who came. Many came. No one asked them their politics or checked up on their affiliations. Jacobstein stuck to his quaint notion that part of his job was to be a link between the humblest citizen and his government. In the House this original man paid little attention to party lines. He upheld measures his intelligence told him were good, opposed others. He paid no attention to their origin.

This year he stood again for his seat. His opponent, a widely known lawyer, was presumed to have powerful backing, such as the Knights of Columbus, whose local leader he had been for two years. He made an energetic campaign, speaking sometimes as often as five times a day. He made skilful use in appealing to the conservatives and farmers of Jacobstein's known liberalism and the fact that he had the indorsement of the local La Follette Progressives. He played the "red" scare before audiences likely to be affected by it and the empty-dinner-pail-Democratic-tariff scare before crowds of factory workers. One of the great manufacturing plants refused to permit Jacobstein to address its workers within the plant at noontime, although this privilege had been extended to his opponent. Well-meaning conservative gentlemen sent letters to the press insinuating none too subtly that Jacobstein was being financed by Moscow. At the eleventh hour the tom-toms of religious prejudice were beaten loudly in a mysterious letter to thousands of "selected" voters.

And the result of it all?

Coolidge and Roosevelt swept city and county by tremendous majorities—and Meyer Jacobstein was reelected to Congress by a majority of 30,000 votes.

Rochester, New York, November 8 PAUL BENTON, Assistant City Editor, Rochester Times-Union

Business Swung the Election

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In Minnesota, in Iowa, in North and South Dakota, and in other Western States there was a complete turnover of political sentiment between October 15 and November 4. That turnover was swift, silent, and secret. It was contrived and sprung upon the opposition with the force of a hidden mine, and succeeded beyond the hopes and expectations of the Republicans themselves. When La Follette called off his Western tour about the middle of October at Sioux Falls with the assertion that the West "between the Mississippi and the Rockies was aflame with Progressive sentiment" he was making no mere political gesture. Neither was so astute a politician as La Follette fooled. Everywhere there was evidence in Senator La Follette's remarkable meetings—where admissions were charged—that the voters were aroused and enthusiastic for the Progressive cause, just as there was evidence in the dull and perfunctory meetings of General Dawes that the Republican cause was languishing. Reporters from New York newspapers, making a tour of the West, brought confidential reports to State La Follette headquarters to the effect that La Follette and Wheeler had better than a fighting chance to carry eight or ten Western States. No fear was expressed at any time for Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, or Nevada; and South Dakota and Washington were thought sure for La Follette.

This revolution in political sentiment in the last two weeks of the campaign was all the more surprising when one considers that La Follette and Wheeler had a clear-cut moral issue upon which to campaign. Neither Senator allowed the voters of these Western States to forget Teapot Dome or President Coolidge's circumstantial connection with the oil scandals. Hitherto this has been just the kind of issue to which the American people have most quickly responded: common decency in government.

Obviously the Coolidge vote, therefore, was compelled—at least in those La Follette States of the West—by a sentiment powerful enough to reverse customary American psychology. Obviously the Coolidge vote was a fear-vote.

Girls in department stores were "shepherded" by lady foremen into the Republican fold. A clerk at a downtown store, the wife of a labor organizer, had to be reconverted to the La Follette cause every night following her daily inoculation with the Coolidge propaganda.

"Why, we won't have any jobs if La Follette is elected," she complained.

At State La Follette headquarters campaign managers were not unaware of this gigantic "whispering campaign" conducted against their candidates, but they were powerless to combat it. They were without newspapers. They could not get to the unorganized women workers, for here is where the seed was being sown.

One La Follette manager bitterly denounced the League of Women Voters following the election as a "disguised Republican club."

"The league," he asserted, "told the girls they must vote out of civic duty, and their employer told them how to vote."

The League of Women Voters claims credit for having secured the largest poll in the history of our country; and it is apparent that the new recruits to the Republican cause are women, and it is a matter of common knowledge that "devotees of civic righteousness" voted to indorse a party of unprecedented corruption, in order to guarantee prosperity.

This "whispering campaign" could not have been conducted without organization, but it was not by the ordinary paid workers of the Republican party. The new and novel fact about the campaign just closing is that for a period of two weeks the entire fabric of American business acted as a well-oiled political machine.

Minneapolis, Minnesota, November 7 M. H. Hedges

Judge Lindsey in Danger

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: We had not only the Klan to overcome but their women, and some of my old enemies—in sympathy with the Klan, if not Klan members—resorted to the circulation of the most vicious lies that could have been invented: lies which we were in no position to combat, first, because of lack of sufficient finances, for, as you know, such expenses are enormous and far beyond my means; the salary here is only $4,000, and I had already spent over $50,000 in my various election campaigns; and, secondly, because their work was done so quietly and insidiously.

The unofficial count gives me a majority of 301, the official count is now on, and one cannot tell what change it may bring with so small a majority to go on; this official count may not be completed for a week. There are also 661 absentee votes which might easily wipe out my 300. But, no matter if I should be elected by the official count, the Klan, on behalf of their candidate, will contest the election. This would mean an enormous expense to me.

I have also this additional danger to confront: If, even after the contest, I am declared victorious, it is the Klan's purpose to get rid of me by passing a bill in the legislature (which they will control, having elected a Klan legislative ticket) abolishing the court.

We want friends of Denver's Juvenile Court to know all of this. If the Klan accomplishes its purpose, it will have done something which no other organization was ever able to accomplish. In anticipation of this, they are gloating over the national fame it will bring them.

Denver, Colorado, November 7 Ben B. Lindsey,
Judge of the Juvenile Court

Handicaps of the Progressives

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: We did not say much about our handicaps while the the race was on, but now that it is over it is wise to review them, because they may all be removed before 1928, except the handicap of a big campaign fund in the hands of our enemies and the handicap of labor intimidation by big-business interests.

An organization to cope with the Republican and Democratic parties cannot be built in four or five months. I was anxious for Senator La Follette to accept a nomination in 1920 from the Chicago convention. Had he done so, with four years of the right kind of organization work, we might have carried the election this year. We would then have avoided the handicap of an independent column on the official ballots. We would have had our own party name and emblem in all the States. We would have avoided the handicap of a political movement with only two candidates in the field for public office. We would have had State, congressional, and local candidates in the field, all working with their friends for the support of the national ticket.

In many States, Progressives who are with us at heart were not willing to come to our support because they did not want to be bolters from their old party, without having a new party to join. Senator Borah's course illustrates what I mean. We would have avoided the handicap of inadequate newspaper support. Many newspaper editors who were with us at heart would not come to our support and forfeit certain political patronage and prestige without having a new party to tie up to.

We had the handicap of the radical supreme-court plank. It was one of our best planks. I wrote and spoke in its favor. But it was an unwise issue to raise. Some Catholics and some Lutherans were made to believe that the permanence of their parochial schools depended upon constitutional guaranties which they thought might be over-ridden some day by Congress Had the leaders of the Progressive movement all been gathered together in a national convention, I think they would have toned down the supreme-court plank, making it more like the plank in the Progressive platform of 1912.

We had the handicap of disorganization among the farmers of the Northwest. Four years ago and two years ago the activity of the Nonpartisan League in the States of the Northwest was certainly a most important if not a determining factor in the election of Senators Wheeler, Ladd, Frazier, Magnus Johnson, Shipstead, and others, as well as in the election of several progressive congressmen and governors. The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota and the Progressive Party of Idaho only partially filled the gap caused by the general breaking up of the Nonpartisan League.

Madison, Wisconsin, November 10 CHESTER C. PLATT,
Secretary, Wisconsin Nonpartisan League

Secret Balloting Openly Arrived At

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Secret balloting openly arrived at"—so one of the artists of Santa Fe aptly describes New Mexico's election methods.

Voting in most precincts of Santa Fe County took place at a schoolhouse. On one side of the school-building a window was open. Just inside, at a long table, sat the election officials; two Republicans and one Democrat in this particular county because the Republicans are in power. Outside, beneath this open window, was a table at which presided one Republican, one Democrat, and this year one representative of La Follette. A short distance away were two sets of voting booths, wholly superfluous appendages.

A voter walked up to the table, asked for a ballot, and gave his name. His name could not be found on the list of registered voters held by the mysterious persons inside the window. The man was positive he had registered. His name must have been lost in the copying of the lists. Or perhaps he was found on the Democrats' list and not on the Republicans'; again evidence of a slight error when after registration the names were copied off by the Republican officials. In either case, he could vote if two citizens swore to his eligibility, and so at last he was handed from the window, via the watcher, the coveted ballot.

With no thought of the privacy afforded by the booths he stood by the table and marked his ballot. He started to fold it but was promptly relieved of this task by one of the men at the table, who kindly did the folding for him, reading the ballot meanwhile. After creasing it so that the official inside the window could also read it easily, the watcher handed it up to the person delegated to drop it into the box inside the schoolroom. No voter deposited his own ballot. Whether or not it got into the ballot box no one knows but God and the election officials, and neither will tell.

If a voter took his ballot to a booth, he was apt to be followed by some zealous party worker who wanted to know what ticket he was voting and gained the desired information by the simple method of watching while the voter performed his civic duty. At most of the polls there was a rope wandering aimlessly from tree to tree about fifty feet from the voting booths; but that did not restrain anyone who wished to accompany a voter to his destination. In one precinct which did carefully keep idlers beyond the rope, there was no protest when instructions were called out by someone in the crowd, or when voters, after starting toward their goal, were urged back outside the rope for another heart-to-heart talk.

Of course this method of public balloting is almost a necessity where votes are freely bought for two, or three, or five dollars. How else could the party tell whether they received what they paid for? And votes were high this year, for the women demanded their rights—equal pay for equal votes. In fact, when after coming to the polls in their accustomed black shawls to cast their ballots they were sent home to get hats and return for another round of voting, they insisted on double pay.

Santa Fe, New Mexico, November 6 HELEN BLACK

Books

First Glance

ERNEST BOYD'S "Portraits: Real and Imaginary" (Doran: $2.50) was worth writing if Pope's "Dunciad" was. There are those who take no pleasure in the relentless poem through which the Wasp of Twickenham stung the dullards of his day almost literally to death; the dullards would have died anyhow, it is maintained, and the musty chest in which their corpses are preserved is depressing now. The same persons will be a little bothered about Mr. Boyd, for he will seem to have expended his extraordinary energy upon worthless victims—not dullards in this case so much as pretenders, persons puffed and blown by cheap literary success until their airs and antics are intolerable. What claim, it will be asked, had the denizens of the Algonquin upon the immortality which only satire can bestow? Mr. Boyd's answer to all these doubts should be that his book is justified if it is interesting. I find it interesting.

By temperament I am inclined to believe that pretenders do not matter, but I must confess to a breathless interest in Mr. Boyd the hunter of small game. He slashes through the underbrush with an absolutely unquenchable fury, darting into this recess to behead a literary lady, pausing at that dark spot to grope for the thin neck of an aesthete and strangle it, pushing on and on until he has disposed of the literary enthusiast, the press agent, the critic, the liberal, the puritan, the British lecturer, and others of their skulking kind. If in his "imaginary" portraits—photographs which for the safety of his own skin he has made by the composite process—he often develops a pedantry of zeal, being so hot after affectation that he grows unable to detect any other scent in the wind and so angry at ignorance that a harmless misquotation, as Burton Rascoe amicably points out, makes his blood boil, I forgive him in view of his vigor; I still can relish his rage. I find him not only as resentful as Pope but as innocent of ideas; I cannot gather, at least from this portion of his book, what sort of person or thing he would positively like. It was not his purpose, of course, to let me know—he was writing satire of the old-fashioned, unsparing sort. And as a matter of fact, in the section of "real" portraits he discharges loud shots of appreciation at Mencken, Nathan, Dreiser, Eugene O'Neill, Yeats, and James Stephens; when he comes to George William Russell (Æ) he actually is almost worshipful. Yet I turn back to those malicious pages where he has painted at full length and in burning oil the most self-conscious literary generation thus far seen in America.

Mr. Boyd's style in the long run is bad, being monotonous in the very quality which for a few pages gives it power. His explosions are too evenly spaced; eventually the impression is of a machine which rather ponderously grinds granite into uniform pieces and coughs them at a uniform rate into the face of the enemy. And he practices a trick which I consider abominable—the trick of misquotation for humorous effect. Something is rotten in the state of Greenwich Village, or the lewd forefathers of the hamlet sleep; we hear of Miltons never mute, and of a style that launched a thousand tiffs.

The comparative failure of "The Literary Spotlight" (Doran: $2.50), a collection of anonymous skits on contemporary American writers reprinted from The Bookman, may conceivably be attributed to its editor, John Farrar, who says in the preface that he "wanted frankness, but certainly not the bitterest truth," and who hopes that "there is in these pages as much constructive as destructive thinking." A few of the portraits are excellently complete, and the whole is a document of value; but Mr. Farrar as a patron of satire should not have been so much afraid of producing a "mean-spirited book."

MARK VAN DOREN

Russia's Foreign Relations

The Foreign Policies of Soviet Russia. By Alfred L. P. Dennis. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

IT seems that in relating the story of the international relations of Soviet Russia Professor Dennis the scholar and historian had to endure a hard battle with Mr. Dennis the gentleman with certain inherent prejudices. Evidence of the clash may be found throughout his book, and this evidence, moreover, shows that the historian has all too often yielded to the gentleman. In spite of apparently laborious efforts to attain fairness and historical objectivity, he falls far short of these qualities. The story has not been much "relieved by the liberal use of quotations from notes, speeches, and articles by Soviet leaders and from the official Bolshevik press." These quotations have been used not so much to illustrate the story as to emphasize the thesis which the author set out to prove: that the foreign policies of Soviet Russia have been actuated by a determination to foment trouble in the interests of world revolution and that in furthering this end the Soviet Government has freely resorted to unscrupulous revolutionary propaganda in foreign countries. To prove this point, however, the author frequently finds himself obliged to resort with an equal freedom to questionable sources. While the notes accompanying each chapter show that the author has been swimming in a veritable sea of material, it seems, however, that he was not always certain of his strokes and in such emergencies grasped at anything that could hold him afloat. A book claiming for itself historical accuracy might be expected to base itself on absolutely reliable and tested documentary material. Instead, the author bases many of his opinions and conclusions on stories in newspapers and propaganda publications which have been notoriously unfair and biased in their treatment of all news concerning Soviet Russia. Consequently his opinions and conclusions are for the most part a mere repetition of the platitudes and inaccuracies with which the average editorials dealing with Soviet Russia in the conservative press of today are teeming.

The fundamental error of the author is his dealing with the foreign policies of Soviet Russia apart from internal conditions. Indeed Mr. Dennis gives due warning in his preface that "the internal conditions . . . have been intentionally neglected," for he does not "pretend to be an expert on Russia." This statement is well borne out by such gross mistakes as declaring "the Bolsheviki" to have been "the extreme left wing of the Social Revolutionary Party" and confusing the Social Revolutionary Party with the Left Social Revolutionists on the evidence of an alleged resolution which Mr. Dennis received from what he "believe[s] is adequate authority." While these mistakes are not extremely important in themselves, they reflect on the qualifications of the author for the task he has undertaken. Perhaps one need not be an expert on Russia, but certainly one must be thoroughly familiar with the recent history of Russia and with the social, political, and economic background against which the revolution was enacted before one can deal authoritatively with Russia's foreign relations. For in the case of Soviet Russia the foreign policies have been so closely knit up with internal conditions and changes as to present a practically inseparable entity. A proper treatment of the subject would follow the revolutionary development, marking among others these principal phases and turning-points: from November 7 to Brest-Litovsk, from Brest-Litovsk to the beginning of Allied intervention and the Czecho-Slovak revolt, the period of civil war and the so-called "military communism," and finally the liquidation of the civil war and the New Economic Policy. Only in the light of the conditions accompanying each of these phases could the foreign policies of Soviet Russia be intelligently discussed. As it is, Mr. Dennis chose to discuss the foreign relations of Soviet Russia with each country or group of countries separately and independently of conditions at home. By this method Mr. Dennis perhaps succeeded in making clear his own point of view and that of the "foreign offices of several nations" in which he has been "afforded exceptional facilities . . . for the collection of the information on which this book is based." The Soviet point of view, however, either is sorely lacking or is overshaded for the sake of proving the original thesis. As a result the author has produced a picture which is out of proportion and out of balance.

Moreover, Mr. Dennis often takes great liberty with facts and sources. Thus in the case of the Hungarian Bolshevik revolution, being unable to lay this episode directly at the door of the Soviet Government, he puts undue emphasis on the alleged role played in this event by Jews—as though that was of any material importance. In fact, Mr. Dennis himself is obliged to concede that the events in Hungary were due "chiefly to the shortsighted policy of the Allies." Lenin's alleged views on the peace with Poland and the prospects of "causing" revolutions in the various countries of Europe are given on the authority of the Ost-Information, an organ of the Russian émigrés which served as a clearing-house for the wildest tales that could be conceived in the work of spreading anti-Soviet propaganda. Mr. Dennis avoids giving sources for such statements as that the Baltic disarmament conference which took place at Moscow in December, 1922, was called by the Soviet Government in order "to secure a reduction in armies of the Baltic League . . . to cover the decrease in Soviet forces" because of "desertion and other causes," or for his weird story about the organization of revolutions in foreign countries under the auspices of the G. P. U., or the Soviet State Political Administration, which succeeded the Cheka and is, as is well known, an organ used exclusively for domestic purposes. The very geography which Mr. Dennis employs in connection with this story is sufficient to brand it as a crude fabrication. The Soviet constitution is dismissed by the author with the unsupported sentence that "it is absolutist in its spirit and Czarist in its conception." These are only a few of the more conspicuous examples of Mr. Dennis's historical and critical method.

With all this Mr. Dennis's work will prove of considerable value to the really interested and attentive reader who will take the pains to check up the sources and make the necessary reservations. For in spite of all the efforts of the author his book shows that the conditions which have been furthering the growth of revolutionary tendencies throughout the world have never been of the making of Soviet Russia; that the foreign policies of Soviet Russia have been actuated by the interests of the Russian revolution, which it was only the logical duty for the revolutionary Government to defend against all foreign aggression, and finally that in all its relations with foreign countries there has not been a single case in which the alleged bad faith on the part of Soviet Russia has been conclusively proved—although this has been the common argument advanced by all opponents of Soviet recognition.

LEON TALMY

Making Good

Lottery. By W. E. Woodward. Harper and Brothers. $2.
The Oblate. By J. K. Huysmans. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

SUCCESS in business is not the result of luck alone. To become a Merchant Prince or a Button King a certain native capacity for assuming the credit due to accident and a perfect willingness to let others work hard are also necessary. When chance does the average man a good turn he merely marvels at his luck and supposes that it will not happen again; but native egotism comes to the rescue of the born business man and he hints so darkly at the shrewdness which created his opportunity that the timid ones are only too glad to do his work for him in the future. Then, if only his self-conceit can keep pace with accomplishment, he is a made man, well on the way to an honored old age and a biography in the American Magazine along with the others who have made good. In this land of opportunity fortunes are to be had for the asking, but only the few have gall enough to ask for them.

Such at least is the moral which it seems necessary to draw from Mr. Woodward's new and joyous novel of the Button King who marched forward in his own estimation, step by step, until he half believed the legend that from his own profound meditations on the button problem had evolved the mechanical contrivance which he acquired by a fluke from its inventor, and until he was, like his fellow-townsmen, wholly convinced that his complacent receptivity was somehow responsible for the industry of his manager and the accidents which made his fortune. Jerry Garrison, beginning merely as a young man who could say: "'Gee! I went to bed at eight o'clock last night, hit the hay with the chickens, and pounded the old pillow for twelve hours'—in such a way that you felt for a moment that a definite forward step in human progress had been made, though at the cost of great endeavor," learns as he goes along the secrets of success. He learns, for example, that the perfect willingness of clerks to pledge their savings to rescue a boss's business is the very reason that they will always be clerks, and the golden rule, "Make the other fellow do it," bursts upon him in a sort of apocalyptic vision; but the real lesson is the lesson of self-deception. When he has learned that even such cynical truths as those just mentioned should not be admitted to oneself too often, and when he has come to the point where he can say: "If I didn't believe in this button, if I didn't believe it to be a great thing for humanity: I mean a useful thing, a labor saver—Gosh! Mack, I'd throw the whole business out of the window this moment" and really believe it himself, there are no limits to his possibilities; for, as the author says, this urgent banality when it is associated with a strong sense of acquisitiveness is the key to material success.

If "Lottery" is, as it seems to me, the most amusing satire on business since "Tono-Bungay" the cause lies not only in the author's evident practical knowledge of commerce, but to an even greater extent in a jolly good humor which enables him to see the fun as well as the meanness in the life he describes. Most artists who enter imaginatively the world of affairs have a way of losing that urbanity which it would better befit them to wear, and they mingle with their scorn a bitterness which awakens in the mind of the reader the suspicion that their contempt for financial success is not unmixed with envy. Mr. Woodward takes his seat in the jovial company of Rabelais and Mark Twain rather than among the atrabilious satirists. Like Mark Twain he has what the cynical usually lack—the capacity to enjoy life—and the spectacle of his hero's rise moves in him more laughter than sneers because though intellectually he despises him he is capable, temperamentally, of enjoying this bungling and good-natured success. Life in America, he seems to say, is muddled and ridiculous; meanness becomes in time synonymous with ability and prosperity with virtue; and yet, granted the requisite robustness of spirit, this life is not unamusing to watch or even to participate in. Freed by his intellect from the market-place gods, and yet too full of exuberance merely to growl or sulk, he has been able as often as not to forget the meanness and catch the excitement of the lottery of life. He has said many bitter things, and I have quoted some of them, but the hearty exuberance of his book, not easily illustrated by quotation, will probably remain longer in the minds of most of his readers. No one could catch so well as he does the rhythm of commercial adventure without catching at the same time something of its fun, and though he would mock it unmercifully afterward I am sure that Mr. Woodward could attend a meeting of the Rotary Club on a lark and enjoy himself hugely.

"The Oblate" is, on the whole, the least interesting of the tetralogy of which "Là-Bas" is the first volume, but to those who, like the present reviewer, find the author-hero strangely fascinating, it is certainly not dull and it is the necessary conclusion to the story of that curious man in whom the most prosaic of temperaments was somehow reconciled with the most comprehensive credulity and with a passion for ecclesiastical art as intense almost as his passion for good cookery. Durtal-Huysmans is inexplicable and perhaps ridiculous, but there are few characters in fiction who so indubitably exist. He is inescapably real, and to anyone who has followed his adventures through the four volumes he is never to be forgotten.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A Scholar Astray

The Contemporary Drama of Russia. By Leo Wiener. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

THE preface of this curious contribution to scholarship leads one to believe that here at last is a history of the Russian drama. Further, one is given to understand that this is not merely an outline of developments but also a startling revaluation of accepted values. The table of contents, in contradiction of the title, indicates that from these pages one may learn about the Russian theater from its origins to its present status under Communism. In all such expectations one is deceived, much as was Mother Hubbard's dog.

The volume is divided into two parts; the second, which is half the size of the first, being an alphabetical list of playwrights with their names meticulously accented and their dates, the titles of their plays, and the dates of the first performance and first publication of these given in due order. The text proper, which makes up the first part of the book, is in effect another catalogue of plays and playwrights, with dates and accents invariably noted, plus other statistical matter not always relevant—all arranged in a rough chronological sequence. The author is unable to sustain the discussion of any topic, whether it be the Art Theater or the theory of monodrama, without taking refuge from analysis and argument in such paragraphs as form the literature of a Who's Who. He makes another escape from the task he set himself in pages of quotations, often pointless and always inordinately long. These are mostly excerpts from Russian critiques, which Mr. Wiener stigmatizes in his preface as vitiated by partisanship. Subtract the quotations and the disjointed Who's Who, and what remains is the occasional summary of a plot, a little chronicling of theatrical events, and some pet animosities which fail to be infectious. The author's appreciation is so shallow and his power of expression so feeble that not one of the hundreds of plays he mentions assumes the semblance of a body, and not one of the playwrights is more than a tagged and dated ghost. In speaking, for example, of Sukhovo-Kobylin's "Krechinsky's Wedding," a piece which is a standby of the Russian stage, Mr. Wiener finds room to say that this play was first produced in 1855, that it was played 194 times in Moscow theaters, that it is based on a famous scandal, that it is "still a favorite play of the repertories," and that its author "had graduated from the university in philosophy"; but he gives no hint of the substance of the play.

Needless to say, the book clarifies the general trends of Russian dramaturgy and stagecraft as little as it does the work of the individual artists. With some difficulty one disengages the scheme which underlies Mr. Wiener's work. He seems to believe that the golden age of Russian drama was in the days when unpretentious realism reigned undisputed. At least he speaks with approval of the great Ostrovsky as "the photographic reproducer of national scenes." The decline commenced with the birth of the Moscow Art Theater, whose "ultra-realism" was just as disastrous as the subsequent symbolist reaction against it. Then the Bolsheviks came upon the scene and delivered the coup de grace. We are to understand, then, that the salvation of the Russian theater lies in a return to "the best traditions of the past," that is, to photography; "and then its virtue will not lie in pessimism raised to a cult, but in the usual incidents of everyday life." Thus the work of Chekhov, Gorki, Andreyev, Stanislavsky, Meyerhold—in short, the developments of the last twenty-five years, which constitute one of the richest chapters in the history of the European theater, are treated as a welter of whims and vagaries. In the final pages, which pretend to deal with the theater under the Bolsheviks, and which are marked at every turn by ignorance and prejudice, the author has lost a marvelous opportunity for studying the social function of the theater, just as in the previous pages he passed by all the other opportunities with which the theme bristles. Toward the end the author complains that a certain Russian playwright, Yevreinov by name, is a slippery customer who surrenders nothing but his mortal coil to his investigator. In the same fashion, alas, the subject of the Russian drama completely eludes this pursuer, leaving in his hands the dry, empty skin which with so much aplomb he offers to the world.

One more word to dispel Mr. Wiener's fearful fantasy that the source material for such a book as his purports to be has been "dispersed" by "the World War and the Bolshevik regime." Last winter I was doing research work in Russian literary history in the libraries of Moscow and Leningrad, and I can assure him that I found all the collections intact and growing.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY

Refugee Psychology

Leaves from a Russian Diary. By Pitirim Sorokin. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

ON the top floor of a loft building in Berlin is the modest plant of a Russian daily, The Days. Its chief editor, Alexander Kerensky, is a slightly built man with no other apparent distinction than the ability to write for his thousand-odd readers. He will shut his eyes and scrutinize you painfully until his shortsightedness becomes embarrassingly apparent. When he rises from his chair you will note that he shuffles his feet, that his hair is closely clipped, Russian fashion, and that his extremely simple apparel creates an impression of defeat and resignation. As he speaks your pity for him will increase.

Behind his sloping back the afternoon sun was setting on the distraught republican Berlin of 1924. Kerensky, however, spoke of the Moscow of 1917, of his blamelessness in connection with the famous Order No. 1, the Korniloff affair, and the past in general, until one got an insight into that kind of mind which cannot take into its consciousness the actuality of painful events and continues to relive and revalue its once glorious past. Professor Sorokin, the former secretary of Kerensky, like Kerensky himself, suffers from the malady of exile, from the psychology peculiar to refugees.

Macaulay, speaking of the Whigs who fled to the Low Countries and there plotted the overthrow of Charles II, says:

> A politician driven into banishment by a hostile faction generally sees the society which he has quitted through a false medium. Every object is distorted and discolored by his regrets, his longings and resentments. Every little discontent appears to him to portend revolution. Every riot is a rebellion. He cannot be convinced that his country does not pine for him as much as he pines for his country. . . . The longer his expatriation the greater does this hallucination become. . . . Every month his impatience to revisit his native land increases; and every month his native land remembers and misses him less. This delusion becomes almost a madness when many exiles who suffer in the same cause herd together in a foreign country. Their chief employment is to talk about what they once were, and of what they yet may be, to goad each other into animosity against their common enemy, to feed each other with extravagant hopes of victory and revenge.

As a historical document Sorokin's book is valuable in the very limited sense that it illuminates this psychology. The story of the Russian revolution has been told and retold by others. In his book, however, we get a glimpse into the mental state of the Russian intellectual and his bitter opposition to the Soviet Government. The author's flight from his enemies, his hair-breadth escapes, his description of the bestialities of his enemies would sound much more convincing if the professor did not occasionally suffer a lapse and indulge in what lawyers call admissions against interest. When, for example, he learns that the English troops in Archangel were concentrating to overthrow the Soviet Government he undergoes hardships and Stevensonian adventures to reach the seat of counter-revolution, but finally he is compelled to surrender to the Soviet authorities. In the end he is given a post at the university, yet when the Kronstadt rebellion takes place the professor writes: "At that time my wife and I were seized with pneumonia. She went to the hospital first, and next morning, although I was suffering, I attended a private meeting of six professors, two lawyers, and two priests, with whom I discussed a plan of action in case the Government fell; plans of organization of a new government, reorganization of the courts. . . ." And while he is unsparing and unstatistical in his condemnation of orgies of blood by the Extraordinary Commission of the Soviet Government he says regretfully: "We moderates are not bloodthirsty, yet in order to prevent repetitions of these murderous uprisings we must exercise great firmness. If it is necessary to execute a few thousand ruffians in order to save millions of Russians, we must be prepared to do it. . . ."

The former Secretary of the Prime Minister of Russia saw how under the Czar and under the Lvov and Kerensky governments the whole social fabric fell and disintegrated, and he pretended to long for a strong-armed dictator to bring order out of chaos. When finally the Soviet Government had established authority over the entire Russian territory the author expresses a peculiar solicitude for the Bolsheviki. He would, like the proverbial Irishman, have them killed for their own good: "If they had been killed by their enemies, they would have lived in history as martyrs who tried to establish a new order but perished before their experiment had time to prove itself. Instead, a different end is destined for them; an end of slow disintegration. Their destiny is to destroy their own ideal with their own hands, to exhibit it to the world in all its rottenness and horror. . . ." And yet Dr. Sorokin, we must assume, has studied the history of Christianity. Ever since their Princeton colleague showed such utter disregard for the cynical lessons of history, professors as statesmen seem destined merely to give proof to the Shavian bon mot that "he who cannot, teaches."

CHARLES RECHT

Books in Brief

The Judge. By Maxim Gorky. Authorized translation by Marie Zakrevsky and Barrett H. Clark. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.50.

Gorki's judge is an old released convict acting on the belief that years of suffering have given him the right to undo a fellow-convict who had escaped early in his term and had become a respected and prosperous citizen. The new Jean Valjean is driven to suicide by the fear of exposure and the shame of not having confessed before to the woman he loves. The scene in which a vain appeal is made to the old man's human sympathy is one of tension and terror. But on the whole the play does not pan out. It has the moral didacticism of Tolstoi's dramas yet lacks their reality. Gorki's thesis is that suffering establishes no right to be vindictive. This platitude, which is an element of Gorki's social philosophy, and has special significance for a Russian, is set forth in a piece which is not sufficiently plausible. Contrary to the publishers' statement that this play "has not heretofore appeared in any language," it should be noted that the original, from which the English text differs in some particulars, was published in 1922 in a Petersburg miscellany under the title "The Old Man."

Under the Red Flag. By Richard Eaton. Brentano's. $2.50.

Another of those "disclosures" of lurid "intimate details of the Soviet regime" which seem rather out of date in 1924, when Moscow is full of foreign journalists, observers, business men, and adventurers, and when the intercourse between Russia and the outside world is practically free and unhampered. Mr. Eaton went to Russia as correspondent of the London Daily Mail, which is notorious for its anti-Soviet propaganda. Mr. Eaton spent a few weeks in Russia, most of which were passed in prison. His prison experiences, even after they have been spiced with the story of his romantic attitude toward the "beautiful Simionova," "the terrible woman inquisitor" of the Cheka, have evidently not been sufficient to fill a book; so Mr. Eaton makes up with a "study" of life and conditions in Russia in all their various aspects. One can only marvel at the meager preparation which individuals with Mr. Eaton's snobbish outlook on the world need before they set out to give their "studies" to the public.

Figures in Modern Literature. By J. B. Priestley. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

This volume, reprinted for the most part from the London Mercury, is a fair example of the work of the younger British writers who have rallied around that publication since its foundation in 1919. Mr. Priestley's table of contents is not at all conventional. He treats Arnold Bennett, De la Mare, Hewlett, A. E. Housman, W. W. Jacobs, Robert Lynd, George Saintsbury, Santayana, and the Mercury's versatile editor, J. C. Squire. Mr. Priestley is a good appreciator. He finds the best things he can in his subjects, and then describes them to the best of his ability, which is sometimes very good indeed. His literary enthusiasm is often the only congruous and unifying element in his work.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

The God of Stumps

IN this age of intellectualized art there is an inevitable but unfortunate tendency to assume of Eugene O'Neill, as of every other arresting artist, that his greatness must lie somehow in the greatness or in the clarity of his thought; to seek in "All God's Chillun" some solution of the problem of race or in the "Hairy Ape" some attitude toward society; and then, not finding them, to fail in the fullest appreciation of the greatness which is his. It was not thought which drove him, as a young man, to seek adventure among the roughest men he could find, and it was not thought which he brought back from this and other experiments in life. Something tempestuous in his nature made him a brother of tempests, and he has sought wherever he could find them the fiercest passions, less anxious to clarify their causes for the benefit of those who love peace than eager to share them, and happy if he could only be exultantly a part of their destructive fury. It is a strange taste, this, to wish to be perpetually racked and tortured, to proceed from violence to violence, and to make of human torture not so much the occasion of other things as the raison d'être of drama; but such is his temperament. The meaning and unity of his work lies not in any controlling intellectual idea and certainly not in a "message," but merely in the fact that each play is an experience of extraordinary intensity.

Young-man-like, O'Neill first assumed that the fiercest passions were to be found where the outward circumstances of life were wildest and most uncontrolled. He sought among men of the sea, ignorant of convention and wholly without inhibitions, powerful appetites and bare tragedies, embodying his observations in the group of little plays now performed for the first time as a whole (and performed well) at the Provincetown Theater under the title of "S. S. Glencairn"; but maturity has taught him the paradox that where there is most smoke there is not necessarily most fire. He has learned that souls confined in a nut-shell may yet be lords of infinite space; that spirits cabined and confined by very virtue of the fact that they have no outlet explode finally with the greatest spiritual violence. As though to signalize the discovery of this truth he has, in his latest play, "Desire Under the Elms" (Greenwich Village Theater), limited the horizon of his characters, physically and spiritually, to the tiny New England farm upon which the action passes, and has made their intensity spring from the limitations of their experience. Whether he or Robert Edmond Jones conceived the idea of setting the stage with a single permanent scene showing one end of the farmhouse, and of removing sections of the wall when it becomes necessary to expose one or more of the rooms inside, I do not know; but this method of staging is admirably calculated to draw attention to the controlling circumstances of the play. It is a story of human relationships become intolerably tense because intolerably close and limited, of the possessive instinct grown inhumanly powerful because the opportunities for its gratification are so small, and of physical passion terribly destructive in the end because so long restrained by the sense of sin. To its young hero the stony farm is all the wealth of the world, the young wife of his father all the lust of the flesh. In that tiny corner each character finds enough to stimulate passions which fill, for him, the universe.

By half a century of unremitting labor Ephraim Cabot has turned a few barren hillsides into a farm, killing two wives in the process but growing himself only harder in body and mind and more fanatical in his possessive passion for the

OXFORD BOOKS

THE THREE DERVISHES
and Other Persian Tales and Legends
By Reuben Levy — Nett 80c

These tales owe their origin to wandering litterateurs who invented characters and incidents to provide amusement for some patron. This is not a reprint, but new translations by Mr. Levy.—The World's Classics No. 254.

SELECT POEMS OF LORD DE TABLEY
Edited by John Drinkwater — Net $1.20

A selection from Lord de Tabley's lyrical poems including what Mr. Drinkwater considers one of the most moving long poems of the century.

THE GROOMBRIDGE DIARY
By Dorothy V. White — Net $4.20

LETTERS TO THREE FRIENDS
By William Hale White — Net $3.50

This diary by Mrs. White; and the Letters to Three Friends by William Hale White; are rich in good things. The two books together give us more of Hale White, the lover of life and of beauty, than we have seen before; and the vision cannot but enrich the enjoyment of the Mark Rutherford books.—Times Literary Supplement.

JOHNSON'S JOURNEY to the Western Island of Scotland and Boswell's Journal of A Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson
Edited by R. W. Chapman — Cloth, Net $4.20
India Paper, Net $5.85

The Journey and Tour are here for the first time printed in one volume, with notes and indexes which make it easy to pass from one narrative to the other.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
American Branch
35 West 32nd St. — New York City

BORZOI BOOKS

The man who would be God

A new character, a new method, a new author

Sound and Fury

by JAMES HENLE

Goody Guthrie is American and 20th century to the core; despite this and the fact that he is new to American fiction, his genealogy goes back to Fielding's Tom Jones. He exhibits a robustness denied to the anaemic protagonist of so much current serious fiction; there is about him a swaggering courage, an innate generosity that would remind the reader of the two-gun hero of the Western thriller—were not Sound and Fury so well and so realistically written.

AND THE ANTAGONIST IS GOD—as He is represented by contemporary institutions, the Church, the State, Charity and Society. One by one Guthrie—this man who would be "his own master, his own judge, his own God"—is brought into conflict with them all. $2.50

ALFRED A. KNOPF
730 Fifth Avenue - New York

BORZOI BOOKS

"The Big Thing Has Been Done. There Is Nothing Like It" . . . . .
. . . London Observer

These Eventful Years

The Book of the Century

THESE EVENTFUL YEARS tells what has happened in the years of this century, where the world stands today, materially and spiritually, and attempts to forecast the future. It asks and answers the question: "Is white civilization a broken thing?" Eighty of the greatest contemporary minds have told what has happened in every field of endeavor; art, science, literature, world politics. H. G. Wells, Freud, Ludendorff, Mme. Curie, Sir Oliver Lodge, Philip Snowden, Henry Seidel Canby, Charles M. Schwab and Wellington Koo are among the contributors.

What the Critics Say

The Boston Transcript says: "For range of theme, vividness of presentation and directness of appeal to all sorts of readers this work can look back to no parallel in literature."

Burton Rascoe in the New York World says: "The story of the conquest of disease, the annihilation of time and space, the saving and prolongation of human life, the biological and chemical inquiries, and discoveries as to the riddle of existence is beautiful and inspiring, romantic and reassuring."

The London Morning Post says: "No work of this same size has ever appeared with such an imposing list of contributors."

Wilbur Cortez Abbot in The Bookman says: "There has not yet appeared a work which is so informing, so stimulating, and so entertaining as this survey of the century in which, for good and ill, we play our part in history."

"THESE EVENTFUL YEARS" will make the ideal Christmas Gift.

The book comes in two volumes of 700 pages each, profusely illustrated. If your bookstore hasn't them in stock (most of the better bookstores have), we will gladly send them to you C.O.D. for $11.50.

ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA, INC.
342 Madison Avenue
New York City, N.Y.

single object which has absorbed his life. Two of his sons, rebelling against the hopelessness of their life, leave him for the gold-fields; the third, who remains with him in dogged determination to inherit the farm, he hates; and so he marries once more in the hope of begetting in his old age a son to whom, as part of himself, he can leave his property without ceasing to own it. But he has reckoned without considering the possessive instinct of the wife herself, and so between the three, and in an atmosphere charged with hate, is fought out the three-cornered battle for what has come to be the symbol of earthly possessions. Love springs up between the wife and her foster son, but in such a battle the directest win, and love, confusing the aims of these two, dooms them to tragedy, while to the old man is left the barrenness of lonely triumph. Unlike the others, he has a god, the hard God who hates the easy gold of California or the easy crops of the West, the God who loves stumps and stones and looks with His stern favor upon such as wring a dour life without softness and without love from a soil barren like their souls. And this God comforts him: "I am hard," he says, when he learns that the baby. murdered by its mother, is not his but his son's: "I am a hard man and I am alone—but so is God."

It may with some show of reason be objected that O'Neill's plays are too crowded with incident, that the imagination of the spectator refuses sometimes to leap with the author so quickly from tense moment to tense moment, or to accept violence piled so unremittingly upon violence, and his latest play is not wholly closed to such objection; but impetuosity is an essential part of his nature and not likely ever to be subdued. To those who, like the present writer, can overlook it, it brings great compensation. "Desire Under the Elms" will be, with one exception, the most moving play seen during the current season. It is competently acted and Mary Morris and Walter Huston deserve special mention. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

Nation Readers are invited to attend a Dinner to

NORMAN ANGELL

On Tuesday, November 25, at 6.30 P. M.

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT

200 Fifth Ave., N. Y. City

Subject: The Real Meaning of the British Elections

auspices

League for Industrial Democracy

70 Fifth Ave., N. Y. City, Chelsea 3877

Tickets, $2.50. Reserve tickets at once.

Send $1.00 to the League for 12 copies of the following 10c pamphlets: "The Challenge of War" by Norman Thomas; "The Profit Motive in Industry" by Professor Harry F. Ward; "How America Lives" and "Roads to Freedom," a syllabus, by Harry W. Laidler.

HARRY ALLEN OVERSTREET, A.B., B.Sc.

Professor of Philosophy, College City of New York.

"Philosophy in Present Day Life"

COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM

Park Avenue and 34th Street

SIX LECTURES

Thursday Evenings, Dec. 11, 18, Jan. 8, 15, 22, 29, at 8:15

Course Ticket, $3.50, can be secured at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue. Single Admission, 75 cents.

OPEN FORUM

Sunday, November 23rd, at 8 P. M.

THE COOPERATIVE MOVEMENT

AARON SAPIRO

Additional Forum Meetings will be held on November 30th, December 7th and 14th. Send in your name for announcements to

SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, 2 West 64th St., N. Y. C.

The Public is invited

DEBATE on PROHIBITION!

CLARENCE DARROW versus REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

(Against) (For)

Chairman, Hon. Royal S. Copeland

Sunday, December 14, 3 P. M.

Manhattan Opera House, 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.

Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75. Box Seats $3.30.

On sale at the office of or direct by mail from

THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION

500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. (Longacre 10434-4447)

N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate should send us their names.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

CLARENCE DARROW SCOTT NEARING

"Is the Human Race Worth Working For?"

Sunday afternoon, November 30, 2:30 o'clock

Town Hall, 113 West 43rd Street

Tickets on sale at Rand School, 7 East 15th St., and box office, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00.

The Fifth Avenue Restaurant

EXCLUSIVELY A LUNCHEON AND EVENING BANQUET RESORT ON THE GROUND FLOOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING, 200 FIFTH AVENUE. TEL. GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907 INCL.

THEODORE KEMM, Proprietor

THE FIRST TIME IN HISTORY

By ANNE LOUISE STRONG

Introduction by LEON TROTSKY

IT is a pleasure to announce that what many believe to be the best book about New Russia yet written has just gone into its second edition. Miss Anne Louise Strong spent two years in Russia, travelling from end to end of that vast country, watching the greatest human experiment ever attempted. Her story is remarkable as a human document, fascinating as a narrative and a useful book for its practical exposition of the economic opportunities in Russia.

"To summarize such a fascinating story of Russia would lessen the excitement of reading it. A clarifying of much that is bewildering on the surface, and a renewed conviction of a purpose intelligently and stubbornly at work, directed toward the organization of a society different from any we have yet seen—that is the result of reading Miss Strong's book."—The Nation.

2nd EDITION

$2.00

BONI & LIVERIGHT GOOD BOOKS 61 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK, N.Y.

The Romance of New Russia

by MAGDELEINE MARX

The most colorful and illuminating picture of life in the Russia of today that has been published in America. A book whose human quality will delight even those whom the question of Russia leaves cold. $2.00

Margaret Ethel MacDonald

by J. RAMSAY MACDONALD

Carrie Chapman Catt—"Not only is it the rare tribute of a man to his wife, of a great man to a great woman, but perhaps it is the only written record of a man's heartfelt recognition and acceptance of the woman beside him as his co-equal in work and life." Mrs. Henry Goddard Leach—"I myself have seldom, if ever, enjoyed a biography more." $2.50

Survival of Extinction

by ELISHA M. FRIEDMAN

A keen, scientific and thorough study of the problems of the Jewish race, by one of the best known authorities on the subject. Julius Drachsler, Professor of Sociology, College of City of New York—"An unusually clear, vigorous and frank statement of the crucial problem that Jewry in the modern world has to face. It deserves to be read and pondered over." $2.50

THOMAS SELTZER, 5 W. 50th ST., N. Y.

The Russian Review

Published semi-monthly by the

RUSSIAN INFORMATION BUREAU

1726 21st Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Prints the most recent material on Industry, Trade, Finances, Agriculture, Legislation and Foreign Relations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Copy, 15c. Subscription rates: for 3 months, $1.00; for six months, $2.00.

First bound volume of the Russian Review, 404 pages, including issues of Sept. 15, 1923, to June 15, 1924, as well as a comprehensive index, bound in imitation leather.

Price, $4.00.

The second volume of the Russian Review will appear after December 15, 1924.

A Half Hour Well-Spent

A well informed state of mind on the world's affairs is no more than a matter of half an hour's reading.

The source of information must, however, be reliable; news presented must be facts not fiction; editorial opinion must be reasoned judgment not insinuating propaganda.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

presents in compact form all the important news of the world without suppression or distortion of facts.

During more than a hundred years The Manchester Guardian has earned a unique reputation among the world's journals for its frank and unbiased editorial opinion, no less than for the accuracy of its news.

Today, in more than sixty countries, readers find that given a half hour of time each week The Manchester Guardian Weekly keeps their knowledge of the world's affairs in repair and enables them to maintain an intelligent outlook on all vital matters.

.....MAIL COUPON BELOW.....

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England, commencing with the current issue.

Name .....

Address .....

International Relations Section

Russia's Industrial Progress

By LEON TALMY

THE Soviet fiscal year recently ended (September 30) was marked with a series of ups and downs. The economic organization of the country underwent severe trials during which the soundness and vitality of the industrial policy inaugurated by the Soviet Government was put to a serious test. At the beginning of the year the country went through a crisis which resulted in overproduction owing to the low demand for manufactured products. The main cause of this crisis lay in the problem of the "shears," as it was graphically described by Trotzky. The prices for manufactured articles were disproportionately high as compared with the prices for agricultural products. Consequently the peasant population refrained from buying. The task before the Soviet economic organization was to achieve a decrease in the prices for industrial products and a corresponding raise in the returns for the products of agriculture, so as to "close the shears" and stabilize the normal course of the internal exchange of commodities. This could be brought about by diminishing considerably the overhead expenses of production and, at the same time, expanding the market for agricultural products.

To what extent this task has been achieved is shown by the conditions which were reported at the end of the year. In his report made before the plenary session of the Central Committee of the Russian Communist Party on October 25, L. B. Kamenev pointed out that, according to the data of the Supreme Council of Public Economy and the State Planning Commission, the production of all industries increased in value over the preceding year by 350,000,000 gold rubles. But, while with the lower output of the previous year the industries had been suffering from overproduction, the increased output in the present year has proved insufficient to satisfy the actual demand for manufactured products. Especially has this been manifest in the case of the textile industry, where by the increased production during this year the output has been brought up to 63 per cent of the pre-war standard.

The output of the industries for which data are available at the Central Statistical Department of the Supreme Council of Public Economy, embracing about 80 per cent of the total production, has amounted to 1,484,000,000 rubles in pre-war prices. This is an increase of about 80 per cent over the output during the preceding fiscal year 1922-1923. The industries, however, have been hampered in their growth to a great extent by the lack of working capital. One of the greatest needs of the industries in Soviet Russia is the rehabilitation of equipment which was badly worn down during the years of civil war. According to calculations made in the Ekonomicheskaya Zhisn of October 1, the total need of the industries during the next few years in capital for reequipment and for the organization of new branches of production is figured at 1,000,000,000 gold rubles.

Progress was made in the coal-mining industry and in the oil industry. In the Donetz basin the amount of coal mined reached 540,000,000 poods, which is about 100,000,000 poods more than the original mining program for the year. The oil industry yielded about 360,000,000 poods, which is 48,000,000 more than in the preceding year. The output of the oil industry has been brought to within 75 per cent of the pre-war level. Yet the significance of this progress is reduced to a certain extent by the slower growth of the heavy industries which are the chief consumers of fuel.

The problem of expanding the market for the agricultural production of the Soviet Union was dealt with in conjunction with the problem of reestablishing the foreign trade of the country. In the fiscal year 1922-1923 the exports totaled 133,200,000 rubles, and the imports 147,000,000 rubles in pre-war prices. A significant detail of the imports is the change in their nature. In the year 1922-1923 food products made up 48 per cent of the imports; in 1923-1924 only 10 per cent. The bulk of the imports during the last year consisted of machinery and raw materials.

The favorable balance which was shown in the foreign trade turnover contributed materially to the success of the monetary reform which was effected during this year and is considered as the greatest economic achievement on the road toward the complete rehabilitation of the economic organism of the country. As a result of this reform the Soviet Union received a stable currency based on the chervonetz. By successive degrees the old depreciated paper money was taken out of circulation and the issue of the new currency was made only against strong security. The financial resources of the country have been steadily growing, as shown by the increase of money in circulation. In December, 1923, the total amount of currency in circulation was 303,000,000 rubles. By the end of September this amount increased to about 650,000,000 rubles.

Owing to growing financial stability the Soviet Government was enabled to limit the issue of currency for budget purposes. The new budget, as announced for the year 1924-1925, is balanced without the issue of currency. The budget, which totals 2,091,648,000 rubles, which is 10 per cent higher than last year, is balanced with a deficit of 80,000,000 rubles, which will be covered by the issue of silver and copper currency. Thus the budget is balanced, in fact, without a deficit for the first time since the war.

A serious setback in the economic reconstruction was the partial crop failure. Besides diminishing the material resources of the Union it required the increase of budget expenditures by 48,000,000 rubles to be used for relief in the stricken districts. The flood in Leningrad will also require the expenditure of an extra 12,000,000 rubles. However, the ultimate effects of the crop failure turned out to be much less disastrous than had been anticipated. According to the report of the Commissariat of Agriculture at the recent session of the Central Executive Committee, the total crop yield will amount to over 2,600,000,000 poods, which is 9 per cent less than the preceding year. This yield, together with the reserves on hand, will not only be sufficient to satisfy the home needs but it will leave a surplus of about 100,000,000 poods for export purposes.

These are, in general outline, the economic facts with which the Soviet Union is entering the eighth year of its existence. In Kamenev's report, referred to above, the situation is summed up as follows:

> We are moving forward. The rehabilitation of the industries, and consequently the strengthening of the socialist elements of our economy, has progressed. In the field

AMTORG TRADING CORPORATION

136 LIBERTY STREET, NEW YORK

Sole representatives in the U. S.

of

Gostorg (State Export and Import Bureau) of the RSFSR, Moscow

Gostorg of the Northwestern Region, Leningrad

Ukrainian Gostorg, Kharkov

Transcaucasian Gostorg, Tiflis

White-Russian Gostorg, Minsk

All the leading industrial and commercial organizations and combinations in the Union of SSR.

and

Arcos Ltd., London

Exporting to the Union SSR:

Agricultural machinery and implements

Electrical machinery

Technical equipment for industries and transport

Drugs and chemicals

Office materials

Objects of general use, etc.

Importing from the Union SSR:

Furs and hides

Bristle, horsehair, wool, casings, and other animal products

Hemp and flax

Medical roots and other raw materials.

MOSCOW OFFICE: KUZNETZKY MOST 14

DERUTRA

Deutsch-Russische
Lager-und Transportgesellschaft.
Hamburg 36 / Stadthausbrucke 17.

Clearance—Forwarding—Chartering—Insurance —Lombard Loans—Aerial Transport— Travel Bureaus—Warehousing.

Transports to All Countries
Special Services from and to Russia

BRANCHES

Berlin Sw 68; Lindenstrabe 22-25.
Stettin; Gr. Wollweberstrabe 23.
Bremen; Langenstrabe 135.
Konigsberg; Altstadtische Holzwiesenstr, 5.
New York City; 35 Water Street.
Kopenhagen; Ny Toldbodgade 5.
Leningrad; Gerzena 55-57.
Moskau; Petrowska 4.
Odessa; Deribassowskaja 12.
Nicolajew; Nikolskaja 24.
Novorossisk; Potschtowaja 3.
Batum; Nabereschnaja 4; Fedosis, Nowaja 6.
Mariupol; Maria Magdalena 8.
Charkoff; Ui. Karl Liebknecht, 17/19.

TRAVEL BUREAUS

Moskau; Petrowka 4.
Leningrad; Prosp. d. 25 Oktobers 60.
Odessa; Deribassowskaja 12.

ALLIED AMERICAN CORPORATION—

(ALAMERICO)

By Agreement with the Peoples Commissariat for Foreign Trade

Exporters—U.S.S.R.—Importers
(Russia)

REPRESENTING IN U.S.S.R.

Ford Motor Company
U. S. Rubber Company and the Leading American Manufacturers of Agricultural Implements, Machinery, Tools, etc.

IMPORTERS from U.S.S.R.
Furs, Caviar, Casings, etc.

HEAD OFFICE
165 Broadway
New York
U. S. A.

PRINCIPAL RUSSIAN OFFICE
Kuznetzki Most 4
Moscow

Direct Branches and Representatives throughout Europe and the U.S.S.R.

of agriculture the crop failure retarded but did not check the growth of the prosperity of the peasant population and the expanding of the market for industries. The issue of money has been stopped. The monetary reform is on a firm foundation. We may well look hopefully forward.

Lenin the Man

By MAXIM GORKI

(The following passages are from a series of reminiscences of Lenin published in the Neue Rundschau (Berlin) for August, 1924.)

TO me Lenin is not only the wonderfully complete incarnation of a will set upon a goal which no man before had dared to set himself; he is one of those great figures, one of those tremendous, half-legendary men who crop up from time to time in Russian history, always unexpectedly, like Peter the Great, Michael Lomonosoff, Leo Tolstoi, and others. I believe that such men are possible only in Russia—the country whose history and manner of living always remind me of Sodom and Gomorrah.

To me Lenin is the hero of a legend, a man who had torn the burning heart out of his breast in order to light up for mankind the path which shall lead it out of the shameful chaos of the present, out of the rotting bog of stupid current politics. . . .

His hero-character has almost no outward adornment. His heroism is of a type not rare in Russia—the modest, ascetic martyrdom of an honorable, intellectual revolutionary who honestly believes in the possibility of justice on earth; the heroism of a man who has renounced all the pleasures of life to do hard work for the happiness of mankind.

One evening in Moscow when J. Dobrowein was playing Beethoven sonatas in Mme E. Peschkoff's home, Lenin said: "I know nothing more beautiful than the Appassionata; I could hear it every day. It is wonderful, superhuman music. I always think, perhaps with a naive childish pleasure: what marvels men create!"

And, blinking, with a joyless smile, he added: "But—often I cannot listen to music; it affects my nerves; I want to talk nonsense and pat men on the head because, living in a dirty hell, they create such beauty. Today one does not dare pat men on the head—they would bite one's hand—one must hit them on the head, strike them without mercy, although ideally we are opposed to all use of force. Hm, hm—a devilishly hard job."

The task of an honorable leader of his people is superhumanly difficult. One cannot conceive a leader who is not to some degree a tyrant. Probably more men were killed under Lenin than under Wat Tyler, Thomas Münzer, or Garibaldi. But the opposition to the revolution at whose head Lenin stood was also broader and mightier. One must recall too that with the onward march of "civilization" men's lives have become cheaper; the perfection of the technique of destroying men and the taste for that process in modern Europe prove it beyond a doubt. . . . Ask your conscience: Is the chatter of those "moralists" who talk of the bloodthirstiness of the Russian revolutionaries, after they themselves through four long years of the World War had not only had no sympathy for millions of men who were driven to the shambles, but had actually preached war "to the bitter end"—say, is their chatter fitting here? Is it not rather out of place? All the civilized nations are beaten, exhausted; they are slipping toward savagery, and only human stupidity has conquered—its harsh bonds are choking us still. . . .

In the hungry year of 1919 Lenin was ashamed to use the food which comrades, soldiers, and peasants sent him from the provinces. When these love-gifts were brought to his uncomfortable home he frowned, was distressed, and hastened to distribute the flour, sugar, and butter to sick and undernourished comrades. Once he invited me to dinner, and remarked: "I will give you smoked fish—they sent it to me from Astrakhan." He rumpled his Socratic brow, looked aside with his all-seeing eyes, and said: "They send it to me, as to a great man. How can one stop them? If one refuses the gift it offends them. And all about people are hungry. It is stupid. . . ."

He himself was very modest in his demands, took neither wine nor tobacco, and was burdened with heavy work from morning till evening; he did not know how to look out for himself, although he carefully watched the life of his comrades. His interest for them was a tender care, such as is usual only in women. Every free moment he gave to others, without seeking rest for himself.

One evening he was sitting at his desk, writing hurriedly, and, without lifting his pen from the paper, he said: "Good day, how are you? I'll be ready in a moment. . . . There's a comrade in the province who is getting discouraged. He's tired. We've got to cheer him up. Morale is important."

On the desk lay a copy of Tolstoi's "War and Peace." "Yes, Tolstoi! I wanted to reread the hunting scene, but then I remembered that I had to write the comrade. I never get around to reading. I never read your book on Tolstoi until last night. . . ."

Smiling, wrinkling his eyes, he stretched out in his armchair and added in a softer voice: "What a colossus, wasn't he? What an old giant! Yes, friend, there's an artist for you! And do you know what is wonderful about him? His peasant voice, his peasant mind—there was a real peasant in him. Until that count began writing there was no real peasant in literature—not a one." Then he looked at me with his little Asiatic eyes and asked: "Who is there in Europe to compare with him?" and himself answered "None!" And, like a cat in the sun, he rubbed his hands and laughed contentedly.

I often noticed in him that pride in Russia, in the Russians, in Russian art. Often this trait seemed strange and even naive, but later I recognized in it the echo of a deep, joyful love of his people. . . .

I know no other man who, like Lenin, the superior of other men, could so resist the temptations of pride and had so warm an interest in "little people."

In Russia, a country where the necessity of suffering is preached as a universal prescription for the salvation of the soul, I know no one who so profoundly hated and despised the unhappiness, the misery, and suffering of mankind. This feeling, this hate of the dramas and tragedies of life raises Vladimir Lenin particularly high in my eyes—this man of iron in a land where the most ingenious gospels have been written to exalt and honor suffering, where the youth begin to live their lives according to books which do nothing but describe the monotonous details of daily life. Russian literature is the most pessimistic literature of Europe; all our books are written upon the same subject—how we suffer in youth and in maturity from stupidity, from the oppression of absolutism, from women, from our family love, from the inadequate arrangement of the world; in old age from recognition of our mistakes, from loss of teeth and bad digestion; finally, from the necessity of death. . . .

Perhaps Lenin conceived the drama of existence too simply and thought it easy to combat, as easy as it would be to do away with the dirt and disorder of Russian life. Well, be it so! I rate high in him just that feeling of irreconcilable and unquenchable hostility to human misery, his firm belief that misery is not the necessary basis of existence but rather something detestable which man must and can repel. I would call this characteristic his optimistic joy in battle, and it was no true Russian character. . . .

I marveled at his superhuman capacity for work. His fiery zeal was native to him; it was not the selfish pride of a gambler, but an extraordinary freshness of spirit, which only a man could have who believed absolutely in his task, who felt himself profoundly and closely a part of the world, and who knew his role in the chaos of the world from the ground up—the role of an enemy of that chaos.

He could with equal enthusiasm play chess, study a history of costumes, argue with a comrade for hours, fish, walk across the rocks of Capri glowing in the sun, rejoice in the golden flowers and in the brown fisher-boys. In the evening, when he listened to stories of village life in Russia, he would sigh enviously: "I know Russia very little. Simbirsk, Kazan, St. Petersburg, and places where I was sent—that is almost all."

He loved a joke, and laughed with his whole body, as if he dived into a laugh, often laughing until he cried. He could give the most various colors to his short, characteristic "Hm, hm"—from biting irony to cautious doubt, and often there rang in it such a humor as is possible only in a keen man who knows the devilish absurdity of life.

Of a solid, thick-set body, with the skull of a Socrates and the all-seeing eyes of a very wise man, he often took on a strange and rather ludicrous posture: bending his head back and toward his shoulder, he would tuck his fingers in the sleeve-holes of his vest. There was something rather lovable and comic in that pose, something that reminded one of a victorious rooster, and at such moments he beamed joy. . . .

His movements were light and easy, and his rare but strong gestures fitted perfectly with his manner of speaking, sparing of words, but rich in thought. In his Mongolian face there burned and played the sharp eyes of a hunter who tirelessly chases the lies and misery of life; they burned now flickeringly, now ironically laughing, now angrily blazing. The gleam of those eyes made his speaking amazingly clear. Often it seemed as if the tireless energy of his spirit hurled sparks from those eyes, as if his words, filled with that energy, burned in the air. His speaking had a positively physical sense of irrefutable truth, and even when I could not accept it I always felt its force. . . .

Men thirst, if they thirst at all, not for a fundamental change in their social habits, but only for more of the same. The cry of man is: "Do not prevent our living as we have always lived." Vladimir Lenin was a man who as no one before him understood how to keep men from living their usual life.

Whether Lenin called forth more love or more hate I do not know. The hate men bear him stands naked and evident; its tracks are plain as the blue marks of the plague. Yet I fear that the love which many bear him is nothing more than the dim faith of miserable and desperate men in the miracle-maker; that it is a love which expects wonders, but would itself do nothing to realize its own strength in an existence which is almost numbed by miseries caused by the avarice of some and the vast stupidity of others. . . .

And if the clouds of hate, the clouds of lies and calumny, which surround his name were heavier still it would not matter; no power on earth can dim the light of the torch which Lenin raised in the dark gloom of this world astray. There has been no man who so much as he has really earned an "eternal memory."

Vladimir Lenin is dead. The heirs of his mind and of his will still live. In the end, despite everything, whatever a man creates that is true and honorable lives; that conquers without which there would be no men.

The Agricultural Offensive

AMONG the most important of the activities of the Soviet Government is that of the agrarian rehabilitation of Russia. It has been forced to face a situation on the agricultural front which is the result not only of the ravages of international and civil war but of the inheritance of an inefficient and primitive peasantry which had been kept in ignorance throughout the regime of the czars.

Only 20 Months Old

Watch Our Growth

Expect to be in our new building soon

Over 8 million dollars transmitted to Russia by our clients

Over 4 million dollars in deposits

New York's First Labor Bank

THE AMALGAMATED BANK

103 East 14th St. COR. 4th AVE. AT UNION SQ.

Money Remittances

to all parts of

RUSSIA

Promptly delivered by the BANK FOR FOREIGN TRADE OF THE UNION OF S. S. R.

Russian Commercial Bank

Capital 20,000,000 Gold Rubles

MOSCOW PETROVKA 3

Also Transacts All Banking Operations

Our Correspondents in America

New York.—American Express Company, Baltic-America Line, Equitable Trust Company of New York, The State Bank, Messrs. Straus & Co., Bankers, Guaranty Trust Company of New York, C. B. Richard & Co., The Chase National Bank of City of New York.

Boston.—Bank of Commerce & Trust Co., The National Shawmut Bank of Boston.

Chicago.—West Side National Bank of Chicago, Depositors State Bank, Division State Bank, International Cable Remittance Co., Schiff Trust & Savings Bank, The Northern Trust Company.

Detroit, Mich.—The Peoples State Bank.

Newark, N. J.—American National Bank, West Side Trust Company.

Cleveland, Ohio.—Central National Bank Savings & Trust Co., Union Trust Company.

Highland Park, Mich.—The American State Bank of Highland Park.

Philadelphia, Pa.—M. L. Blitzstein & Co., Southwark National Bank, Peoples Bank & Trust Company.

Portland.—Hibernia Commercial & Savings Bank.

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Pittsburgh State Bank.

San Francisco, Cal.—Bank of Italy, Italian American Bank.

Baltimore.—The National Bank of Baltimore.

Prominent in the educational campaign to combat the lack of scientific knowledge of farming is the Society for Technical Aid of the United States and Canada. This society says of its work:

The aim is to organize agricultural and industrial units equipped with modern machinery and sufficient funds and to send these groups to Russia to establish modern farming communities. Twenty-five such groups have been sent to Russia by the society, with a capital in cash and machinery and accessory implements amounting to $3,000,000. Most of these groups have settled in southeastern Russia. They met conditions there which called for the roughest kind of pioneer work, but so well did they cope with the hardships that their work has produced encouraging results.

Recent reports from Russia state that in one Don basin commune, where the drought had ruined other crops, the number of poods per dessiatin for the commune and for the average peasant farm compare as follows (a pood equals 36 pounds, a dessiatin 2½ acres):

	Commune	Peasant Farm
Rye	53 poods	4.1 poods
Winter wheat	92.5 poods	4.7 poods
Spring wheat	40.6 poods	4.6 poods
Barley	15 poods	7.7 poods

Other Don communes have produced results averaging more than twice those of the peasants. Similar conditions prevail in the Tambov region and in other localities where the American communes are operating.

The communes of American-trained Russian farmers are functioning as model agricultural units. They furnish information to their more primitive neighbors. They demonstrate the use of modern agricultural machinery, implements, and accessories which they have brought with them.

Aside from the essential agricultural aspect, the American communes are engaged also in various auxiliary activities. Each commune has established its blacksmith, carpentry, and repair shops, in addition to the shops established according to the needs of the particular localities, such as textile, shoe, and tailoring establishments. A lively economic interchange is thereby established between the communes and the peasants, who for the first time are brought in contact with modern artisanship which they are eager to assimilate and adopt. In addition, some of the communes have built electrical power stations in rural districts where electricity was little known, and have supplied electricity to the neighboring villages.

From the tendencies prevailing it appears that organized reemigration to Russia will soon assume large proportions, and the central bureau has been improving its facilities for increased activities in the future.

Contributors to This Issue

MARY ROSS is an associate editor of the Survey who has devoted special attention to the subject of public health.

LOUIS FISCHER is a correspondent of The Nation in Russia.

RUTH EPPERSON KENNELL is on her way back to America after residence in the Kuzbas colony since its beginning.

MAX EASTMAN, formerly editor of the Masses and of the Liberator, is now living in Europe

JESSICA SMITH has just returned to this country after nearly three years in Russia, where she was engaged in famine relief and other work.

LEON TALMY is a frequent contributor to The Nation on Russian affairs.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY is joint editor and translator of "Modern Russian Poetry: an Anthology."

CHARLES RECHT is a lawyer in New York and the author of "Rue with a Difference."

IN honor of the Seventh Anniversary of the formation of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, this space is respectfully dedicated by

All-Russian Central Union of Cooperative Societies

Represented in the United States by

CENTROSOYUS - AMERICA, Incorporated

136 Liberty Street - New York

BRENTANO'S, INC.

FIFTH AVENUE AND 27TH STREET

Chicago New York Washington, D. C.

Books in the Russian Language

Art Books, Fiction and Historical Works

American Publishers of

Jar Ptitza

The finest Russian Art Magazine of the day

$1.25 a number

Autonomous Industrial Colony

KUZBAS

(An organization operating mines, chemical and coke plants, and a machine farm at Kemerovo, Siberia, with American and Russian skill and labor.)

The following cable was received by the New York office on November 14, from Moscow:

"RESULT INVESTIGATION OUR ACTIVITIES S. T. O. (Council of Labor and Defense) DECIDED TURN OVER TO KUZBAS ALL SOUTH REGION KUZNETZ BASIN INCLUDING KOLCHUGINA AND PROKOPEVSKY MINES AND GURIEV METALLURGICAL PLANT."

Kuznetsky Basin Is the Pennsylvania of Siberia

Russian Offices—Volkhonka 9, Moscow.
Yadrinitskaya 28, Novo Nikolaevsk.

New York —Kuzbas, Room 402, 799 Broadway.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1924 No. 3100

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 587
EDITORIALS:
Child Labor Must End! 590
Plunkitt's Way 591
The Indispensable Century 591
Senator Borah's Opportunity 592
THE POLITICIANS BETRAY THE FARMER. By Gertrude Mathews Shelby 593
CALLES—THE TEACHER AND STATESMAN. By Howard A. Lamb 595
TO A SONG OF SAPPHO, DISCOVERED IN EGYPT. By Leonora Speyer 596
BERRIES IS BERRIES. By Frances Bradley 597
IN BAD ALL AROUND. By William Hard 598
CASSANDRA. By Louise Bogan 599
POET'S LOVE LETTER. By Maxwell Bodenheim 599
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 599
CORRESPONDENCE 600
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 602
Religious Insight and Religious Nonsense. By Benjamin Stolberg ... 602
Galsworthy's World. By A. Donald Douglas 603
Engineering or Architecture? By Talbot Faulkner Hamlin 605
Regular Journalism. By Arthur Ruhl 605
Books in Brief 605
The Nation's Poetry Prize 606
Drama: The Utopia of Gallants. By Joseph Wood Krutch 606
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Shall We Commit Suicide? By Winston S. Churchill 608

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

MANAGING EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS

JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE BRITISH ULTIMATUM to Egypt would be a disgrace to any civilized nation. It is an act of force—of sheer, brute, bullying power. In tone and content it is like the Austrian ultimatum which precipitated the European War. This time there will be no general war, but that is not England's virtue, and the horror with which the world greeted the authors of the 1914 document should be turned upon Mr. Baldwin's Government in 1924. Compare the two documents:

AUSTRIA SAID TO SERBIA JULY 23, 1914:	ENGLAND SAID TO EGYPT NOVEMBER 24, 1924:
1. Suppress anti-Austrian publications.	1. Apologize.
2. Dissolve anti-Austrian secret societies.	2. Discover and punish the criminals.
3. Eliminate anti-Austrian propaganda from the public schools.	3. "Henceforth forbid and vigorously suppress all popular political demonstrations."
4. Remove army officers and civil officials guilty of anti-Austrian propaganda.	4. Pay England £500,000.
5. Accept Austrian collaboration in suppressing movement to break up Austria.	5 Within twenty-four hours order all Egyptian officers and army units out of the Sudan (hitherto ruled jointly by England and Egypt, in Egypt's name).
6. Punish those guilty of assassinating the archduke, letting Austrian officials participate in the investigation.	6. Allow increase of the Gezira irrigated area (hitherto limited to preserve Egypt's water supply) "to an unlimited figure."
7. Arrest two compromised individuals.	7. Withdraw all opposition to England's wishes "regarding protection of foreign interests in Egypt." a) Let England revise the regulations and pay for alien officials in Egypt. b) Retain the foreign advisers and accept British recommendations.
8. Stop the traffic in arms across the border.	8. Accept these demands within twenty-four hours.
9. Explain anti-Austrian statements made by Serbian officials since the crime.
10. Accept these demands within forty-eight hours.

IN FACT, THE BRITISH are more drastic than the Austrians. The British paragraph 7 is broad enough to include all the first six of Austria's 1914 demands. Austria sought to punish the assassins and to stop Serbian propaganda aimed at the break-up of the Dual Monarchy, and her demands were regarded as outrageous and extreme. England goes further. She seeks not only to stop anti-British activities; she wants money, and demands that Egypt suppress "all popular political demonstrations"—an unprecedented and impossible demand, and smashes the Sudan treaties which her own statesmen have executed, to which England's word is pledged. Egypt has paid five-sixths of the cost of administering the Sudan for the last quarter-century, and now England, acting in the interest of her cotton magnates, would boot Egypt out. The extension of the Gezira irrigation project is tucked in to facilitate the development of British cotton plantations in the Sudan. Here the hand of greed joins that of imperial brutality.

EGYPT ACCEPTED the demands for punishment, an apology, and an indemnity, but naturally refused to accept, as a Government, direct responsibility for the crime of an individual; she also declined to accept off-hand the demands to increase the irrigable area and to withdraw officers from the Sudan, declaring that this would violate her constitution. General Allenby, British High Commissioner, forthwith replied that the British Government would execute these by itself. The Egyptian Premier Zaghlul paid the indemnity but maintained his refusals, and resigned. British land, air, and naval units have been ordered to Egypt, and there, as we go to press, the matter rests. The next step is for the League of Nations. Article XI of its Covenant begins:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the League or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole League, and the League shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. . . . It is also declared the friendly right of each member of the League to bring to the attention of the Assembly or of the Council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

If the League is worth its salt, some of its members—possibly Turkey or even the Irish Free State, which knew General Sir Lee Stack before he went to Egypt—will exercise that "friendly right."

SO SENATOR LA FOLLETTE may be deprived of his committee positions in the Senate as punishment for his heading a third ticket. Well, we hope he will be. Nothing else the Republicans could do would so increase Mr. La Follette's popularity or keep up the fighting spirit of his followers. It would greatly help to make the new permanent organization effective, just when such help will be most welcome. On the other hand, we are still of the opinion that Senator La Follette should voluntarily burn his bridges and cut all communications with the Republicans, even to the extent of seeking reelection in Wisconsin as a Progressive. It is time for the lines to be clearly drawn. Men and women must be either Progressives or something else. The reform cause will suffer if it is merely the temporary refuge of people who are ready to slip back into the old parties if one fray is unsuccessful. Only those who are willing to join in a long fight and to endure days of small things if necessary can help.

> Thanks to La Follette we've had a census of unrest in this country, and the group is composed of ne'er-do-wells, foreign populations we can never assimilate, and a large bunch of Americans educated at public expense to whom education is an acquisition but not a useful thing.

THIS IS the delightfully tactful statement made the other day by Richard F. Grant, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, in Cleveland, the American city which Senator La Follette had just carried by a comfortable majority. But Mr. Grant did not stop there. He went on to say this:

> We've had a lot of long-haired demagogues raging up and down the land with imaginary short-cuts to bliss. We even find these radicals creeping into our colleges. I know some of them in Yale and, as far as I'm concerned, I'm going to start taking the bird-seed out of them.

Yale and Cornell—for he included Cornell in his indictment—will please take notice. Any student or professor who refuses to think as Mr. Grant does must be trembling in his shoes and, in Mr. Grant's elegant phrase, preparing to yield up his "bird-seed" as well as his opinions. That is exactly the position we should expect the head of the United States Chamber of Commerce to take a day or two after business had won its greatest victory in our history. How could anyone believe that a man of this type would be intelligent enough to know that nothing would spread radicalism in the colleges as much as an attempt at its suppression by Mr. Grant's organization?

JUST NOW, WE ARE TOLD, the American business man rejoices that business is to be freed from governmental interference. He once more demands that business and politics be divorced, and he loudly cries amen when the newspapers report that Honest Cal will not have Congress meet in extra session. That sounds very well. But who is it that is the first to run to Congress for aid if things do not go well with him? Why, the business man. If he is a manufacturer whose business, whether badly or well managed, is not doing well, then to Congress he hies for a higher tariff. If he is a shipowner in danger from foreign competition, the first thing he thinks of is to run to Congress for a subsidy to help him operate his ships while reviling anyone who suggests that rather than have the government a minority partner it had better run the whole show. If he owns oil-wells in Mexico, why, the government must stay in business with him to protect his interests, whether Congress sits or not. And if it is a question of deepening waterways, or releasing water-power to private interests, or giving permission to cross rivers, or appropriating money to dredge rivers and harbors, then to Congress the nearest Chamber of Commerce flies. The simple truth is that nobody wants the government in business as much as the well-to-do business man—but he wants to be the final, yes, the only, arbiter as to how far politics shall go into business and just exactly what it shall do when it gets there.

EXCEPT WHEN A SMUTS falls or an unusually large diamond is found South Africa seldom calls attention to itself. Now the report of the 1921 census is beginning to worry South Africans. During the twenty years after 1871 the European population doubled itself. It doubled itself again in the next twenty years; but in the last ten years it has increased only 19 per cent, "a retardation of progression too significant to be ignored." The European increase has relied largely upon immigration, but the number of Europeans emigrating to South Africa has dropped off. The report says that, > assuming on the one hand on the terms most favorable for the European population not only a natural increase, but a progressive increase by immigration in addition to natural increase, . . . and assuming for the non-European population the most unfavorable conditions such as a serious retardation of natural increase similar to the recent influenza epidemic, in fifty years a population of 6,500,000 Europeans will live side by side with a population of 16,500,000 non-Europeans.

The rapidly increasing number of natives will find their lives and national aspirations more and more hindered by the presence of a European dominant race. If the European is not willing to abandon South Africa or accept a secondary position, the report asks, how can the circumstances be controlled and the tendencies of the past fifty years be directed into different channels?

THE GHASTLINESS of a system by which in supposedly civilized countries men still take the lives of their fellow-creatures in the name of justice is again illustrated in an account of the execution of four bandits in Montreal. We quote from the Glens Falls Times:

> Dawn had not broken. There were just enough lights about the scaffold to permit the executioners to see.
>
> The executioners were nervous. In binding Gambino one bumped into another. It broke the tensity of his nerves and made him cry out in a voice audible outside in the courtyard:
>
> "Go easy! Go easy!" . . .
>
> A tall, powerful policeman suddenly gasped:
>
> "I can't stand it. My heart!"
>
> He averted his gaze, leaned against a wall, and sobbed.
>
> He turned just as the bodies plunged, sobbed anew, and then prayed.
>
> As the bodies of Serafini and Frank dangled at the end of the rope a church bell tolled five. A moment later the chimes sounded. The work was done. The party that had been compelled to kill four of their fellow-men nearly fled from the chamber into the misty courtyard.

If the community at large, in its indifference, still allows this survival of savagery to continue it ought at least to consider the feelings of the officials who have to carry out its ghoulish work. In commenting lately on an attempt at suicide by an English hangman—depressed at the thought of his life's work—we suggested that the job be filled, like jury duty, by lot. But better, of course, is for enlightened people to demand the end of judicial murder.

LONDON DOES NOT readily abandon an enterprise to which she has set her hand, but she has just had to confess herself beaten. She has given up the attempt, on which a committee of her County Council has been occupied off and on for ten years, to find a suitable motto for herself. In vain have the geniuses who win prizes for proposing the best name for a new breakfast food or a new paper striven to help her out of the difficulty. Many hundreds of mottoes have been sent in—some hortatory, some declamatory, some religious, and some humorous—but not one of them satisfies the committee. Perhaps, as the London Times suggests, the trouble is that the English metropolis has acquired so many divergent meanings in the minds of British subjects that any attempt to summarize them would exclude more than it embraced. Puddlecombe-by-the-sea means, one imagines, very much the same thing to all its inhabitants, but the London of Lord Curzon can scarcely be the same place as the London of George Lansbury, nor does Pett Ridge love it for the reasons that inspire the affection of Dean Inge.

IS AEOLUS to be enshrined again as a major god? Are the winds of heaven, after years of neglect, to become once more an important source of motive power? Certainly no invention of recent times is more captivating to the imagination than the windship of the German, Anton Flettner—if it measures up to the claims made for it. Wind was once one of the world's great reservoirs of power. Windmills did universal service and sailing ships carried the world's commerce. The windship—if it should succeed—would bring back those days, with modifications. The windship is propelled not by sails but by two masts upon which turrets revolve. They are said to produce about fifteen times as much power as would be obtainable from sails and to permit the ship to go in any direction; they produce a speed equal to that of a steam-driven cargo vessel. Such a ship would, of course, save not only in fuel but in a reduction in the size of the crew, the saving amounting to from 50 to 80 per cent over the steamship. A wonderful vista, if true—and maybe it is! Nor would the invention be limited to ships. The windmill—now used chiefly on prairie farms or to attract American visitors to Holland—would also come back to glory.

BUT EVEN IF THE WINDSHIP be only a dream, another development is actually taking place which, if less spectacular, is almost as revolutionary. The windship is a possibility of the future, but the motorship is a reality which is already transforming ocean commerce. The substitution of the Diesel internal-combustion engine, by which the power of oil fuel is applied directly to a ship's propeller shaft—similar to the propulsion of an automobile—is reducing the cost of ocean transportation by 10 to 30 per cent, writes E. S. Gregg, chief of the transportation division of the Department of Commerce, in the Nautical Gazette. Speaking of the exporter, Mr. Gregg says:

> He has been conscious only of the severity of competition abroad and the high expenses at home. He has even been inclined to say that high ocean and freight rates are keeping him out of desirable markets when, as a matter of fact, the decline in ocean rates has been greater than the decline in prices. . . . The most recent development in motorship construction is in the field of the large passenger ship. Heretofore only cargo boats and small passenger-cargo ships have been equipped with Diesel engines; but in the past year two passenger ships, averaging around 20,000 gross tons each, have been ordered and are now nearly completed.

We are glad to add that in regard to the motorship the United States Shipping Board is abreast, if not ahead, of the times. The last session of Congress appropriated $25,000,000 to convert fifty of the government's better steamships to motorships, and contracts have already been let for work on eighteen vessels.

WHAT, WE WONDER, would be the state of literary taste if our reading of imaginative literature were confined to the works published during the current year? Such a condition of affairs is too absurd to be imagined and yet the situation in the theater is exactly parallel, since revivals, except for an occasional revivification of Shakespeare, are almost unknown. Elsewhere in this issue we comment upon a performance of Congreve's "The Way of the World," but that bold effort merely stimulates our desire to see other famous works of both the near and distant past live again in the theater. A certain rather vulgar insistence upon sumptuous productions (in which the public has been encouraged by wealthy producers) stands in the way of unpretentious revivals, but if this same public could come to realize how even a very mediocre production on the stage brings out dramatic values unguessed in the library it would demand at least modest revivals and support a theater devoted to them.

GUS KARGER, the veteran Washington correspondent, whose death occurred on November 16, was a really remarkable figure in the newspaper world of the capital, particularly because of his intimacy with William H. Taft. Of humble German and Jewish origin, he worked himself up by sheer merit, by frankness and trustworthiness, by reason of his penetrating political judgments and shrewd common sense. It was currently reported in Washington that Mr. Taft as President rarely took any action without consulting Mr. Karger, who had copies of all important documents and letters of the Taft Administration in the expectation that he would some day be the official Taft biographer. That Mr. Karger was an intense partisan goes without saying, for he was the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Times-Star, owned by Charles P. Taft, one of the most hide-bound, narrow, and intemperate Republican journals in the country—so much of a back number that it would not print Senator La Follette's Cincinnati speech. It is, in other words, a kind of antiquated partisan survival whose disappearance would be a public benefit. But to Gus Karger it gave a fairly free hand, and within the limits of his and its Republicanism he expressed himself as he would. Everybody in public life and in his profession liked him and respected him, even where there were sharp political disagreements.

Child Labor Must End!

A FEW years ago the people of this country were so convinced of the elementary necessity to give Congress the right to make laws for the protection of children in States which neglect or refuse to protect them that the child-labor amendment seemed certain of passage. President Wilson, President Harding, and Mr. Coolidge had all declared for it. Now Massachusetts has voted against the child-labor amendment, and the forces of reaction have taken new heart.

The American people has three times expressed its determination to stop the slavery of children in the mills. In September, 1916, Congress passed a bill prohibiting interstate commerce in the products of child labor. In June, 1918, the Supreme Court ruled that the bill was unconstitutional, holding that it was not in fact bona fide regulation of interstate commerce. In February, 1919, Congress passed a new bill imposing a 10-per-cent tax on the products of child labor. In May, 1922, the Supreme Court ruled this act, too, unconstitutional. It was plain then that if child labor was to be regulated by the federal government there would have to be a constitutional amendment. Congress adopted such an amendment last spring; to become effective it requires ratification by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. Arkansas has approved it; Louisiana, Georgia, and North Carolina, as was expected, have rejected it; and the people of Massachusetts, in a referendum distinguished by misrepresentation, ignorance, and deceit, have also voted against it. In January, 1925, thirty-six State legislatures will assemble, and the battle will be on. It will have to be won a fourth time, and it will be. No defeat of such a measure is final, but every victory endures; a State legislature may reconsider a negative decision but not an affirmative—such is the provision of the Constitution.

This federal amendment is, in the nature of things, permissive only. The Constitution is not the place for statutory legislation—it is the place to define powers. What the federal amendment would do is to transfer to the national Congress powers which are not held by the State legislatures: "The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age." Today every State in the Union has that power, but those whose memories reach back through the years of pioneer effort to take the children out of the mills know how heartlessly the State legislatures have failed to use their authority. Some States have excellent child-labor laws; some have wretched laws, and those ill enforced.

When this amendment is ratified—as sooner or later it will be—we may expect federal legislation akin to that killed by the Supreme Court's veto. The federal laws passed in 1916 and 1919 sought to prohibit in mills, factories, and workshops labor of children under 14, and to regulate—by establishing an eight-hour day and a six-day week—the labor of children under 16. They also sought to keep children under 16 out of the dangerous quarries and coal mines. The National Child Labor Committee, which focuses the national campaign to stop child labor, also proposes to include tenement sweatshops in the general prohibition, and to extend the prohibition for work in industries dangerous to life, health, or morals to the age of 18. No attempt has ever been made to prohibit child labor on the farms; the suggestion of such legislation is a bogy invented by the defenders of child labor to frighten the farmers into opposition to the amendment.

Child labor and illiteracy of course go hand in hand. All the leading countries of the world except the United States have, by passing national child-labor laws requiring children to go to school up to certain ages, reduced the number of their illiterate citizens. We talk of our enlightenment, but our illiteracy rate is four times that of England or Germany. According to the census of 1920 1,060,783 children under 15 were at work in the United States, and 1,437,783 children between 7 and 13 were not in school. These unprotected children in States which have weak child-labor laws or which do not enforce the laws on their statute-books have a right to look to the national government to protect them.

In Massachusetts the Associated Industries, affiliated with the National Association of Manufacturers, early transmuted itself into the "Citizens Committee to Protect Our Homes and Children." One might suppose an association so named a branch of the National Child Labor Committee. It was not; it was a part of an association which masked greed for profits won out of children's labor under the fair name of the American home, and deliberately set out to deceive the people of Massachusetts. It suggested that the campaign to stop child labor, waged so earnestly in the United States these last decades, was an invention of Soviet Russia! It quoted or misquoted—we have not verified its quotations—from extreme Russian communists who propose to take children out of the home, and declared that these quotations represented the program of the heroic group which has been struggling to save American children from the mills. A letter sent out by Charles R. Gow, general manager of the Hood Rubber Company and chairman of the finance committee of this Massachusetts "committee to protect homes and children," quoted a statement attributed to Zinoviev's wife, that "We must remove the children from the pernicious influence of the family. We must . . . nationalize them," and continued:

> The avowed purpose of the proposed Twentieth Amendment to the Constitution is stated above in the exact language of the chief of the forces who conceived, drafted, and lobbied that measure through Congress under the American leadership of Mrs. Florence Kelley, formerly Wischnewetsky.

Falsehood could hardly go further. Neither Zinoviev's wife nor any other Communist had anything whatever to do with the campaign for a federal amendment to stop child labor in the United States. Florence Kelley, a present-day saint if there be such a thing, is a daughter of a former congressman, also named Kelley, from Pennsylvania. Her mother's maiden name was Bonsall. She is American to the core; one of her sons was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury during the war. Mrs. Kelley did work for the federal amendment—she has given twenty-five years of her life, as secretary of the National Consumers League, to campaigns in behalf of working children and women in the United States; that is the only truth in Mr. Gow's letter. By such lies—we use the word deliberately—Massachusetts was induced to vote against the child-labor amendment. The rest of the United States will, we hope, show more intelligence. It will have its chance in January when the legislatures meet.

Plunkitt's Way

GEORGE WASHINGTON PLUNKITT was one of the wisest men in American politics and by a stroke of genius on the part of a good newspaperman, William L. Riordan of the New York Evening Post, much of his wisdom was packed into a single small book called "Plunkitt of Tammany Hall." Unfortunately, that book is out of print and rare; but now that Plunkitt is dead it should be republished in large editions and handed to every student of politics, to every organizer of new parties and movements, to every first voter. For in this small book of political sermons, Plunkitt of Tammany Hall, leader of the Fifteenth Assembly District, practical politician and political philosopher, tells all that needs to be told about American government.

He tells why reformers have been only morning glories that "looked lovely in the mornin' and withered up in a short time, while the regular machines went on flourishin' forever like fine old oaks"—a chapter full of post-election thoughts for progressives. He told of the dangers of dress suits and high-priced cars in politics almost twenty years before the defeat of Ramsay MacDonald in England. He explained the difference between honest and dishonest graft in terms so ingenious and yet so simple that Harry Daugherty might have learned a straighter or at least a safer road to wealth and power had he read them; there are no little black bags in the philosophy of George Washington Plunkitt.

He even tells how the Democratic Party can survive. His advice was given in 1905 and in detail may be considered obsolete; but the thought behind it is as good as new and may be applied to 1928 as aptly as to 1908.

> The trouble is [he said] that the party's been chasin' after theories and stayin' up nights readin' books instead of studyin' human nature. . . . You can't get people excited about the Philippines. They've got too much at home to interest them; they're too busy makin' a livin' to bother about the niggers in the Pacific. . . . There's just one issue that would set this country on fire. The Democratic Party should say in the first plank of its platform: "We hereby declare, in national convention assembled, that the paramount issue now, always, and forever is the abolition of the iniquitous and villainous civil-service laws which are destroyin' all patriotism, ruinin' the country, and takin' away good jobs from them that earn them. We pledge ourselves, if our ticket is elected, to repeal those laws at once and put every civil-service reformer in jail." . . .
>
> I see a vision. I see the civil-service monster lyin' flat on the ground. I see the Democratic Party standin' over it with foot on its neck and wearin' the crown of victory. I see Thomas Jefferson lookin' out from a cloud and sayin'. "Give him another sockdolager; finish him." And I see millions of men wavin' their hats and singin' "Glory Hallelujah."

Forms change but the fundamental issue remains: enough jobs and enough money to go round. The party that can actually deliver a full dinner pail or the party that promises it convincingly gets the votes. Honesty doesn't matter; efficiency doesn't matter; progressive vision doesn't matter. What matters is the chance of a better job, a better price for wheat, better business conditions. The same issue holds in national elections and in ward politics. General principles, as Mr. Plunkitt says, are all right to work into the platform but they are always going to be side issues.

Reformers who doubt this are bound to be defeated and disillusioned. They must learn somehow to apply the human knowledge that Tammany Hall and George Washington Plunkitt have used for their own ends to the pressing job of salvaging a derelict civilization. They must learn in the first place that politics is a full-time job just like any other business, not a gentlemanly avocation outside of office hours. They must learn that it is a profession requiring training and technique—not merely virtue or indignation. They must learn that it means getting into close, helpful, daily touch with thousands of individuals. "If there's a family in my district in want," said Plunkitt, "I know it before the charitable societies do, and me and my men are first on the ground. The consequences are that the poor look up to George W. Plunkitt as a father, come to him in trouble—and don't forget him on election day." Reformers could learn many a lesson by studying "Plunkitt of Tammany Hall."

Plunkitt worked for himself and for his friends and for his organization. The rest of the people, let us assume, were mulcted by his activities. But they didn't feel it and didn't know it—until he told them. And then they didn't care, because they could understand a cheerful and honest grafter who made no pretense of virtue but did practical good right and left every day in the week, better than they could a seventh-day reformer who talked of the public welfare and did nothing tangible for anybody.

Plunkitt is dead, but the system he believed in and grew rich by is certainly still a fine old oak. If it is to be hewed down, if the system of private patronage is to be changed to one of honesty and a fair deal all round it will only be by Plunkitt's own method—"You must study human nature and act accordin'."

The Indispensable Century

THERE are signs that the eighteenth century is about to be discovered again. "The Beggars' Opera" has been revived with remarkable success, and in the wake of that success, or perhaps only contemporaneously with it, dozens of literary persons have returned from excursions into the world of Queen Anne or the first three Georges with the information that it is a world of ineffable charm. Anthologies almost by the dozen have been made of fugitive eighteenth-century verse. One of them is entitled "Byways Round Helicon," and the compiler has picked his posies with exactly the same beguiling devotion that was expended a generation or two ago upon the minor versifiers of the seventeenth century. Another selection has the even more significant title of "Rogues in Porcelain." There we have the note of naughtiness thought just now to be essential in the new-found century, combined with the note of artificiality which, to be sure, professors of literature have long been in the habit of saying was there. Certain other manifestations of the rage are more impressive. David Garnett in England has produced two admirable if fantastic short novels which are hailed as being in the manner of Defoe, and Elinor Wylie in America dresses up a later period in something brilliant which she calls a "sedate extravaganza." But all of the manifestations thus far have been manifestations of interest in comparatively trivial aspects of the century.

No genuine admirer of the century can resent this for a moment. Triviality was something like an art in those days, and the admirer will not be inclined to forget his Gay, his Horace Walpole of Strawberry Hill, his Journal to Stella, his Twickenham grotto, his Rape of the Lock, his Sterne, his letter-writing Cowper, his wigs and patches, and his numberless anecdotes of poodles and pet hares. When eighteenth-century poetry dealt with little things, as it often did, the purpose was not to dignify these little things and prove that after all they were indexes to the great mysteries—that suspicious function was reserved for the nineteenth and twentieth centuries—but to set them forth in the exact quality of their littleness and so see how precious or amusing they intrinsically were. Greatness has a way of going out of fashion, and it was far from being the fashion for Pope when he wrote an epic about a young lady who lost a lock of her hair, for Gray when he wrote an Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat, for Goldsmith when he wrote an Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog, or for Cowper when he composed a poem On a Goldfinch Starved to Death in His Cage. The eighteenth century cannot be other than charming to one who is intimate with it, and too much cannot be done today in the way of discovering its charm.

Yet the intimate and the admirer in question will just a little resent that word "discovery." How, he will ask, can anything be discovered which is already here? For the eighteenth century is one of the inescapable things, not merely in the sense of being so close behind us that if we turn we stumble upon it, but in the more important sense of being an ineradicable part of ourselves. Leave institutions out of account—republicanism in government, philanthropy in social science, propriety in manners—and take only literature. There is the matter of language to begin with, and prose style. We learned to write in the eighteenth century, when journalism came into its own. Dryden, Swift, Addison, Steele, Defoe, Fielding, and Dr. Johnson invented and fixed a syntax which we shall not abandon soon. To be sure they are our "classical writers," and at their most official moments they are somewhat heavier than we like to be; yet catch them at their average, or when they were having a really good time with literature, and they can get over the ground as swiftly and as smartly as the proudest modern. We speak their language; we are theirs.

Then how can it be said that we have discovered a century which left us among other books "Robinson Crusoe" and "Gulliver's Travels," books whose vogue has been uninterrupted since their first great days and which now we can hardly escape reading twice, once in children's editions and once when we are grown and are curious to see what more is there than meets the juvenile eye? They are built into our minds as few books are. So, within necessarily narrower limits, is "Tom Jones"; so in general is the eighteenth-century novel. Dickens, undoubtedly the most popular novelist of the century which followed, was brought up in his father's house on Fielding, Richardson, Smollett, and Sterne; Thackeray frankly went to school to Fielding. Modern fiction through these two has caught the full stream of the eighteenth-century mind, as modern life has inherited eighteenth-century institutions, and as modern prose has inherited eighteenth-century style. All of which is not to say that "The Beggars' Opera" should never have seemed a fetching discovery, but to say that no mysterious continent behind that bright headland cries out for recognition.

Senator Borah's Opportunity

THE most important result of Senator Lodge's death is that Senator William E. Borah becomes chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. There is no more strategic position for him to occupy, and there is certainly no abler man in the Senate to fill the place. Not unnaturally all who are interested in the relations of this country to the European situation are busily at work speculating as to what the change will mean. So far as the League of Nations is concerned there will be none. Senator Borah remains as opposed to our entrance into it as was Senator Lodge. But unlike the latter, Senator Borah is definitely committed to a number of proposals that are constructive, in which he should have the widest possible support. He is in deadly earnest in his advocacy of the policy of outlawing war and in demanding that the United States shall take the lead in calling an economic and a disarmament conference for the settlement of the European situation. He is, moreover, devoted to the movement to bring about recognition of Russia, and it is well known that he looks with disfavor upon American conquests in the Caribbean and the governing of little countries by means of our marines. As for the World Court, Senator Borah is, we understand, of the opinion that the United States should not enter it without specific reservations despite the fact that most people agree that as at present constituted the World Court can and will accomplish very little.

Obviously Mr. Borah is in a position to accomplish a great deal and powerfully to affect the foreign policy of the United States. On the Russian question at least there should be a battle royal between the Senator and Secretary Hughes, if the latter should remain in office—which heaven forfend. But, England and France having recognized Russia, Senator Borah has stronger cards in his hand than ever before—he has even the threat of continuing his investigation of our Government's Russian policy to play with. If the British continue to trade with the Soviet it will be hard to convince our business men that we should not.

As for the European situation, England has definitely postponed early consideration of the protocol for disarmament and peace. France is falling in line, and the Belgian proposal that the discredited three-Power alliance of France, England, and Belgium be revived is proof positive that M. Hymans and other Belgian leaders place little faith in the League or its proposals. But that, as Senator Borah is quoted as saying, merely gives additional opportunity to President Coolidge to call the international conference he has at least twice declared that he wishes to summon. Our Government has lost opportunity after opportunity to take the lead abroad; it has alternately pretended to have nothing to do officially with the Dawes settlement and then sought to take all the credit for it. Now is the chance to make the European nations once for all declare whether they are for peace or for the destruction of the world in the next great war. Senator Borah, to whom President Coolidge has made a number of advances—he tried to have him nominated as Vice-President and has repeatedly consulted him—is in a most fortunate position now to make his views felt and to demand that this Government lead toward the outlawry of war for which the whole world longs. We do not doubt that he will rise to the opportunity to serve well his country and the world.

The Politicians Betray the Farmer

By GERTRUDE MATHEWS SHELBY

THE mortgage on the old farm, in billion-dollar bulk, has become national drama. Three hundred thousand farmers own twelve great district land banks of the billion-dollar Farm Loan System. They subscribed forty-five millions of capital stock, but have been deprived of their right, guaranteed by the Farm Loan Act, to manage and operate their property.

Why? Partly because the system offers to politicians the greatest patronage outside of the civil service, coupled with the ability to lend 200 to 300 millions a year, and partly because of a bureaucrat at the head of the Federal Farm Loan Board. But most important, a fundamental new power was given to our people by the Farm Loan Act, a power financiers greatly feared, whereby agriculture could create and control its own credit pool. If agriculture made a success of the exercise of that right, other workers could justly demand it. The concentration of money might be menaced.

Naturally a dramatic struggle is on. Sidelights of it appeared in a little-noticed investigation of Congress last session, and a new and more searching inquiry will possibly be demanded this winter. How the Federal Farm Loan Board did business was shown by indisputable testimony that the board had kept no books on transactions of 881 millions.

"It recently took the Treasury Department, employing ten accountants and working double shifts, from March 12 to about May 1, or nearly seven weeks, to compile a mere statement of receipts and expenditures from the Farm Board records," said Senator Howell to his colleagues. "Moreover, the accountant in charge of this work testified that he would have been unable to make up the statement from the records afforded him without the aid of the memories of several of the employees of the board."

It was charged also that the board had removed $43,000 from the Treasury without authority, disbursing it without vouchers or receipts upon checks signed only by the Farm Loan Commissioner, first Charles E. Lobdell, later R. A. Cooper. Upon this, too, no books were kept.

What was done with the money? Items disallowed by the Comptroller General were paid from it. Traveling expenses and extra salaries were paid. Presents were made to employees. Lobdell, who had become the beneficiary of a salary of $25,000 not authorized by the act, plus $15,000 more for expenses, had received his monthly stipend from this account, unknown to the Comptroller General. Senator Edwards has declared that "accounts were juggled." Nepotism of the worst sort existed. Lobdell employed two sons, another relative, an old friend, his wife's former dressmaker (as statistician of the board), and as secretary his wife's former dressmaker's nephew.

Senator Howell made six serious charges on the floor of Congress, including "misappropriation of funds," and put in a resolution of investigation, still pending.

That is one reason why the Progressive platform carried a plank demanding reconstruction of the Farm Loan System and indorsing cooperative banking. That is why also certain conservative Democratic and Republican congressmen have put in bills to accomplish the same end.

There is nothing really more human than the aspiration and pain represented by mortgages. They tell the tale of the struggle of men for homes, for land. From the era of the covered wagon till now men have had to depend on funds obtained on security of their land to start or to stock farms, to carry on through bad crops or general depression. Little farmers, wanting small loans, always suffered most from the mortgage sharks. They got the worst terms. They constitute the bulk of the pitiful flood of bankrupt farmers today, a scandalous reflection on both our land and credit policies.

The Farm Loan Act was our first federal law to encourage banks of the people for use, not profit. Providing a workable method for securing large funds at low cost by issuing bonds against the farm lands on which loans were made, it granted farmers the right to make themselves independent of existing financial pools. Congress advanced nine millions to start twelve land banks. This is now practically all repaid out of earnings. Farmers who borrowed were required to purchase stock to 5 per cent of the amount of their loans. Furnishing the capital, they were endowed with the right to control the management of all twelve land banks, electing the majority of directors. This they have never been permitted to do. In these land-bank boards was vested power to issue and to sell, in whatever manner they saw fit, together or separately, tax-exempt bonds.

Selling the bonds is the key-power of the system. That is the crux of the present complicated drama. The Federal Farm Loan Board usurped that power, and gave the bond sale over exclusively into the hands of the very group whose interest it was to keep financial power centralized. A syndicate of six bond houses has had this lucrative business. It is composed of Brown Brothers, Harris Forbes and Company, Lee Higginson and Company, the National City Company, the Guaranty Trust Company, and Alexander Brown and Sons of Baltimore. The amount and time of farm-loan bonds issued have practically been determined by counsel with their agents. That, of course, offers practical if not direct control over how much money agriculture shall receive through this channel. Instead of allowing farmers to decentralize credit, the Federal Farm Loan Board, usurping powers in the last analysis belonging to stockholders, hog-tied them to the same financiers from whom they were to escape if they chose.

A word about the structure of this system. The act provided that ten or more farmers who wanted loans should organize cooperatively a national farm-loan association ("national" only in that there would be others all over the land). There are now 4,500 of these purely local groups. Certain of them have done a million-dollar business each. When such an association received its charter, government appraisers visited the land, recommending to the land bank allowance or rejection of loans. Farmers who got loans took stock in the land bank of their district; for example, Spokane, or Springfield (Massachusetts), or New Orleans. The associations had to indorse every loan, enhancing the security behind the bonds. All associations are liable to twice the value of their stock ($90,000,000) for losses of their own land bank, and each bank is liable for the losses of every other.

A huge chain. Although called the Federal Farm Loan System, it never was federal. It is the farmers' own, but the Federal Farm Loan Board has given them scant encouragement to think so. Within a year after the system was started in 1917 the farmers had met all requirements to take over management of the banks. But no elections were called. The Federal Farm Loan Board, announcing itself in its first report as opposed to control of banks by borrowers—although the first premise of the act the board was intrusted to administer was that stockholders who were also borrowers should operate these land banks—proceeded to override the law and to usurp vital functions. To prevent farmers from demanding control, using the plausible excuse that they took the action to protect bond buyers and also to promote the sale of Liberty bonds then being issued, the board secured an amendment deferring elections.

No explanation was vouchsafed. Farmers did not know what had happened to them until several years later. No elections being held, stockholders protested. Some of them tried to organize to protect themselves. Two attorneys general refused to allow them to use even $10 a year of association funds to support a federation.

In 1923 the Federal Farm Loan Board wrote and obtained from Congress a revision and emasculation of the original act by means of the Strong bill. Its provisions were a betrayal of public trust, stultifying the purposes of the original act, legalizing the usurpation of power by the board, and banishing the hope of the farmer-stockholders to regain control of their property.

Without being considered by the Senate at all it became law. In the disgraceful last-minute legislative jam its sponsors slipped the bill into the composite Intermediate Credits Act, between two measures the Senate had separately passed. Without discussion, without a reading of the bill or the conference report, it became law. According to Senator Fletcher it confiscates the farmers' rights to control their own property. It reduced farmers' elected representation on each land-bank board to a minority. Thus uninterrupted continuation of the bond-selling policy was made probable, for the old land-bank boards were perpetuated in power. This new legislation destroys the promise of decentralization of land credit; it should be repealed.

Not until the first elections held in seven years occurred could the stockholders fairly measure the seriousness of what had happened. They then discovered that they had been deprived of their last chance to affect policy, improve service, eradicate politics, reduce their own interest rate—now higher than that offered by private companies—or secure the return of several millions of undivided profits held up from year to year. They found the entire system in the hands of politicians with not a cent at stake.

If salaries had not been raised throughout the land banks, and Lobdell had not overreached himself grabbing for salary and place, the stockholders' protests might have availed them nothing. But certain Senators became curious, and finding facts impossible to ascertain put several resolutions through the Senate which forced continued hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee.

The new legislation put the entire expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board, a bureau of the Treasury, on the farmers' backs—an unprecedented arrangement; national and federal reserve banks do not pay the cost of their bureaus. Two new $10,000 memberships were added to the board. Senator Borah objected to this, charging the two places had been added as a matter of "political exigency." The board, although on record that it was large enough already to take care of the work, now declared the new members necessary. Farmers reported unfair practices and poor service; they demanded control of their own banks. Yet the Senate committee refused Senator Howell's request to call certain witnesses or go into the matter further. The appointees were confirmed.

"Case of places being more important than principles," commented Senator Norris.

Places! "The system has become a political annex and pie-counter," wrote a stockholder.

The political phase of these dull-sounding agricultural banks now threatens if it does not already affect every voter. Remember that this system which now lends 200 to 300 millions a year is wholly in the hands of 1,600 office-holders. These 1,600 places constitute a patronage naturally clamored for by politicians. Then suppose congressmen become greedy to secure the largest share of loans for their districts. If loyal henchmen or relatives are appointed as officers of the bank or as appraisers, discrimination among loans applied for is easy. Associations, even States, complain that they can't get applications approved. Concentration of loans in others is reported.

Consider another phase. Appraisers number 750. Having to pass no civil-service examination, and being politically appointed, their qualifications are often most dubious. In each district sixty to seventy go constantly, at the farmers' expense, from place to place. What an ideal electioneering force!

The net improvement in the situation as a result of the hearings forced last session was: A large amount of information was obtained; accretions to the irregular account in the Franklin National Bank were stopped by the Secretary of the Treasury and at least a partial refund was demanded; the fiscal agent began to keep books.

For the future these are the main demands: Stockholders want control of their own property and freedom to decentralize credit. They believe preferential or exclusive contracts should be refused to any bond-selling agency. They desire a broadened market for bonds, lower interest, and returns of surplus. They ask that the right of farm-loan associations to support a federation out of their own funds be recognized. They demand production by the Federal Farm Loan Board of public information now systematically withheld even from stockholders. They hope for eradication of political abuses by putting the system under civil service.

If the Federal Government is honorably to make good its promise to agriculture of independence through a co-operative-credit system, these issues must be met. This kind of credit presents genuine advantages over the old system where the poorest farmers were the victims of usurious loan rates. It is especially built to serve all sections, not the "best territory," like private joint-stock banks. Ultimately, by "loans at cost and loans that never come due" (repaid in regular instalments), the farmers will get out of debt. With eleven billions of mortgage indebtedness bearing down on agriculture, that's a social question. To protect and perfect the Farm Loan System is a necessity if it were not plain justice.

Calles—The Teacher and Statesman

By HOWARD A. LAMB

WHEN I first met Calles in the crude little border village of Agua Prieta I was surprised as well as puzzled to find a man in a Mexican colonel's uniform talking like a Rand School professor. There was none of the military claptrap about him, he granted interviews to newspaper reporters in his shirt-sleeves, smoking a cigarette, but as a soldier he seemed to be wholly effective. I saw him under siege at Naco, Sonora, feeding apples imported from this country to his ragged mob of soldiers to cure them of scurvy, and finally triumphing over the fat and drink-loving governor, Maytorena, who, in league with Villa, had turned against the Carranza government with the Yaqui Indians enlisted in his support.

Then I saw Calles, a general now, beat off the indomitable Villa at Agua Prieta and later march into the Sonora mountains to subdue the rebellious Yaquis. But it was not primarily as a soldier, brilliant as his friends regard him in that capacity, that Calles shone. On the field of slaughter that glorified bandit, Pancho Villa, had more genius, so far as I could judge, than Calles and Obregon combined. At a time of strained relations on the international border, when liquor was inciting disturbances that might have brought on intervention by the United States, I saw Calles, as military governor, issue the famous decree making liquor-trafficking in Sonora punishable by death. No bootlegger was ever stood up against an adobe wall, but Sonora became tolerably dry until a legislature was elected and restored the old conditions.

The American border was still aflame when Calles demonstrated his ability as a man of action. Three or four Mexicans crossed the international line into Arizona and committed a robbery that aroused the American population. In a few days, assisted by American peace officers, Calles had the guilty men in jail in Agua Prieta. In still less time they were tried, convicted, and hanging from telephone poles in the plaza as a lesson to all.

In the days when Mexico seethed in anarchy under Carranza it was Calles who settled workers' strikes in the southern part of the republic without resort to arms. He could handle American employers as well. The trouble at Cananea, Sonora, when he was governor was a case in point. As his friends tell the story, the American owners of the big copper mines at Cananea, displeased because several thousand Mexican workmen organized a union, peremptorily closed up the works and returned to Arizona. Calles advised the miners to operate the mines themselves. They did, and even more efficiently than he expected. At the end of twenty days the owners put in a heavy claim for damages against the state of Sonora. "All right," agreed Calles, "but perhaps you have forgotten that under the new constitution whenever a corporation locks out its men without submitting the point at issue to the board of arbitration it must pay the workmen three months' wages. You may be entitled to some damages, but if we pay you will have to advance three months' wages to every man."

The mine manager relinquished all claims, paid the men for the twenty days they had operated the mine, and resumed operation. Then to prove that he felt no ill will the American built a $25,000 school for the miners' children and also provided them with a swimming pool.

But it was in founding the Cruz Galves vocational school for war orphans at Hermosillo that Calles showed the best that's in him. It was at a time when years of revolution, with bandits in epaulets roaming the country, had ravished it bare. The last steer on the range had been fed into the stomachs of "soldiers" in one army or another; all loose copper or silver ore at the mines had been appropriated by force; there did not remain even one American mine manager worth capturing to obtain a ransom; many women and children were gaunt from hunger.

Yet Calles was able by public subscription to raise enough money to start the school. It was a strange sight

The Public Career of Mexico's New President

1910. Joined the Madero revolution and on its triumph was elected mayor of Agua Prieta, Sonora, on the international line opposite Douglas, Arizona.

1912. Helped Obregon fight the federal forces in Sonora.

1913. During the Huerta dictatorship fought at Naco, Nogales, and Cananea as commander of the Constitutionalist forces, Carranza giving him the rank of colonel for meritorious service.

1914. Took the field against Governor Maytorena, who had deserted Carranza to go over to Villa, and drove him from the state.

1915-1916. With help of Obregon drove Villa and his army out of Sonora and became military governor of the state.

1917. Conducted a campaign in the mountains against the Yaquis, who were making raids on the surrounding country.

1918. Elected constitutional governor of Sonora. During his administration new agrarian and labor laws were enacted and many new schools established.

1919. Called to Mexico City by Carranza as Secretary of Industry, Commerce, and Labor.

1920. Resigned to return to Sonora to direct Obregon's presidential campaign. Fought for Obregon when the latter broke with Carranza and helped to establish Adolfo de la Huerta as Provisional President. Appointed Secretary of War.

1921-1922. Secretary of the Interior and Chief of the Cabinet under President Obregon.

1923. Resigned to become candidate for the Socialist-Labor-Agrarian parties for President, but was obliged to take the field against De la Huerta, who, supported by a large part of the army and property interests, started a revolt.

1924. After the flight of De la Huerta resumed his presidential campaign and defeated his opponent, General Angel Flores, governor of Sinaloa, receiving 83 per cent of the votes.

to American visitors to see the poverty-stricken town of Agua Prieta "thrown open" for three days so that the profits from beer, whiskey, tequila, and gambling might be collected to educate orphans. The enthusiasm was intense. Education is the new religion of the Mexican people. The national budget for schools in 1923 was seven times larger than in the last year of the Diaz regime.

I remember the time when Calles, still governor, deserted the capital at Hermosillo to return to Agua Prieta and sell the handiwork of his little proteges to raise money for the school. It was fine work, for Mexican boys and girls excel American children in such craftsmanship, and as the Governor brought out for inspection of the visitors a little piece of needlework by a parentless girl or an example of cobblery skill of an orphan boy he smiled as proudly as if he were the father of them all. No wonder the children of the school call him "Papa Calles." I believe it was that scene in the cramped adobe reception-room in the rear of a store at Agua Prieta that fixed Calles in my mind as a leader worth while.

The Mexican President-elect, now 46 years old, is a pioneer product. He has been compared to Lincoln, and in his love and understanding of the plain people there is a resemblance. His native state, Sonora, is in about the same phase of material development, one imagines, as was Illinois in Lincoln's day. It is still given over mostly to range cattle and mining. Agriculture in most sections is primitive. The roads are impassable except for the smallest and toughest automobiles.

Young Calles, son of a poor farmer, suffered all the hardships of the Illinois rail-splitter. As a small boy he peddled fresh water from a pushcart in the streets of Guaymas. In school he was bright and industrious in preparing himself for the future. He won a scholarship and was sent by the government of Sonora to Mexico City to finish his studies, after which he devoted his time to public instruction in his native state, finally becoming head of the state Department of Education.

The system Calles, cooperating with Obregon, devised to end the bandit problem was a shrewd stroke of statesmanship. When Obregon came into power he had 130,000 federal soldiers, while 50,000 bandits roamed the land. Calles knew that the difference between a bandit and a federal soldier in Mexico was about the same as between a Republican and Democratic politician in the United States. Under slightly different pretensions both lived off and robbed the country. The peon became a bandit or, better, a federal soldier, because it was the easiest way, almost the only way, to make a living. So Calles, at the head of the army, opened the ranks and took the bandits in. He accepted them at their own rating. He said: "If you say you are a general, you must be one." Numerous bandits became Calles's best friends. With an army swelled to 180,000, the problem was what to do with the army. It was put to work building roads and schoolhouses. When conditions permitted groups of soldiers were settled in colonies. They were given land, supplied with agricultural machinery, and where possible paid in advance so they could get along until they harvested their first crop. Calles was weeding out generals, colonels, and high privates by the hundred and the sword was being almost literally beaten into the plowshare when the Huerta insurrection forced him to quit.

In Mexico Calles is not regarded as an extreme radical. He stands in about the same relation to the Mexican conservatives as La Follette does to those of this country. A nation just emerging from fourteen years of anarchy during which old institutions and traditions have been submerged in a welter of blood is receptive to new ideas. Calles represents them. The dream of martyred Madero will now begin to materialize under the more practical Calles. Americans who have had dealings with Calles in Sonora over a period of many years say he will raise no barrier against legitimate American enterprise in Mexico. He appreciates the genius of the American people and would like to utilize it, but is probably dubious about a government which throws his friend Eugene V. Debs into jail and puts Albert B. Fall in the Cabinet. Nobody more than Calles wants to develop his country, but, not forgetting a certain black satchel, he will take care that business adventurers from the United States do not carry out of Mexico what little the Mexican generals have left.

The Catholic clergy, rich and in part undeniably corrupt under Diaz, were routed by the revolution. In the late presidential campaign they fought Calles. When he spoke from a bandstand in San Miguel, Guanajuato, women in the crowd heckled him, crying, "Viva, Christ the King!"

"Viva, Christ the Revolutionist!" shouted Calles in reply. "Viva, Christ the carpenter but not the king. The days of kings have passed forever. Viva, Christ, but Christ, the friend of the poor and suffering, the friend of the hungry and homeless!"

To a Song of Sappho, Discovered in Egypt

By LEONORA SPEYER

Jonah wept within the whale;
But you have sung these centuries
Under the brown banks of the Nile
Within a dead dried crocodile:
So fares the learned tale.

When they embalmed the sacred beast
The Sapphic scroll was fair and strong
To wrap the spices that were needed—
Its song unheard, its word unheeded,
By crocodile or priest.

The song you sang on Lesbos when Atthis was kind or Gorgo sad—
The startled whale spewed Jonah wide,
Out of the monster mummified
Your roses sing again.

Your roses! from the seven strands
Of the small harp whereon they grew—
The holy beast has had his pleasure,
His bellyful of Attic measure,
Under the desert sands.

Across pale seas your petals blew
In singing fragments, roses all!
The air is heavy on the Nile,
The drowsy gods drowse on the while,
As gods are wont to do.

Berries Is Berries

By FRANCES BRADLEY

A CARAVAN of wagons, covered and uncovered, was crossing a creek. Some were filled with rolls of bedding and clothing, with dilapidated grips, suitcases, and bulging telescopes, with crates containing smoky coffee pots, frying pans, and heavy dishes, the worse for wear; while from the front, the rear, and from the uplifted sides of the prairie schooners appeared tousled heads, yellow, brown, tawny, of a score of youngsters consumed with curiosity, for they were seeing the world.

The procession was held up temporarily by an obstreperous pony, who, as one of the rear team of a four-horse wagon, was expected to fall into line and learn how to travel in harness. He refused, however, to do his part, and apparently neither he nor his master knew the rules of the game. Frightened, protesting, pursued by the lashes and oaths of the combined drivers of several teams, his sides frothing, and a bloody gash on his back luring a persistent, merciless horse-fly, the poor beast at least furnished his share of excitement. In spite of his three steady mates, the wagon swayed and tilted in the heavy sand. The load of children careened this way and that and clutched the sides of the wagon. The older ones dropped out behind and trudged barefoot beside the men, swelling the grand whoopla to urge on the panicky pony.

"What is it all about? Well, we're a tryin' ter git ter the berry fiel's but this durn pony is boun' he won't pull. I'll show him whether he will or no," and a stinging lash across the legs brought only another toss of the head and a wild dash to the other side of the road in a frantic effort to evade the next onslaught of the exasperated driver. "We hev n't made mo'n fifteen miles today," he complained, "but I'll say we'll do better'n thet tomorrow. Berries is ready ter pick an' we 've got ter be in the fiel's by Friday."

Finally, seduced with a bribe of cigarettes, the men ceased hostilities for a time, giving the frantic animal a chance to steady his nerves and to secure a much-needed rest.

"Well, yes," in answer to a question, "of co'se most of 'em is school chillen, but schools close when berry season opens. Yer see berries is berries an' the crap hes ter be made right now. School begins again in July an' lasts till fodderin' time, cep' fer them ez hez ter chop cotton. An' arter thet, ther's nothin' mo' ter hinder 'em till pickin' time in October an' November."

"Where are the parents of so many children? Do they pick berries too?"

"Well, hardly," smiling. "Berry pickin' is the back-breakin'est work yer ever tried. Hit's wussen cotton pickin' on grown folks, 'specially men. Ther backs is too stiff fer sech work. Hit's jes suited ter women an' chillen. Yes o' co'se, they hez ter ben' too, but hit don' lame 'em up like it does us men, an' somehow they seems ter stan' it better. Mr. Donaghey here picks on contrac' fer the M an' N Packin' an' Preservin' Company, an' we uses only chillen fer the pickin'. The big boys stays in the shack with Mr. Donaghey an' Mrs. Simpson yonder tries ter keep the little fellers out o' mischief."

"Do they like to go? Are there any repeaters, children going the second or third year to the berry fields?"

"Oh well, you know how chillen is. They 're crazy about it till they fin's they hez ter stay on the job. Hit's lucky fer them they hez parents who knows what's good fer 'em. These kids 'd be tearin' all over the place eatin' ther haids off ef they wuz at home while now they're mekin' money, an' ther folks needs it.

"How much do they earn? Well that depen's. Sometimes they picks by the row, but mos' gene'ally they picks by the box, 2 cents when berries is plenty an' 3 or 4 cents ef they're sca'ce. Berry pickers hez easy hours, fer all berries picked today mus' be shipped today, so they don' put in mo'n six or eight hours in the fiel'. A good boss kin git a right smart o' work outen a batch o' kids in thet time, an' they meks good money too. O co'se they gits ther boa'd an' lodgin' an' ther quinine free."

"But all of them do not need quinine," was protested. "Who gives it and how much?"

"Well, hit don' tek 'em long ter need it in these bottoms. Ef they comes from the mountains o' co'se we waits till they begins ter git dopey; but hit's a safe bet thet a gang from the low country'll begin chillin' by the ninth or tenth day. We gits mo' work outen 'em ter give three or four grains every night all han's roun'."

"Surely everybody in the low country does not have malaria."

"Mebbe not ez long ez they stays thar, but let 'em mek a change an' hit's sho ter crop out. Yer see hit 'd never do ter bring a lot o' kids away from ther homes an' let 'em git sick on us. Hit's cheaper, an' hit saves a gran' pow-wow with the uplifters, see? Arter every rainy spell, the water backs up an' gits mighty bad. Hit's hardly fitten ter drink, an' a run o' malaria or typhoid fever is sho ter foller. Then, too, yer cain't keep chillen or grown folks nuther from eatin' late peaches an' watermelons which is allus full o' malaria. All these frills about mosquitoes causin' malaria, tek hit from me, is all bunk. Ask any ole planter what hez lived in these parts an' hed ter keep his han's well. He'll tell yer. So will Dr. Oleboy. He's practiced medicine fer forty year an' is health officer in my county. I reckon he knows."

Meantime the pony had quieted down and was resting first on one haunch, then the other. The children, stretching their bones, had spotted a "swimmin' hole" in the bend of the creek and were speculating on the number of cat, perch, and suckers its cool shadows harbored. Others, even without being told, washed their grimy faces and hands, and, thus emboldened, waded, squealing and splashing, into the enticing stream.

"How about it, Johnny, going to earn some money?" someone asked.

"Yeah, I reckon so, but I wish ter cracky us fellers could git a swim fust. Whar we come from, hit's all standin' water, with slime on top an' a black, oozy bottom. This yer water runs, an' yer kin see plumb through it. Look at the san' an' rocks." Dipping up a fist full of pebbles, he hurled them one by one over the smooth surface of the swimmin' hole. watching eagerly the wigglers, tadpoles, and "minnies" dart after the ever-widening ripples.

"How much money will you make?"

"Aw, I dunno. Daddy made the trade." Then, excitedly, "Gee whiz, did yer see thet fish jump? Ain't nobody in this bunch got a hook an' line?" looking over the crowd in an agony of despair.

"All han's aboa'd. We've got ter move." This from Mr. Donaghey brought to an untimely end the passing dream of the children. Scrambling into the wagons, their bobbing heads watched with regret the last sparkle of the stream, then turned eager for the next experience. Accepting the proffered service of a stranger, the pony listened to a quiet word of assurance and encouragement, agreed that it is an exasperating, sometimes even a disappointing world, but that, on the whole, traveling in harness has its good points. Resentful of a beating, he whinnied gratefully over being led to the inevitable, and trotted out into the great world with his load of fellow-youngsters, each to learn his and her lesson that going' a-berryin' sometimes means much more than goin' a-pleasurin'. It means life as it is lived out in the fields where "berries is berries."

In Bad All Around

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

I COULD get a couple more newspapers for my newspaper service if I would stop writing for this accursed radical magazine The Nation.

Meanwhile, a lot of the readers of The Nation seem to spend all their time trying to get Oswald Garrison Villard to fire me from The Nation for being some sort of eighteenth-century country-squire Tory—or worse. I mean and worse. These readers tip me off to Oswald Garrison Villard as a friend of Harry Daugherty's.

I do not think that any evidence ever proved that Harry Daugherty ever got any money from bootleggers via Jess Smith. A good progressive, it seems, should believe that the evidence on that point was there. I could not see that it was. So I'm in bad as a progressive.

However, I have my consolation. I'm also in bad as a conservative. I never could see that any evidence ever proved that the I. W. W.'s put into jail during the war had ever committed any crime against the government of the United States. For that inability on my part I got the name of being quite a radical.

The persons accused were radicals. I could not see that the accusations against them were established. They were accused essentially of treason. Not being able to see that certain radicals accused of treason had ever been proved guilty of treason, I found myself invested with a sudden and thrilling reputation for radicalism on my own account.

I now sometimes say that Calvin Coolidge believes in lowering the surtaxes not because he is told to believe it by "Wall Street" but because anybody else from Plymouth, Vermont, even if he had never heard of "Wall Street," would believe in lowering the surtaxes. This gives me a reputation as a conservative. A progressive, apparently, would believe that nobody from Plymouth, Vermont, would ever know what to think until somebody from New York told him.

I then, however, say that Calvin Coolidge often hesitates a long time before making up his mind and that he is a great jiu-jitsu political artist (which I think admirable) and that, in any case, Senator Couzens of Michigan is not going to do everything that Calvin Coolidge says simply because Calvin Coolidge got a considerable plurality and a quite safe majority in the last election.

This induces readers of the Brooklyn Eagle to write enraged letters to the managing editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, pointing out that I am insidiously disparaging the presidential hero of conservatism and the whole recent conservative presidential victory. It also raises endless trouble for me in virtually every other city where my dispatches are published. Once again, instead of being a blue-nosed reactionary, I am a red-eyed revolutionist.

It is clear to me that somebody must be crazy.

On reflection I have decided that it is I. I hope my readers will not mind my writing about myself. I'm getting old. I crave sympathy, before I get shut up in a sanitarium for people with political dual personalities. I must hurry and get into some logical, consistent, political pigeon-hole, in order that the jury may be able to declare me sane.

For instance: More power in industry for labor is a relatively new idea; or, at any rate, it is a relatively new organized movement. Being new, it is called progressive. I happen to be for it. Meanwhile government ownership and operation of industrial enterprises is also, in a certain sense, new. I happen to be against it.

This is my mistake.

If anything is new, I ought to be either always for it or always against it, irrespective of what it is. "Progressivism, right or wrong!" "Things as they are! May they always be grand; but, grand or not, things as they are!"

That's the way to let people know where they can find you. That's the way to give them confidence in you. It is not only countries that have patriotism. It is also factions. There is a patriotism of progressivism. There is a patriotism of conservatism. If you are a progressive, you should go along with the progressives in any war they start. If you are a conservative, you should be against anything that anybody who at any time was ever called a progressive wants. A man is known by the company he keeps. If he does not stick on one side, he has no company. That's me.

I was introduced the other day to an audience of all sorts of people. My introducer said: "We have all read Mr. Hard's articles." There was not a sound from the audience. My introducer then said: "And we have all disagreed with them." There was rapturous applause.

Of course, behind all this solemn (or flippant) pretense, I love it. I would rather lose ten newspaper clients for writing for The Nation than stop irritating the readers of The Nation.

If Oswald Garrison Villard, besides imploring me for heaven's sake to wake up and to see and have some principles, should ever try to make me have them, I would quit him cold and rejoice in being a martyr to my lack of principles.

Yet I have them. I will tell the readers of The Nation a secret. Senator Borah is no progressive either. I and Senator Borah—the press gallery has precedence over the Senate—I and Senator Borah are progressives of the vintage of the period between 1776 and 1787. We—I and the Senator—are for what we regard as human liberty. We accordingly are for free speech and for the free right of labor to organize and to struggle for more power. We are for all that sort of thing.

We also are for the guaranties of it in the Constitution. We think that the Constitution does guarantee it. We think that if we elect Presidents who will appoint fair judges to the Supreme Court, the Constitution of 1787 is in absolute realistic fact a palladium of liberty.

Liberty is what we are for. That's why we're progressive. Because we're progressive, and because we're for liberty, we're against governmentalization. We hate these modern increases of governmental powers and functions. We do not want government big. We want it small. That's why we're conservative. A true progressive must at this time often be a conservative.

That's my proposition. That's why I'm in bad. And Senator Borah would be in bad, too, if he weren't so much cleverer than I.

Cassandra

By LOUISE BOGAN

For me one silly task is like another—
I bare the shambling tricks of lust and pride.
This flesh will never give a child its mother.
Song, like a wing, tears through my breast, my side,
And madness chooses out my voice again,
Again—I am the chosen no hand saves,
The screaming heaven lifted over men,
Not the dumb earth, wherein they set their graves.

Poet's Love Letter

By MAXWELL BODENHEIM

Blue birds invade the patience of the moon;
The insubstantial trickeries of stars
Seduce an inch of sky and make it vast;
The night is like a lonely, poisoned boy,
Who gulps down starlight and is once more healed,
But rushes to a second treachery.
Amid these semblances, where logic strides
In chase of beauty, almost losing shape,
You walk, fearless and yet afraid to move
With legs that do not need a sheltering cloth.
Ah, courage is the animated lie
That shatters unreal linings of a heart—
Exquisite counterfeit of fierceness where
A soul compels the flesh to abdicate.
What is the night except an argument,
Renowned and wild, between the soul and flesh?

In the Driftway

THE Arabian Nights contain no tale as dazzling, as breath-taking, as rainbow colored as the story of Fifth Avenue's rise in a century from a plan set on paper and derided by all sensible citizens—the reality being a wandering country lane leading vaguely from one small village to another—to the richest and proudest street in the world. The Drifter likes romance and he has it here in abundance. Carping editorial writers in New York newspapers may object that Fifth Avenue represents not only the amazing progress but the youth and brashness of America; the fact remains that what was a goat pasture in 1860 is now occupied by those great dwellings which out-of-towners point at and whisper about as housing New York's "millionaires"; that somewhat earlier one Garrit Storm spent a good many sleepless nights after his rash purchase, for $45,000, of the Fifth Avenue block between Forty-second and Forty-third Streets, and that lately one of his many heirs died leaving a fortune of $10,000,000, mostly in real estate; that when Amos R. Eno, in 1858, built a hotel on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Twenty-third Street the enterprise was known as "Eno's Folly," and the wiseacres shook their heads and predicted a bad end for such an unbusiness-like attempt to establish a great tavern in the country.

* * * * *

IN 1824 Fifth Avenue was planned on paper; at that time a collection of log huts housing fewer than one hundred persons had managed to grow up on the bleak shore of Lake Michigan, under the protection of Fort Dearborn, rebuilt after its destruction by the Indians in 1812. The knowing ones who laughed at the idea of plotting a street which cut through farms and across creeks would doubtless have become hysterical with mirth if someone had prophesied that by 1850 the Fort Dearborn settlement would grow to 28,269 persons, by 1860 to 109,000, and would be in 1924 the City of Chicago with a population of over three million. But of course no one made such a prophecy; in New York men were too busy to bother with such nonsense. They went about their affairs in the city and spent their leisure in their country houses; sometimes they stopped overnight at an inn; in 1850 they might have stayed at Madison Cottage, the tavern at Fifth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, provided they were willing to comply with the following rules for guests:

Four pence a night for Bed.
Six pence a night with Supper.
No more than 5 to sleep in one Bed.
No Boots to be worn in bed.
Organ Grinders to sleep in the Wash House.
No dogs allowed up stairs.
No Beer allowed in the kitchen.
No Razor Grinders or Tinkers taken in.

* * * * *

THE gulf between Europe and America never shows more plainly than in the rehearsing of tales like these. The Atlantic Ocean is a quiet brook compared to this sea of difference that divides an old world from a new, a world where "antique" carries with it the traditions of a thousand years and one where it refers to the late eighteenth century. Consider the contrast between the young Americanized Italian admiring his Fifth Avenue and the Florentine. The latter sees, as he looks from his window deep-set in stone, the same narrow streets, the same type of house, and in many cases the same house, that his grandfather sixteen generations removed must have seen. Florence today looks enough like Florence of the fifteenth century to set at rest the heart of any ghost looking about for his former habitation; Savonarola, walking about on the square where he was burned to death in 1498, would notice a new statue or two, the iron tables and chairs of a modern cafe (built in the old style), and the bronze plate under his feet which marks the place of his execution. Otherwise things would be much the same. And how hard-put a citizen of Rome would be to vie with his American cousin in boasting of "progress." "Ah, yes," he might say, "but remember that in 1450 Rome was a city of wild-haired beggars who had for their houses the ruins of pagan temples and Christian basilicas." And even then he could be reminded that in three years the Pantheon, whose gold mosaic ceiling arches over its marble mosaic floor as securely as it did when it was built, can celebrate its nineteen-hundredth birthday.

* * * * *

TO the European, accustomed to cities which have remained more or less stationary for hundreds of years, the fantastic tale of a mere century seems like a child's dream or the vision of a madman. In neither case it is to be taken seriously. This sister across the sea has, to be sure, managed to acquire wealth enough to make her word carry weight; but in art, in letters, in architecture, even in government, she is, necessarily, centuries behind her European relations or else merely copying their ideas. One hears that she is advanced in the matter of bath-tubs; but her grasp on the realities of life must be that of an infant. The Drifter, with a desire to defend his country while reserving the privilege of salutary criticism in private, cannot but admit the force of this contention. If America is crude, if she is ignorant, if she loudly trumpets one theory while practicing another, if she arrogantly assumes herself to be right because she is great, let these faults be set down to her youth and inexperience. It is conceivable that age may bring wisdom—possibly even the wisdom of China, which sits and sleeps. With the benefits of her upbringing and with the chance she has had to profit by the failures of others, it may be that America's future will be a brighter one than that of Europe seems to be.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

English for the Viennese

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The editor of the Vienna daily Die Stunde, which I represent in America, asked me to thank The Nation for having published a letter by Mr. Swann Harding, Beltsville, Maryland, offering to send American periodicals to Vienna. This letter led to the organization of 185 American men and women who have nobly responded to Mr. Harding's appeal and expressed their willingness to furnish, free of charge, hundreds of English-reading Viennese with American periodicals.

I was asked, at the same time, to thank Mr. Swann Harding and all those who have been instrumental in bringing about this result.

Brooklyn, November 18 EMIL LENGYEL

E. D. Morel

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I bear brief testimony to the splendid character and work of E. D. Morel, whose untimely death you, in common with all friends of public justice and humanity, deplore? I did not know him personally during the earlier of his two great adventures, his campaign against the atrocities of the Belgian Congo. But during the past ten years I have watched from close quarters, on the executive committee of his Union of Democratic Control, the magnificent services he has rendered, largely single-handed in his country, to the revelation of the truth about the Great War and the Bad Peace.

Considerations of his own personal safety and reputation counted nothing with this great-hearted truth-teller. Needless to say, he suffered every affront and contumely which unscrupulous patrioteers and their lying press could heap upon him. These men and their newspapers charged him openly with treason and the receipt of pay from Germany, well aware that in the heat of the war-fever he could not invoke the protection of the law of libel with the faintest chance of a fair verdict from a jury poisoned by the very lies he sought to expose. At last his enemies secured his silence for a time by a trumped-up technicality. But not for long. After his release from prison he pursued his purpose with unabated zeal, though with a damaged physique due to the heavy nervous strain which such maltreatment put upon one whose fighting spirit concealed a sensitiveness inseparable from his enthusiasm for justice. He shrank from the unmerited hatred of his fellow-men. The iron entered his soul and contributed to wear down his fine physique. Even after the extremity of the war-fever was abated, the general refusal to confront the greatest of the war-lies, the sole guilt of Germany, kept him in a continual emotional ferment, and imposed upon him new toils of controversy.

It would be idle to conceal the fact that the formation and the policy of the Labor Government were in some ways a bitter disappointment to him. His knowledge of foreign policy and his personal part in educating the nation to it to put the Labor Government in power seemed to most of his friends (and doubtless to him) good reasons for giving him a ministerial place in foreign or colonial administration. At any rate he expected from ministers who were his fellow-workers in the U.D.C. a bolder and more strenuous policy aiming to secure a revision of the destructive peace treaties and the falsehood they affirmed regarding the responsibility for the war.

His death cuts short the most truly glorious career of any Englishman of our time. In private life, I may add, he was the most lovable of men, full of kindness and considerateness, willing to listen and defer to friends who had not a tithe of his knowledge of affairs. His death, the latest war-victim, will bring a throb of personal sorrow to hundreds of private friends in different countries, brought in contact with him during this last decade of his spiritual adventure.

Washington, D. C., November 17 JOHN A. HOBSON

The Klan in the Election

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Some weeks ago when you or some one of your staff wrote a funeral oration over the dead body of the Klan I was amused, considering that I had recently been engaged in a bitter and futile attempt to prevent the Tulsa schools from falling into the hands of the Klan.

As the result of the election here in the Southwest is decided my amusement is tempered somewhat by pity. Are you not aware that the Republican landslide for Coolidge, especially in the West, was the work of the Klan and that Klan slates, nonpartisan in character, were ordered from Atlanta and were put through almost without exception in every doubtful State?

In Oklahoma the county officials and the judges and the congressmen and legislators are without exception amenable to the Klan, and Pine who was openly the Klan candidate was elected by two to one over Jack Walton in spite of the fact that the State as a whole returned its normal majority for Davis.

In Kansas, William Allen White, who made a spectacular campaign against the Klan, was beaten worse than anyone had anticipated. The Klan indorsed Paulen and elected him, and the labor men of Kansas can expect a revival of the Industrial Court with all its unfairness together with the organized lawless enmity of the small business men and politicians who make up the strength of the Invisible Empire.

In Texas, in spite of the apparent victory of Mrs. Ferguson, the Klan is back in power in all parts of the State and came near carrying the State over in the Republican column; it may with its control of the courts prevent Mrs. Ferguson from serving her term. The sad part of it is that her opponent's cry that Jim Ferguson will be the real governor is true. Mrs. Ferguson did not make a speech during the campaign, and admitted she did not know how.

The Klan had a death grip on several States outside of the South, and will have a powerful voice at Washington for the next four years. I suggest that you withdraw that funeral oration in view of the fact that the reported demise was considerably exaggerated.

Tulsa, Oklahoma, November 5 CLARENCE R. LONG

A Word of Approval

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation is about the only thing "that comes regularly" that I have time to read. Of all of it, Ludwig Lewisohn's reviews meant most to me. I confess that I genuinely regretted his departure.

But the splendid theater comment in this week's issue not only gets my resubscription but my genuine enthusiasm.

New York, September 19 PHILIP MOELLER

Help Wanted

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am just naturally a single taxer—was one even as a boy. So I sat me down some time ago, and wrote a MS. Whatever else it may be, it is original; for although the single-tax doctrine appears in works of economic science, it has never, so far as I know, appeared in fiction, save in one instance—"From Earth's Center," which I have never chanced to read somehow.

I sent the thing to the publishers—and of course it was returned. I expected it. I peddled my wares up the wrong street. So I set out to find where, if any, were any publishers who might recognize the single tax. I went over to the Post Dispatch in St. Louis. Somehow I never got past the boy at the outer desk. I carried on quite a little confab, through him, with some near-god inside the splendid offices. Finally, in some despair, I asked him where the single-tax headquarters were. He came back, with the answer written on a slip of paper: "Over at the City Hall." With some misgiving I went there. I asked a great splendid fellow in uniform where, etc. He answered: "Single tax? Oh, yes—third floor." Thank goodness, I thought. But alas! My man turned to another near by and said: "That's right, ain't it, Fred? Pay your single tax on the third floor, don't you? This guy wants to pay his single tax!" Then to me: "Better get married, boy! They tax a man for anything, nowadays!"

I held up a desperate hand. "It's a political party, boys!" I wailed. "The Post told me its headquarters were over here!"

"The Post?" he answered. "Huh! Them Jews'll tell you anything! An' anyhow there's so many o' them political parties these days a man can't keep track of 'em!"

I fled. Home, I wrote the Post a letter—and got no answer. Just as helpless as a babe I was and am, I guess.

So this letter to you. Will you be kind enough and intelligent enough to tell me a little something of the Single Tax Party? Where is it, and who is it? Who's who in it? Where would you advise sending such a MS as mine—outside of the furnace? There is a place in this world for anything, I'm sure —even a single-tax MS.

East St. Louis, Illinois, October 30 ED. A. CARSEY

The Courage of Blasco Ibánez

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your issue of October 29 carried a rather bad-humored paragraph on the subject of Mr. Blasco Ibáñez's attack on the King of Spain. In pointing your query as to whether the author of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" had not postponed his present "campaign" to a time when "heterodoxy is safer" you apparently failed to recall a number of important points in the biography of the Valencian novelist. During his editorship of El Pueblo, a republican newspaper of his native town, Mr. Blasco Ibáñez went to prison some twenty times. For his pronouncements on the Spanish-Cuban-American War he received a sentence of six years. Several years of his youth he spent in exile in France; and the first of the three fortunes he made in the course of an adventurous life was devoted almost entirely to the propagation and defense of what may be accurately called the "American idea" of democratic federalism. One need but recall the case of Ferrer to reflect that political agitation in Spain has never been the academic thing it often is in more evolved democracies.

With Mr. Blasco Ibáñez as with other public men many faults may doubtless be found; but, frankly, cowardice is not one of them; and I am sure you will be willing to strike that portion of your paragraph from the record. If you decide also to retract the rest as well, there will be no great harm that I can see, since your note throws no accurate light on the value or motivation of Mr. Blasco Ibáñez's present attitude toward the king of his country.

New York, November 5 ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

Contributors to This Issue

GERTRUDE MATHEWS SHELBY attended the hearings of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency last winter when it was inquiring into the Federal Farm Loan Board. She went solely as a listener because of her interest in cooperative banking, but after a few questions so convinced the committee of her knowledge of the subject that she was allowed to act virtually as an examining counsel.

HOWARD A. LAMB is a newspaperman who spent five years as correspondent on the Mexican border for the El Paso Times, the Douglas Daily International, and the Associated Press. He covered several military campaigns and himself participated in certain battles.

LEONORA SPEYER is the author of "A Canopic Jar," a volume of verse.

FRANCES BRADLEY is a physician who for many years engaged in field work for the Federal Children's Bureau.

LOUISE BOGAN is the author of "Body of This Death."

A. DONALD DOUGLAS is establishing a reputation as novelist and critic.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN is a practicing architect in New York and the author of "The Enjoyment of Architecture."

ARTHUR RUHL is a noted newspaper correspondent and the author of several volumes on European affairs.

Books and Plays

First Glance

THE latest section of the monumental and now almost completed "New English Dictionary" (Oxford: 10 shillings) to arrive in America covers rather unpromising ground, since in going from "unforeseeing" to "unright" it must spend five-sixths of its space on words beginning with the prefix un-. Yet even within this province it finds an opportunity to suggest the particular kind of commentary upon human behavior for which, as the one really comprehensive survey of the language in existence, it is so famous. Under the word "unicorn," for instance, the whole history of belief and disbelief in that fine animal is silently, remorselessly written. After sentences from old and middle and early modern English which indicate a simple and healthy faith comes this wavering statement of 1657: "A very fierce and strong creature it is; and nowadays very rare, but anciently more common." Here is the beginning of the end, for in the next century Dr. Johnson refers to "that Beast so much talked of and so little known"; and in 1801 the Monthly Review contained an article On the Probability of the Existence of an Unicorn. Thus have human travel and the science of natural history relieved the mind of a pleasant superstition.

Now that geography and history have banished so effectively the grosser superstitions of distant place and distant time, it might very easily occur to someone that the world so lost was worth preserving; and indeed this has occurred to Clark B. Firestone, who in a bulky volume, "The Coasts of Illusion" (Harper: $4), endeavors to read the history of knowledge backward, laboring to remember rather than forget "the things that were not so." His extraordinary purpose is to recall from chambers of the racial mind now all but closed that menagerie of animals, that mapful of coasts and mountains, that kingdom of preternatural men and women which we no longer are able to believe in. They once were facts, and herein lies their peculiar interest for Mr. Firestone; he is indifferent to mythologies on the one hand and to utopias on the other, since these have been conscious creations of the soul and the brain. He would sum up what formerly was science, he would draw what once would have been accepted as a map of the known earth. It is a beautiful ambition, one which has only to be announced to make the mind leap. Yet a scrupulous mind would hesitate after a little thought and eventually despair. A history of human error, even if only on its more picturesque and harmless sides, is grotesquely impossible. Where to begin, for instance? Will any distinction between myth and "fact" actually work? And where to end? What of the laws of celestial mechanics, now so ably doubted? Or what of certain evolutionary dogmas now no longer sworn to?

The only thing left for Mr. Firestone was to compile a reference book to the illusions which for one reason or another interested him, and that is what he has done. With no pretensions to scholarship, although his amateur knowledge is immense, he has ransacked the literature of travel and anthropology and popular science. He knows not only the obvious sources—Herodotus, Lucian, Pliny, Marco Polo, Mandeville, Hakluyt, Purchas, Sir Thomas Browne, "The Golden Bough," and "Primitive Culture"—but hundreds of obscure studies and stories; his feast is rich if somewhat irregularly served. At any rate, here for the reader's delight are tons of information about unicorns, griffins, harpies, rocs, and cockatrices; about noseless, headless, one-eyed, and dog-headed people; about satyrs, pigmies, Amazons, troglodytes, and gnomes; about Arcadia, Bohemia, Prester John's kingdom, the lotus-land, and the land of Gog and Magog; about Atlantis, Elysium, and Lyonesse; about El Dorado, the Spice Islands, and the Fountain of Youth; and about the Sargasso Sea. Here, I am almost driven to say, is the other and better side of the moon.

MARK VAN DOREN

Religious Insight and Religious Nonsense

Personal Religion and the Life of Devotion. By W. R. Inge. Longmans, Green and Company. $1.

The Friendship of God. By A. Maude Royden. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

THE danger of know-nothing fundamentalism lies not in its grotesque and vulgar bigotry as such. Though the carriers of this spiritual infection are causing fleeting epidemics in backward colleges and provoking dervish orgies in the darker church belts, on the whole the modern environment is sufficiently immune to the virus. The real danger of Pharisaism invariably lies in the pseudo-enlightened Sadducee counter-reformations it arouses. The supercultivated fundamentalism of Philo Judaeus in the first century stirred up an equally sophisticated modernism; while the cheap Chautauqua fundamentalism of the Bryans can excite but the equally naive "liberalism" of the Reverend van Dykes. "The Sadducees were the hypocrites of the Jewish world, just as the Epicureans were the hypocrites of the Greek world"—and just as the "modernists" are the hypocrites of the contemporary Christian world, only that they lack the savoir-faire to be hypocritical without first fooling themselves.

The intrinsic falsity of the liberal church lies in its seeming conformity with the temper of the age. Prestige in our era undoubtedly goes with rationalism and the scientific method. Accordingly the liberal church deifies Evolution in nature and society. It glibly jumbles religious insight with social ethics. It pretends to preach the higher criticism by interpreting the sacred writings as esoteric fables. And in general it alleges the growing affinity of science and religion. All this is the sheerest nonsense. It is nonsense from the point of view of modern science generally, whose attitude is no less alien to the homiletics of the Reverend Mr. Fosdick than to those of Bishop Manning, simply because the category of compromise is as impertinent to the scientific method as the category of conversion. It is nonsense from the point of view of modern psychology, within whose special purview the objective study of religious emotion falls, for it increasingly recognizes religious behavior in the mystical, more or less fetishist and clairvoyant attitude of orthodoxy. It is nonsense from the point of view of modern exegesis, which does not see in the holy scribes poetic fabulists but literal-minded medicine men, emotional and Draconic spokesmen of deeply imbedded myths and mores, whose rise and fall are of ethnologic interest. And, most important of all, it is nonsense worse confounded from the point of view of modern liberalism.

For liberalism is not, as modernism assumes, the generic opposite of bigotry. Tolerance is that. Liberalism is specifically the informed, courageous, and enlightened attitude in social politics, and only in social politics. It is as irrelevant to religious revelation as it is to the theory of numbers or to an appreciation of the Fifth Symphony. There is no more sense in liberalizing the Immaculate Conception of Jesus than there would be in liberalizing the noncontroversial immaculate conception of Minerva. Religious cosmology cannot be modernized into paleontology. Religious eschatology is forever incompatible with the ineluctable agnosticism of the scientific outlook. Moreover, religious experience is categorically different from social ethics, no matter at how many points they may touch each other to mutual benefit or harm, unless we stretch words beyond their most elastic connotations. For the religious ineffabilities are, in the words of Dean Inge, "not of this world." Indeed "the truth is"—he quotes approvingly a French writer—"that there always has been a conflict between mysticism (which to him is essential to religious consciousness) and politics (which he defines in the Aristotelian sense of community organization)."

I know no religious writer who has refuted with so much Christian humanism and learned sagacity the religious claims of both the reactionary church politicians and the exhibitioners of modernism. Indeed it is his school of thought which was able to lay to some degree the unseemly quarrel in the Church of England a good quarter of a century ago. His little book on personal religion is not a systematic treatise. For that the reader may look into his "Outspoken Essays." This booklet is merely a collection of stray reflections on religious beatitudes. But only a vast cultural investment could be responsible for so many sage glimpses of truth. And all these flashes converge on one central definition: religion is a mystic universe; it is a dream world of strength and beauty and exalting recreation from whose threshold the believer returns spiritually invigorated for a more meaningful and moral mastery of "this world," which otherwise would be quite as mean, empty, brief, and brutal as it seems. Our momentary pleasures cease with gratification; only religion can throb them into the "joy which is the triumph of life"; "God punishes the useless by giving them pleasure without joy." Our sorrows are but petty worries unless religion purges them with the sense of tragedy, whose touch alone can fraternize mankind. Our little hopes are either tricks "of looking at the bright side of things" or mere selfish wishes unless religion lifts them into the serenity of Faith. In short, for Dean Inge "it is otherworldliness which alone can transform this world."

With multiplying thousands I fail to follow the Dean of St. Paul's. I find a more vital option in the Hellenic search for beauty in each moment—and let it go at that; in Bertrand Russell's freeman's worship of man's tragic comradeship with truth—and let it go at that; in Axel Heyst's noble and agnostic resignation to his inner decency, which is Conrad's notion of all there is to moral victory. To bind goodness, truth, and beauty into one grand teleological religious urge seems to me to detract from their intrinsic values. To Dr. Inge they have no meaning but as a trinitarian mandate under a personal Godhead, which mystically consecrates them for our inner guidance and—human nature being what it is—for some outer forms of worship. That is religion, he says. It is. And—it seems to go against the Zeitgeist. But one must respect the author for the emotional and intellectual sincerity with which he has so exquisitely cultivated his "kingdom of faith . . . which is not of this world."

Though the more prancing kind of modernism has been tired out in England since the nineties, for sheer religious demagoguery—intellectually unkempt, sham-erudite, and quack-courageous—we have produced nothing to beat Miss Royden's "Friendship of God." Our Fifth Avenue religious illuminati use at least good-looking English and do not court illogic to absurdity. The lady preacher takes us into her divine chumminess as follows: "The revelation of natural law was needed to make us understand, even dimly, the sublime constancy of spiritual law. We have that revelation now and it has brought us nearer to our high amazing destiny—to be the friends of God." We might dismiss this meaningless outburst as pure piffle if modern psychology did not warn us that piffle has a meaning all its own. And indeed the modernist defense-mechanism could not have been caricatured with greater felicity than it is here. Miss Royden's table of contents is a perfect program for her sort of show: Spiritual Sight ("I believe that our Lord had the most scientific spirit that ever lived"); The Laws of Life (science and religious revelation are the same); What is a Christian? ("to be a Christian is to be like Christ"—nothing less); Some Forms of Worship (worship is "love and praise and wonder that goes out to things that are worshipful, wonderful, and lovely"). And so on and on for 138 pages without a single disciplined idea, even by accident. It would be pitiful did not pity turn to irritation when Miss Royden claims in Charles Darwin "a modern prophet" of her own views. She admits that, in spite of his almost abnormal shrinking from religious controversies, he was forced to put himself down as an "agnostic . . . who did not know whether there was a God." But she does not permit his memory to rest in peace. From his very agnosticism she deduces by a triumphant syllogism which would have dizzied a medieval monk his profound religiosity—his belief in the divinity of Christ. Apparently nothing is sacred to the open-minded.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Galsworthy's World

The White Monkey. By John Galsworthy. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

THE generations of the years pass before Mr. Galsworthy's eyes like a dream remote and twilit in the pathos of receding distance. Like one of his own Forsytes he sits under a blanket on a chair giving vision of green lawns and slant autumnal sun and the world dying. He would have us believe that all old people sit brooding to conjure up the past in a haze of regretful memory wherein first love was indeed sweet with all regret and young men of a sterner age looked upon the roast beef when it was red. His young men and women lack body. It is only the older characters who possess sinew and root, and these only in remembrance of wine past. Even when Mr. Galsworthy tries to be most scrupulous toward the unrest of what he thinks is the younger generation, he cannot really esteem the young. He can care only for the youth of his own youth. In his exquisite story The Apple Tree he is most beautifully himself, the historian not of old age and not of youth but of an adolescence which has never outgrown the recollection of desire, caught into a new harsh world it cannot understand except in pain, the dupe of a fine pure sensibility to what cannot return and never in its own time met true fulfilment. Both to the Forsytes and to Mr. Galsworthy himself, ah! death is life indeed, the days that are no more!

When he writes of a young man he most clearly likes Mr. Galsworthy names his tale The Apple Tree or The Dark Flower, both fragrant in a bloom that is dying, dying, dying. When he writes of a generation he cannot like he names his tale The White Monkey. For him, even when he is most sincerely sorry for the bad world, it is a generation resembling a fantastic biped which has sucked the fruit and tasted only the rind. At the last he can give Soames Forsyte his due and make him the chief figure of his belated esteem. His young man, Michael Mont, is simply the fine and pure young man, the Galsworthy young man. His heroine, Fleur Forsyte, who has married Michael, like all his heroines has never put on flesh even when she is said to be tempted by the flesh of the poet, Wilfrid Desert. For the rest Mr. Galsworthy includes at length a cockney man and his girl wife, both pigeons transfixed by the tearing hawks of the modern world, invented indeed to show that world how much Mr. Galsworthy prefers two souls, tender and true, to the barren discords of modern art. In losing his money through too honest a business conscience Soames Forsyte is washed pure from his sins. Even in defeat he is more admirable than the young people who practice the disintegration of the technique of painting and poetry.

No one else in the world could have written the story of Victorine and Tony Bicket and not fallen into the ultimate mire of sentimentalism. Tony packs books in the publishing house of Michael's father. His girl wife is stricken with pneumonia. Tony steals books, sells them, and pays the doctor's bills. He is discovered and fired from his job, for all Michael's efforts to retain him in some capacity. He buys balloons and sells them on street corners. Victorine recovers. Acting on Michael's recommendations, she poses as a model, at last posing in the altogether but remaining immaculate. Tony learns the awful truth, but believes her protestations of innocence. With the money earned they set out for Australia, out of it all. They would do just that very thing! A good-hearted cockney pathetically selling balloons! Mr. Galsworthy alone would go to such extremes and give them the fine flavor of his pity. Denry the Audacious might have sold balloons, but he would have won a fortune. Kipps might have sold balloons, not burst by pity but blown up to a full humor. Mr. Galsworthy suffers balloons, sadly.

Fleur is supposed to represent the blind alley of the younger generation. She comes to the brink but does not fall into the gulf of darkness. At the propitious moment Wilfrid refrains, yields up the manuscript of his new poems, and takes the next train for Arabia. Fleur has not married for love (you will remember young Jolyon), and she is for a time caught into every gusty swirl of new art and new life. At the end she finds she is going to have a baby, she has the baby, and everything is quite all right. Mr. Galsworthy even has her practice Couéism —all related without the ghost of a smile. In Soames's and Michael's happiness Mr. Galsworthy is himself most happy. All the discords have been resolved into an assuaging harmony (quite obviously in C major) and the white monkey by a simple process of magic has been transformed into the child of the ages.

No one would ask Mr. Galsworthy to be other than himself alone in the rare fine world he has builded from dreams of regret and aching lost beauty and a pity that is itself the echo of its own sorrow. It is a world, and it is most complete and final in the Forsyte Saga, where you can dwell or not just as you choose. It is not copied from this world, but imagined by Mr. Galsworthy's own art. Perhaps it offers less rich substance than the worlds of other artists, each one spinning like a universe by the laws of its own being. Mr. Galsworthy cannot give you roast beef, but the memory of roast beef. He cannot give you love, but the remembered loss of love. He cannot give you women, but dreams of fair women. He is limited by his own fineness and his own pain at the harsh discords of what he thinks is the modern world. He can mistake the advertised temperaments of small mean literary cliques for the authentic voice of God, and so dismiss all modern art. Yet he can give us something no one has ever before given. He can give us the world himself has created.

A. Donald Douglas

Engineering or Architecture?

Sticks and Stones. By Lewis Mumford. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

IT is a stimulating adventure to open a book on American architecture and find neither those sycophantic appreciations, beautifully illustrated, which form so important a part of the current periodical literature of the subject, nor, on the other hand, those equally one-sided, bitterly pessimistic attacks on all modern work which characterize another type of criticism. For Mr. Mumford has seen deeply into architecture; careful historical study has given him an authoritative background; he has realized that behind that stream of form which makes the "style" of any place or date there is a reason; he has asked the why of form in American architecture. The answer is inevitable; it is the quality of the civilization that gave it birth. Architecture can exist only as an expression of civilization; in any complete understanding of one a knowledge of the other is implicit. Mr. Mumford has called his book "Sticks and Stones." There is a gentle sarcasm in the title itself, for to him architecture is rather of the spirit; it is the soul of a people's life exemplified.

The book is built upon a careful historical examination of the parallel development of American architecture and American culture. This historical analysis is an important and pioneer piece of work, expressed with a concise vividness. Time and again, in one telling phrase, the entire picture of an epoch is evoked, and the architectural forms of that epoch are at once seen in their inevitability. For instance, in talking of the development of land-speculation as a result of pioneering, Mr. Mumford says: "If the older cities of the seaboard were limited in their attempts to become metropolises by the fact that their downtown sections were originally laid out for villages, the villages of the Middle West labored under just the opposite handicap; they had frequently acquired the framework of a metropolis before they had passed out of the state of a village." Thus one sentence sums up and makes vivid the pioneering philosophy behind all the unimaginative and arrogant stupidity that underlies a thousand down-at-heel and jerry-built towns.

The chapters on The Diaspora of the Pioneer and The Defeat of Romanticism vividly recreate almost forgotten periods with a perfect and biting equanimity. They are more candid and level-headed than the first chapter, The Medieval Tradition, where the cool clarity of insight is blurred—like a mirror breathed upon—by the fact that in the Puritan village of the seventeenth century Mr. Mumford has found his long-sought Utopia; in the presence of one's divinity one's eyes are always veiled. But in the consideration of modern architecture the clarity is complete, and the examination of the effect of industrialism on architecture and on life is entirely convincing, once Mr. Mumford's implied definition of architecture is accepted.

For architecture has a double meaning. On the one hand it is the entire corpus of that portion of human environment which is man-built; on the other, it includes only those buildings in which the effort to build beautifully—that is, the creative ideal—has been dominant. The only flaws to be picked in Mr. Mumford's criticism lie in his occasional confusion of the two definitions, for his sociological sympathies lead him to emphasize the totality of building as an important human expression, and his admiration of certain past periods leads him to consider great works of art in those periods as sociologically inevitable, while the great beauty of much modern work is considered either an "accidental result" or "outside the purlieus of our commercial system." This is contradictory; one hazards, with due humility, the opinion that the Lincoln Memorial, by the late Henry Bacon, or the Nebraska State Capitol, by the late Bertram Goodhue, or "the prosperous country homes and college buildings and churches and municipal institutions" in which "a tradition of good building and tactful design has been established" are quite as close to the spirit of this age as the cathedrals of thirteenth-century France are to that, and the taste that animates the styles—academic or secessionistic—of today quite as inevitable as that differing taste which set the chimères on Notre Dame grinning over the Paris housetops. The "style" is an accident, a mere vocabulary; wherever true beauty has entered, now or generations ago, it is because the creative spirit has brooded over the creation, which is raised at once to a new plane; the true art of architecture is timeless and without bounds of geography or dates.

Once this distinction is grasped, and "Sticks and Stones" seen as a history and criticism not of architecture as an art but of architecture as the totality of building, its analyses and conclusions become inescapable. The modern problem is not bad architectural art but the too frequent lack of architure itself; engineering seems to the modern so much more "efficient." Where else than in this book has the function and the misuse of the engineer in modern life been so succinctly set forth? Where else the inevitable ugliness of the results of the uncurbed realtor? Where else is the ultimately destructive character of current industrialism and business initiative so vividly presented? Or the futility of an almost endless and unplanned city growth? For the ugliness, incoherence, monotony, stupidity of much modern building, the wrecked countrysides, the dreary city fringes, the foul slums do not grow of themselves but are the terrible children of a civilization whose aim is gain got with the ruthlessness of the pioneer and the efficiency of the engineer. Beauty cannot come down to walk with the people under such a civilization. So the examination of the history of building in America leads surely to the ruthless and forceful criticism of the wastefulness and the underlying inhumanity of the rampant industrialism of our own time. By all odds "Sticks and Stones" is the most stimulating book on architecture in many a long day.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN

Regular Journalism

Those Europeans. By Sisley Huddleston. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

MR. HUDDLESTON'S sketches of twenty more or less well-known Europeans are the sort of thing which a foreign correspondent, when the exigencies of news permit or by way of showing his good intentions, sends home to his Sunday paper. In Europe, where readers are more accustomed to international gossip, they might go on week-days as well.

They are not news, although phrases like "now" and "last year" frequently appear and obviously Mr. Huddleston is never very far from his last edition; not good straight reporting; still less history or literature; but that crisp, fluent, entirely superficial and generally useless sort of "tosh" which springs from typewriters on which Reparations, Mustapha Kemal, the Polish Corridor, Ramsay MacDonald, the Twilight of Europe, Mussolini, or whatever else happens to make the front page is always good for a column and a half—until something else makes the front page and these are as if they had never been. Mr. Huddleston polishes off Lloyd George, Clemenceau, Masaryk, Primo de Rivera, Anatole France, D'Annunzio, Sir John Bradbury, Stresemann, General Sikorski, and the Pope among his twenty, and he hops from London to Anatolia, from Morocco to the Rhineland, without saying anything of the slightest importance about any of them. Nothing, that is, unless one were looking for a sort of Who's Who of personalities of the moment, so that before going out to dinner one might be tipped off, so to speak, as to who Dr. Dorten or Sir William Goode, for example, might be. The least perfunctory of the portraits, perhaps, is that of Clemenceau. Mr. Huddleston contributes nothing that is not known already by everybody who has met the Tiger, but he does give a hint of the personality of that extraordinary old man—"perhaps the greatest man our generation has produced," Mr. Huddleston thinks. The chapter labeled Lord Cecil, on the other hand, is merely a few trite paragraphs on the League with practically nothing about its distinguished advocate.

Subtlety of characterization is not one of Mr. Huddleston's strong points. This man is "the right man in the right place," that one "head and shoulders above," and so on. Anatole France, whose characteristic mood is compared to that of Omar Khayyam in the "Remold it nearer to our Heart's Desire" quatrain, "may be described as the highest flower of culture yet produced, the topmost peak of human intelligence." As for more or less controversial questions, "whether you agree that . . . or, on the other hand, that . . . certainly it must be admitted" . . . and, in any case, "much will depend on the course of events." While political Spain "hardly counts for much . . . there can be little doubt that, as Mr. Valery Larbaud remarks, 'Spain is perhaps the foremost intellectual nation of our time.'" By way of supporting his "there can be no doubt that perhaps," Mr. Huddleston presents the following bit of illuminating criticism: "At the head of the writers, philosophers, artists is Miguel de Unamuno, who may be taken to be the antithesis of Primo de Rivera. In literature, Benito Pérez Galdós was followed by Palacio Valdés; Vicente Blasco Ibáñez can not be omitted, nor can Pio Baroja. Among the younger men is the extremely original Ramon Gomez de la Serna. In painting, Picasso has influenced the whole of European art. In music one finds such names as those of Albeniez, Granados, and Manuel de Falla."

The Fascisti wear black shirts, it seems, and "while there is much that appears like play-acting in Fascism, there is also a sincere purpose, a sincere belief . . ." Morocco used to be a savage sort of place, but now that the French have had a chance at it "there exist side by side with rush huts great tourist hotels of the most modern kind, splendid villas, and all the appurtenances of civilization as it is known in the big cities of the world. . . ."

Either author or compositor is responsible for some very curious words and phrases. Among them is a French quotation with two English "at's" in it, while the English version of enfant de volupté is "infant of volupty"!

Mr. Huddleston is a veteran journalist, and undoubtedly, at his daily task, a very capable one. We hope that he is one of the "best" journalists, for he tells us on page 23 that while "politicians are often the narrowest of men, the best journalist is the broadest of men." Breadth in the sense of extension, of getting about to many people and places, he shows in his book. Unhappily he seems to possess no other dimension.

ARTHUR RUHL

Books in Brief

The Common Sense of Music. By Sigmund Spaeth. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Dr. Spaeth has achieved two impossibilities: he has written a low-brow textbook, and he has covered—thinly—the subject. In 375 pages he disposes of the classification of compositions and styles; thematic material; jazz, its origin, value, and technique; the theory of rhythm; intervals and simple harmony; the cycle of keys; the form of songs, sonatas, etc.; descriptions and drawings of orchestral instruments; instructions for "natural pianists," "close harmony artists," and musical parlor tricks of various kinds; a chapter on interpretation; a chapter on the literature; a glossary that contrives to be a miniature Grove's Dictionary—all in words of one syllable or less, sometimes oversimplified, but seldom condescending. Who can resist even a hard subject like the organ, for instance, when he is introduced to it like this? "If you watch an organist at work, you may think he is playing dominoes, or running a switch-board, for he is constantly puling or turning over certain 'stops' and oblongs, inscribed like a Mah Jongg set." Or object to reading a press-agent for Bach as long as he fills his copy with anecdotes and puns? The copious illustrations mix "Boolah," "Three O'Clock in the Morning," and "Rock of Ages" casually enough with Verdi, Brahms, and Chopsticks; and identify "How Dry I Am" unmistakably with "Lead Kindly Light." This goes rather far, however, in the chapter of melodies arranged according to their beginning notes. It is too much like classifying all poems, plays, and novels by the first words of their first lines. But it does suggest the starting-point for a colossal job which some university class must undertake some day—an index of musical themes. Dr. Spaeth's book will not lack the enormous sale he planned for it among women's clubs and public schools. If he is very lucky he will succeed in persuading his thousands of readers to listen to the music first and the player second, and to like what they like instead of what they ought to like.

Moss from a Rolling Stone. By E. A. Brayley Hodgetts. E. P. Dutton & Company. $3.50.

This particular stone has rolled through Germany, Russia, England, America, Africa, and the Near East, and is still budging. But it has operated on the principle more of the snowball than of the proverbial boulder, for it has gathered unto itself a sparkling wealth of anecdote and information. The author's own wide experience has been eked out by a seemingly inexhaustible store of family tradition. Thus Mr. Hodgetts is able to command a broad scope in time as well as in space. Russia under Alexander II, Alexander III, and Nicholas II, France under the Empire and under the Republic, Germany under Bismarck and Wilhelm II, Armenia, and Africa are as familiar to his pen as are the quaint celebrities of his London club. And his pen is always the crisp, facile tool of the "born journalist" Pulitzer proclaimed him to be. The result is a combination of "Barnum" and "The Education of Henry Adams": first-rate entertainment mingled with material of distinct historical value.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

The Utopia of Gallants

NONE of the offerings of a busy week so excited the imagination of the present writer as the audacious attempt made by the group at the Cherry Lane Theater to revive upon their tiny stage "The Way of the World," one of the greatest and yet one of the most remote of English comedies. No other drama requires of both actors and audience so delicate a perception of an artificial style as the drama of the Restoration, and no other Restoration play is quite as difficult as this one. The bitter strength of Wycherley would defy any performance to conceal its effectiveness, and the boisterous fun of Farquhar needs only high spirits to set it off, but to undertake Congreve's masterpiece—that is boldness indeed. Even the actors of his own day, disciplined for two generations in the tradition of which it is the final flower, could not quite reach the perfection of impudent grace which it demands, and the play, though perfect enough to sustain for its author a continuous fame through the twenty unproductive years which followed its writing, hardly succeeded upon the stage.

For forty years before it was written the English theater had been, as it never was before or since, the exclusive possession of an idle aristocracy, and the genius of its dramatic writers was devoted to no other task than that of mirroring as best it could the riotous carnival into which the return of the Merry Monarch had plunged his court. John Dryden and Aphra Behn

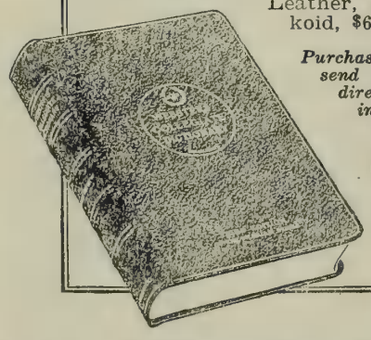
For Christmas—
The Treasured Gift

For a gift of permanent value; a tribute to the good taste of the one who gives and the one who receives, Webster's Collegiate Dictionary is ideal. It is a gift to delight anyone who reads, writes, or studies, for it is a constant source of the information that is needed most frequently. This Christmas give the handsome Bible Paper edition of

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

The Best Abridged Dictionary
It Is Based upon Webster's New International

A gift of lasting, everyday value with its vocabulary of 106,000 words—its dictionary of Biography — its Gazetteer department — its guide to rules of punctuation, use of capitals, abbreviations, etc.—its foreign words and phrases—its wealth of other information. A handsome book with 1700 illustrations. 1256 pages; printed on Bible Paper. Full limp Leather, $7.50; flexible Fabrikoid, $6.00; art Canvas, $5.



Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us; or write for information and sample pages.

G. & C. MERRIAM COMPANY
52 Broadway
Springfield, Mass.

PAUL LAFARGUE'S Social and Philosophical Studies, tenth edition just ready, consists of a series of keenly critical studies of the causes of belief in God and in such abstract ideas as justice and goodness. The author points out that in capitalist countries the "good" man is the man with the "goods"—that there seems to be a necessary connection between virtue and property. Cloth, 60c postpaid; also at same price the author's later book, The Origin and Evolution of the Idea of the Soul. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, CHICAGO

MT. AIRY
(Near Harmon-on-Hudson)
A colony for liberals and radicals. 54 Minutes from Grand Central Station; frequent expresses. Property a mile from Croton Lake, two miles from station, three miles to Croton Beach. 1-4 acre of high, dry and well wooded land (equal to 4 city lots of 25 x 100 ft. each) $200 to $400. Cash or terms. Now is the time to buy in groups and be with friends. Address Harry Kelly, No. 70 Fifth Ave., Room 411, for circular. Office hours 2:30 to 6 P. M. daily except Saturday. Saturday 11:00 to 1:30 P. M.

The Fifth Avenue Restaurant

EXCLUSIVELY A LUNCHEON AND EVENING BANQUET RESORT ON THE GROUND FLOOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING, 200 FIFTH AVENUE TEL. GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907 INCL

THEODORE KEMM, Proprietor

flattered the grossness of its taste, William Wycherley mercilessly exposed their vices while he seemed to pander to them, but in William Congreve the age found a man who could turn its life into a conventional pattern, extract the quintessence of its gaiety, and present upon the stage a gallants' Utopia, purged of the ugliness and cruelty which are the necessary result of an attempt like that which the people of his time made to realize it upon earth but perfect in the world of pure imagination.

Like most of his contemporaries, Congreve had no faith in man or woman. When he says in one of the songs which he scatters through his plays:

> He alone won't betray in whom none will confide
> And the nymph may be chaste that has never been tried he meant what he said. But if he judged from the world which he saw about him that virtue did not exist, he still believed in grace and he created an artificial world in which grace alone counted. He made no attempt to hide the fact that the persons of his comedy were utterly cold and utterly selfish; he even accepted the Restoration tradition that obscenity alone was the proper material for wit; but he gave to both his people and his epigrams a polish so exquisite that perversity of subject is lost in perfection of manner and exquisite gestures of mind and body alone remain. In real life men flirt and plot in order that they may obtain their desires, and thus mind is the servant of body, but in Congreve the situation is reversed; his people have bodies and bodily desires only that they may give occasion for the wit and intrigue which for them alone exists. No one (I would swear to it) in all his plays really cares to bring the mistress he is courting or the wife he is seducing bodily to bed; for no one of them has any existence save when he is sparkling and flashing in the public eye. Restoration love was a game not infrequently played with heartless brutality, but Congreve purified it, not by endowing it with either nobility or kindness, but by transferring it wholly to the realm of the mind and setting it to work upon fantastic creatures without bodies to be soiled or hearts to be wounded.

Doubtless if one is to appreciate to any great extent the performance at Cherry Lane one needs to bring a good deal with him. The best production in the world could not make the delights of the play comprehensible to one who knew nothing of the long tradition which it perfects. The production at the Cherry Lane is not the best in the world, but it is good enough and honest enough to make it emphatically worth the while of any person with the slightest taste for one of the most exquisite creations of the past to seize the opportunity, not often afforded, of seeing Mirabell and Millamant step upon an actual stage. Fortunately Miss Bryan, who is intrusted with the impersonation of the latter character, is extremely good and comes near to accomplishing the superhuman task of bodying forth the character who is the greatest triumph of this play as the play is the the greatest triumph of the tradition it represents. What Beatrice is to the age of Elizabeth Millamant is to the Restoration—the highest embodiment of the charm of feminine perversity. To Miss Bryan and to Mr. Rainey, who plays opposite her, should go no little credit for the skill with which they carry out the bargaining scene—for that scene stands at the very summit of English comedy.

The remainder of the week's offerings at the various theaters were diverse and not without interest. At the Princess Theater was produced "The Steam Roller," an amusing but by no means perfect satire on the managing woman, admirably acted by Janet Beecher; at the Frazee a spectacular melodrama called "Shipwrecked," and at the National "Silence," an ingenious crook-play; while at the Martin Beck "Madame Pompadour," a gorgeous musical comedy which delights the eye and at least mildly entertains the ear, began its career. Moreover, M. Gemier and his Odéon Company presented a series of plays of somewhat unequal merit but all admirably acted in a finished, realistic manner, thus proving what several seasons of American audiences have been led to doubt—that France can still produce excellent actors.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATRE

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

GEORGE BACKER Presents
JANET BEECHER AND BRUCE McRAE in LAURENCE EYRE'S NEW COMEDY WITH
"THE STEAM ROLLER"
OLIVE THAIS WYNDHAM MAGRANE ERNEST CATHERINE COSSART PROCTOR
PRINCESS Theatre, 39th St., East of Broadway. Eves. 8:30. Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:30.

DEBATES LECTURES

DARROW NEARING DEBATE
IS THE HUMAN RACE WORTH WORKING FOR?
Sunday, November 30, 2:30 p. m., Town Hall, 113 W. 43rd St.
Tickets $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00 at Box Office and Rand School, 7 East 15th St.

DEBATE on PROHIBITION!
CLARENCE DARROW (Against) versus REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES (For)
Chairman, Hon. Royal S. Copeland
Sunday, December 14, 3 P. M.
Manhattan Opera House, 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.
Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75. Box Seats $3.30.
On sale at the office of or direct by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. (Longacre 10434-4447)
N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate should send us their names.

HARRY ALLEN OVERSTREET, A.B., B.Sc.
Professor of Philosophy, College City of New York.
"Philosophy in Present Day Life"
COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
SIX LECTURES
Thursday Evenings, Dec. 11, 18, Jan. 8, 15, 22, 29, at 8:15
Course Ticket, $3.50, can be secured at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue. Single Admission, 85 cents.

Saturday Afternoon Camaraderie
3:30 to 5:30 p. m.
Nov. 29 Savel Zimand "Gandhi"
Dec. 6 John Langdon-Davies "Can Science Save Society?"
Dec. 13 Jessica Smith "Three Years in Russia"
Dec. 20 Report of Delegates to Mexican Federation of Labor
Rand School Auditorium, 7 East 15th St.

International Relations Section

Shall We Commit Suicide?

By WINSTON S. CHURCHILL

SHORTLY before the opening of the recent British electoral campaign Winston Churchill, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, war-time Minister of Munitions and post-war Secretary of State for War and Secretary of State for Air, published in Nash's Pall Mall Magazine (London) for September 24, 1924, the following brilliant article. It is possible that participation in a Tory Ministry may somewhat modify his views on the League.

The story of the human race is war. Except for brief and precarious interludes, there has never been peace in the world; and before history began murderous strife was universal and unending. But up to the present time the means of destruction at the disposal of man have not kept pace with his ferocity. Reciprocal extermination was impossible in the Stone Age. One cannot do much with a clumsy club. Besides, men were so scarce and hid so well that they were hard to find. They fled so fast that they were hard to catch. Human legs could only cover a certain distance each day. With the best will in the world to destroy his species, each man was restricted to a very limited area of activity. It was impossible to make any effective progress on these lines. Meanwhile one had to live and hunt and sleep. So on the balance the life-forces kept a steady lead over the forces of death, and gradually tribes, villages, and governments were evolved.

The effort at destruction then entered upon a new phase. War became a collective enterprise. Roads were made which facilitated the movement of large numbers of men. Armies were organized. Many improvements in the apparatus of slaughter were devised. In particular the use of metal, and above all steel, for piercing and cutting human flesh opened out a promising field. Bows and arrows, slings, chariots, horses, and elephants lent a valuable assistance. But here again another set of checks began to operate. The governments were not sufficiently secure. The armies were liable to violent internal disagreements. It was extremely difficult to feed large numbers of men once they were concentrated, and consequently the efficiency of the efforts at destruction became fitful and was tremendously hampered by defective organization. Thus again there was a balance on the credit side of life. The world rolled forward, and human society entered upon a vaster and more complex age.

It was not until the dawn of the twentieth century of the Christian era that war really began to enter into its kingdom as the potential destroyer of the human race. The organization of mankind into great states and empires and the rise of nations to full collective consciousness enabled enterprises of slaughter to be planned and executed upon a scale with a perseverance never before imagined. All the noblest virtues of individuals were gathered together to strengthen the destructive capacity of the mass. Good finances, the resources of world-wide credit and trade, the accumulation of large capital reserves, made it possible to divert for considerable periods the energies of whole peoples to the task of devastation. Democratic institutions gave expression to the will power of millions. Education not only brought the course of the conflict within the comprehension of everyone, but rendered each person serviceable in a high degree for the purpose in hand. The press afforded a means of unification and of mutual encouragement; religion, having discreetly avoided conflict on the fundamental issues, offered its encouragements and consolations, through all its forms, impartially to all the combatants. Lastly, science unfolded her treasures and her secrets to the desperate demands of men and placed in their hands agencies and apparatus almost decisive in their character.

In consequence many novel features presented themselves. Instead of merely starving fortified towns whole nations were methodically subjected, or sought to be subjected, to the process of reduction by famine. The entire population in one capacity or another took part in the war; all were equally the object of attack. The air opened paths along which death and terror could be carried far behind the lines of the actual armies, to women, children, the aged, the sick, who in earlier struggles would perforce have been left untouched. Marvelous organization of railroads, steamships, and motor vehicles placed and maintained tens of millions of men continuously in action. Healing and surgery in their exquisite developments returned them again and again to the shambles. Nothing was wasted that could contribute to the process of waste. The last dying kick was brought into military utility.

But all that happened in the four years of the Great War was only a prelude to what was preparing for the fifth year. The campaign of the year 1919 would have witnessed an immense accession to the power of destruction. Had the Germans retained the morale to make good their retreat to the Rhine, they would have been assaulted in the summer of 1919 with forces and by methods incomparably more prodigious than any yet employed. Thousands of aeroplanes would have shattered their cities. Scores of thousands of cannon would have blasted their front. Arrangements were being made to carry simultaneously a quarter of a million men, together with all their requirements, continuously forward across country in mechanical vehicles moving ten or fifteen miles each day. Poison gases of incredible malignity, against which only a secret mask (which the Germans could not obtain in time) was proof, would have stifled all resistance and paralyzed all life on the hostile front subjected to attack. No doubt the Germans too had their plans. But the hour of wrath had passed. The signal of relief was given, and the horrors of 1919 remain buried in the archives of the great antagonists.

The war stopped as suddenly and as universally as it had begun. The world lifted its head, surveyed the scene of ruin, and victors and vanquished alike drew breath. In a hundred laboratories, in a thousand arsenals, factories, and bureaus men pulled themselves up with a jerk, turned from the task in which they had been absorbed. Their projects were put aside unfinished, unexecuted; but their knowledge was preserved; their data, calculations, and discoveries were hastily bundled together and docketed "for future reference" by the war offices in every country. The campaign of 1919 was never fought; but its ideas go marching along. In every army they are being explored, elaborated, refined under the surface of peace, and should war come again to the world it is not with the weapons and agencies prepared for 1919 that it will be fought but with developments and extensions of these which will be incomparably more formidable and fatal.

It is in these circumstances that we have entered upon that period of exhaustion which has been described as peace. It gives us at any rate an opportunity to consider the general situation. Certain somber facts emerge solid, inexorable, like the shapes of mountains from drifting mist. It is established that henceforward whole populations will take part in war, all doing their utmost, all subjected to the fury of the enemy. It is established that nations who believe their life is at stake will not be restrained from using any means to secure their existence. It is probable—nay, certain—that among the means which will next time be at their disposal will be agencies and processes of destruction wholesale, unlimited, and perhaps, once launched, uncontrollable.

Mankind has never been in this position before. Without having improved appreciably in virtue or enjoying wiser guidance, it has got into its hands for the first time the tools by which it can unfailingly accomplish its own extermination. That is the point in human destinies to which all the glories and toils

A NEW PRIZE FOR A DISTINGUISHED ECONOMIC STUDY

In the belief that the Theory of Wages

is of exceptional importance, and that constructive study of it should be stimulated, a Committee composed of

PROFESSOR J. LAURENCE LAUGHLIN, Chairman
PROFESSOR JOHN BATES CLARK — PROFESSOR EDWIN F. GAY
HON. THEODORE E. BURTON — PROFESSOR WESLEY C. MITCHELL has been authorized by Messrs. Hart Schaffner & Marx to offer in 1926 a cash prize of Five thousand dollars for the best original treatise on this subject

THE Committee places no restrictions upon the scope, method or character of the studies submitted beyond the requirement that they make genuine contributions toward our understanding of the problem. Emphasis may be laid upon analysis of the economic principles underlying the determination of wages, upon the conditions which set maximum and minimum limits to the prices paid for important types of labor, upon quantitative studies of the factors involved, or upon any other aspect of the problems which a writer can show to be significant and upon which he can throw new light.

The prize will not be awarded except for a work of high merit. Contestants are not limited to any country; but the manuscripts must be in English. This offer is entirely separate from the annual competition in Classes A and B of the Hart Schaffner & Marx prizes elsewhere announced.

The ownership of the copyright will vest in the donors, who will arrange for the publication of the book.

Competitors should inscribe their manuscripts with assumed names and in sealed envelopes give their real names and addresses, together with degrees, distinctions, or positions held.

Inquiries concerning the competition may be addressed to the undersigned. Manuscripts should be sent on or before October 1st, 1926, to

J. LAURENCE LAUGHLIN
UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, U.S.A.

of men have at last led them. They would do well to pause and ponder upon their new responsibilities. Death stands at attention, obedient, expectant, ready to serve, ready to shear away the peoples en masse; ready if called on, to pulverize, without hope of repair, what is left of civilization. He awaits only the word of command. He awaits it from a frail, bewildered being, long his victim, now—for one occasion only—his master.

Let it not be thought for a moment that the danger of another explosion in Europe is passed. For the time being the stupor and the collapse which followed the World War insured a sullen passivity, and the horror of war, its carnage and its tyrannies, have sunk into the soul, have dominated the mind of every class and in every race. But the causes of war have been in no way removed; indeed they are in some respects aggravated by the so-called peace treaty and the reactions following thereupon. Two mighty branches of the European family will never rest content with their existing situation. Russia, stripped of her Baltic provinces, will, as the years pass by, brood incessantly upon the wars of Peter the Great. From one end of Germany to the other an intense hatred of France unites the whole population. This passion is fanned continuously by the action of the French Government. The enormous contingents of German youth growing to military manhood year by year are inspired by the fiercest sentiments, and the soul of Germany smolders with dreams of a war of liberation or revenge. These ideas are restrained at the present moment only by physical impotence. France is armed to the teeth. Germany has been to a great extent disarmed and her military system broken up. The French hope to preserve this situation by their technical military apparatus, by their black troops, and by a system of alliances with the smaller states of Europe; and for the present, at any rate, overwhelming force is on their side. But physical force alone, unsustained by world opinion, affords no durable foundation for security. Germany is a far stronger entity than France, and cannot be kept in permanent subjugation.

"Wars," said a distinguished American to me last summer, "are fought with steel; weapons may change, but steel remains the core of all modern warfare. France has got the steel of Europe, and Germany has lost it. Here, at any rate, is an element of permanency." "Are you sure," I asked, "that wars of the future will be fought with steel?" A few weeks later I talked with a German. "What about aluminum?" he replied. "Some think," he said, "that the next war will be fought with electricity." And on this a vista opens out of electrical rays which could paralyze the engines of a motor car, could claw down aeroplanes from the sky, and conceivably be made destructive of human life or human vision. Then there are explosives. Have we reached the end? Has science turned its last page on them? May there not be methods of using explosive energy incomparably more intense than anything heretofore discovered? Might not a bomb no bigger than an orange be found to possess a secret power to destroy a whole block of buildings—nay, to concentrate the force of a thousand tons of cordite and blast a township at a stroke? Could not explosives even of the existing type be guided automatically in flying machines by wireless or other rays, without a human pilot, in ceaseless procession upon a hostile city, arsenal, camp, or dockyard?

As for poison gas and chemical warfare in all its forms, only the first chapter has been written of a terrible book. Certainly every one of these new avenues to destruction is being studied on both sides of the Rhine, with all the science and patience of which man is capable. And why should it be supposed that these resources will be limited to inorganic chemistry? A study of disease—of pestilences methodically prepared and deliberately launched upon man and beast—is certainly being pursued in the laboratories of more than one great country. Blight to destroy crops, anthrax to slay horses and cattle, plague to poison not armies only but whole districts—such are the lines along which military science is remorselessly advancing.

It is evident that whereas an equally contested war under such conditions might work the ruin of the world and cause an immeasurable diminution of the human race, the possession by one side of some overwhelming scientific advantage would lead to the complete enslavement of the unwary party. Not only are the powers now in the hand of man capable of destroying the life of nations but for the first time they afford to one group of civilized men the opportunity of reducing their opponents to absolute helplessness.

In barbarous times superior martial virtues—physical strength, courage, skill, discipline—were required to secure such a supremacy; and in the hard evolution of mankind the best and fittest stocks came to the fore. But no such saving guaranty exists today. There is no reason why a base, degenerate, immoral race should not make an enemy far above them in quality the prostrate subject of their caprice or tyranny, simply because they happened to be possessed at a given moment of some new death-dealing or terror-working process and were ruthless in its employment. The liberties of men are no longer to be guarded by their natural qualities but by their dodges; and superior virtue and valor may fall an easy prey to the latest diabolical trick.

In the somber paths of destructive science there was one new turning-point which seemed to promise a corrective to these mortal tendencies. It might have been hoped that the electromagnetic waves would in certain scales be found capable of detonating explosives of all kinds from a great distance. Were such a process discovered in time to become common property, war would in important respects return again to the crude but healthy limits of the barbarous ages. The sword, the spear, the bludgeon, and above all the fighting man, would regain at a bound their old sovereignty. But it is depressing to learn that the categories into which these rays are divided are now so fully explored that there is not much expectation of this. All the hideousness of the explosive era will continue; and to it will surely be added the gruesome complications of poison and of pestilence scientifically applied.

Such, then, is the peril with which mankind menaces itself. Means of destruction incalculable in their effects, wholesale and frightful in their character, and unrelated to any form of human merit: the march of science unfolding ever more appalling possibilities; and the fires of hatred burning deep in the hearts of some of the greatest peoples of the world, fanned by continual provocation and unceasing fear and fed by the deepest sense of national wrong or national danger! On the other hand, there is the blessed respite of exhaustion, offering to the nations a final chance to control their destinies and avert what may well be a general doom. . . .

Against the gathering but still distant tempest the League of Nations, deserted by the United States, scorned by Soviet Russia, flouted by Italy, distrusted equally by France and Germany, raises feebly but faithfully its standards of sanity and hope. Its structure, airy and unsubstantial, framed of shining but too often visionary idealism, is in its present form incapable of guarding the world from its dangers and of protecting mankind from itself. Yet it is through the League of Nations alone that the path to safety and salvation can be found. To sustain and aid the League of Nations is the duty of all. To reinforce it and bring it into vital and practical relation with actual world-politics by sincere agreements and understandings between the great Powers, between the leading races, should be the first aim of all who wish to spare their children torments and disasters compared to which those we have suffered will be but a pale preliminary.

In the article on Russia's Industrial Progress, by Leon Talmy, in last week's International Relations Section, it should have been stated that during the first eleven months of the fiscal year 1923-1924 the exports amounted to 304,700,000 rubles and the imports to 181,600,000 rubles as contrasted with an excess of imports over exports in 1922-1923. This accounted for the favorable balance of trade alluded to.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1924 No. 3101

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 611

EDITORIALS:

Beyond Egypt 614
Politics and Fundamentals 615
The Mystery of Poe 615
Yale Wins Again 616

THE WEST—TAMED AND COMBED. By Oswald Garrison Villard 617
WHERE ARE THE WOMEN GENIUSES? By Sylvia Kopald 619
MAN THE CREATOR. By Alexander Goldenweiser 622
ACQUIESCENCE. By Irwin Edman 624
SUSTENANCE. By Babette Deutsch 624
NATIONAL VILLAGE NOTELETS. By William Hard 625
THE WIND AND THE WHIRLWIND. By Wilfrid Scawen Blunt 626
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 627
CORRESPONDENCE 627

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Violation of Europe. By Samuel Untermyer 630

HOLIDAY BOOK SECTION

POEMS:

Rational Man. By Rolfe Humphries 635
To Lisa in Summer. By Max Eastman 635
Memoir. By Genevieve Taggard 635

CONTEMPORARY DISILLUSION: A DIALOGUE. By Lewis Mumford. 636
STEPHEN CRANE AND THE GENIUS MYTH. By Floyd Dell 637
THE UNKNOWN CRITIC. By Himself 638

BOOKS:

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 640
Sherwood Anderson's Autobiography. By Harry Hansen 640
Cornelia Among the Roughnecks. By Irwin Edman 641
Racial Unrealities. By Hendrik Willem van Loon 642
A Victorian Genius. By H. H. Johnston 643
War and the Willing Victim. By Joseph Wood Krutch 644
An Anthropologist Kidnapped. By Alexander Goldenweiser 644
More "Avowals." By Samuel C. Chew 645
Political Science Passé. By Harry Elmer Barnes 646
Brandes's Goethe. By Camillo von Klenze 647
The Perfect Philologist. By George Genzmer 647
Eugene Field. By Henry B. Fuller 650
Mussolini Pro and Con. By Tenney Frank 652
Chekhov Revealed. By Johan J. Smertenko 652
Mature Youth. By Ruth Suckow 654
The Great Sorcerer. By A. Donald Douglas 656
The Art of Elie Faure. By Thomas Munro 657
Books in Brief 659

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN. By Dorothy Graffe 660
A NOTE ON GLUCK. By Pitts Sanborn 661
THE NATION'S POETRY PRIZE 662

DRAMA:

Compromise. By Joseph Wood Krutch 662

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY MANAGING EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN LITERARY EDITOR

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS

JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

ONE WOULD THINK from the rude and disagreeable tone of its diplomatic notes that the Baldwin Government intended from now on to ignore the very existence of Soviet Russia. Unfortunately for the dignity of British Conservative leaders Russia is difficult to snub. It is neither small nor weak nor dependent nor meek. It has weapons of retaliation and the hard purpose to use them when necessary. In a gruff note the present British Government repudiated the treaties negotiated by the MacDonald Ministry and reaffirmed its faith in the authenticity of the Zinoviev letter. The Soviet Government answered politely and repeated its offer to submit the question of authenticity to an impartial commission. This offer will undoubtedly be ignored; the Baldwin Ministry cannot afford to discover that letter to be a fake. Officially Russia is polite. But behind the government mask of dignified regret, Communist leaders in speech and in writing are making plain their resentment. In an "Open Letter to Messrs. Arthur Ponsonby, E. D. Morel, and to other founders of the Union of Democratic Control" Radek has suggested that an organization similar to the union be founded in Russia to study "the regime of forgery which is carried on by the English Government" and to publish "in hundreds and thousands of copies, in Chinese, Arabic, Persian, Turkish, and other languages, the detailed history" of these forgeries.

"FASCISM IS SHAKEN by Internal Crisis," we read in a headline. Possibly. Yet only six months back we remember reading predictions of the impending fall of Fascism on account of the murder of Matteotti. Now it is the publication more than a year after it was written of a letter from General Balbo, commander of the fascist militia, to the head of the party in Bologna, urging the use of violence against the opposition. As soon as this letter became public Balbo sent his resignation to Mussolini and the latter promptly accepted it. Mussolini's personal position has been made further uncomfortable by the publication of a letter sent upon his order, during the election campaign last spring, by the secretary general of the Fascist Party, directing that the opposition speakers Sala and Forni should not be allowed to hold meetings. "Wherever they are seen they must be violently attacked by all Fascisti." This, of course, is ammunition for the opposition, but it does not prove that Fascism is about to die. Even if the present dictatorship were overthrown the chances are at least even that it would be replaced by another dictatorship—possibly more arbitrary. The hope for Italy is in a return to a more tolerant and democratic attitude of mind. That there is yeast working toward such a change we gather from the Manchester Guardian, which writes of the remarkable influence of that excellent opposition newspaper, the Corriere della Sera, whose circulation has reached a million copies.

HUNGARY HAS BEEN THE BAD BOY of Central Europe for so long that its misbehavior has become a rather tiresome accepted fact. But Hungary keeps trying to produce new evidences of its deep-seated distemper. Just at present it is in the midst of a storm of accusations of government corruption, which the authorities have met by the swift expedient of throwing bodily out of Parliament a dozen Social Democrats and two opposition leaders. The royal castle and other state buildings are occupied by troops, the streets are patrolled, public meetings have been dissolved, and editions of three opposition newspapers have been confiscated. Popular mass meetings have been called in protest; and on both sides the conventional stage settings for revolution have been trundled out. It is possible to admit with Samuel Untermyer, whose recent address on European conditions we print this week in the International Relations Section, that Hungary has been badly treated by the Allies, her territory unjustly confiscated and her army disproportionately reduced. But it is impossible to wish that more men and guns were at the disposal of the wanton and reckless crew who are smashing opposition by force, hiding corruption, and turning their instruments of justice to the unsavory job of finding Count Karolyi, democrat and patriot, guilty of "treason."

SAMUEL GOMPERS sat triumphantly through the El Paso convention of the American Federation of Labor—he did not even have to ride roughshod over the opposition, for it bowed as he approached. Never did his iron control seem stronger. But Gompers is a sick man and an old man—although it is true that his father only recently died—and it is not likely that the seventy-four-year-old veteran will have many more opportunities to be reelected president of the federation. Meanwhile the lesser pundits are maneuvering for position. Will John Lewis, chief of the miners, a Coolidge Republican, be able to seize the leadership? Will it pass to one of Gompers's own cabinet? Or will some new labor leader arise with the vision and the statesmanship to bring the federation, the railway brotherhoods, and the dissident clothing workers together in one powerful group and make it a rejuvenating force in American life? We must wait to see. Meanwhile, friends of labor will watch with interest the career of Robert P. Brindell, the crooked czar of the New York building trades, who has just won his fight for an unmerited parole.

THE TROUBLE WITH EFFORTS so far to improve labor conditions in the coal-fields of West Virginia is that they have come largely from without. Commissions may report, newspapers may expose, and preachers may decry—the situation is likely to remain much the same as long as the mass of the citizens of the State and the public officials that represent them are indifferent or hostile to change. Regeneration must come from within. Hence we are glad to read the words of the federal judge who recently sentenced Don Chafin, the notorious sheriff of Logan County, for violation of the prohibition laws. Chafin was not convicted for any of his thuggery against labor, but the judge took occasion to say just the same:

> It has been one of the sad bits of knowledge that have come to me during the three years that I have been upon the bench of this court, that in the district over which I preside, which district is composed of twenty-four counties, there should be any counties therein where liberty of life and property and the pursuit of one's own business was impossible by reason of the local government assuming to itself the power and authority to say who should come into the county, who should stay in the county, and what they should do while in the county. It might as well be realized that no coal association, by laying a tonnage tax on their coal, and paying it unto a corrupt sheriff, can prevent human liberty in the counties where that sort of thing is done. If I were to go into the field of prophecy I would say that the coming legislature is going to prohibit this system of deputy sheriffs that has prevailed in Logan County, and probably in some other counties.

We hope that the judge's prediction may come true. In the meanwhile an injunction suit has been begun to prohibit the mine-guard system in Logan County.

THE BOSS-ORDERED NOMINATION of Hiram Bingham as Republican candidate for Senator from Connecticut has already led to the bolting of Horace D. Taft and ex-Governor E. J. Lake, both of whom will vote for Hamilton Holt, the Democratic nominee. There can be no doubt whatever that if the voters of that State should choose according to fitness rather than party labels, Mr. Holt would be chosen, despite the fact that he is obsessed by his adoration of the League of Nations. Aside from the truth that Lieutenant-Governor Bingham is without the service or public experience which would especially fit him for the senatorship, he has only just been elected Governor of Connecticut to take office on January 1. To demand and receive the senatorship now is to break faith with the people who chose him to head the State government. But his action is quite in keeping with Hiram Bingham's o'erweening ambition. An explorer, a writer, a Yale professor, a soldier in the war, and then a politician, he owes his present office to the Republican boss, J. Henry Roraback, for he had had no previous service in any Connecticut office. A militaristic imperialist, his career, if he enters the Senate, will parallel Henry Cabot Lodge's in its subserviency to the machine, its boundless ambition, and its championship of privilege. The permanence of Mr. Bingham's beliefs is instanced by his having written a book a few years ago denouncing the Monroe Doctrine as an obsolete shibboleth, whereas today—since entering public life—he has "changed his mind" about it. Like the Republican New Haven Journal-Courier, revolting against Mr. Bingham, we urge our Connecticut readers to vote for Mr. Holt.

WARREN WORTH BAILEY was the liberal Democratic, anti-Klan, wet candidate for Congress in the Twentieth Pennsylvania District. On the face of the returns his Republican opponent was elected by a scant plurality. The Republicans, not satisfied with this, appeared before the local judges and had the ballot boxes reopened. The recount, to their dismay, showed a majority for Bailey! Hoist by their own petard, they retired to think it over. As a result the Klan candidate is now appealing to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania on the ground that the local court had no authority to go behind the official returns in the case of a federal election. There is a nice constitutional point involved, and we do not know what the courts may decide. We do know what decency demands. How can a man have the face to take a seat in Congress upon the plea that while he was in fact defeated, legal technicalities intervened to save him?

WE ARE GROPING toward a reduction of the misery and waste of unemployment. Government assistance, as worked out in Europe, has not yet been accepted in America, but other experiments are in process. A scheme of unemployment insurance, supported jointly by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers and the manufacturers, was established in Chicago last year, and now a similar arrangement has been adopted in the industry in New York City. Union employees will contribute 1½ per cent of their wages and their employers an equal amount to a fund which may total $1,000,000 a year, according to Jacob Billikopf, impartial chairman in the men's clothing industry. The arrangement is not ideal. Unemployment is largely unnecessary; it is the result partly of the seasonal organization of certain industries, partly of alternating booms and depressions, and partly of sheer carelessness and indifference among employers. As long as industry is primarily in the control of capital and the profits of boom periods go chiefly to the employer we believe that he alone should pay for unemployment insurance, as he does for that against accident. In this respect the bill introduced into the Wisconsin Legislature last year was sound. Also a sliding scale of premiums would have penalized the careless employer and thus worked toward a reduction in unemployment instead of merely charging its cost to the industry and finally to the consumer. Still we welcome the present experiment as a practical step in lessening the tragedy of unemployment.

EVERY TIME we have to buy a new suit of clothes, which is an infrequent but painful moment, we read advertisements and fashion articles for several days in advance in order to learn "what the well-dressed man should wear." Just now, we gather from the Daily News Record, our estimable contemporary in men's suits, the chief point upon which we should insist is a coat-of-arms instead of the plain label that father used to wear:

> The idea of selling a coat-of-arms with every suit is all O.K., if the supply of animals—unicorns especially—does not run out. . . . Heraldic labels are the animal crackers of clothes.
>
> Unicorns are being extensively worn, but of course there are lions, horses, serpents, and an unlimited collection of four-legged whatnots born in fevered imaginations but seldom listed in a circus program.

The vogue of illustrated clothes, following that of illustrated books, began with overcoats, we learn, but the use of handsome labels is spreading so insidiously that it may reach underwear and corn-plasters by spring.

> Overcoats have the best of it, however, because a man can fold an overcoat inside out and throw it over a chair with the label on top. Friends can sit around in a circle and admire it. A man cannot lounge gracefully with his jacket off, however, unless he is wearing a clean shirt.

We doubt if, after paying for our new suit, we shall be able to afford a clean shirt every day. Hence we shall demand that our label be sewed on the outside of the coat.

THE PLIGHT OF THE COUNTRY CHURCH was most usefully discussed at the recent meeting of the American Country Life Association at Columbus, Ohio. When 300 men and women, chiefly laymen, get together to consider such a problem in relation to the general question of rural living conditions we are apt to get truths all too often glossed over in purely ministerial gatherings. There seems to have been at Columbus remarkable agreement upon the fact that there are too many churches in rural communities and not enough cooperation among them, with the result that, thanks to a stupid and outgrown denominationalism, all the churches are weak and ineffective, with inadequate pulpit service. Unfortunately it is the denominations themselves which are the great stumbling-block to the realization of the true ideal of a noble community center, educational, with a profound ethical character, and supporting a free forum for the instruction of all the people in citizenship, in learning, in ethics. Professor Walter Burr, of the Kansas State Agricultural College, declared that while the great need of rural life today was unity, the national and State heads of the leading denominations who could alter the situation within a year refused to do so. Apparently they fear the effect of statistics showing the closing of many struggling churches. The Methodist clergy at Columbus telegraphed to their bishops to move toward only one rural Protestant church to every thousand of population, and urged that no Methodist clergyman's standing be prejudiced by his appointment as the pastor of a federated, undenominational church. A recent study shows that church attendance in Windsor County, Vermont, has dropped 52 per cent in thirty years. How much longer can the denominations delay modernizing their rural work?

TO THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY we take off our hats. If every religious or semi-religious journal were to do as valiant work against war as it does we should really make rapid strides toward the destruction of the war-gods. Most refreshing is its recent demand that the churches get out of the chaplaincy business. There has never been anything more disgusting than the assigning of Christian ministers, trained to preach the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" to the service of troops trained for mass murder. But the Christian Century now realizes that, aside from the ethical and moral issues involved, the chaplaincy is a deliberate part of the army's and navy's plan to hitch the church up to the war-game. Before the expansion of our army following the Spanish War the chaplains were usually broken-down or third-rate clergymen appointed by and for politicians for the mere purpose of filling sinecures. Latterly the Federal Council of Churches, to its disgrace, has taken an active part in the appointment of chaplains and has actually sponsored a bill to increase the chaplains from one to every 1,200 troops to one to every 800—without regard to whether the 800 want clergy or whether there is anything for such clergymen to do when appointed. The Christian Century rightly declares the whole business to be pagan and revolting; "the two institutions cannot be yoked together—the institution of Mars and the institution of Christ, the institution of fratricidal strife and the institution of brotherhood and universal good-will, the institution of the sword and the institution of the cross." By taking military service the ministry truly "degrades and forswears its high calling."

SO PHOTORADIOGRAMS are at hand. Not that the first attempts which appeared in metropolitan newspapers were satisfactory or appealing, but as the transmission of pictures by wire has been nearly perfected, so, through radio, we are also to have pictures sent through the air from one quarter of the world to another. We must confess that the feat accomplished interests us less than the way in which it was brought about. Owen D. Young once remarked that the time would come when the front page of a New York or London newspaper would be transmitted entire across the ocean to appear the next day in facsimile in London or New York. Thereupon three engineers of the General Electric Company and the Radio Corporation of America went to work to make good Mr. Young's prophecy. In other words, science is being developed by the choosing of a goal and the devoting of concentrated and elaborate efforts to its achievement. That is the modern way. Where Bell and Edison and Helmholtz delved and toiled to invent with little or no aid, the great modern corporations maintain huge laboratories in which sometimes a thousand persons are free to devote themselves to given problems with unlimited time and unlimited sums of money. In this case three brilliant men staked their minds, their laboratories, and the means of two great companies upon their succeeding, and won.

Beyond Egypt

BEHIND Egypt lies the Sudan, and Africa; and beyond Egypt is the Suez Canal, the gateway to Asia. The violence of the British action in Egypt is more than an imperial demonstration; it is the rattling of the sword of the West in the face of the restless East. It marks another chapter in the history of white hegemony over the yellow and dusky-skinned peoples of the ancient continents where our civilization was born.

To understand the significance of this conflict one must link with it a dozen other recent events: the success of the Moors in driving the Spanish to the coast in the Moroccan Riff; the rumblings of revolt in French Tunisia and unrest in French Syria; Italy's battles in Tripolitania; Persia's reported readiness to sponsor Egypt's case before the League (England probably can dissuade her); Turkey's success in defying the West; the capture of the Moslem holy places by the desert Wahabis, driving into exile the puppet prince whom the British had supported; the quarrel about Mosul; the lone stand of the British gentlemen who "represented" India at the Geneva opium conferences and there opposed the American effort, which Japan, China, Persia, and Turkey seconded, to stop the lucrative traffic in drugs; the duel in China between Soviet Russia and the West, with Japan intently watching; England's uneasiness over the Robinson-"Mr. A" trial which threatened to end hopes of a pro-British succession in the Kashmir border provinces of India. The East is in a process of rebirth; a new self-consciousness threatens Western dominance. In war time the Allied watchwords — "self-determination," "democracy," "rights of weak peoples"—leaked through to ears for which they were not intended, and ever since the ferment has been at work. No one can foresee the outcome; but worried colonial officials recall that European control of Asia is hardly more than a century old, and that Europe, exhausted by her own wars, is little disposed to spend her resources in holding far countries in check.

A fundamental question faces us which the Western countries—including the United States in the Philippines—will have to answer. Do we intend to attempt to hold our imperial power over Asia and Africa indefinitely, at any cost? Is our talk of the "white man's burden," of "education for self-government," of "mandates for mankind" mere pretense, simply a vocabulary devised to facilitate the processes of empire? Is our interest in the backward regions of the earth an interest of greed, such as might be suspected from the 20 per cent dividends paid last year by the British-owned Sudan Plantations Syndicate, Inc.—the corporation which will most profit if the British demand for unlimited water from the Gezira dam is forced through? Or do we honestly mean to set these peoples free? Do we intend the relation of master and minor which we have established in Asia and Africa to continue, even at the cost of war, or are we building toward a future of friendship? If the former, the British in Egypt are right; if the latter they are terribly, tragically wrong.

For the British right in Egypt is only the right of might. They have undoubtedly improved conditions since they entered Egypt, but that is beside the point. The brave manifesto of the Independent Labor Party speaks the conscience of England and the fact:

> This policy of renewed suppression is due to the false belief that Great Britain has the moral right to occupy Egypt, although she has pledged on more than fifty separate occasions to terminate the occupation, and formally recognized her independent sovereignty in 1922.
>
> The occupation of Egypt was originally due to strategic and financial reasons. It has no greater moral sanction than the German occupation of Belgium for strategic military purposes. The Egyptian people have as much right to govern themselves as any other nation. The occupation of Egypt by an alien power is the basic fact in the present situation which no subsequent reason of strategy or financial interest should obscure.
>
> The Independent Labor Party, therefore, while unreservedly condemning the method of the recent political assassination, deplores the fact that the British Government should have made this crime the occasion for asserting new imperialistic claims which may virtually amount to the annexation of the Sudan and the appropriation of the water supplies from the Nile to the detriment of Egypt and to the advantage of the British cotton companies. . . .

Undoubtedly for the present England can have her way. She has the power, and the conscience of the world has not recovered from its overdose of rhetorical idealism in the days when statesmen fought the war with speeches. But do the Churchills and the Birkenheads never look ahead? They can hardly believe that little Britain, with her forty millions, can forever rule hundreds of millions of aliens thousands of miles across the sea. She has retained the devotion of the Australians, Canadians, and South Africans, but she no longer rules them, and could not if she would. Sir Auckland Geddes said the other day that England was grateful to America for teaching her a lesson in colonial administration; but she seems not to have learned it. As surely as revolt sundered the feeble American colonies from the mother country—even more surely, indeed—the dark peoples of the earth will some day throw off the Western yoke. It may last decades; it cannot last centuries. The end may come gradually and with friendship, or suddenly and in a bitter orgy of hate and bloodshed. Britain today is bringing closer the latter consummation. The East will not forget; it scores another large black mark against the West.

British liberals are demanding that England submit her case to the League. Some timidly suggest that she ask the League to grant her a mandate for the Sudan. That would, after what has passed, merely mean that the League lent England its moral cloak. The Independent Labor Party goes further; it urges that > the issue of control of the Sudan should be submitted to the League of Nations with the view of developing that country as a self-governing nation at the earliest possible moment. It calls for an immediate Anglo-Egyptian conference to complete the evacuation of Egypt and to arrange for the submission of the question of the Suez Canal to the League, not as an issue in respect to which the British claim legal or moral authority, but as a problem concerned with one of the international waterways of the world.

The Labor Government, in its brief and insecure stay in office, did not mount to that spirit. But until Western governments achieve such a vision they will keep their peoples on the edge of an abyss.

Politics and Fundamentals

CONGRESS has opened for a session of small things. Inhibited by the reigning interpretation of the election as a mandate to do as little as possible, it will doubtless confine itself to appropriation bills and plans for further reduction of taxation and for relief to the farmers. The measure of the temper of the victors lies in their apparent readiness to take orders from the newest Senator, Butler of Massachusetts, who is to snap the Presidential whip as occasion demands, just as he was the party spokesman in the campaign. The old and experienced Senators are to smile and take orders from the party boss in a senatorial chair alongside them. But even clearer evidence of the soreness and the pettiness of those now directing the Republican Party's fortunes lies in their ousting of Senators Brookhart, Ladd, Frazier, and La Follette from the party caucus these men rarely attended. It illustrates the smallness and inconsistency and also the blundering of those who control not only their party but the destinies of the country.

If further proof were needed of the lack of vision it is to be found in a recent editorial by George Harvey in the Washington Post. Since Colonel Harvey has been announced as the voice of the White House in the press even Samuel Gompers found it necessary to reply to this editorial at the convention of the American Federation of Labor. What is Colonel Harvey's thesis? It is this: In order that "we may continue with conservative government for as many years as we did after the Civil War" the farmer and the other rebels who voted for La Follette must be brought back into the Republican fold—the "fold of conservatism." "This," he declares, "must be done while the Labor Party is still young and the Liberal and Radical parties are dividing the opposition vote." And the means? Simple enough. "The immediate problem is to expand the tariff system so as to include in its benefits the major farm products." Then, later on, railway rates must be revised and money must be made stable, and then the millennium will be at hand and the Republican Party will govern uninterruptedly for twenty-four years as it did from 1861 to 1885—thus abolishing the two-party system and installing the one-party plan in its place. It was not against the political and economic absurdity of this plan that Mr. Gompers protested but at the incidental suggestion that wages might be reduced, and at the Harvey proposal that labor and the farmer should be divorced. Cynically frank, as usual, Colonel Harvey avows that his is purely a compromise plan—Unity Through Compromise is the title of his editorial. He would buy the farmers' interest by any sop; even though he was last winter of the opinion that the McNary-Haugen bill was all wrong, he is willing now to do violence to his feelings in order that business may rule us undisturbed.

All of which shows once more that it is politics we are facing again, and politics of a stupid and blundering sort, however clever it may seem superficially. The reason is that there is no search after fundamental issues, no determination to go into economic factors from the standpoint of principle, and no desire whatever to remove at the root grievances which, Colonel Harvey admits, will persist even though prosperity returns for a time to the embattled farmers. His dreams of a Republican heaven as secure as that of the angels, unmenaced by Democrats or Laborites, is as unthinkable as it is undesirable. There can be no period of complete public acquiescence, because the fight as to who shall control this government, the people or the privileged interests, will continue no matter how many the defeats. Here is a fundamental which will arise again and again to challenge the politics of sordid materialism that seeks to steal away men's rights and then to drug or frighten or cheat the robbed into acquiescence.

That's the trouble with fundamentals in this age-long battle with politics. They will rise up and hit back when you least expect it. As long as you have not gone to fundamentals and made them your own or intrenched yourself behind them they refuse to let you reign in peace. The royal house of Coolidge and Butler will no more reign unmolested than did the Kaiser. For one thing, rulers of this type are stupid—the punishment of the insurgents proves that. A Progressive Party with half the brains of the British Labor Party could, as the boys say, run circles around them in the legislative arena. For another thing, anybody may bid economic change stop, but it stops for no one. Already the Coolidge regime declares privately that the tariff must be revised again because of altered conditions abroad. And that tariff, we venture to predict, will continue to be in need of tinkering until it is altogether abolished, with all its crookedness, corruption, and privilege. For here is another fundamental, free trade, which can no more be definitely downed than any other attribute of freedom. It will continue to raise its head however crushed to earth. And that is only one of the economic issues which may affect the program of the victors in Washington. They cannot control these any more than they can tell where next there will be some convulsion of the earth to set all their plans agley. Unity by temporary compromise is a will-o'-the-wisp; unity by sound fundamental reform is the only worth-while aim.

The Mystery of Poe

MR. GEORGE MOORE is the latest of a whole line of foreign critics who have annoyed Americans by their persistent determination to regard Edgar Allan Poe as the one and only poet—perhaps the only artistic genius—which this country has produced. In his recently published "Conversations in Ebury Street," where Mr. Moore laid the plans for his "Anthology of Pure Poetry," no other American poet is so much as tentatively considered, but the author of Ulalume and The Haunted Palace is passed for admission into the select company which neither Longfellow nor Whitman nor Frost nor Robinson will be permitted to enter. Moreover, to make the matter worse, Walter de la Mare enthusiastically supports this choice and fears only that the anthology will have to be overcrowded with Poe.

Many times in the past American critics have protested against the tendency here exhibited. Emerson, as everybody knows, called Poe "the jingle man"; Henry James said that a liking for his verse was a sure sign of immature taste; and A. C. Brownell wrote a whole essay to prove that his entire work consisted of nothing except labored and obvious artifice. Foreign critics, however, have persisted in exalting the work of this man of whom many sophisticated Americans are inclined to be a little ashamed, connecting him only with elocutionary renderings of > . . . the bells, bells, bells, bells,

> Bells, bells, bells.
> . . . the jingling and the tinkling of the bells.

Sober critics like Edmund Gosse and Andrew Lang insist that he is "the greatest poet, perhaps the greatest literary genius of his country," and that "he must be ranked with the greatest poets," while enthusiasts like Baudelaire and Mallarmé exceed all bounds, the former solemnly praying to him as a saint and the latter calling him "a genius the most truly sublime the world has ever known." Evidently we are faced here with something more than an ordinary difference in literary taste. Below the surface of the shallow jingle which competent American judges dismiss with contempt certain men catch an undercurrent of meaning not perceptible to those who have no temperamental sympathy with Poe, and we are in the presence of a mystery which will never be fully solved until his personality is more carefully studied by someone capable of understanding the malady of the soul from which he suffered.

Even in America Poe has not failed of partisans but they have almost always been the wrong ones. Sentimental Virginians and facile admirers of the shallow trickeries of his verse have claimed him for their own while those who have caught some hint of his deeper and darker meaning have turned aside in distaste. Professor Woodberry, his keenest biographer, confessed to a friend that after finishing his book he was compelled to take a trip to Italy to get the taste of Poe out of his mouth. He thus proved that he had caught something of the flavor of his subject, but proved also that he was not the one to sympathize with the quality which makes Poe the first of the great neurotics of literature and the real inventor of the frisson nouveau attributed to Baudelaire—of that shiver whose source is not in melodrama but in a definite sickness of the soul. Unlike Baudelaire, Poe never clearly articulated the cry uttered by his nerves; he hinted here and there among the artificial fripperies of his work at the things which haunted him. When both the admirers and the condemners of his jingles are pushed aside there will be time to analyze and evaluate that peculiar flavor which left in Woodberry's mouth so unpleasant a taste and awoke the unbounded admiration of Baudelaire and Mallarmé. Indubitably all three caught the same flavor.

Yale Wins Again

GEORGE P. BAKER, for thirty-six years a teacher at Harvard, creator of the famous English 47 Workshop, has resigned to accept the directorship of a new department of dramatic arts at Yale. To the outsider, perhaps, the chief significance of this event will seem to lie in the fact that the million-dollar gift just made by Edward S. Harkness to Yale for the founding of such a department will assure Professor Baker all the equipment necessary to carry on his work, but the incident has another aspect. The Nation must express its sympathy with the Harvard Crimson, which has risen in editorial wrath against the Harvard authorities, whose persistent refusal to cooperate with this extraordinarily gifted man has forced him to go elsewhere.

Mr. Baker's resignation was naturally the occasion for an exchange of amenities between him and President Lowell, but these amenities cannot wipe out the fact that Harvard has persistently slighted a faithful and distinguished servant. Mr. Baker denies the report that there has been friction between him and his university, and President Lowell writes polite regrets in the course of which he says, among other things, "We owe you a large debt of gratitude for all you have done for the university during a long service." That is true, and it is also true that no effort has been made to pay that debt, even to the extent of making it possible for him to do his best work. As the Crimson says: "For three decades he has fought for decent quarters and equipment for his work and not once has his cry been heeded by the authorities. It is at the feet of the latter Harvard should lay the blame for his loss." These undergraduate editors see more clearly than the men who plan their education.

The 47 Workshop, in which plays were written and produced by students, was Mr. Baker's own creation. He realized the necessity of studying dramatic technique in connection with the practical problems of production, and his method has been brilliantly justified by the fact that he has sent forth a score of students—including Edward Sheldon and Eugene O'Neill—to make living contributions to the theater. The fame of his class spread until it was the most celebrated academic course in America, yet when his bare quarters in Massachusetts Hall were burned Harvard failed even to assume proper custody of his papers and properties. Poverty has, of course, been the excuse, but the excuse, like the regret, is empty since Harvard has had no difficulty in raising funds for things it really wanted. While starving the Workshop it raised more than $30,000,000, including its recent ten-million-dollar drive, from which six millions were pledged to the business school but not a cent to the drama. This drive blocked the effort which Mr. Baker's friends wished to make to raise money for a college theater workshop, and thus he was given as plainly as possible to understand that though the Harvard officials were anxious to teach advertising and accounting they took no serious interest in the development of creative literature.

We do not doubt that the leaders in commerce need training, but business, so powerful and so rich, can look after its own, and the first duty of a university is surely its duty to the things of the spirit. If the colleges, theoretically devoted to the cultivation of those things which the busy world is likely not to find time for, relegate them to a bad second place, where shall they find refuge? If Harvard can get more money than it needs for the real work of a university it might perhaps conduct a school of business (though we are of those who believe such a school out of place at Harvard); if it is determined to put the requirements of such a school first it is betraying its trust and its tradition.

The incident has, in addition, its moral side. If Harvard wants to make itself "practical" in conformity with the spirit of a practical age, it may have the right to do so. But has it the right virtually to cast off a man who for thirty-six years has served it faithfully? It has decided too late that it has no need of Mr. Baker. His aims and aspirations have been long known; the university has accepted his labor and expressed its gratitude, but if it intended to do no more it should have made that fact clear to him long ago. To Harvard he gave the best efforts of his best years and Harvard, having accepted them, starved him into resignation. What, we wonder, would its teachers of business ethics have to say about such a procedure?

Meanwhile, Yale gains what Harvard has lost. Thereby it wins a vaster prestige than all the athletic victories it ever won in its bowl or Harvard's stadium.

The West—Tamed and Combed

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

DISILLUSIONMENT? In the language of the West, "You bet!" One expects change and some drift toward standardization, of course, as a young country gets older. But this last visit of mine to the Middle West and part of the Northwest startled me with its overwhelming evidences of conformity. No, I am not speaking politically, though I might; but of the outward aspects of people and places, social appearances generally. My memory goes back to a ride on the first train that ever crossed the continent from St. Paul and Minneapolis to the Pacific Ocean, so I have years of background. At least I can recall what the Twin Cities looked like a long time ago, also big and little towns, frontier hamlets in all their brutally coarse rawness. Often I have revisited the West since, but never have I noticed as much change as this time. Those who wish to have all America exactly alike, who would blot out every distinction and difference between States, towns, and sections may take heart. They are nearing the time when one may drop down into Kansas City in a Zeppelin out of an early morning fog and fancy oneself in Cleveland or Worcester or Buffalo, or even Newark and see nothing in outward appearances to dispel the illusion.

Yes, the West is growing old, and as it gets older it patterns more and more after the East—incredibly so. You arrive in Sioux Falls and a yellow taxi stands where once were tame bronchos hitched to a wagon, and the driver is, as elsewhere, guaranteed to be a safe escort to both men and women. You drive to the hotel, any hotel, and it is just a replica of some gilded fourteen-story rabbit warren near the Grand Central Station. It may be small or it may be big and expensive, but you know the pattern right off. The rooms are all of a type, the baths like every other, even down to the towels and the little pieces of soap in their paper wrappings. The hotel clerk is twin to him of Pershing Square, and the bell-boy—well, the bell-boy is as much a hold-up artist as though he had been born in a "lounge," suckled in a Pompeian Room, taught to walk in Peacock Alley, and made first to eat solids in an Egyptian cafeteria. Not a telegram will he deliver until his reward is forthcoming. The waiters wear dress-suits; the women—shades of Owen Wister's biscuit shooters!—wear neat black uniforms with white caps and aprons. Gone is the old-fashioned dinner with its innumerable bird-bath dishes; gone the frowzy, dirty waitress who stood at your elbow and mumbled off the grub-list in a Choctaw you could only begin to make out at the third trial. (The last living female of this deadly species I found in a Cortlandt, New York, caravansary the other day.)

Now these are hard things to put up with if your memory goes back to the time when every hotel was an American House or some such; when you lugged your own bag; when the bar opening into the lobby was the biggest thing in the hotel, and omnibus drivers and evil-looking hackmen were lords of the porticoed entrance; when you entered an ill-smelling room with grimy curtains, whose faded, dirty carpet with its huge, once-glaring, designs reminded you of the man at the old Brighton Beach Hotel who insisted that that hostelry's slogan, "Swept by Ocean Breezes," referred only to the method of cleansing the bedrooms. And the stairs you once climbed and the men you met, loud-voiced, tobacco-spitting, broad-brimmed, pistol-toting (I once, for half an hour, watched two Chinamen in a San Francisco hotel cleaning up big pools of blood in a corridor where two gentlemen had just met and fought to their souls' content)! Yes, they had their hussies, too; and you were lucky if you did not draw a room next to a poker game that lasted until four a. m. Characters there were then in the hotel business itself, plenty of them, men who had added a bedroom or two, and then more, to a flimsy unpainted saloon until they became real "hotel-keeps." Sometimes the unexpected appeared among them. In Montana, in a two-story shack destitute of plaster, paper, or paint, I one day danced with the wife of the manager, a dainty French girl not long enough away from Paris to have gained a language and lost an accent in the Montana of thirty-five years ago; she was joyous, indeed, at meeting a boy who knew her Paris even if only from the conventional tourist angle. It was like finding a lily in the midst of sage-brush.

And now? Would you believe it? When I drove up in Omaha to a hotel with a promising but misleading Indian name, the man who opened the door was clad immaculately as an English groom with a tall hat and cockade, light corduroy breeches, and, if you please, the regulation top boots. In Omaha! I stood and stared. It is not so long ago, I recalled, that cowboys on this very street were shooting the heels off the boots of much less tempting freaks than that. Inside the doors and you were back in the thousand-roomed orchestraed, marble-columned, overornate monstrosity so familiar in New York. Yes, you could swear you were in the Astor or the Commodore, for the lounge had a great big motor-car in it and the parlors were full of other $5,000 autos attended and explained by cultured, young gentlemen all in dinner coats and all as carefully groomed as a professional dancing partner. I can swear that not one chewed tobacco, and I am sure they had never seen an Indian or a cowboy and did not know the difference between a cinch and a pack-mule. I know they had never heard the click of a roulette-wheel, or ever seen the inside of a frontier saloon where men threw dice for drinks—and sometimes for lives that were held about as cheap.

So it was everywhere. The big and the small department stores have done their damnedest. There are more oddly dressed persons in Bangor, Maine, than in Parsons, Kansas. I don't deny that the improvement in dress has been tremendous. There in Parsons, in the Main Street shops, are the very same styles for men and women that you see in New York. The buyers from Kansas City take the Berengaria and the Mauretania and come back from Paris on them as regularly as those from Lord & Taylor's. They all bring back the same things, and the buyers from Parsons have only a small ride on the "Katy" to get the bait for their shops. The men—well, they look like men everywhere and nary a pair of trousers tucked into rawhide boots among them. As for the girls, conformity has done its worst here—bobbed hair, little round hats, dresses just below the knees, pink hosiery, silly, open-work slippers, coats just like the ones you saw in Chicago, St. Paul, and Lincoln. Individuality? Not a trace of it; it's decried and driven to cover as a disreputable wench, just as have been certain ladies of a certain type who once had their little shacks in plain view beyond the freight house across the railroad tracks. Paint, powder, and lip-sticks everywhere. Only the rouge is put on as if with a shovel. I stood on a university campus which shall be nameless and saw young girls dyed, marceled, painted, lip-sticked, "nude"-stockinged, and said to myself that Broadway must suddenly have moved West. They are as pure as gold, I've no doubt, but copy-cats of the worst kind, of the worst kind of thing, though they may not know it.

Gradually one sighs and sighs and suffers pain for the sight of something new. Everywhere the same automobiles, Packards, Buicks, Dodges, Chandlers, Chevrolets, yes, even a Rolls-Royce now and then, and miles and miles of Fords. All kinds and all varieties, all dirty, faded, and shabby. Once painted always painted seems the motto with all cars, and some girls. Same parking difficulties; same terrible crush on shopping afternoons. Not a town big enough for its cars in motion or waiting. Roads? Well, many superb ones, and many where a motor car "dies" ignobly in three minutes. Minnesota shines here with miles and miles of magnificent cement roads all used by motor buses, radiating in every direction. Some of their schedules call for seventy miles an hour, I was told, and I believed it after one ride where we surely hit sixty miles before we skidded dangerously and then slowed down. One huge bus I saw in the ditch—"steering-wheel broke, nobody hurt." They are broad, low-hung monsters; as they come at you they suggest nothing so much as monstrous bugs out of some dreadful nightmare, or some pterodactylian monster bent on swallowing you entire in the lifting of an eyelid. Indeed, automobiling conforms too. A friend drove me 340 miles in fourteen hours through the original Main Street (so proud signs at its gate announced) and beyond with perfect ease over prairies where little beside Concord coaches and the inevitable bronchos ventured when that first transcontinental railroad trip began. The "hitch-hiker" is there, too, and the red filling-pumps, and the tire signs, and all the rest. But no men on horses, not an Indian, not a man with "chaps."

In Kansas City I trembled, for the old station was gone and there stood the magnificent new one, a first cousin to the Pennsylvania Terminal. Had its air of modernity, its every aspect of the new rich, destroyed the life of what used to be the most interesting, swarming place in all America of Americans of all types? Yes. Almost. Harvey (Fred, not George) has a wonderful lunch-counter room there that beats anything in New York even to the looks of the waitresses. And next door is a room! Well, the waiters in their dress-suits, the perfection of the service, the curtains, the carpets, the prices, the decorations, the head-waiter were all as if bodily transplanted from the Ritz. That seemed the last straw. But then, as if to order, there came a bewhiskered farmer in his shirt-sleeves attending eagerly upon a crippled wife attired in a Mother-Hubbard and ensconced in a rolling-chair, a Mexican, a cowboy with the largest hat I think I ever saw, and an Indian, not in blanket and feather, but in "cits"—still in his profile and his color an aborigine. They saved the day and gave me just a reminiscence of the old thrill of the dusty, dirty, wooden "depot," where one used to meet more types and kinds of Americans in five minutes than anywhere else in years.

As for the city? But for its hills it is like Rochester or Indianapolis or Cleveland, full of bustling life and miles upon miles of shops crammed with second-hand autos for sale. The same movies, same taxis, same chain drug-stores, same soda-water and candy shops, same hotels, same marble-fronted banks, same prison-like Federal Reserve structure as in Minneapolis, Cleveland, and New York—(a new governmental infamy); same flappers, same hats and stockings, same well-dressed elderly women, same men, droves of them, middle-class business men bent on selling, selling, selling, selling—apparently never buying—and about to vote for "Cal" to save the country. Kansas City, come to this out of its shabby newness, its unpaved dirty streets, its gin palaces, its rows and rows of grimy wooden homes, yes, its sordidness! All of it once characteristic, once individual, once original, once distinctive—once, oh well—once it was Kansas City. Now it is any old place with many lovely new homes and buildings—the best American architecture lifting its head here and there, even in whole quarters. And a soldiers' monument going up which bids fair to be the noblest yet erected. "Kansas City, door-way to the West, Southwest, and Mexico, on the bluffs of the Missouri; most important railroad center and headquarters for wholesale buyers. Population, 350,000. . . ."

How good, after all, those prairie towns were! Not to live in; no—the Connecticut hills first. But to see. And now Sauk Center, however small and dull, with "red-blooded hemen" is playing cards in a room where the bar and the rail still exist, but drinking soda. A living protest against the invasion of the East. Strange that Sinclair Lewis did not see in Main Street, already conforming within, a last desperate struggle outwardly to be a bulwark against the flood from the East. At Villard—Villard, Minnesota—once destined to be a metropolis and now still a hamlet beside two fine lakes—my heart jumped a bit. False fronts again! On the ladies? Or, dear no. On the houses. One-story shacks with a false second-story front, the plainest, openest, kindliest fraud ever perpetrated, for you saw the fraud as you approached down the street and as you left it, if you looked back. Here the auto alone seemed to mark the lapse of years. The bombast has gone, the exaggerated visions of what each hamlet was to be and to become. Forty years ago they talked of empires to be won and untold riches to be garnered from the winning of the West. The dreams of wealth, of low prices, of an easy living wrung from virgin soil have faded away. Only in the cordial crispness of the language, the inevitable "you bet," the friendly welcome is there the constant proof that one is West. The flaming spirit of political and social progress flickers unevenly, at times all but extinguished, either by prosperity or because of isolation and lack of knowledge as to what is going on. And behind it all lurks leering—conformity.

One's mind leaps back forty years. There were few fronts that were not false in those little frontier towns which, many of them, were nothing but gambling hells and worse. Oh, but the color they had! The human variations! The real Sioux, in their own blankets and their own grime and grease, cowboys in numbers with Theodore Roosevelt among them to see the first trains go by. The gamblers, the vigilantes, the road-agents, the "good" and the "bad" women, the "respectable" shopkeepers, the blue uniformed troops—all, all have yielded, in this section at least, to conformity, the enemy of us all.

Forty years from now?

Where Are the Women Geniuses?

By SYLVIA KOPALD

MANY years ago Voltaire was initiated into the mysteries of Newton by Mme du Châtelet. Finishing her translation and her rich commentary upon the "Principles" in a glow he extended to her the greatest tribute which man has yet found for exceptional women. He said: "A woman who has translated and illuminated Newton is, in short, a very great man." Genius has long been a masculine characteristic, although some more generous authors admit its possession by certain "depraved" women. Only the courtesans of classical antiquity could be women and individuals at once, and, therefore, Jean Finot found it necessary to remind us emphatically even in 1913 that "women of genius and talent are not necessarily depraved." Not necessarily, mind you. No, the great woman may be, in short, a great man, but she is not necessarily depraved.

As the twentieth century progresses and women capture the outposts of individuality one after the other, the old questions lose much of their old malignancy. Women battle with the problem of how to combine a home and a career and men become less sure (especially in these days of high living costs) that woman's place is in the home. As women enter the trades and the arts and the professions, men begin to discover comrades where there were only girls and wives and mothers before. It is an exciting century, this women's century, and even though prejudices crumble slowly, they crumble. Yet one of the old questions remains, persistent and unyielding as ever: Where are the women geniuses?

Even a pessimist may find cause for rejoicing in this final wording of the "woman question." Man's search for the woman genius is more consoling than his sorrowful quest for the snows of yesteryear. For snows, like all beauty, have a way of melting with time; a mind ripens and mellows with age. Granted a mind which it is no longer a shame or a battle to develop, woman can look upon the passing of the years with at least as great an equanimity as does man. She remains in the picture of life long after the Maker's paints have begun to dry. And that is good. But as long as the female geniuses remain undiscovered, it must be also a bit insecure. Women may have minds—every average man will now grant that. But (he will quickly ask) have they ever much more than average minds? Look at history, which this time really does prove what you want it to. Every high peak in the historic landscape is masculine. Point them out just as they occur to you: Shakespeare, Dante, Goethe, Virgil, Horace, Catullus, Plato, Socrates, Newton, Darwin, Pasteur, Watt, Edison, Steinmetz, Heine, Shelley, Keats, Beethoven, Wagner, Bach, Tolstoi. . . .

Where are the women geniuses?

It has really become much more than a question of feminist conversation. Science has attempted to put its seal of approval upon the implied answer to this rhetorical question. It has sought to put the notion that a woman is only a woman but a genius is a man into impressively scientific lingo. The argument goes something like this: In regard to practically all anatomical, physiological, and psychic characteristics the male exhibits a greater variability (i.e., a greater range of spreading down from and up above the average) than the female. The male is the agent of variation; the female is the agent of type conservation. This sex difference operates in the realm of mental ability as everywhere. In any comparable group of men and women, the distribution of intelligence will tend to follow the law of chances (Gaussian Curve). But female intelligence will cluster far more about its average than male. There will be more imbeciles and idiots among men, but there will also be more geniuses. It is really very simple, as the following arbitrary example will show. Supposing you take comparable sample groups of 1,000 men and 1,000 women from a given population. After testing them for grade of intelligence, you classify them according to previously accepted "intelligence classes." Your results would tend to read a little like this:

Intelligence Class	Number Men	Number Women
Idiots	10	3
Inferior	100	50
Slow	200	150
Average	380	595
Able	200	150
Highly talented	100	52
Geniuses	10	..

Of course none of the proponents of this theory would state the alleged facts of man's greater variability in such bald terms. But all of them would agree that men do vary more than women and in some such fashion. In this greater variability they see the explanation of men's monopoly of genius.

According to Karl Pearson this "law of the greater variability of the male" was first stated by Darwin. Somewhat earlier, the anatomist Meckel had concluded that the female is more variable than the male. It is interesting to note in passing that he consequently judged "variation a sign of inferiority." By the time Burdach, Darwin, and others had declared the male more variable, however, variation had become an advantage and the basis and hope of all progress. Today great social significance is attached to the comparative variability of the sexes, especially in its application to the questions of sex differences in mental achievement. Probably the outstanding English-speaking supporters of the theory in its modern form have been Havelock Ellis and Dr. G. Stanley Hall. But even so cautious a student as Dr. E. L. Thorndike has granted it his guarded support. And Dr. James McKeen Cattell has explained the results of his study of 1,000 eminent characters of history by means of it. Indeed, many others hold the theory in one form or another—e.g., Münsterberg, Patrick. What is most important, of course, is that its supporters do not stop with the mere statement of the theory. They ascribe to it tremendous effects in the past and ask for it a large influence in the shaping of our policies in the present.

For Havelock Ellis the greater variability of the male

"has social and practical consequences of the widest significance. The whole of our human civilization would have been a different thing if in early zoological epochs the male had not acquired a greater variational tendency than the female" ("Man and Woman," p. 387). Professor Hall builds up upon it a scheme of gushingly paradisiacal (and properly boring) education for the adolescent girl, which "keeps the purely mental back" and develops the soul, the body, and the intuitions ("The Psychology of Adolescence," Vol. II, Chap. 17). Just because Professor Thorndike is so careful in his statements, his practical deductions from the theory are most interesting: "Thus the function of education for women, though not necessarily differentiated by the small differences in average capacity, is differentiated by the difference in range of ability. Not only the probability and desirability of marriage and the training of children as an essential feature of women's career but also the restriction of women to the mediocre grades of ability and achievement should be reckoned with by our educational system. The education of women for such professorships as administration, statesmanship, philosophy, or scientific research, where a few very gifted individuals are what society requires, is far less needed than education for such professions as nursing, teaching, medicine, or architecture, where the average level is essential. Elementary education is probably an even better investment for the community in the case of girls than in the case of boys; for almost all girls profit by it, whereas the extremely low-grade boy may not be up to his school education in zeal or capacity and the extremely high-grade boy may get on better without. So also with high-school education. On the other hand, post-graduate instruction to which women are flocking in great numbers is, at least in its higher reaches, a far more remunerative social investment in the case of men." (Sex in Education, Bookman, Vol. XXIII, April, 1906, p. 213.)

Before we begin the revision of our educational systems in accordance with this theory, we must make sure that it really explains away the "female geniuses." For although the theory is still widely held by biologists and psychologists, it requires only a short study to discover how tenuous is the evidence adduced in support of it—in all its phases, but especially in regard to mental traits. Darwin apparently gave no statistical evidence to support "the principle," as he called it, and those who have followed him have done little to fill the lack. Professor Hall offers evidence that is almost entirely empirical; Havelock Ellis has been attacked by Karl Pearson for doing much "to perpetuate some of the worst of the pseudo-scientific superstitions to which he [Ellis] refers, notably that of the greater variability of the male human being." Professor Thorndike, in spite of his conclusions, admits that it "is unfortunate that so little information is available for a study of sex differences in the variability of mental traits in the case of individuals over fifteen." And while the overwhelming majority of Professor Cattell's 1,000 eminent characters are men, he merely states without proving his explanation that "woman departs less from the normal than man."

Wise feminists today are concentrating their forces upon this theory. Women have won the right to an acknowledged mind; they want now the right to draw for genius and high talents in the "curve of chance." And this is no merely academic question. For while genius may overcome the sternest physical barriers of environment, it is nourished and developed by tolerant expectancy. Men may accomplish anything, popular thought tells them, and so some men do. But if women are scientifically excluded from the popular expectation of big things, if their educations are toned down to preparation for "the average level," if motherhood remains the only respected career for all women, then the female geniuses will remain few and far between. And, more important still, all thinking women will continue restless over the problem of how to secure the chance to vary in interests and abilities from the average of their sex, and at the same time to be wives and mothers.

In this fight for a full chance to compete, woman may do one (or all) of three things. She may merely ignore the theory and go on "working and living," trusting that as environmental barriers fall one after the other this final question, too, will lose its meaning. She can point out in support of this attitude that the past does contain its female geniuses, however few; and certainly if all the barriers that have been set up against woman's entry into the larger world have not entirely stifled female genius we may at least look forward hopefully to a kinder future. Something of this attitude, of this demand for free experimentation, must make part of every woman's armor against the implications of this theory. But taken alone, it becomes more purely defensive than the status of the theory deserves. For it is really the theory that must defend itself. We may demand not only that it bring forward more affirmative evidence but also that it meet the contrary findings of such investigation as has been made. It must, finally, prove its title to the cause of the scarcity of female geniuses when so many other more eradicable causes may be at its bottom.

The actual evidence that has been gathered on this question is still uncertain and fragmentary. While it does not yet establish anything definitely, it points to rather surprising conclusions. In all cases investigated the discovered differences in variability have been very slight, and if they balance either way tend to prove a greater variability among women. Neither sex need have a monopoly of either imbeciles or geniuses, but women may yet be found to be slightly more favored with both!

The first painstaking investigation in this field was made by Dr. Karl Pearson, who published his interesting results as one essay in his "Chances of Death and Other Studies in Evolution" in 1897. Under the heading Variation in Man and Woman (Vol. I, pp. 256-377), written as a polemical attack upon Havelock Ellis's stand in this theory, he set forth results of measurements upon men and women in seventeen anatomical characteristics. He obtained his data from statistics already collected, from measurements of living men and women, and from post-mortem and archæological examinations. Female variability (coefficients of variation) proved greater in eleven of these seventeen characteristics, male in six. He concluded among other things that "there is . . . no evidence of greater male variability, but rather of a slightly greater female variability. Accordingly, the principle that man is more variable than woman must be put on one side as a pseudo-scientific superstition until it has been demonstrated in a more scientific manner than has hitherto been attempted."

To round out this evidence Drs. Leta Hollingworth and Helen Montague measured 20,000 infants at their birth in the maternity wards of the New York Infirmary for Women and Children. They sought to discover whether environmental influences played any determining role in producing the results obtained by Pearson from measurements upon adults. From the ten anatomical measurements made upon these babies they found that "in all cases the differences in variability are very slight. In only two cases does the percentile variation differ in the first decimal place. In these two cases the variability is once greater for males and once greater for females" (The Comparative Variability of the Sexes at Birth, American Journal of Sociology, Vol. XX, 1914-1915, pp. 335-370).

The findings on anatomical variability do not, of course, necessarily prove anything about differences in the range of mental ability. They do, however, suggest the probability of parallel results and such studies as have been made tend, on the whole, to bear this out. All the recent work in this field (and it is still fragmentary) seems to point at least to equal mental variability among men and women. In 1917 Terman and others in their "Stanford Revision of the Binet-Simon Scale for Measuring Intelligence" investigated this problem among schoolchildren from five to fourteen years old. They obtained the intelligence quotients of 457 boys and 448 girls and compared these I.Q.'s with teachers' estimates and judgments of intelligence and work and with the age-grade distribution of the sexes for the ages of 7 to 14. After making all necessary qualifications they concluded that the tests revealed a small superiority in the intelligence of the girls that "probably rests upon a real superiority in intelligence, age for age." But "apart from the small superiority of the girls, the distribution of intelligence shows no significant differences in the sexes. The data offer no support to the widespread belief that girls group themselves more closely about the median or that extremes of intelligence are more common among boys" (p. 83).

Dr. Hollingworth, again, has made a study of mental differences for adults. She has summarized the results of recent studies in sex differences in mental variability and in tastes, perceptions, interests, etc. Her conclusions on this score are interesting: "(1) The greater variability of males in anatomical traits is not established, but is debated by authorities of perhaps equal competence. (2) But even if it were established, it would only suggest, not prove, that men are more variable in mental traits also. The empirical data at present available on this point are inadequate and contradictory, and if they point either way, actually indicate greater female variability. . . ." (Variability as Related to Sex Differences in Achievement, American Journal of Sociology, Vol. XIX, pp. 510-530, Jan., 1914).

It seems hardly safe scientifically, therefore, to restrict women to the average levels in education and work and profession on the ground that eminence is beyond their range. But if the female geniuses have not been cut off by a comparatively narrowed range of mental ability, where are they? Certainly history does not reveal them in anything like satisfactory number. And it is now that women may bring forward their third weapon of attack. The female geniuses may have been missing not because of an inherent lack in the make-up of the sex, but because of the oppressive, restrictive cultural conditions under which women have been forced to live.

The important role played by cultural conditions in the cultural achievement of various nations and races has been noted with increasing emphasis by the newer schools of sociology and anthropology. No scholar can now defend unchallenged a thesis of "lower or higher races" by urging the achievements of any race as an index of its range of mental ability. Culture grows by its own laws and the high position of the white race may be as much a product of favorable circumstances as of exceptional innate capacities. Similarly the expression taken by the genius of various nations appears to vary strikingly. This is especially impressive in the realm of music. The Anglo-Saxon peoples are singularly lacking in great musical composers. Neither Britain nor America, nor indeed any of the Northern countries, has contributed one composer worthy of mention beside the Beethovens and Wagners and Chopins of this art. Indeed, the great names in music are generally of German, Latin, or Slavic origin. Yet no one thinks of urging this fact as evidence of an Anglo-Saxon failure of major creativeness. Instead, we point to achievements in other fields or at most attempt to explain this peculiar lack by some external causation. Similarly all our impatience with the unartistic approaches of the American people does not lead us to frame a theory of their lack of genius. There are many cultural factors to be considered first.

But as soon as we approach the problem of female genius, too many of us are apt to bring forward an entirely different kind of interpretation. We pass over the undoubted female geniuses lightly—granting Sappho and Bonheur and Brunn and George Eliot and Brontë and Mme Curie and Caroline Herschel and perhaps even Chaminade and Clara Schumann and several others. We admit the undoubtedly significant parts women are playing in modern literature. But the question always remains.

Yet in no national or racial group have cultural influences exercised so restrictive an influence as among the entire female sex. Not only has the larger world been closed to them, not only has popular opinion assumed that "no woman has it in her," but the bearing and rearing of children has carried with it in the past the inescapable drudgery of housework. And this is "a field," as Dr. Hollingworth points out, "where eminence is not possible."

It was Proudhon who sneered in response to a similar argument that "women could not even invent their distaff." But we now know enough about the laws of invention to realize how unfair such sneering is. Professor Franz Boas and his school have long demonstrated that cultural achievement and mental ability are not necessarily correlated. For material culture, once it begins, tends to grow by accumulation and diffusion. Each generation adds to the existing stock of knowledge, and as the stock grows the harvests necessarily become greater. Modern man need have no greater mental ability than the men of the ice ages to explain why his improvements upon the myriad machines and tools that are his yield so much larger a harvest than the Paleolithic hunters' improvements upon their few flint weapons and industrial processes. For, as Professor Ogburn has well shown (in "Social Change," Part III), all invention contains two elements—a growing cultural base and inventive genius to work with the materials it furnishes. The number of new inventions necessarily grows with the cultural base. Even 50 times 100 makes only 5,000, but 2 times 1,000,000 makes 2,000,000. Countless generations have added their share to the total material culture which is ours and which we in turn shall hand down still more enriched and diversified to posterity.

It must be at once obvious that there has been no such cultural growth in housework. Housework has long remained an individualized, non-cumulative industry, where daughter learns from mother the old ways of doing things. The small improvements and ingenuities which most housewives devise seldom find their way into the whole stream of culture. Thus it is that the recent great inventions which are slowly revolutionizing this last stronghold of petty individualism have come from the man-made world. Workers in electricity could more easily devise the vacuum cleaner than the solitary housewife; the electric washer, parquet floors, the tin can, quantity production of stockings, wool, clothing, bread, butter, and all the other instruments that have really made possible women's emancipation have naturally come not from women's minds (any more than from men's) but from the growth of culture and the minds that utilize that growth for further expansion.

Consequently, as women participate in the work of the world and win the right to acquire the results of past achievement in science and technique and art, we may expect their contributions to the social advance to appear in ever greater numbers. Until we give them this full chance to contribute, we have no right to explain the paucity of their gifts to society by inherent lacks. And that such a chance will render the old quest for female geniuses properly old-fashioned is an hypothesis at least as good as any other now current. They will be there, these women—the able and talented and geniuses—working side by side with men, not as "very great men" nor as necessarily "depraved" nor in any way unusual. They will be there as human beings and as women.

Man the Creator

By ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER

"WHEN is no bird, a woman—no human," says a Russian proverb. In this drastic formulation stands written the history of centuries. Woman's claim to "human"-ness was at times accepted with reservations, at other times it was boldly challenged, and even today when woman's legal, social, economic, and political disabilities have been largely removed woman's acceptance in society as man's equal remains dependent on a definition of the "equal."

As in the case of the mental capacity of races, the question of woman's intellectual status was never judged on its merits. Rather, it was accepted as a practical social postulate, then rationalized into the likeness of an inductive conclusion. The problem seems so replete with temptations for special pleading that a thoroughly impartial attitude becomes well-nigh impossible. However, let us attempt it!

Is woman psychologically identical with man? or, If there is a difference, is it one of superiority and inferiority? And of what practical significance is this issue to society?

Two ways of approach are open: Subject men and women to psychological tests, or observe performance in life and, exercising due critical care, infer capacity.

Both methods have been tried. The first enjoys today a certain vogue: it is the method of science, of experimental psychology. Unfortunately, the findings of science in this field have to date resulted in precisely nothing. It was feasible to assume that woman was man's equal in elementary sensory capacity, in memory, types and varieties of associations, attention, sensitiveness to pain, heat, and cold, etc. Experimental psychology has confirmed these assumptions. But what of it? What can we make of it? Precisely nothing. What we are interested in is whether woman can think "as logically" as man, whether she is more intuitive, more emotional, less imaginative, more practical, less honest, more sensitive, a better judge of human nature. These, among many other interesting issues, cannot even be broached by experimental psychology "within the present state of our knowledge."

Remains the second method, to observe performance and infer capacity.

To examine in this fashion all the issues involved would require a small library. I select only one, creativeness. Is woman man's equal in creativeness? The choice is justified by the highly controversial character of the issue as well as its practical bearings.

Two periods in the history of civilization lend themselves well for our purpose, the primitive and the modern.

The primitive world was not innocent of discrimination against woman. In social and political leadership, in the ownership and disposition of property, in religion and ceremonialism, woman was subjected to more or less drastic restrictions. It would, therefore, be obviously unfair to expect her creativeness in these fields to have equaled or even approximated that of man. Not so in industry and art, where division of labor prevailed, but no sex disability. As one surveys the technical and artistic pursuits of primitive tribes, woman's participation is everywhere in evidence. The baskets of California, the painted pots of the Pueblos, the beaded embroideries of the Plains, the famous Chilkat blankets, the tapa cloth of Polynesia, all of these were woman's handiwork. Almost everywhere she plans and cuts and sews and decorates the garments worn by women as well as men. Also, in all primitive communities she gathers the wild products of vegetation and transforms them into palatable foods. More than this, in societies that know not the plow woman is, with few exceptions, the agriculturist. It follows that the observations, skills, techniques, and inventions involved in these pursuits must also be credited to woman.

It will be conceded that in primitive society woman's record is impressive: wherever she is permitted to apply her creativeness she makes good, and the excellence of her achievement is equal to that of man, certainly not conspicuously inferior to his.

In evaluating these findings, however, it is important to take cognizance of the submergence of individual initiative by the tribal pattern, a feature characteristic of primitive life. This applies to men and women, to artisans and artists. Imaginative flights being cut short by traditional norms, the individualism and subjectivism of modern art are here conspicuous by their absence.

How does this record compare with a survey of the modern period?

Here again woman's disabilities in the social, political, and religious realms were so marked that creative participation was impossible. The same is true of architecture. Then come philosophy, mathematics, science, and sculpture, painting, literature, music, and the drama. In philosophy and mathematics there is no woman in the ranks of supreme excellence. Even Sonya Kovalesky, though a talent, was not a great mathematician. In science also, where women have done fine things, none are found among the brightest luminaries. It must be added, moreover, that the few women who have made their mark in the scientific field, notably Mme Curie, have done so in the laboratory, not in the more abstract and imaginative domain of theoretical science.

At this point some may protest that the period during which women have had a chance to test their talents in philosophy, mathematics, and science was too short, their number too small, and that here once more performance cannot fairly be used as a measure of possible achievement. We must heed this protest.

As to sculpture, painting, literature, music, and the drama, I claim that woman's protracted disabilities cannot in any way be held accountable for whatever her performance may be found to be. Women artists, musicians, writers, and, of course, actresses have been with us for a long time. Their number is large and on the increase. Whether married or single, they devote their energies to these pursuits quite unhampered by social taboos. There are in this field no taboos against women. In the United States, in fact, these occupations are held to be more suitable for women than for men.

But what do we find?

In painting and sculpture no women among the best, although considerable numbers among the second best and below. There is no woman Rodin or Meunier or Klinger or Renoir or Picasso.

In literature the case for woman stands better. Here women have performed wonderfully, both in poetry and prose. If they have fallen short, it is only of supreme achievement.[1]

Finally we come to music and the stage. The case of music is admirably suited for our purpose, is really a perfect test case. What do we find? As performers, where minor creativeness suffices, women have equaled the best among men. As composers, where creativeness of the highest order is essential, they have failed. We have a Carreño or Novaes to match Hofmann or Levitzki, a Melba or Sembrich to match a Caruso or de Reszke, a Morini or Powell or Parlow to match a Heifetz or Elman or Kreisler; but there is no woman to match a Beethoven or Wagner or Strauss or Mahler or Stravinsky or Rachmaninoff—a composer-performer.

The situation in drama is almost equally illuminating. Here women have reached the top, have done it so frequently and persistently, in fact, as to challenge men, some think successfully so. But as dramatic writers the few women who tried have never succeeded to rise above moderate excellence. A Rachel or Duse can hold her own against a Possart or Orlenyev, a Bernhardt looms as high as an Irving, Booth, or Salvini; but there is no woman to compare with a Molière or Ostrovski or Rostand or Hauptmann or Chekhov or Kapek.

If now we glance once more at the primitive record the conclusion suggested by an analysis of music and the drama is greatly reinforced. In primitive society woman, whenever opportunity was given her, equaled man in creativeness; in modern society she has uniformly failed in the highest ranges. The results are not incompatible. As indicated before, in early days cultural conditions precluded the exercise of creativeness on the part of the individual except on a minor scale, in modern society major creativeness is possible and has been realized. Woman's creative achievement reaches the top when the top is relatively low; when the top itself rises, she falls behind.

To analyze this fact further is no easy task. We may not assume, as some do, that the difference between major and minor creativeness lies in degrees of rationality. This is certainly erroneous. The true creator is what he is not because of his rationality but because of what he does with it. The differentia, as I see them, are two: boldness of imagination and tremendous concentration on self. The creator, when he creates, is spiritually alone; he dominates his material by drawing it into the self and he permits his imagination, for once torn off the moorings of tradition and precedent, to indulge in flights of gigantic sweep. Imagination and pesonality exalted to the n^{th} power—not rationality—are the marks of the highest creativeness.

In the possession of these traits, then, as here understood, woman is somehow restricted. She has them, of course, and exercises them, but not on the very highest level.

We might stop right here, but it is hard to suppress at least a tentative interpretation.

If the personality-imagination complex is where woman fails at the top, then it becomes a priori probable that this difference between man and woman constitutes a remote sex characteristic. And if this is so, then it may prove worth our while to look for a corresponding difference on a level more directly connected with sex life. No sooner is this done than a difference does indeed appear, and it meets our expectations, for it lies in the direction of personality or self-concentration as well as of imagination. Woman is never so much "a part of" as when she loves, man never so "whole"; her self dissolves, his crystallizes. Also, woman's love is less imaginative than man's: man is more like what woman's love makes him out to be than woman is like what man's love makes her out to be. Relatively speaking, his love is romantic, hers realistic.

This difference in the diagnostic features of man's love and woman's love confirms our suspicion that the discrepancy in performance, where the personality-imagination complex is involved, constitutes a remote sex characteristic.

We must now turn once more to woman's achievement in the different fields of cultural creativeness, for the variation in the degree of excellence reached by her provides a

[1] We need not mention a Dante, Shakespeare, Cervantes, or Milton. Perhaps these are too far back. Not so Tolstoi, Dostoevski, Turgenev, Goethe, Heine, Balzac, Maupassant, the Goncourts, Flaubert, Byron, Browning, Shelley, Emerson, Walt Whitman. Where are their equals among women? And coming down to the modern period, when literature is flooded with feminine figures, is there one who can be placed beside Anatole France or d'Annunzio or Proust or Gorki or even Bernard Shaw (not to mention Ibsen)? The feminine names that might be cited in comparison are obvious enough, but would any of them measure up to these—quite? However, let me mention Katherine Mansfield, Edith Wharton, Edna St. Vincent Millay. And I may add Sheila Kaye-Smith, Willa Cather, Selma Lagerlöf, and Marguérite Audou.

I realize, of course, that such comparisons, except in a most sweeping statement, are invidious. A better picture could be obtained by juxtaposing, one to one, writers of similar type and literary form—but this is a task for a volume.

valuable clue as to where her strength lies. In an ascending series of woman's achievements musical composition is at the bottom of the list, then come sculpture and painting, then literature (with a strange drop in dramatic writing), then instrumental and vocal performance; acting, finally, heads the list.

This order is most illuminating. The relative excellence of woman's achievement is seen to rise with the concreteness of the task and the prominence of the technical and human elements. Creativeness is more abstract in music than in the plastic and graphic arts, more abstract in these than in literature; and in each case woman's relative achievement increases as abstractness decreases. Even the peculiar drop in dramatic writing when compared with other forms of literature is explicable in terms of a more abstract sort of creativeness required by the formal elements of dramatic art. Again, the high position in the list of musical performers and actresses must in part be ascribed to the importance of the technical element in these arts. The preeminence of the musical performers is probably entirely due to this factor, although the intrusion of the human element (performing for an audience) may also have a share in the result.

In the case of acting the human element is the most important factor, for here there is not only an audience to act to but the human content of the acting itself. The human orientation also accounts for the relatively high position of literature in the list when compared to sculpture and painting and to musical composition. Finally, the creativeness of musical performance and acting—two fields in which woman excels—is concrete when compared to that of literature, the arts, and musical composition. Incidentally, a sidelight is thus thrown on the case of science, where woman's relative preeminence is found in the concrete and technical domain of the laboratory.

The preceding analysis leads to the conclusion that woman's strength lies in the concrete as contrasted with the abstract, the technical as contrasted with the ideational, the human as contrasted with the universal and detached. This conclusion, it may be of interest to note, harmonizes perfectly with the general consensus of mankind, as expressed in lay opinion and the judgments of literary men.

To summarize: In all fields of cultural activity opened to her, woman has shown creative ability, but since cultural conditions have made major creativeness possible, she has failed, in comparison with man, in the highest ranges of abstract creativeness. On the other hand, woman has shown in her psychic disposition affinities for the concrete, the technical and the human.

Before closing, these findings may be utilized for a prognostication of woman's activities in the immediate and more remote future.

The present tendency toward equalizing the cultural opportunities of man and woman will no doubt persist. Thus the range of woman's cultural contributions will expand and the excellence of her creative achievement will rise, especially in the fields in which she has so far had but little chance to try her hand. It is to be expected, however, that in the highest ranges of abstract creativeness, in philosophy, science, art, music, and perhaps literature, she will fail as she has hitherto failed to equal man. Her concrete-mindedness will ever continue to provide a useful counterpoise to the more imaginative and abstract leanings of her male companion. Her technical talents will shine more brilliantly in a world in which the crafts will again occupy the prominent place which was theirs once before. But her unique contributions will come in the range of the human element.

In this respect, woman's principal affinity is calculated to bear its choicest fruits in a world better than the one we live in. When formalism recedes from the field of education, as indeed it has already begun to do, and gives room for more individual and psychologically refined processes, woman's share in education will grow in scope and creativeness. When the family has left behind the agonies of its present readjustments, the reconstruction of a freer and happier family life will largely rest on the shoulders of woman. When prisons will be turned into hospitals and criminals will be treated as patients, woman's sensitiveness, insight, and tact will bring her leadership in this field. When a return of leisure and the reduction of economic pressure will permit a revival of the more intimate forms of social intercourse, woman's social talents will find new fields to conquer. When the world of nations will sheathe its sword forever—an event toward the realization of which woman will probably contribute more than man—woman, to whom nothing human is foreign, will at last be free to show the world what she can accomplish as the mother of the family of man.

Acquiescence

By IRWIN EDMAN

It matters not how piteously you plead,
Your voice is but a silence in my ears;
Sighs move me not. I am too straight a reed
For storms; I am not teachable by tears.
Your bitterness may sting me into pain,
And I may wince at every searing word;
You do not, therefore, make me see less plain;
Nor does your anger make you less absurd.
Scorn, rage, all the hot cruelties you have said
I have withstood. But how can I withstand
The hopeless little drooping of your head,
The helpless little lifting of your hand?
By these a lock is turned, and a bolt slips,
And acquiescence leaps across my lips.

Sustenance

By BABETTE DEUTSCH

The cherries darken up in the tree,
The flower of the bee-balm waxes red;
The sun was a little blind fish in the sea:
The white-bellied fog is fed.

A wind straddles the cherry-bough,
The scent is gone from the mint's gray bed.
And now the fire-fly comes, and now
He rises, with his lantern fed.

Beyond black walls lie cherry and mint.
The longest day of the year is dead.
My mind gnaws on a sky of flint,
And so is fed.

National Village Notelets

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The President will now assume leadership of his party. He regards himself as having a mandate from the people.

Nicholas Longworth will now assume leadership of the House of Representatives. In the last session he did not have a mandate from the people, since the people in his district did not know that he was going to be Republican floor-leader. Now, having been floor-leader, and having gone back to his district for reelection, and having got reelected, he regards himself as having a mandate.

Senator Curtis of Kansas will assume leadership of the Senate. He has been Republican "whip," or sub-leader, and now he has been promoted to be leader in succession to Henry Cabot Lodge. He says that leadership is a good thing and that he will try to produce it.

Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Brandeis will again try to lead the Supreme Court. It is not known that the other seven justices will respond to this leadership.

Mr. Bascom Slemp, political secretary to the President, and Mr. Judson Welliver, literary secretary to the President, and Mr. Edward Clark, personal secretary to the President, are reported as being ready to follow the President's leadership.

Members of the Shipping Board are reported to be ready to follow the President's leadership on all matters except the appropriation for the Shipping Board. They think the appropriation should be larger.

Members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, having refused to reduce freight rates on agricultural products while the President was saying and while the Republican Party was saying that freight rates on agricultural products should be reduced, were non-committal today on the subject of leadership.

Seven delegations from rotary clubs visited the White House today and urged the President to assume leadership. Their spokesman said: "We believe in the Constitution and we think that anything the President says the Congress ought to do."

Senator Couzens of Michigan, on being asked whether or not he would follow the leadership of Senator Curtis in the Senate, is erroneously quoted as having responded: "Sure! The President will say it to Senator Curtis and then Senator Curtis will say it to me and then I will do it. That is all there is of it. What we have always needed is simplification in government, and this is it."

Senator Capper of Kansas, having got a larger majority for himself in Kansas than was given to the President, said, it is said: "I will follow the leadership of the President and of the people."

Later it was said that he did not say it.

Representative A. Pitt Andrew of Massachusetts, having got in bad with the Administration for opposing administration ideas, and having got in bad with the radicals for opposing radical ideas, and having been denounced by all the administration newspapers, and having been denounced by the American Federation of Labor and by the La Follette national congressional organization, and having gone to the polls to get reelected, and having been reelected without anybody's daring to run against him, said: "Since everybody is against me, and since I am here, I will, of course, do anything that anybody says."

President Coolidge, it is now discovered, has not said that he will tell Senator Hiram Johnson of California what to do. Friends of the Constitution are said to be greatly disappointed in President Coolidge. They think he ought to tell Senator Johnson what to do and make him do it.

The President is said to have asked Frank W. Stearns of Boston how to make Senator Johnson of California do what he tells him to do if Senator Johnson does not want to do it. Mr. Stearns is said to have told the President to consult some of the editorial writers who write editorials demanding leadership and action in Washington.

The President refused to comment on the rumor that a Senator had been found who would follow the leadership of somebody. The President then proceeded to continue to refuse to comment upon the subject of leadership at all.

A member of the Cabinet was seen talking with a member of the House of Representatives. This is thought to indicate a new close harmony between the executive branch and the legislative branch.

Secretary of the Treasury Mellon is reported to believe that the Government should take a temperate attitude toward business.

The Federal Trade Commission continued yesterday to press its efforts to prevent the Mellon Aluminum Company of America from continuing to practice its alleged unfair methods of competition and of monopoly.

When asked if the Federal Trade Commission would accept the leadership of the Treasury Department or if the Treasury Department would accept the leadership of the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Trade Commission and the Treasury Department replied that the problem would perhaps be referred to Colonel H. C. Smither, chief coordinator of the Bureau of the Budget.

Several correspondents, who had sent out dispatches about leadership, have now sent out dispatches saying that we can never have leadership in Washington as long as there are so many people here. The only way to have leadership, these correspondents now say, is to have President Coolidge and Representative Longworth and Senator Curtis and Mr. Justice Brandeis here and have all the others send in their proxies.

The trouble with Washington, these correspondents now say, is too many individual personalities and too many individual convictions.

President Coolidge, Representative Longworth, Senator Curtis, and Mr. Justice Brandeis, having conferred, announce that among them they had found three convictions too many.

All is as quiet and composed as usual along the Potomac.

On fifteenth thought the correspondents have decided that nobody is going to boss Washington. One man scooped them on this discovery. The President, it is now learned, never did say that he hoped that even the Interstate Commerce Commission, which he appoints, would do what he wants. The President, it is thought, will take what leadership he can and will not attempt what leadership he can't. His problem is to be sensible and only a President, while the rotarians must be led to think that he is crazy and a monarch.

Some correspondents think that Calvin Coolidge can get away with even this.

The Wind and the Whirlwind

By WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT

These stanzas are part of a poem by Egypt's one staunch friend in England, written in 1883 after the bombardment of Alexandria by the British and the arrest of Arabi Pasha, the Egyptian nationalist leader. We reprint them on account of their immediate and tragic bearing on events in Egypt today. Blunt died in 1922.

I have a thing to say. But how to say it?
I have a cause to plead. But to what ears?
How shall I move a world by lamentation,
A world which heeded not a nation's tears?

How shall I speak of justice to the aggressors,
Of right to Kings whose rights include all wrong,
Of truth to Statecraft, true but in deceiving,
Of peace to Prelates, pity to the Strong?

Where shall I find a hearing? In high places?
The voice of havoc drowns the voice of good.
On the throne's steps? The elders of the nation
Rise in their ranks and call aloud for blood.

Where? In the street? Alas for the world's reason!
Not Peers, not Priests alone this deed have done.
The clothes of those high Hebrews stoning Stephen
Were held by all of us—aye, every one.

Yet none the less I speak. Nay, here by Heaven
This task at least a poet best may do,
To stand alone against the mighty many
To force a hearing for the weak and few.

Unthanked, unhonored—yet a task of glory,
Not in his day, but in an age more wise,
When those poor Chancellors have found their portion
And lie forgotten in their dust of lies.

And who shall say that this year's cause of freedom
Lost on the Nile has not as worthy proved
Of poet's hymning as the cause which Milton
Sang in his blindness or which Dante loved? . . .

* * * * *

I have a thing to say. But how to say it?
How shall I tell the mustery of guile,
The fraud that fought, the treason that disbanded,
The gold that slew the children of the Nile?

The ways of violence are hard to reckon,
And men of right grow feeble in their will,
And Virtue of her sons has been forsaken,
And men of peace have turned aside to kill.

How shall I speak of them, the priests of Baal,
The men who sowed the wind for their ill ends!
The reapers of the whirlwind in that harvest
Were all my countrymen, were some my friends.

Friends, countrymen, and lovers of fair freedom,
Souls to whom still my soul laments and cries!
I would not tell the shame of your false dealings,
Save for the blood which clamors to the skies.

A curse on Statecraft, not on you, my Country!
The men you slew were not more foully slain
Than was your honor at their hands you trusted.
They died, you conquered—both alike in vain.

Crimes find accomplices, and Murder weapons.
The ways of Statesmen are an easy road.
All swords are theirs, the noblest with the neediest.
And those who serve them best are men of good. . . .

* * * * *

I have a thing to say. Oh how to say it!
One summer morning at the hour of prayer,
And in the face of Man and Man's high Maker,
The thunder of their cannon rent the air.

The flames of death were on you and destruction.
A hail of iron on your heads they poured.
You fought, you fell, you died until the sunset;
And then you fled forsaken of the Lord.

I care not if you fled. What men call courage
Is the least noble thing of which they boast.
Their victors always are great men of valor.
Find me the valor of the beaten host!

It may be you were cowards. Let them prove it—
What matter? Were you women in the fight,
Your courage were the greater that a moment
You steeled your weakness in the cause of right.

Oh I would rather fly with the first craven
Who flung his arms away in your good cause,
Than head the hottest charge by England vaunted
In all the record of her unjust wars!

Poor sheep! They scattered you. Poor slaves! They bowed you.
You prayed for your dear lives with your mute hands.
They answered you with laughter and with shouting,
And slew you in your thousands on the sands. . . .

* * * * *

Oh insolence of strength! Oh boast of wisdom!
Oh poverty in all things truly wise!
Thinkest thou, England, God can be outwitted
Forever thus by him who sells and buys?

Thou sellest the sad nations to their ruin.
What hast thou bought? The child within the womb,
The son of him thou slayest to thy hurting,
Shall answer thee, "An Empire for thy tomb."

Thou wentest to this Egypt for thy pleasure.
Thou shalt remain with her for thy sore pain.
Thou hast possessed her beauty. Thou wouldst leave her.
Nay. Thou shalt lie with her as thou hast lain.

She shall bring shame upon thy face with all men.
She shall disease thee with her grief and fear.
Thou shalt grow sick and feeble in her ruin.
Thou shalt repay her to the last sad tear.

Her kindred shall surround thee with strange clamors,
Dogging thy steps till thou shalt loathe their din.
The friends thou hast deceived shall watch in anger.
Thy children shall upbraid thee with thy sin.

All shall be counted thee a crime—thy patience
With thy impatience. Thy best thought shall wound.
Thou shalt grow weary of thy work thus fashioned,
And walk in fear with eyes upon the ground. . . .

And thou too, Egypt, mourner of the nations,
Though thou hast died today in all men's sight,
And though upon thy cross with thieves thou hangest,
Yet shall thy wrong be justified in right.

'Twas meet one man should die for the whole people.
Thou wert the victim chosen to retrieve
The sorrows of the Earth with full deliverance.
And, as thou diest, these shall surely live.

Thy prophets have been scattered through the cities.
The seed of martyrdom thy sons have sown
Shall make of thee a glory and a witness
In all men's hearts held captive with thine own.

Thou shalt not be forsaken in thy children.
Thy righteous blood shall fructify the Earth.
The virtuous of all lands shall be thy kindred,
And death shall be to thee a better birth.

Therefore I do not grieve. Oh hear me, Egypt!
Even in death thou art not wholly dead.
And hear me, England! Nay. Thou needs must hear me.
I had a thing to say. And it is said.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter saw her first as she walked deliberately through the crowded railway station by which he had just entered Manhattan. Her gray fur coat was grimy with the dust of countless city streets and her white neck was shadowed with the same dingy stain. But dignity was in every movement of the lithe body that found its way so easily through the tangled mass of human beings. As she passed the Drifter he looked into her eyes—and knew somehow that he had come face to face with reality. They were calm and wise—unjudging, and very tired. And because wisdom had come to her through sorrows they were old eyes—too old for the graceful figure that slipped through the crowd and vanished into the street.

* * * * *

A FEW mornings later the Drifter took a turn along a parkway. A gray figure walked there, too, close to the fence. Her pace was steady, unhurried, but at intervals she looked back. The Drifter followed her glance. At a distance came a large well-groomed police dog. Obviously he was very young and very excited. His tail was up, his step was eager. Every movement said: "Isn't this great? A cat so early in the morning. I'll catch her too. I always get everything I want." The Drifter wanted to box the dog's ears, but what could he do? He caught a glimpse of the gray cat's eyes. There was no fright in them—she was simply bored, tragically bored. He watched. The dog was gaining a bit. The cat turned a corner and her pursuer followed. They both disappeared.

* * * * *

THE Manhattan Cat. Who has not seen her? Like a gray shadow she moves over the face of the city—and disillusionment is in her eyes. She may be black, she may be white, she may be black and white; but always there is that indefinable grayness about her that distinguishes her from other cats. In every doorway she lurks—and woe to the youth who looks into her sad green eyes overlong. Where does she live? The Drifter couldn't tell. He has seen the little gamin sparrows visiting their nests on the shoulders of the saints in Trinity churchyard; he has never seen the Manhattan Cat except on the move. He did see two bedraggled and frightened kittens under a stairway on Brooklyn Bridge the other day, but that is all.

* * * * *

PERHAPS there's a cats' heaven, where the streets are paved with eiderdown and the only dogs are toy dogs; where the gutters run with milk and birds are sometimes, not too often, caught. But the Drifter fears the City Cat wouldn't like it. Three kittens were offered homes in the bosom of a refined family. All the comforts were theirs for the taking. But milk-fed cleanliness was not to their liking, and soft carpets were irksome to the pavement-hardened feet of their inheritance. One by one they disappeared into the streets of their forefathers, there to live, to suffer, and to learn in the heart breaking, dream-taking struggle of the streets. And not one of them ever returned. For cats, like human beings, prefer hell on earth to heaven out of it.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Be Honest to the South

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is a significant article in the American Mercury for October called The Dilemma of the Negro by that eloquent and admirable writer, W. E. Burghardt Du Bois. The whole is a careful study of educational problems for the Negro, and it contains a strong plea for Atlanta University, which he says is starving today. "Despite its great record, it has not half the income it needs; its teachers are wretchedly underpaid; its equipment is painfully inadequate." I can vouch for the needs of Atlanta University and for the beautiful spirit of faith and hope and loving service that is shown by the members of the faculty, both black and white.

The South is fond of saying it understands the Negro best. It has even the impertinence to proclaim that it treats him best! It makes an insincere pretense of desiring the betterment of the race—insincere because it vents its spleen upon those white men and women who really try to lift it up. It amazed me to find that the most delightful white men and women were entirely ostracized for giving their lives to teach the Negroes. One woman professor at Atlanta University is the daughter of a former president of a well-known Wisconsin college, yet she is nevertheless completely ignored by white Atlanta, even her own friends coming down from the North falling into line with the local policy of neglect.

And speaking of visitors from the North, I want to protest against the silence of those who loathe Southern injustice and yet are afraid to speak and give offense. It is not considered good form to utter one's opinion on the Negro question, as if it could really be a purely local question, one in which the North is not just as much interested as the South. Thus the few liberals of the South (and they are growing) receive no support from the liberals of the North. They have begged me to pass on the word to speak out, to utter one's scorn. Let us no longer toady to Southern opinion, saying: "It is a bigger problem than we of the North thought." "If we lived here we also would act as you do." When we learn that taxes are taken from the Negro and little given in return, let us cease being polite and call it plain dishonesty as it deserves. When we learn that $9.64 is spent in the education of a white boy and $1.74 for a black boy, don't let them tell you they are doing their best to educate the Negro. If the South wished to educate its Negroes, surely it would not dishonor the white teachers who are endeavoring to accomplish it.

No, the next time you go South, leave your politeness at home. Tell the truth.

New York, October 30 ANNIE NATHAN MEYER

Library Censorship

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Were you born in this country?" "Why did you come here?"

Thus spake Mr. John H. Leete, the director of the Carnegie Library of Pittsburgh, simply because I contributed to the library a book dealing with a vital phase of American history. The book was John Kenneth Turner's remarkable and most accurate study of America's part in the late war, "Shall It Be Again?" The director refused to place this book on the shelves for general circulation. He told me by letters and by a personal interview that this book was anti-American —insidiously anti-American—and that no true American would desire to see it circulated.

The Carnegie Library of Pittsburgh is controlled by a ruthless czar; he is the director, who is appointed by a board of trustees, among them Andrew Mellon, foremost Pittsburgh citizen (on the income-tax returns) and Secretary of the United States Treasury. The director has the final word on all books, magazines, and newspapers that are to enter the library.

After experimenting thus far, I decided to go further. I sent the library three more books, which, I wrote the director, I would be glad to contribute if he would place them on the shelves for general circulation. These books were Scott Nearing's "The American Empire," Upton Sinclair's "The Goose-Step," and ex-Senator Pettigrew's "Imperial Washington." A few days later I received an acknowledgment and thanks for my contribution, but do you think they were ever placed on the shelves for general circulation? No!

Pittsburgh, October 26 BENJAMIN P. CHASS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I appreciate your courtesy in allowing me to see the article criticizing the policy of the Carnegie Library. As typical of many points in which the article falls short of the truth, let me say that the opening conversation, in order correctly to represent the facts, should be prefaced by statements of your correspondent to the effect: America is all wrong. Her government is altogether corrupt and her public men are all crooks and grafters. It was only then that as a matter of curiosity I asked the question "Were you born in this country?" and obtained the answer that the young man was of Russian birth. Again, to be fair, the article should state explicitly that the books were accepted for reference use, which would make them always available for all readers of maturity.

Yes, there is a distinct difference of opinion between your correspondent and the writer as to the policy which should be pursued by a public library. We do contend that a public library is not only justified in limiting the circulation of certain material to people of maturity of judgment and with sufficient knowledge of the facts in question to enable them to discriminate between true and just charges and unfair and malicious slander, but is obligated to adopt such a policy. While we would not and do not debar from our shelves any material representing the viewpoint of any individual or group of individuals, we do believe that we should not circulate indiscriminately among young and immature minds unproved or false assertions and accusations calculated to defame character and to subvert government and good order. We believe that public funds should not be devoted to such a purpose.

May I call your attention to the fact, also, that every editor and publisher uses discretionary power as to the material he shall circulate and, in that sense, exercises the same right (censorship?) as that claimed for the library? To say that the library shall circulate without question anything that finds its way into print simply makes the publisher the judge rather than the public library.

Pittsburgh, November 24 JOHN H. LEETE,
Director, Carnegie Library of Pittsburgh

Adrienne Toner, Saint

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have received a copy of The Nation containing an exceedingly interesting and brilliant review of my novel "The Little French Girl." It would ill become a writer to enter into any controversy as to an interpretation of her work, yet may I be allowed—in regard to an earlier novel—one protest?

"Adrienne Toner" is in no sense the story of "the grooming of an American girl into ladyhood." I see Adrienne as no more, or less, of a lady at the end than at the beginning of the book. Her development takes place in quite another category, for it is as a saint that I see her ending, and her story is the story of a saint. ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK

Far End, Kingham, Oxon, England, October 31

Savinkov and Masaryk

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The reprint of Savinkov's story, appearing in the International Relations Section of your publication for October 22, finally gives an opportunity to subject Savinkov's assertions as regards President Masaryk to a closer scrutiny. Briefly, Savinkov asserts that in the year 1918 he received money from one Klepando in the name of President Masaryk for the purpose of conducting a campaign of assassination against the Bolshevik leaders.

President Masaryk left Moscow on the 9th of March on his way to America by way of Siberia and Japan. While in Tokio he advised the Allied governments not to antagonize the Soviet leaders and so to handle the Russian situation as to prevent these men from becoming German tools, consciously or unconsciously. Whether we agree with Masaryk's Russian policy or not, this fact of itself is pretty nearly sufficient to discredit Savinkov's story in so far as it involves Dr. Masaryk, who, in his memorandum from Tokio, holds that a Soviet downfall is not to be expected in the near future.

President Masaryk arrived in Vancouver on April 29, 1918. I know, because I met him there in response to his cabled request from Tokio. From that time until November 19 of the same year I was with him daily, first as his secretary, then as delegate of the Czecho-Slovak National Council, and still later as commissioner of the Czecho-Slovak Republic to the United States. I know every move that was made, I saw virtually every document that was issued, including cablegrams to the troops in Siberia, and through this all Masaryk's insistence is upon strict neutrality of the Czechs in Russian matters and their departure for the western front in France.

The clash with the Soviets came as a development following Masaryk's departure from Russia, and was not welcomed by the President, still less instigated or ordered by him. It was inevitable the moment the Soviets decided to place obstacles in the path of the Czechs in their desire to reach France.

Savinkov speaks of a Klepando who made him the alleged payment. There was no Klepando in the Czech movement in Russia. Probably Savinkov refers to George Klecanda, secretary of the Russian branch of the Czecho-Slovak National Council. But if so, more than reasonable doubt is thrown upon his story by the mere fact that Klecanda died on April 28, 1918, on a railroad train between Petropavlovsk and Omsk, and was buried in the Omsk cemetery.

At all these times Savinkov appears to have been in Russia proper. He claims that he was ordered by the French ambassador to begin a revolt in Jaroslav or Rybinsk at the beginning of July, 1918. At that time Masaryk was in America and Klecanda had been dead for two months.

Washington, D. C., October 21 CHARLES PERGLER

Schoolbooks and Propaganda

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your magazine for September 17 appears an article which refers, among other things, to a textbook of mine in an uncomplimentary way. I am accused of introducing various sorts of propaganda, consciously or unconsciously, in favor of rich men and corporations, with the effect of prejudicing the minds of children who read the book in favor of these same "malefactors of great wealth." Especially, the writers Messrs. Herskovits and Willey are alarmed by the fact that I used some illustrations which came from the United States Steel Corporation or some of their subsidiaries.

Please allow me to state that after a considerable number of years' experience in the classroom I never once knew a member of the class to make any reference whatever to the source of an illustration which was printed in fine type beneath it. Nobody except a college professor looking for trouble would read into a mere credit line anything in the nature of propaganda. Furthermore, the criticisms in the article are too often based on paragraphs or sentences or illustrations taken out of their context and made to seem to suggest something that the ordinary reader would never think of, as long as they remained in their proper place. I am sure of no bias, conscious or unconscious, when I put myself into the mental state required of a textbook writer, in favor of or against corporations, labor unions, or any other of the numerous economic elements that actually do exist. I will not allow myself to refuse to give corporations or rich men credit for occasionally doing something right. But I know that the discussions and questions and illustrations in the book will create no prejudice one way or the other, if considered by any teacher or class in the spirit in which they were prepared. An author cannot help it if a teacher or critic reads into a text something which is not there. But he does object to having his work advertised as unfair when there is no cause for any such assertion.

Pittsburgh, October 24 R. O. HUGHES

[Mr. Hughes selects John D. Rockefeller's church for illustration as an example of a "community church." Public-health work is illustrated by a tooth-brush drill by "courtesy of Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Co." His pictures of strikes are limited to two street-cars wrecked in front of a church; the wreckage of the supply-house at Herrin; and a crowd listening to a strike speaker. Beneath the first of these is the caption: "Strikers or their sympathizers overturned and wrecked these cars in Denver, Colorado. The public was seriously inconvenienced. Are such conditions necessary or excusable?" After careful study of the book we cannot accept Mr. Hughes's contention that Messrs. Herskovits and Willey distorted his meaning by quoting sentences apart from their context. His section on Those Who Would Overturn Things, from which they quoted liberally, is grotesque. Mr. Hughes's own book makes plain his earnest desire to be fair and to state both sides; most of it is excellent, but the chapter on Industrial Relations reveals his own, perhaps unconscious, distrust of labor unions and sympathy with industrial paternalism.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

E. D. Morel's Work

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The announcement of E. D. Morel's death will be accepted by friends of the liberal movement in England and throughout the civilized world as the loss of a rare leader. His combination of intellectual rectitude and moral courage is almost without parallel in our times. How little we know, or perhaps are still intended to know, of such champions of truth is made clear by the scant notice of his death, as it had been by the superficial recognition of his great achievements during his life. His election at Dundee over Churchill by a majority of ten thousand at the time of MacDonald's triumph was hardly recorded in this country. Today we have to search English papers to find that in the late conservative landslide he was again elected from the same district by an increased majority.

These triumphs at the polls are the more significant when we remember that his was a life's challenge to falsehood and hypocrisy in a period of lying propaganda at its worst. The man who wrote "Red Rubber," and fought for many years to expose the crime of the Belgian Congo and succeeded, could hardly expect official or even popular favor. The author of "Ten Years of Secret Diplomacy" was all too true a prophet of the Great War's origin, purpose, and tragedy to invite recognition in his own lifetime. The British citizen who throughout the war refused to bend the knee before official misstatement, and finally to curb him was sent to prison on a technical charge, must have been prepared to be lost in obscurity.

But he was a man of action. He not only survived; he triumphed. His publication Foreign Affairs has maintained his crusade for truth. In its columns he has confirmed the correctness of every charge he ever uttered against the myth of sole guilt for the war and against the hideous crimes committed since the war in the name of humanity and democracy and world peace.

Friends of democracy may derive consolation and courage from the fact that so unyielding a champion of truth won the confidence of his constituency in two elections. They may have to concede that the British foreign system is too well intrenched to have made it possible to admit so uncompromising a champion of open diplomacy into the cabinet even when MacDonald was premier, but nothing can deprive them of the inspiration of a life of service so completely unselfish, courageous, and noble.

St. Louis, November 24 CHARLES NAGEL

To Morel

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am sending you the following few lines in appreciation of a great man who has just died:

Dauntless he walked breast forward, pressing to his goal;
Scorned Courts where subterfuge helped diplomats betray,
Held Truth his oriflamme, nor feared the scourging way
Which immemorial time has made the true man's dole.

New York, December 1 MARY CRUTTENDEN PERCY

International Relations Section

The Violation of Europe

THE results of the World War and the treaties which followed it and the position of the United States toward the European settlement are vigorously outlined by Samuel Untermyer in the following "Reflections on Armistice Day" delivered at the Temple Rodeph Sholom on November 11, 1924:

When the agreement for the League of Nations was formulated it was found to be an agreement to perpetuate, by the combined force of arms of the great nations of the earth, the most brutal, despotic, and war-breeding "peace" in the annals of time. Then and then only did we learn that our dear country, under the guise of "a peace without victory" that was to make the world forever thereafter "safe for democracy," had been made the pawn in the most treacherous game ever played in history. We, whose participation had changed defeat into success for the Allies, were repaid by a treaty that violated every promise made by us and which cannot but perpetuate hatreds for generations to come.

The fundamental particulars in which these three documents (the armistice terms, the League agreement, the Treaty of Versailles) differ from one another, the oppressive and destructive exactions that were added from step to step, have been so frequently analyzed and discussed that the outstanding facts are now well known to all students of the subject. Prefacing them by a brief chronological table, they may be summarized as follows:

NEGOTIATIONS PRECEDING THE ARMISTICE

October 5, 1918. German note to the President, accepting the Fourteen Points laid down in his address to Congress of January 8, 1918.

October 8, 1918. President asked if he was to understand definitely that the German Government accepted the terms laid down in the Fourteen Points and his subsequent addresses and that nothing would be left except to discuss the practical details of their application.

October 12, 1918. The German Government returned an unconditional affirmative to this question.

October 14, 1918. Further communications from the President concerning submarine warfare and guaranties of the representative character of the German Government.

October 20, 1918. Such assurances were given in the German note of that date.

October 23, 1918. The President announced that having received the solemn and explicit assurance of the German Government that it unreservedly accepted the terms of peace laid down in his address of January 8, 1918, and the principles of settlement announced in his subsequent addresses, particularly in the address of September 27, 1918, he had communicated the correspondence to the Allied Powers with the suggestion that they ask their military advisers to draw up armistice terms.

November 5, 1918. The President transmitted to the German Government the reply of the Allied Governments declaring their willingness to make peace on the terms laid down in the President's address of January 8, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses—with two qualifications, the one concerning the freedom of the seas and the other relating to reparations.

The peace agreed to by Austria-Hungary with General Diaz in Padua was based on the same terms and principles contained in President Wilson's addresses above referred to.

IN WHAT RESPECTS THESE TERMS WERE VIOLATED

Time will permit of only the briefest summary:

1. The first of the Fourteen Points relates to "open covenants openly arrived at and open diplomacy."

This was violated by the Treaty of the Trianon concluded with Hungary. The allotment of territory to Rumania, including all of Transylvania and a large piece of territory across the River Tisza with over 5,000,000 inhabitants, was based on the secret treaty between the Quintuple Entente—that is, France, Great Britain, Italy, Russia, and Rumania—concluded in August, 1916. The allotments to Serbia and Czecho-Slovakia were based on the secret pacts of Corfu, Cleveland, and Pittsburgh respectively.

2. The third point concerns the "removal of economic barriers and the assurances of equality of trade." This was violated in every particular.

Germany and her allies were required to obligate themselves by the treaties of Versailles, St. Germain-en-Laye, and the Trianon both with respect to imports and exports and as regards tariff regulations and prohibitions for five years to accord "most favored nations" treatment to the Allies and their associated states, without reciprocity; for five years Alsace-Lorraine was made free to export into Germany without payment of customs duties, up to the average amount that had been sent into Germany from 1911 to 1913. No such treatment was accorded German exports into Alsace-Lorraine. For three years Polish exports to Germany and for five years Luxemburg's exports to Germany were given similar treatment under the treaty, without reciprocity. Luxemburg was permanently excluded from the German Customs Union. For six months after the treaty came into force Germany was prohibited, and again without reciprocity, from imposing duties on many imports from the Allies and associated states higher than the "most favored nation" duties prevailing before the war.

This prohibition was continued for a further period of two and one-half years beyond the six months on such commodities as wines, vegetable oils, artificial silk, and washed or scoured wools. . . .

The Allies also reserved special treatment on the left bank of the Rhine, under cover of which the French have tried to establish an independent republic under French clerical auspices.

The provisions relating to railways as affecting goods shipped from Allied countries into Germany and in transit through Germany stipulate a one-sided and "most favored nation" treatment in respect to rail freight rates, etc.

The treaty has given over the administration of the Elbe, the Oder, the Danube, and the Rhine to international commissions. There were similar one-sided stipulations in the Treaties of the Trianon and St. Germain-en-Laye.

3. "Reduction of armaments guaranteed." This covenant has likewise been flagrantly violated by the treaties. Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Bulgaria have been disarmed and left to the "tender mercies" of the Allies while the states of the Allied Powers have greatly increased their armaments.

On November 1, 1918, Czechia (which at that time had not been allowed to annex Slovakia) had 70,000 men under arms, Jugoslavia 60,000, and Rumania 127,000. Today, about five years after the peace, their actual military forces are at least twice as large as at the time of the armistice.

The Hungarian army, on the other hand, has been converted into a voluntary body and limited to 35,000, consisting of about 7 mixed battalions. Czecho-Slovakia's military force has 12 infantry corps, 3 cavalry and 4 artillery battalions, and 2 mountain batteries. Jugoslavia's army includes 16 infantry corps, 2 cavalry corps, and 8 heavy artillery regiments. Rumania commands 14 infantry corps, 2 corps de chasseurs, 1 mountain corps, 3 chasseur battalions, 2 battalions of guards, and 7 mounted, 7 sanitary, and 7 reserve corps.

The 3½ Hungarian corps are in the proportion of 1 to 17 compared to the 59 corps of the Little Entente. Hungary's 525 machine-guns are faced by 3,200 of Czecho-Slovakia and 560 of Jugoslavia and the 4,870 of Rumania. This means that Czecho-Slovakia possesses 6 times as many machine-guns as Hungary, and Rumania 9 times as many. As to cannon, Czecho-Slovakia has 800 pieces of ordnance, Jugoslavia 722, and Rumania 1,822, while 105 is the total of Hungary. Thus Czecho-Slovakia has 8 times, Jugoslavia 7 times, and Rumania 15 times more of these arms than Hungary.

The Hungarian army is prohibited from having any flying-machines, while Czecho-Slovakia is now in command of 1,400 aeroplanes as a result of the completion of the 1922 program. Jugoslavia has 70 and Rumania has 80 flying machines.

Hungary is not allowed to mobilize. Czecho-Slovakia, according to the 1920 Army Act, recruits to a total of 2 to 3 million men. Jugoslavia with her 32 categories accounts for 1,600,000. Rumania with her 27 categories represents a total of 2,500,000. That is a total of 6,400,000 men to be let loose on the comparatively defenseless population of Hungary.

The Allied countries are allowed compulsory military service, while the former Central Powers are permitted only voluntary service.

As to the fifth point, concerning the "impartial adjustment of colonial claims": This was completely disregarded. All former German colonies have been taken without compensation. Austria-Hungary have lost their former settlements in China, without compensation.

4. The ninth point, which assured the adjustment of Italy's boundaries according to nationality, was also flagrantly disregarded. Millions of Germans and Austrians have been included in the territory ceded to Italy by Austria (including Bozen), and without plebiscites.

5. As to the tenth point, promising autonomy to the people of Austria-Hungary: This, too, was violated in every particular. Instead of autonomy millions of people have been wrested from their mother country without a plebiscite and against their will. Hungary lost about 14,000,000 out of a total of 21,000,000. With the exception of western Hungary no plebiscite was held anywhere. Here the population voted almost 2 to 1 in favor of retaining Hungarian rule, although the inhabitants are chiefly of German origin.

6. The eleventh point provided that Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated and the occupied territories restored.

Montenegro was swallowed up by Serbia and ceased to exist. Serbia, now known as Jugoslavia, has been enormously enlarged at the expense of Hungary, Bulgaria, Croatia, and Bosnia. Historical allegiance and nationality were ruthlessly disregarded. This is true also as to Macedonia and Herzegovina—which latter province has never belonged to Serbia. Croatia never belonged to Serbia and wants to be autonomous.

7. The thirteenth point, providing for an independent Polish state, has been disregarded in the partition of Upper Silesia, the cession of eastern Prussia to Poland, and the establishment of Danzig as a free city.

Referring now to the principles laid down in President Wilson's addresses: On February 11, 1918, he said: "There shall be no annexations, no contributions, no punitive damages."

Under the peace treaties there have been wholesale annexations. Leaving aside Alsace-Lorraine, which it was always understood would go to France, there were annexed Moresnet, Eupen, and Malmedy by Belgium; part of Silesia by Czecho-Slovakia; eastern and western Prussia (partly) together with Posnania by Poland; Upper Silesia partly by Poland; North Schleswig by Denmark; all the colonies of Germany by the Allied Powers. All German territory west of the Rhine is to be occupied for at least fifteen years. It remains to be seen how much longer this occupation or annexation will last.

Nation Dinners

Dec. 12, 1924

Is the Press Kept?

Speakers:
HERBERT BAYARD SWOPE,
Executive Editor, The World
ERNEST GRUENING,
Former Managing Editor, N. Y. Tribune

Can You Get the Truth from Persona Grata Foreign Correspondents?

WILLIAM G. SHEPHERD
Former Foreign Correspondent

Chairman:
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,
Editor, The Nation

Jan. 23, 1925

Is Monogamy Feasible?

Speakers:
FLOYD DELL
ELSIE CLEWS PARSONS
A. A. GOLDENWEISER

Chairman:
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Feb. 13, 1925

Do Americans Speak English?

Speakers:
CARL VAN DOREN
and others

Chairman:
ARTHUR WARNER

Tickets will be sold only to Nation subscribers and their guests. Each dinner $2.50

A ticket to any of the dinners with The Nation for a year $6.50

Season tickets for the three dinners $7.00; with The Nation for a year $11.00

All dinners at
The Fifth Avenue Restaurant
200 Fifth Avenue

The Nation,
20 Vesey Street, New York.
Enclosed find $..... Send me The Nation for a year and reserve.....places at the.....dinner, (or the series of dinners).

Name .....

Address .....

(The tickets will be mailed a few days before the dinner.)

12-10-24

Two-thirds of Hungary has been fraudulently taken by Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, and Jugoslavia; Fiume by Italy (leaving Hungary without a port or access to the sea); Macedonia by Serbia; the Dobrudja by Rumania; Bessarabia, Bukovina by Rumania; parts of Tyrol; Trieste, the Austrian seacoast, and the Hungarian littoral by Italy.

The American delegate to the Peace Conference, Mr. John Foster Dulles, vigorously protested against contributions and punitive damages from Germany. He particularly objected to the payment of military pensions, which is the biggest item of the reparations payment. Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, another American delegate, declared that not one legal expert of the American delegation advised the inclusion of pensions in the reparations.

In the address of February 11, 1918, above referred to, the President also declared:

> Self-determination is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril. . . . Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims of rival states.

Except in eastern Prussia, Upper Silesia, and western Hungary, there was no plebiscite and no self-determination. The peoples have simply been transferred to alien rule without being consulted. . . .

If the war had terminated in the defeat and surrender of the armies of the Central Powers the Allies might well have claimed that under the ancient brutal rules of war, whereby "to the victors belong the spoils," they were entitled to absolutely dictate the terms of peace, however destructive to the future peace of the world. But this war was not supposed to have been so terminated. Each side (except the United States) was almost as near the point of exhaustion and enforced surrender as was the other. Hostilities were suspended by common consent and upon assurances that were flagrantly violated at every step. The dismemberment of Austria-Hungary and the taking of a vast part of the territory of Russia, the former ally of the Allies, were accomplished because their resistance-power was exhausted.

France is today almost as much the military master of the new states, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Jugoslavia, that were taken largely from her ally, Russia, and from Austria-Hungary, as though they were her territory. We have substituted French militarism for German militarism, but in a more aggravated form.

The League of Nations, that was to correct past wrongs and aggressions and to perpetuate a just peace, has proved an iridescent dream. It was beautiful in its abstract conception but was wrecked and converted into a weapon of injustice and oppression before it took form. The treacherous and obnoxious character of the peace that it was finally pledged to assure, more even than the requirements of Articles X and XII of the Covenant, made it impossible for America to become a party to that iniquitous bargain.

America's Role

Every venture that we make into the realm of diplomacy proves anew that we are mere children in that art. The play upon our idealism is as easy as taking candy from children. It is the indoor sport of European statesmen. A trade with the United States is an easy diversion in which we are sure to come off in the rear. In the Spanish War, after having easily beaten the poor, weak, impoverished enemy with its antiquated navy, we paid $20,000,000 for the privilege of winning the war and of relieving Spain of a liability that had hung like a millstone around her neck and assumed the role of colonial development of subject peoples for which we are not fitted, which is foreign to our conceptions of free government, and into which we have poured and will continue for generations to pour untold wealth.

America - South - of - U. S.

Deals exclusively in books, maps, prints, old and new, relating to South America, Central America, Mexico and the West Indies.

Catalogues of 900 out-of-print items mailed on request.

A list of 400 current books always in stock is now in preparation. It includes the latest books.

EDWARD W. AMES, Prop.

44 West 47th Street New York

Telephone, Bryant 4096

The New School Bookshop

will be glad to help you choose your

Christmas Gifts

Books for Children and Grown-ups

Gift Cards of Unusual Beauty

Open Evenings

465 West 23d St. Call or Telephone Chelsea 1386 New York City

PROSPECT HILL APARTMENTS

41*st* STREET AND PROSPECT PLACE

100% Co-operative

ON the highest point in midtown New York; ground floor on a level with sixth floor in Washington Square district; within 10 minutes' walk of Grand Central Station. Decorations of apartments and fixtures included in the sales price. Apartments will consist of 2 to 4 rooms or larger combinations. Fireplaces, chemical refrigeration, incinerators, etc. Occupancy Spring of 1925. References required. Send for complete plans.

HAMILTON, ISELIN & CO.

SELLING AGENTS

385 Madison Avenue, Murray Hill 7660

Hamilton Gibbs's stirring article, What Every Veteran Knows, which appeared in The Nation for November 19, has been reprinted for wider distribution. Orders should be sent at once, as the supply is limited. Five cents a copy; $3 a hundred. Lower rates for large orders.

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

In the World War the result is far worse. Here we have succeeded in sowing the seeds of future wars by our impotent, amateur diplomacy, while the Allies have bagged the spoils in power, territory, and reparations. Our role has been that of the Lady Bountiful who after supplying man-power, armaments, and the billions of money that made victory possible, found ourselves at the end without indemnity for our sacrifices and without real participation or influence to make good our promises, based upon the assurances made by the Allies to us, in the carrying out of the terms of peace on which we induced the enemy to lay down their arms.

Our diplomats are mainly untried men drawn haphazard from the ranks of successful lawyers, bankers, and big business, without training in diplomacy—men who have been so busy with their private concerns that they go to their posts painfully ignorant of the conditions that confront them.

What we need above all things in our foreign affairs is a school of diplomacy where the histories of the inner affairs of nations can be studied, supplemented by a system of promotions in the service that will assure these men a career and will give us a consistent, continuous foreign policy unhampered by political changes in our home administration of affairs.

The latter has in recent years been assured to a limited extent in the minor posts, but the positions of great honor, power, and prestige are still doled out as rewards for political service. The worst feature of that system, unlike other countries, is that by the time a man has learned his way about and begun to gather friends and accumulate influence in the country to which he is accredited he is replaced by a new administration. So long as these conditions prevail we shall continue without real knowledge and influence at the head of our diplomatic affairs.

We have in our brilliant Secretary of State probably the most superb, all-round, intellectual machine in America. But he, like most of our other high public officials, assumed that great office entirely devoid of experience in the subtle art of diplomacy.

America and Russia

Our attitude toward the recognition of Russia is an apt illustration of the incoherent, infantile brand of diplomacy in which we are engaged. For seven years the present Russian Government has maintained itself and gradually grown in strength in the face of incredible obstacles until it has literally forced recognition from other great countries.

We recognized the Czarist regime, which was the most cruel and despotic form of government of modern times, surpassing even the kingdom of Siam and other countries that might be named, whose accredited representatives are members of our Diplomatic Corps at Washington. We have recognized Central and South American governments with their kaleidoscopic changes, brought about by internal revolutions that were so rapid that by the time we had recognized an existing government another had taken its place through bloody revolution.

The internal social and economic policies of a great nation are none of our business. If we were only to associate in friendly relations with those countries whose forms of government appealed to us we should have been living in isolation for the past century.

If our reason for refusing to recognize Russia is based upon her repudiation of the debts of the Czarist regime, we should at least be consistent. Has Czecho-Slovakia or Jugo-slavia recognized the outstanding obligations of the countries they have absorbed or any portion of them? . . . Has Germany or Austria-Hungary assumed liability for the outstanding internal or external debts of those countries held in foreign lands? Does not the treaty, in fact, prevent them from doing so by placing the reparations payments ahead of all such things?

Russia's substance was poured out in the defense of the Allies on the Eastern Front. She lost millions of men and Make your gift a compliment. Give The Nation!

See suggestions on page ix

A Half Hour Well-Spent

A well informed state of mind on the world's affairs is no more than a matter of half an hour's reading.

The source of information must, however, be reliable; news presented must be facts not fiction; editorial opinion must be reasoned judgment not insinuating propaganda.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

presents in compact form all the important news of the world without suppression or distortion of facts.

During more than a hundred years The Manchester Guardian has earned a unique reputation among the world's journals for its frank and unbiased editorial opinion, no less than for the accuracy of its news.

Today, in more than sixty countries, readers find that given a half hour of time each week The Manchester Guardian Weekly keeps their knowledge of the world's affairs in repair and enables them to maintain an intelligent outlook on all vital matters.

.....MAIL COUPON BELOW.....

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England, commencing with the current issue.

Name .....

Address .....

billions of treasure in that effort. When her government collapsed as a result of this intolerable drain the Allies, in whose cause it had been thus destroyed, calmly proceeded to carve out her territory. Such pretexts for the non-recognition of Russia are the veriest hypocrisy.

If we had a real sense of humor we would "tread rather lightly" in celebrating Armistice Day, beyond congratulating ourselves that we are out of the mess and vowing to forget all about the mortifying spectacle that we must present in the eyes of the trained diplomats of Europe. If America wants a real Armistice Day that shall be a source of pride rather than of shame and mortification, we should at least make an effort to correct or modify these wrongs, for which we are at least partly responsible, in so far as possible. As the first step in that direction, let us ask the forthcoming Disarmament Conference to include in its agenda the discussion of treaty revision. It would be a difficult task, but if it can be only partly accomplished it will open the way for us to become a party to a League of Nations to preserve a peace which we need not be ashamed to defend.

Contributors to This Issue

SYLVIA KOPALD is the author of "Rebellion in Labor Unions."

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER, author of "Early Civilization," is a lecturer on anthropology at the New School of Social Research.

BABETTE DEUTSCH, poet and anthologist, has recently returned from Russia.

MAX EASTMAN was formerly editor of the Masses and the Liberator.

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD is an editor of the Measure and the author of "For Eager Lovers."

LEWIS MUMFORD is the author of "A History of Utopias" and "Sticks and Stones."

FLOYD DELL is a journalist and novelist of nation-wide reputation.

HARRY HANSEN, literary editor of the Chicago Daily News, is author of "Midwest Portraits."

HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON is the author of "The Story of Mankind."

H. H. JOHNSTON (Sir Harry Johnston) is famous as an English novelist and traveler.

SAMUEL C. CHEW is professor of English at Bryn Mawr.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is professor of sociology in Smith College.

CAMILLO VON KLENZE is professor of German in the College of the City of New York.

TENNEY FRANK, professor of Latin at Johns Hopkins University, was in the American Academy at Rome during Mussolini's march into the city.

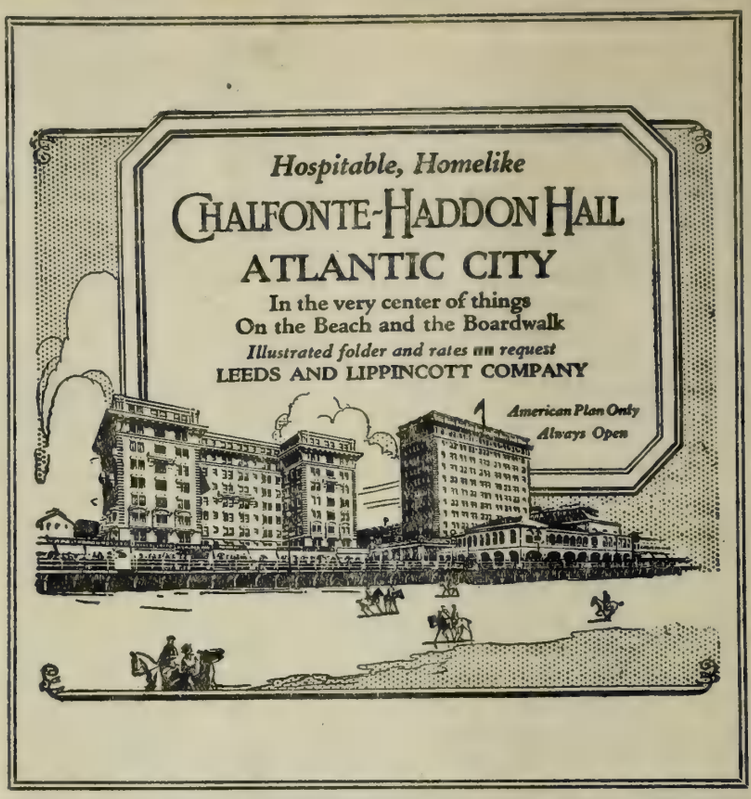
HENRY B. FULLER is a novelist and poet of Chicago.

RUTH SUCKOW is a Nebraska novelist.

THOMAS MUNRO is professor of fine arts at the University of Pennsylvania under the Barnes Foundation of Modern Art.

PITTS SANBORN has frequently contributed to The Nation on musical subjects.

GEORGE GENZMER, an instructor in English at Columbia University, is the author of a forthcoming work on American literary dialects.



The Fifth Avenue Restaurant

EXCLUSIVELY A LUNCHEON AND EVENING BANQUET RESORT ON THE GROUND FLOOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING, 200 FIFTH AVENUE TEL. GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907 INCL.

THEODORE KEMM, Proprietor

NAVARRE SOCIETY UNEXPURGATED LIMITED EDITIONS

Apuleius; Casanova; Cervantes; Decameron; Heptameron; Montaigne; Rabelais; Royal Mistresses and Lovers; Ten Pleasures of Marriage; Harriette Wilson's Memoirs. All of above are beautifully illustrated and bound in handsome buckram.

Catalogue Sent on Request

G. GERHARDT, 25 WEST 42D STREET NEW YORK

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c.
10 Tablets 40c.

Midol for HEADACHE

Holiday Book Section

Poems

Rational Man

By ROLFE HUMPHRIES

His restless glance abruptly drew
An arc halfway around the rim
Of earth's mysterious big bowl:
After escaping from his soul
Colors of sleep were standing by,
Their dark-blue shadows all around him.

This was the kind of night, he knew,
That, for no cause at all, would hound him,
And set his spirit prowling, prowling. . . .
His glance, grown tired of running, flew
Suddenly upward to the sky
And stopped. The moon gazed back at him;
He stared, frowning a little, scowling . . .

He had discovered that, despite Supposed advantages of sex,
When that white globe was on the wax
He could not hope to be immune
To lunar influence, nor fight
The monthly fulness of the moon.

And then he saw some poplar trees
All in a line, set close together,
Essential to a stiff design
In formal-garden symmetries:
He counted them, and there were nine.

He thought that they were beautiful:
Then he began to wonder whether
They were, like him, susceptible
To that distinct unearthly pull;
Some influence, he saw, was making
Their leaves keep rustling and shaking
Strangely. There seemed to be no breeze.

Rest and quiver, rest and quiver,
The trembling trees stood close together.
Their false propinquity, however,
Was not surprising to discover,
For he remembered he had heard
Poplars would never touch each other
No matter how their limbs were stirred.

There was a symbol for his shield!

Nine poplars on a moonlit field
Aloof, fastidious, intense
With shuddering self-preference!
He had no one near him to touch
But the idea consoled him much,
And he, whose lot was not like these,
Took comfort from the poplar trees.

To Lisa in Summer

By MAX EASTMAN

All things that move are memories of you,
The waves that linger glimmering and slim
Along my body when I dive and swim,
The daisies bathing with me in the dew,
The nimble swallows in the limpid blue,
The leaping butterflies above the trim
Wild yellow lilies dancing in the brim
Of winds that are but living motion too.

There is no wing or willow in this place
So swift or slender it can bend or bless,
But in remembrance of your kindling grace;
And even the deep cool waiting water knows
How liquid is the depth of your repose,
How silver still a pool your quietness.

Memoir

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

Such bliss he had, such agony,
And what he had he gave to me.

I shut the door of our small house
And lived with agony's carouse;

I opened the door and let in Others to live down the din;

And all the time his bliss was there
Eluding me like silver air,

And when I caught his silver glee
It was too magical for me.

I broke his bliss, I hushed his woe,
We stood in our empty house to go

Packed and coated on our quest:
He went east, I went west,

Until at length we met before
The narrow panel of our door;

We stood and faced each other as Long as lifetimes take to pass;

Into the house I led him then,
I shut the door on living men;

And now we watch grope to and fro
The ghost of bliss, the ghost of woe.

Contemporary Disillusion: A Dialogue

By LEWIS MUMFORD

A MARBLE bench in the Public Library. The pallor of a November afternoon, just before the lights are up, makes a glacier of the blenched walls and causes the two figures that have crumpled up in the corner to seem a little pathetic—as if they had lost their party and had sunk down wearily to await the return of the guide. As a matter of fact, they have been shopping. The poet, Marjorie Franck, is an eager, mouselike woman, with a quick inscrutable smile; the critic, Thomas Deems, has a hard intentness which points to a mind that perpetually feels the touch of some interior whip. They eye each other wanly, these two, in the first tentacular moments of meeting; but presently their weariness and apathy are blown away in gusts of conversation.

MARJORIE. What have I been doing lately? That is an ironic question to ask a mother. I wash innumerable diapers, I sew, I prepare food, and occasionally I am foolish enough to dream of writing a little; but nothing comes of it: the child of my flesh is a jealous child! And you?

DEEMS. I am in much the same plight as you; but I haven't the excuse of a baby. Our contemporaries are all so sick and disillusioned that although I have a hundred things in me that want to be written I am appalled at the notion of having to arouse so much apathy.

M. Don't talk about our contemporaries! I feel like strangling every person between thirty and forty that I meet. Every time I spend an evening with some remnant of those little groups and coteries that used to be so active when I was at college or during the first year of the peace, I hear nothing but the same tale—how old they feel, how disgusted they are with life. Those who don't openly complain show by their tastes and interests what has happened. They tell dull smutty jokes and discuss the nuances of Krazy Kat. Even this is a little too strenuous for their mentalities: so they seize the first drop of liquor as a pretext for getting drunk! If only they were gay!

D. Yes, if only they were! The sad fact is that they become the Brahmins of the frivolous life, and like Mr. Gilbert Seldes they discuss jazz and Joe Cook with a seriousness which would be pontifical and absurd if they were treating the music of Bach or the stage of Molière. Their efforts to repudiate their old interests seem much more pathetic than the plight of the younger generation; for the youngsters are not conscious of the past they have turned their backs on.

M. Don't you honestly feel a little sad at the fact that we no longer are the younger generation; that there is now growing up a fresh crop of boys and girls who scorn what we cherished?

D. I should be heartily envious of them if I thought that their rebellions were driving them into positions where some freezing-up of old sympathies kept us from following them. When I was in Germany last year I more than once felt a sentimental twitch when I watched the bands of medieval-looking youths setting out to live for themselves a much more gay and strenuous life than we had been able to conceive—and grabbing directly a number of things that we had thought could come only by legislation or a prolonged course of education. Many of them have achieved, on a few crusts of bread and a stout heart, the sort of life we couldn't imagine for ourselves without an economic revolution and a full dinner pail. In America I don't feel this at all: the chief mark of the younger generation is a sort of spiritual amnesia; and their notion of the good life is that of the bourgeoisie, minus the responsibility. Reaching adolescence in the midst of the war, these youngsters were introduced to none of the great ideas of the Enlightenment: all they were conscious of was the material and spiritual collapse. They are literally a generation without a history; for the war effaced the future as well as the past, and who can labor at art or science or any of the humane disciplines if he is uneasily aware all the while that the fabric which supports his single work may be destroyed overnight?

M. But they are not alone: at bottom we are all in the same mood. Did you read the retrospective wail with which Floyd Dell finished for good and all The Liberator and the things that it once stood for? This emptiness is what makes my lot as a mother doubly hard. What have I to give my child at its coming-of-age? Ten years ago one wouldn't have asked the question: the answer was as obvious as a good dinner to a man with a healthy appetite. But what can we believe in today? A state which will promote imbecile wars for the sake of picayune commercial gains or "Nordic" prestige? A labor movement that learns nothing, assimilates nothing, foresees nothing—except Mr. Babbitt's world extended and enlarged? "An emerging American philosophy" which will revise and codify all the thin sterilities of puritanism and pragmatism. How thrilling! What trumpet calls to the soul!

D. What you say reminds me of a dictum of Taine's I ran across the other day: I jotted it down in my notebook. I have it here: "Beneath every literature there is a philosophy. Beneath every work of art an idea of nature and of life. . . . Whoever plants the one, plants the other; whoever undermines the one, undermines the other. Place in all the minds of any age a new grand idea of nature and of life, so that they feel and produce it with their whole heart and strength, and you will see them seized with the craving to express it, invent forms of art and groups of figures. Take away from these minds every new grand idea of nature and life, and you will see them deprived of the craving to express all-important thoughts, copy, sink into silence, or rave." It is easy to see the bearing of this on our generation: we have lost the medium of ideas in which we lived and breathed and had our being. No wonder literature is in a backwater. No wonder we have novels like "Jennifer Lorn," and the "New Candide," and "Lady into Fox," and the "Green Hat"—to speak only of the better ones. No wonder so much of our poetry is delicate, inane embroidery. I am not speaking of your own verses of course; but if you'll forgive me for saying so, I do not think it is the baby alone that has made you sink into silence these last few years.

M. Well, between us, we've conjured up a horrid picture; and in the act of explaining the situation it seems to me we've made it worse. It would be bad enough if the dreariness of our contemporaries were a mere aberration. But suppose it is inevitable: suppose we, without realizing it, are in the same giddy boat? One can blame no one: one can correct nothing: one can create nothing! That is what your criticism comes to.

D. On the contrary: it is only in the past tense that things are inevitable. The battle has not been lost yet; and the reason is that it has not been fought. I myself don't feel old and tired; on the contrary, I feel much younger than the so-called younger generation. The fatigued academicism of Mr. Gorham Munson, or the encyclopedic felicities of Miss Marianne Moore, or for that matter the belated decadence of Mr. Carl Van Vechten, who belongs to the younger generation, as it were, by adoption—these things are really old and tiresome and depressing. The young men in Broom who used to write paeans to the stark lucidity and beauty of modern advertisements doubtless never heard of Elbert Hubbard; their colleagues who have awakened to sudden enthusiasm over the rigorous comeliness of machinery are probably unacquainted with Mr. Gerald Stanley Lee, to say nothing of Samuel Smiles and the architect of the Crystal Palace. I have not succumbed to these hoary modernisms, perhaps, because the foundations of my education were laid before the war; and as Charles Adams said the other day, anyone over thirty who keeps his wits at all is ipso facto gifted with the matured intelligence of an old man, for he has passed through a long course of spiritual experiences which the youth of today has been deprived of. I am not at all discountenanced by these stale enthusiasms and sickly philosophies which satisfy the belligerently young. Let them exhume all the corpses my generation folded tightly into the earth; if the corpse has any vitality it is only the vitality of decomposition.

M. I follow your argument, I think; but I don't get much consolation out of it. We should be happier if we could feel again the old meanings and hopes; but we are empty, and the universe seems empty, too. Like the sick man in the parable of Sadi, our only want is that we might want something.

D. Excellent; emptiness is the prelude to appetite. What is necessary, for those of us who recognize our dilemma, is simply to keep our writers and artists from cherishing the illusion that emptiness is a new kind of fulness. We may not be able to produce any robust works of the imagination; we may hardly be able to stomach the hearty intellectual fare that a Tolstoi or a Nietzsche could give us. So much the worse for us, of course; but we must be doubly on our guard lest we fancy that the things we now produce, which lack the full swing of the intellectual and imaginative life, can redeem their inherent weakness by their verbal costume and their aesthetic pattern. Formal perfection is not merely a minor virtue; it is something that belongs to minor works of art. You can demand it in the sonnet but not in the Odyssey; you can find it in Leopardi's dialogues but not in Plato's. This cant about pattern attempts to measure imaginative literature with standards that are scarcely proper even to painting or music; and it is absurd, for unless a work of literature has more than "form" it can only be a dim, muddy kind of painting or a fettered sort of music, performed on an imperfect instrument.

M. But what good will this sort of criticism do? You will only alienate the people you should help. The younger group won't believe you; or, if they do, will accept your criticism as the last bouquet of praise, and will continue to flirt with those literary periods in which their own delicate vacuity has been most perfectly expressed. Before you know it, there will be a cult of Renaissance masques. Do you not smell the approach of this in Mr. Sacheverell Sitwell's beautiful book on the Baroque in Spain and Italy?

D. Well, I have no desire to reform anybody or change anything; I, too, am a product of the war! If I insist a good part of our present work is sterile and empty, it is not because I wish to chasten the taste of those who like that sort of thing; it is only because I want to keep the road open for those who have guts enough to read and write something different. We are a minority at the moment; but we will have our day yet! After Lyly came Ben Jonson! Given sufficient time our spiritual ailments tend to heal themselves; that is the great secret of psychoanalysis which accomplishes many of its marvels by a treatment so prolonged that it outlasts the disorder which occasioned it!

M. (demurely acid). Biologically speaking, you've made me happy that I am at least a mother. By the time the child of my flesh is old enough to feel the difference there may be new children of the spirit for it to play with: and in the meanwhile I can forget my futility.

D. That from a feminist!

The chandelier over their head suddenly rings with lights; and they rise from their crumpled postures with clean decision.

Stephen Crane and the Genius Myth

By FLOYD DELL

THOMAS BEER, in his excellent study of Stephen Crane, relegates to an appendix the myths which, gathering about Crane's name, so confused a previous biographer that he gave up his task in despair of ever finding out the truth. Piecing together various fragments of these myths, one may reconstruct the following biography of the mythical Stephen Crane: he was the illegitimate son of a President of the United States; he served a term in prison for some crime; he had a love affair with Sarah Bernhardt; he had an illegitimate child by a girl in the slums, who then went on the streets; he married and deserted a number of women; he was an alcoholic and a drug-fiend; he fought a duel, tried to burn James Gordon Bennett's yacht, and sent a ninety-thousand-dollar cablegram to his paper when he was a war correspondent; he died of delirium tremens in Paris. . . . None of this, as Mr. Beer takes pains to point out, was true. Stephen Crane was hard-working, sober, and of irreproachable private life. Why, then, this lurid myth?

Mr. Beer ascribes it to prejudice and envy; and Joseph Conrad, in his introduction to the book, takes pains to defend his dead friend against this "perfidious and contemptible gossip." Yet nothing is clearer than that the people who spread these preposterous stories were not animated by any hatred for Crane; they had no wish to do him injury. On the contrary! Mr. Conrad reveals the secret when he says, scornfully, that the story of Crane's being unable to write "without getting drunk" was related by some one "as an instance of the artistic temperament." And Mr. Beer speaks of some of these other stories as having been told by people who had met Crane "and admired him." That is just the point; these people did admire Crane, and they admired him for his "artistic temperament." No, these legends did not spring from malice; they were the tribute of his generation to his "genius." The Stephen Crane myth, which reveals nothing as to Crane himself, reveals much as to the state of mind of the times in which he lived—late nineteenth-century America.

Much of it is archaic enough in form; heroes have been illegitimate since there were hero-tales to celebrate them; and the President as the father is merely a quaint substitute for the King of those hero-tales. But in spite of such archaisms, the myth discloses a late nineteenth-century secret—what people thought a "genius" ought to be. Genius, according to this view, consists in breaking rules. And in being illegitimate our mythical genius was merely starting in at the beginning with his rule-breaking. Of course a true genius ought to commit some crime and go to prison; could "unrestrained temperament" be expected to abide the laws made for common people? And he should have an illicit love affair with the most distinguished woman of his time—with some Cleopatra, some Ninon de L'Enclos; and the divine Sarah served the purposes of myth very well. Crane had written a book about "a girl of the streets"; a true genius studies life at first hand—he goes and does the thing, and then writes about it; our genius must unquestionably have driven Maggie to the streets before he could write about her. Women, as stepping-stones, play a part in the life of all true geniuses; they must be numerous, and they should, according to late nineteenth-century taste, be badly treated by all ordinary standards; hence the other deserted women of the myth. Obviously he must be a drunkard and a drug-fiend, and write only under the influence of these literary aids. He must do preposterous things; the attempt to burn the Bennett yacht and the ninety-thousand-dollar cablegram have the true epic touch. Finally, he must die in the horrors of delirium tremens; those horrors add the final touch of perfection to a life consecrated to beauty, as that of a genius must be.

Contemporary fact had something to do with this notion of genius. There were poets in England who were vagabonds and drunkards, who went to prison, who died in delirium tremens. But it was more than a fact, it was a fashion that was being emulated in America. It was the thing for young geniuses, just then, to "tread their mystic way to the dogs," as Rebecca West has said, to "conscientiously stretch themselves upon the rack of irregular habits." They were doing it faithfully in England and in the more up-to-date literary circles of America. The trouble was that the recipe did not work very well; in England, in a few instances, literary ability survived for a time this harsh regimen, and the brilliant flashes that drugs and drink had not extinguished were ascribed to their beneficent influence. But in America there was not even that much to show. The theory had to be proved: a genius, authentic and universally acclaimed, had to be there to point at. So poor Stephen Crane was picked upon. Wasn't he a genius? Well, then, he must have become one by such means!

That leaves unexplained, however, the existence of such a fashion. The fashion may perhaps be described as the flamboyant and defiant acceptance of an apparent necessity. Different as late nineteenth-century England and America were, in both there was a tremendous emphasis on the manufacture and sale of goods, and slight encouragement for the young person who was by temperament committed to something else. Stephen Crane's own early and obscure literary struggle testifies to this for America. The result of such early discouragement and lack of sympathy might have been, in a person of less stamina, drugs, drink, and irrelevant and preposterous adventures. That might have been the case; that was the case with many others; and it was these others, failing to achieve anything in literature themselves, who took refuge under the aegis of the Stephen Crane myth. He was their great apologia, their justification, and in a sense their sanctification. Through him all their sins were forgiven.

And in a sense they were right in identifying themselves with him. He too, though in a different way, was the victim of his environment. American commercialism, if it did not drive him to drugs and drink, killed him none the less. He was, truly enough, a martyr to his artist's temperament. Others, who could adjust themselves more easily to the America into which he was born, still live and flourish; Stephen Crane died young.

The Unknown Critic[1]

By HIMSELF

HE is a youth to fortune and to fame unknown. But the certainty that some day his efforts will be recognized is a pardonable vanity in him, because it is a dream born out of his finest hopes. Humble though he is, and as yet totally unknown, he asked permission to draw his own portrait for The Nation because he believed he had claims to such a distinction. For he knows himself for what he is, an important member of that great family which knows no other nexus in itself but its community of love and reverence for the noblest manifestations of the human spirit.

He has no achievements to be discussed. His philosophy—if philosophy may be called the small quantum of knowledge and of experience he has gathered and is trying to synthesize—and his personality may be of no interest to the public. But as a tyro in the quixotical concerns of the spirit he deserves the attention of that small number in whom the curse of opportunity has not yet killed the love for that small plant of beauty and understanding he is preparing himself to cultivate.

Personal details about him are unimportant. His parents may be descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers; or he may be made constantly aware of his long nose by hearing the word "Jew" muttered under breath at the slightest provocation; or it may be that his broad a's and dark skin proclaim him for a Latin—it does not matter. Whether born here, or brought here when young, it was here that the tendrils of his mind first pierced the soil of wisdom in search of knowledge; here, from English cadences, he first suffered the voluptuous pang with which the beauty of words can make him smart; and here, planted by an American hand, was the seed of his longing for expression. He does not consider hereditary traits, therefore, as important in his making as the influences of the environment in which he first opened his eyes to the light of understanding. The blood of his soul, his mental traits, the make-up of his moral bias, his aesthetic prejudices—these were gathered here by him, from the same fountains from which Whitman and Melville and Hawthorne gathered theirs. The American tradition, perhaps broadened and made more catholic by his intimate acquaintance with another, is definitely his.

[1] This anonymous article is the eighth in a series of articles by American critics about themselves. Heywood Broun, Ludwig Lewisohn, H. L. Mencken, Carl Van Doren, Llewellyn Jones, Harry Hansen, and Henry Seidel Canby have appeared; Burton Rascoe, E. W. Howe, and John Macy are to follow.

He is therefore an American. The land itself he loves because it is a land pregnant with the promise of great things. But the word American as he uses it is not tainted with the prejudices of the patrioteer or of the jingoist. He is an American because he is keenly interested in the life about him and sensitive to its beauty and passionately resentful of its ugliness. Politically, however, he is an internationalist, for he sees no rational justification for the division of the world into sovereign states and considers this division as the cause of the moral chaos into which the world is at present plunged.

But political and industrial questions, however much they may throb in the back of his mind, do not preoccupy him. He leaves them to others to settle as best they may. This is hardly to say that he is not interested in them at all. No human problem is alien to him. Just as politically he considers himself an internationalist, economically his sympathies lie with the proletariat. But he is satisfied with his unscientific opinions about this question, because he considers the wrangle between the capitalist and the proletariat, although of sweeping practical consequences, a superficial wrangle. And he knows that whatever settlement they may come to his own position, which is the position of the artist, will remain unchanged. As an artist, it is not to capitalism that he is opposed but to industrialism. And for industrialism neither the gilded plutocrat of today nor the mythical proletariat of the dictatorship offers a remedy. As to the triumph of his faith he is pessimistic, for he knows that there has been no time in the history of the race when the claims of art were ever recognized with preference; not even in Greece, which witnessed such a beautiful flowering of the human spirit. Our present dream of the glory that was Greece he believes to be a beautifully desperate modern invention; an expression of our modern longing for a disciplined, harmonious life of the soul.

What he is mainly interested in is life as expressed in literature. Perhaps what impels him toward criticism is his concern for expressed life—for the ethical and philosophical implications of life, for the yearnings and aspirations of man as caught and rendered clear by the artist in an aesthetic medium—rather than for life itself. As he sees it, the difference between the critic and the imaginative artist lies in the fact that the artist is concerned only in externalizing the world of his fancy—which is the world of his experience remade to suit his heart's desire—while the critic, with a more intellectual bent, or with a lesser sensitivity to experience, finds vicarious self-realization by giving a meaning to the world of the artist. This is what he understands by criticism. As he once put it to me, critics are beach-combers in the sands of expressed life, searching for hidden coins in the sieves of their own philosophies.

In search of the weft for his sieve, in search of a few principles under the light of which to understand life, and with the aid of which he may correlate the chaotic plexus of its tendencies as he feels them, he has spent a good part of his formative years. But philosophers who purport to solve the riddle of the world have given him but little. After a long apprenticeship in their barbaric lingo, when he was able to enter their arcana he saw that metaphysicians are quack doctors pretending to cure the world of imaginary illnesses. His disappointment with them, nevertheless, taught him that it is not from others but from himself that he may expect the answer which he seeks. And that answer he may get only by extracting it from his own experience, alchemized in his own mind, with reference to the truth attained, not by the Hegels or Kants but by those who are sensitive enough to the beauty and the hurt of the world to feel for man love and pity.

To two moderns, however—whom he thinks of not as philosophers but as artists, since they are, in truth, more concerned with expressing the world of their fancy than with understanding the world of experience—he owes a great debt: Nietzsche and Santayana. From these two men, who after all are the only two modern thinkers who have a serious claim to the attention of the youth of today, he is endeavoring to gather the sweetness and light of the latter and the restless courage and passionate hatred of mediocrity of the former. The staid Attic pose of Santayana, searching in life for the seeds of its ideal possibilities, and the fearless and uncompromising attitude of Nietzsche toward a bungling self-satisfied world—these are, of human virtues, the two virtues he admires most. But their philosophies, as tools for his work, have not proved of great use to him. For Santayana, by locking himself up in the tower of ivory of his "Life of Reason," shuts out the man of flesh and bones, the man of contradictions and of passions, from his consideration. And Nietzsche, to escape his own weakness, identified strength with cruelty, and because he was not able to liberate himself from his pity—the consciousness of his own weakness—made of it the scapegoat of his failure.

The rational attitude of Santayana and the aristocratic attitude of Nietzsche are the present tyro's distinguishing characteristics. Through them he expects, in whatever measure may be given to him, to play his part in the process of accelerating America's coming of age. His program is yet vague in his mind. But the major lines of his intentions are simple enough. The need of America as he sees it (and for this diagnosis, of course, he does not claim originality) is the recognition of the claims of the spirit. We are—for reasons that are being brought to light by men like Van Wyck Brooks—worshiping at shrines whose gods have little care for the more permanent values of the human soul. But there is no reason to believe that, after the exaltation of our materialistic triumphs has worn itself out, as it must very soon, we shall not be forced to turn toward lines of endeavor of greater significance to the human spirit than those we at present follow. Do not our buildings—he argues naively—gush upward? Surely, there must be a meaning to this obsession for the heights! To point out the fallacy of our materialistic philosophy, to stimulate our already growing discontent with it, and to force acceptance of the cults of Apollo and of Minerva is the duty of that minority among us who have enlisted in the priesthood of the older gods. This is, with him, a matter of faith, and he admits of no other attitude than that of a truculent intolerance for the values which to him are false. To encourage, then, as a critic, the efforts of those who are striving after sweetness and light, to unmask those who under the disguise of artists go about peddling bogus beauty and wisdom, and by helping to unite the efforts of the minority into a common urge to wage a successfully defensive fight against the eternally triumphant hordes of Philistia—this is the task to which, with a religious fervor and a humble attitude, he has had the temerity to pledge himself.

Books

First Glance

HAVELOCK ELLIS is only sixty-five years old, but throughout the third and final series of his "Comments and Impressions" (Houghton Mifflin: $3) he speaks like one who believes that he is done. Death has begun to be something that he can love; a feather from her soft wing has touched his eyes, the scythe has pricked him and left him bleeding, and he is not sorry. He thinks of Prospero, "the man who has finally grasped the whole universe in his vision, as an evanescent mist, and stands serenely on the last foothold and ultimate outlook of the world," and he is content with such wise company at the close of a long day spent without rest yet without haste. The author of "The New Spirit," "Man and Woman," "Studies in the Psychology of Sex," and "The Dance of Life" rises quietly from profound labors along the darker edges of man's mind and walks free upon an earth which he now sees for the first time, perhaps, in its complete and shining beauty.

The quality of his present vision he has himself defined in a magnificent passage describing the final phase of any great artist's genius—Rodin, Michelangelo, Titian, Rembrandt, Turner, and Shakespeare are in his mind. "The artist has lost his early power of realistic grip, and with it lost also his early taste for such power. But he has lost it only to attain a wider and deeper and more symbolic mastery of the world. He no longer cares for the mere literal imagery of a scene he will leave so soon. But he cares more than he has ever cared for its essence, and he is conscious of that essence with a delicacy of sensitive perception he never before possessed. He is no longer concerned with things; they are receding from his view. As he rises above the earth, like Elijah in his chariot of fire, he now sees it only in the distance. Henceforth he no longer deals with things. It is the soul of things that he brings before us." It is the soul of his universe that Mr. Ellis is asking us to see in this last but surely not yet finished phase—the soul behind all natural things, the soul one glimpse of which "converted" him to a very special kind of religion years ago. It shows itself clearly to him now as he goes on holidays of the spirit along the Cornish cliffs or through the vineyards of the South. It is manifest in sun and spray, in the green oncoming wave, in the music of Bach, in the aeroplane which takes him once to France, in the twisted, vigorous vine, in the metaphysics of obscenity. It reconciles for him the most stubborn of all opposites—"the diversity of the world" and "its inability to accept its own diversity." It saves him from the romanticism "which lies in seeking after a beauty the world cannot hold and in failing to see the beauty it really holds." But in particular it glows for him through all the rich memories of books and men which leisure now allows to return. If he is the ripest commentator on human life today it is because he knows and remembers more pertinent things than any other man, and because these things are grown not only into his mind but also, apparently, into his body; so that to observe for him is to reflect, and to reflect is to feel truth spreading like a warm dye through nerve and sinew and bone.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Ellis will write many more books, and incidentally that he will continue as here to chastise the age into which—unfortunately, he thinks—he was born. "I am sometimes called 'modern,'" he remarks, "and there is nothing that I less desire to be called. The only modern things that I care for are those that are as old as the dawn or the rainbow or at least as the wild rose." The Victorian age against which he rebelled and the Georgian age about which all he can say is that it "will seem worth remembering heaven knows for what!" have been timid ages, innocent of danger, extravagance, and splendor. Dominated by the cowardly herd, the twentieth century has faced few or none of the facts which to Mr. Ellis are as simple as they are noble. And what is never to be forgiven, it has fought a squalid, meaningless war. Mr. Ellis on the World War, and especially on those flimsy minds which now deprecate it though they once justified and cheered it, is a salutary satirist. Perhaps the particular future which it is hard not to believe awaits him lies in the direction of denunciation.

MARK VAN DOREN

Sherwood Anderson's Autobiography

A Story Teller's Story. By Sherwood Anderson. B. W. Huebsch, Inc. $3.

THIS autobiography has the singular merit of presenting in a most engaging manner a key to all sides of its author's literary character. Parts of it must have been written desultorily, and other parts rapidly; some of it is humorous, rippling with gaiety and boyishness; some of it is introspective, brooding, testamentary. Out of this book comes the real Sherwood Anderson: not only the man seeking to interpret the subconscious elements in life or lamenting about the hard road of the artist in a world of ironmongers, but also the man rich with the human quality that comes out in short stories like "I'm a Fool" and the unpublished "Mama Geigans." It would seem that Mr. Anderson revealed here all the facets that one discovers otherwise only by reading every one of his previous volumes.

Mr. Anderson recalls boyhood as an adventure in which the imagination had its share; consequently the early pages tell how the Anderson boys dramatized "The Last of the Mohicans" and delved into such romance and mystery as boys can conjure up; in retrospect, also, the author sees his father as a delightful, carefree story-teller with a flair for braggadocio, and the mother as hard-working, lovable, solicitous for her brood; the reader recognizes the father at once as the original of Windy McPherson in Mr. Anderson's first published novel. In fact, he is much more entertaining than his fictive replica, and one is tempted to hazard the guess that Windy McPherson might have sat for the portrait of Mr. Anderson's father much as a model sits in the clothes of a person long deceased when a posthumous portrait is to be painted. Mr. Anderson looks back to the mother whom he adored and the father whose dreams he envied—"What dreams he must have had!"—with much tenderness, but the saving grace of humor lightens what might have become sentimentality, until, when he says: "The purity of a Southern woman is unlike any other purity ever known to mankind," one is willing to admit that even that fits into the picture.

Except for occasional asides on morality and aesthetics there is little in this story of boyhood to foreshadow the author that was to come. But one reads here of "a sensual love of life, of surfaces, of words with a rich flavor on the tongue, colors, the soft texture of the skin of women, the play of muscles through the bodies of men." That is significant of the future, for Sherwood Anderson has written often of such riches. Also he sets down: "There is something of the actor in me." But whether as a boy his fancy told him that he would look at our industrial age differently from other men he does not know. "But of one thing I am quite certain," he writes; "in all my life I have never for a moment subscribed to the philosophy of life as set forth by the Saturday Evening Post, the Atlantic Monthly, Yale, 'Upward and Onward,' 'The White Man's Burden,' etc." The period of uncertainty came to him as it comes to all men, and with it came sexual unrest and the desire to play a brave part before the dull-witted teamsters and warehouse employees who surrounded him. It was about this time, in Chicago, that he began to walk the streets at night, to take stock of life round about him, and to speculate on the words he heard and the faces he saw. In these solitary wanderings the novelist came to the surface.

The rich loam of experience soon produced much meditation. Mr. Anderson began to think about the relation of industry to living, and to wonder why men abandoned themselves to routine slavery. "I have always understood horses better than men," he writes. "It's easier. . . . I had always been drawn toward horses, dogs, and other animals, and among people had cared most for simple folk who made no pretense of having an intellect, workmen who in spite of the handicaps put in their way by modern life still loved the materials in which they worked, who loved the play of hands over materials, who followed instinctively a force outside themselves they felt to be greater and more worthy than themselves—women who gave themselves to physical experiences with grave and fine abandon, all people, in fact, who lived for something outside themselves, for materials in which they worked, for people other than themselves, things over which they made no claim of ownership." And farther on, carried away by his convictions, he remarks: "To the workman his materials are as the face of his god seen over the rim of the world. His materials are the promise of the coming of God to the workman. . . . Some day the workmen will come back to their materials, out of the sterile land of standardization. . . . The day of rediscovery of man by man may not be so far off as we fancy. Has there not been, in our own time, a slackening of the impulse toward purely material ends? Has not the cry for success and material growth become already a bore to the average American?"

When the time came for Sherwood Anderson to seize his materials they proved to be words and he wooed them like a lover. They are associated in his mind with the use of hands. "The arts are after all but the old crafts intensified, followed with religious fervor and determination by men who love them, and deep down within him perhaps every man wants more than anything else to be a good craftsman. Surely nothing in the modern world has been more destructive than the idea that man can live without the joy of hands and mind combined in craftsmanship, that men can live by the accumulation of moneys, by trickery. In the crafts alone one may exercise all one's functions. The body comes in, the mind comes in, all the sensual faculties become alive."

Sherwood Anderson is a sensualist in the best meaning of the word, as has already been amply proved in other books, when he caresses words and phrases, or embraces a woman, or recalls "the rich, fragrant smell of things" on farm and race-course. His contempt for the industrial age has its foundation in the fact that it perverts the senses to slavish uses and makes of man a machine. He writes much in this book about changing America; he reminds his reader often that the artist is still in bondage, unable to become the child of fancy because of his money-making, but his meditations on this subject, which come mostly in the latter half of the book, do not always carry conviction. We can sympathize with his hatred of the machine-made tale, built about a plot or made to point a moral, and with his desire to get at the "actuality of life" and to make comprehensible some of the intangible relationships of human beings. But we are reminded that he wrote most after a pattern in those early days when he was in bondage to an advertising concern, and that he has voiced his lament most eloquently in these later years when he has been comparatively free to reach out for the heart of things. He is at his best in this book, as elsewhere, in his plain narrative of experiences among human beings—such is the story of Judge Turner, of Alonzo Berners, and of Nate Lovett—for he has a simple, direct, and fragrant prose which is the best proof of his contention that the plain words that fit a situation are the only living words; and he is least successful when he tries to make these experiences and observations the basis for long and often unoriginal generalizations. But if we judge the book in the light of its function, we have to agree that it presents most accurately the mental growth of the man who wrote not only "Windy McPherson's Son" but also "The Triumph of the Egg" and "Many Marriages." In the field of literary autobiography it stands practically alone in America.

HARRY HANSEN

Cornelia Among the Roughnecks

My Dear Cornelia. By Stuart P. Sherman. Atlantic Monthly Press. $2.50.

Points of View. By Stuart P. Sherman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

AMONG the things that make a critic provocative and important three may, perhaps, particularly be mentioned. He may be interesting by virtue of the range, acuteness, and vividness of his impressions. He may hold attention by the weight and lucidity of the philosophy of life and letters which informs his specific observations. He may on the basis of his own inventive prose and fancy be a charming, seductive writer.

Mr. Sherman has long been recognized for the sharpness and precision of his perceptions; even when one disagrees with his valuations one admires the accuracy with which he discloses the native essence of the writer or idea he loves or hates. He has likewise long been vilified or glorified for the general philosophy of life and criticism which lies implicit in every theme he handles and every paper he writes. In "My Dear Cornelia" Mr. Sherman seems to me to have added a new dimension to his reputation as a writer. He has turned criticism into congenial fiction and made ideas the living and persuasive voices of characters themselves living and persuasive, whatever their ideas may be.

Mr. Sherman has long been set up by what he himself calls the young Mohawks as an organ of reaction, a frowner upon life and freedom, a propagandist for the academic, the formal, and the dead. In the light of these two recent books it might be well to consider what his actual position is. Mr. Sherman is, if the term still means anything, a classicist. He is interested in those permanent residua of perfections in form, clarities in thought, and rationalities in ways of life that appear and reappear in the history of literature, and make certain writers of all ages brothers and contemporaries. He loves grace in life and urbanity in letters. He thinks they are the fruit of a discipline in living and an Askesis in thought. He is an enemy of spontaneity in so far as it leads to chaos; he hates freedom only in so far as it leads to foolishness. He regards reason as the gardening process in a weedy world.

There are many things in contemporary literature that seem to Mr. Sherman rank weeds, and he has often in the past spoken astringently of them. He has dealt hard blows against writers like D. H. Lawrence, Ben Hecht, and James Joyce, who seemed to him to have made a perverse cult of an animalism that may be the basis of life but is not its fruit. He has faced with apprehension the disintegration in prose, the loathsomeness in subject-matter, and the helterskelterism in life which seem to him to be the leitmotifs of the "emetic" school of fiction. He has contended against these things not because he has felt that they were wrong puritanically but because they seem to him to be obstacles to that rounded and perfected beauty which constitutes success in the arts and in the art of life.

He has, in the person of Cornelia, presented this doctrine in a winning dramatic garb. Cornelia is a lovely, albeit narrow lady, living in a smooth and lovely world. From the walled garden of her wealth and social position—she is the wife of a talented and successful diplomat—she surveys with alarm the invasions threatening her fastidious Greek temple of a cosmos. She hates the insurgent romanticism that makes her daughter want to marry a charming boy without any prospects in preference to a civilized and settled gentleman. She hates to see her daughter smoke cigarettes and bob her hair; she cannot brook the thought of her son drinking things out of flasks. She hates, in so far as so elegant a person can hate, emetic novelists; the stupidities of the plain people; the miscellaneous roughneckedness (how Cornelia would hate the phrase) of the contemporary world. She flees to Communion and Saints' Days' and the Anglican Church for an inner peace that the outer scene no longer affords. Cornelia hates democracy much as Plato hated it, because it is hoodlum and bedlam. Life to her must be always a clean Parthenon of reason.

The professor, the amiable protagonist in these witty and sometimes poetic dialogues, courteously and deferentially suggests the reasons why this retreat to an edifice of traditional reason is impossible. He is the partial defender of the uneasy or bumptious flutterings of the younger generation. The two children, Oliver and Dorothy, are the outspoken crumblers of the old order. The professor, whose opinions seem most like Mr. Sherman's, stand midway. He knows what Cornelia is driving at, and loves the preciousnesses she is trying to preserve. But he knows also that she is shutting her eyes to many of the inviting possibilities that lie outside her tight and polite universe. He knows that she is shutting herself out of more than she is shutting herself into.

Cornelia, elegant, gracious, and unyielding, represents for Mr. Sherman, one infers, the conservative viewpoint at its best. She longs for conservation of the defined traditional values, unmarred by the wild, weird, or irruptive new ones. The children are lithe and clear-headed spokesmen of the essential pagan idealism which lies at the heart of the young revolt.

Mr. Sherman intimates that he thinks the young are doing something more than shattering the tables of the law; they are moving toward a temple of their own. Says Oliver:

> We get our line out of books and out of the air; some of it we think out ourselves, and a little of it we get out of Hoover and Lane and what father calls the "Western roughneck crowd. . . ." We're sick of war; we don't think it's sensible; and we're sick of supermen; and we're sick of belonging to the privileged class. We believe in the real square deal and good sportsmanship and common sense, and common decency, and health and hygiene and science and beauty and—and a lot of things like that. . . .

These conversations with Cornelia and her children seem to me an unusually successful attempt to turn current controversy to something at once, clear, humane, and entertaining.

"Points of View," in which Mr. Sherman dons his more familiar critical habit, is a miscellany of essays on current social and literary phenomena: American Style, Sinclair Lewis, Where There Are No Rotarians, Brander Matthews, and Gertrude Stein. For Mr. Sherman literary and social and moral phenomena are indissolubly connected, and one is conscious in these essays how much of his attention is occupied with the moral needs of our time. Mr. Sherman has a more passionate concern than most literary commentators with moral issues. Discipline in life and form in art are for him the twin principles of a moral Askesis. The most telling essay in the book is the one that opens it and sets its mood. What are the materials of our civilization, the things that really move us, that we spend our money on? Cleanliness, health, intelligence, swift mobility, playing the game, and publicity. Out of these we might make something clean and beautiful if we would. But that clean beauty can be attained only by a lopping off of irrelevance and by disciplining ourselves to our ends.

Out of our operative national faiths we can develop something like the Greek runner and the Greek marble ideal of life. But it was a disciplined athletic asceticism that made these possible. Our life and our literature, Mr. Sherman suggests, need the same thing.

It is not an unamiable ideal. Mr. Sherman's antagonists come mainly from those who see the beauty of flashes of undisciplined rapture, and love Byron no less than Adonis. Mr. Sherman looks at life as more than a moment, and sees success in life as no less than a disciplined art.

IRWIN EDMAN

Racial Unrealities

Racial Realities in Europe. By Lothrop Stoddard. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

The Mediterranean Races. By Marion I. Newbigin. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THOSE who defend the opera omnia of Mr. Stoddard against attacks made upon them by the ribald are apt to set up the defense against his slipshod methods and conclusions that he has humanized an obscure subject of study which formerly lay forgotten in the Preussische Jahrbücher für Anthropologie, and that he therefore has rendered a signal service to the cause of the great Nordic Triumph.

I recommend to such enthusiasts a simultaneous perusal of the two books listed above. Of Miss Newbigin I know nothing beyond what the publisher tells me. But I shall order whatever other books she has written, for I find in this one volume a neatly ordered mind and that respect for facts (good, bad, and indifferent) which makes me suspect that the excellent lady is right, or about as right as anybody can ever hope to be. The story of the Mediterranean lands is not particularly new. People began to write about them as early as the Trojan war. It seemed that everything which could be told had been told. But no, here we get the same facts, recomposed in such a fashion that the resultant symphony pleases our ears and delights our brain.

And then we turn to Mr. Stoddard's latest (if it still is his latest) Ode to the Nordic, and the irritation begins. "More and more we are coming to realize the fundamental importance of race in human affairs." Am I reading the literary pages of the Saturday Evening Post or have I stumbled upon the advertisements? "More and more we are coming to realize the fundamental importance of central heating (or sauerkraut-three-times-a-week, or dental-floss, or silk-underwear, or blood-pressure, or Listerine) in human affairs." I have so often said what I think of those books, indeed of this entire branch of erudition devoted to white-man propaganda, that it becomes boresome. Besides, the esteemed Saturday Evening Post, with that profound contempt for brutal truth which characterizes everything which bears the name of Curtis upon the title-page, will continue to dish up this badly prepared pabulum for the sake of popular applause, and what is a still little voice in the arid wastes of The Nation against the clamorous millions of the Paradise of Profit?

But I will try to repeat my objections as concisely as possible. I am no great lover of the human brotherhood if I have to sit in the same room with all the brethren and sisters of all the many and variegated nations of this earth. I am not at my ease, for example, with the honest Hindus from Bombay whose long brown fingers, playing with a simple teaspoon, can drive me into a nervous condition which is almost unbelievable. From a long struggle with the Genus Hibernicus I have come to dislike the inhabitants of that sea-green island until the slightest murmur of a brogue makes me look for the nearest exit, fully determined to run and not walk to the door if my fears should be verified by the inevitable paean of praise to the Holy Saints and the Sovereign Republic. But I fully realize that these sentiments on my part are silly prejudices, based upon nothing more sound than my ancestral dislike of cheese or my personal horror of spiders. For cheese is an excellent item upon our bill of fare, and spiders are useful animals because they eat up flies, and the poor creatures who invade my workshop cannot know that I would rather have the flies (which can be dry-killed) than the spiders, which are as messy in death as they are hairy and horrible in life. If I were to take these prejudices and turn them into a foundation upon which to erect a brand-new racial theory devoted to a careful exposition of my own superiority to the Hindu and the Irish I would (as far as I can see) contribute something almost as useful to human progress as the works of the new school of "racial realities."

Realities indeed! The poor innocents who spend their nickels upon this stuff believe that it represents a sound piece of investigation, that the conclusions stand like the rock of Gibraltar and the multiplication table, that there is such a thing as "racial realities," and that the scientists are greatly worried about it. Of course they are, but only because they appreciate that in the field of race we still know practically nothing and know that we shall know practically nothing for a long time to come. To take this ignorance and revaluate it into knowledge, to take hypotheses and turn them into established facts, is a variety of historical adulteration which in the end may prove almost as dangerous as similar experiments with sausage and Scotch whiskey.

Science is not like poker. Around the poker-table the chips have only such value as the players have agreed upon beforehand. If it pleases the cheerful company the red chips can be called purple and the purple ones green and the green ones red. But in the department of provable fact a red chip is always red, a green is always green, and a purple is always purple. The new Nordic Edda (of which "Racial Realities" is only one short canto) is a most flattering contribution to the pride of the Original Settlers, and from a purely charitable point of view I would say the more of these books the merrier. But let us be honest and say that their contents are meant as a substitute for the old oratory of the Fourth of July and must not be taken too seriously. In that case the hollow-chested, emaciated, morally decrepit new-comer may even join in the celebration. But for heaven's sake let us know to what sort of party we have been invited.

HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

A Victorian Genius

Selected Papers on Anthropology, Travel, and Exploration. By Sir Richard Burton. Edited and annotated by N. M. Penzer. Robert M. McBride and Company. $4.

AMONG all the enthusiastic appreciators of Sir Richard Burton there has been none more persistent, more determined in his efforts to obtain justice for him than Mr. Penzer. Whether he had any personal knowledge of his hero I have not been able to determine. I was a friend of both Sir Richard and Lady Burton from the year 1885 until their deaths, in 1890 and 1895. But I am now sixty-six, and Mr. Penzer, I believe, is considerably younger.

It is a little difficult for me to understand how and why Burton created such vivid animosity in certain directions. I have related in my own autobiography and even in one or two of my novels how I came to know this really great man. I was quite young when I first met him at a dinner party, but I had already grown enthusiastic over his books on Africa and Arabia. I was entranced by his reception of me, and at intervals in the five following years became increasingly a friend of Sir Richard and Lady Burton. Never had I known such hosts at a London dinner party, such fellow-guests at a great House. Burton and his wife were themselves the most delightful hosts. They were able to make all their guests interesting by drawing them out in whatever direction they had specialized. Away from Burton one realized that he lived far in advance of the average thoughts of his day. Yet his wife—extraordinary as it seems—was an ardent Roman Catholic. One met at their table great ecclesiastics as well as great agnostic exponents of modern science. Burton, from the fifties onward, was not appreciated or well treated by the heads of the British Foreign Office; yet the subheads, the young and middle-aged men who were growing up concurrently into positions of great influence and authority at that office, had the highest opinion of him. How on earth the authorities of Great Britain failed to appoint him in his later life British Minister at the Court of Morocco I have never been able to understand, remembering as I do the types who were sent there after the death of Sir John Drummond Hay.

That, I think, was the great disappointment of Burton's life. His talents, his researches, had captivated the intelligence of the late Lady Salisbury. It was she—one always understood—who had moved most effectively in 1885 to secure him recognition from Queen Victoria as a K.C.M.G.; though her husband, the great Lord Salisbury, was in no way averse to him—an appreciator, on the contrary. Yet Burton remained to the day of his death very poorly treated by the Foreign Office. The climate of Trieste did not agree with his health, nor were its small emoluments any compensation. They were chiefly spent by Burton in obtaining efficient assistance from a vice-consul. He remained, in fact, a very poor man down to the publication of the first six volumes of the "Arabian Nights." A few years later he had a stroke and was obliged to call into his household a young doctor (now an elderly man, but still living, and still an enthusiastic Burtonian), whose constant care kept him alive for two or three years longer, during which time he completed the supplementary volumes of his "Arabian Nights" and considered the question of publishing translations of French translations or free renderings of Persian prose poems.

It is said that these were of scandalous lubricity. Possibly this would seem an exaggerated description today. But Burton's translations of the French were destroyed after his death by his wife and his wife's sister, whether justifiably or not we cannot determine.

In conversation I never heard Burton dwell other than anthropologically upon the sexual questions affecting man's progress and his divagations. He and I (though there was such a great disproportion of years between us) were intensely interested in languages, particularly in the great Bantu speech-family of Africa and its possible connections in a far distant past with language families of Mozambique and the Mediterranean shores, with the Asiatic languages of today, and with the Romance tongues of present time and of the Dark Ages as they emerged from popular Latin. In such a direction as this he was an entrancing person to meet, and he was always human enough to appreciate a good lunch or a well-chosen dinner or an evening at the theater. But he was keen and critical as to the works of Diez and Gaston Paris.

Things that he said to me in the five years of our acquaintance remain vividly in my mind. He was so modern-minded that we have only now come up to date with him. My remembrance even of his remarks about the telephone, about the advances of photography, or even about such details as the possible improvement of the bicycle (the bone-shaker of 1889), or the making of motor cars (then almost uncreated) makes me feel that, if the impossible could happen, he would fit rapidly into his place among us at the present day.

The essays of Burton included in this book are mostly new to me. They consist of "Early Days in Sind," written down somewhere about 1851; "The Guidebook to Mecca," issued as a pamphlet in 1865; "A Trip to Harar" (published in 1855), "Notes on Scalping" (1864), "A Day amongst the Fans" (1863), "Notes on the Dahoman," "Chapters from Travel" (in Syria), "Notes on Rome" (1875), "Spiritualism in Eastern Lands" (1878), and "An Essay on Belzoni," the Italian Egyptologist who afterward died exploring Benin and the Niger delta. This selection shows the wide range of Burton's studies and explorations: from the very heart of the United States at a time when its inter-communications were distracted by civil war; from the tangled recesses of the African continent to the town of Mecca, almost unapproachable for a Christian at the present day, though Burton visited it in thin disguise as a nominal Mohammedan; from this, that, and the other little-known and scarcely described district of western India to Rome, which had just ceased to be Papal, and to Palmyra, lost in the sands of desert Syria.

In addition we must remember that Burton spent several years as a consul in Brazil exploring the courses of Brazilian rivers; that he knew intimately France and Italy, Spain and Portugal—he spoke and translated Portuguese like a master; that he was well acquainted with most parts of England and Ireland; that he fought in the Crimean War; and that he closely followed the discoveries of palaeontology. Surely such a career as this would seem unusually great and varied and instinct with genius at the present day, thirty-four years after Burton's death. It was still more wonderful thirty-four years ago, and Mr. Penzer is to be thanked for placing before us the articles we find in this book.

H. H. JOHNSTON

War and the Willing Victim

Plumes. By Laurence Stallings. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

ONE may, if he likes, call Mr. Stallings's novel propaganda. Doubtless the author would never have striven so passionately to communicate his personal disillusion had he not hoped to convince others of the futility of war and to do something to make it impossible. But some of the qualities which render the book more effective than most as propaganda also help to raise it to the level of art. There is, above all, no undue simplification of the case, no tendency to make of any single factor like capitalism or industry or patriotism a scapegoat and thus to simplify the thinking of pacifists as the thinking of the average citizen was simplified by the convenient assumption that the Kaiser was, in his own person, the only remaining obstacle to universal brotherhood; instead there is a comprehensive recognition of the interlocking factors which make war possible and a frank acceptance of the fact that the reconstruction which must precede permanent peace is as much a reconstruction of individual human minds as a reconstruction of governmental systems. Richard Plume, struggling with the problems of a wounded veteran in a post-war society and trying at the same time to understand the causes, external and internal, which made him a victim, is no mere lay figure invented to illustrate a dogmatist's point. He is a very real man, suffering a real perplexity, and paying the penalties of real but humanly forgivable defects.

Surely this Richard, actually glad in the beginning to leave his instructorship and his wife to seek in France the romance of combat, is more typical of the soldier than the now more familiar figure of the completely unwilling victim of capitalistic greed or political trickery. Like countless others, Richard had in his veins the blood of fighters; none of his ancestors had ever possessed more than twenty-five thousand dollars and none had ever had much either to win or lose materially, yet each had gone forth gladly under Jackson or Lee to fight the battles of those who had more tangible things at stake. Each was, if you like, a victim of material interests; but not one was in any sense an unwilling victim because each in his heart believed that war was a noble activity and was willing enough that others should find some excuse to set it going. All brought mutilated limbs back to ruined homes, but as they sat useless in chimney corners and recounted their deeds to admiring listeners none ever doubted that the glory was worth the price paid for it.

War is a trick which the powerful few play upon the feeble many, but it is a trick which can never be forestalled until the instinct through which it works is eradicated. No political scheming and no industrial greed could drive a people to fight if that people were not glad of the opportunity; unfortunately the socialist's dreams of economic reorganization are nearer to realization than the destruction of that fighting instinct which the reconstructed world will still have to reckon with. Thousands will still be willing, like Richard, to leave wife and children and job behind to embark upon the glorious adventure even though they half realize that they are both fools and villains and, even after disillusion has come, will be hardly willing to admit, as Richard's biologist friend tells him he must admit if he is to extricate himself from the dilemma, "that all your suffering comes to exactly the same thing that might have been gained from a fall under a freight train when attempting to steal a ride." That is a bitter proposition for any one to accept, bitter not only because of personal pride but bitter, too, because it means the surrender of the high hope that real heroism must be somehow good and because it makes the world a sadder and a flatter place by robbing it of certain spiritual values inherent in the idea of a great struggle for non-personal ends. Yet the most that the optimist can reasonably hope is that the proposition is now nearer to being accepted than it ever was before. "Pshaw!" says one of the characters to Richard, "who ever heard of an old soldier who did not creep home to romance about his wounds? My own father, I remember, was thirty years choosing a literary mode for his own wound at Yellow Tavern." But Richard Plume, though he could not escape the illusion which led him to follow his ancestors to battle, will at least never romanticize his folly.

Neither Mr. Stallings's style nor his manner is particularly original or distinctive, but they furnish a clear medium by means of which his thought and passion are communicated. No one, that is to say, could maintain on the evidence of this book that he is a great novelist or predict with certainty that he could create another important novel; but there is, on the other hand, no denying the fact that at least one experience has moved him deeply and that he has been able to set it forth in an intensely interesting story. Nor, if we consider the novel as propaganda, is the fact that it is stylistically unmannered to be regretted. The extreme of the naturalistic style, with its heaping of horror upon horror and the exploitation of ugliness as a form of beauty, has been chosen by most contemporary writers when describing war, but it is itself a form of romanticism. The thesis of a book so written may be easily dismissed by an unsympathetic reader as part of a literary device; but no one, not even the most convinced of patrioteers, could read so straightforward and unvarnished a tale as "Plumes" without being just a little shaken by the truths which it reveals.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

An Anthropologist Kidnapped

Social Organization. By W. H. R. Rivers. Edited by W. J. Perry. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

HAD Rivers lived, his definitive work on social organization would have been little short of an event in ethnology. As it stands, the fragmentary treatise presents a carefully reasoned and lucidly written summary of some of the outstanding facts and theories in the field of primitive society and politics. Unfortunately it is only too apparent that the piece is but a skeleton of the much more comprehensive work for the writing of which Rivers was so splendidly equipped.

What is said about the clan, for example, will barely suffice for a freshman course in anthropology, while the important subject of totemism, to which the author in other publications has contributed both critically and constructively, is scarcely touched upon. A much-needed summary of the history of social organization breaks off midway in the most disconcerting fashion. Rivers deserves great credit for an exceedingly illuminating consideration of the difficult problem of kinship and relationship. His sketch will be more acceptable to the unprofessional reader than Lowie's discussion in "Culture and Ethnology," and it is simpler than Rivers's own "Kinship and Social Organization."

Even in so compressed a treatment more diversified illustrative data would have been welcome. Melanesian material, with which Rivers had first-hand acquaintance, is disproportionately stressed. Africa receives some attention, but America scarcely enough. Also, a couple of errors have crept in: the Haida (of Queen Charlotte Islands) not merely are divided into two moieties but have in addition numerous clans which are distributed between the two exogamous halves; and a chief among the Iroquois may never be succeeded by his son, the succession being strictly matrilineal. Yet by and large the treatise is excellent and will prove most useful.

And now a word about the really unique feature of the book. I refer to Appendix III: The Dual Organization, written by W. J. Perry, the editor—a fact which, in justice to Rivers, should have been indicated in the table of contents. This kidnapping of a competent ethnologist by a group of dogmatizing amateurs stands out as a truly pathetic episode in Rivers's career. The tale is worth the telling.

Rivers's early contributions to ethnology were marked by methodological rigor. In particular he earned recognition by introducing the so-called genealogical method, which proved most fruitful in the study of social and ceremonial organization. Thus his studies of kinship and social groupings among the Torres Straits islanders, as well as his masterful exposition of the highly complex ceremonialism of the Todas of Southern India, firmly established him in the foremost rank of English anthropologists. Later came his preoccupation with the problems of kinship and relationship systems. With these theoretical interests he undertook a field survey of certain island groups in Melanesia. Here he was confronted with a highly complex cultural situation, and in his attempt to interpret what he saw he was prompted to make most ingenious if equally hazardous use of the hypothesis of cultural diffusion, with the result that his "History of Melanesian Society" (in two volumes) stands unique in the entire domain of ethnology, not alone for its speculative acumen but also for its total futility; the entire elaborate structure is but a house of cards.

During this period Rivers became acquainted with the daring speculations of G. Elliot Smith, a famous anatomist, whose most commendable labors on ancient Egyptian skulls were suddenly succeeded by ruthless and uncritical excursions into the domain of civilization. The main elements of his theory are no longer foreign to the reading public. Civilization goes back to Egypt of the fifth dynasty. There we find the ruling family of Heliopolis, the Children of the Sun. There also throve Perry's "Archaic Civilization" with its dual organization and totemism, its agriculture and irrigation, its megalithic monuments, including the pyramids; its polished stone implements, its mining activities and pearl fisheries, its gold, its Sun worship, its mummification of the dead. From there the Children of the Sun went forth into the world, and, although their own preoccupation was with gold, pearls, and life-giving shells, civilization went along.

And Rivers capitulated. He beheld the Children of the Sun and was lost. Without ever accepting the Smith-Perry mythological epic in its entirety, he went far enough to become thoroughly perplexing to the initiated and confusing to the uninitiated.

In "Social Organization," however, Rivers wisely refrained from ultimate interpretations. Throughout, his speculative thrusts are extremely reserved. The book, in short, can be safely passed on to the young. And now, without word of warning, this sketch of The Dual Organization by Perry (incognito)! I confess that in the face of such a performance I find it difficult to preserve scientific calm. For, apart from the inherent absurdity of the entire doctrine, the inclusion of so highly speculative a theory in a book which attempts the modest task of stating in simple language what is known of primitive social organization must be characterized as nothing short of preposterous.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER

More "Avowals"

Conversations in Ebury Street. By George Moore. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

Pure Poetry. An Anthology. Edited by George Moore. London: The Nonesuch Press. 17s. 6d.

Wrap Me Up in My Aubusson Carpet. By John Middleton Murry. Greenberg. $1.

MR. MOORE talks and meditates upon all manner of subjects: education, a national theater, "objective" and "subjective" poetry, Balzac, Anne Brontë, the members of the New English Art Club, Baudelaire, Mr. Hardy, St. Paul's possible authorship of a passage in Acts, the engaging Monsieur Dujardin, the burning of Moore Hall, and other equally unrelated themes. The threads which bind these miscellaneous topics together are Mr. Moore's personality and his point of view. He is somewhat too willing to admit that his book was prompted by the need to make a volume to take the place of the suppressed "Impressions and Opinions" in the collected edition of his works. The book lacks any such dominant motif as that which runs so sinuously through his earlier volume of conversations, the famous "Avowals." It is an informal collection of impressions, ideas, opinions, and notions. A large portion is occupied with an attempt to do for the New English Art Club what he did in "Hail and Farewell" for the Irish Literary Movement. Several of the members—Steer, Tonks, and the rest—are portrayed in lively fashion yet with an affection which the touches of inoffensive satire do not disguise. The dialogue with Mr. Granville-Barker on the need of a national theater will interest Londoners more than Americans. Since it was written progress has, I believe, been made toward the fulfilment of that need. The concluding meditation upon the burning of Moore Hall by the Irish "rebels" is in Mr. Moore's best manner, quite worthy to rank with the last pages of the "Memoirs of My Dead Life."

Some of the opinions on literature are challenging; all are interesting. Mr. Moore has nothing new to say on Balzac, but he manages to say the old things in a new way by passing under review the minor pieces and leaving aside the great novels. The American edition of the "Conversations," by the way, reprints from "Avowals" the lecture in French on Balzac which was delivered years ago in Paris. This is not included in Heinemann's exquisite limited edition. Its inclusion in the ordinary edition results in a sad break in the harmony of the Ebury Street atmosphere. One assumes that it was reprinted by way of atonement for the miserable hash made of the French in Messrs. Boni and Liveright's edition of "Avowals." The dialogue with Mr. Freeman and Mr. De la Mare on "Pure Poetry" prompted the Nonesuch Press to invite Mr. Moore to edit an anthology containing the poems thought worthy to deserve that high and chaste adjective. For his anthology Mr. Moore wrote an introduction in which he tells of his early interest in poetry, reprints the conversation with his friends, and adds some remarks upon the objective and subjective in the arts, drawing his illustrations from the art of painting. The thesis propounded by Mr. Moore and (apparently) accepted by his interlocutors is that only "things" have in them a lasting quality, while ideas and opinions change from age to age; that therefore poetry which is concerned with the poet's own thoughts and aspirations has in it the taint of mortality; and that the only "pure" poetry is that which mirrors with absolute objectivity the external world. If that be so there is very little "pure" poetry in the world, a conclusion which this slender anthology serves to support, for it would not be difficult to indicate "subjective" passages even in the songs of Shakespeare and Blake which are thought worthy of inclusion. The thesis does not amount to much; but the introduction is a delight and the anthology is a beautiful piece of book-making.

Not many people will agree with Mr. Moore in his whimsical laudation of the merits of Anne Brontë, whom he rates more highly than either of her sisters; or in his perverse blindness to the greatness of Baudelaire. He hints a fault and hesitates dislike of Joseph Conrad, whom, however, he refrains from treating roughly on the ground that "Mr. Conrad is our guest," a stranger in England. But he denies him "a place in English literature" for the truly astonishing reason that to win such a place a man must bring "into the language something that was not there before"; or "something latent in the language must be raised to the surface." But surely Conrad's claim rests upon the fact that he has brought to the surface qualities latent in the language but hitherto not apparent upon the surface. To argue with Mr. Moore is, however, fruitless; his mission is to tease, to irritate, to suggest, to inspire; neither to convince nor to be convinced.

They talk with quiet, easy dignity in Ebury Street; with something of a quaint formality that is never pompous though often a trifle self-conscious. The tone of these conversations is for the most part the most mellow, affable, and kindly to be found in any of Mr. Moore's books. The pity is the greater that he permitted himself the luxury of the attack which it contains upon Thomas Hardy. Mr. Hardy is not sacrosanct, and there is no reason why the defects in his style should not be discussed and exposed. Mr. Moore's criticism is at times acute and justified; at times exaggerated and perverse. Much of it might be answered were it worth while. But he should not have condescended to the personalities with which this discussion closes, in which he pictures Mr. Hardy as arrogating to himself a position in the hierarchy of literature in the same rank with Aeschylus and Shakespeare. The accusation is a piece of very bad interpretation of character and is in exceedingly bad taste. The best way to meet it is with a shrug of the shoulders, for it is "just Mr. Moore's way." Mr. J. Middleton Murry is, however, not so tolerant and philosophical, and he has turned upon George Moore with a venomous and vituperative fury which would scarcely be justified had Mr. Moore committed the sin against the Holy Ghost. So shrewish and ranting and fishwife-like is this attack that Mr. Murry contrives to turn all our sympathies to the object of his hysterical denunciations. One is puzzled by his sneer that Mr. Moore makes a virtue of his necessity and, having few readers, issues his books in costly limited editions. Considering that the "Conversations" is published in the ordinary way at a moderate price and that Mr. Murry's reply is in an edition limited to five hundred copies, one fails to grasp the point of this remark.

SAMUEL C. CHEW

Political Science Passé

American Democracy Today and Other Essays on Politics and Government. By William Starr Myers. Princeton University Press. $1.75.

MR. MYERS was one of the personal appointees of Woodrow Wilson in his preceptorial system and in his own department at Princeton, and his political views very largely coincide with those expressed in Mr. Wilson's books, which are amply quoted and cited here. During and following the war he was one of the foremost sources of aid and encouragement to the embattled women's clubs and other organizations of this type; his "Socialism and American Ideals" (1918) was perhaps the most conspicuous academic extenuation offered to the Palmer atrocities—second only to Calvin Coolidge's "Reds in the American Colleges" as a fervid and feeling warning against the inroads of Sovietism in the land consecrated to conservatism, safety, and sanity by the tradition of Patrick Henry, Samuel Adams, Franklin, Tom Paine, Hancock, and Jefferson. The present work, however, has been toned down greatly, and there is evidence that Mr. Myers no longer looks under his bed nightly for a bomb-laden emissary from Lenin or Debs.

The topics covered in the book are the trends and major problems in contemporary American democracy; constitutional changes and amendments; the function, powers, and relationships of the three departments of the federal government; the weaknesses of contemporary State governments; and the political party as the indispensable mechanism of representative government. The book represents approximately the stage of political analysis reached in Wilson's "Congressional Government"—being an account of governmental machinery and its workings with little or no attention to the basic underlying factors of an economic, social, geographical, or psychological type. There is no evidence here that the juristically immaculate department of political science at Princeton has been defiled by an intrusion of the interests represented by Beard, Bentley, Lippmann, Laski, or Wallas. Yet the work is not without value as a readable brief résumé. Among the pertinent subjects suggestively discussed are the mixture of races and cultures in America as a problem in democratic and representative government; the wide differences in mental capacity among the various members of our population, with the bearing of this on the validity and practicability of democracy; the desirability of restriction of suffrage on the basis of an intelligence and educational test; the tendency toward over-centralization in our federal system, produced as much by the incompetence and default of State government as by federal aggression; the necessity of more adequate presidential leadership in legislative matters, something which was notably forwarded by Roosevelt and especially by Wilson; the decline in the intelligence and morale of the Senate since the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment providing for direct election of senators; the irrational system of equality of State representation in the Senate; the committee system as the dominant technique of congressional government; the lack of adequate discretionary power in representatives; the necessity of a scientific budget system to check wasteful expenditures; the desirability of maintaining the independence of the federal judiciary; the burlesque of contemporary State government in the United States; and political parties as the dynamic and unifying factor in contemporary political life.

But students of political and social science would accord less unanimous approval to some of the following statements and implications. "The mere sight of the pushing, shoving crowd of human cattle (in the New York subway), for that is what they are, is enough to make any person despair of the future of this country. But a closer look at the faces and actions of these same individuals shows that they are not American and do not know what America is, or that for which it stands." "It is a well-known fact that socialism has never appealed to the rank and file of the people of the United States, Great Britain, or the self-governing commonwealths of the British Empire." "Foreigners are swamping America and American institutions. . . . Mayor Hylan was elected by Italian, Irish, German, and other foreign blocs. . . . Senator La Follette, who poses as the leader of a radical agrarian movement, draws his main personal support from a large German socialist element in Wisconsin which showed its true character during the war, and never has been really Americanized." "The way to end 'tax exempts' is completely to revise our income and other levies, and then capital automatically will flow into productive enterprise." "Even among the most extreme radical or socialist elements in British politics one seldom hears any questioning of loyalty to the Crown, or the expediency of its continuation as a part of the constitution and government. Its practical utility is established." Mr. Myers apparently would approve Washington's proposal to surround the President with regal splendor and ceremony. Imagine Calvin in gold and purple, with crown and scepter! The Constitution of the United States is as adequate for the public control of a great industrial democracy as for the tiny agrarian republic that brought it into existence in 1787. "It is probable that reverence for the Constitution is just as important now as ever. . . . Reverence and respect for this remarkable document or form of government is well justified, and rests upon a sound basis of experience and reason." McKinley is included in the list of the seven Presidents of "outstanding power and popular influence"—Roosevelt compared him to a chocolate éclair. All proposals to meddle in any way with the present powers of the Supreme Court are severely frowned upon, even to the plan to require something beyond a bare majority in declaring significant and important legislation unconstitutional. Roosevelt's plan for a recall of judicial decisions is branded "a dangerous and destructive expedient." Few will dispute Mr. Myers's contention that appointment of judges is to be preferred to their election under modern political conditions, but he fails to call attention to the dangers in the appointive process when federal judges are selected upon the advice of an attorney general so distinguished for juristic erudition, legal acumen, broad and sympathetic grasp of social and economic principles, and objective, impersonal, and non-partisan attitude as the late Harry Micajah Daugherty. And in his analysis of parties he subscribes firmly to the Lowellian anachronism that the two-party system is the only natural and healthy basis and procedure in party government. The group system which dominates continental Europe and is making its way into England is explained on the ground of the political immaturity and incapacity of these states. But the great defect in his analysis of parties lies in his total lack of appreciation of what constitutes the rationale and basis of the emergence of parties and groups. Such information can be discovered only by consorting with Ratzenhofer, Beard, Michels, Brooks, Kales, and Wallas. In brief, the book as a whole may well be regarded as a brief epitaph to the Woodrovian era of political analysis which has run its course and is giving way to a consideration of the realities of political life.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Brandes's Goethe

Wolfgang Goethe. By Georg Brandes. Authorized translation from the Danish by Allen W. Porterfield. 2 vols. Nicholas L. Brown. $10.

IT is the aim of this monumental work to interpret Goethe "as a profoundly human and magnificent personality," as "the incarnation of humanity at its loftiest," and as the "most superbly endowed human being in general that has concerned himself with literature since the days of the Renaissance"; and, furthermore, by avoiding "rubrics" (such as "Goethe as a dramatist" or "Goethe as a lyricist") to trace all his literary output "back to the history of his soul" and thus "dissolve" it "in psychology." The author could eagerly address himself to this enterprise because Goethe represents an age in which, in contrast with our own, interest centered on "proper development of the soul in accord with its inborn ability and innate power," and because ripe understanding of his message—as is strikingly evinced by Edouard Rod's essay on Goethe in 1898—has not even yet become universal among leaders of literary criticism.

In accordance with its underlying plan the book unrolls the development of Goethe's mind as reflected in his verse and prose, in his scientific publications, in his attitude to the great social and political problems of his day, and last but not least in his relations to his contemporaries. But the author does not stop there. He skilfully interweaves critical discussions of the lyrics, novels, and dramas. He brings to his task intimate familiarity with his material and that acumen which has made of him one of the pathfinders in modern criticism. His exceptional gift for literary interpretation nowhere comes better to expression than in the discussion of "Werther," "Wilhelm Meister," and the second part of "Faust." Nowhere does profound realization of Goethe's greatness degenerate into idolatry nor criticism lapse into cavil. The most masterly chapters are perhaps those entitled Goethe and Voltaire and The Tree of Life and the Tree of Knowledge. The former with a few unerring strokes characterizes the two sovereigns of letters in the eighteenth century and reaches its climax in the antithesis: "Voltaire was all mind; Goethe was all nature." The latter chapter, by contrasting with Goethe on the one hand supreme artists like Rembrandt or Mozart, "whose gifts lay exclusively in an extraordinary ability to create life," and on the other scientists like Alexander von Humboldt or Darwin or a historian like Augustin Thierry, "who had great knowledge and great wisdom," who "sought and found," but who wholly lacked the ability "to create characters that live and move," comes to the conclusion that Goethe alone was "at once a fountain of life and an inexhaustible fountain of knowledge."

If in spite of its extraordinary advantages this work fails of being a truly great biography the reason lies in the fact that it falls between two stools. For the specialist will lay it down with a sense of disappointment. He will find little in it that is new. He will miss much in it that he must regard as vital—as, for instance, an adequate discussion of Goethe's letters, diaries, and conversations or of Goethe as a critic of literature or of art. He will stumble over inaccuracies such as the statement that Heinrich Meyer, Goethe's influential guide in matters of art, "could do no more than agree with him." The general reader, on the other hand, will balk at a book of a thousand pages which contains detailed reproductions of the contents of unimportant plays like "Die Geschwister," "Claudine von Villa Bella," or "Der Bürgergeneral" or of the tales in "Wilhelm Meister's Years of Travel," which goes into long discussions of the life and works of minor poets like Lenz and Klinger, and which discusses in full Duke Karl August's behavior toward Napoleon. A perusal of these pages more than ever inspires one with the feeling that the English-speaking world is entitled to a new Goethe biography representing a more modern method and doing justice to Goethe's supreme and many-sided message without lingering on what has lost its value for us. Calvin Thomas and Hume Brown failed to understand Goethe the artist; Benedetto Croce deals, though with rare brilliancy, with only a small part of Goethe's activity; while Gundolf's treatise, the most original of recent years—it still awaits translation—probably presupposes too close an intimacy with the famous German to appeal to a large English audience. Let us hope that someone will arise who will combine Mr. Brandes's rare acumen, sweep, and insight with a finer sense of selection.

The translation is fluent but lacks distinction. The reader's attention is all too frequently diverted by expressions like "which did not turn out any too well," "he had begun . . . to lave away the reality he had so loved," "he had emptied them on to the fatherland," "then he went in for Goethe with all his heart," "the scene . . . mixes program-like sensations." Moreover, the translator would have done well to introduce as footnotes renditions into English of the passages quoted in the text—a procedure which heightens the value of Mr. Ainslie's translation of Croce's "Goethe."

CAMILLO VON KLENZE

The Perfect Philologist

The Philosophy of Grammar. By Otto Jespersen. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

FEW scholars are at once as learned and as entertaining as Professor Jespersen. He is indeed the perfect philologist. Nothing that concerns language is alien to him. Bantu, Beach-la-Mar, and Chinook are not too remote, nor the dialects of his native Denmark too near, to interest him. He does not confine himself to phonetics and morphology or to syntax,

Ready in January

JOHN KEATS

AMY LOWELL

A permanent and absorbing biography, notable alike for the new light thrown on Keats's life and work, and for the insight with which its author has revealed more fully Keats's psychology as poet and man. Lavishly illus., 2 vols., $12.50

SONGS AND SONNETS OF PIERRE DE RONSARD

CURTIS HIDDEN PAGE

These translations, published some twenty years ago in a limited edition, closely reproduce the exquisite and varied lines of the original. His book is, we believe, the only volume of translations in English that has been published. $2.00

THE LITTLE BOOK OF MODERN BRITISH VERSE

JESSIE B. RITTENHOUSE

A delightful collection of two hundred and twenty-nine poems, from the works of one hundred and six poets since Henley that will be a joy as well as a convenience to every poetry lover. $2.00; leather, $2.75

UNDER DISPUTE

AGNES REPPLIER

"Well may this book bear the imprint of the most letters-loving house in America, so choice are its contents, so saturated with appreciation and comprehension of all literature."—Milwaukee Telegram. $2.00

AFRICAN CLEARINGS

JEAN KENYON MACKENZIE

"The book is more than a travelogue of a strange land and people—it is a human document."—Brooklyn Eagle. $2.50

MODERN FRENCH MUSIC

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

"The most comprehensive and authoritative survey of the subject thus far published."—New York Review. Illus. $4.00

RELIGIOUS LIFE IN ANCIENT EGYPT

SIR WILLIAM FLINDERS PETRIE

"Mr. Petrie writes with the firm hand of the scholar. . . . The result is a volume which is both interesting and instructive."—New York Post. Illus. $2.00

Good Gift Books

FROM

HOUGHTON M

WOODRO

WILLIA

Here is a biography that reads like a no truth, such clarity, and such abounding interest he would the most thrilling novel of adventure. of Woodrow Wilson as man and as President. M widely read and talked of biographies of recent

HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN FRONTIER

FREDERIC L. PAXSON

The first complete history of the American frontier telling whole thrilling story of the conquest of the wilderness. With maps. $

LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN MUIR

WILLIAM BADE

A definitive biography of the great American naturalist will rank with Muir's own "Story of My Boyhood and Yo for its vividness and absorbing interest. Illus., 2 vols. $

THE SOUL OF SAMUEL PEP

GAMALIEL BRADFORD

"The most delightful purely literary piece of work and most interesting analysis of characters that has been place the book market in twenty years."—Hon. John Sharp Will Illus. $

IMPRESSIONS

HAV

The third, final, and most brilliant volun whom Mr. H. L. Mencken has called "the mo of the thoughts collected in this volume will giv Life." For a gift of permanent value, a gift t recommend this new book.

"Nation" Readers

T OF

LIN COMPANY

WILSON

WHITE

e story of a complex personality told with such ader will sit up to finish it with as much zest as me for a thorough, frank and impartial appraisal as made it in a book that will be one of the most Illus. $5.00

HE LIFE AND LETTERS OF EMILY DICKINSON

As fair, as engaging, as deeply stimulating a biography as has published for a long time."—Providence Journal. Edited Martha Dickinson Bianchi. Illus. $4.00

RANCIS WILSON'S LIFE OF HIMSELF

A great comedian describes his long and distinguished career, es his pages with choice new stories of many celebrities, and ws himself to be as entertaining on the printed page as across footlights. Illus. $5.00

WANDERINGS THROUGH NCIENT ROMAN CHURCHES

RODOLFO LANCIANI

A study of the most ancient and interesting of Roman churches the author of "Ruins and Excavations of Ancient Rome," "The lden Days of the Renaissance in Rome," etc. Illus. $7.50

D COMMENTS

LLIS

ournals of the author of "The Dance of Life," of living Englishmen." The sanity and wisdom e on the booklover's shelf beside "The Dance of den horizons and chart the way to a richer life we $3.00

THE LITTLE FRENCH GIRL

ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK

Critics and readers of three countries proclaim this absorbing novel the book of the year. A Christmas gift of distinction that will give pleasure to readers of every taste.
$2.00

THE FALL OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC

HENDRICK WILLEM VAN LOON

"Mr. Van Loon has illuminated an exceedingly interesting period in the life of a remarkable nation."—Boston Transcript. New Edition, with illustrations by the author.
$5.00

THE SPIRIT OF THE REVOLUTION

JOHN C. FITZPATRICK

A decidedly readable and minute study of many little-known aspects of our Revolutionary War, giving an intimate view of the life of the period and of the conduct of the war. Illus. $4.00

BENJAMIN CONSTANT

ELIZABETH SCHERMERHORN

"A most admirable essay in biography, at once edifying and amusing, sympathetic and unsentimental. It contains enough good character drawing to make half a dozen novels."—New York Herald-Tribune. $5.00

TORQUEMADA

RAFAEL SABATINI

First published ten years ago, this thrilling biography was immediately recognized as the authoritative book on the creator of the Spanish Inquisition. Illus. $2.50

PARTY BATTLES OF THE JACKSON PERIOD

CLAUDE G. BOWERS

"Mr. Bowers has wrought in masterly fashion . . . a book which is as fascinating as a novel of Dumas."—Former Senator Beveridge. New Popular Edition. $2.00

THE PIPER, a periodical devoted to books and their authors, will be mailed free on application to Houghton Mifflin Company, 2 Park Street, Boston. Send now for the special Children's and Holiday issues.

but studies every aspect of his subject. He unites the wide range of the comparativist with the minute knowledge of the specialist. The foremost authority on the English language, he has also written about the musical tones in Chinese and has contributed much to general linguistic theory. He has even turned historian of his science and written appreciatively of his predecessors. Yet erudition is not his most salient characteristic. Other philologists carry in their holds a cargo as vast and various as Professor Jespersen's, but they do not carry it with such ease and grace. In him the scholar has not submerged the thinker; his knowledge of other men's ideas has not frightened him out of his own. He has not only learning but imagination, energy, humor, originality. A master of the footnote and the filing cabinet, he yet writes a lucid and vivacious English, and his books fizz with ideas.

His latest work, the "Philosophy of Grammar," is no exception. In it he reviews the usual practices of grammarians, presents his own views, and illustrates them with an abundance of quotations drawn from a number of languages, but chiefly from English. His main purpose is to discover the principles underlying the grammar of all languages, and thus to lay a solid foundation for the grammatical study of any language. In practice, however, he limits himself pretty strictly to the Indo-European group, to the great comfort of most readers, who would not care to follow him much farther afield. The book is, therefore, both prolegomena to his own "Modern English Grammar," which is already a philological classic, although only two volumes have so far been published, and a general introduction to the study of syntax.

For the traditional scheme of grammar Professor Jespersen has little respect. According to that scheme, which is of course variously modified by grammarians, the subject is treated in two main divisions, and the two are kept as much apart as possible. The first division, morphology, classifies words under the parts of speech and exhibits the flexional forms in paradigms. Word-formation, carefully distinguished from inflexion, is handled by itself. The second main division, syntax, groups the forms together under the syntactical categories of person, number, gender, case, comparison, mood, voice, tense, and the many sub-classifications, and then proceeds to explain how sentences are put together. The treatment is thus largely formal; relatively little is said about the meaning expressed by the forms and constructions, and that little is sometimes vague, misleading, or otherwise unsatisfactory. Although such a system will serve for the grammar of one's native language or of languages belonging to the same family, it is inadequate as a scientific exposition of linguistic structure and is even of little practical value in the case of a language of totally different structure. The great German philologist, Georg von der Gabelentz, seems to have been the first to attempt something better, and in his "Chinesische Grammatik" he treated syntax both from the standpoint of form and from that of meaning.

To von der Gabelentz Professor Jespersen is indebted for the basic idea from which he elaborates his own thoroughly original system. In that system he retains the terms "morphology" and "syntax," but uses them in a sense different from the one generally understood. The two divisions of grammar, in his scheme, treat the same grammatical facts, but morphology approaches them from the side of form and syntax from the side of function and meaning. His morphology, therefore, includes not only the flexional forms but also word-formation and the order of words in sentences. The arrangement is according to formal characteristics; the different ways of making the plurals of nouns, for example, are treated not together but under the different phonetic devices employed. In the syntax, on the other hand, the forms of the language are grouped together under the syntactical categories—all the different means of forming plurals, for instance, being brought under the syntactical category of number—and it then becomes the chief business of syntax to explain how the categories express meaning—how ideas are run into grammatical molds.

So much for the general outline of his system. To fill in that outline—to discover the scope, uses, and meanings of the syntactical categories—calls for the greatest shrewdness, observation, and feeling for language. The bulk of Professor Jespersen's book is devoted to an examination of those notional categories that are expressed in the structure of the chief European languages and to tracing their curiously complex relations to syntactic phenomena. No short review can do justice to the insight and erudition displayed in every chapter, but even a short review must call attention to Professor Jespersen's distinction of the three syntactic ranks and to his masterly discussion of negation, the meaning of proper names, the difference between substantive and adjective, and the various kinds of nexus. Such work shows Professor Jespersen at his best, bringing vast learning, clear intelligence, and deep insight to the great task of understanding the ways of language.

GEORGE GENZMER

Eugene Field

Eugene Field's Creative Years. By Charles H. Dennis. Doubleday, Page and Company. $4.

IF Chicago, as Mr. Mencken professes to believe, has become an important literary center, and if a vital literature is, as some others maintain, the child of the daily press, then few newspapers have done more for the cause of Western letters than the Chicago Daily News. It has brought out any number of well-known talents. It introduced an Ade. It remembers, though with qualified satisfaction, a Hecht. It employs a Sandburg. Yet its earliest and greatest boast remains a Field; and now we find Field suitably commemorated by the managing editor who has made so many other careers possible.

Mr. Dennis was at the helm of the News during some of Field's most productive years, and he writes out of a fulness of knowledge. There is little doubt that he often found his distinguished contributor a handful. Field was not to be treated simply as an employee: he had to be handled otherwise than as poet and paragrapher. He was to be considered as the head of a household, with erratic notions of finance; as a rabid bibliophile who was likely to wander into any eccentricity or excess; as an indefatigable copy-spinner whose discretion could not always be depended upon. His quick hand thrust itself out and drew back anything within range. An eminent librarian made a precious target; a group of friends among the clergy put him on his mettle; any notable literary visitor from the East became a shining mark; and his daily associates, along with his suburban friends and neighbors, lived in constant apprehension of what might be coming next. Such were some of the dribbling streams that contributed to the ceaseless flow of a free and varied invention. Over all this impish laboriousness hovered the blue pencil, in the hands of Field's present biographer; and the pencil was constantly asking itself: "How little may I do? How much must I do?" Field's natural tendency was to josh, to play the wag, to indulge in airy personalities, to fasten impertinent fabrications upon innocent bystanders. His jocularities, his waggishness, his practical jokes and wanton wiles are often grouped by Mr. Dennis under the single broad head of "merriment"—a decorous word, yet somehow cold and hollow; for Field's activities, even when somewhat trying, usually possessed the warmth and momentum of a genuine human impact.

Did this last attitude extend to childhood? Field still reigns in nursery and schoolroom by virtue of Little Boy Blue and other effusions; the point, therefore, becomes important. Mr. Dennis finds it so, and gives it a whole chapter. Doubt has been widespread; and Field's own declaration that he did not like all children has received due, perhaps undue, emphasis. Other biographers of Field have brought adverse testimony; but his present one is fully of the faith. He believes that while

SCRIBNER HOLIDAY BOOKS—A VARIED LIST

The Big Novel of the Christmas Season

The White Monkey

By JOHN GALSWORTHY

"What makes a story so good that you want to tell your friends about it right away? . . . Something positive and admirable comes out of 'The White Monkey,' something that gives the reader the satisfaction of 'a good book.'"
—HARRY HANSEN in the Chicago Daily News.

"I like 'The White Monkey' unreservedly. It's my notion of a novel for anybody and everybody. It is a good story, an excellent story, easy to read and . . . worth reading."
—FANNY BUTCHER in the Chicago Tribune.

"A delightful novel."—New York Tribune.

"A fascinating story, exquisitely done, engaging, interesting, and, as is usual with Mr. Galsworthy, thoughtful."
—New York Evening Post.

"The White Monkey" is Mr. Galsworthy's first novel in three years. A book which is being read and discussed throughout the English-speaking world, it is hard to conceive of a novel which would be more acceptable as a gift. $2.00

Also for Your Christmas List—The Novel of the Billionaire Era

THE NEEDLE'S EYE — By ARTHUR TRAIN

A prominent critic says: "He has taken the rich material furnished by the families of J. P. Morgan and John D. Rockefeller (chiefly) and has welded all that is most characteristic in a harmonious whole—the Grahams of New York. . . . These Grahams of 'The Needle's Eye' are a gorgeous collection, and one can no more leave them after making first acquaintance than one can refrain from reading his morning newspaper. . . . Great stuff, Mr. Train!" $2.00

Select Your Christmas Non-Fiction from This List

MEMOIRS OF AN EDITOR. By E. P. Mitchell. The season's most entertaining memoirs. $4.50
LETTERS FROM THEODORE ROOSEVELT TO ANNA ROOSEVELT COWLES, 1870–1918 $2.50
IMPRESSIONS OF GREAT NATURALISTS. By Henry Fairfield Osborn. With portraits $2.50
SIX DAYS OF THE WEEK. By Henry van Dyke. An admirable gift book. Cloth, $2.00; leather, $3.00
THE FAITH OF A LIBERAL. By Nicholas Murray Butler. Liberal view-points of to-day. $2.50
A POPULAR HISTORY OF AMERICAN INVENTION. Edited by Waldemar Kaempffert. 2 vols. $10.00
RACIAL REALITIES IN EUROPE. By Lothrop Stoddard. A fascinating study. With maps. $3.00
THE CHARACTER OF RACES. By Ellsworth Huntington. The influence of environment. $5.00
GREATER FRANCE IN AFRICA. By Prof. Wm. M. Sloane. Profusely illustrated. $3.00
DOGS AND MEN. By Mary Ansell. The famous Nana of "Peter Pan" was one of Mary Ansell's dogs. $1.50
THE DIARY OF A DUDE-WRANGLER. By Struthers Burt. A delightful personal narrative $3.00
COWBOYS, NORTH AND SOUTH. By Will James. A man's book—be sure to see it. With drawings. $3.50
AS I LIKE IT: SECOND SERIES. By Wm. Lyon Phelps. These papers are an unfailing delight. $2.00
THE GENIUS OF STYLE. By W. C. Brownell. The distinguished critic's only book in recent years. $2.00
POINTS OF VIEW. By Stuart P. Sherman. For your Christmas list, Mr. Sherman's most delightful book. $2.00
MARY ROSE. By Sir James Barrie. One of the most delightful Barrie plays. Boards, $1.00; leather, $1.75
SIX PLAYS. By Rachel Lyman Field. These are ideal for amateur production. $1.50
THE NATURE, PRACTICE, AND HISTORY OF ART. By H. Van Buren Magonigle. $2.50
BEAUTIFUL GARDENS IN AMERICA. By Louise Shelton. A beautifully illustrated book. $10.00
GARDENS: A NOTEBOOK OF PLANS AND SKETCHES. By J. C. N. Forestier. Profusely illustrated. $12.00

For Young Readers

TALES FROM NATURE'S WONDERLANDS. By W. T. Hornaday. Fascinating natural history. $2.50
YOURSELF AND YOUR BODY. By Wilfred T. Grenfell. The famous Labrador doctor talks to boys and girls. Illustrated. $2.50

Stevenson's DAVID BALFOUR, with beautiful full-color illustrations by N. C. Wyeth, is the new Scribner illustrated classic for younger readers. The 29 books in this series have been reduced in price—it's now the

SCRIBNER $2.50 SERIES OF ILLUSTRATED CLASSICS FOR YOUNGER READERS

The Complete List

Robert Louis Stevenson's David Balfour, The Black Arrow, A Child's Garden of Verses, Kidnapped, Treasure Island; Cooper's The Last of the Mohicans; Eugene Field's Poems of Childhood; Jane Porter's The Scottish Chiefs; Kingsley's Westward Ho; Sidney Lanier's The Boy's King Arthur; Poems of American Patriotism; Arabian Nights; Grimm's Fairy Tales; Jules Verne's The Mysterious Island; Scott's Quentin Durward; Frances Hodgson Burnett's Little Lord Fauntleroy, A Little Princess; Kenneth Grahame's The Wind in the Willows; J. M. Barrie's Peter Pan and Wendy, Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens, Peter and Wendy; Noah Brooks's The Boy Emigrants; Mary Mapes Dodge's Hans Brinker; Louis Dodge's Everychild, The Sandman's Mountain, The Sandman's Forest; F. B. Linderman's Indian Old-Man Stories, How It Came About Stories, Indian Why Stories.

Reduced from "Gardens: A Notebook of Plans and Sketches."

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, FIFTH AVENUE AT 48TH STREET, NEW YORK

Field "studied" children ("experimented" might seem the better word to Messrs. Thompson and Stone) "with the purpose of expressing their ways and their emotions in his poems and stories," yet he "studied them sympathetically and, as a rule, with tenderness." And Mr. Dennis cites his own offspring as beneficiaries of Field's good-will. Perhaps the continuing vogue in the schoolroom and at the bedtime hour constitutes the decisive argument.

The book, concentrating on Field's best years, is topical rather than chronological. Field as the up-to-date translator of Horace, as the insatiable collector, as the celebrant of Christmas, and as the enemy of "veritism" receives due attention. All the same, he is decisively put in his own milieu and his own day; and these pages, as a record of literary Chicago in the eighties, may come to have a permanent value. They depict a rather uncouth yet aspiring society on its way to something better; and it is the author's pleasing fancy to represent Field as a censor morum who corrected by laughter: what other formula, indeed, for the disconcerted pork-packers and "Culture's Garland"? However, quis custodiet? Field, by heritage and by early environment, was a blend of East and West, of Massachusetts and Missouri; often these two influences ran side by side and produced an effect which was, at the very least, disconcerting. Perhaps it is but fair to say that Field himself needed discipline as much as did the community with which he cast his lot.

Mr. Dennis's book is large, full, well-organized, and carried on with a fine tactfulness. It has copious excerpts from Field's varied writings, and a complete and serviceable index. The only objection is that it comes too late—it is at least a quarter of a century behindhand. However, a busy man must find his opportunity when he can, and Mr. Dennis is perhaps justified in leaving his biggest job for his last.

HENRY B. FULLER

Mussolini Pro and Con

The Awakening of Italy: The Fascista Regeneration. By Luigi Villari. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

WE have no right as yet to expect an unbiased history of Fascism in Italy. If the writer be enough of an Italian to command all the facts, he will inevitably find his sympathies too much involved for cool judgment. Villari has apparently breathed in the smoke of battle these last years and is somewhat too honest to pretend disinterestedness. To him Mussolini is the savior of Italy, while Nitti was its evil genius. But the book is not to be cast aside because of its bias. If the reader will use it as an account of what has actually happened, suppressing now and then the names of the hero and villain of the piece (who, after all, were to a very striking degree the spokesmen of inevitable post-bellum reactions), he will come out with a fairly accurate story. And Villari has so candidly betrayed his sympathies for bourgeois normalcy that the proper deductions can always be made.

To a mere outsider who watched the fray from a balcony above the Seven Hills it seems that both men served their generation fairly well. When Italy was tobogganing downward after the war to find her economic level—a necessary process—she required most of all a resilient shock-absorber, and Nitti provided just that. On the rebound Italy needed force vigorously applied in the right direction. Mussolini was there at the proper moment, preferring, however, to use quantities of TNT where some of us think that a steady steam engine might have sufficed. But Italy has made the grade, notwithstanding the fact that she has been a bit rattled by the unsteady motion. It was a steep grade too, and the reader who follows Villari's honest catalogue of accomplishments in the latter half of the volume can readily forgive him for his enthusiasm. There is something very appealing in Mussolini's romantic faith in youth, his devotion to clean public service, his power to inspire disinterested work, his hatred of malingering and graft in public office. The list of his amazingly rapid reforms in breaking an outworn and futile bureaucracy, reconstructing the judicial system, cleaning the barnacles from the educational system, lopping off expensive sinecures, adjusting the tariffs and taxes to some semblance of fair incidence, and ridding the departments of ancient forms of graft is soberly enough set down by Villari and justifies in great measure his thesis.

It is in its silences and apologies that the book is least satisfying. The quixotic "march on Rome," saved from incalculable consequences by the King's wise intervention, is treated too casually. As for the Fascist militia, formed to protect the revolutionary government, Villari offers this judgment of cerulean innocence: "In order to replace the disbanded Guardia Regia without great expenditures and avoiding the employment of troops for the maintenance of order, Mussolini conceived the idea of creating a force of volunteer militia composed of Fascisti to assist the police when necessary"—a sentence that would find its proper setting in Punch. The brief paragraph on the Corfu affair is almost as delightfully naive. The praise Villari accords the government for breaking the labor unions and enticing the individual workmen by promises of jobs to betray their organizations is, to say the least, premature. Italy will eventually have to pay for this wholesale jettison of self-respect on the part of a million laborers.

Moreover, since the author is writing for foreigners, he might well have admitted that the peculiar Italian traits which reveal themselves so constantly in a florid self-confidence and a disintegrating individualism have at times forced Mussolini to adopt unparliamentary methods. In Italy, where there is little social cohesion, seldom an effort to comprehend a neighbor's point of view, and a very tenuous spirit of compromise, it is as yet too much to expect that democratic government will suffice for every crisis. We cannot forget that the present constitution is young, adopted—from a desire to be up to date—at a time when Italy was a patchwork of a dozen jealous states and when the majority of its citizens were still illiterate. Such considerations, which Villari would perhaps find less pleasure in recording, go far toward justifying a temporary dictatorship and an ingenious method of securing a workable legislative bloc by counting in a two-thirds majority of deputies to the credit of the party that gains a plurality of the votes at an election.

Finally it must be said that the first half of the volume, with its sharp criticism of previous governments, is far from satisfactory. It is quite likely that history will blame Nitti not so much for yielding what he did to urban labor as for not yielding more to the farm tenantry. Had he followed Rumania's example, the absentee landlord system, which, in its social and political consequences, is Italy's greatest curse, might then have been broken.

TENNEY FRANK

Chekhov Revealed

Letters on the Short Story, the Drama, and Other Literary Topics. By Anton Chekhov. Selected and edited by Louis S. Friedland. Minton, Balch and Company. $4.

THOSE who seek to know the great figures of Russian literature will consider the letters and diary of Chekhov more important than the subjective writing of any of his compatriots. For other Russian authors have revealed in their creative work—often too readily and too obtrusively—the attitudes and appetites, convictions and characteristics which distinguished them from other men. Chekhov scrupulously refrained from expressing his opinions and his desires in the drama and fiction he wrote. Complete objectivity was the ideal of his art, a goal which he fully achieved. It is therefore necessary to peer into his more intimate pages for some idea of his character and quality.

When writing to those friends who aided and inspired him,

Is it to be a book?

Here is a beautiful Christmas List to choose from

Biography, History and Politics

☐ A Gallery. By Philip Guedalla. Sketches of noted contemporaries. $2.50

☐ Supers and Supermen. By Philip Guedalla. Pen portraits of interesting moderns and historicals. $2.50

☐ The Secret of the Coup d'Etat. Edited by the Earl of Kerry. Unpublished correspondence dealing with the Second Empire of France. $3.50

☐ Marie Antoinette. By Hilaire Belloc. The beautiful queen is presented as an instrument of destiny. Illustrated. $5.00

☐ The Life and Times of Cleopatra. By Arthur Weigall. A biography of the queen as a woman, a wife, mother and lover. Illustrated. $5.00

☐ The River of Life. By J. St. Loe Strachey. The editor of the "Spectator" records his experiences and thoughts. $5.00

☐ The Windows of Westminster. By the Gentleman with a Duster. A fearless dissection of British Tories today. $2.50

☐ Those Europeans. By Sisley Huddleston. Politics and politicians in post-war Europe by an eminent journalist. $2.50

Travel

☐ Galapagos: World's End. By William Beebe. The distinguished naturalist gives an account of his expedition. Gorgeously illustrated. $9.00

☐ Voyaging: Southward from the Strait of Magellan. By Rockwell Kent. With pen and picture the well-known American artist tells the story of his voyage. $7.50

☐ The Sea Gypsy. By Edward Salisbury and Merrian C. Cooper. A thrilling adventure round the world in a small sailing vessel. Richly illustrated. $3.50

☐ In the Land of the Laughing Buddha. By Upton Close. China in its present political upheaval. $3.50

Belles Lettres

☐ Enchanted Aisles. By Alexander Woollcott. Delightful essays on letters and the theatre. $2.50

☐ The Golden Flower. By Arthur, Count Gobineau. Translated by Ben Ray Redman. A companion piece to "The Renaissance." $2.50

☐ The Fabulous Forties. By Meade Minnigerode. New York and America in "the awkward age." Illustrated. $3.50

☐ Sitting on the World. By Heywood Broun. The well-known columnist's impressions of life, letters and politics. $2.00

Fiction

☐ The Colour of Youth. By V. M. Friedlaender. A distinctive tale of sensitive, inarticulate youth. $2.00

☐ The Golden Bed. By Wallace Irwin. A gorgeous love story of a Southern beauty and a "poor white." $2.00

☐ The King of Elfland's Daughter. By Lord Dunsany. A super-fairy tale of elves, magic and a quaint village of long ago. $2.00

☐ Georgian Short Stories of 1924. A distinguished collection of fiction by fourteen leading British writers. $2.50

Check this list and take it to any bookseller or

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS 2 West 45th Street NEW YORK

Chekhov dismissed all reticence and uncovered his soul. Here, and here only, has he declared himself the liberal and humanitarian, here the artist bemoaning a fate that forced him into journalism, here the Micawber with his everlasting embarrassments of a pecuniary nature, the literary oracle, honest yet kind, and the critic of Russian life and Slavic temperament. Hence the title of this volume is a bit misleading. It may give the impression that the book is a manual of rules and suggestions on authorship. And though there is sufficient consideration and criticism of literary media in the letters to justify the claim that the volume may be an aid to writing, the substance of these epistles is autobiography.

"And I must write and write and hurry to the post office, since, for me, not to write means living in debt and worry. . . . Not for one moment does the thought leave me that I must, that I am obliged to write. To write, and write, and write. I am of the opinion that inner happiness is impossible without idleness. My ideal: to be idle and love a fat girl. For me the greatest delight is to walk, or to sit and do nothing; my favorite occupation—to collect what is not needed (papers, bits of straw, etc.), and to do useless things. Meanwhile I am a litterateur, and must write, even here in Yalta. . . . I am disgusted with writing and I do not know what to do. I'd take up medicine with pleasure; I would look for a post, but I haven't the physical flexibility. When I write, or think about writing, I experience an aversion—as if I were eating sour-cabbage soup from which a roach had been removed—forgive the comparison. It is not writing itself toward which I feel this aversion—it is really toward the literary 'entourage' which one cannot escape, and which one always carries along as the earth carries its atmosphere."

These quotations are chosen from letters extending over a period of five years, that is, from 1893 to 1898. In 1887, when he had just arrived, Chekhov wrote ironically: "I may boast that my business is better than Loboda's. I, brother, have become a merchant. I sell articles, plays, books, and medical advice. I'll get no less than 1,000 rubles for the play; the other day I sold to a certain publisher fifteen old stories that were lying about and that had already appeared in print—for 150 rubles. Sold for one edition only. And so on. In a word, business is lively." The fullest expression of Chekhov's irked and bilked spirit is to be found in the satiric sketch "In Moscow," which Mr. Friedland has wisely included in this biographical material. The maladjustment between man and humanity and the complexity of living always oppressed Chekhov, though he saw and laughed at all of that three-ringed circus of life: the quirks of the gods, the antics of men, and the solemnity of circumstances.

Only slightly less important than the revelation of his own character is Chekhov's explanation of his created characters, especially of those whom the critics and the public misunderstood. In discussing Ivanov, the hero of a play of that name, Chekhov generalizes on the nature of a Russian gentleman. His reflections on the Slavic temperament and his comparisons with the Germans and French, though condensed into half a dozen pages, are equaled only by the observation of Herzen for penetrating analysis and indictment of Russian society. They clarify not merely Ivanov but also Turgenev's Rudin, Tolstoi's Nekhludov, and the salient Russians of one's own acquaintance.

As the quotations indicate, Mr. Friedland's translation is simple and satisfactory. Though the literal rendition occasionally makes for awkward passages like "that it is already a week since I have been tortured by ceaseless palpitations of the heart," it carries the tang of Chekhov's unpretentious yet neat and effective style. In his thoughtful introduction the editor summarizes successfully Chekhov's attitude toward the art of writing, but he overemphasizes the service that the master may render to students of literary technique. The craft of the litterateur was always an incidental consideration with Chekhov.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Mature Youth

The Apple of the Eye. By Glenway Westcott. Dial Publishing Company. $2.50.

THE literature of locality is prevalent just now in America, and therefore Mr. Westcott's book is announced as the story of "a little-known countryside of southern Wisconsin." The setting is painted beautifully and truthfully, but "The Apple of the Eye" is, as a first novel is apt to be, chiefly a presentation of a young man's philosophy and experience of life, with an autobiographical flavor.

This novel, in impulse and method, inclines rather toward poetry than toward that vital concern with character which Arnold Bennett names as the basis of pure fiction. The sureness of the characterizations seems to rest upon thoughtful consideration and not so much upon that minute and intuitive understanding of people as people that usually marks the born writer of fiction. The characters are human qualities—purity, chastity, sensuous joy, the primitive—rather than human beings. But what the book lacks in the sense of intense intimacy and of a deep human relish for the spectacle of life it perhaps gains in a poetic simplicity of conception.

There is no particular value in restating its philosophy, which is set forth very definitely in the book itself. Philosophies and conclusions cannot make art, although they can mar it. There are other, personal qualities which give Mr. Westcott's book a very marked distinction—an exceptional sense of form and balance, poetic insight, and a kind of fine adequacy in form, characterization, speech, incident, style that is like the satisfying competency of technique which one feels in certain musicians.

The whole book shows this perception of aesthetic form, as every separate sentence shows it. It is very nearly faultless in technique—faultless rather than perfect, because the feeling of perfection is more intense and goes beyond this. The book is divided with a beautiful coherence. The first part, the primitive story of Bad Han, is quite complete and at the same time forms a legend for the rest of the book. The second part tells, as it stands, the brief tragedy of the coming together of puritan and pagan; but it, too, is drawn into the whole by its influence in the development of young Dan Strane's comprehension of life. The third part coordinates the other two. There is a balanced comprehension of both the puritan and pagan impulses, very rare in American fiction up to this time but exactly due. Beside the excesses of many recent novels this has the maturity of a thoughtful and deeply feeling boy, watching his elders, weighing and pondering, then quietly and resolutely taking his own way among the materials of his choice.

The preoccupation with form exacts its penalty, however, in a certain static quality. Each sentence, each paragraph and part is so careful, so complete that it tends to halt the movement instead of becoming an integral part of it. There are a few very fine scenes which move of their own accord, inevitably, and irresistibly. The most beautiful is the sheep-shearing scene in the chapter called A Puritan Idyll. And there is, too, a certain remoteness or isolation in the quality of the author's vision which often gives the effect of someone standing a little too much apart and seeing with a distinct but at times unrelated view; so that we get, not quite so much a vivid participation in the thing itself as a fine and truthful but rather too personal vision of it.

There is little of the haziness, unevenness, and panicky loss of direction of an immature novel. And yet, for all its simplification, the book has behind it far too strong and aesthetic impulse and feeling to produce the journalistic patness and obviousness of a thesis novel. Only twice, I think, does a certain immaturity betray itself: first, in the story of Rosalia, which has too much of a poetic Ophelia touch about the pretty madness and which does get off the basis of reality to which

OF ESPECIAL INTEREST TO NATION READERS:

OUR CHANGING MORALITY

By Bertrand Russell, Floyd Dell, Ludwig Lewisohn, etc.

"THE subject of sex has been treated in this generation with a strange, rather panic-stricken lack of balance. . . . A few courageous, matter-of-fact glances into the depths have been embodied in this volume."—From the Introduction by Freda Kirchwey.

The problems of the younger generation have been more or less toyed with for some time, but in this symposium, which appeared in The Nation, many of the best known serious writers of our day discuss these questions from every angle. $2.50 net

BEGGARS OF LIFE

[A Hobo Autobiography]

By Jim Tully

H. L. MENCKEN says, "This is the best book of its kind I have ever encountered. Thirty-one strange chapters, and all of them good." $3.00 net

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI, INC., 39 W. 8th Street, NEW YORK

BRENTANO'S BRENTANO'S

The Flower Beneath the Foot

By RONALD FIRBANK

Who Wrote "Prancing Nigger"

The pathetic history of St. Laura de Nazianzi and the times in which she lived.

"One of the most curious phenomena that grace . . . the present literary sky of England is, beyond all doubt, Ronald Firbank. . . . Few, if any, English-speaking writers have filled the part of the enfant terrible with such grace and gusto."—Edwin Bjorkman in the New York Evening Post. $2.00

The Natural Man

By PATRICK MILLER

The novel which won this year's Grant Richards prize for literary merit, THE NATURAL MAN is, strangely enough, a straight war book. Unclothed by sentiment or mock heroics, it tells the story of the born soldier. As a refutation to war novels of the Dos Passos, Cummings, Stallings type, it commands your attention. $2.00

At All Bookstores

BRENTANO'S :: PUBLISHERS

BRENTANO'S BRENTANO'S

Sherwood Anderson

writes:

Dear Calverton:

It would be absurd of me to make any criticism at all of your article. I wonder why you thought I might not like it. It is one of the few things I have read that has something to say.

May I keep the copy I have or will you want it returned? The essay is remarkably fine.

Sincerely,

SHERWOOD ANDERSON.

of

SHERWOOD ANDERSON:

A Study in Sociological Criticism

By V. F. Calverton

The Giant (a story), Leonid Andreyev
A Modern Analysis of Historical Theory, Haim Kantorovitch are other articles in the Fall issue of

THE MODERN QUARTERLY

318-20 Exeter Street Baltimore, Md.

35 cents a copy. $1.00 a year.

Name .....

Address .....

most of the story holds so firmly; and again at the end—the intellectual test of any novel—which turns to autobiography and spoils the illusion of a thing complete in itself. Like his own Dan Strane the author cannot quite make a legend of his own short life—cannot hold these things away from him but must relate them too closely to his own personal existence. Thus the vision underlying the book is not quite equal to its fine execution. But it is a beautiful book, individual if not strongly original at bottom.

RUTH SUCKOW

The Great Sorcerer

Wagner as Man and Artist. By Ernest Newman. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE first American appearance of Mr. Newman's "Wagner" should be an occasion for public rejoicing. Musical criticism is so often no more than a display of pedantic dulness, or personal caprice, or simply bad temper that one welcomes with delight the exercise of an intelligence as incorruptible as it is certainly not pea-green. There is nothing ponderous about Mr. Newman's learning, and nothing spiteful or ignorant about his wit. His first book on Wagner came after the permanent proof and establishment of the great sorcerer's genius, and therefore he is not one of those whose unremitting crusades brought first light to the darkness of the barbarians. Yet he was one of the first to write a full study of Wagner in English, and he is one of the last to give the shining distinction of wisdom and learning to the unraveling of a personality whose art reshaped the texture of music, roused the diligent wrath of schoolmen, and even now afflicts the chambered elegance of those who like to talk about "pure" music.

When Mr. Newman considers Wagner the man and Wagner the artist he is, of course, doing two almost separated tasks. The time has gone by when a great-hearted critic like Ruskin can affirm that the beauty of art springs from the beauty of the artist's character. In his own life Wagner presented a discreditable series of years filled with egotism, greed, meanness, pettiness, and vanity. In music, and for that matter in any kind of art, perhaps no one else has created a world so colored with loveliness and splendor and haunting enchantment. Mr. Newman does not indulge himself with moral judgments about Wagner's disingenuous conduct and his almost monstrous egotism. It would be too much like lecturing the ocean. Wagner was what he was by the very force of his temperament. The world did not treat him kindly, or welcome his slow-maturing colossal genius with anything like enthusiasm. The world was too busy admiring Meyerbeer's operas, immense and impressive like gigantic earthworms. It had no time for a new heaven peopled with gods and heroes and incomparable seraphim. Wagner's years of almost incredible privation and disappointment in Paris would have planted weeds of rank bitterness in the heart of the most self-denying, and self-denial is not a desirable virtue in one who, like Siegfried rather than like Parsifal, was to dispossess the old order that a magic rainbow might be flung to the cloud turrets of Valhalla.

In his first study Mr. Newman explained the difficult business of Wagner's "ideas" about music drama and even then indicated that the ideas do not matter. Wagner was wiser than his metaphysics and more enduring than his theories. Mr. Newman leaves for lesser critics the pain of being bothered by Wagner's determination to paint in music the dazzle of magic fire and the bleak upland of a mountain dawn rather than the geometrics of a spun pattern. Taking his own great learning almost for granted, Mr. Newman first disentangles the thick mesh of "Mein Leben" (an invaluable and often misleading document) so that he may proceed to the Artist in Theory and the Artist in Practice. Informed with a culture of old music no less genuine than his understanding of new music, Mr. Newman traces the long course of Wagner's development from the early Italianism of "Lohengrin" and "Tann-

McBRIDE BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS

A new book by the greatest Living Romantic Writer
JAMES BRANCH CABELL

STRAWS AND PRAYER-BOOKS

In this trenchant and stimulating book Mr. Cabell offers what may best be described as an autobiography of the mind. It is a discussion of the mental and spiritual adventures which lead to the production of literature, so brilliantly presented that it becomes one of the most diverting, as it is certainly the most personal, of Mr. Cabell's books. Third printing. $2.50 net

BUSHRANGERS
By Charles J. Finger
Another beguiling book of rogues by the author of Highwaymen. Illustrated with eight spirited wood cuts in color by Paul Honore. $3 net

THE LIFE STORY OF AN UGLY DUCKLING
By Marie Dressler
There have been other biographies of stage folk, but surely none resembling this life story of Marie Dressler, best beloved of American comediennes and creator of the immortal Tillie. It is the revelation of a richly human personality, at once candid and engaging. Illustrated. $3 net

FRAGMENTS FROM MY DIARY
By Maxim Gorky
A book of sketches and interpretative pictures of Russian life, done with the beauty and tenderness and irony that are found in M. Gorky's other work. $3 net

ECONOMY IN HOME BUILDING
By Oswald C. Hering
A well-known architect discusses the commercial and artistic side of building for the benefit of the prospective home-builder. Illustrated. $5 net

DR. LITTLE'S DOG BOOK
By George Watson Little, D.V.M.
A complete manual for dog lovers upon the care of the dog in sickness and health. The author is one of the leading canine specialists in the country. Illustrated. $4 net

WHEN ISRAEL IS KING
By Jerome and Jean Tharaud
A study of the Jewish question in Hungary by the authors of The Shadow of the Cross. $2 net

THE JUDGE
By Maxim Gorky
Gorky's latest play, which the author considers his finest achievement in this field. $1.50 net

SQUIFFER
By Hal Garrott
A charming tale for young people by the author of Snythergen. Squiffer is a squirrel whose desire to become a boy sends him upon strange adventures. The characters of the tale include a Bear, a Candy Princess, the wicked Red-Fairy-Hot (with his three quick changes) and ever so many other delightful persons. With many illustrations in color and black and white by Dugald Walker. $2.50 net

WONDER TALES FROM FAR AWAY
By Frederick H. Martens
Fairy tales gathered from the story-treasure of far-away people and places by the author of Fairy Tales from Far Away. For children from seven to twelve. Illustrated in color and black and white by Da Loria Norman. $2.50 net

THE ENCHANTED WANDERER
By Nicolai Lydskov
A robust, whimsical tale of the wanderings of Golovan, madman saint and rascal. The Enchanted Wanderer is one of a series of Russian classics, edited by Maxim Gorky. $2.50 net

THE HOUSE OF HATE
By Rita Wellman
A finely written story of a woman in whom love and an even more powerful passion struggle for dominance. Florence of the present day is the background of a drama which is developed with admirable subtlety. $2 net

PAULUS FY
By Helene Mullins and Marie Gallegher
James Branch Cabell says: "This is a startling book, a book compact, it may be, of all delicate corruptions, and yet pointing a delicate moral, too, for the not utterly unsophisticated." $2 net

THE THING IN THE WOODS
By Harper Williams
"From its sinister title to its last shivery page The Thing in the Woods, by Harper Williams, is the scaringest mystery story that has come this way since the fearsome Hound of the Baskervilles."—Toledo Blade.

THE VALLEY OF EYES UNSEEN
By Gilbert Collins
Far-off China and the mysterious hinterland of Thibet are the scene of this exciting tale in which yellow men and white struggle for the treasure preserved by an unknown race. $2 net

LIBERATION
By Isabel Ostrander
The story of a man who escaped from prison. One of the best of Miss Ostrander's novels. $2 net

THE MAN WHO PLUNDERED THE CITY
By Sven Elvestad
A mystery story upon unusual lines, with a fantastic villain and a detective who is not a superman. $2 net

At all Bookstores. When ordering by mail, add 8 per cent. for postage.
ROBERT M. McBRIDE & CO., Publishers, New York

häuser" to the creation of works which are Wagner's own, his final and indisputable masterpieces. Certainly Mr. Newman was never more subtle or profound than in the pages wherein he discovers Wagner's symphonic lineage and shows that the abiding permanence of his greatest music lies in the symphonic web of the tone poem rather than in the histrionics of the stage. Whatever Wagner himself may have written to the contrary, Mr. Newman is altogether right in describing the finest pages in "Tristan" and "Götterdämmerung" as concert pieces independent of the contours of fat sopranos or the stage fright of Brynhilde's horse.

It would be impossible for anyone in words to give more than a faint intimation of the stupendous grandeur of the last act of "Götterdämmerung," or the fearful mounting passion of "Tristan," or the golden serenity of "Parsifal." Analysis and explanation and persuasion can do little more to make clear the rapture of a remembered experience. Yet if anyone can indicate the infallible invention of Wagner as a dramatist, or his extraordinary variety of tone painting, or his overwhelming orchestral climaxes, it must be Mr. Newman, unless indeed it is Mr. Lawrence Gilman. Once Mr. Newman has discussed the historical and technical details of Wagner's life and art he can in full measure estimate the nature of an achievement as astounding as the "Ring" or as exquisite as "Die Meistersinger." Having disposed of the quaint theory that Wagner ever tried to put actual birds and horses and forests into music, Mr. Newman can give us (or perhaps merely renew for us) judgment on Wagner's volcanic concentration of musical phrase, his understanding of the most diverse springs of character so that Hagen and Alberich are drawn with no less complete reality than Siegmund and Brynhilde, his rising flood of a long-drawn musical intensity that at last gathers to itself the very substance of pain and sorrow and sublimity. Each of the great operas hangs like a profound dream over the dark gulf of time. Each one glows from its own luminous and terrible beauty and speaks with its own voice of divine godhead.

A. Donald Douglas

The Art of Elie Faure

The History of Art. By Elie Faure. Translated by Walter Pach. Harper and Brothers. 4 vols., each $7.50.

DURING the past three years these volumes, long well known in France, have been appearing in Mr. Pach's vivid translation. Each has been met with generous praise, and the series, now completed, seems on the verge of becoming a popular classic. Before it is thus placed safely out of reach there is need for a general estimate, a little calmer perhaps than was possible during the first excitement it aroused by its unusual eloquence.

Why is the history popular? What does it give its readers? A fine collection of pictures, first of all, representing a wide range of art. In the text, an enormous variety of subjects. Artists of every time and place; anecdotes of their lives and personalities. Their environments—the desert, the tropical forest, the streets of Florence, Paris; the effect of these places upon their art. Intellectual and social backgrounds—Platonism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, medieval Christianity, democracy, materialism, industrialism; all religions, philosophies, social systems; literature, music, architecture; a glance at the history of every artistic people from the cavemen to the grain-elevator builders of North Dakota. How all these affected, and were expressed by, painting and sculpture. A philosophy of civilization almost as broad in scope as Herbert Spencer's. A tolerant mind, finding something good in old masters as well as in modern extremists, with no axes to grind, no metaphysical prejudices, no pedantic scholarship or dogmas about what people ought to like. Musical sentences, dreamy images, epigrams, metaphors that seem to sum up a man, a school, or an age; the ability to vitalize a subject, to make of

Books that Stimulate Thought

THINGS AND IDEALS
Essays in Functional Philosophy
By M. C. Otto, University of Wisconsin
Philosophic facts examined discerningly and presented in a distinguished style. The author revaluates current values and emphasizes the reality of things. $2.50

PROBLEMS OF PHILOSOPHY
By G. Watts Cunningham, University of Texas
Written from the point of view that modern philosophy supplements and unifies the results of scientific research, of which it is an outgrowth. $3.50

THE INNER DISCIPLINE
By Charles Baudouin and A. Lestchinsky
Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul
The study of auto-suggestion considering both its historical and present-day aspects. $2.00

MIND AS A FORCE
By Charles F. Harford
The forces of mind and how best to use them are comprehensibly presented for the lay reader. $2.00

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF EARLY CHILDHOOD
By William Stern
Translated from the German by Anna Barwell
This standard work, recently revised and published in English for the first time, makes a comprehensive study of the child's psychic life from birth to the sixth year, the author basing his theories upon a wealth of observation. $5.00

SCHOLARSHIP AND OTHER ESSAYS
By Calvin Thomas, Late of Columbia University
Comprises thirteen essays on varied subjects—all discussed in Thomas's lucid style. A sketch of Thomas's life and works by Professor W. A. Braun is included. $2.50

ESSAYS TOWARD TRUTH
Studies in Orientation
By K. A. Robinson, W. B. Pressey and J. D. McCallum of Dartmouth College
Certain fundamental questions pervading the present social fabric discussed by some of the most distinguished living writers, including Bertrand Russell, John Dewey, Mencken, Galsworthy, etc. $2.00

Economics of Fatigue and Unrest and the Efficiency of Labour in English and American Industry
By P. Sargant Florence, Ph.D., Cambridge University
A summary of the most recent results of English and American labour research, discussing industrial inefficiency and methods of prevention. $5.00

PROBLEMS OF CITIZENSHIP
By Hayes Baker-Crothers, Dartmouth College, and Ruth Allison Hudnut
Provokes individual critical thinking on such important civic problems as the Newspaper, Immigration, the Negro, the Woman Question, Labor, Civil Liberty, International Relations, and World Peace.

THE READER'S GUIDE BOOK
By May Lamberton Becker
Mrs. Becker considers every taste and purpose in her advice to readers. John Cotton Dana, Librarian of the Newark Public Library, says: "Mrs. Becker has helped thousands of readers in their search for what each year becomes more difficult to find—the best books on specific subjects." $2.00

At All Booksellers
HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
19 West 44th St. New York

Greek scupture, Flanders, or the cathedral a living organism into which one enters, of whose growth and decline one seems to be a part.

Enough to ask of one book, perhaps, and certainly more than most writers on art have to offer. Yet because of his importance M. Faure deserves to be judged by severe standards. He does much, but not everything equally well, and there are serious failings almost inevitable in the sort of task he has undertaken.

The first follows naturally from his attempt to interrelate so many different subjects. Along with Spencer and many other philosophers he has fallen into the trap of over-simplifying history, trying to reduce it to the interplay of a few factors, assuming universal causal connections where they do not exist. He has undertaken to show how all sorts of remote conditions affect the arts, and show it he will in every case, resorting when necessary to the most far-fetched explanations of underlying influence. Too cautious or too rhetorical to make simple and clear assertions, he piles up analogies. The Hindus live in tropical forests, profuse with swarming life; they are pantheists; their art is profuse, swarming with unorganized forms. The ground of Italy undulates; its church holds individuals in order; Florentine line embraces living forms in its undulating arabesque. Provence has bare rocks and sharply outlined planes; Cézanne's painting is reduced to the bare essentials of form. Drugged by long passages of highly colored prose, one forgets to ask: "But is this really an explanation? Have not other sorts of environment produced that kind of art? Have not the same environments produced different kinds of art?" Doubts and exceptions are brushed aside with vague, high-sounding concepts reminiscent of Spencer: integrations and dissolutions of social forces, rhythms, equilibria, periods of analysis and synthesis. Rarely is a specific picture more than casually alluded to; never is it discussed with anything approaching thoroughness. A few chapters are genuinely constructive in linking up a social institution with an art-form; others are full of penetrating guesses which open up long vistas of possible speculation; some dress up the familiar and obvious thing, such as the connection between Venetian pageantry and color. But all are written as if the system of events were simple and certain; no circumstance is irrelevant, no phenomenon incomprehensible; never is the author content to admit frankly: "Ingres was a bourgeois; some bourgeois paint one way and some another; why, I do not know."

In explaining the subject-matter of art he is more plausible. Social and religious conditions doubtless determine to some extent what a man shall paint, whether Virgins or Venuses, queens or wives of millionaires. But whether they determine how he shall paint them, with what line, color, light, and shade, is more dubious. There probably is some relationship, but M. Faure has not established it as universally as he supposes. The plastic qualities of a painting or statue are what distinguish it from other treatments of the same subject; far more than subject-matter, they distinguish an artist or an age from others. Presumably they should be the central theme of a history of art, but here, as usual, they are persistently subordinated to subject-matter. So when the author comes to men whose subjects are comparatively unimportant—Chardin, the Negro sculptors, Modigliani, Picasso—he is all at sea; he passes quickly on, or spins out irrelevant platitudes. Elsewhere his occasional perception of plastic form is drowned in a flood of other ideas, poured in haphazard. There are so many horses to ride at once that he has to skip back and forth incessantly. First a vague simile, perhaps (this artist's colors are like burning clay); then his home town, where such colors are to be seen; his early loves, the books he read; the scenes he must have met with on the street; long idyllic reveries, long pursuit of labored metaphors. As a statement of facts it is bewildering; and even as rhetoric the flowery phrases lose their first appeal. The same figures of speech come back a little too often, the same hearts throbbing with fever, full breasts of women,

OXFORD BOOKS

THE SANSKRIT DRAMA
By A. Berriedale Keith $7.00

Thirty-two years have passed since the first adequate sketch of the origin and development of the Indian Dramatic Theory. In the light of recent research the time is therefore ripe for a fresh investigation in the light of the new materials available.

INDIAN PAINTING UNDER THE MUGHALS A. D. 1550 to A. D. 1750
By Percy Brown Net $35.00

"The word 'sumptuous' is emphatic and not to be used slightly. But if a stronger adjective as descriptive were at our command we would use it in describing this engrossing study. Into all public libraries and into the home library of every lover of art this superb book should go."— Boston Transcript.

THE HOME OF AN EASTERN CLAN
By Mrs. Leslie Milne Net $5.35

An interesting and readable account based upon first-hand observations, and extending over many years, of the life and customs of a little known tribe of North-Eastern Burma who are as yet hardly touched by European Civilization.

WHITE JACKET
By Herman Melville Nett 80c

The incidents portrayed were the outcome of the author's own experiences on board the U. S. Frigate, "United States." Moby Dick by Herman Melville was published last year. Typee and Omoo will be published shortly.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
American Branch
35 West 32nd St. New York City

In making up your Christmas List—Don't overlook

ROGET'S INTERNATIONAL THESAURUS

"The chiefest tool of all writing craftsmen."
—Dr. Frank Crane.

One of the most valuable desk guides ever prepared, for both the careful writer and reader. It supplements the Dictionary at every turn. Its use is a liberal education. (The Cross-Word Puzzlers have discovered this fact!)

Prices $3.00 to $5.50

THOS. Y. CROWELL CO. NEW YORK

calm brows of blond angels, pearly mists and ruby pulps of tropical fruit. One can enjoy such things for a while in either a poet or a Frenchman; M. Faure is both, but there is a limit.

His virtues and defects, in short, are those of all romanticists—enthusiasm, intuitive sympathy for human struggle and emotion, along with extravagance, loose thinking, and dissipation of energy. What he says of the romantics is essentially true of himself: Delacroix "feels too much, he wants to say too much; and if the ensemble is always living, it sometimes is too much alive, it reels, as if it could not bear the weight of silence. . . . Hugo abounds in holes, in empty places full of smoke and wind. Wagner is often loose and prolix, and his giant breast suffocates under the flowers he heaps up."

The final test of art criticism would seem to be: Does it help one to appreciate art? There is room for doubt whether M. Faure's type of criticism, in spite of the pleasant reading it makes, will ever accomplish much toward that end. It can succeed only in giving one the habit of looking at a painting in so many ways at once that all are bound to be confused and blurred, with dimly felt plastic qualities, subject-matter, historical associations, and day-dreams all jostling one another for supremacy. By the easily satisfied this fulness of soul, these vague emotional quiverings at the name Botticelli or Sistine Madonna, are taken for understanding and appreciation. Such readers will come from this book with a comfortable sense of omniscience but with no suspicion that such a thing as plastic form exists, and with little conception of how to proceed in the face of a new and unfamiliar painting. M. Faure admits frankly that his work is a poem, and holds that the study of art must be either that or the dry table of dates which he appends to each volume. Is there no middle ground, then, for clear thinking, for the simple statement of facts, opinions, and preferences? Why should a good picture be injured by our finding out just what forms it produces with its line, light, and color, in what distinctive ways it treats its subject? A history of art that followed this course, or indeed any course straightforwardly, would get somewhere, and need by no means be coldly intellectual about it. A little of such thinking would make it possible to approach, with some hope of success, a few of the ten thousand problems that M. Faure has valiantly tried to solve at once.

THOMAS MUNRO

Books in Brief

The Falkland Islands. By V. F. Boyson. With notes on the natural history by Rupert Vallentin. Oxford University Press. $5.

A history of the treeless islands of Patagonia which entered history with Amerigo Vespucci and became a plaything of Spanish, French, and British ambitions. Today the strange huge Falkland fox is extinct and the last king penguin is dead, its oil used to seal the Falkland roofs. A commercial company takes profits from a million sheep and kills the wild geese who dispute with the sheep the succulent native tussock-grass. But the mysterious stone rivers, in which no water ever runs, remain to puzzle the geologist and the geographer.

Anglican Church Principles. By F. J. Foakes Jackson. Macmillan and Company. $2.25.

A flippant reader might say that Mr. Jackson makes a better case for the enduring Anglicanism of the Established Church of England both before and after Henry VIII than for its enduring Christianity. But such comment would do less than justice to a scholarly and readable book in which such different men as John Wesley and the modern High Churchmen are dealt with sympathetically yet discerningly. To one who knows Mr. Jackson as a colleague of Kirsopp Lake in drastic criticism of the gospels and the person of Jesus it is a bit surprising to find him here revealed as so good a Churchman.

Lippincott Books in Brief

UNCENSORED RECOLLECTIONS — Anonymous
The literary tid-bit of the season—the book all America and all Europe will devour this year. King George, it is reported, has read his copy three times, and this is not to be wondered at considering its piquant and racy revelations. "The most entertaining volume of intimate memoirs the reviewer has read for many a season."—New York Herald Tribune. Eight printings have already been necessary to satisfy the demand here and abroad. 346 Pages. Large octavo. $4.50

SEEING CANADA — By John T. Faris
A tour through the land of Moose and Salmon, from Cape Breton to the Rockies. Completes Dr. Faris' popular American Travel Series, now covering every section of the United States and Canada. Frontispiece in color, 150 illustrations in double-tone. $6.50

THE MANORS AND HISTORIC HOMES OF THE HUDSON VALLEY — By Harold Donaldson Eberlein
Published in limited editions, all previous volumes of Lippincott books on Historic Homes have gone speedily out of print and when procurable now sell at a premium. The present volume will become one of the most desirable because of the interest of the region selected. Frontispiece in photogravure, 81 illustrations in doubletone. $10.00

HISTORIC WALL-PAPERS — From Their Inception to the Introduction of Machinery — By Nancy McClelland
A literary luxury. The only comprehensive and authoritative study of the subject in any language. Printed from type in a very limited edition, this magnificently illustrated volume is destined to become a rare book among rare books—an ornament to any fine collection. 12 Color plates, 245 illustrations in halftone and a folding chart of periods. $25.00

SPANISH GARDENS AND PATIOS — By Mildred Stapley Byne and Arthur Byne
Spanish gardens are of oriental inspiration and differ from all others. This volume comes as the first authoritative work on the subject, a revelation to artists, architects and owners of summer homes. 4 Color plates, 175 illustrations in halftone and measured drawings of important gardens, all made by the authors expressly for this work. $15.00

FEEDING PETER — By "Caroline"
"To cook interestin' is the Lord's own gift." But young housekeepers who read "Caroline's" instructions on how to feed Peter deliciously, wholesomely and economically may acquire it second-hand. Never have pots and pans, recipes and menus, been more alluringly presented. $2.00

LOUIS BECKE'S — Never-to-be-Forgotten South Sea Tales Now Published in a Uniform Edition
Louis Becke's bizarre and adventurous life among pirates and pearlers, islanders and traders, deserters from whaleships and men-o'-war gave his work such truth and vigor that it has outlived more recent South Sea fiction. In his books readers will find the real South Seas. The following four are now published, to be followed in time by the others:

PACIFIC TALES
BY REEF AND PALM and THE EBBING OF THE TIDE
HELEN ADAIR
RODMAN, THE BOATSTEERER
Each $2.00

PRILLILGIRL — By Carolyn Wells
The New "Fleming Stone" Detective Story. A mystery that mystifies—until the adroit Stone outwits the murderer by radio. $2.00

HARBOTTLE — By John Hargrave
A thought-provoking novel, outspoken on the subjects of Trade, Sex, Religion, Politics and other human relations. The Saturday Review calls it: "A novel of great importance as an expression of the spirit of the times." $2.00

RE-CREATIONS — By Grace Livingston Hill
This diverting romance is an ideal gift for old and young, for with freshness and vivacity it tells just the kind of love story everyone likes at heart. $2.00

LAUGHING LAST — By Jane Abbott
The story of Sidney Romley's adventurous summer on the boats and wharves of Provincetown. A splendid book for girls, fresh and sweet as the clean breath of the Atlantic over the Cape Cod sand dunes. Colored frontispiece, 3 illustrations in black and white. $1.75

Lippincott's Sociological Series
Books that apply scientific methods to social thought
Edited by Edward Cary Hayes, University of Illinois

CRIMINOLOGY — By Edwin H. Sutherland
An analysis of criminality in the light of recent developments in the science of human behavior. $3.50

RACES, NATIONS AND CLASSES — By Herbert A. Miller
The psychology of dominion and freedom. $2.00

THE SOCIOLOGY OF REVOLUTION — By P. Sorokin
A sociological analysis of Revolution, in the light of the Russian Revolution especially. Tentative price $2.00

POLITICAL ACTION — By Seba Eldridge
A naturalistic interpretation of the Labor Movement in relation to the state. $2.00

POPULATION PROBLEMS — By Edward B. Reuter
An enlightening book on the facts of population here and abroad. $2.00

SOCIAL WORK IN THE LIGHT OF HISTORY — By Stuart A. Queen
The first study of social work in historical perspective. $2.00

At All Bookstores

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
LONDON PHILADELPHIA MONTREAL

Books for Children

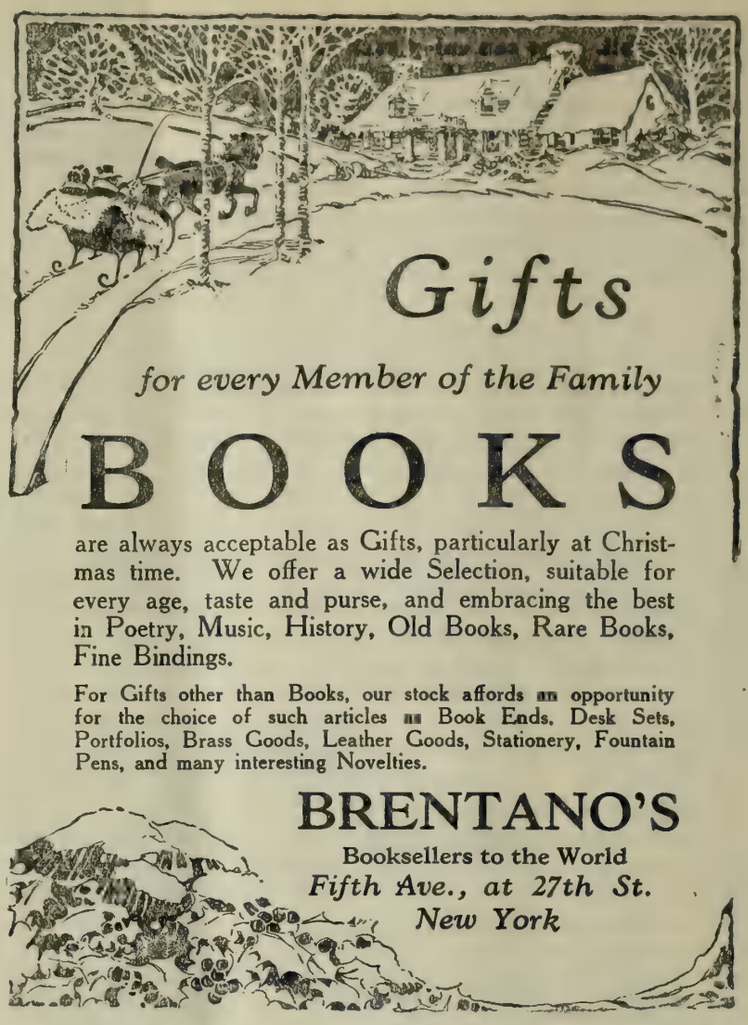
By DOROTHY GRAFFE

THERE is as little logic in discussing "books for children" as there would be in lumping the balance of printed matter under "books for adults." Adults read poetry and essays, scientific treatises or dissertations written to obtain a Ph.D.; they do not, however, regard all these as one and the same species. But for the children, who are obliged in the main to read only those books which adults have written—with a few honorable exceptions—and certainly which they have printed and published, there is only "juvenile literature," passed out over the counter with never a thought for the particular inclinations of the boy or girl who will read it. The final insult, of course, is that adults write articles deciding which books are most suitable for a certain age, size, and doubtless color of child. This discussion, therefore, is not for the purpose of determining which books of the current season are best for, say, a blond boy of eleven. One has difficulty enough in predicting for adults. Yet books written for children have a right to examination as literature, and in the long run it is as literature that they will be judged by their readers, old or young.

It is pleasant to record that two of the most beguiling books classed this season as "juveniles" have been written by children themselves. Selections from Hilda Conkling's two volumes have been issued as one ("Silverhorn"; Stokes: $2.50), and Nathalia Crane, a young woman of twelve years or so, has brought out a volume of poems ("The Janitor's Boy"; Seltzer: $1.50), which a poet twice her age might read with envy and considerable delight. Mr. William Rose Benét in an admirable preface has said perhaps all there is to say about Nathalia, and he has picked out for comment almost every line of distinction in the volume—lines revealing genuine poetic insight into matters which are not ordinarily grasped so clearly at twelve. With Hilda Conkling it would be much more difficult to isolate felicitous lines, for Hilda is felicitous almost always, if she is also at times reminiscent and self-consciously rapturous. Hilda knows what a poet may say; she will learn in time what he may not. Meanwhile, she can write:

> Sun-flowers, stop growing!
> If you touch the sky where those clouds are passing
> Like tufts of dandelion gone to seed,
> The sky will put you out!
> You know it is blue like the sea . . .
> Maybe it is wet, too!
> Your gold faces will be gone forever
> If you brush against that blue
> Ever so softly!

There are those children who read Hugh Lofting gray and ragged; for them a new volume, as rich and gently humorous as the others, will be cause for joy ("Doctor Dolittle's Circus"; Stokes: $2.50). The little doctor is still the despair of his neat duck housekeeper; he will wander over the country ministering sensibly to afflicted animals. Mr. Lofting has composed also a diverting book of nonsense rhymes ("Porridge Poetry"; Stokes: $1.25), adding his own absurdly solemn illustrations. Very amiable young children should find this little book as welcome as "the wonderful adventures of Ludo, the little green duck" (Duffield: $2), an extravaganza in lavish green and purple which takes Ludo from his home in Normandy across the world and back again. "Tony Sarg's Book for Children" (Greenberg: $3.75) is likewise full of colored pictures intimately illustrating a text that will delight aged parents who must read it aloud; it holds, moreover, plenty of interest and laughter for children, even if a little of the humor is above their heads. The tale of how the battle of Waterloo was lost through Napoleon's excessive fondness for pastry should become a classic of nonsensical history. The handsomely bound "Number Two Joy Street" (Appleton: $2.50) is both less hilarious and less successful than Mr. Sarg's volume. Mr. A. A.



Gifts
for every Member of the Family
BOOKS
are always acceptable as Gifts, particularly at Christmas time. We offer a wide Selection, suitable for every age, taste and purse, and embracing the best in Poetry, Music, History, Old Books, Rare Books, Fine Bindings.
For Gifts other than Books, our stock affords an opportunity for the choice of such articles as Book Ends, Desk Sets, Portfolios, Brass Goods, Leather Goods, Stationery, Fountain Pens, and many interesting Novelties.
BRENTANO'S
Booksellers to the World
Fifth Ave., at 27th St.
New York

RHYMES OF EARLY JUNGLE FOLK:
An outline of Pre-History for the Young Folks. By Mary E. Marcy, illustrated with seventy-one woodcuts by Wharton H. Esherick.

The Hartford Courant says:

"The children of the rising generation are here presented with a delightfully up-to-date account of pre-historic man, related in exceedingly readable and clever verse; possessing this volume a child of the tenderest years is at once given the scientific point of view; cave-men and such-like amazing creatures become as real as the lions and tigers of the old-fashioned picture books.

"As is true of all really first-class books intended for children, the older people who read these verses aloud to their little ones will enjoy them as heartily as will the children themselves, for they are genuinely entertaining and the author's mastery of different meters adds vastly to the charm of their alluring rhymes. Mr. Esherick's woodcuts are in perfect accord with the spirit of the book, and the verses and pictures together make a work which is really striking and original."

$2.00 postpaid.

CHARLES H. KERR & COMPANY, 347 E. Ohio St., Chicago

The CHANNEL BOOKSHOP

A bookshop where your own tastes are sympathetically followed.

Let us help you with your Christmas list. We have many delightful books including charming ones for children.

Come in person or order by mail or telephone.

You will find us at 279 Park Avenue (between 47th and 48th Streets), New York, Tel. Murray Hill 4864.

Milne's story of Prince Rabbit, which begins the book, is charmingly light and original. The rest of the poems and stories vary considerably in merit; some are pretty, some have wit; one at least is dull beyond words.

Mr. Padraic Colum ("The Island of the Mighty"; Macmillan: $2.25) has retold the matchless tales of the Mabinogion so that their poetry, freed from often wearying complications, gushes forth clear and bright. Here are King Arthur's knights with different names and different tasks, but still daring and firm, still riding forth to slay monsters, protect the poor and friendless, storm unassailable castles, and take to wife the fairest ladies in the world. "In the youth's hands," so runs the tale of Kilhuch and Olwen, "were two spears of silver, sharp and well-tempered, of an edge to wound the wind. . . . And the blades of grass bent not beneath him, so light was his courser's tread as he journeyed toward the gate of King Arthur's palace." This was the age when chivalry in literature was yet uncorrupted, when it was proud and lovely and free of rancor. The high-hearted will read about it and ask for more. It is a pity that this book, as well as Harriet Martineau's "Feats on the Fiord" (Macmillan: $1.75), charmingly illustrated by Boris Artzybasheff, could not have been given a better dress by the publisher. The contents, the end papers, the pictures are all satisfying, but a thoroughly unimaginative binding makes the approach to them a little difficult.

When he wrote "Highwaymen"—as good a book for children as was ever written—Mr. Charles J. Finger showed himself a first-rate story-teller. Now in "Tales from Silver Lands" (Doubleday: $3.50) he has retold certain legends of the South American Indians with spirit and with a swift and captivating grace. If a mere grown-up may judge of such matters, this is the ideal children's book. It is, to begin with, beautifully made and illustrated with excellent woodcuts by Paul Honoré; it tells of giants and witches, of astute animals who not only attend sensibly to their own affairs but are generous enough to come to the aid of honest young men harassed by sorcerers, of unsuspecting little girls whom black magic freezes tight to a rock; it is rich in fancy and poetry and at the same time full of good sense and good humor; brave deeds succeed each other and the moral is not distressingly plain. If a child is so unreasonable as to demand more than Mr. Finger has to offer, he can only be directed to retreat in good order to Gulliver and Robinson Crusoe, those ancient strongholds.

A Note on Gluck

By PITTS SANBORN

NOW that the Metropolitan Opera House has gone for over seven years without giving the public anything by Gluck, the Society of the Friends of Music is taking upon itself to fill a want by devoting its concert of next April to a performance of Gluck's "Orfeo," to be done, of course, in what, for convenience, is termed "concert form." It is a distressing reflection that Gluck is no longer staged at the Metropolitan, but in justice to Mr. Gatti-Casazza we must not forget that during his sixteen years of directorship he has done what no other impresario ever did in America; he has produced three operas by Gluck, "Orfeo," "Armide," and "Iphigénie en Tauride"—the first in particularly artistic fashion and the two latter at least for the first time in this country. Perhaps eventually he will return to Gluck.

Meanwhile, if New York is to look to the concerts of the Friends of Music for the creations of a great composer of lyric drama whose works are constantly staged in Europe, it is permissible to express a wish that the Friends had selected for their coming concert performance not the comparatively familiar "Orfeo" but that particular one of the six major operas of Gluck which has never been restored to stage use. I mean the "Paride ed Elena." However, inasmuch as the Friends

ANIMAL LAND

Delightful, Entertaining and Informative Stories About Animals, Birds and Insects for Children, Parents and Teachers

By WILLARD ALLEN COLCORD

This charming new book contains three hundred stories, all TRUE, and beautifully told. It is divided into sixteen parts, each part having a descriptive introduction.

A suitable gift-book for children of all ages.

12mo, 462 pages. 16 full-page Illustrations. Jacket in colors.

Beautiful cloth binding in colors, $1.75 net.

The Judson Press

1701-1703 Chestnut Street Philadelphia, Pa.

Early Italian Songs and Airs

Volume Two Now Ready

Transcribed and edited by
PIETRO FLORIDIA

(Two Volumes) Volume Two (Forty Songs)
PUBLISHED IN TWO EDITIONS

FOR HIGH VOICE FOR LOW VOICE

PRICES:
Each volume in heavy paper, cloth back . . $2.50 Net
Each volume in full cloth, gilt . . . . . 3.50 Net
Postage extra except in first and second zones from Boston and New York.

In this volume of The Musicians Library the editor completes his collection of early Italian masterpieces, and brings them forward to the beginning of the nineteenth century when the great school of song melodists yielded to the rise and predominance of modern Italian opera. The names of Scarlatti and Stradella are represented, together with many others less known but of imperishable value; and in the richly colored but appropriate harmonic dress Mr. Floridia has given them these songs are indeed a splendid harvest of beauty.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY,
178-179 Tremont St., BOSTON 10

Chas. H. Ditson & Co., 8-10-12 East 34th St., New York

Order of your local dealer

have chosen "Orfeo," one may then wish that they would see fit to distinguish the concert performance by discarding the usual contralto version in favor of the version which Gluck made twelve years later, when the work was to be introduced to Paris, rewriting the part of the hero for a tenor voice.

But, gloomy reflections and unprofitable wishes aside, it is a fact that the operas of Gluck belong in the theater and that they can be so presented as to appeal strongly to audiences of today. The Munich Festival of 1922 reached its artistic culmination in the performance of "Iphigénie en Aulide" (in a German translation of course), under the direction of Bruno Walter and with Delia Reinhardt and Fritz Feinhals congenially cast as Iphigenia and Agamemnon. The manner of staging the work in Munich was worthy of emulation on any stage. Without risking the grotesque, it might conveniently be described as expressionistic.

Most of the action passed in the huge curtained tent of King Agamemnon, through occasional rifts in which one got a glimpse of the Greek encampment silhouetted black against an orange sky. There was thus the sense of something trammeled and held back as long as the Greek army sat windbound on the coast of Aulis. For the miracle the entire theater was absolutely darkened, and when again light slowly dawned the tent had disappeared and we saw nothing but a wide expanse of beach and a wider sea beyond, bearing the liberated ships. The Grecian host came rushing to the shore with a mighty shout of "Nach Troja!" and the curtain fell on a tempest of frenzied rejoicing.

Similar stagecraft might be applied to Gluck's four other operas of Grecian subject—"Orfeo" itself, "Alceste," "Paride ed Elena," and "Iphigénie en Tauride." But an opera of the time of the Crusades, of adventure and necromancy in the nearer East, is another matter. In "Armide" Gluck's music, though romantic enough in feeling, remains strictly classical in form and subdued in coloring. Of the local color with which any composer of the last two or three generations would saturate an Armida opera Gluck's score is entirely innocent. A realistic Oriental setting, faithful to the period of the Crusades, could not but swear lustily at the classical formalism of the music. Fantastic scenery and costumes, such as our Metropolitan essayed when it put on "Armide" thirteen years ago, were likewise out of sympathy with the music, for Gluck's score, though plenteously imaginative, is not fantastic. To solve the contradictory problems of staging this strange masterwork some have even advocated the wisdom of dressing it frankly according to the court style of the reign of Louis XVI, as it was dressed on the occasion of its initial production at Paris in 1777.

The Paris Opéra, under the present management, has made an interesting experiment of this sort in the staging of operas by Gluck's great predecessor, Rameau. Following the modes of the Louis XV period, the magnificence of the costumes in "Castor et Pollux" turned M. Rouché's costly production at the Opéra into a nine days' wonder. But interesting and artistic as the production indisputably was, the tragedy of "Castor et Pollux" got somehow lost amid the mighty bastions of the ladies' petticoats and the overwhelming parapets of their infinitely elaborated wigs.

If for "Armide" a "period" production is the thing, the inevitable model may be found blazoned on a set of tapestries treasured in the Residenz of the Bavarian kings in Munich. Those tapestries unfold the adventure of the crusading knight Rinaldo with the temptress Armida in a series of pictures whose sumptuous court costuming, though of a land far distant from the Orient and a time centuries later than the Crusades, nevertheless leaves ample room for portrayal of emotion in the features and bodies of the protagonists. If some such model as the Munich tapestries is not followed, then the staging of "Armide" should be without reference to time or clime, a frankly expressionistic presentation, duly decorative but with a discreet abstinence from the extravagant and grotesque.

These are mere suggestions, based on observation, for the effective production of Gluck's operas. The operas themselves need no apology or defense. They are as stageworthy today as the day they were written. Five of them hold a definite place in the theater, and with the present fashion of reviving operatic masterpieces of the remoter past—as, notably, Handel's operas in Germany—it seems extremely likely that "Paride ed Elena" will yet be restored to the stage, where it belongs. It is worthy of note that Richard Strauss has just sponsored a revival of Gluck's ballet "Don Juan" at the Vienna State Opera and that his little "vaudeville," "Les Pèlerins de Mecque," has recently been given again in Paris.

Undoubtedly "Orfeo" as an oratorio will be heard with pleasure when the Friends of Music present it in April. It is no disparagement to their well-meant effort to insist, however, that the place for the operas of Gluck is the stage and that, produced with the taste and imagination of modern stagecraft and competently cast and conducted, they can be trusted to interest audiences at the Metropolitan or any other opera house in the world.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

Compromise

IT was the simple faith of the old-fashioned playwright that life proposed no problems not completely solvable by those who were willing in purity of heart "to do the right thing," and it was the dominant thesis of the realistic drama which swept down from the North to revolutionize ethical thought that life's favorite game was, on the contrary, the devising of dilemmas from which neither good-will nor intelligence provided any possible escape. Between these two views, the one so comfortable and so false, the other so dark and so ready to leap into unrelieved tragedy, lies a region not so carefully cultivated as either of the others—the region where man is shown balked perhaps of his dearest desires and forced into compromises which his spirit does not willingly make, yet finding some modus vivendi for his soul in a world to which he need not wholly surrender.

Because Mr. Sidney Howard has chosen to treat of this middle-ground, his play "They Knew What They Wanted" (Garrick Theater) seems to me extraordinarily interesting. In it three simple people face a problem apparently too difficult for their quite uncultivated intelligences and yet succeed, in a measure, in solving it by virtue of a native intelligence strong enough to make them see how, by giving up much, they can still salvage something from the wreck which circumstance has brought about.

Tony, a middle-aged Italian wine-grower become rich in California, wants a wife and child. He falls in love with a San Francisco waitress and by mail he proposes marriage. The waitress longs so much for a home that she accepts, but as the result of a peculiar confusion she believes that it is a young workman on the place whom she has accepted, and it is not until she has arrived at the house that she realizes her mistake. A few moments before this Tony has been injured in an automobile accident, and, moved half by pity and half by the realization that life will hardly offer her a fairer chance at an existence reasonably decent and comfortable, she resolves to go through with the bargain. But she has reckoned without the presence of the young man whom she had imagined as her future husband. That night (and on no other occasion) they succumb to moonlit madness and that once is enough. Three months later the girl, nursing the wounded man back to health, has come to feel for him at least as much love as can be born of admiration and gratitude alone, and she has forgotten her momentary passion; but the doctor informs her that in the moment of madness a child was conceived. The thought, not of their lust but of their treachery, overwhelms the guilty pair; there seems to remain nothing for them to do except to leave together and to crush the man whom they both love. They tell him and he rises in a frenzy of pain to drive them quickly from the house.

Now fate, working in league with treacherous nature, has seldom devised a subtler or more seemingly hopeless dilemma, and for those who would accept Brand's motto "All or nothing" it would be the nothing which they would get, because it is obviously impossible that any of the three should ever wholly forget or that Tony should ever recapture his dream of the beautiful American girl who loves him with the wholehearted and exclusive passion with which he loves her. To the conventionally minded the situation is hopeless, and so, too, is it hopeless to those who love to find the unsolvable dilemma; but surely if clear vision and thought untrammeled by prejudice or sentimentality is worth anything it is because, after uncovering life's chronic unwillingness to gratify our romantic desire, it teaches us somehow to make the best of what it will give, and it is exactly that which Mr. Howard, choosing a method even bolder than that of the unhappy end, has made his characters decide. The guilty youth wants his freedom, the girl wants her home, Tony wants a baby. Why then should not the man and wife remain together? For then all three will get what they want even if not exactly in the way they wanted it. Thus the art of life is shown to be the art of compromise.

This thesis is neither pleasant nor spectacular, and it is therefore not an easy one to make effective in drama. But the conceptions of character embodied in Tony and the girl (brilliantly interpreted by Richard Bennett and Pauline Lord) succeed in making the play both convincing and, to one spectator at least, thoroughly satisfactory. The latter character, both as conceived by Mr. Howard and as interpreted by Miss Lord, is one of the most significant figures which the current stage has to offer. Through her Mr. Howard has succeeded in salvaging romance for an age suspicious of the idealization which romance seems to demand. He has made her as fallible and as limited as the strictest realism demands, but he has made her at the same time as appealing as any spotless heroine ever conceived by the most inveterate sentimentalist.

"Pigs" (Little Theater) is amusing theatricality of the sort which has made Mr. John Golden rich. "The Desert Flower" (Longacre) is melodrama for the simple-minded only; those for whom it is intended seem to relish it hugely.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATRE

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE
466 Grand St. Telephone Drydock 7516
First Play of the Repertory Season
"The Little Clay Cart"
A Classic Oriental Comedy
Every Eve. (except Mon.) Matinee Saturday
Orchestra $1.50. Balcony $1.00, 75c.

Subscribe Now for Our New Season
Special rates, for particulars, address:
Subscription Sec'y, 466 Grand St., N. Y.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD
by WILLIAM CONGREVE
"Emphatically worth the while of any person with the slightest taste for one of the most exquisite creations of the past to seize an opportunity not often afforded."
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH in "The Nation."
CHERRY LANE Saturday Matinee, 2:45.
Theater: 40 Commerce St.; two blocks from Christopher St. subway station on Seventh Ave. Line.

PLAYHOUSE West 48th Street. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, 2:30. Evenings, 8:30.
the show-off
By GEORGE KELLY
11th CAPACITY MONTH
"BEST OF ALL AMERICAN COMEDIES"—Heywood Broun, World.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

DEBATES LECTURES

DEBATE on PROHIBITION!
CLARENCE DARROW versus REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
(Against) (For)
Chairman, Hon. Royal S. Copeland
Sunday, December 14, 3 P. M.
Manhattan Opera House, 34th St., W. of 8th Ave.
Tickets $1.10, 1.65, 2.20, 2.75. Box Seats $3.30.
On sale at the office of or direct by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. (Longacre 10434-4447)
N. B.—Out-of-towners desiring a printed stenographic report of this debate should send us their names.

New Harper Books

MARK TWAIN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

"LIKE everything that Twain wrote, it has throbbing vitality. And because it gives us first hand information about one of the giants of our native literature, it is a publication of the first importance," wrote Burton Rascoe in Vanity Fair.

Bare Souls

By Gamaliel Bradford

Author of "Damaged Souls"

"Our national portrait gallery is enriched by eight imported presentments which would do no discredit to the suave pencil of Sir Joshua himself," writes Isabel Patterson in the New York Herald-Tribune. Gamaliel Bradford has magnificently revealed the inner as well as the outer selves of eight of the most fascinating personalities of the literature of England and France. $3.50

Tide Marks

By H. M. Tomlinson

Author of "The Sea and the Jungle"

Once more H. M. Tomlinson has interpreted for us the beauty and the terror of the world that he has found in his travels—this time to the beaches of the Moluccas and the Forest of Malaya—in prose, without rival in our time for brilliance, range, and mastery. $4.00

The Causes of Industrial Unrest

By John A. Fitch

This timely and important book by an expert on industrial problems reveals the background, the point of view and the circumstances out of which the general labor struggle arises, bringing to the present heated conflict between labor and capital a thorough understanding of labor psychology and conditions. $3.00

Fiction

Julie Cane

By Harvey O'Higgins

Author of "From the Life"

"We have no hesitation in pronouncing 'Julie Cane' one of the outstanding novels of the year. There is a fine simplicity about the story, a hearty robustness and vigor that are infinitely pleasing," said the New York Evening Post. $2.00

Lottery

By W. E. Woodward

Author of "Bunk"

"The color, the gusto, the crassness, passion, restless energy of America have gone into the making of this book. But the peals of Rabelaisian laughter are hearty," said the New York Times of this rollicking satire on the career of an American business giant. $2.00

R. F. D. No. 3

By Homer Croy

Author of "West of the Water Tower"

Josie Decker is real, from her craze for the movies to her beauty and her longing for the good things of life. In his novel of Josie, her parents, and the Missouri countryside where they lived, Homer Croy places himself definitely in the front rank of significant novelists of the American scene. $2.00

History of Art

By Elie Faure

"Before Elie Faure the history of art was never written," wrote Octave Beliard in the Nantes Mondain of this supreme history of the human race as it has been written in the art of all peoples, from the stone age to the present.

Translated from the French by Walter Pach, with over eight hundred illustrations.

In four volumes. Volume I, Ancient Art; Vol. II, Mediaeval Art; Volume III, Renaissance Art; Volume IV, Modern Art.

Each, $7.50

Gypsy Fires in America

By Irving Brown

Author of "Nights and Days on the Gypsy Trail"

"It is a colorful story, with many high points of romance as we wander over the countryside watching the gypsies trading, reading fortunes, singing world-old songs, and telling tales of humanity's youth.—It is a good deal better reading than most fiction," said the Boston Transcript. $3.00

The Coasts of Illusion

By Clark B. Firestone

This collection of the wonder tales told by the early travelers of the world to their generations—stories of fabulous animals and of countries beyond the rim of the seas—is a sort of Arabian Nights exploration of the faery lands of the human imagination. $4.00

HARPER & BROTHERS Established 1817 NEW YORK

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1924 No. 3102

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 665
EDITORIALS:
Muscle Shoals—Ours 668
Britain and Our Reparations 669
International Literature 669
Albert De Silver 670
SOVIET GEORGIA'S LITTLE REVOLUTION. By Louis Fischer 671
MAKING COOPERATION SUCCEED IN AMERICA. By Agnes D. Warbasse 673
THE PRIMITIVE BLACK MAN. By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois 675
JAURÈS AT THE PANTHEON. By Ida Treat 677
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 680
CORRESPONDENCE 680
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 682
Twin Prestidigitators. By R. F. Dibble 682
"The Fox's Paw." By W. L. Fichter 683
Wilberforce. By Frank J. Klingberg 683
Europe for Children. By Martha Gruening 684
Rockwell Kent in the South. By Glen Mullin 684
Books in Brief 685
The Nation's Poetry Prize 686
DRAMA:
Too Much Main Street. By Joseph Wood Krutch 686
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
What England Wants in the Sudan 688
France Sets an Example 690

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN, LITERARY EDITOR

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS

JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S MESSAGE to Congress on the state of the nation is a first-class report of an executive to a board of directors. It is clear and straightforward, in the best style of any of the President's documents, and—is lacking in vision and idealism. The President boasts not at all of his tremendous electoral success; when he refers to it he does so merely to assert that it is a verdict that the country "is determined to go forward," but that "it will have no pretenses" and "no vagaries." Unfortunately, to the President, who in his Labor Day speech asserted that the New England mill operatives ought to call themselves blessed because they were earning $14.95 a week, the country's "going forward" means merely business and material development. He makes many recommendations, most of which are tossed off with slight comment for the consideration of Congress. Some are routine; others, like the proposal for a national police bureau, are fraught with danger and carry the menace of further unnecessary concentration of power in Washington. Mr. Coolidge's approval of voluntary railway consolidations has helped to send railway securities sky-rocketing in Wall Street. Curiously, he looks upon the pending consolidations as altogether desirable—a complete break with the policy of the Roosevelt-Taft days—because he is convinced that it not only means "a greater element of competition as to service but it will afford economy in operation, greater stability in railway earnings, and more economical financing." He is not able to see that for the Government to amalgamate all the railroads would afford far greater economies and far better financing than is possible under private ownership.

ONE PASSAGE IN THE MESSAGE we notice with particular pleasure. It is that in which Mr. Coolidge warns our militant admirals and generals that he will take no stock, and he does not wish the country to take any stock, in the usual military alarums as to what other countries are doing in the way of armaments. "We shall do well," he says, "to be little impressed by such reports of such actions." Declaring that "this country has definitely relinquished the old standard of dealing with other countries by terror and force and is definitely committed to the new standard of dealing with them through friendship and understanding," he raps the generals and admirals over the fingers by saying: "This new policy should be constantly kept in mind by the guiding forces of army and navy." These are pleasant words. But they will be regarded as treason by our 100 per cent patriots who insist that we never did deal with other countries by the old standards of terror and force. To us this Presidential utterance will appear meaningless until we end the cruel and bloody Caribbean policy which has given the lie to the President in Haiti, Santo Domingo, Nicaragua, and other countries that have been the victims of our wanton aggression. Nor does the menacing plan of the navy bombastically to voyage to Australia and maneuver in Hawaiian waters at the very moment when our relations with Japan are so strained, make legal tender of the President's words. What has he to say to the words of our former ambassador to Japan, Mr. Cyrus E. Woods, who has just told the Federal Council of Churches that our anti-Japanese legislation was "an international disaster of the first magnitude, a disaster to American diplomacy in the Far East, a disaster to religion"?

WE ARE ALSO IN COMPLETE SYMPATHY with the President's traveling to Chicago and back in an ordinary Pullman. Anything that will tend to democratize the office of the President and to strip it of some of the attributes of royalty which have been attached to it in the last twenty years deserves the heartiest praise. The Presidency was meant to be an office to which a Cincinnatus should go from the plow to return to the plow; there is still no finer picture in American history than Thomas Jefferson, riding unattended into Washington for his inauguration and hitching his steed to a post. Mr. Coolidge has plenty of opportunity in the Presidential office for practicing the excellent doctrine of economy which he is preaching, and for putting the service of the White House on a completely honest basis. Unless things have changed lately, various White House employees such as the first secretary to the President's wife are carried on the rolls of other departments as clerks, etc. Thus the yacht Mayflower, on which the President cruises, is, we believe, still carried as a cruiser in the navy, although its chief function is serving as a pleasant place to give tea dances. If the President should have a yacht devoted to these valuable functions it should be so designated by Congress, and the men should be specially enlisted, not taken from the strength of the navy. The more that Mr. Coolidge deflates the Presidency, and cuts down officials and waste in the White House, the greater will the office really bulk in the eyes of the world.

GERMANY IS MOVING BACK to the center. In spite of Nationalist gains preventing a clear moderate majority in the new Reichstag, the Socialists have added at least thirty seats, probably enough to keep the Nationalists out of the Ministry; the heavy loss of votes at the extreme Right and the extreme Left will practically eliminate anti-Dawes Plan, anti-Republican influences. The most striking returns come from Bavaria, where the Right suffered a loss of nearly 75 per cent of its strength and the Socialists gained 50 per cent. The election results may cause parliamentary difficulties but they show unmistakably the trend of public feeling in Germany. Hard times drive people to political extremes. Bolshevism and Fascism thrive amid economic chaos. Peace and relative comfort bring new strength to the parties of evolution. Political prophets foretold the moderate victories from such encouraging figures as the following, of bank deposits in Berlin:

	Long-term deposits	Short-term deposits
	gold marks
January	1,300,000	12,800,000
February	2,000,000	14,900,000
March	2,850,000	24,000,000
April	3,400,000	19,000,000
May	4,700,000	25,000,000
June	5,700,000	29,000,000
July	6,500,000	27,000,000
August	7,400,000	28,000,000

HERRIOT HAS ADDED to his good name by agreeing in behalf of France to submit the vexed question of the "free zones" on the Swiss border to the World Court. This is a sensible and an honorable decision. Readers of The Nation will recall the distressing attitude of previous French governments. Old traditions and century-old treaties bound France to an annoying system of tariff regulation on the border near Geneva. The custom-houses were well back of the frontier, and the border zone received Swiss products duty free. The Treaty of Versailles, to which Switzerland was not a party, arbitrarily declared these stipulations "no longer consistent with present conditions," and besought France and Switzerland to negotiate a new agreement. This they endeavored to do, but while Switzerland was ready to assent to the deneutralization of the border provinces and to other limitations of her treaty rights France asked total abrogation of all the reservations upon her sovereignty. Finally, no common agreement being reached, Poincaré, then Prime Minister of France, took the law in his own hands and moved the custom-houses to the frontier. Against this high-handed violation of treaty rights the Swiss Federal Council protested, but in vain. Now a compromise has been reached—the terms are printed in our this week's International Relations Section—and resort is had to arbitration. It is a practical expression of international good faith which the world will welcome.

AT HOME HERRIOT has loudly and heroically stifled a Communist revolution. It reminds us of the days when Mr. Palmer suppressed a revolution or two every morning before breakfast. So far as we can judge from the newspaper dispatches this particular uprising consists chiefly in a strike by the sardine-packers of Douarnenez, a town in Brittany which in 1920 had a total population of 10,000. This metropolis had a Communist mayor, and when the prefect of his department told him to stop the strike—the strikers were paid ten cents an hour—he wound the flag of France about his waist and went out to join the strikers on the picket-line. Other reports indicate that the Communists have been holding meetings and preaching revolution—which is hardly news. The other leading evidence of the Communist revolution in France is the return of Jacques Sadoul.

CAPTAIN SADOUL, a mild young school-teacher, was sent to Russia by the French Minister of Munitions in 1917. When the revolution came he discovered that he liked the Bolsheviks, and he refused to assist the French Ambassador in his attempts to organize military intervention. Instead, he persistently wrote letters to French politicians telling them that the Soviets would last. A year or two later, after his letters had found their way into print, a French court-martial amused itself by trying him in absentia on a charge of desertion, and sentenced him to death. Sadoul remained comfortably in Russia. A week or two ago he returned to France and telephoned to the police please to come and arrest him. That they did—and the boulevard press, to cover up its embarrassment at the necessity of arresting so pleasant a young man, began to howl about the Communist danger. Herriot, whose political position has been weakening, saw his cue. Whether there was a Communist menace or not, he would suppress it and win the laurels of the press. That he has done, and bravely: he has removed the mayor of Douarnenez from his office; he has broken up meetings, denounced Sadoul, and finally has deported a few score foreign workmen. Thus not only France, but M. Herriot's job as premier, is saved.

OTHER SIGNS reveal that M. Herriot is about to tread the well-worn path followed by Briand, Millerand, Viviani, and so many other French statesmen who began their political careers as radicals and ended them as reactionary office-holders. With Ramsay MacDonald out of power in England Herriot's liberal foreign policy was left high and dry, and Austen Chamberlain seems to have had no difficulty in persuading him to make a right-about-face and to join the British Tories in a career of empire. He is reported to have renewed the Franco-British agreement of 1905 (one of the first steps in the policy which made the European war inevitable), agreeing to give England a free hand in suppressing Egypt in return for England's support in the expansion of the French empire in Morocco. The Berbers of the Riff have thrown off the Spanish yoke, but they are not to be left to independence. France, in the holy name of "law and order," will step in, and add what was Spanish Morocco to her vast African empire. England will aid and abet. Plans for peace are jettisoned; and if the League or any other agency attempts to interfere with this program of conquest these two noble Powers will support each other in their aggression. It is a sorry deal, of which both countries will be ashamed.

CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE, "sentinels of the republic," "woman patriots," and "defense societies" are mobilizing to stop the passage of the child-labor amendment. Let us make no mistake: These are the black hundreds of American reaction, men and women who have proved their scorn for the liberties guaranteed in the American Constitution but today take its name in vain. In the name of freedom and of the Constitution they would stop the federal amendment granting Congress the power to stop child labor. In their furious stand-pattism they distort facts, create false bogies, invent red perils. Nor can we solace ourselves with the belief that, because they have lost the power they once had to hound the police into arresting innocent men by the thousand, they are today harmless. They have not lost the power to frighten. Here is a simple amendment enabling Congress to adopt legislation protecting children. A few years ago State legislatures would have rushed to demonstrate their readiness to support such legislation. Today the apostles of fear have raised vague, enervating doubts—the absurd but effective bogy of federal regulation of the home, the irrelevant lie of nationalization of children, the outgrown shibboleth of State rights. And these fears disturb minds which are not touched by the sordid interest of the real inspirers of the opposition—manufacturers who would employ children—and retard the progress of a reform which would seem to be typically American.

NOW THAT EVERYBODY ELSE in the world has called the Russian Communists names, George Bernard Shaw has decided to do it too. But he has thought of new names, and we have a suspicion that they will penetrate several inches deeper into Russian sensibilities than all the opprobrium of all the Churchills and Hugheses and Poincarés in the world. Mr. Shaw discusses Mr. Zinoviev's "cinematographic schoolboy nonsense"—not in connection with the famous letter but with the constitution of the Third International, whose "bourgeois idealism" and "childish inexperience of men and affairs" shock Mr. Shaw profoundly. He says that modern socialism has left Karl Marx as far behind as science has left Moses. Mr. Shaw urges the Soviet Government to wake up "unless it wishes to become the main bulwark of capitalist imperialism in Europe and America," and he blandly charges the Third International with wrecking the British general election in the capitalist interest and thereby making "the Sudan a present to the British Empire and the River Nile a present to the Sudan plantations syndicate." There is enough stinging truth in every wrong thing Mr. Shaw says to hurt the feelings of any intelligent Communist.

WHEN WE AMERICANS want a change in the cost of living or the price of wheat we grumble and make speeches and then eventually go out and vote about it. We vote Mr. Taft out of office or Mr. Coolidge in, according to rather vague feelings of discomfort or security. We still believe in sudden shifts which will make us rich and powerful and better than our neighbors. So we jump into one briar-bush after another, but never, it seems, do we manage to scratch our eyes in again. Which explains, philosophically, why Europeans have developed the cooperative movement to heights of success and mutual benefit beyond the dreams of all but a few of the 100,000,000 people in this country. Cooperation demands vision and intelligence; it offers no opportunity for competition or dizzy individual success. Europe has come to it through generations of patience and hard work. A recent report by Huston Thompson, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, and William Notz, of the Department of Commerce, written after a summer's investigation, estimates that some 120,000,000 persons are linked to the cooperative movement in all parts of the world; in England and Germany nearly half the population is affiliated with cooperative societies. The farmers of Finland and Denmark and Holland and Ireland are solidly and prosperously organized. In Czecho-Slovakia about 8,000,000 people are cooperators. On another page of this issue Agnes D. Warbasse describes some encouraging enterprises in this country. When cooperation in Europe is considered the United States is nowhere. But we have made a beginning.

MORE PASSPORTS! That is the cheerful prospect that the Secretary of Labor holds out to a public already too much inconvenienced and restricted in its natural right to move about the world as it pleases. Not only more passports but thousands of miles of new frontiers and walls of restriction to interrupt existing free and friendly intercourse. For that would be the practical result of Mr. Davis's recommendation to extend the immigration-quota law to the nations of North and South America. Mr. Davis does not pretend that immigration from Canada and Latin America is a menace, but he imagines that the extension of the quota system would prevent what he calls the bootlegging of aliens over the Canadian and Mexican borders. In fact it would probably be as ineffective in that respect as is the Volstead law to stop bootlegging in liquor, while thousands of persons would be inconvenienced by the inevitable requirement of passports. Even worse, although less immediately apparent, would be the handicap to the natural economic and social development of the North American continent as a whole. The natural lines of commerce and travel in North America, like the rivers and mountains, run north and south. At a moment when we are beginning to accept this fact Mr. Davis suggests new political barriers. His ideal for our country seems to be a system of barricades beside which the barbed-wire entanglements of the war were nothing.

CAN THE AUTOMOBILE SUBDUE the desert? We shall soon see, for the French are making what amounts to a mass attack upon the Sahara. Four expeditions have started or are about to start which among them will attempt the loneliest and most difficult reaches of this great expanse. The first expedition, using caterpillar wheels, is working its way from Algeria toward the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, and thence through Abyssinia to French Somaliland. Another party under Marshal Franchet d'Esperey, governor of Algeria, is heading south into Dahomey, using six-wheeled cars in order to test their usefulness for such travel. A third journey will be made in ordinary touring cars, but west to east from French Guinea to French Somaliland, while the fourth expedition will attempt to map a route for an airplane line from Tunis to the heart of French equatorial Africa. On top of all this we are not surprised to find that it is proposed to start a line of sightseeing automobiles across the Sahara in January, with a semi-weekly service. The project is fathered by André Citroen, manufacturer of the "French Ford." It is proposed to make the trip of some 1,500 miles in nine days, establishing hotels where necessary along the route. Three types of conveyance will be used: caterpillar-wheeled cars, ordinary automobiles, motor boats. "Native jazz bands and other entertainments" are promised along the way.

Muscle Shoals—Ours

"IF I were greedy for power over my fellow-men I would rather control Muscle Shoals than to be continuously elected President of the United States." So Newton D. Baker, the Secretary of War under whom the power project was begun, wrote last spring to the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate. This enormous power was nearly sold for a song to Henry Ford at the last session of Congress. The House passed a bill to that end, and there was strong sentiment in the Senate for similar action. Fortunately Senator Norris induced the Committee on Agriculture to favor instead a continuance of government control, but the danger of selling a national birthright for a mess of nitrate was not averted until Ford himself withdrew his offer.

Nor was it more than temporarily averted then. There were three detailed offers before Congress last winter besides that of Ford. Ford's offer was, in fact, the poorest of the lot, although it carried the most prestige because of the myth which had set up the auto-maker not only as an industrial superman but as a philanthropist to whom almost any power might safely be intrusted. The three other offers have not been withdrawn, and an effort is being made to induce the present session of Congress to turn over to private control the great power development in northern Alabama. But it is predicted in Washington that the offers will not again be pressed in competition with one another but will be superseded by an amalgamated plan having certain definite farmer support and strong business backing.

We are not especially interested in the details of this possible new plan or in the features of any of the old ones. We think it beside the point to contrast them, for one can be better than another only in that it offers a little more money—soon spent and forgotten—or a little more possibility of regulating a power so vast and vital that its complete control ought always and indisputably to be vested in the public. Let it not be forgotten that such control is vested in the public now. The problem is not like that of the railroads. There is no proposal that the nation buy at a huge outlay and plunge into the operation of a great privately owned industry. The nation owns Muscle Shoals. The question that it faces is the maintenance of that ownership and the gradual conversion and transmission of power, with plenty of time to work out a policy and a personnel as the size and importance of the project increases. It can sell out at any future date if it wants to, but it is safe to say that if it waits twenty years it would no sooner think of selling something of such paramount national interest than it would think today of selling the Panama Canal. On the other hand, if it sells Muscle Shoals now, Congress will within twenty years have to meet an insistent demand to buy it back at enormous expense and difficulty. Let us remember that we are now trying to recover two great oil basins that were too lightly disposed of.

The comparison with the Panama Canal is a good one. The public is still too little informed as to what Muscle Shoals actually is and can be. The power development there was begun in war time to furnish nitrates for making munitions. After the armistice the notion was spread that Muscle Shoals had lost its value and should be sold like our wooden ships for whatever it would bring. Ford's offer cleared away a little of that mist, for the public knows that Henry Ford is not collecting a menagerie of white elephants. But Ford put his emphasis entirely on producing cheap fertilizer for the farmer and so obscured the immensely more important facts about Muscle Shoals as a source of electric power for half of the United States.

Muscle Shoals is probably our greatest single water power. There is a drop in the Tennessee River at that point of 130 feet in thirty miles. The dam is 5,000 feet in length, or nearly a mile, impounding an estimated horse power of 850,000. Less than an eighth of this is needed to manufacture the amount of fertilizer promised by Ford.

The power has a transmission radius of 500 miles and an incalculable bearing not only upon the future evolution of all of the Southeastern section of the United States but upon virtually all of the country east of the Mississippi River except New England. The power at Muscle Shoals is far too great for any one State to use or control. It is the king-pin in the forthcoming development of electrified industry. It is fully comparable to the Panama Canal in its national significance and its possibilities of commercial revolution. To quote Newton D. Baker again:

> To grant Muscle Shoals to any individual or company for a hundred years, or even fifty years, grants to such company or individual industrial dominance for that period of the whole Southeastern portion of our country. . . . All the figures one sees about the gifts in present values in money to Mr. Ford or other proposed lessees are trifling as compared with the growing value of the industrial power that any such lease necessarily entails. . . . I am therefore clearly of the belief that Congress should retain Muscle Shoals, provide for its operation directly by the corps of engineers of the army or by a public corporation analogous to the Panama Railroad Company, and through such operation deal with the power produced in the mass, without entering into retail operation. By so doing the public interest, which we now see to be large, will be continuously served, and as the importance of this power source grows the hand of the Government will be free to make it continuously serviceable in the highest degree as the changing public interest demands.

The chief of engineers of the army has just reported that current expenditures at Muscle Shoals are at the rate of about $800,000 a month and that the electric-power and nitrate plants will be completed by next October but could be hurried through so as to be ready by July 1. More than $150,000,000 will probably have been expended upon Muscle Shoals by the time the work is done. There will be a tremendous drive upon the present Congress to turn this enormous undertaking, with its still greater potentialities, over to some private financial group to exploit for its own profit. Only a determined show of popular opposition can prevent this tragedy and this betrayal. The Nation has pointed out several times within recent months the striking economies and benefits that have been obtained in the province of Ontario through the public development and sale of power from Niagara Falls. Mr. Underwood's bill—supported by President Coolidge—to deliver Muscle Shoals into private hands under a fifty-year lease would tie it up for too long a period. Senator Norris has a better plan for continued government ownership, with the option of operation by the government or by private agency under government control.

Britain and Our Reparations

WHAT is behind the mist of talk about inter-Allied debts and debt settlements, sequestrated private property, reparation claims, which has been blowing through the press? This: The United States has claims against Germany arising out of injuries sustained by American citizens during the war; these claims, now being settled by the Mixed Claims Commission in Washington, will, it is estimated, amount to about $250,000,000. The Treaty of Versailles required Germany to make compensation for such war losses sustained by citizens of the Allied and Associated Powers, and the United States duly claimed them from Germany in the separate Treaty of Berlin. The Dawes Report, for the execution of which the Allies rely strongly on the United States, provided that the reparation claims of "the Allied and Associated Powers" shall be paid out of the so-called Dawes bonds and annuities. The United States asked its share of these reparation bonds at the conference, called in Paris in November, to distribute the bonds among the Allied and Associated Powers. Allied diplomacy, however, seemed to assume that the United States was merely a tool for the accomplishment of Allied policies and that our rights were concessions grantable by the Allies, for which we must pay.

When the United States in Paris asserted its claim to participate in the Dawes bonds, as the Dawes Report provided and required, to the extent of the $250,000,000 necessary to satisfy our pecuniary claims for war losses, we were told by France that our claim could not be granted because we had not signed the Treaty of Versailles and because France had been required to reduce her claims on Germany. She set a price on her consent which we evidently have had to pay, namely, a material concession on the French debt and support of French loans in the American money market.

The British delegate at the conference professed a lack of instructions, a clear indication that Great Britain opposed and would resist our just claim. The British moved for an adjournment of the conference until January, by which time the British Government doubtless will disclose the price it will require for its consent to our claims. This price has already been indicated by Mr. Winston Churchill: Britain will contend we should wait for our claims until the Allies have been paid off or else confiscate the sequestrated private property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian in Washington, as England has disgracefully done; and finally, that Britain wants the same concession on her debt to the United States as France obtains.

Britain is playing for big stakes. Knowing the disposition of Congress to return the sequestrated private property, the retention of which constitutes an ineffaceable blot on our national history, she hopes to induce the Department of State to prevent Congress from returning it and perhaps eventually to confiscate it, thus putting us in the same evil boat with Great Britain. Moreover, should we return the property, the British Government realizes that the prestige for financial integrity thus gained by us will reflect on Great Britain and will stimulate the forces in England that are disgusted with the British policy of confiscating private property and are demanding that the expropriated owners, to save England's reputation, be compensated. If she cannot succeed in bringing about the confiscation of the property, for which England has labored unremittingly, she hopes to get the alternative advantage of a further remission in her debt to the United States.

All the world but Great Britain has admitted our rights, though France demanded a price for the "concession." We should not permit Great Britain further to debauch our foreign policy. Even according to the Knox-Porter Resolution, although it violated a basic American tradition by authorizing the retention of the private property until Germany had made "suitable provision for the satisfaction of" the claims of American citizens, the sequestrated private property, including compensation for the requisitioned ships, should now be returned to its owners. Judge Meares, formerly counsel in the office of the Alien Property Custodian, in a booklet just published under the title "The Confiscation Fact," has pointed out how the congressional policy of "conservation" of the property has been distorted and abused by Messrs. Palmer and Garvan into a policy of "confiscation." The Chemical Foundation transaction smells to Heaven, and should result in an indictment of the participating officials. Germany has now made "suitable provision for the satisfaction of" the claims of American citizens, by handing over to the Allied and Associated Powers for distribution among themselves 10 billion marks of railroad and 5 billion marks of industrial bonds. If the United States, through British recalcitrance or its own ineptitude, is unable to obtain its share of the bonds, the responsibility is not Germany's nor that of German citizens who own private property in the United States. This seems elementary. Congress has always had power to return the property, without waiting on the indulgence of the Secretary of State; and even he must now recognize that the condition precedent of the Knox-Porter Resolution, on which, contrary to all American traditions, he seems to have insisted, has now been performed.

International Literature

THE man who likes to imagine a world in which ideas are as easily and conveniently exchanged as coffee or tea or gold, a world over which literary currents flow uninterrupted by ignorance or accident or ill-will, will be particularly pained when he looks about him today. He will find remarkably few facilities for the free movement of books between nations in the West—the East he has doubtless given up long ago as hopeless—and such instances of international vogue among authors as he observes he will perhaps set down to the operation of chance. The news that Upton Sinclair is being hailed by critics in Soviet Russia as the writer of the future, the person whose method and subject-matter best reveal the tendencies which literature in the next century or so must logically follow, may be welcome to him; but he will at once begin to wonder how many other authors might have become influential abroad through the efforts of what he might call a Western clearing-house of literature. It was only by a similar accident a few years ago—perhaps it is true yet—that Ralph Waldo Trine took Europe by storm. And evidently it is an accident again that the publication this year in New York of Wladislaw Reymont's masterpiece coincides with the announcement that this Polish genius has been awarded the Nobel Prize in literature. The clearing-house is far away.

If pessimism on this point cannot be cured by arguments showing the practical difficulties in the way—the expense, for instance, the waste of effort over books which literary officials might be wrong in deciding to promote abroad, and the increase in what is already too much printed matter—it may be soothed at least by a glance at the past. There is reason for believing that conditions are no worse and no better than they ever have been. The literary boundaries between nations have periodically been broken, and quite conceivably this has happened as often as there was any occasion for it. A great many elements in what is often supposed today to have been a purely national literature, the Greek, can be accounted for only by the fact of ideas infiltrated from the East. A Roman citizen in the time of Augustus read more Greek books, perhaps, than Roman; Greek meters were borrowed by Horace for his poems, and Virgil was indebted both to Homer and to the Hebrews. In the Middle Ages the use of Latin as a literary language brought it about that universities addressed more completely international audiences than have ever since assembled, and upon all subjects of large scope there was virtually no such thing as national expression. Exactly what was the nationality of Augustine, of Boethius, of Thomas Aquinas, of Abelard? The average layman would have to seize an encyclopedia to find out. Even fiction was international. Beowulf was not an English hero. Was Siegfried Scandinavian or German, and if Scandinavian what one of three countries did he start from? Parsifal was sometimes Percival, and Tristram belonged to all of Europe.

With the invention of printing and the development of the vernaculars there came a certain change, and yet the amount of that change should not be overestimated. From the beginning until now there have been periods of great intimacy between nations, and it is unlikely that accident or caprice was responsible; minds inevitably ran together. Elizabethan England became intoxicated with Renaissance Italy, and Shakespeare had access to Bandello as Chaucer had had to Boccaccio. A century later it was France which was educating England; a student of the Restoration must know Molière almost as well as he knows Dryden. And in the eighteenth century France returned the compliment. Voltaire had much to do with this—his "Philosophical Letters" came out in London a year before they did in Paris; and later on Frenchmen were accepting as classics the works of Locke, Pope, Thomson, Richardson, and Sterne. Still another century, and England was opening herself to Germany; Goethe and Carlyle corresponded, and Coleridge disseminated with all his might metaphysical doctrines which reached him from across the Rhine. Bernard Shaw is almost more potent today in Germany than he is at home, and Anatole France is the possession of everybody. British and American fiction can often be traced to a source in France or Russia, and Mr. Mencken in America can really be understood only by reference to Shaw, Butler, Nietzsche, and Schopenhauer.

No one could refrain from wishing that publishers and critics were more internationally educated than they are, and that good translators—for they are rare—abounded. On the other hand, it is hard to believe that an author in any country who deserves to be heard in another will not somehow get heard. In the long run there has been no difficulty in the case of Shakespeare or Molière or Voltaire or Goethe or Anatole France. The trouble may be that there are few such men.

Albert De Silver

TO write of one who was as close to the staff of The Nation as Albert De Silver is hard. He was one of its directors; he wrote many unsigned editorials; hardly a legal topic passed under review without the benefit of his balanced and suggestive mind; but more than all these, he was one of our closest friends.

Albert De Silver was in a sense a product of the war. He was born to comfort and position; he was a clubman at Yale; when the war darkened the horizon he was well along on the road to a conventional lawyer's career. From the beginning the violent partisanships of the war disturbed that cool passion for fairness which was perhaps his most individual characteristic. He always believed that there was another side, and he wanted to hear it. When the hot temper of 1917 began to stifle civil liberty in America he stepped out of his path to defend it. Friends marveled at the bold progress of what was by training a conservative mind. It was with amazement that, one day when war intolerance was at its fever heat, they saw his name appended to an advertisement asking funds for the defense of the imprisoned members of the I. W. W.

"So you've turned I. W. W.," more than one said.

"Not on your life," he would reply; "but I want to see those boys get a chance, and they aren't getting it."

When Roger Baldwin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union, went to jail in 1918 Albert De Silver gave up his law practice and stepped into Baldwin's place. "Someone had to do it," he explained. When Baldwin came out of prison there was work for two and double work for a lawyer. De Silver continued.

"You get me wrong," he used to say to friends with whom he was associated in this work. "I'm not a radical. I don't know whether there is anything in your ideas or not. Only, I think you ought to have a chance to express them. We can't get on without that."

Conservatives too appreciated his clear mind and good humor. Few men who played so prominent a part in the free-speech fight retained—and made—such warm friendships among those whom they had to combat. Recognition of his balance and integrity made him chairman of the legislative committee of the City Club of New York.

In a nation of partisans and in an age of intolerance a personality like Albert De Silver's is rare and can ill be spared. His passion for justice was almost abstract; it held for enemies as well as friends. His restless curiosity was not to be stilled by the easy acceptances of any party or cause. He was beyond the reach of the various forms of hysteria that have muddled the minds of so many Americans, and he deliberately turned out of all the ruts.

When the persecutions died down he gave up his desk in the civil-liberties office. But by that time the ordinary practice of commercial law had come to seem an uninteresting thing, hardly worth the devotion of a venturesome intelligence. "I don't see why I should give my life to a thing I am not interested in," he said. "Fortunately, I don't have to. I'll find something which means more." He set out deliberately to reeducate himself, turning in his search for a firm foundation for his thought to chemistry. His critical mind never disturbed his sunny temper. He was still cheerfully searching when the train lurched on December 7 and he plunged to instant death.

Soviet Georgia's Little Revolution

By LOUIS FISCHER

Tiflis, Soviet Republic of Georgia, November 1

LITTLE Georgia, mountainous, wine-drinking, the cradle of the Caucasian race if we are to believe the omniscient ethnographers, today furnishes an indispensable object lesson in the science of revolution. The recent uprising in Georgia, which the League of Nations dignified with its attention, was the inevitable result of an attempt to develop a Communist or Soviet system on a country which had not, like Russia proper, gone through the preliminary purgatory of a revolution. For Georgia, it may be recalled, passed directly from capitalism under the Mensheviks to the New Economic Policy under the Bolsheviks without the intervening period of military communism which in Russia made possible stable politics under NEP economics.

From the Pravda (Moscow)

Mr. Hughes and His Russian Policy

To the student of revolution and of social movements Georgia is a revelation. Its history since 1917 and its present give him a partial or perhaps complete answer to the much-mooted question: Can England, can Germany evolve peacefully toward socialism? Can a labor government legislate the cooperative commonwealth into being? Or must the life of the land first be turned inside out and upside down by a revolution?

Soon after the power of the Czar collapsed, the Mensheviks set up a government in Georgia. In its early age the troops of the Imperial German Kaiser were its foster father; in its old age it was watched over by well-meaning British Tommies acting on behalf of Mr. Churchill and Lord Curzon, who have always evinced a peculiar interest in Baku and its oil-fields and in the great Baku-Batum pipe line, which cuts through the heart of the Georgian republic.

Meanwhile the Mensheviks were sending punitive expeditions to crush their restive national minorities, the Ossetinians, Adjarians, and Abkhazians. Unable to restrain the peculiar nationalistic ardor which distinguishes them, they engaged in petty wars with their neighbors, Armenia and Azerbaijan. By that time Moscow had rid itself of civil war. Wrangel was in Constantinople and the Poles were back within their swollen frontiers. It was then that Sirgo Ordjenekidze and his troops went to support the Georgian Communists and sweep the Mensheviks out of Tiflis, Batum, and Poti, out of Kakhatia, Mingrelia, and Svanetia. He led the Red army over impossible mountain passes, meeting with no resistance until within sight of Tiflis, where ex-Czarist officers made a futile stand. In February, 1921, Georgia had turned Bolshevik. The Menshevik leaders simply fled to Paris and Berlin, taking art and museum treasures with them.

For a week the mass of the people in the cities, which for Georgia with a proletariat of scant 90,000 means the bourgeoisie, hid at home awaiting the developments which had ruined the Russian bourgeoisie. But none came. Slowly they reappeared on the streets. They wore the clothes of yore and the diamonds. They flashed their evening dresses at the theater and opera. The Bolsheviks instituted no Red Terror in Georgia and no sudden expropriation of the propertied classes.

Revolutionary measures which were the first acts of the Bolsheviks in the Smolny and Kremlin are only now being ventured in Georgia. The Singer Sewing Machine Company was nationalized by the Russian Government early in 1918, by the Georgian Government late in 1923. The Tchiaturi manganese deposits, deposits on which the American steel industry is largely dependent and for which, therefore, W. A. Harriman is now bidding, are still worked by their prewar owners, the only instance of such leniency in all the Soviet Union, with the possible exception of some minor enterprises not known to the writer. Even the land reform in Georgia waited until 1923.

During the period of military communism in Russia the bourgeoisie was crushed. The war-weary soldiers had no sooner bolted from the Eastern front than they dispossessed the rich landowners, sometimes destroying their fine homes, often driving them from the neighborhood. The land barons and the nobility lost their wealth, their social position, not too seldom their lives. Many fought and died in the prolonged civil war through which Russia passed. Many, forced to go into exile, are now waiters and chauffeurs and unofficial advisers of foreign offices in the capitals of Europe. In fine, the effect of the upheaval in Russia was the extinction as a class of the landed bourgeoisie, and certainly, since private trade was outlawed for three years, of the city bourgeoisie. When the NEP came, the NEP which at least for some years after its promulgation in 1921 was a license to live to the bourgeoisie, the Bolsheviks had to deal with a new bourgeoisie without traditions and without roots. Experience shows that the task of combating such a deracinated bourgeoisie is, relatively at least, not difficult, though it is not always altogether pleasant or advisable.

The picture in Georgia is different. The land-owning classes did not emigrate. The rural princes—and owing to peculiar circumstances they constitute 6 per cent of Georgia's population of 2,400,000—were never violently expropriated and never forced to move from their premises. It is true that when the Bolsheviks finally redistributed the country's meager land resources the holdings of the princes and nobles suffered serious diminution; nevertheless, they managed in many cases to maintain an economic superiority owing to retention of their live and dead agricultural stock and of their personal property.

The landed families which were not banished from their homes in Russia have forever renounced any pretensions to their former greatness. They have been forced out of their class and into the peasant class. But in Georgia they remained a compact and rather large nucleus of disaffection. It matters little that some of the princes have become paupers. Without years of civil war and of active communism to shake the foundations of their existence and to impress them with their own futility, they remain imbued with a sense of class solidarity, cherishing the hope of rehabilitation.

So also the urban bourgeoisie. Tiflis store windows were never boarded up as were those of Petrograd and Moscow. The luxury shops, the pastry parlors, the dispensers of fancy French perfumes, all private of course, operate in 1924 as they did in 1914. The bourgeoisie remains intact. More than that, it has gained in confidence and arrogance. The Communists have not dared lay hands on them.

Only in one respect did the Georgian Bolsheviks follow the radical road. They went the limit in the anti-religious campaign, closing every church in whole provinces and continuing atheistic street demonstrations long after Moscow had grown wiser. They justified the policy by submitting, what is true, that the average Georgian is less devout than the average Russian, yet they overstepped the mark, and today Ordjenekidze, the "big chief" in the Tiflis Government, is sounding the retreat. "To say that the peasantry does not want its churches," he tells a party conference, "is self-deception."

Georgia joins Armenia and Azerbaijan to form the Trans-Caucasian Federation, which federation plus Great Russia plus White Russia plus the Ukraine constitutes the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). Officially, and in many respects actually, an autonomous republic, Georgia, sometimes with grace and sometimes without, usually takes the cue from Moscow. One marvels at the authority of the Kremlin. Its finger is as clear in Baku and Batum as in the very streets of Moscow. Now, when the intensive anti-NEP, anti-bourgeois crusade commenced a year or more ago, Tiflis followed suit, albeit with much caution. But whereas in Moscow the Nepmen merely complain meekly of their sad lot, Georgian merchants became the active supporters or passive sympathizers of the revolt.

Thus the tradespeople joined the princes and priests to form the backbone of the insurrection. Few workers joined the ranks. In fact the proletariat of Batum and Poti and Scharipan suppressed the trouble without the aid of the military. It was a tiny affair, the insurrection. At its climax it had mobilized no more than 4,000 persons. Some of these were peasants who jumped on to the bandwagon when the Mensheviks held Tchiaturi (population 13,000) for ten hours, and Novo Senaki (population 5,000) for two days. The Georgian peasants have as many good reasons to grumble as have the Russian. Nevertheless, most of the peasants turned a deaf ear to the Mensheviks; some, as in the province of Kakhetia, reacted toward the insurrection by driving the princes out of their villages. Still others, however, plain peasants whose condition was steadily yet only slowly improving were the victims of princely agitation and provocation. How natural this in a land where the nobles have not lost their prestige, which only recently shed its feudalism, and where, until several decades ago, the peasantry submitted to the exercise by the princes of the jus primae noctis. The relation between the peasants and the princes in certain sections of the country is closer than that which the Communists have succeeded in setting up. Therefore the non-bourgeois peasants struck with the bourgeoisie.

The insurrection was inspired and organized by the Mensheviks who live in Paris. Georgian Menshevism, it should be understood, is not the Menshevism of Martov, whom Lenin loved, nor even of Abramovitch. It has no kinship with socialism. It is tantamount to anti-Bolshevism. The Mensheviks who precipitated this revolt received foreign financial aid. A member of their own Central Committee, arrested by the Cheka, confessed the fact in testimony which lies before me. They were promised that if they succeeded in holding power for three or four days British and French vessels would land troops in Black Sea ports and march to their support. I spoke to young men in western Georgia, men who had carried arms with the Mensheviks, who wondered why America had not sent tanks. These innocents had been drugged into believing that the Powers would aid their efforts. And not without reason did they believe so. Had not Doumergue received with pomp and music the "Georgian ambassador to France," Tchenkelli, the Parisian copy of Bakhmetiev? Had not Herriot received Tseretelli, a member of the Menshevik cabinet? Had not MacDonald seen Tseretelli shortly before the rising? And did not MacDonald and Herriot support the Georgian Mensheviks at the recent meeting of the League of Nations? I think it can be stated categorically that the insurrection would not have occurred but for the encouragement which the Mensheviks got from abroad.

The Mensheviks exploited the exaggerated nationalism of the Georgians. The Georgians are an excessively proud race, and Czarist attempts at Russification only fostered the spirit. Menshevism urges the slogan of national independence. But history has proved that an "independent" Menshevik Georgia was first a colony of Imperial Germany and then of the British Empire. Georgia is too weak and too attractive to stand alone. It commands the road to the oil of Baku, Persia, and Afghanistan. It has the coveted manganese. With Georgia in British hands Russia's passive threat to India and Russia's possession of the Caucasus would cease. Georgia's choice lay and lies between British imperialism via Menshevism and Soviet Russia. It is interesting that the League of Nations lent its influence to the former.

Was it an insurrection for national liberation from foreign domination, the domination of Russia, or was it part of a scheme to destroy the Soviet regime in all of Russia? Between 1918 and 1921 the Menshevik Government in Tiflis fought the Armenians and the Turks in Azerbaijan; they burned the villages of the Ossetinians and cruelly oppressed the Abkhazians. Now they parade in the name of the rights of national minorities. Be that as it may, what was the prime object of the Georgian Mensheviks? Before me is a letter written by Noi Jordani, president of Menshevik Georgia, and intercepted by the Cheka. He outlines his plan to his comrades. First Daghestan is to revolt. Then Azerbaijan and the Mountain Republic centering around Vladikavkaz. Finally Georgia. With the Caucasus thus detached from Russia they could prepare the downfall of Bolshevism. This is the "oil state" of which French papers wrote and which, it was suggested, would be under the aegis of the League.

There was a military program. On such and such a day Baku was to be taken. On that day the Social Democrat and emigrant press of Europe reported that Baku had been taken. Daghestan was to hoist the White Guard flag on Wednesday. On Thursday the anti-Bolshevik papers knew from "special dispatches" that the Soviet republic of Daghestan had been smashed. Though the entire affair was liquidated in three days, Berlin and Paris dailies continued for more than a month to describe disturbances in places which I know were perfectly peaceful because I was visiting in them at the time when these supposed disturbances were being reported. Jordani, for instance, sitting in Paris, sent the London Daily Herald a wire to the effect that "Bolshevik troops have disembarked in Batum and are making terrible reprisals on the population, massacring old men, women, and children." Now I have been to Batum. I have had conversations with an American, the local representative of the Near East Relief; with private storekeepers who mouthed fire and brimstone at the Bolsheviks, with port workers, with non-political hotel servants, and with Mensheviks. Batum is a small town. Had they seen Red troops who had disembarked or arrived in any other way? No. Had anybody been massacred? No. The revolt had not even touched Batum.

Georgia is a pre-capitalistic country. The people weave their own cloth and make their own carpet dyes from nuts and fruits. You see women making thread from raw cotton and wool. There is little factory industry and therefore no very strong bourgeoisie. Nevertheless, that bourgeoisie has been able to offer passive resistance to the Soviet regime since its inception in 1921 and to participate in three troublesome, albeit puny, insurrections. The last uprising, quickly terminated though it was, forced the Government to recognize that it could not flout the will of the bourgeoisie nor deny the influence of the princes on the mood of the peasants. Measures tending toward the destruction of private capital were publicly renounced. Thus the state monopolies for cotton, silk, and wool were revoked, giving Nepmen a free hand in competing with the Government. Private shops boycotted for a year by the banks will now receive credits. The anti-NEP campaign will probably cease, certainly it will take on milder forms, while concessions will be made to the rich peasantry. Attacks on religion have been ordered stopped.

This latest Georgian experience emphasizes the heavy cost of revolution and the tremendous responsibility of revolutionaries. For the Q. E. D. of three years of Bolshevism in Georgia is that the ends of socialism cannot be approached, much less attained, as long as a counter-socialistic class has the weight and the will to bar the way. The Red cynic will even say that if civil war and foreign wars do not follow social upheavals, as they did the French and the Russian, they must be artificially induced in order to excuse acts through which the destruction of this class, the bourgeoisie, could be consummated.

I have put the question to many Communists only to receive an almost unvarying reply: No bourgeoisie will voluntarily relinquish its wealth and power. Nationalize its mines, railroads, land, real estate, factories, attempt a serious capital levy, and even the bourgeoisie which is the greatest champion of democracy will fight, though its enemy be a regularly elected parliamentary majority. No class submits to the guillotine without a struggle, not even so small and weak and unorganized a class as the Georgian bourgeoisie.

Making Cooperation Succeed in America

By AGNES D. WARBASSE

MOST of us in the United States are not a bit stirred by cooperation. The ephemeral torchlight processions of political radicals arouse much more enthusiasm than the unspectacular but solid gains of cooperation. If, as Huston Thompson, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, says, "cooperation with all its problems is one of the most portentous, successful, and apparently enduring movements in this great period of world events," why aren't we thrilled at this growing movement in our midst?

In Europe they are taking cooperation seriously. Here perhaps, in our reckless, profligate way, we think "the effort is too great and the savings are too meager." Or perhaps we have not yet suffered enough to value it. Most of us still have the pioneer psychology. Even if we are in present straits we hopefully believe that by moving on we can find a better opportunity for ourselves. We are not yet ready "to dig in," right here on the job. There is no adventure in that. If we do not move on in search of improved conditions we prefer the excitement of standing on the sidelines and whooping up the other fellow—the politician or the boss—to better things for us: and then we blame him if things do not get better.

But there are some Americans who are pioneering in cooperation. Here, a few sketches of what they are doing:

"The visitor to New York goes to see the statue of Liberty; the visitor to Minneapolis goes to see the Franklin Cooperative Creamery." One of the daily papers of Minneapolis ran this as a headline last fall. They are proud of their lusty cooperative child out there. The Franklin Cooperative Creamery really is a prodigy. Though it is only four years old, it has more than two-thirds of the milk business of the city. One hundred and fifty-eight white wagons with white horses and glass-lined white automobile tank cars distribute $3,500,000 worth of dairy products to the members annually. The Franklin pays the organized farmer about fifteen cents more for a hundred pounds of milk than is paid farmers elsewhere. It sells milk at twelve cents a quart; two, three, even six cents lower than in other large cities. And besides all these money values that the people receive, there is the social value of this creamery to the community. The Commissioner of Health in a public statement largely attributes the reduction in the death-rate of babies and the decrease of typhoid in Minneapolis to its pure milk. Since 1920 the creamery has increased its percentage of butter fats even above the standard required by law and decreased the bacteria count to a lower point than ever before. The surplus savings of the Franklin are used for enlarging their plant, for music and recreation, and for education of the members. Nearly $4,000 has been set aside this year to spread the knowledge of cooperation in the Northwest.

Who makes the most fuss about the exorbitant profits of the chain stores? The workers and the radicals. And who patronizes them most? Not the profiteers but these same workers and radicals, to the tune of $1,000,000 a day. If, instead of trading at the chain stores, the workers would plug ahead and buy all their food at their cooperative stores they too might begin to challenge the coal barons, as have, for instance, the cooperators in the mill town of Maynard, Massachusetts.

In the beginning of 1923 this cooperative society found itself with a surplus of $23,000 because for two years it had distributed no savings-returns to members. The directors decided to go into the coal business. Big gains were being made from their restaurant, grocery store, meat, furniture, milk, and bakery departments. Why not tackle one more of the necessities of life? Early in the autumn an agreement was made with one of the coal-mining companies of Pennsylvania. Land was purchased near the railroad tracks for $2,100; permission was wrung from the railroad company to build a spur; an overhead trestle and concrete bins were built. The entire plant cost $15,000. They started to deliver coal late in October; 2,200 tons of coal had been delivered by the end of March, 1924, with a distinct saving on each ton handled. The business is still growing.

Somebody brought the story over from Europe in 1921 of how they were building cooperative homes for the homeless; how homes were being built to live in instead of to sell; how speculation in real estate and housing was passing out. Instead of cursing the landlords as villains and exploiters the people were quietly putting them out of business by becoming their own landlords.

As usual, however, before real cooperative housing—the non-profit-making kind—could get established in the United States, our enterprising realtors captured the idea, put up apartments to sell, and called them "100 per cent cooperative." Up and down the avenues of any of our large cities you can see luxurious "cooperative" apartments flaunting prosperity. Their values run to the millions. The tenants invest from ten to twenty thousand dollars in cash for each apartment. The monthly charges run up from $500 to $600. Everybody makes something all along the line in the typical American fashion; first the real-estate speculators, then the contractors, then the agents. After the tenants have paid the price that these promoters demand, they in turn catch the germ of profit-making. Sometimes they sublet at extortionate profit. Sometimes groups of tenants, owning all the building, occupy only a portion of it: they let the rest at such a high rent that they themselves can live rent-free on the proceeds. Sometimes they sell out at their own price.

You ask, "Well, isn't this good for the wise ones who have cooperated in buying the apartment together, instead of continually renting from landlords?" Of course it is; but it is not cooperative housing. It does not eliminate speculation in land and homes.

Contrast this with genuine cooperative housing. If you are a cooperator you cannot hold title outright to the property you occupy. You own shares in the society; it owns the property. You can't hold more than the house or apartment you intend to occupy; you can't sell or sublet at a profit. But you can, even in America, by investing from $500 to $2,500, get a permanent, desirable cooperative home. The upkeep charges vary from $35 to $135 a month for three to six rooms. This is a saving of almost one-half the rental of similar apartments rented from landlords. These monthly charges decrease as the mortgages are cleared off. The "Garden Homes" of Milwaukee are a proof that this plan works. Over a hundred are already built; five hundred are planned on a plot of twenty-eight acres, a real cooperative community. And there are many true cooperative apartments in New York, Brooklyn, and a few other cities.

The present banking system does not provide loans for the man with ideas or for the worker who has labor power and little else to offer for security. But the people's banks, or credit unions as they are called in the United States, do. That is the reason they have increased so rapidly in the last few years. The need is here. The people are learning how to supply it. There are 95 credit unions in Massachusetts, 104 in New York, 35 in North Carolina, and a few others scattered through other States—nearly 300 in all. These little banks accept deposits and make loans only to their members—telephone girls, mill operators, civil-service clerks, poor-white farmers, even intellectuals. Their shareholdings now amount to $15,000,000. These savings they loan back to members whose needs and character they know. Over $12,000,000 has thus been used. Practically no losses—in some districts a small fraction of 1 per cent only, in some absolutely none—have been sustained.

"Oh, yes, these are the cooperative banks of the big unions," you say. No, the labor banks are different. There are thirty-five labor banks in the United States with assets of $125,000,000. They too are growing, but they are not yet cooperative. Their shares are largely held by labor, it is true, but their methods and investments are subject to the ordinary banking laws. There is as yet no national law for cooperative banking. When such a law is passed, these banks may reincorporate and become cooperative. At present they are following the usual course of private banking—making money for their shareholders. There is one significant difference; these labor banks have voluntarily limited the amount of dividend payable on stock to 10 per cent. Although some have been able to pay more, they have kept their dividends down as low as 8 per cent. The remaining surplus has been used to increase the interest paid to depositors and to decrease the interest charged to borrowers.

In Europe, cooperation is standardized. Experimentation is passed; but until recently we in the United States preferred to blunder along independently rather than to unite with the national federation of consumers' societies, The Cooperative League, and learn the right way to go about things. An encouraging change is taking place. Three hundred and thirty-three of the strongest consumers' societies in the United States, doing a combined business of about $15,000,000 a year, have joined the league. As a result of its education, its clearing-house for information, and its standardization, these societies are making better headway than ever before.

At the recent cooperative congress, held in New York, November 6, 7, and 8, eight groups of cooperative organizations formed a federation for joint buying. They decided no longer to "go it alone" but to buy important staples—flour, sugar, etc.—in carload lots. This is a promising step toward the formation of the much-needed cooperative wholesale.

Who would have believed, a few years ago, that three non-profit-seeking cooperatives of several thousand members each could succeed in the heart of competitive business, New York City? Is it not interesting to know that there are two cooperative restaurants flourishing in the Wall Street section and two in the uptown business district? They serve 65,000 meals a month. "Our Cafeteria," now known as Cooperative Services, Inc., started less than four years ago. It has had a calm, steady growth, nothing very spectacular. Yet the 1,900 members, who have received $14,000 in savings-returns in addition to 6 per cent interest on their capital stock, will tell you that there is a demand for cooperative service even in gay New York. A recent addition to their activities has been the Cooperative Laundry, which is washing 1,500 bundles of its members' clothing monthly at a distinct saving.

The second "co-op" that knows how to succeed in New York City is the Finnish Cooperative Trading Association, with 1,500 members. It has a meat market, butcher shop, bakery, restaurant, and recreation room. Its success is, of course, more easily explained. It is in Brooklyn, in the center of a Finnish colony, with like habits, like needs, and like traditions. This is fertile soil.

Union labor is the unbroken rule in the forty-five cooperative bakeries ranging from the Massachusetts seaboard to the coast of California. Some of these were organized by union bakers who despaired of ever getting better wages and conditions through legislation. Strikes, too, had been of little effect. So the workers started to finance and run their own bakeries. They sold shares also to the consumers. As a result the working class as a whole has benefited. The presence of the "co-op" in many a town has driven down the prices of competing private bakers, day by day. And in time of strike, for instance, the great textile strike of 1922, 170,000 loaves of bread were sent from the cooperative bakeries in Massachusetts to the strikers' food kitchen.

Throughout the land there is a growing understanding of cooperation. Two training-schools for cooperative employees and executives are running annual courses of six weeks each. The colleges and special schools are giving increasing time to courses in cooperation. Spurious, fraudulent, and fanciful schemes have been put out of business by publicity, by court proceedings, or forced to the wall bankrupt. Henceforth they will have little chance of securing a foothold in the United States. Americans are beginning to know real cooperation from "fake."

Cooperators in this country are at last building solidly and laying deep foundations. Most countries have built a cooperative movement first and later sought to add a cooperative culture. In the United States we are building a culture upon which to found the growing movement. We shall succeed. But we must work everlastingly to make ourselves bigger than our problems.

The Primitive Black Man

By W. E. BURGHARDT Du BOIS

I BEGAN to notice it as I entered southern France. I formulated it in Portugal. I knew it as a great truth one Sunday in Liberia. And the Great Truth was this: efficiency and happiness do not go together in modern culture. Going south from London, as the world darkens it gets happier. Portugal is deliciously dark. Many leading citizens would have difficulty keeping off a Georgia "Jim Crow" car. But, oh, how lovely a land and how happy a people! And so leisurely. Little use of trying to shop seriously in Lisbon before 11. It isn't done. Nor at noon; the world is lunching or lolling in the sun. Even after 4 p. m. one takes chances, for the world is in the Rocio. And the banks are so careless and the hotels so leisurely. How delightfully angry Englishmen get at the "damned, lazy" Portuguese!

But if this of Portugal, what of Africa? Here darkness descends and rests on lovely skins until brown seems so luscious and natural. There is sunlight in great gold globules and soft, heavy-scented heat that wraps you like a garment. And laziness; divine, eternal languor is right and good and true.

I remember the morning. It was Sunday, and the night before we heard the leopards crying down there. Today beneath the streaming sun we went down into the gold-green forest. It was silence—silence the more mysterious because life abundant and palpitating pulsed all about us and held us drowsy captives to the day. Ahead the gaunt missionary strode, alert, afire, with his gun. He apologized for the gun, but he did not need to apologize to me, for I saw the print of a leopard's hind foot. A monkey sentinel piped, and I heard the whir of the horde as they ran.

Then we came to the village. How can I describe it? Neither London nor Paris nor New York has anything of its delicate, precious beauty. It was a town of the Veys and done in cream and pale purple—still, clean, restrained, tiny, complete. It was so simple and quiet there in the great wide world. Its arms were wide—it was no selfish place, but the central abode of fire and hospitality, was clean-swept for wayfarers, and the best seats were bare. They quite expected visitors, morning, noon, and night; and they gave our hands a quick, soft grasp and talked easily. Their manners were better than those of Park Lane or Park Avenue, Rittenhouse Square or the North Shore. Oh, much better and more natural! They showed breeding.

The chief's son—tall and slight and speaking good English—had served the late Colonel Young. He made a little speech of welcome. Long is the history of the Veys and comes down from the Eastern Roman Empire, the great struggle of Islam and the black empires of the Sudan.

We went on to other villages—dun colored, not so beautiful, but neat and hospitable. In one sat a visiting chief of perhaps fifty years in a derby hat and a robe, and beside him stood a shy young wife done in ebony and soft brown, whose liquid eyes could not meet ours. The chief was taciturn until we spoke of schools. Then he woke suddenly—he had children to "give" to a school. There was a pile of brown coffee heaped in the center of the village. I see the last village fading away: they are plastering the wall of a home, leisurely and carefully. They smiled a goodby—not effusively, with no eagerness, with simple friendship, as we glided under the cocoa trees and into the silent forest, the gold and silent forest.

And there and elsewhere in two long months I began to learn: Primitive men are not following us afar, frantically waving and seeking our goals; primitive men are not behind us in some swift foot-race. Primitive men have arrived. They are abreast, and in places ahead of us; in others behind. But all their curving advance line is contemporary, not prehistoric. They have used other paths and these paths have led them by scenes sometimes fairer, sometimes uglier than ours, but always toward the Pools of Happiness. Or, to put it otherwise, these folks have the leisure of true aristocracy—leisure for thought and courtesy, leisure for sleep and laughter. They have time for their children—such well-trained, beautiful children with perfect, unhidden bodies. Have you ever met a crowd of children in the east of London or New York, or even on the Avenue at Forty-second or 142nd Street, and fled to avoid their impudence and utter ignorance of courtesy? Come to Africa and see well-bred and courteous children, playing happily and never sniffling and whining.

I have read everywhere that Africa means sexual license. Perhaps it does. Most folk who talk sex frantically have all too seldom revealed their source material. I was in West Africa only two months, but with both eyes wide. I saw children quite naked and women usually naked to the waist—with bare bosom and limbs. And in those sixty days I saw less of sex dalliance and appeal than I see daily on Fifth Avenue. This does not mean much, but it is an interesting fact.

The primitive black man is courteous and dignified. If the platforms of Western cities had swarmed with humanity as I have seen the platforms swarm in Senegal, the police would have a busy time. I did not see one respectable quarrel.

Wherefore shall we all take to the Big Bush? No. I prefer New York. But my point is that New York and London and Paris must learn of West Africa and may learn. The one great lack in Africa is communication—communication as represented by human contact, movement of goods, dissemination of knowledge. All these things we have—we have in such crushing abundance that they have mastered us and defeated their real good. We meet human beings in such throngs that we cannot know or even understand them—they become to us inhuman, mechanical, hateful. We are choked and suffocated, tempted and killed by goods accumulated from the ends of the earth; our newspapers and magazines so overwhelm us with knowledge—knowledge of all sorts and kinds from particulars as to our neighbors' underwear to Einstein's mathematics—that one of the great and glorious joys of the African bush is to escape from "news."

On the other hand, African life with its isolation has deeper knowledge of human souls. The village life, the forest ways, the teeming markets bring an intimate human knowledge that the West misses, sinking the individual in the social. Africans know infinitely fewer folk, but know them infinitely better. Their intertwined communal souls therefore brook no poverty or prostitution—these things are to them ununderstandable. On the other hand, they are vastly ignorant of what the world is doing and thinking and of what is known of its physical forces. They suffer terribly from preventable disease, from unnecessary hunger, from the freaks of the weather.

Here, then, is something for Africa and Europe both to learn; and Africa is eager, breathless, to learn—while Europe? Europe laughs with loud guffaws. Learn of Africa? Nonsense. Poverty cannot be abolished. Democracy and firm government are incompatible. Prostitution is world old and inevitable.

Whereupon Europe proceeds to one of two programs:

1. To force Africa into modern work-slavery by whip and gun.

2. To tempt Africa into work profitable to Europe by catering to her present wants.

And then across these programs with absolutely no reference to them logically or physically run the amazing missionary efforts.

The net result is disintegration. Disintegration toward death as in the Belgian Congo. Disintegration toward European life as in French Senegal. Disintegration toward modern machine methods as in Sierra Leone. Disintegration by absorption into another group as in Liberia, where the new Liberian is more and more of native blood and American training.

Most people would disagree with the attempt to force Africa into work slavery and assume that this program is obsolete in Africa. It is not. It is, on the whole, the main and predominant program. On the other hand, the second program of catering to the wants of Africa may be good and may be bad, and is usually bad. Everything depends upon which wants are catered to, and how they are catered to, and with what objects and ideals. One may cater to the wish for alcoholic stimulants by synthetic gin, or one may cater to the need of knowledge by establishing schools; and between these two runs the gamut of the universe. As a matter of fact, what one does cater to is to those wants the satisfaction of which makes the largest profit for the importer. And one does this without any reference to the ultimate effect upon the people. One copies the beautiful cloth patterns of the West African artisan and his dyes, and floods West Africa with machine-made garments, beautiful and striking in many ways, but far less beautiful, of course, than the native garment, and at the same time driving the native artisan out of the market.

What shall one do? Here again one must do the thing most profitable to the importer. Bring down palm oil and ivory and wild rubber. All this beginning of trade and intercourse with the modern world is a matter which ought to call for the wisest thought and most far-seeing philanthropy. It is left today in the hands of the most selfish and ignorant white traders. One could envisage in West Africa a missionary effort that would uplift the world: trained physicians and nurses, masters of industrial processes guided by ideals which make industry cater to human development and uplift; wise men trained in anthropology and history to observe and copy the ancient and in many respects magnificent native organizations; and teachers who know how to teach.

Your Christmas gift to The Nation—a new subscriber!

Jaurès at the Pantheon

By IDA TREAT

Paris, November 24

A DAY of incongruities. More red than tricolored, and yet not quite red. A truce between the "Internationale" and the "Marseillaise." A symbol of the Government of the Bloc des Gauches—with its hesitancies, its lack of assurance, its constant need of leaning on the Left. . . .

As we walk from the metro station toward the Chamber of Deputies the first glimpse is impressive. The brown bulk of the House-without-windows, with a high, black catafalque in silhouette against a moving, billowing curtain of tricolor, vast as a cloud against the dark pillars. Below the square is black with onlookers, massed at either side of the boulevard and along the bridge leading to the Place de la Concorde, where groups of red flags flame darkly through the mist.

Everyone buys a red eglantine for his buttonhole. Today red is an official color. Few police are in evidence; a platoon keeps the crowd in order; a few brigadiers with braided képis stand about. Cavalry officers trail their long swords; their silver spurs twinkle under their long coat-skirts cut after the German pattern.

Comes a prolonged drum-roll. Hats off. A monstrous something advances, draped in red-white-and-blue bunting, visible over the heads of the crowd. It sways and lurches, steams like a locomotive. People crane and shove. What is it? A float, a tank? It is the catafalque; poised at the summit of a wooden pyramid nearly twenty feet high and fully twice as long, it is borne along by the stalwart miners of Carmaux wearing their picturesque blue jeans. Incense burns at the four corners in gilded holders.

Overhead something whines and wheezes—like a phonograph with a warped disk or a worn needle. Two mighty amplifiers on the roof of the Chamber transmit the strains of an orchestra, playing in comfort within the heated building. The march from "Aïda"! In an instant the scene on the square loses its sincerity. This is mere opera—the swaying catafalque, the tall cenotaph with its silver gauze, its banks of chrysanthemums, and the two red-and-yellow torches like immense ice-cream molds. Only the billowing flag-curtain still is beautiful.

The crowd shivers and stamps in the icy fog. To think that this display has cost the Government 650,000 francs! One cannot help remembering the pathetic budget of education they have been discussing this very week behind those draped columns. No money for museums, no money for libraries and laboratories—but 650,000 francs for a spectacle! The republic has come a long way from Danton's "Bread first . . . and then education."

"Poor psychology," comments one man in the crowd. "Bad politics," grumbles another. In spite of the lyric tone adopted by the journalists, the crowd understands that this is a political demonstration. Jaurès is a pretext—a chance to reveal the forces massed behind Herriot and the Bloc des Gauches. Yesterday it was the Poincaré Government with the heart of Gambetta and the Unknown Soldier; today, the Left has its opportunity.

The catafalque has disappeared down the Boulevard St. Germain, followed by the President of the Council in his tall hat, deputies, and senators—the very men who in 1911 christened Jaurès "l'avocat de l'Allemagne." Then come the radicals, the League of the Rights of Man with its venerable chief, Ferdinand Buisson, warmly saluted by friends in the crowd. Last of all, the long procession of Socialists, their scarlet banners hung with crape—a disturbing sight no doubt to the good folk in the big houses that line the boulevard. A window just above our heads is filled with house-servants so typical that they seem scarcely real—the cook with mustache and cap, the housekeeper and her keys, the butler with a handful of spoons. Monsieur himself with his monocle stands a little apart from the rest, carefully observed by his household, who pattern their behavior after his. When Monsieur gives a scornful laugh, the servants laugh; a shrug of his shoulders is accompanied by a whole series of less successful shrugs.

The amplifier still whines over the square—excellent music, without a doubt, but nothing to march to. Could not some of the six hundred thousand francs have been used to hire a band? The cortège saunters—a well-dressed crowd, derby hats and French heels. One lady leads or is led by a gay little dachshund in a blue overcoat.

Two-fifteen; the "official" procession is over. The policemen along the curb break ranks. An amiable brigadier invites us to fall in behind the marchers. But there is a stir on the bridge, banners, and—at last—a band. The crowd surges into the square as the Communists, fifty thousand strong, sweep across from the Place de la Concorde. On they come, flags flying, Cachin and Vaillant-Couturier in the lead. Just under the cenotaph they come to a stand. There is a crash of brass.

C'est . . . la lut-te final-e . . .

The "Internationale." An answering roar from the crowd. Hats wave. The whole square rocks with sound.

"That's what Jaurès would have loved!" gasps an old man beside me who has been singing with all his might. "I am no Communist, but to bury Jaurès without the 'Internationale'—it would be a shame!"

"You can't play the 'Internationale' at a government funeral!" snaps a man with a Socialist badge on his arm.

"Jaurès didn't belong to the government. He was a revolutionary—" came the peppery rejoinder, and the old man burst out again with the refrain:

L'Inter-nationale sera . . . le genre humain!

For nearly an hour they file past—workers from the faubourgs, children in scarlet caps, bareheaded women—singing and shouting "Vive Jaurès! Vive l'Amnestie!" their voices covering the bark of the amplifier that is grating out the official speeches at the Pantheon. The Communists are masters of the street; they fill the boulevard from wall to wall and stretch in a long procession to the distant square where the dome of the Pantheon disappears in evening mist. No hypocrisy here. This is frankly a political demonstration—a heaven-sent opportunity to parade the strength of a revolutionary party through the very heart of the capital. Flags, songs, speakers haranguing the crowd from taxis.

And Jaurès? . . . The ceremony is over. The officials have wandered home to dinner. The amplifiers have ceased grating. The gates of the sanctuary are closed and barred. The autumn mist closes down on the square, shutting out the crowds that drift away with their eglantines and their furled banners; wrapping close about the dome of great men, like a symbol of the solitude of their lives.

Jaurès is alone in the Pantheon.

The Unimp

For Radio Enthusiasts and Music Lovers

FOUR BOOKS BY PERCY A. SCHOLES

THE COMPLETE BOOK OF THE GREAT MUSICIANS Net $4.20

For persons of all ages. Treats the subject in the light of a game that one must first learn to play and understand before full enjoyment comes. Also obtainable in three volumes, each Net $1.70

THE LISTENER'S GUIDE TO MUSIC. With a Concert-goer's Glossary . . . . . Net $1.50

When you listen in to musical programs on the radio do you understand what the music is expressing to you? Your family and friends will find this book an open sesame to the language of music.

THE BEGINNER'S GUIDE TO HARMONY . . . Net $ .85

A simple introduction to the subject.

THE LISTENER'S HISTORY OF MUSIC, Volume I. Net $2.00

A book for any concert-goer, pianist, or gramophonist. Provides also a course of study in the appreciation of music.

Order singly or in sets from your bookseller or from the publisher.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
American Branch

35 West 32nd Street New York, N. Y.

Ernest Boyd
PORTRAITS:
REAL AND IMAGINARY

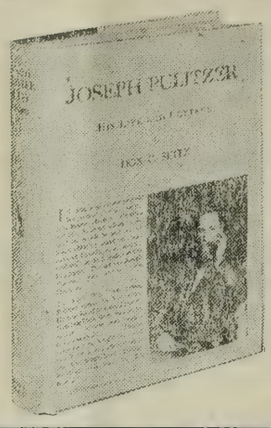
YOU can't afford to miss Mr. Boyd's "Puritan: Modern Style," "A Literary Lady," and other studies of types we all know. These keen satires are rounded out with word portraits of such writers as Shaw, Moore, Mencken, Scott Fitzgerald, Dreiser, and Chesterton. "It opens with the breathtaking 'Aesthete, Model 1924,' . . . You linger over the pages of this volume and are reluctant when the last leaf is turned." $2.50

John Farrar
THE LITERARY SPOTLIGHT

THESE intimate and exceedingly frank personal accounts of living American writers have already been greeted as sensational. Humorous, penetrating, sometimes bitter, these brilliant studies have been written by a score or more of famous American critics who accept the cloak of anonymity. Among the authors included are Tarkington, Edna Ferber, Cabell, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Sinclair Lewis, Mary Johnston, Sherwood Anderson, etc.
With caricatures by Gropper.

DORAN BOOKS

All Bookshops
Each $2.50



"The Seitz biography is

JOSEP HIS LIFE AN

The dramatic s thrilling chronic
American life. .

24 full page plates
SIMON AND SC

A Recommendation

Each year it has been the privilege of Charles Scribner's Sons to recommend as a Christmas gift an American autobiography published at a moderate price. Last year at this time we were presenting Michael Pupin's "From Immigrant to Inventor," a book which had perhaps its most adequate and discerning estimate in the pages of The Nation, and which has since received the Pulitzer Biography Prize. The new autobiography recommended for the Christmas season of 1924 is

MEMOIRS OF AN EDITOR
By Edward Page Mitchell

Who, two years ago, retired at seventy as editor of the New York Herald after 47 years of brilliant service with it and the Sun.

To our recommendation we might add that of the New York Times, that of W. P. Beazell, managing editor of the New York World, and those of the Boston Transcript, the New York Herald-Tribune, the New York Sun, to assure you that this is a fine, wise, human, rich and diverting book.

Illustrated $4.50

Cartoon of Charles A. Dana in Kidney Bill's Hack in E. P. Mitchell's "Memoirs." Mr. Mitchell's half-century career in journalism brought him in contact with men and great events.

Charles Scribner's Sons

UNCENSORED RECOL

"IT should be tremendously popular," said Laurence Stallings made its first appearance. Mr. Stallings can take credit as George, it is reported, has read his copy three times and this make it the literary tid-bit of the season. If you like sparkling inc "not even Margot Asquith presented social gossip and scandal, the Times Book Review, sees in it "an important contribution to Boston." The New York Herald Tribune agrees, finding it "th many a season. Gossip about personalities of international noto If you are looking for a gift to please the particular, give this here and abroad.

Large Octavo. 346 Pages.

PHILADELPHIA J. B. LIPPIN

chable Gift

t charts the path of a comet."—Laurence Stallings

PULITZER

TTERS — By DON C. SEITZ man who made THE WORLD,—a f the most amazing careers in recent example of craftsmanship in book-making.

5.00. At all book stores or from the publishers,

NC. 37 West 57th St., New York

st of nguished

BOOKS On Politics and Personalities

A GALLERY
alla
Pen portraits and landscapes of such fascinating subjects as Fez, Mandalay, Anatole France, Galsworthy, Lord Curzon and Empress Eugenie, sparkling, witty and profound. $2.50

SUPERS AND SUPERMEN
alla
The brilliant historian skillfully lampoons interesting figures including Frederick the Great, Louis Philippe, Wilfred Blunt and Disraeli. $2.50

THE SECRET OF THE COUP D'ETAT Earl
erry
The recently discovered correspondence of Louis Napoleon, Duc de Morny, M. de Flahault and others, reveals new and important facts concerning the Second Empire of France and are published here for the first time. $3.50

THOSE EUROPEANS
lleston
An intimate and illuminating account of men who have most influenced the destiny of Europe during the post-war period, ably written by one who knew them all personally. $2.50

THE WINDOWS OF WESTMINSTER
leman
ister
The only book on the leaders of the British Tory party, which has just come into power, invaluable to those interested in world politics. Illustrated with portraits of the members. $2.50

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

West 45th Street New York

TIONS Anonymous

York World when this book of entertainingly indiscreet gossip the volume at once proved an International Sensation. King wondered at in view of the piquant and racy revelations which u will enjoy these, for, according to the San Francisco Chronicle, icity and snobbery, as this writer does." Walter Littlefield, of Biography, not overlooking that of London, New York and aining volume of intimate memoirs the reviewer has read for e runs through its pages like the swift flow of a swollen stream." Already eight printings have been necessary to satisfy the interest

At All Bookstores.— Postpaid $4.65

T COMPANY LONDON

New Books

OUR CHANGING MORALITY
A Symposium

by Bertrand Russell, Floyd Dell, Ludwig Lewisohn, Elsie Clews Parsons, etc.

A SERIES of articles which have been appearing in The Nation on the standards of the younger generation. $2.50

WILL ROGERS' ILLITERATE DIGEST

THE best selling book of humor since publication on November 7th. "For humor, this is hard to beat."—Post. $2.00

BEGGARS OF LIFE

by Jim Tully [A Hobo Autobiography]

"THE best book of its kind I have ever encountered. Thirty-one strange chapters, and all of them good."—H. L. Mencken. $3.00

BLACK CAMEOS

by R. Emmet Kennedy

"WE recall no other book of recent months that has captured the full flavor of Negro character and humor."—Allan Nevins. With many illustrations. $2.50

ON BOARD "THE MORNING STAR"

by Pierre MacOrlan

A PIRATE story for the sophisticated, with characters that ... "terrifyingly actual and the episodes involving them as vividly unreal as nightmares."—New York World. $2.00

ALBERT and CHARLES BONI, Inc., New York

Gifts

for every Member of the Family

BOOKS

are always acceptable as Gifts, particularly at Christmas time. We offer a wide Selection, suitable for every age, taste and purse, and embracing the best in Poetry, Music, History, Old Books, Rare Books, Fine Bindings.

For Gifts other than Books, our stock affords an opportunity for the choice of such articles as Book Ends, Desk Sets, Portfolios, Brass Goods, Leather Goods, Stationery, Fountain Pens, and many interesting Novelties.

BRENTANO'S

Booksellers to the World

Fifth Ave., at 27th St.

New York

In the Driftway

THE Drifter admits without pride that he is immune to the cross-word microbe. Long ago, when the disease was in its dread infancy, the Drifter was exposed to a single puzzle. With that thoroughness for which he is so justly noted he began at the upper left-hand corner, looked up every Tasmanian tree and Burmese deity, filled every square, in fact, to the very last. What was the Drifter's horror to find, at the lower right-hand corner, the name of an extinct bird that could only be nandu. Nandu didn't fit all its crosses, so they had to be changed. Nearly everything had to be changed, all the way back to the upper-left corner. From that moment the Drifter abjured cross-word mania, and nothing will tempt him back. Not if the checkered series stretches out to as many volumes as the Elsie books; not if the annual contest of the cross-word association comes to rival the Army-Navy football game; not if the puzzle-builders of the daily papers are paid as high as columnists and words like eloign and ormazd become as common as pronouns; not even if the Drifter himself is offered the chair of cross-etymology at Harvard.

* * * * *

DO not hasten to congratulate the Drifter on his immunity, because he has a much worse disease. He is addicted to the species of puzzle known as the number cryptogram. This, though rarer, is much more deadly than the common cross-word. Its pursuit requires no reference library of textbooks in naval engineering and Babylonian mythology. It can be practiced by the unaided exercise of the human intellect, but at what cost in vital energy! A number cryptogram, you should know, is a sum in arithmetic, expressed in letters which form a ten-letter keyword like a merchant's price code. All the victim is given is a picture like this:

VEL) RVLLB (AA
RMVP
RPVB
RMVP
IEO

The Drifter worked out this one yesterday, but unfortunately mislaid the answer. He has evolved his own secret method of solution, which he guards with his life. In case any converts wish to take up the study, he refers them to the method described not long ago in the New York World by an earnest contributor named Schrum. This careful scholar has made a card index, as the Drifter understands it, of the multiplication table. He reports a hundred possible combinations for a single pair of digits. Armed with his index he attacks the cryptogram, and after about two columns of explanation notes proudly: "This eliminates 56 combinations and leaves but 44 to contend with." The reader will of course understand that the rest is child's play.

* * * * *

AFTER all, the Drifter emerges from his cryptogram to observe, the cross-word vogue may be as good a key to the psychology of our time as radio, crime, or jazz itself. For unbelievers in the gospel of commerce, puzzle-solving offers a quaint escape from the useful. For orthodox devotees of the daily dozen, it serves to enlarge the vocabulary and sharpen, as they virtuously say, the wits.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"Scouts with a Difference"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Last spring I had the pleasure of calling the attention of your readers to a new movement which adopted the name of the Pioneer Youth of America. I should like now to report what degree it has won for itself as a kind of "Boy (or Girl) Scouts with a Difference."

It ran a very successful camp at Pawling, New York, primarily for the children of workers. Anyone who would like to get the feeling of the camp would do well to write for a copy of that attractive little publication Pioneer Youth, which the boys and girls themselves wrote, edited, and printed.

This camp has been followed by the organization of eight clubs in different parts of Greater New York. Others will soon be opened in New York City, and in the near future work will be begun in Pennsylvania with the help of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor. Slowly and steadily the movement is winning the approval and support of organized labor, some sections of which, from the beginning, have been active in it. It has also won the friendly interest of modern educators and it has established a training class for leaders with an average attendance of over thirty.

It is quite idle to believe that we shall have a new labor party, or a nobler and less jingoistic patriotism, or a finer spirit in labor organizations, or world peace itself, if we are to allow the spirits of our boys and girls to be militarized and regimented and taught the religion of success, not only through our schools but through the very organizations which satisfy their need for recreation and comradeship and out-of-door life. That is why I believe the modest beginnings of this new organization deserve both the moral and financial support of the readers of The Nation. May I remind you that Joshua Lieberman, secretary of the organization, can be reached at 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City?

New York, December 1 NORMAN THOMAS

American Labor at El Paso

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A band of Mexican labor delegates a thousand strong, many of them barefoot and scantily clad, wearing their broad sombreros and flaunting gay colors, marched into Liberty Hall at El Paso, Texas. They were greeted by the forty-fourth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor and immediately a keynote of internationalism was struck. The Chihuahua city band played "America" and the Mexican national anthem, and President Gompers and Secretary Trevino clasped hands, with the Mexican flag between them. Juan Rico, president of the Mexican Federation of Labor, meeting in Juarez, Mexico, answered the greeting of President Gompers; and again the band crashed out a Mexican tune. The delegates shouted "Viva Gompers!" "Viva Mexico!" "Viva labor and peace!" These expressions of brotherhood were significant and impressive just because they were unconscious and spontaneous. If they were emotional so were at least half of the deliberations of the assembled body. It greeted with equal enthusiasm the statement of National Commander James Drain of the American Legion that "the United States must maintain a navy the equal of any in the world. . . . It must have an army . . . capable of immediate expansion to war-time size" and the statement of A. B. Swales of Great Britain that "our congress is working toward the international solidarity of the workers of the world."

But the wheels of the machinery were well greased and moved with automatic precision. The committee reports went through without a hitch. The resolutions looking to the formation of a labor party were, of course, voted down, and the nonpartisan political attitude of the federation was reaffirmed. The surprisingly broad and inclusive report on education, involving a per capita tax of one-half cent per member, per annum, to be paid to the Workers' Education Bureau, was passed as a matter of routine, along with an imposing list of other resolutions.

In similar fashion the reelection of every one of the officers of the previous year was ticked off with the regularity of a clock. No trace could be detected of an articulate or even a dormant minority opinion. Max Hayes, Andrew Furuseth, and Basky of the Stone Cutters were the nearest approach to a protest vote of which the convention could boast. This was all to be expected. The only feature of the convention at all comparable to its genuine exhibition of internationalism was the unexpected vigor, the aggressive determination of the federation's veteran leader. Recovering from his illness of the first day, Samuel Gompers spoke several times and fired the convention to tumultuous applause when he expressed sentiments like these:

> I would rather that the American labor movement put a dollar in the pay envelope at the end of the week and cut down an hour a day of the burdensome toil than to cast votes once in every four years. . . . Hungry stomachs may create a riot, but never a successful revolution. . . . It is better to resist and lose than never to resist. . . . If any industry cannot pay a living wage it had best go out of existence. . . . If the gauntlet is thrown down let us pick it up and fight—fight to the bitter end until the rights of our people shall be respected.

NELLIE SEEDS NEARING

El Paso, Texas, December 1.

A Critic Criticized

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the issue of The Nation for October 29, in an article of criticism on "Taking the Literary Pulse" by Joseph Collins, Mr. Johan J. Smertenko says: "In the work of Dr. Collins we may see the green-grocer morality and mentality passing judgment on what it cannot understand." Why the gratuitous insult to the green-grocer? Is it not (I will not say un-American and undemocratic) unjust, unkind, and unintelligent to hold up to contempt an entire class of workers, harmless, necessary green-grocers, as objects worthy of scorn? Is it not that a sense of caste-distinctions is not yet eradicated from the soul of your foreign-named critic, so that a person in petty "trade" is not to him worthy the consideration an American gentleman is, in theory, at least, expected to give to each individual on his own merits?

This point recalls to my mind the practice of Rebecca West's early days of literary and social criticism. Butlers were her pet aversion. Any person too low and mean for special classification was dubbed a "butler." The very worst were "cretinous butlers"!

Would it not be well for such hasty and class-prejudiced persons as these two named critics to ponder the wise words of Phillips Brooks on "Tolerance," spoken more than twenty-five years ago, but most pertinent at the present moment? He says: "Has it not been true with you that the more sure you have been of yourself the more tolerant you have been always? We have full tolerance for the Buddhist and the Mohammedan; least of all for the man of our own church. Where the difference is least we have most misgivings, and there tolerance is weak."

Let our American critics beware, then, of selecting arbitrarily certain Europeanly designated "servile" classes for scorn and contumely lest they inadvertently betray concerning themselves what they presumably would prefer to keep hidden.

Los Angeles, November 11 EMMA B. PATTON

In Sympathy with Mr. Hard

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It seems to me that Mr. Hard's letter of December 3 in The Nation most happily illustrates a very serious embarrassment. There is an undoubted disposition to confuse adherence to a general cause and adoption of a particular reason or measure to promote that cause. In 1896 I felt that Mr. Bryan was right in virtually every complaint he uttered, and wrong in practically every remedy he suggested. The common impression, however, was that to be honest it was necessary to be for or against both. In the last campaign I sympathized with La Follette's protests as to past abuse or neglect of principles, but I was out of sympathy with his program for future correction by changing those principles.

I was surprised to find that, because I stood for the right to utter opinions, I was expected to agree to any opinion that any one might utter. I protest that because I insist that others have a right to be socialists I should be classed as one of them.

The proposed child-labor amendment is a case in point. Many very earnest opponents of child labor still hesitate to support the federal amendment, although in the present state of the Constitution the Supreme Court has declared Congress to be helpless. This presents the same conflict between general purpose and particular measure. Shall the original conception of the dual system of government yield to the crying need for immediate relief? There are still those who would be glad to be both federalist and State-righter, and who contend that intelligent adherence to one presupposes respect for the other. Shall they yield that position?

Finally, there are those who advocate the least possible government. These are the progressive conservatives, or conservative progressives, as the case may be—men and women who cherish ideals but who look to the spirit of the man rather than to the letter of the statute. Again and again the question is, What shall be our practical answer in a situation which presents a conflict of conviction or principle, or both?

St. Louis, December 1 CHARLES NAGEL

New Hampshire

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article on New Hampshire by Ralph D. Paine reminds me of a little poem written by Harry Kemp, the so-called "tramp poet," written while sitting beside a New England roadway. The verse bears the title of

THE NEW ENGLAND FARMER

Along a slope of stony ground, where niggard nature yields
A scant return from rocky ridge and age-exhausted fields,
I see a farmer turning slow behind a yoke of steers
The furrow that his fathers clove in far colonial years.
The railway is an incident to him who turns the clod;
He has the limp that Cato had when Tuscan fields he trod—
Coeval he with Romulus, whose plow was sire to Rome,
Though snugly set 'mid apple trees he owns his Yankee home.
Last scion of a hardy line whose children run to seed,
He ever goads the wretched soil to half-supply his need;
Alone he toils from day to day—his offspring dead, or gone
To wrestle for existence in the million-peopled town—
Dyspeptic, full of ancient tales of things that used to be,
Of times more thriving, brighter suns, he chatters garrulously—
And then again a silence falls. . . . He turns to face once more
The battle with the barren lands his fathers drained of yore.

Stockton, California, September 1 OTES E. BROWN

Mollie Best's three articles, Quaker Revolutionaries, will appear in successive issues of The Nation, beginning next week.

Books and Plays

First Glance

THE tortures through which youth is willing to put itself in order to achieve expression in poetry are so appalling that to many persons they would seem incredible were it not that documents occasionally come along about whose reality there can be no doubt. Two recent volumes tell strange stories of such pain, and though they are alike in no other respect they belong together as proving the mad power of that urge which hunts elected souls across the difficult fields of art.

"Pascal D'Angelo, Son of Italy" (Macmillan: $2) is the autobiography of a young immigrant laborer who suffered the various hells of an impossible environment before a lucky day in 1922 brought him to the office of The Nation, where he got his first recognition as the only thing he wanted to be, a poet. Readers who remember The Roving Critic's article describing that visit will be interested now in Mr. D'Angelo's picturesque and moving account of the years which in one way or another led up to it. He begins with his boyhood in a valley of the Abruzzi, and his memories of that world, in spite of the fact that it lay under the curse of incurable poverty, give clear and beautiful color to the first four chapters of his book. These are packed with excellent narrative of storms and superstitions and childish fears, with pictures of rain and drought, of the vine, the goat, the red roofs of mountain houses, and the deep green of valleys. One passage in particular might be the work of an ancient pastoral poet momentarily exiled from his loved locality: "One day I was pasturing my goats and sheep on the broad shoulder of the immense mountain. Higher and higher we went, gradually leaving the castle below us, and reaching the clear bright regions of stunted trees and fitful mountain storms. Far below me was the white town and to the north stretched the vast glorious valley that was for so many centuries the stronghold of the mighty Samnites. In a hazy softness of distance it appeared, threaded by the Pescara, the blue river. There gleamed Sulmona, surrounded by its towered walls. And there nestled the villages of the Marsi, and further north, though hidden in mists, I knew was Aquila, the city of the eagle."

At fifteen he came with his father to America, and for twelve waste years he was herded with pick-and-shovel gangs through the Eastern States. It was only toward the end of this period that he was seized with a passion to learn English. He studied it fiercely, getting an old dictionary by heart and experimenting more and more boldly with written sentences. Then, becoming aware that he was a poet, he abandoned the pick and shovel and starved in New York through a long, cold year until his poems were accepted. He still must labor for a living, but he is a happy man in so far as he has caught the ear of a careless world. His poems, a few of which are inserted in the present text, deserve to be better known. But his story as told here is thus far the most important thing about him.

The story of Arthur Rimbaud has long been famous, though to most English and American readers it has hitherto been known only in outline. Such a book as Edgell Rickword's "Rimbaud: The Boy and the Poet" (Knopf: $3.50), which fills in the outline, was much to be desired. Mr. Rickword, far as he is from being a lucid biographer or a competent critic, has performed a valuable service by fitting together the known facts in the case and by furnishing translations of a number of Rimbaud's poems. The difficulties which formed the genius of Rimbaud were within himself, or within the bourgeois world which, as a boy of precocious and powerful intellect, he hated. Poetry with him was a virulent disorder, an eruption through which from fifteen to eighteen he arrived at an understanding between his sullen, adolescent ego and the rest of the universe. Equilibrium attained, he abandoned literature entirely and spent the second half of his life as a man of action, an explorer and colonizer in North-East Africa. He utterly despised the poems which he had set in circulation; today he would shout from his grave if he knew that he was considered by Mr. Rickword and many others the greatest French poet since Baudelaire. His relations with Verlaine make a story in themselves, and I am sorry that Mr. Rickword's volume is so unsatisfactory a mate for Harold Nicolson's admirable "Paul Verlaine" of three years ago.

MARK VAN DOREN

Twin Prestidigitators

Memories and Adventures. By Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Little, Brown and Company. $4.50.

A Magician Among the Spirits. By Houdini. Harper and Brothers. $4.

WHERE is Sherlock Holmes? May the master detective, despite his rheumatism, his philosophical studies, and his bee-keeping, seize his crutches and hobble forth from that irritating retirement in which he has remained since "His Last Bow" appeared. For a quest even more glorious than any of his former exploits awaits him—the rescue of his creator's mind from the clutch of that dreadful disease called the Psychic. And, when all is over, may Dr. Watson abandon his vials and scalpels in order to pen "The Adventure of the Gullible Author."

For Sir Arthur is, above all things, credulous. Here is an autobiography which in many ways is excellent; it tells, clearly, unaffectedly, and most entertainingly, the story of an exceptionally interesting, an enormously busy and therefore happy life. Certainly no lover of the Holmes Saga should fail to read it. But from beginning to end the book is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of metaphysical speculation. Like most specialists in science—Sir Arthur practiced medicine constantly for eight years and intermittently thereafter—he is incurably romantic about the great mysteries, and also (one hesitates to say it) almost as incurably cocksure of his own bizarre theories. "I have clasped materialized hands. . . . I have seen spirits walk round the room in fair light and join in the talk of the company." One imagines that Sherlock, listening to such remarks, would retort in his icy drawl: "Now, really, my dear Doyle . . ." This, of course, is the sort of jargon characteristic of mystics in every age. William Blake and John of Patmos made great poetry out of such hallucinations, but Sir Arthur shapes his broodings into unconsciously amusing, and yet distressing, essays in pseudo-science. Yet, after a fashion, his mental evolution has been sufficiently logical. Young Dr. Doyle wrote tales which portrayed the workings of an acutely analytical mind, though it is obvious enough that in almost every story about Holmes the dice of logic and reason are heavily loaded. Sherlock never picks up a watch or a key that does not contain a suspiciously large number of clues—far more than respectable watches and keys should have. Every act, every glance, every button has some abstruse significance for Holmes; so every ghost has a meaning of its own for his creator. Hypnotized by an uncompromising belief that because he wishes a thing to be true it therefore must be true, Sir Arthur performs some tricks with logic that are far more astounding than many of Sherlock's ratiocinations.

But since Holmes will presumably remain in retirement—for, alas! Sir Arthur remarks that the detective tales have "tended to obscure my higher work"—it is most fortunate that Houdini, a jolly mystifier instead of a mystic, has just come on the scene. For some thirty years he has carefully studied every phase of psychic phenomena, has amassed a huge library on the subject, and has attended all manner of hair-raising séances—which, nevertheless, have failed to make a single hair on his own head wiggle. Still, as he admits, he would like to believe that spirits can commune with their earthly friends, largely because he would like to communicate with his deceased mother. Once he held a séance with his friendly enemies, Lady Doyle and Sir Arthur, in which Lady Doyle, "seized by a Spirit," wrote down a message, couched in excessively ecstatic English, which purported to come from his mother. Sir Arthur naturally believed that it was "a direct communication"; and when Houdini pointed out that his mother "could not speak, read, nor write English," Sir Arthur told him that "a spirit becomes more educated the longer it has departed and that my blessed mother had been able to master the English language in heaven." Incidentally, Sir Arthur avers that he has "smelt the peculiar ozone-like smell of ectoplasm"; and when one reads that Houdini and others have detected mediums discharging ectoplasm from either their noses or their mouths, one suspects that Sir Arthur may be right.

Houdini's book naturally abounds in amusing episodes. He once attended a séance with a friend, who, informed that his deceased wife's spirit was on hand, asked permission to kiss her; and "he told me later that she must have forgotten to shave, as she had a stubble beard." Here is an interesting comment on the deportment of spirits: "A widow in Brooklyn became a mother and claimed that the spirit of her husband was the father of her child." Yet the book as a whole is eminently serious. There is more solid sense in this one sentence than in all of Sir Arthur's fantasies: "The secret of all such performances [séances] is to catch the mind off guard and the moment after it has been surprised to follow up with something else that carries the intelligence along with the performer, even against the spectator's will." Incidentally, Houdini plays some surprising tricks with the English language. He may be able to escape from any man-trap extant, but he is frequently quite helpless in the coils of syntax.

R. F. Dibble

"The Fox's Paw"

The Fox's Paw. A Novel of Spanish Life by Ramón Pérez de Ayala. Translated by Thomas Walsh. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

THE appearance here a few years ago of a translation of three short stories by Ramón Pérez de Ayala, one of the most prominent of Spain's younger writers, passed all but unnoticed, even by the reviewers. Though the book was not a remarkable one, its neglect by the reviewers was regrettable in view of the extravagant praise they had been lavishing upon Blasco Ibáñez. Now that critics are becoming aware of the existence of other modern Spanish writers, it is to be hoped that they will not go to extremes, as some have already done, by overpraising "The Fox's Paw."

"The Fox's Paw" is one of a series of four novels dealing in general with modern Spanish life and in particular with the intellectual and spiritual development of a sensitive young Spaniard seeking to find himself. The first of the series, "Darkness on the Heights," was published anonymously some sixteen years ago, and achieved notoriety for its bold picture of libertinage. The second, "A. M. D. G., or Life in a Jesuit College," which came out under the author's own name, caused a certain stir by its denunciation of Jesuit education. "Troteras y danzaderas" ("Dancers and Trollops"), the fourth of these novels, aroused considerable curiosity because of the rumors that certain of its characters were veiled portraits of well-known figures in the artistic and political life of the Spanish capital. In "The Fox's Paw," the third of the series in date of publication, the central figure of the tetralogy, Alberto Díaz de Guzmán, young, well-to-do, with vague artistic longings, continues his attempt to fit himself happily into his world, but succeeds only in bringing unhappiness and death to the woman he loves and disillusion to himself.

One acquainted with these novels must feel that "The Fox's Paw" does not represent Pérez de Ayala at his best. To be sure it shows the same mastery of language as his other work, the same gift for narrative, and the same ability with characters; but the story, at least as reread in the present translation, fails by comparison with "Darkness on the Heights" and "Troteras y danzaderas." In those novels Guzmán was for the most part an agreeable young man whose adventures were picturesque enough not to be overborne by the didactic quality of his comments thereon. In this book he appears as a lover, and as such he is unconvincing. Never for a moment do his emotional experiences become crucial or real, nor are they productive in him of more than fruitless introspection and conventional poetry—much of the verse, by the way, has been left out in this not always accurate and otherwise bowdlerized translation. One is inclined to accept the judgment of a "certain theatrical critic, who had declared that Albert could never succeed as a dramatic author because of his incapacity to feel or understand a passion." The setting and events, moreover, have less significance than those of the other two novels mentioned; its narrative lacks the picaresque verve of "Darkness on the Heights," and its setting is not as solid as that of "Troteras y danzaderas." W. L. Fichter

Wilberforce

Wilberforce: A Narrative. By R. Coupland. Oxford University Press. $5.

MR. COUPLAND has written an interesting biography of one of the two outstanding Evangelical leaders. Wilberforce was the best-known English crusader for the Negro, while Lord Shaftesbury was a keen fighter for the working classes. It is a happy coincidence that a life of Shaftesbury by Mr. and Mrs. Hammond has appeared simultaneously with that of Wilberforce. The earlier five-volume "Life of Wilberforce" (1838) by his sons is a fine collection of material rather than a biography. The piety of the reformer is stressed until it wearies the reader. Mr. Coupland handles this subject in harmony with modern taste and creates a very human character.

Wilberforce holds an important place as a defender of the Evangelical creed. In 1797 he stated his religious convictions in "A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes of the Country Contrasted with Real Christianity." This book passed through many editions on both sides of the Atlantic. He hoped that the Younger Pitt might fulfil his ideal of a Christian statesman and govern England by "principle" rather than by "influence." Mr. Coupland's comment is: "It was not the least of Wilberforce's tributes to Pitt's greatness to conceive him thus, if once his eyes had been opened to the truth, initiating and directing that one experiment in aristocracy which mankind has never cared or dared to try—a government of saints—and bringing down to English earth the incredible dream of a Christian state."

Wilberforce was not wholly absorbed in the Negro. During forty years in Parliament, in the age of Fox, Burke, Pitt, and Canning, he was active in many contests. He opposed the war with France in 1793; he turned the scales against Pitt's colleague, Lord Melville, in 1806, when the latter was impeached for grafting. He promoted missionary enterprises, worked for parliamentary reform and the amelioration of the penal code, and defended religious toleration. Under his leadership the abolition party became so powerful that Castlereagh, Wellington, and Canning did its bidding. His career suggests a study of the influence of humanitarianism in international diplomacy. Statesmen have not always obeyed and followed the wishes of investors, nor have they always been the instruments of economic imperialism.

Mr. Coupland admits that he has no new material to offer. Anti-slavery literature was scattered broadcast over England and America by letters, pamphlets, and parliamentary documents, and the pertinent manuscript material was used by the sons in the "Life." But he has written a standard biography. His narrative shows insight, gives excellent interpretations, and makes the stories of conferences and debates exceedingly vivid. Mistakes are few. On page 82 he gives the impression that Judge Mansfield wished the Somerset Case (1772) decided as a test case. On the contrary, Mansfield repeatedly urged a settlement out of court because he was reluctant to free 14,000 or 15,000 valuable slaves in England by judicial decision. No detailed account is given of the development of humanitarian sentiment during the eighteenth century, which made an attack on the slave trade inevitable. And the account of the emancipation struggle from 1823 to 1833 is necessarily brief, because this victory was won, not by Wilberforce, although he played a part, but by Buxton, the Stephens family, and Zachary Macaulay.

This study should be of much value to Americans. Wilberforce was a forerunner of our own anti-slavery leaders. William Lloyd Garrison was in England, counseling with the English leaders, when emancipation was voted in 1833, and he later visited that country several times. During the first visit he had two long conferences with Wilberforce just before the latter's death. Afterwards he joined in the memorable funeral procession as the triumphant anti-slavery leaders carried Wilberforce's body into Westminster Abbey. Harriet Beecher Stowe crossed the Atlantic also, and at her request Sir George Stephen wrote his "Antislavery Recollections." The libraries of American anti-slavery leaders, including Charles Sumner, were filled with English anti-slavery literature. Garrison underlined his copies of The Anti-slavery Reporter and covered the pages with marginal notes. Since neither a cotton nor a coffee kingdom grew up within the British Empire to replace the decaying sugar colonies, it was easy for the British to look upon slavery as wrong and unprofitable, and they championed the Negro cause in both hemispheres. As is well known, anti-slavery sentiment was strong enough to help keep England neutral during our Civil War, and so contributed to the preservation of the Union. A big share of this credit belongs to William Wilberforce.

FRANK J. KLINGBERG

Europe for Children

Ports and Happy Places. By Cornelia Stratton Parker. Boni and Liveright. $3.

MRS. PARKER has written a charmingly informal and very companionable travel book. It tells the story of her own two years in Europe with her children, and there is at least one want that such a book supplies. The innumerable parents who would like to give their children the advantages of travel and a grounding in foreign languages without interference with their normal development will find Mrs. Parker's report immensely valuable.

Mrs. Parker's travels took her from the beaten track not so much, apparently, because of any clearly formed intention of avoiding it as because she sought quiet and attractive backwaters where the education of her children could continue in its proper course. It was in this way that she came to live for a year in an enchanted cloister in the comparatively little-known Swiss town of Stein am Rhein while her sons went to school in the Swiss Landerziehungsheim of Glarisegg on Lake Constance. Mrs. Parker is probably the first American writer to give an adequate and untechnical account of these new schools, and this is in itself an important contribution. The greater part of the book is taken up, however, with accounts of vacation journeys: a five-weeks' walking trip through Germany with two boys and three rucksacks, winter sports in the Alps, a spring vacation in southern Spain and Algiers, and another in a fishing village of the Italian Riviera. On all these trips Mrs. Parker and her children managed to combine the seeing of sights ancient and modern—the "advantages" so dear to parents and so deadly, frequently, to their offspring—with a maximum of play and adventure, of fun and fellowship. From the point of view of the young Parkers there is every reason to believe that the undertaking was a success.

MARTHA GRUENING

Rockwell Kent in the South

Voyaging. By Rockwell Kent. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $7.50.

ROCKWELL KENT'S amazing adventure was undertaken, by his own confession, on the chance of being "wrecked, drowned, or eaten." As it developed, the angry seas did their best to make merry hell for him but the cannibals failed dismally. They strangely preferred Huyler's chocolate to human flesh. Thrills enough remain, however, to make up for the recusancy of the anthropophagi.

In brief summary, "Voyaging" is an account of Mr. Kent's attempt in a tiny sailboat to steer a course from the Strait of Magellan south and west through the mountainous-islanded channels of Tierra del Fuego around Cape Horn. His mate in this mad enterprise was one Ole Ytterock, a thick-skulled Norwegian sailor with the blood of the ancient sea-rovers roaring in his veins. The twain, after rigging out a twenty-six-foot lifeboat with mast and sail and storing her with various provisions and necessities including Mr. Kent's art materials, a silver flute, and a broken phonograph, weigh anchor. On the first day they narrowly escape foundering. Thereafter their lives are in constant jeopardy. Escaping squalls and treacherous reefs in Admiralty Sound, they finally reach Bahia Blanca, where they are wind-bound for weeks. At last, realizing the impossibility of beating out of Gabriel Channel southward toward the Horn, they abandon their boat and set out on foot across Brecknock Peninsula laden with heavy packs, their destination being Beagle Channel whence they hope somehow to continue their sea journey to the Horn. Through matted virgin forest, over bog and stream, across bleak glaciers they tramp for days, arriving eventually at Ushuaia, the southernmost city of the world. In this trek they were genuine pioneers. They had found a new route across the mountains from the north to Beagle Channel.

Here at Ushuaia they find themselves still seventy-five miles from Cape Horn. Cape Horn itself is the southernmost point of a small rocky island-group called the Wollastons. Cape Horn Island is a desperate venture, and many days pass before they are able to borrow a boat and secure as guide a mighty otter hunter named Christopherson. They make a brave attempt, but high seas and a balky gasoline engine turn them back. They do, however, manage to catch a fleeting glimpse of Horn Island. In graphic prose Mr. Kent sketches the utter desolation of that quarter of the world known as The Sailor's Graveyard:

> After a last steep ascent of several hundred feet we reached the mountain top, and, clinging there against the storm, beheld the vast and fearful wonder of the region of Cape Horn. Through the drifting murk of the clouds appeared a wilderness of mountain peaks with the torn > sea gleaming at their base, stark islands with the storm's night over them or glistening with a sunshaft on their streaming sides, or veiled illusively in falling rain. And, as we looked, suddenly the darkness of a midnight closed around us, obliterating every thing but the pinnacle of rock on which we crouched for shelter.

In order to guide the reader more effectively over the trail of his wanderings Mr. Kent has inserted several useful maps of the environs of Cape Horn. These are purely utilitarian, of course; but not so his glorious drawings. As Mr. Kent is rather better known as an artist than as a writer, one expects something especially fine when he undertakes to illustrate his own book. These black-and-whites make an astonishing portfolio in themselves. Scarcely a trace remains of the earlier Blakesque manner; a profoundly personal vision has found here a simple inevitable language of its own. The drawings are instinct with subtle, reticent intimations of dark elemental powers—forms of terror and mystery that swarm in those savage far-off seas. Mr. Kent has caught the wild beauty of this ominous region—iron crags ringed with the froth of blown surf, wind-tortured trees, distant peaks incrusted with dazzling snow; but out of the very heart of this bewildering beauty emanates a sense of unseen presences appallingly, implacably hostile to man.

It must not be supposed that Mr. Kent's drawings merely ornament a text. They supplement and enhance a narrative which has not only vigor and poetical sweep but candor and quizzical humor. The characters which appear throughout the book are alive. Mr. Kent lets us into the secret of their comic infirmities without overstatement, without a trace of snobbish superiority. Whether it be the crazy cook for whom he plays the flute, or the poachers on Baily Island, he shares the odd amenities of their lives as man and brother. This leads one to a consideration of the force that molds Mr. Kent's material into a genuine work of art. He does not venture forth into the unknown in the spirit of the professional purveyor of romance—always conscious of what a dash he is going to cut with the readers back home. In fact Mr. Kent's book seems to be a beautiful by-product—a mere accident born of prodigious adventure undertaken for its own glorious sake; then as an exultant survivor he writes about it and makes pictures with a drunken delight in imaginative representment. As his stolid mate Ole Ytterock is unconscious of anything save the zestful immediacy of adventure, so, too, is Rockwell Kent. He did not write to thrill a jaded, book-glutted world, but to retain for himself in some endurable form the richness of his ardors and travailings.

GLEN MULLIN

Books in Brief

Autobiography of John Stuart Mill. Preface by John Jacob Coss. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

Autobiography by John Stuart Mill. Introduction by Harold J. Laski. Oxford University Press. 80 cents.

The appearance of two new editions of Mill's "Autobiography" is gratifying evidence of the continuity and vitality of the great tradition of liberalism. The "Autobiography," writes Mr. Laski, "paints a convincing and, I think, not unattractive picture of the way in which a body of ardent young men set out to convert a dubious nation to the acceptance of ideas which are only commonplaces now because they were occupied, with full minds and full hearts, in making them commonplaces." The Columbia University Press prints for the first time what "seems . . . the final draft intended for publication, because of the statement by Miss Helen Taylor (Mill's step-daughter), written by herself and attached to the manuscript, as follows: 'Autobiography of J. S. Mill written by himself. To be published without alterations or omissions within one year after my death. Helen Taylor.'" Examination of the passages restored, totaling about six hundred words, demonstrates the good taste of Miss Taylor in excising them, for they consist almost entirely of complimentary references to her quite as generous as those to her mother. She has also left a note contradicting Mill's statement that her father was "without the intellectual or artistic tastes which would have made him a companion" for her mother. The Oxford edition follows the old text, but is accompanied by a sympathetic and illuminating introduction by Mr. Laski which includes valuable information concerning Mill's unpublished writings and an appendix consisting of six hitherto unpublished speeches. These speeches, belonging to the period between Mill's seventeenth and twenty-third years, confirm the statements of the "Autobiography" concerning his intellectual life immediately before and after the celebrated mental crisis. The earliest, delivered in 1823, presents ideas from the common stock of the Benthamite school colorlessly and without elaboration. In that of 1825 there is more color, but no originality. Those of 1828 and 1829 reveal a freely critical intellect, adroit, fertile in illustration, and devastatingly ironical. The speeches were selected from a large number to be published soon by the Fabian Society.

America: The Great Adventure. A History from the Discovery to the Present Time. By George Philip Krapp. With Illustrations by Philip von Saltza. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

The mechanical appearance of this sumptuously printed volume suggests that the book may have been written for young people, and there is nothing in the vocabulary or the style that should cause the average American adolescent to stumble or grow fainthearted. The treatment is sufficiently mature, however, to suit the class of readers, unhappily very large, who do not care much for what they loosely refer to as the "facts" of American history, but who prefer a rapid survey, pleasantly sketched, of everything from prehistoric times to date, with emphasis upon personalities, informing excursions among things economic, and a patriotic, hopeful tone. Mr. Krapp's narrative meets very well these varying requirements, and while the historical substance of what he has to say is extremely slight and an imposing amount of what is usually thought important is left out, what remains is interesting and informing, the chapters on corn, wheat and cotton, gold, coal, and capital and labor being particularly well done. The illustrations, some in colors and some in black and white, contrast somewhat sharply with the sober character of the text.

A Strong Man's House. By Francis Neilson. Huebsch. $2.

This book, reissued now that public hysteria is supposed to be subsiding, describes terrible things intelligently. Its picture of the agony of war-time England will still be new to the great majority of readers in America who cannot believe in the reality of a knife until it cuts their own flesh, but those readers will not believe it any more than they believed Latzko or Barbusse or Sassoon. That moment in the individual's conversion to radicalism when he finds himself possessed of extreme exhilaration mixed with peace, a moment not unlike the ecstasy of religious conversion and having much in common with the ecstasy of sexual surrender, is here set forth in perfection. After their various sufferings in the war all the characters in the book on whom the author looks kindly find their way into this sweet pain, though they talk in rather longer periods than most lovers or most religious devotees, filling many pages with staggering logic out of Tolstoi and Henry George, and completely annihilating with their verbal bombardment any adherents of another order who venture to set themselves up as targets. They begin earnestly to adapt their lives to a juster dispensation and establish a stud farm for the breeding of hunters as a contribution to the cause of economic justice. They have, in fact, all the pleasurable emotions of falling in love without any of the disillusionments of married life. Every radical will recognize the blissful stage of early conversion—and its terrible optimism.

NOTE: "The Apple of the Eye," by Glenway Westcott, is published by The Dial Press and not by The Dial Publishing Company, as erroneously stated in last week's Nation.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

Too Much Main Street

IF any critic in a future age should happen to read the manuscript of "Close Harmony" (Gaiety Theater) he would probably be at a loss to understand why the obviously capable authors of the piece chose to burden themselves with a hero weak to the point of insignificance and with a social background dull to the point of imbecility. He would admit, as contemporary observers will be compelled to admit, that the suburban atmosphere is evoked in dense clouds and that stupid conversation is recorded with remarkable fidelity; but unless he understood fully the strange contemporary mania for the meticulous study of dulness he would marvel that playwrights hoped to lure audiences into a theater with portraits so photographically and phonographically accurate of people who would bore them to extinction in the drawing-room. Into the short space of two hours and a half the authors have managed to crowd a perfectly adequate substitute for at least a two months' visit in Suburbia. But to me, at least, such a visit would be more in the nature of a punishment than a pleasure.

Recently, it is true, the American intellectual has exhibited a passionate interest in dulness and has shown a strange inclination to consider the man who can imitate it closely as the most diverting of wits. This is merely because a temporary condition has given an adventitious interest to things which have in themselves no permanent significance. Just awakened from a complacent acceptance of provinciality and bigotry, the intellectual has been delighted to see them depicted—partly for the sake of the feeling of superiority which the spectacle produced and partly in order to assure himself that he could recognize them when he saw them. Yet only a nascent sophistication can be interested in stupidity for its own sake; the Main Street

MAY SINCLAIR says:

I have only read one of Mr. Anthony's previous books—The Gang. That was a spirited study of boyhood in the slums of New York, accomplished with a powerful and vivid realism.

The Golden Village is powerful and vivid and realistic, too, but it is several stages higher in its unique quality of imagination. It has magic and an almost spiritual beauty. I have read it with intense interest and admiration.

The Golden Village

By JOSEPH ANTHONY

Price $2.00

BOBBS-MERRILL, Publishers

Bishop Brown's Fight

A Fight for the Right to Interpret the Bible in Accordance with Science

A Fight to Break the Shackles of Outgrown Religious Creeds

A Fight Against Pulpit Hypocrisy

Bishop Brown's Fight is the popular title given to the Brief filed in the Court of Review by Joseph W. Sharts of Dayton, Ohio, counsel for Bishop William Montgomery Brown, in the heresy trial over his booklet, Communism and Christianism. Date of Review hearing, January 13th, 1925. Place, Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio.

PUBLICATIONS

Communism and Christianism, paper 25c
Heresy No. I, Before the Trial, 25c
Heresy No. II, During the Trial, 35c
Bishop Brown's Fight, 35c

(This set covers the trial to January 13, 1925, and may be had for $1.00)

Communism and Christianism, cloth 75c

The Bradford-Brown Educational Company, Inc.
GALION, OHIO

theme is played out. Perhaps a few years ago the limitations of the particular variety of the suburban mind which our conditions produce had not been sufficiently recognized, but today every literate person knows that neither the commuter nor the commuter's wife represents the acme of virtue or the final grace of living. Even the satisfaction which comes from the first glow of superiority has been evoked too often, and dulness has again become what it always should be—merely dull. Thus the authors of "Close Harmony" have miscalculated their time; the measure of their skill is pretty nearly the measure of the tedium which they produce. It is true that the play has received critical approval, but the critics, while speaking truly of its verisimilitude and sincerity, forget to add that it is not interesting.

The story which it tells is the story of a dull, weak man who realizes for a moment the dulness of his life and makes one futile movement to alter it, only to realize that he has settled too completely into his routine ever to change it and that he must rest content with a mild rebellion against the unimaginative tyranny of his wife. Although the restrained acting of James Spottiswood contributes some moments of gentle pathos, the story has, as we hinted before, the disadvantage of dealing with a man too inconsequential to arouse any very deep interest; and it is, besides, merely incidental to the main emphasis, which is upon the evocation of an atmosphere no longer possessing even a factitious interest. Upon this subject I speak with some heat, not because the play is bad in the way that merely incompetent plays are bad, but because the tendency which it illustrates is a tendency which seems to be leading American literature down a blind alley.

Excessive verisimilitude is the last charge which could be brought against "The Harem" (Belasco Theater), a farce by Ernest Vajda, which has been selected as a vehicle for the display of Miss Lenore Ulric's charm. The story of a wife who disguises herself with three square inches of transparent veil in order to seduce her handsome but credulous husband (William Courtenay) is almost the exact converse of "The Guardsman," and it is not so rich in the by-play of comedy types; but it is raised to an entertaining level by the lavish exploitation of the personality of the star. Throughout one whole act Miss Ulric sustains herself in her most sultrily voluptuous mood, and that is quite enough to hold the interest of a good many spectators.

The other offerings of the week contain little worthy of remark. Cosmo Hamilton's "Parasites" (Thirty-ninth Street Theater) follows the safe formula which calls for scandal tempered by moralizing and exposes the vices of the fast set for the delectation of those who regret that they never had the courage to be quite so fast. "Dawn" (Sam H. Harris Theater), a wooden play in alleged defense of the flapper, is hopelessly unreal. "Princess April" (Ambassador Theater) exploits the pleasing voice of Miss Tessa Kosta but is extraordinarily dull in both text and score.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATRE

THE WAY OF THE WORLD
by WILLIAM CONGREVE
"Emphatically worth the while of any person with the slightest taste for one of the most exquisite creations of the past to seize an opportunity not often afforded." JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH in "The Nation."
CHERRY LANE Theater: 40 Commerce St.; two blocks from Christopher St. subway station on Seventh Ave. Line. Phone: Spring 2480.
Saturday Matinee, 2:45. Evenings, 8:40.
Subscription to five plays, $10.00.

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE
466 Grand St. Telephone Drydock 7516
First Play of the Repertory Season
"THE LITTLE CLAY CART"
A Classic Oriental Comedy
Every Eve. (except Mon.) Matinee Saturday
Orchestra $1.50. Balcony $1.00, 75c.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A New Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30 Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

A Frohman success
EMPIRE THEATRE, Broadway & 40th Street Evenings, 8:30. Mats., Wed. & Sat.
INA CLAIRE triumphs in Grounds for Divorce

PLAYHOUSE West 48th Street. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, 2:30. Evenings, 8:30.
the show-off
By GEORGE KELLY
11th CAPACITY MONTH
"BEST OF ALL AMERICAN COMEDIES"—Heywood Broun, World.

DEBATES LECTURES

DEBATE on PROHIBITION!
CLARENCE DARROW versus REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
Famous Chicago Lawyer of the Loeb-Leopold Case (AGAINST PROHIBITION)
Brilliant New York Preacher of the Community Church (FOR PROHIBITION)
CHAIRMAN
U. S. Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND
This Sunday Aft., December 14, at 3 P. M.
MANHATTAN OPERA HOUSE, 34th St. and 8th Av.
Tickets $1.10, $1.65, $2.20, $2.75. Box Seats $3.30.
Tickets on sale at the Box Office, Macy's and obtainable through any Theatre Ticket Agency, or at the following places:
Manhattan: Jimmie Higgins Bookshop, 127 University Place; Gothic Art Book Store, 176 Second Avenue; Harlem: Hauser's Book Store, 1285 Fifth Avenue; Bronx: Stern's Jewelry Store, 1337 Wilkins Avenue; also at the offices of and by mail from
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
500 Fifth Avenue Longacre 4447-10434
P.S.—OUT-OF-TOWNERS desiring a printed stenographic copy of this debate, kindly send us their names.

"Why I Joined the British Labor Party"
Address by
Brig. General LORD THOMSON
Former Secretary of State for Air, British Labor Cabinet
December 29, 1924, at 8:15 P. M.
COOPER UNION
Tickets $1.10 and 25c. No collection will be taken.
Under the auspices of the FOREIGN POLICY ASSOCIATION
9 East Forty-fifth Street, New York City.

The New School for Social Research
announces the following lecture by
COUNTESS CATHERINE KAROLYI
"Why I am an Exile"
Saturday, December 20, 8.20 P.M.
465 West 23rd Street Admission $1 New York City

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

What England Wants in the Sudan

IN her recent demands which have been accepted by Egypt, England tore up the Sudan treaties and eliminated even the shadow of Egyptian control in that region. Some of the economic factors behind that action and behind the demand for an unlimited extension of the Gezira irrigated area (hitherto limited to protect Egypt's water supply) are indicated in the following article in the 1923-1924 annual edition of the African World published at Cape Town:

Mr. F. Eckstein, chairman of the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, Ltd., is engaged on a work than which there is none bigger in the empire today. That work consists in bringing to fruition the aims and ambitions of his company and its subsidiary, or sister, concern, the Kassala Cotton Company. Together they are achieving in the Sudan the most gigantic cotton-growing proposition the world has ever known.

The stay-at-home individual, or even the Lancashire cotton spinner, does not realize the immensity of the proposition. Measurements of fields are not in acres or thousands of acres, but in hundreds of thousands; localities are not restricted, but extend to the north, south, and east of Khartum—along the Nile and, in the Kassala region, in the delta of the Gash River, whose waters never reach the sea but spread out, inundating fertile fields. When the Gezira and Kassala plains are in their first stage fully planted the acreage under cotton will be over 500,000 acres—to increase as time creeps on and irrigation works stride forward. The control over practically all this stupendous territory will be under the auspices of the Sudan Government, in the hands of the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, whose leading spirit is, beyond doubt, Mr. F. Eckstein himself. Compare these figures, a modest estimate ten years hence, with America, where the biggest single cotton operation held in one hand is only 15,000 acres!

So much for the size of the Sudan Plantations Syndicate's operations in the Sudan. The real significance, however, of the work they have undertaken does not lie in the colossal acreage under their control, but in the cotton they produce. Reckoning at a rough estimate three to four (no doubt more) bales of cotton to the feddan or acre, you obtain an output of empire-grown cotton that commands respect. Add to it the fact that this cottor is of the best quality available, the sort of cotton that Lancashire is most anxious to purchase for her mills, and your Sudan proposition acquires immediately a new aspect.

Moreover, economic phases of even greater import are or will be affected by the Gezira and Kassala undertakings. It is notorious that cotton growing in the States is on the decline, and has been in the memory of the past ten years. Labor is expensive or unobtainable, so much so that certain spraying operations have now already to be undertaken by aeroplane, thus greatly enhancing the cost of production per acre and the selling price of cotton per bale. These questions do not arise in the Sudan. At first it was thought by some that the question of labor would kill any cotton-growing proposition on a big scale. The Mahdi's wars, they argued, had decimated the native population, and Egyptian fellaheen, frightened by, and hating the Sudanese, could not, even if such had been the intention of the authorities, be coaxed south of Wadi Halfa. But what has happened? An era of peace and prosperity having settled on the Sudan under the British flag, the population is increasing within the country, while from without there is a continual influx of "Hansa, Fellata, and other tribes from Nigeria and other places." Obviously, therefore, the labor question may be regarded as by no means so dangerous as small-minded or short-sighted little owners in the Khartum area originally thought.

This being so, one can assume that, at no very distant date, the Sudan Plantations Syndicate will be able to market a fine quality cotton on a big and ever bigger scale at a lower cost of production than that marketed by the Americans. The effect, at first, will be small, but it will gather and grow like an avalanche, and in the end it can have but one economic result, namely, the freeing of Lancashire from serfdom to the cotton speculators of New York and the Mississippi, whose refined cotton operations cost in Lancashire industry a loss of £1,000,000 per week!

That is the meaning, the real meaning, of the work now being undertaken and rapidly pushed by the Sudan Government in happy conjunction with the Plantations Syndicate. It is imperial and not local in nature; in aspect it is vast, and the possibilities attached thereto are so immeasurable that to analyze them, or to picture an empire freed from dependence on America for one of the world's most valuable raw products, is utterly impossible. But, at any rate, viewed from this commanding angle, the digging and sowing and planting and building now being hurried on in Kassala, Makwar, Zeidab, Tokar, and elsewhere will convince us that the vision of the men who conceived this plan years ago was not that of ordinary individuals intent merely on floating humdrum concerns. They looked ahead.

Nevertheless, it must not be presumed from the foregoing that these men, these empire-builders—in the same sense, though not along the same path as Cecil Rhodes—were casting bread on the waters for an idea only.

One of the happiest features of the work of the Sudan Plantations Syndicate is that, while planning the great scheme, its board of directors, always in close touch with the Government at Khartum, were able, long before the big work was put in hand, to lay the foundations of a solid business paying very acceptable dividends. Starting in a relatively small way on a purely experimental scale in various parts of the country, they made these experiments pay, thus proving that cotton-growing in the Sudan could be made exceedingly profitable, and that, if any one syndicate or group could, by private enterprise, daring, and ability help the Government to exploit such potential territories as the Gezira, that group was the Sudan Plantations Syndicate itself. Having proved which, they ipso facto reaped the natural reward. Today, if we may say so, they are still on the threshold of their career; ten years hence they will be among the most powerful and influential organizations in Africa, and certainly the largest cotton-growing and marketing organization in the world.

We have not dealt here with figures and statistics. . . . Suffice it that the experimental stage is over, that by next July the minor irrigation canals for 300,000 acres will have had to be dug, that plowing will begin by next October, and that in 1925 the Makkar Dam, being constructed by the Sudan Government, will have been completed and water begin to flow down the new channels into the prepared fields. This latter work is itself stupendous, and were it not for the ceaseless energy of the company's staff on the spot it would be nigh impossible. But we can rely on its being done to time, and then will begin the real career of the syndicate. It cannot be other than successful. For, as stated, the foundations have been too well built for failure.

In conclusion, we must frankly admit that for the men at the head of the Plantations Syndicate, who nursed it from its infancy sixteen years ago, and are now looking ahead into a land of waving cotton fields, we have the very greatest admiration. Imaginative and undaunted, diplomatic and able business men, organizers and men of tireless activity, they have created, or assisted in creating, a new Sudan beside which

THE etchers represented are outstanding leaders in their field. They are of no one school. They are neither all "modern" nor all "conservative." They were selected chiefly because of their Americanness and their wide range. The work of no one of them resembles that of another (either of this or of any other group). They are in the fullest and best sense, original and individual.

ERNEST HASKELL,

a master technician, represented in this set by "Sentinels of North Creek," is perhaps the closest student of the art of etching in this county. We are extremely fortunate in having one of his latest plates, a marvel of clean line, economy of means of expression and rhythmic design. He frankly admits the debt he owes to Rembrandt and Leonardo.

PEGGY BACON,

in "The Promenade Deck" (the single dry point of the set) reveals herself as a most penetrating depicter of character. A shoe by her needle point tells the story of its wearer. There is wit and biting satire in her populous plate and a wealth of keen kindly fun.

JOHN MARIN'S

"Brooklyn Bridge" will inevitably offend, intrigue, startle and delight. It is a characteristic piece of work, defiant of academic standards, pulsing with desire, quivering with emotion, tragically sure and unsure at the same time. This plate is a synthesis of sensation—the artist's own and his contemporaries.

HAYES MILLER,

one of the most thoughtful and thought-provoking of American artist, contributes "Play," a study of three nudes, a woman and two children. There is a stark profundity, a serene dignity, an almost austere sincerity about Hays Miller's work that marks him as a kind of ironic modern Ryder, aloof, alone mysterious.

EDWARD HOPPER,

whose "Night Shadows" is included in this set, is a finder of beauty in the seemingly commonplace. Robustly American, he knows how to make even the supposedly hideous, gabled house of the 70's sing with design. Light (as in "Night Shadows"—perhaps his finest single plate) plays an important part in all his work.

JOHN SLOAN

lover of cities, Dickens-like Chronicler of American life, also contributes a "best" plate, "The Bandit's Cave"—a Greenwich Village night scene, wherein hesitating maidens are being urged by their escort to enter the alluring door. This plate is not only a superlative example of etching, it is a rich harmony of design in characterization, in form, in depth and in feeling.

SIX ETCHINGS

Incomparable Christmas Gifts

ORIGINALS — NOT REPRODUCTIONS: EACH PROOF PRINTED BY PETER J. PLATT ON HAND-MADE VAN GELDER PAPER, SIGNED BY THE ARTIST, OFFERED WITH

THE NEW REPUBLIC

At an Incredibly Small Cost

$9.00

THE difficulty with this offer is not to explain, but to refrain. For in The New Republic's alluring list (which includes New Republic editions of the Wells' Outline, Strachey's Queen Victoria, and Van Loon) there has never been an announcement even approaching this one. Yet overstatement is almost difficult in face of the facts—the foremost of which (alone amply sufficient to testify to the quality of these etchings) is the names of the six artists themselves.

For those who know American etching, this is enough. An original by any one of this sextet is generally regarded as a collector's prize. Here is an opportunity to know and to own the original work of six outstanding American artists at an incredibly small cost.

Look at it Money-Wise. No price is placed on this set of six. It cannot be bought without The New Republic. Nor can the individual proofs. Their value can be approximated only by referring to a reputable dealer. He will tell you that a single original by any one of these artists brings anywhere from $15.00 to $40.00. The plates used here range in size from 4⅝ x 6 to 9 x 11 inches. They are printed in a relatively large edition. "Rarity value" is thereby eliminated. What you then have is intrinsic merit —ranging all the way from the Rembrandt-like perfection of the Haskell to the lyric impressionism of the Marin. The edition is limited. Acceptances will be filled in the order of their receipt. Act now for Christmas giving.

The New REPUBLIC
421 West 21st Street
New York City

I enclose $9.00 for one year of The New Republic and the six etchings.

Name ..... City .....

Street ..... State .....

For $12.00 you may have a two years' subscription or two annual subscriptions with the etchings. You may send The New Republic for one year to two friends or take one for your own subscription and make a gift of the other. The New Republic has prepared an attractive Christmas card which will be sent to the recipient of your gift if you request it. Both etchings and magazine postpaid in the United States. Add $1.00 for Canada, $1.50 foreign for each subscription.

N 12-17

the fields of Georgia and Alabama pale. They are carrying out, or assisting thereat, the dreams of Cromer, who, according to Mr. Eckstein, dreamed that one day railways would be constructed from Suakim to Atbara, from Khartum to El Obeid, from Atbara to Kassala; that one or two dams would be built on the Blue Nile; and that the Gezira Plain would be developed. . . .

France Sets an Example

THE treaty by which France and Switzerland agree to submit to arbitration their controversy regarding the special position of the border provinces is printed below as translated from L'Europe Nouvelle for November 22. Editorial comment on this action will be found on page 666 of this issue; a fuller summary of the dispute, by Robert Dell, was printed in The Nation for February 9, 1921.

Whereas France and Switzerland have not been able to agree upon the interpretation to be given to Article 435, paragraph 2, of the Treaty of Versailles, with its annexes, and it has been impossible by direct negotiation to reach the agreement there referred to,

The President of the French Republic and the Swiss Federal Council have resolved to resort to arbitration to define this interpretation and to settle the various questions involved in the execution of paragraph 2 of Article 435 of the Treaty of Versailles;

And, desiring to reach a contract expressing the equal will of France and of Switzerland loyally to conform to their international obligations, they have named as their plenipotentiaries:

For the President of the French Republic, M. Edouard Herriot, president of the Council of Ministers and Minister of Foreign Affairs; M. Henri Fromageot, jurisconsult of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs;

For the Swiss Federal Council, M. Alphonse Dunant, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Paris; M. Paul Logoz, professor at the University of Geneva;

Who, having communicated their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. It shall be the function of the Permanent Court of International Justice to say whether Article 435, paragraph 2, of the Treaty of Versailles abrogates or is intended to abrogate, between France and Switzerland, the stipulations of the protocol of the conferences of Paris of November 3, 1815, of the Treaty of Paris of November 20, 1815, of the Treaty of Turin of March 16, 1816, and of the manifesto of the court of accounts of Sardinia of September 9, 1829, relating to the customs and economic structure of the free zones of Upper Savoy and of the Pays de Gex, while taking account of all facts precedent to the Treaty of Versailles, such as the establishment of federal customs in 1849, which may be regarded by the court as pertinent.

The High Contracting Parties agree that the court, when it has completed its deliberations shall, before issuing any decree, grant to the two parties a suitable period to settle with each other the new regime for the aforesaid territories, under such conditions as they may judge opportune, as provided by Article 435, paragraph 2, of the aforesaid treaty. This period may be prolonged at the request of the two parties.

ART. 2. If no convention shall be concluded and ratified within the period set, it shall be the function of the court, by a single decree rendered in accordance with Article 58 of the statute of the court, to pronounce its decision upon the question formulated in Article 1 above, and to settle, for a period which it shall determine, and taking account of the present circumstances, all the questions involved in the application of paragraph 2 of Article 435 of the Treaty of Versailles.

If the decree provides for the free importation of goods or for reduced customs rates on goods crossing the federal custom

Our best story teller here tells his best story

SHERWOOD ANDERSON

Drawn by C. B. Falls after photo by Alfred Stieglitz

Third printing in press $3.00

A STORY TELLER'S STORY

N. Y. TIMES:—Probably unequalled in our recent literature for austerity of moral courage and sincerity of conviction. . . . A book which should be read by every intelligent and reflective American. —LLOYD MORRIS

N. Y. SUN:—Stays in the memory as a thing perfect of its kind. . . . An outstanding contribution to the spiritual history of the times. —ERNEST BOYD

N. Y. EVENING POST:—If we were asked for one American book of the year that should by all means be read, our choice would unhesitatingly be Mr. Anderson's autobiography. —HERSCHEL BRICKELL

The SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE:—It exhibits ever and again the fullest powers of one of the truly creative writers of our time. —WILLIAM ROSE BENÉT

N. Y. EVENING POST and Philadelphia PUBLIC LEDGER:—This book—call it novel, autobiography, what you will—seems to me by far the most significant book of the year. —WALTER YUST

N. Y. WORLD:—It is a document of first importance for those interested in the growth of American letters. . . . Its warmth and humanity make it a great American book. —LAURENCE STALLINGS

The NEW REPUBLIC:—A story of spiritual adventure, a fascinating and moving revelation of the artist's mind. —ROBERT MORSS LOVETT

N. Y. HERALD-TRIBUNE:—It is a book which stirs thought and imagination. . . . He has a shining sence of humor. —SINCLAIR LEWIS

B. W. HUEBSCH Inc., Publisher
30 Irving Place New York City
THIS MARK ON GOOD BOOKS

CROWDED OUT

Nobody ain't Christmas shoppin'
Fur his stockin'!
Nobody ain't cotch no tukkey,
Nobody ain't bake no pie,
Nobody's laid nuthin' by,
"Santy" ain't got nuthin' hid
Fur his Mammy's little kid.

Seem like eve'body rushin'
An' er crushin',
Crowdin' shops an' jammin' trolleys,
Buyin' shoes an' shirts an' toys
Fur de white folks' girls an' boys,
But no hobby-horse ain't rockin'
By his little wore-out stockin'.

He ain't quar'lin', recollec',
He don't spec
Nuthin'—hit's his not expectin'
Makes his Mammy wish, O Laws!
Fur a Po' Folks' Santa Claus,
Totin' any kind er toy
Fur his Mammy's honey-boy!

Subscription from our many friends towards Colored Children's Christmas Tree and Dinner for the poor Colored children will be most gratefully received by

ROSALIE M. JONAS,

Hotel Rutledge, 30th St. & Lexington Ave.

or the French custom lines, this importation cannot be settled without the consent of the two parties.

ART. 3. Each of the High Contracting Parties shall deposit with the clerk of the court, in as many copies as Article 34 of the regulations of the court prescribes:

(a) Within six months of the ratification of the present contract, its Memoir upon the question formulated in Article 1, paragraph 1, with certified and like copies of all supporting documents and papers;

(b) Within five months from the expiration of the preceding period, its Counter-Memoir, with certified and like copies of all supporting documents and papers;

(c) Within five months from the expiration of the preceding period, its Reply, with certified and like copies of all supporting documents and papers, and its Final Conclusions.

ART. 4. If the court, in accordance with Article 2, is called upon to settle all the questions involved in the execution of Article 435, paragraph 2, of the Treaty of Versailles, it will inform the parties of the proper periods within which to produce such documents, suggestions, and observations as they may wish to submit to the court in connection with such settlement, as well as to reply to it.

Furthermore, in order to facilitate the said settlement the court may be asked by one or the other party to delegate one or three of its members to undertake studies on the spot and to hear all the interested parties.

ART. 5. The present contract shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Paris as soon as may be.

E. HERRIOT, HENRI FROMAGEOT, DUNANT, PAUL LOGOZ

Done in duplicate at Paris, October 30, 1924

In covering letters Messrs. Dunant and Herriot at the same time assured each other (1) that until the court made its decision they would not change the status quo on the frontiers; (2) that they had no objection to the court communicating semi-officially to both parties "all useful indications" regarding the result of its deliberations; (3) that the "present circumstances" referred to in Article 2 had the same meaning as the same words used in Article 435 of the Treaty of Versailles.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's correspondent in Russia, has just completed a first-hand study of conditions in the Caucasian Soviet republics.

AGNES D. WARBASSE has been active for many years in the cooperative movement in this country.

W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS is well-known as lecturer, author, and editor of the Crisis. His article on Georgia: Invisible Empire State will appear in a forthcoming issue of The Nation.

IDA TREAT is an American living in Paris, who has frequently contributed to The Nation.

R. F. DIBBLE is the author of "Strenuous Americans" and of numerous biographical essays.

FRANK J. KLINGBERG is chairman of the department of history at the University of California.

GLEN MULLIN, artist and writer, is the author of "The Smoky Trail."

Those Who Recognize

that a play excellent enough to extract unusually high praise even from a Nation critic has something behind it deserving encouragement should communicate at once with the

Cherry Lane Players, Inc.
40 Commerce Street, New York
Telephone: Spring 2480

See Nation drama criticism of December 3rd.

Please inform me of the plans and purposes of your group of players.

Name .....

Address .....

City .....State .....

Immediate response will be rewarded.

WALDO FRANK

makes it possible for readers of The Nation to put a mystery story on their Christmas Gift-Book list and on their own reading list as well. The book is which adds the thrill of beauty to the thrill of horror and suspense. Its mystery is not a mere trick of plot mechanics but opens for us, for a spelled interval, the whole mystery of existence.

CHALK FACE

"The book is a fine piece of writing, with novel ideas, well expressed, and artistically executed."—Dr. Joseph Collins, New York Sun.

"The evil man with the white head of CHALK FACE is assuredly in the category of those 'other ghosts' that have horrified the souls of such writers as Dostoyevsky and Melville."—Gorham B. Munson, N. Y. Evening Post.

$2.00

Boni & Liveright, 61 West 48th Street New York City

B&L

GOOD BOOKS

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c.
10 Tablets 40c.

Midol
for HEADACHE

CHIROPRACTIC A distinctly new and independent system of healing, the success of which has no parallel in the history of therapeutics. Our course of study is recognized by State Boards of Chiropractic Examiners. Our faculty has been carefully selected and represents the very best of the profession. Tuition fees are moderate. Evening Sessions—write or call for further particulars—Dep't N.

THE BRONX SCHOOL OF CHIROPRACTIC
13-19 Astor Place New York City
C. E. C. OSWALD, A.B., D.C., Pres. "Near Wanamaker's."

Nation Dinners
For Nation Subscribers and Their Guests.
Dec. 12—Is The Press Kept?
Jan. 23—Is Monogamy Feasible?
Feb. 13—Do Americans Speak English?
Telephone Whitehall 7730 for reservations.

The Fifth Avenue Restaurant

EXCLUSIVELY A LUNCHEON AND EVENING BANQUET RESORT ON THE GROUND FLOOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING, 200 FIFTH AVENUE TEL. GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907 INCL.

THEODORE KEMM, Proprietor

LORD WILLIAM THOMSON

late Secy. for Air Defence in the British Labor Government will make his first public appearance at COOPER UNION, Dec. 29, 8:15 P. M.

500 tickets for sale at $1 and 1100 tickets at 25c each under the auspices of the Foreign Policy Assn., National Headquarters, 9 East 45th St., N. Y. C.

—Further announcement on page 687—

Books?

Will you please—EVERYBODY—write us the name of the bookseller from whom you purchase books. We have something of benefit to communicate to such bookshops. Thank you for your cooperation. Address The Nation, 20 Vesey Street.

STRANDED in cactus hills after three years recovering health, easterner, depositor of defunct bank, seeks immediate employment: small-town and metropolitan experience of 15 years in mail-order and retail advertising, as analyst, writer and executive. Will tackle anything however keen the competition. Has a weakness for newspaper work. Age 36; speaks Spanish. Address Box 245, care of The Nation.

HOFFMANN SCHOOL
for Individual Development
156 Fort Washington Avenue, New York City
DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL
Rebecca Hoffmann, Director
Dr. Nathan Peyser, Educational Director
Children 4-10 years Bus Service

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE, Cooper Union, 8 o'clock
Friday Eve., Dec. 19. Everett Dean Martin
"Was the Renaissance a Mass Movement?"
Sunday Eve., Dec. 21... William M. Salter
"What is Americanism?"
Tuesday Eve., Dec. 23.....No Meeting
Christmas Holidays.

STEINWAY
THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

THE NATION will be glad to pay the current price plus postage for the following copies, stock of which has been completely exhausted. Please communicate with the Circulation Department:

February 14, 1923	October 31, 1923
February 21, 1923	November 14, 1923
April 11, 1923	February 13, 1924
August 15, 1923	April 30, 1924

Weekends?

At what hotel or inn do you stop when you leave the city for weekends or for a short winter vacation? The Nation has had several inquiries of this nature lately and would like to know what places appeal to its readers. We should appreciate hearing from you. Address A. B., The Nation, 20 Vesey St., New York.

Your Christmas List

Let the Channel bookshop help you with it. We have books for every taste. Christmas cards, too, for those in search of "something different." In this new bookshop your own preferences are sympathetically followed. Come in person or order by mail or telephone. Open evenings, also—except on Wednesdays. Tel. Murray Hill 4864.

THE CHANNEL BOOKSHOP
279 Park Avenue New York
(Between 47th and 48th Streets)

German Books, Etchings
W. BEYER
113 West 43rd Street, New York City

COSMOPOLITAN STENO - TRANSLATION BUREAU, 154 Nassau Street, Suite 925, New York. Beekman 1552. Translations, stenography, copying, mimeographing, circularizing, in RUSSIAN and other languages.

"A corner of old Russia in New York"—
THE RUSSIAN INN
33 West 37th St., 'phone Fitzroy 6567
LUNCHEON TEA DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1924 No. 3103

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 693

EDITORIALS:

Samuel Gompers 696
League Ahoy! 697
As It Will Be Soon 697
An American "Who Was Who" 698

RADIO OR NEWSPAPER—CAN BOTH SURVIVE? By Marc A. Rose 699

ENGLAND AND EGYPT: THE RIGHTS AND WRONGS. By Henry W. Nevinson 701

THE ONE-PARTY SYSTEM. By William Hard 703

QUAKER REVOLUTIONARIES:

The Death Battalion of Youth. By Mollie Best 706

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 708

CORRESPONDENCE 708

BOOKS, MUSIC, PLAYS:

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 710
A Nietzschean Novel. By Joseph Wood Krutch 710
Frank Cobb. By Lewis S. Gannett 711
The Genealogy of a Genre. By Carl Van Doren 711
"The Land of the Fathers." By Dorothy Brewster 712
Benjamin Constant. By Arnold Whitridge 712
Books in Brief 713
The Nation's Poetry Prize 713

PUCCINI AND FAURÉ. By Pitts Sanborn 714

DRAMA:

Pure Theater. By Joseph Wood Krutch 715

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

New Life in the Law. By Frithjof Toksvig 716
Danish Disarmament 716
Russia Answers Britain 717
Nevinson on Morel 718

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor MARK VAN DOREN, Literary Editor

Contributing Editors

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE GREAT DINNER given to Owen D. Young in New York on December 11, in recognition of his services in Europe as a member of the Dawes Commission, was a well-merited honor. Giving high praise to General Dawes for his work, which he described as the "selling end" of this business operation as opposed to the "manufacturing" in which he and the others labored, Mr. Young made no extravagant claims for the plan itself. He stated frankly that he took a middle ground as to its merits, between the extreme views in favor of or against the plan. "The members of our committee," he said, "well knew that human minds are too small to comprehend such great forces and to make a plan which, unchanged, would be permanently effective to control them." That is altogether refreshing. The Nation has never taken the view that the plan reduced the German people to slavery, but it has feared that it put undue burdens upon them. Mr. Young would probably be the first to admit that the plan is very much of a compromise. But it has started things going in Europe, averted bankruptcy and social disintegration, removed much ill-will, ended the Franco-German deadlock, and done away (for the time, at least) with the threat of European war. We are profoundly indebted to Mr. Young for making it clear that the Dawes Plan cannot endure unchanged. That merely adds to the debt which not only America but the world owes him. In saying that, we do not abate a jot of our belief that the worst feature of the Dawes Plan is that it gives American financiers a domination over Europe which may have the most serious consequences.

SO THE SENATE has voted the House bill appropriating $110,000,000 for the "modernization" of the navy. Congress might better throw this vast sum into the Atlantic Ocean. There it would create no ill-will, while doing the country as much good as will its expenditure on the fleet. The bill now goes to Mr. Coolidge for his signature, and we have no doubt that he will sign it. Did he not say that he was for an adequate army and navy, although warning the country against listening to stories that other countries were arming against us? Our jingoes have not listened to his admonitions. Mr. William B. Shearer, our latest "naval expert," has solemnly and publicly warned the inimitable Solomon Stanwood Menken and his National Security League that Japan is preparing for war with us; the Navy League has impugned the truthfulness of a statement issued by the Japanese Navy Department; and the fleet maneuvers in Hawaii are not to be stopped although Japan is the theoretic "enemy" against whom we are to maneuver. On top of this comes this criminally wasteful and dangerous expenditure of $110,000,000 more on the navy. This will have its prompt echo in England and Japan, our only possible antagonists on the sea. If we do not have war with Japan within the next five years it will not be the fault of the preparedness advocates. They, by the way, are very indignant when peace-lovers refuse to follow the wishes of authority; they now reserve to themselves the right to flout the admonitions of the President to desist from war-creating propaganda. Loyalty to officialdom is, in their view, the duty of the other fellow.

TREASON IS SPREADING so rapidly in our army and navy that we heartily wish our navy and security leagues would devote themselves to ferreting it out, leaving the condition of the navy alone—no two experts have ever yet agreed on that. Here is General Robert Lee Bullard, one of our three commanders of armies in France, quoted as saying that one German soldier equaled three Allied. That is going too far. Coming as it does on top of the clean bill of health which Admiral Sims gave the German submarine officers, we must ask where this will stop. What is to become of our cherished belief that the cowardly German had to be driven to the front and chained to his machine-guns, and that any American sergeant could kill twenty squareheads single-handed? Perish the thought! Keep all the old fictions alive, or there may come a disposition to query the war itself, its origin, its honesty, the relative moral positions of the adversaries, the worthwhileness of its outcome. The old tone rings in the dispatches now coming out of Spain charging the Moroccans with mutilating the bodies of the Spanish prisoners and Spanish dead, with subjecting their captors to torture, with chaining them to stakes, blinding them by confinement in dungeons and starving them to death, etc., etc. That has the familiar ring of world-war days; that is the patriotic way to talk of one's enemies and to keep alive the fighting qualities. Let us have lies and then again lies, for henchmen of the war-god can carry on in no other way.

MR. MELLON COMES back to his muttons in his annual report: that is, the reduction of the income taxes, especially the surtaxes of the very rich, of whom he is one of the richest. Naturally he rejoices in the defeat of the La Follette forces, since they were particularly opposed to his policies and attacked him personally with a great deal of heat. Now Mr. Mellon still wants to reduce the inheritance taxes and to abolish the gift tax which has only just been passed. With some reason he declares it to be unworkable. With his reasoning that it "handicaps business" we cannot at all agree. The one object and purpose of Mr. Mellon's official existence is to "free" business. He is opposed to income-tax publicity because he thinks it hurts business, and to tax-exempt securities because they keep money out of business. He wants income-tax rates down because—according to Mr. Mellon—they hamper business, and when the facts go dead against him he is just a little more eager than ever to cut the rates. We wonder if he is able to sleep at all when he thinks of the perils that menace business. But we cheerfully admit that when he lies awake nights he can take solid satisfaction in the excellent work the Treasury has done under him in refunding our obligations, in helping to reduce expenses, and generally to put our public finances in order.

HULLABALOOING ABOUT THE INTER-ALLIED debts bids fair to become as popular a political pastime in Great Britain as it has long been in the United States. Winston Churchill is now making loud noises about the impropriety of letting any of England's debtors off. The Nation knows no good reason why France should pay her debt to the United States any sooner than she pays her prior debt to Great Britain, and if our Mr. Mellon were getting away with any such magic it might be well for England's Mr. Churchill to stop it. Mr. Churchill, however, is not content to demand that France pay England as soon as she pays us. He wants her to pay everybody, in particular to pay England as well as England is paying us. But political speeches do not produce money where money does not exist, and some of Winston Churchill's speeches seem more likely to dry up the sources than to increase them. An intelligent creditor naturally adjusts terms of payment in accordance with the conditions of his bankrupt debtor, and it does not help much if sound debtors cry out that they were not treated so considerately. Mr. Churchill believes that France should not get better terms than England did. In fact, she will—because she is less able to pay. If he objects to France paying on terms which might be possible, the result will probably be to stop France paying anything at all—either to the United States or to Great Britain.

THAT ZINOVIEV LETTER refuses to stay out of the news. England's Tory Government says its members have no doubt of its authenticity, but they refuse to explain the reasons for their faith. This is the famous letter, alleged to have been signed by Zinoviev, the president of the Third Internationale, and Arthur McManus, leader of the British Communists, last October, virtually appealing for armed revolution. Four days before the election it was printed in the English newspapers and it undoubtedly cost the Labor Party hundreds of thousands of votes. Ramsay MacDonald, away from London campaigning, at first accepted the word of the permanent officials of the Foreign Office that it was genuine; he now doubts it. The Tory Daily Mail, it appears, had the letter before the Government, and the British Government has admitted that it has never had in its possession, or even seen, the original of the letter. All it has ever had is an alleged photostat copy, and Mr. Austen Chamberlain has hinted in the House of Commons that he doubted the authenticity of McManus's signature. Both McManus and Zinoviev have denounced it as a forgery. The Soviet Government has suggested reference of the question of its authenticity to neutral experts. Mr. Chamberlain replies that his mind is made up and he will do nothing more. That leaves the British Government in as cowardly a position as the French Government was in when the Dreyfus case began.

THERE IS A NEW MAGAZINE for people to buy before they board the train. But its contents will never be new. Doubtless many a commuter will glance at a cover of the Golden Book and, seeing in the usual fashion there the names of a dozen or so star contributors, never realize that most of these stars have gone out—that the contributions come mainly from the grave. The first number of the Golden Book, just published, contains serials by Stevenson, Gaboriau, and Maupassant; short stories by Tolstoi, O. Henry, Kipling, Bret Harte, Mark Twain, and H. C. Bunner; a play by Anatole France; an essay by Montaigne; travel sketches by Sir Richard Burton and Sir Harry Johnston; and poems by Burns, Villon, William Dunbar, Christina Rossetti, and Emily Dickinson. It is to be hoped that the commuter will read on. For he will make the acquaintance of Mark Twain's jumping frog, of Anatole France's man who married a dumb wife, of Bunner's Hector, and of Gaboriau's Lecoq, to mention no more. The experiment is a bold one, the outcome of which will be awaited with some eagerness by those who have always suspected that tons of older literature went unread because unseen. The place for a classic may be in a bound book; yet numerous unprofessional readers do not know how or where to buy books, and even professional readers have to admit sometimes that they have no text of "The Notorious Jumping Frog"—for instance—about them. The editors of the Golden Book are particularly to be envied, however. All of their contributions will be worth reading; there will be no painful letters to write, and no rejection slips.

EVEN THOUGH WE have not yet been included among the 500 members of the Monday Opera Club, or even among its 2,500 invited guests, we have our opinions. Alexandra Feodorovna is a grand duchess and the sister of a queen and the wife of a pretender, and she doubtless exudes the dignity and good breeding which New York society intends to import from Europe. For aught we care she may rejoice in all the presidential suites and special trains that society ladies wish to engage for her. All we object to is the philosophy lurking behind this expensive importation.

The committee of the Monday Opera Club has this to say: If dignity and good breeding are not restored "there will be a social revolution here like the French Revolution." So the grand duchess was invited to come to America. Now there are two things at least which help revolutions along: the flaunting of social differences by pretentiousness and pomp and the intriguing of discredited royalist émigrés. The husband of this grand duchess thinks he is the Czar of Russia, and since Russia inconveniently thinks otherwise he has set up a little private Russian court in Coburg. But even Bavaria doubts if the Grand Duke Cyril's court should be maintained in a country at friendly peace with Russia and may ask him to move to more monarchical shores—perhaps the United States. At a New York reception to the grand duchess the other day Russian royalists knelt at her feet and Boris Brasol hailed her as the Czarina. If we were worried lest a French or a Russian revolution were lurking under the plush sofas of New York society, we would not seek to avert it by hiring an unemployed Russian grand duchess.

HAS THE PRACTICAL JOKE passed from the American scene? Regretfully we answer: Almost. In rural regions this peculiarly national type of humor still survives, at least in such parts of the country as have not been too much disturbed by progress. But in our cities public opinion and the police have pretty nearly done it to death. New York City has just lost its last notable practical joker at the age of seventy-five, and we do not look to see him replaced. Some of the pranks of Brian G. Hughes were simple horse-play, as when he put up signs on his land: "Not for Sale, B. G. Hughes, America," or when he set all Asbury Park to digging in the sand by pretending to have found $50,000. At other times he came close to satire, as when he "dolled up" an alley cat purchased for ten cents, hired a uniformed valet to attend it, and won a blue ribbon at a cat show. Later he just missed doing as well with a worn-out street-car nag which he entered in the horse show. The practical joke is part of the individualistic and pioneer America which is almost gone. It belongs to an era when our humor was amateur—when everyone rolled his own or his neighbor beat him to it. It dies of loneliness or fright as our fun-making and humor are professionalized and syndicated.

WHEN A WOMAN decides to keep her name after marriage she is frequently criticized for making so much ado about nothing; but when she seeks later to obtain a passport under her own name, or open an account in a conservative bank, or draw her pay from a government job, her name suddenly becomes of the utmost importance to all the authorities; the State Department refuses her a passport, the president of the bank will not honor her signature, the government department will not make out a check to so misguided and miscalled a female. Precedent has been upset, however, in the case of Miss Helena Normanton, English barrister, who was admitted as a member of the Middle Temple in 1919, a few hours after the enactment of the Sex Disqualification Removal Act. She was married in 1921 and continued to practice under her own name; but when, a year later, she was called to the bar, bitter opposition arose among serious legal authorities. The Joint Council of the Four Inns of Court solemnly sat upon the question for eight months or so and finally decided that Miss Normanton had a right to use her own name if she chose. Last September she applied, under her hard-won name, to the British Foreign Office for a passport. It was refused on grounds of public policy. She submitted a brief citing the arguments and precedents that had convinced the jurists of the Inns of Court. The Foreign Office considered the evidence and granted the passport. This will not, of course, alter the attitude of the American State Department which has refused passports in like cases, apparently for reasons of tender sentiment without reference to any law. But American precedent has been broken none the less, for the American consul in London has given Miss Normanton a visa and thus has planted the seal of the State Department of the United States on an unsanctified and improper "maiden" name.

CHARLES PATRICK SWEENEY, cut down in his early thirties, had all the Irishman's love of a good time, zest for a fight, and capacity for spending himself without measure in a cause in which his heart was enlisted. His sense of humor never left him, nor his good-fellowship; as a journalist or propagandist he could attack and attack hard and yet love, and be loved by, his opponents. He had many adversaries but few enemies. When this country entered the World War Mr. Sweeney left the Philadelphia Public Ledger and was attached first to the Committee on Public Information and then to the War Labor Board. Later he investigated working-class education in Europe for the Department of Labor. Upon his return to the United States he did publicity work for the Irish Republic and Farmer-Labor Party, and put before the country the report of twelve distinguished lawyers condemning Attorney General Palmer's illegal drive against radicals; in 1921 he went to the New York World, where he did notable work in the exposure of the Ku Klux Klan. "Charley" Sweeney was a frequent and valued contributor to the columns of The Nation, and in his death the liberal cause loses a valiant and lovable champion.

MUSSOLINI AND KING GEORGE have this in common: they both collect stamps. King George is known to have one of the finest stamp collections in the world, and Mussolini must be a philatelist, else why should he have made his name so beloved to the stamp fanatic? When Italian troops landed in Corfu Mussolini rushed to order new postage stamps. The fact that his troops were out of Corfu before the stamps were off the printing-presses did not disturb him; collectors bought the stamps just as eagerly. Now he has a new trick. Instead of advertising military training camps in the cancelations, as is the wont of the peace-loving American post-office department, Mussolini has cannily enlarged the size of his stamps and taken to selling advertising space on them. The Italian fifty-centesimi stamps now cross the water with all sorts of gay additions to the sober face of Victor Emmanuel. "Un grafono Columbia con una lira al giorno—cataloghi gratis," say some of them in easily translatable Italian; and another advertises a white-goods sale in Rome. If only King George had equal dictatorial powers what a boon he might be to his subjects—they must grow weary of his somber Windsor visage repeated eternally on stamps of every denomination.

Gompers—The End of an Era

SAMUEL GOMPERS was sufficiently great to encompass and express an era in American labor. For over forty years, even toward his end, he voiced the hopes and fears, the reforms and the bigotries of the craft phase of the movement he headed. It is a short view which considers him merely the conservative chieftain of a machine oligarchy; he was a movement embodied in one man. From the mildest to the most rabid dissenter, all knew that he was the head of the organized expression of labor. And they all acted on the slogan, Get Gompers and Labor Is Yours. His personal history is not merely the story of his own successes, but of his opponents' failures. One can get a more significant picture of his rivals—Powderly, Debs, De Leon, and Foster—by learning all about Gompers than by knowing all about them.

Gompers's orthodoxy was distinguished by two main traits, probably reducible to one: his naive self-righteousness and his chronic pugnacity. Intellectually he was but mediocre, a lesser man than Frey or Perkins or others of his associates. When he ventured into philosophical speculations about labor he was sophomoric. The absurd backwardness of his jealous craft separatism, forever entangled in fratricidal "jurisdictional disputes" while industry was rapidly amalgamating, was only too obvious. In fact, his intra-labor tactics, by which he maintained his machine and his power, were always directed against those sufficiently thoughtful to have a philosophy of labor as against his own hand-to-mouth opportunism. He was so much of a realist in his long guerrilla campaign that any "ism" antagonized him. All his life he fought the "intellectuals"—within and without the labor movement. He fought the anarcho-socialists of the last century; then the present socialist movement, as well as all partisans of independent political action by labor, no matter how mild. He fought the I. W .W. and all the rest of the syndicalist schools; finally, of course, he fought the communists. Toward the end of his life this anti-intellectualist complex developed into unreasonable hatred of anyone with a formal training who took an interest in labor otherwise than as "expert" in his hire. There is little doubt that since the war leadership has been passing to the New Unionists, who are accepting the essential structure of capitalist management, and are trying to work within it by developing a sort of trade-union capitalism. But even that proved too much for Gompers, in spite of his belief in the framework of capitalism. And he fought labor's entry into finance, into business and managerial cooperation with capital, almost as bitterly as he fought the Reds. He was born to fight at close quarters—for more wages, fewer hours, better work rules; through the weapon of the strike and the armistice of contract.

Yet for his time and place Gompers was essentially right. The visionaries could not scout and strike effectively in the primitive battles of our industrial frontier. Before the war American labor could not be led by philosopher-kings because its culture was necessarily simple. Gompers was king, but he was no philosopher. He gave the impression of wisdom because he was so uncannily shrewd and so vastly experienced.

As sheer fighter Gompers was unequaled not merely in the history of American labor but in the history of the entire republic. His tactics were perfect. One by one he outwitted opponents, chasing them off the labor field and leaving them stranded in the desert to the Left of the mass movement. True fighter that he was, he never admitted to himself for a moment that he might be wrong. He had the fighter's cold and merciless fury. Yet he had something in him which warned him when his enemies expressed a real, mass disaffection. When the craft movement became almost self-defeatingly "autonomous" and the radicals were howling for amalgamation, Gompers got the progressives to fight, successfully, for the industrial departments in the Federation. When, last summer, the rank-and-file cry for independent political action seemed too insistent, he "non-partisanly" indorsed La Follette. Had La Follette won a strong congressional bloc, Gompers would have won with the winner. When La Follette lost, Gompers hailed a victory for his "nonpartisan policy." He always fought with this Heads-I-Win-Tails-You-Lose shrewdness. Yet he always fought essentially incorruptibly; what Royce called Loyalty to Loyalty Gompers gave to the labor movement as he saw it. Much has been said about his fanatical fire-eating in war time, which seemed to transcend his devotion to labor. This is only half true. There was much craftiness in his frenzy. He felt about trade unionism much as Lincoln felt about the Union. Anything to strengthen it! Whether he actually strengthened it—is another question.

A man of his blind self-righteousness and of such cunning alacrity could not stand the collaboration of strong characters. Unconsciously Gompers always surrounded himself with lesser men. And now that he is no more American labor faces the jealous interregnum of a coterie of feudal chiefs whose master is gone. Were it not for the growing circumstance that our labor movement is becoming too intricately and significantly a part of the national life such a period might prove fatal. But leadership is bound to drift increasingly to such men as Johnston, Hillman, Stone, and other progressives within and without the American Federation of Labor. It takes little boldness to prophesy that the next half century will see all the tendencies against which Gompers fought with his splendid ferocity enacted into some sort of progressive labor philosophy.

No sketch of the dead leader would be complete without mention of his fine human qualities. Some one said that "nothing human is alien to the Jew." This certainly was true of Gompers. To those who worked with him or agreed with him or were in no way entangled in his tactics he was abidingly kind with that courtesy which the Germans so untranslatably call Herzensbildung. He really did have the rare magnetism of one who had the genius to synchronize his own personality with the fortunes of a cause.

The obituary notices emphasize his rise from lowly beginnings, his terrible struggle with adversity, his death as a poor man. Of course Gompers was born in the indescribable squalor of Whitechapel and not in fashionable Mayfair. Of course he went to work at the age of ten. Of course he had to work years at his trade as cigarmaker in the daytime in order to support himself as President of the American Federation of Labor at night. Of course Gompers had these tremendous advantages. Else greatness could never have touched him as it did.

League Ahoy!

ENGLAND has resoundingly slapped the League of Nations in the face and returned to a policy of impenitent imperialism—that is the meaning of the diplomatic antics at Rome. With a "Mind your own business, please," she has turned her back squarely upon policies which Conservative, Liberal, and Labor ministers had developed and maintained.

It was a Conservative Prime Minister who invented the "independent" kingdom of Egypt, and if the world still takes that word "independent" seriously surely no Conservative Englishman should complain. But the present attitude of the British Government, translated into simple English, is this: "We didn't mean it; and if anybody outside of England acts upon the assumption that we did mean seriously what we said two years ago, we'll knock his block off." On the day on which the Sirdar was assassinated England dispatched a note to the Powers warning them that her difficulties with Egypt were a private quarrel within the family, and that good manners required that neighbors should behave as if they did not hear the din. Since then she has gone a step further; the Irish treaty must not be registered with the League, she says, because Ireland is also within the family, and the treaty is not properly to be called international. Just how this can be squared with England's sponsorship of the Free State as an "independent" member of the League is not explained; thus far, apparently, no other member of the League has dared raise the question. We may trust the Irish, however, not to let the issue pass.

Meanwhile the League has received two other blows—the shelving of the so-called protocol, and the failure of the opium conferences. It took all of M. Briand's persuasive powers in the League Council at Rome to induce the British to agree to the diplomatic fiction that the protocol was not being rejected but merely required more prolonged study. Such forms deceive no one; the protocol is dead. That in itself might not be so ill, were it not that with it go the radiant hopes of a new European spirit which seemed so bright in October. The protocol was essentially a program to enforce peace, by military means if necessary; and The Nation has never believed that the path to peace is one of military power. The worst aspect of the present position is that the British newspapers contain plain hints that while England will draw back from any international agreement she might contract a special protective bond with France. The black days of secret understandings which brought on the European war are with us again. France and England have already agreed to give each other a free hand in their respective spheres in Africa—a development of the 1904 negotiations by which France dropped out of Egypt in return for a free hand in what has become known as French Morocco. Now France is to have Spanish Morocco, too, and no French voice will protest when England violates her own agreements with Egypt regarding the Sudan.

The opium situation is as discouraging. The American delegates went to the League's Geneva conference with a program of sweeping reforms, and in this program they were in general supported by the Asiatic delegates—the Persian, Turkish, Chinese, and Japanese—but opposed by the British and French, and by the gentlemen with such fine Oriental names as Campbell and Clayton who appeared to "represent" India. As a result of this opposition by the Powers which prate most of the "white man's burden" substantially nothing will be done.

All this leaves the League in a position from which the half-expected announcement that the United States will participate in its Conference on the Control of Traffic in Arms next May will hardly rescue it. It stands flouted by the Great Powers which have, in the main, dominated it, and it has not dared to protest. That, some of its friends will say, is the fault of the United States which has refused to join it. It is rather, we believe, the fault of the construction of the League out of the victors in the Great War. One by one, as they lost their real independence and submitted to Allied control, the lesser "enemy nations" have been admitted. Germany and Soviet Russia remain outside, and Germany's admission is planned only when, under the Dawes Plan, she has lost her freedom of action. A passionate desire for better things has at times animated the sessions of the Assembly of the League, but the Council, still dominated by France and England, has chilled every hope. Something is needed to shock the world out of the well-worn path which it is treading, and the League seems incapable of providing that shock.

As It Will Be Soon

CHARLOTTE, N. C., December 8.—A trust fund totaling $40,000,000 was created here today by James B. Duke, tobacco and power capitalist, with which to finance and maintain a vast educational institution for North Carolina to be known as Duke University. If Trinity College, at Durham, already the beneficiary of the Duke family many times, sees fit to change its name to Duke University, $6,000,000 will be spent in expanding it; otherwise the proposed Duke University will be located elsewhere in the State.

DURHAM, N. C., December 9.—Trinity College will comply with the conditions upon which the donation of James B. Duke to the college is based and the trustees will do all in their power to cooperate with the philanthropist in carrying out his ideas.—Press dispatches.

CHICAGO, December 1, 1930.—William Wrigley, the chewing-gum king, today announced that he had offered $75,000,000 to Northwestern University on condition that it change its name to Wrigley University and that of its medical school to Chicle College.

EVANSTON, December 12, 1930.—The president of Northwestern University today declared that its trustees would undoubtedly change its name as requested by William Wrigley. "The slightest wish of that great and good man who has done so much for the teeth, jaw muscles, and digestion of the American people will be our first consideration," he declared. "The name Chicle College especially appeals to me. I have often thought that our new-fledged doctors pay too little attention to the gastric juices. Thanks to this great philanthropy, Northwestern—I mean Wrigley University—will now outshine any other in the Northwest.

NEW YORK, April 1, 1931.—Not to be outdone by William Wrigley, Harry F. Sinclair today announced that he was donating $80,000,000 par value of Sinclair Oil Company stocks and bonds to the University of Oklahoma upon condition that the city of Norman change its name to Sinclairia and the university to Sinclair. Otherwise Mr. Sinclair will make the same offer to Tulsa and start a new university there. He denied a later report that H. M. Doheny would make half the gift. "I am underwriting this whole deal myself," he said, "and the university will have within it the finest oil laboratory the world has ever seen. The discoveries I confidently expect from that laboratory will enormously increase the oil reserves of the country and the profits of the Sinclair Oil Company. I shall give the name of Albert B. Fall to the laboratory."

DETROIT, MICHIGAN, May 1, 1936.—Henry Ford today announced that he had offered $250,000,000 to Harvard University upon the condition that it establish a laboratory for auto experimentation and change its name to Ford University. "I cannot take it with me," he said, "but I should like to have my name perpetuated after the last flivver has run out of gas. I have chosen Harvard because it shows the world the way to do it by making the business school the most important part of the university."

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS, May 7, 1936.—When asked today what Harvard's attitude toward the Ford offer of a quarter of a billion would be, President Lowell said: "I cannot, of course, presume to speak for the overseers or the corporation, but I am sure that Mr. Ford's offer will receive the immediate consideration of our governing bodies. We are very proud of the name of John Harvard; it has been a trade-mark which has served us well. It may be, however, that a compromise can be arrived at so that Harvard College could remain Harvard College within the new and greater Ford University. The medical school could be called Edsall College and the business school be rechristened the Dearborn School of Economics. I am particularly gratified that the greatest of our business men approves of our policy of making the science of business the foremost consideration of our university."

An American "Who Was Who"

THE need for a really competent dictionary of American biography is to be satisfied. The American Council of Learned Societies Devoted to Humanistic Studies appointed a committee two years ago to investigate the possibilities of such a reference-work, and when this committee reported recently upon the cost of the project there was consternation. But funds are forthcoming. The New York Times, through its publisher, Adolph S. Ochs, has offered $500,000—a sum sufficient to produce the manuscript of the dictionary if not to print it—and now a special committee of management is considering the appointment of an editor. The staff will reside at Washington, where the Congressional Library offers, of course, the best facilities in the country for investigation, and it is expected that the first volume of the dictionary will be ready in four years. There will be twenty volumes, according to present plans, each containing about 750 pages and the whole presenting biographical information upon approximately 20,000 Americans, none of them living. The articles will be written either by specialists in the various subjects or by persons trained in biography and bibliography, so that a dozen years hence, when the dictionary is expected to be done, American scholars, journalists, and teachers will be in possession of a body of knowledge hitherto without parallel.

The Nation, commenting in 1920 upon the news from England that the "Dictionary of National Biography," recently given over from private hands to the University of Oxford, was in danger of neglect and even death, had occasion to regret the failure of most modern states to assume an interest, either through subsidy or through supervision, in the progress of scholarship. The case of the "Dictionary of National Biography," which ideally should have been from the beginning an enterprise of the British Government, seemed a particularly flagrant one; but it was pointed out that neither in England nor in the United States had adequate attention ever been paid to this kind of thing.

In the present case, although Mr. Ochs and the Times are to be congratulated upon their enlightenment and their liberality, it seems regrettable again that the emergency which they met should ever have arisen. The new dictionary will be in every sense a national product; scholars from all sections of the country will be asked to contribute, the work will be directed from Washington when it is not done there, and national ends will be served. What more logical then, than that the government pay the costs? Without Mr. Ochs the book would have been left to chance, and chance has rather a rude way with learning. To be sure the attitude of governments is not too stable a thing, and there might have been the chance that Congress would change its mind about the "Dictionary of American Biography." A few years ago President Harding made the appalling remark that the only act of administrative economy he could think of at the moment was doing away with the Bureau of American Ethnology! But it is unlikely that even a President would dare to hint that the dictionary was becoming too expensive—was costing almost as much as the Mayflower.

The choice of an editor will be no easy task, for he should be a man neither too young to be soundly informed nor too old to need the reputation which the work will give him. Needless to say he should be interested in everything; the council which appoints him represents societies not only of historians and students of literature but of philosophers, scientists, antiquarians, philologists, archaeologists, economists, sociologists, and political scientists. In particular it is to be hoped that he will not be satisfied merely with biographies which can be pieced together from documents already collected and catalogued in libraries. On this basis preachers celebrated in memorial sermons delivered by other preachers and politicians puffed by brother-politicians would get more than their share of space. Business men, about whom it is often difficult to find much satisfactory information after their death, should receive attention proportionate to their really great importance. Explorers, pioneers, and persons of all sorts influential along the various frontiers should be treated as fully and clearly as the materials will permit. The circuit-rider, the vagrant, and even the rogue should appear whenever distinction of some kind has been achieved. Perhaps it is not too fantastic to suggest that certain entirely mythical—yet nevertheless enormously influential—figures ought to be honored with sketches. The precise dates of Paul Bunyan might be hard to discover, but there is no denying that he has had a career; and so have Pecos Bill, and Tony Beaver, and Strap Buckner. The only reason for ruling them out, and on second thought it seems an important one, is that they are still very much alive.

Radio or Newspaper—Can Both Survive?

By MARC A. ROSE

SIX national elections have come and gone since I joined the guild of those who serve the roaring presses. On six Presidential election nights I have looked out from newspaper office windows upon a sea of faces upturned toward bulletin boards. (To be meticulous, several times the faces were not visible but only the style of haircut of the period, because we were projecting our bulletins upon a screen across the street. That, however, is a detail.)

What I set out to say was that rain, sleet, or moonlight, the crowds were just as dense one year as another—up to 1924. This year, in our town, there was a falling off in numbers and a deterioration in the quality of election-night crowds. Where were the absentees? Why, at home, grouped in front of the loud-speaker. The old family hootodyne that had brought in the sweet unison of Cleveland, the raucous dissonance of Madison Square Garden, the speeches of Bob and John and Cal, wound up the campaign by reporting its results.

It was the first radio campaign. Now that it is over we newspaper makers are trying to figure out what it all meant—to you and to us. Especially to us, since we are humanly selfish.

What will the radio do to the newspaper? Will the radio hurt the sale of newspapers? Will it destroy them by supplanting them? If it does not kill their sales, will it kill their influence? Or can radio be made to help the newspaper?

The Associated Press is exceedingly wary. It is on record through its board of directors as forbidding its members to broadcast, or to supply for broadcasting, any news belonging to the A. P. And note this: News originating in the territory of the member newspaper, and gathered by the newspaper's staff, belongs exclusively to the association.

The attitude of the board of directors, however, does not represent a united body of opinion. Twenty-two newspapers, many of them A. P. members and most of them large, own and operate broadcasting stations. Many others broadcast news through arrangement with stations they do not own. One member of the A. P., the Chicago Tribune, openly defied the board of directors, announcing its intention to broadcast election returns and "carry to the highest court" any attempt to discipline it for so doing.

I am not authorized to speak for the Associated Press. I think, however, the sentiment of its directors is no secret. They feel they should be cautious. They frankly do not know in what way, or how greatly, radio may develop. As radio stands today they do not fear it—much. But radio doesn't stand; it leaps forward in its improvement and extension with a speed somewhat comparable to the velocity of the waves it utilizes. Conceivably it may become a rival of the newspaper. Why help it along?

That is a perfectly understandable state of mind. Yet one suspects that if it is possible to develop radio into a great rival of the daily press it will be developed—with or without the newspapers' consent; in which case there is no sense in emulating the worthy King Canute. One had better be building a tide-mill. Maybe that is what the Chicago Tribune and twenty-one other newspapers are doing—building tide-mills. If the tide turns to radio—well and good, they are established in business. If not, very well; charge the outlay to advertising.

The United Press so far dissents from the opinion of the A. P. that it broadcast its complete election-night news, and a dozen great newspapers enthusiastically cooperated, paying large sums in order to give this service to their communities. Karl A. Bickel, president of the United Press, put his view succinctly when he said: "No one can eliminate radio from the field. Whether we like it or not, it is here." So his organization is determined to play along with radio, study it, be ready to utilize it as its possibilities unfold.

You, sir and madam, eventually will answer the question, Shall the newspaper survive, or the radio? That is propounding the problem in extreme form. More moderately phrased, will an important fraction of the public sooner or later prefer to get its news, and interpretation thereof, by radio? There are corollaries: Will you eventually pay more attention to broadcast advertisements than you do to printed advertisements? Or even as much? And since a large part of many newspapers is merely entertainment, will you increasingly seek entertainment by radio to the neglect of newspaper reading?

Perhaps it will help to state a few fundamentals.

To begin with, the gathering of news costs money. You wouldn't believe how much. Election-night service cost the A. P. $250,000. The cost was kept down to that trifle because every member supplied free the figures for its community. You don't pay for that service now, not directly, and so you do not appreciate its cost—or its value to you.

Not so very long ago a shrewd merchant discovered that if he paid for an announcement that marvelously good mousetraps could be had at his store people would beat a path to his door. More merchants quickly followed his example and the newspaper editor had found a new source of revenue. With the cash he did two things. First, he began selling his newspaper for a fraction of what it cost him to gather its contents and publish them. Second, he began spending lavishly to get more and better news. He hired famous writers; he sent men to Africa. He established offices in Paris and Tokio and all points between; he hired airplanes and set up private wires.

Take the advertising revenue away from the New York Times or the Chicago Tribune, or the Oil City Derrick for that matter, and your copy would cost you (a wild guess) ten cents a day.

Today the radio has no revenues adequate to supply so rich and splendid a service. It can now at comparatively small expense let you listen to a candidate's speech or a description of a fight or a ball game. Or, it can give you the news by sponging upon some newspaper which gathered it at great cost, hoping for reimbursement from you, indirectly, when you go shopping.

So today radio is not greatly to be feared—you jump at that conclusion. Ah, my friend, unfortunately all newspaper readers are not like you! You are thoughtful and thorough. You want all the news and you want it carefully and completely set forth. But the thousands, the millions, who buy newspapers, and without whom the newspapers will starve—they are more easily satisfied. Headline readers, these, and devotees of the comic strips and the stuff you despise as "trash": the 800,000 "readers" of the Daily News in New York, in which there is nothing to read. Perhaps they will be satisfied with a clever, catchy, sketchy bulletin service such as radio can improvise, without much cost.

This is today. Tomorrow this lusty, this amazing baby may discover how to make money! Perhaps by broadcasting material that is hash and gibberish unless you buy a certain receiver or pay for a certain key. Perhaps, tearing a sheet from the newspapers, by developing huge revenues from advertising. Some stations have pioneered far into this field already. Suppose they divert from newspapers a considerable portion of their revenues?

Now the other view—the opinions of those who feel that radio never can displace or even seriously damage the popularity of newspapers; those who are convinced that radio even can be made a genuine ally of the newspapers, bringing in more readers, and increasing their intelligence and interest. The best customers for the baseball extras are the crowds pouring homeward from the ball parks. They've sat through the game, seen every play, perhaps kept a box score. Then they buy a newspaper to read it all over again! Paradox? Not at all. The most interesting item in the newspaper is the item that contains your name. The next most interesting is the one that relates the incident you saw. You want to match your eyes against the reporter's—check his accuracy or yours, discover whether you missed a detail, learn the true inwardness of something that puzzled you at the time.

By analogy, so goes the reasoning, the man who listened to a speech by radio, is the man who will buy a newspaper next day to look it over in type. The great task confronting the newspaper today is to stimulate the public's interest in news, to arouse a genuine intellectual curiosity as to the world we live in. There are today too many who read nothing but racing results or eight-column headlines. Radio, many believe, can help here.

Is this sound? I don't know. I listened in while Davis talked in Chicago, 500 miles away, and I eagerly looked up telegraphic reports to reread certain passages and to see if I could get particulars about the heckling I overheard. A few nights later I heard Coolidge, and next day I carefully ducked reading his speech. I mean no invidious comparison. I was equally interested in each address, but I felt I knew all about the Coolidge meeting. The announcer was better, perhaps, and there was, it happened, no unexplained incident. That's fifty-fifty. But I think the weight of experience tends to prove that listening to the broadcasting of public events makes newspaper readers. It was my fate to sit in Madison Square Garden on a kitchen chair that got harder and harder as the Democratic convention dragged on, so I didn't hear it broadcast. But scores of my friends did. They all say it made them read the newspaper accounts much more eagerly. More critically, too. (We'll come back to that point.)

For decades the newspapers have used bulletin boards to stimulate curiosity and interest in news. Now science gives us the most splendidly sprawling bulletin board the world ever has known. If the old-fashioned bulletin board was a good thing for the newspaper, isn't a glorified bulletin board better?

There is another argument to allay the jumping nerves of radiophobe publishers. It is the time-and-human-patience argument. It took an hour, about, to broadcast a recent Presidential speech. You could read it in fifteen minutes. Furthermore, you could read it at your convenience, but to hear it you had to be listening at a definite hour—at his convenience. You may have just two investments, American Can and United States Steel. You can skip the stock table from "A" to "U" and get the day's prices in ten seconds. Or you can tune in your radio and listen while the announcer reads his weary way from "A" to "U." Suit yourself.

This, however, is not a final and crushing argument. The mischief is that too many buyers of newspapers are not readers at all but headline scanners. They might be glad to escape even the little reading they do now and take their bulletins in the intervals between jazz and humorous monologues.

Let me be fantastically imaginative for a moment. Suppose privacy of communication by radio is developed, and somehow I believe that is coming soon. May we not then see the newspaper of the future selling a complete service to subscribers? A year's subscription to the newspaper and a radio set that will receive the hourly-bulletin service of the newspaper's broadcasting station, as well as whatever other program the station has to offer, for so many dollars. A refinement of detail might be a key, not unlike a Yale key, that would tune the set to the secret-wave combination of the newspaper's broadcasting. Unlocked, the set could be tuned in the usual way to receive from public stations—if there are any left by that time. So if there is profit eventually to be made in broadcasting the newspaper need not be left out in the cold.

I alluded to the critical faculty developed by radio listeners, and promised to return to the point. It is a comfort to be sure of something in the midst of this sea of uncertainties. I am dead sure the broadcasting of public events—conventions, meetings, speeches—will improve the accuracy and honesty of newspapers. We're reasonably honest and all that, but the best of us do better work when we're checked up. The newspaper reporter nowadays "covering" a meeting that Mike the demon Microphone also attends has a million critics. He'd better be right. If he isn't his newspaper will hear about it.

The newspapers up our way accepted the prepared copy of a candidate's speech and printed it "as wrote." The candidate deviated from his manuscript—not in any important particular, at that—and radio fans told us about it. Let that be a lesson to us.

We welcome this, or we should. We court tests of our accuracy. Maybe this will stop a lot of loose talk about the unreliability of our newspaper. As for our loathed contemporary—well, it serves him good and right. He will chop and invert and distort the speeches of our candidate, will he? And how about the "tumultuous enthusiasm" and "wild cheering" he reported for his candidate? Say, did you hear that cheering? Lasted just thirty seconds. Timed it myself, and so did every reader of his miserable sheet.

My own opinion, since no one asked for it, is that radio cannot be strangled, that it will play an ever-increasing role as disseminator and publisher of news, but as the ally, not the enemy, of the newspaper.

And, of course, if I guess wrong, I can turn announcer.

England and Egypt: The Rights and Wrongs

By HENRY W. NEVINSON

London, December 2

LET us try to be calm and reasonable about it. A party of Egyptian extremists have in open daylight in the streets of their capital violently murdered Sir Lee Stack, Governor General of the Sudan and Sirdar or Commander-in-Chief of the whole Egyptian army, which shared in the defense or policing of the Sudan and Egypt. The Sirdar by universal admission was a British administrator and general of the best type—kindly, reasonable, above suspicion of corruption, and wholly devoted to the service under his charge, especially for the Sudanese tribes. His murder naturally stirred his friend and colleague, Field Marshal Lord Allenby, the British High Commissioner in Egypt, to extreme rage. He attributed the crime, probably with justice, to the prolonged incitements of the extremist organization known as the Wafd, with which the Prime Minister, Zaghlul Pasha, was intimately connected, if he was not actually the originator and chief exponent of its nationalist doctrines. Lord Allenby is one of our greatest cavalry officers, and besides he won the highest praise for his campaign in Palestine toward the end of the war. But he is a man of passionate nature, accustomed to control others rather than himself. Under the stress of violent emotion he issued his ultimatum to the Egyptian Government, couched in offensive terms, describing them as having "allowed" the murder. He brought his cavalry clattering up and down the streets of an independent and sovereign capital. Against all etiquette, he made a visit of state in a soft hat and lounge suit, obviously with the intention of offending Egyptian feelings, punctilious on such points. And indeed he behaved as though Egypt were not even under a protectorate, as she was from 1914 to 1922, but had become a subject country, to be punished as such.

Here I would urge a point in his defense that is likely to be forgotten. Living as we do at a safe and comfortable distance from the scene of danger, we are all apt to omit "the haggard element of fear," as Carlyle called it. Egypt has a population of about 14,000,000, of which about 12,000,000 are Moslems. Cairo itself has a population of nearly 800,000 and Alexandria of 450,000. In the midst of those vast populations dwell mere handfuls of British, French, Italians, and a few other European and mainly Christian races. The Egyptian army numbers about 17,000 men who could not be relied upon to defend Europeans in case of a nationalist rising. Last year the British forces counted three regiments of cavalry, three batteries of horse artillery, three batteries of field artillery, seven battalions of infantry, and four squadrons of aeroplanes. The British force is being rapidly increased since the murder, but at the time it was small. You may say that even a small force of well-trained, disciplined, and confident British troops would suffice to deal with a rising of random mobs, even if supported by ill-disciplined Egyptian troops which have never been distinguished for martial behavior. I think that may be true, but before the British troops could come into action and suppress a widespread revolution how many innocent Europeans might have been plundered, ravished, and slaughtered with impunity by the rioters! That is where the haggard element of fear comes in, and we must make allowance for it. I felt that very keenly when I was in India. A tiny proportion of any European race dwelling in the midst of a different and possibly hostile population to be counted by millions always lives in fear and on the edge of panic. You may say that the Europeans have no right to be there at all. I will not argue that question now. I only say that under such conditions one must make allowance for fear.

So, urged by natural indignation at the murder of his friend and by a resolve to show the Egyptians that he was prepared to protect the foreign settlers to the utmost of his power, Lord Allenby issued his ultimatum and went clattering about the streets with his cavalry and marching his infantry battalions through the most dangerous parts of the city with fixed bayonets. Now let us consider the terms of the ultimatum. No one objects to the demands for an apology from the Egyptian Government and an inquiry into the crime, to be followed by the punishment of the murderers if caught. The prohibition of political demonstrations may also be granted, since such demonstrations are always likely to lead to violence and bloodshed in Cairo, chiefly owing to the excitability of the students in the famous Moslem University of El-Azhar, with its 405 professors and 10,000 students over whom the British representatives of official education never had recognized control. The demand for an indemnity of £500,000 is far more questionable, and its identity with Mussolini's demand upon Greece after the murders on the Albanian frontier is unfortunate, for it suggests a close parallel with the Italian behavior on that occasion—behavior which nearly the whole of England condemned. These terms, however, were accepted by Zaghlul Pasha before his resignation. Then came the retention, pending the conclusion of a further agreement on the subject, of the protection of foreign interests in Egypt, such as "the position and powers of the Foreign, Financial, and Judicial Advisers, and the officials of the European Department of the Ministry of the Interior." In that clause there is nothing new, for the "defense of Foreign Interests" was expressly reserved for "future discussion" when the British Protectorate was abolished in 1922 and Egypt was declared an independent and sovereign state. But it has now been exacted without discussion. Zaghlul refused it. Ziwar accepted it yesterday with all the rest.

So far, I think, one may say that there was nothing outrageous in Lord Allenby's demands, though the manner in which they were presented was harsh and violent. I should have thought that compensation to the Sirdar's widow (say to the amount of £50,000) would have been sufficient as reparation, but one hears that the "fine" of £500,000 already paid is to be devoted to the service of charitable objects in the Sudan, and so some excuse is possible, though I regret the sum. Then we come to the two demands having reference to the Sudan itself, and both of them are debatable, while one appears to me dangerously mistaken. The first is the withdrawal of the Egyptian troops from the Sudan and of the Egyptian officers in the Sudanese battalions. That demand raises the whole question of the British and Egyptian rights in the Sudan. Both nominally rest on the agreement of 1898-1899, concluded between ourselves and Egypt after the Mahdi had been "smashed" by Kitchener at Omdurman and the Sudan relieved of a bloody tyranny which had oppressed it for nearly twenty years. Whether that Mahdist tyranny was more detested than the corrupt and disgusting tyranny exercised over the Sudan by Egypt for the sixty years before the Mahdist rebellion in 1880, I could not say. Both were detestable, and the memory of the Egyptian rule still remains a horror in the Sudanese mind. After Gordon had tried in vain to appease the rising, and Kitchener had released the Sudan, as was hoped, both from Mahdist and Egyptian misgovernment, British officials under a British Governor General, who was also to be Sirdar of the whole Egyptian army, undertook the administration of the country. But the government was now to be called a "condominium," and the British and Egyptian flags were to fly side by side on the citadel of Khartum.

Of all forms of government a condominium seems to me the worst. We have never been able to get on with France in the condominium of the New Hebrides; nor could we get on with her so long as we had till the beginning of this century a condominium with France over Egypt. As to the triple condominium declared yesterday over Tangier, heaven help us all! For vain will be the help of man. When Egypt was declared a sovereign state two years ago the Sudan was one of the four points reserved for "future discussion," and it seems to me that by ordering the Egyptian troops and officers out Lord Allenby has canceled further discussion and taken over the government of the Sudan for this country. The whole moral question is whether the Sudanese still detest the Egyptian race so much as formerly. I hear different reports, and certainly the small mutiny of Sudanese platoons from one battalion under Egyptian officers seems to show that the tyranny of fifty years ago is becoming forgotten history. On the other hand British inhabitants of the Sudan represent the native tribes as devoted to the British in deep gratitude for our honorable administration and the fertility we have extended over the country by peace and irrigation. Assuming that the Sudanese tribes are still incapable of self-government, one must incline to think that British government is likely to be more popular than Egyptian as long as we maintain our high standard.

But the mention of irrigation brings up the last demand. Lord Allenby stated that for the future we would pay no attention to the agreement that only 300,000 feddans (acres) of the district called the Gezira should be irrigated. In future there would be no limit to the irrigation of this so-called "Island," which is really a vast promontory between the Blue and the White Nile, especially favorable for the growth of cotton. There we come hard up against a "snag." Our Sudanese Cotton Syndicate is a powerful company, and the day after Lord Allenby's demand was published up went the shares. Among its directors are included members of our "governing classes" and relatives of our ministers. Mr. Asquith's son is one of them, and perhaps you may remember the scandal that arose in the House of Commons when Mr. Tom Johnston (now candidate for Dundee owing to the death of my dear friend E. D. Morel) raised the question of Mr. Asquith's advocacy of the company's concession when Mr. Bonar Law was Prime Minister. Some members took the trouble of writing out an apology for Mr. Johnston to sign, but he refused to sign it, and no apology was ever offered. There comes the trouble. The Egyptians naturally clamor that the water of the Nile on which the very existence of their country absolutely depends is to be diverted for the benefit of a British company supported by political influence. I am told the fear is unfounded, for the two Niles supply more than enough water to irrigate both the Sudan and Egypt, leaving plenty over for navigation up the rivers. But it looks bad in any case, and Lord Allenby's demand is more than ill-timed. It looks like the act of a bully who says: "I don't like you. I distrust your way of going on. So I am going to cut off your water-supply at the main, and in future you will not get anything to drink or wash with, except at my pleasure."

It is important to keep the Egyptian demands separate from the Sudanese. In my opinion both should be referred to the League of Nations for separate decision. Have we a right to make the demands on Egypt herself? Have we a right to order her out of the Sudan and to divert a large quantity of the Nile water? The League might refer both questions to the International Court at the Hague. The Egyptian Parliament has petitioned the League to interfere, and if we refuse on the merely technical ground that the Parliament is not the Government, we shall be doing our worst to kill the League that we have done so much to foster. My own opinion further is that, assuming the Sudanese are incapable of self-government, and definitely refuse the Egyptian Government, we ought to ask the League to grant us a mandate over the Sudan. A mandate is not the same as annexation, for the holder is responsible to the Mandatory Commission of the League, and must present accounts and reports every year. The alternative is flat annexation, and if we insist on annexation the League may as well close its shutters.

P. S.—Since the above was written I have consulted a high authority (I might say the highest authority in this country) upon the subject. I was sorry to find that he disagrees with me as to appeals to the League of Nations. He says that the League could not take the matter of Egypt up on the sole petition of the Egyptian Parliament, for the reason I gave above: i. e., the Parliament is not the Government, and the Government under Ziwar certainly will not have the will or the courage to appeal. If some other country, such as Persia, took it up, he thinks that the League would be split in half and could not survive.

Nor does he think the time yet ripe for a mandate over the Sudan, though he regards that solution as the best ultimately. At present Egypt would certainly say: "Oh, that's all jolly well, but we too have a share in the Sudan. The Sudan is not a derelict like the other mandated countries taken from your ex-enemies. England may grab it if she likes, because we cannot prevent her. But we will not consent to any talk of a mandate."

I give you that as the opinion of a very progressive statesman, not a member of the present Tory Government, but one whose connection with the Egyptian and other foreign questions has been very intimate.

I am sorry he sees these objections (rather technical objections, I think) to my own suggestions, and I should not have given you his opinion had he not been a man of such wide experience and accurate knowledge of the subject.

The One-Party System

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THERE'S nobody—pretty nearly nobody—in Democratic National Committee headquarters here. The Progressives are scurrying about wondering if they have a home somewhere sometime in the bosom of the future of the republic. Republican National Committee headquarters are bubbling with people and desks and statistics and conferences and files and facts and newspaper releases and personal and political activities.

Why not? A two-party system, we are told, is better than a three-party system. Fine! Very well. Why, then, isn't a one-party system better than a two-party system?

Great! We've got it.

The only party there is in these United States today is the Republican Party. That's all there is of that.

Senator Heflin of Alabama, white-waistcoated, portly, archangelic avenger of the Sunny South upon the perfidies and insidious and enervating diabolisms of the Federal Reserve Board, sits silent now in his seat. Minute after minute passes without a speech from him. Walsh of Montana arises not to intimate that political corruption is the road to political ruin. Walsh, the clarid avenger, like Heflin, the turgid avenger, seeks vengeance no more. The Democrats lie back to watch the Republicans make another record and hope—ah! how they hope!—that it will be sufficiently worse than the last to speak for itself.

They begin to doubt the wisdom of speaking for it.

Last time they pointed out to the country how awful—as they thought—it was. The country thereupon said: "Aw! Politics!"

In the House the mass of the Democrats were committed to the Barkley-Howell bill for abolishing the Railroad Labor Board and for substituting for it a set of arrangements more satisfactory to the railroad trade unions. The Republicans, on the whole, were and are against the bill. It nevertheless had the parliamentary right to be considered and debated on December 15. The Democratic leader of the House—Mr. Garrett of Tennessee—thereupon agreed with the Republican leader of the House—Mr. Longworth of Ohio—to set aside December 15 as a day on which eulogies would be delivered in the Congress of the United States to the urn of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. Longworth would rather deliver eulogies to any urn than advance the Barkley-Howell Bill which was introduced into the House and waved out onto the floor of the House by—as it were—secret signals, without consulting him. He regards the Barkley-Howell Bill as a case in which he has got to show whether or not he is running the House, or who is? In any case the Democratic leader joins him now in doing the Barkley-Howell Bill out of its December 15 and in postponing it to the first Monday in January, which perhaps will be dedicated to memorial ceremonies by the Department of Agriculture to the apple which led to the discovery of the law of gravitation by Isaac Newton.

Meanwhile Senator La Follette's seat in the Senate is usually regally empty, and Senator Wheeler attends only to be as amiably inconspicuous as his dashing cavalryman appearance will permit. Brookhart of Iowa postpones his panegyrics on the cooperative economic system to another time. The Republicans—the regular Republicans—at this time have it all to themselves.

In Britain the vanquished David Lloyd George and the vanquished James Ramsay MacDonald may rise in Parliament to level tranquil sneers at the victorious Stanley Baldwin. In the United States the fans for the vanquished team take off their buttons and sneak home to supper voiceless.

The Democratic Party is at this moment not a party. It is perhaps much better. It is much better, if multiplying and replenishing the earth is as good a thing for parties as it is said to be for people. The Democratic Party, by fissure, like an amoeba, has split itself into two parties. There is the Al Smith Party. There is the McAdoo Party. Each thrives and conducts all sorts of propaganda in Washington and elsewhere for the campaign of 1928.

We now in truth have one party and three factions. We have the Republican Party. We have the La Follette Progressive faction. We have the Democratic Al Smith "boss" faction. We have the Democratic McAdoo "anti-boss" faction. Because of the existence of these two last factions the Democratic National Headquarters in Washington are as Romish catacombs or Pompeiian atriums, elegantly preserved but destitute quite of all flocks of worshipers or traversers.

Three sects, Al Smith Democratic and William Gibbs McAdoo Democratic and Bob La Follette Progressive—and One Church, the Republican Church! That is the present situation.

The Republican Church has within it even now, it is true, high churchmen and broad churchmen and low churchmen. Senator Wadsworth of New York is a high churchman, burning incense before a red lamp of private property and refusing to be disturbed at his devotions by any modern hymns to public ownership. Senator Curtis of Kansas is a broad churchman, seeing an occasional need of a restatement of eternal verities into kaleidoscopic language. Senator Johnson of California might even refuse to allow any incense at all to be burned in any Republican Church edifice of which he was the pastor.

Yet among them all there is a certain acceptance of unifying truths or myths, as distinguished from a pursuit of disintegrating inquiries or facts, which establishes them as concertedly a church. They agree that almost anything can be transubstantiated into the body and blood of the republic on the Republican altar.

The others have today no such similar faith. That is their political practical weakness. The McAdoo Democrats think that a "boss" is a "boss"—and wicked—even if a Democrat. The Smith Democrats think that a "demagogue" is a "demagogue"—and despicable—even if a Democrat. The Progressives think that any Progressive who disagrees with any other Progressive on the subject of the meaning of the fifty-fifth verse of the two hundredth chapter of the third book of the prophet Daniel regarding the valuation of railroads has sold out to The Interests.

These three elements are all sectarian. The Republican Party today is the only political national church in Washington. The problem of the other three elements is profoundly psychologically this: How to get over being dividingly sectarian and become compositely churchmanlike enough to command a majority of ordinary people in a human country in a world which, after all, wishes to stick together rather than fall apart.

The Unimp

A Unique and Very Important Contribution

THE BUSINESS OF LIFE

By HUGH W. SANFORD

is important for

1. Business men
2. Statesmen
3. Philosophers
4. Biologists
5. Scientists

for it offers a theory of

1. Business cycles
2. Economic principles
3. Evolution
4. Idealism
5. Government
6. Law

by combining in one large work (two volumes) an interwoven argument in which Economics, Philosophy, and Biology are associated and related.

Two volumes Net $10.00

At all booksellers or from the

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

American Branch — 35 West 32nd Street, New York

The New School Bookshop

will be glad to help you choose your

Christmas Gifts

Books for Children and Grown-ups

Gift Cards of Unusual Beauty

Open Evenings

465 West 23d St. Call or Telephone Chelsea 1386 New York City

The Right Book for Christmas

Let us help you select just the right books for your Christmas giving. We have many interesting volumes to choose from, including charming ones for children. We have some very attractive Christmas cards, also, ranging in price from 75 cents down to two for five cents. Come in person or order by mail or telephone. We are open evenings, too, except on Wednesdays.

Why not join our rental library? We carry all the latest fiction as well as much of the good non-fiction.

The Channel Bookshop

279 Park Avenue New York City

Telephone Murray Hill 4864

OUR CHANC

A S

by Bertrand Russell, Elsie Clews Pa

"FIFTEEN voices in the wilderness con Such a document cannot be overlooked

Edite

ALBERT & CHARLES BON

THE WOMANS PRES

600 Lexington Avenue, New York, N

For Christmas Giving

Little Robin Stay-Behind

KATHARINE LEE BATES $

Whimsical, delightful plays in verse children. The book for the devoted moth aunt or uncle to bestow.

Ceremonials of Common Day

ABBIE GRAHAM $1

"Abbie Graham's charming bibelot sha ens our apprehension of many da miracles. Its paragraphs have the delic mental flavor of fine verse."

—Christopher Morley

The Ascending Life

RICHARD ROBERTS, D.D. $

"Divinity," Dr. Roberts believes, "is j that 'next hill' that lifts its crest above as we top each rise."

Christ in the Poetry of Today

MARTHA FOOTE CROW $2

An exquisite anthology from our mod American poets. A veritable life of Chr in verse.

UNCENSORED RECOL

"IT should be tremendously popular," said Laurence Stallings made its first appearance. Mr. Stallings can take credit as George, it is reported, has read his copy three times and this make it the literary tid-bit of the season. If you like sparkling in "not even Margot Asquith presented social gossip and scandal, the Times Book Review, sees in it "an important contribution to Boston." The New York Herald Tribune agrees, finding it "th many a season. Gossip about personalities of international noto If you are looking for a gift to please the particular, give this here and abroad.

Large Octavo. 346 Pages.

PHILADELPHIA J. B. LIPPIN

chable Gift

G MORALITY

JM:

ell, Ludwig Lewisohn
dwin Muir, etc.

his volume . . . and do the subject to a turn.
ew York World.
introduction, by Freda Kirchwey. $2.50 net.

39 W. 8th Street, NEW YORK

List of Beautiful BOOKS on Travel and Adventure

GALAPAGOS: World's End
By WILLIAM BEEBE
The distinguished naturalist's colorful account his expedition to a range land of marine onsters and curious eatures never before en by man. With a ealth of gorgeous illusations in color and ack and white. $9.00

PEARLS AND SAVAGES
By CAPTAIN FRANK HURLEY
You plunge into New Guinea's savage heart where cannibals and head-hunters still live in their primitive state, where the sensuous excess of color and life staggers the senses. Illustrated with magnificent photographs of these savages and their rites. $7.50

THE SEA GYPSY
By DWARD SALISBURY
and
IERIAN C. COOPER
Storms — shipwreck — venture—romance— an citing record of three ars' wandering down e world's strange seaths by a little Ameri- n sailing vessel. Illusated with fascinating otographs. $3.50

VOYAGING Southward from the Strait of Magellan
By ROCKWELL KENT
In a small boat the artist-rover wandered along the stormy coast off Cape Horn and Tierra del Fuego. The account of the voyage is enchantingly told and illustrated with rare and beautiful drawings. $7.50

IN THE LAND of the LAUGHING BUDDHA
By UPTON CLOSE
Modern China, thrilling, humorous and tragic in her struggle to catch up with the world — China seen intimately by one who knows the inner nature of her people. Illustrated with an unusual collection of photographs. $3.50

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
West 45th Street NEW YORK

TIONS Anonymous

York World when this book of entertainingly indiscreet gossip r the volume at once proved an International Sensation. King wondered at in view of the piquant and racy revelations which ou will enjoy these, for, according to the San Francisco Chronicle, licity and snobbery, as this writer does." Walter Littlefield, of Biography, not overlooking that of London, New York and taining volume of intimate memoirs the reviewer has read for ne runs through its pages like the swift flow of a swollen stream." Already eight printings have been necessary to satisfy the interest

At All Bookstores.— Postpaid $4.65

T COMPANY LONDON

Security Against War

A narrative of the

ADVENTURES OF PEACE AND JUSTICE

In Persia, the Burgenland, the Polish-Russian War, Albania, Corfu, Vilna, Memel, Fiume, the Ruhr, Turkey, Teschen, Eastern Galicia, Upper Silesia, the Aaland Islands, Armenia, Poland, Rumania, Thrace and Macedonia, Irak, Peru, Chile and Bolivia, Georgia, the Saar, Danzig, and on the frontiers and waterways of Europe.

EXPERIENCES OF ARBITRATION

At the Permanent Court of International Justice, at the Hague Organization, at Geneva, at Paris, at London, and wherever tribunals sit.

FATE OF NATIONAL SECURITY

Through reduction of armaments, compulsory arbitration, military alliances, mutual assistance and outlawry of war.

By

Frances Kellor and Antonia Hatvany (Collaborator)

In two vols. Price $6

THE MACMILLAN CO. New York City

Gifts
for every Member of the Family
BOOKS

are always acceptable as Gifts, particularly at Christmas time. We offer a wide Selection, suitable for every age, taste and purse, and embracing the best in Poetry, Music, History, Old Books, Rare Books, Fine Bindings.

For Gifts other than Books, our stock affords an opportunity for the choice of such articles as Book Ends, Desk Sets, Portfolios, Brass Goods, Leather Goods, Stationery, Fountain Pens, and many interesting Novelties.

BRENTANO'S
Booksellers to the World
Fifth Ave., at 27th St.
New York

Quaker Revolutionaries
The Death Battalion of Youth

By MOLLIE BEST

> Stone walls do not a prison make,
> Nor iron bars a cage;
> Minds innocent and quiet take
> That for an hermitage;
> If I have freedom in my love,
> And in my soul am free,
> Angels alone that soar above
> Enjoy such liberty.
>
> RICHARD LOVELACE

THE mention of Quakers usually calls up pictures of quaint old gentlemen in quiet clothing or serene old ladies in ample gray skirts, while the pioneers of Quakerism are thought of vaguely as well-meaning folk leading lives as drab as their clothes. Like many popular opinions this is far from fact. Compared to the primitive Quakers the life of an I. W. W. in the oil-fields of Oklahoma is a sheltered and protected one. Far from being drab their lives were, in fact, lurid. They reached out toward danger like plants for the sun. They trekked the whole wide world and challenged all the autocratic powers and potentates of their time. They sailed the seven seas in leaky tubs, and ran afoul the Algerian pirates before Commodore Decatur was born or thought of. They were even sold as slaves to the profit of their Christian queen and fellow-countrymen; vivisection was practiced upon them in New England and in Old. Deported on convict ships where they had hardly more than standing room only, they died like flies or survived to fatten in stockades in the Barbados. They founded great states and administered them, without once making the Sermon on the Mount a scrap of paper. In fact, the history of their lives reads like a fragment out of the Teutonic fairy tales.

For in the beginning Quakerism was distinctly a youth movement, and characterized by zeal rather than discretion. To us, heirs of their victories, some of their war cries seem trivial or even absurd, but if they had been obsessed with the idea that God willed them to be nourished by a diet of dried prunes it would not have hampered their drive against intrenched authority and custom, nor obscured the fact that they fought one of the most cruel wars in the history of English-speaking people for individual freedom, the right of free speech and free assembly, and the separation of church and state. They went over the top almost alone, with nothing to back them but spiritual force, unparalleled courage, and a mighty power which they called God.

Like the prophet Samuel many of the Quaker leaders heard the call of God as little children, and long before they reached maturity their valorous young lives were snuffed out in dank and stinking prisons. Of all the grewsome tales none is more affecting than the martyrdom of little Elizabeth Fletcher and little James Parnell, both under twenty when they were done to death by highly respectable and pious people.

An eloquent and persuasive preacher at sixteen, Elizabeth was fired with an ambition to civilize and Christianize the institutions of higher education. Her first attempt was Oxford, an arduous undertaking, for the he-man red-blooded model was the fashion in that aristocratic seat of learning. The high-born youth of Oxford, many of them in training for holy orders, had a habit of breaking in on Quaker meetings, smashing doors and windows, throwing the worshipers to the floor, and riding on the backs of men and women. When their victims refused to drink, beer was forced down their throats and their clothing saturated with it. It was also thought proper to behave indecently to the women, use obscene language, fire gunpowder and bullets to terrorize them, and otherwise assert themselves as jolly English gentlemen.

Stirred by the atrocities of these young savages two earnest north country girls moved on Oxford, "under a Religious Concern, to exhort the Inhabitants of that Place, and the scholars in the colleges to Repentance and Amendment of Life." The call to repentance was unfavorably received by the vivacious students, who carried the two girls to the college pump and forced water down their throats till they were partially strangled. They were then roped together and dragged through a muddy ditch to the cemetery, and after a battering against the gravestones thrown into an open grave.

Mangled in body but unshaken in their conviction that amendment of life was desirable for the students, the young women rose from the grave to continue their mission. They were arrested and taken before a court where the vice-chancellor of Oxford sat on the bench, the most severe of the judges. For the merry pranks of his students there was no condemnation—boys will be boys—but the exhortations of the two Quaker girls horrified him. He sternly declared that since the spirit of God and the grace of Christ had been dishonored by the unseemly and riotous conduct of the girls they should be whipped out of town. For the execution of this sentence the mayor's signature was necessary, and here the chancellor encountered a snag. That official flatly refused to affix his name to the order. He went further and offered to supply the young Quakers with garments to replace those torn to shreds by the fighting students and to provide other necessaries.

The imperious vice-chancellor, lately so eloquent on the duty of obedience to magistrates, absolved himself from that duty. In defiance of the mayor's veto, he signed the order himself, and the girls were whipped out of town by a very reluctant executioner, more compassionate than his superior. Elizabeth Fletcher's frail body was not constructed to stand water treatment followed by violent contact with gravestones. The wounds she received in the battle of Oxford proved mortal, though she lingered on in great agony, fighting valiantly to the end.

The story of little James Parnell makes a perfect companion piece to that of Elizabeth Fletcher. At the age of fourteen this serious child began a quest for the peace which the world cannot give. He was quite wicked, he assures us, probably preferring other diversion to the entertainment offered in the sanctuary. He learned that George Fox wandering on the same quest had found what he sought, and the boy set off afoot for Carlisle, where Fox was imprisoned. His search was over; in that miry dungeon he found the young Quaker leader joyful and triumphant, and immediately fell into rank. The peace he sought and found was not of this world, for his short Quaker life ended as it began in prison.

The records tell us that Parnell was "raised in the schools of literature." His family had given him educational advantages with a more ambitious view than turning him into a Quaker, and his conversion to that heretical sect resulted in his being turned out of doors. The activities of the young gentlemen at the universities decided young Parnell to embark on the dangerous life of Christian missionary to the divinity students of Cambridge. They received him with "rude and bad entertainment." He was imprisoned and then expelled as a vagabond. Many of the plainer people were "convinced" by his eloquence and sincerity, but the better class were die-hards. Coming out of church one pleasant Sabbath morning a zealous worshiper struck the lad a cruel blow with his stick, saying, "For Christ's sake take that." The little fellow replied, "Friend, I do receive it for Jesus Christ's sake."

Startled by the success of the youth the clergy proclaimed a day of fasting and prayer against Quaker errors. On the appointed day James attended church, listened quietly to the thundering from the pulpit denouncing Quakers as deceivers and their doctrines as built on sandy foundations. The sermon ended he rose and said: "I will prove our foundations not to be sandy and thee to be a false prophet." To speak lightly of or to the clergy was unlawful, and James was escorted to prison, charged with contempt of magistracy and ministry, of creating a riot, and of otherwise indecently behaving himself. In rebuttal the boy claimed that he did not think it indecent to call an unjust judge unjust, a persecutor a persecutor, or a deceiver a deceiver. His superiors differed with that opinion and denied his plea. Manacled day and night to felons and murderers he was compelled to walk eighteen miles to stand trial, but the murmurs of the populace had that menacing note which English authorities had learned to respect, and on his next appearance at court it was deemed prudent to omit these unpopular features.

Four magistrates and seven clergymen sat on the bench, and in the naive manner of that time the jury was charged that if they failed to bring in a verdict of guilty the sin would rest on their own heads. They were hard-headed, and feeling equal to the weight refused to bring in the verdict demanded of them. Upon which the judges ignored the jury and took the liberty of fining the prisoner £40, knowing that he had conscientious scruples against paying an unjust fine and would remain a prisoner.

This sentence silenced the young preacher forever. Authority is a jealous god, and crimes against it are always more harshly punished than crimes against humanity. Toward Barabbas chief priests and scribes may relent; toward Jesus never, for "he stirreth up the people." For the same crime little James was to pay the same penalty. The jailer was a brutal man; his wife was venomous. She beat the little lad continually and swore to have his blood. The jail was a relic of the Roman occupation, and, strictly speaking, James occupied a sarcophagus, a mere shelf in a thick stone wall, twelve feet above the ground and approached by a ladder reaching but half way up. The remainder of the ascent was a scramble effected by means of a rope. The beatings of the gentle jaileress and the cold, damp stone soon wrecked the delicate body that housed James's indomitable spirit. Making the ascent to his shelf on a bitter winter day, his stiff hands missed the rope, and he plunged to the floor, shattered. It now became necessary to assign him a shelf near the floor, but fresh air or any other alleviation of his suffering the malice of his jailers denied him. He lingered for a time on the stone shelf, gradually fading out of a hostile world, tenderly cared for by Thomas Shortland and Ann Langley. The Quakers frequently restored their sick to health by prayer, and the tired boy with the mangled body pleaded anxiously with his two friends. "Thomas," said he, "I have seen great things; don't hold me, but let me go." And again he questioned, "Will you hold me?" "No, dear heart," Ann said, "we will not hold thee." And so comforted he went to sleep; destroyed at the age of nineteen by a world he risked his life to better.

Another young soldier who fell scaling the cliffs of clerical power was Roger Hudson. Having proved delinquent "in a certain cause of Tithes and other Ecclesiastical Rights," the warrant read, "the right worshipful Richard Lloyd, Knight and Dr. of Laws, vicar general and Official of the Right Reverend Father in God, Nathaniel, by divine Providence Lord Bishop of Durham," attached the body of the said Roger Hudson, who was thrown into a dark and airless dungeon, where he languished many months. He pleaded for a breath of fresh air, but the right worshipful ecclesiastic had warned the jailer against any such indulgence to this enemy of society and of his lawful perquisites. The prisoner grew very weak and, compassion finally conquering fear, the jailer moved him to where he could breathe pure air. For this humane disobedience of orders the vicar had the jailer summoned before a magistrate, who after a severe reprimand fined the poor man £20.

Robert Selby, a physician of Durham, now entered the contest with the vicar, and let him know in plain language that Roger Hudson, who was not a criminal, would surely die if he continued in a dark cell. The man of God replied:

> I hope I am and desire to continue a tender hearted Man. Yet I would not have you or others judge me a soft fool, and one easily to be wheedled out of his right Reason and Senses by little phanatick Bugbears. If Roger Hudson were not able to pay (though a Turk) I know what I have to say, but if either he or you pretend Conscience for non-payment of just Debts or dues, you must pardon me if I have as little Credit for, and give as little respect to that Coynage and Cozenage, as one that picks a Purse or cuts a Throat by the same Pretense.

The good-will of the jailer and the physician was unavailing. Smothered to death for a conscientious refusal to pay a tax of a few shillings Roger Hudson died in his cell, but even when he had reached the place where the wicked are said to cease from troubling the ire of the tender-hearted man pursued him. The body, as required by law, was wrapped in woolen, but the bereaved sister was a day late in making the necessary affidavit that the law had been complied with. Like a hawk the vicar bore down upon her with a warrant for her arrest, and half of the £5 fine—the penalty for failure to comply with the law—went to that good man as informer. Besse's two huge volumes of twelve hundred pages, "The Sufferings of the People Called Quakers," are a wearisome repetition of such martyrdom. Like the pagan temples, the pillars of our liberties rest on the bodies of the martyrs.

In the Driftway

AT a critical moment the Western Union Telegraph Company is prepared, as usual, to step into the breach. It has suspected—or, rather, hoped—that many persons would want to express their holiday greetings by telegram; it realizes that no one ever knows what to say in a telegram. And, behold! a list of canned wires all prepared and numbered so that the sender has only to pick up the telephone, call Western Union, announce that he would like to send No. 200 to Aunt Mary in Spokane, and the thing is done. But stay; would No. 200 do for the relative in question? No. 200 reads as follows:

> We wish you a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. At the same time we want you to know how thoroughly we appreciate your untiring efforts to advance the interests of our company (firm) during the past year. Good luck to you.

On second thought, the Drifter thinks that Aunt Mary would not consider that one entirely suitable. No. 11 might be better:

> Over the many miles which separate us I (we) send you this message of love and affection with all my (our) best wishes for a Merry Christmas.

The only objection to that one is that Aunt Mary, being a frugal soul, would sniff and wonder if her nephew did want to send her a telegram and get her out of bed at seven o'clock in the morning to fetch it in, why in tarnation he couldn't limit himself to ten words; on the other hand, if he hadn't forgot all about her until the last minute, he could have put as many words as he liked on a post card with a penny stamp and mailed it to Spokane. All this reflection would undoubtedly be bad for an aunt and might even make her change her will. Nephews have been disinherited for less.

* * * * *

THE Drifter, mind, does not mean to disparage the obviously well-meant efforts of the Western Union to help out (and increase the number of) its customers at the glad Christmas season. But he feels that the company has failed, as the business phrase is, to "think the matter through." Difficulties would arise, as he has pointed out, which have evidently not been foreseen. Nor is the Western Union entirely to blame for its lack of foresight. It has merely fallen in line with the multitudes who are trying to send Christmas greetings in a new way. Every year the Drifter, lured by the crowds who throng around the Christmas card counters, pushes his way in to inspect the merchandise that is so popular. He reads a dozen cards, neat squares of pasteboard with envelopes to match, almost, on which a decoration—a lighted candle, a sprig of holly, a blue sky sprinkled with gold stars—accompanies a sentiment, and he takes himself off sadly. It is the sentiment which finished him: "For Father. A glad New Year to a Good Old Scout," "For Mother. May 'Santa' bring 'Good Cheer' to the Sweetest Little Old Lady in the World," "Wishing you a Merry Christmas with Great Joy for the New Year," or, saddest of all,

> I'd like to send a little gift
> To express my dearest wish
> For Christmas and New Year joy to you,
> But this card will have to do.

THE Drifter does not send greeting cards. To those persons whom he meets on Christmas morning right lustily he shouts "Merry Christmas!" To the rest no card of his comes to swell the morning mail; for him no postman's back is bent. On the other hand, he would not go so far as to forbid entirely the sending of cards; he would merely order to be hanged, drawn, and quartered all persons engaged in the business of making them. After that, if anyone wished to write, on a plain white piece of paper, the only two words that are suitable for Christmas greeting, and wished also to deliver the scrap to the door of a friend, he would have no objection. Friendship would be served, the post office would be saved a great rush of overtime work, and the cause of art and literature would be immeasurably advanced. Meantime, to one and all, "A Merry Christmas" from THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The "Gang" Loses in Cincinnati

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At the last election Cincinnati voted for a charter amendment which not only provides for the city-manager plan but for proportional representation.

For years Cincinnati has been considered the worst-governed city in Ohio, if not in this entire section of the country. People in the northern part of the State had a way of referring to the "black spot" which was Hamilton County and to "you gang-ridden people down in Cincinnati," accompanied by ominous shakings of the head as though they wondered why we put up with such a state of affairs. One got to the point of rather being ashamed to admit a home in the city on the Ohio River. From the old days, when George B. Cox ruled it with an iron hand from the back room of the corner saloon, up to the present time, under the absent but none the less autocratic guidance of R. K. Hynicka, there has been but little change.

Came the Presidential election and a group of public-spirited men and women who offered a remedy to the people of Cincinnati in the form of a charter calling for a city manager and proportional representation in the government of the city. The "gang" was dead against it naturally. It had perpetuated itself in office for so long it must have viewed with dismay the idea of losing, so it endeavored to cloud the issue by substituting its own amendment. A systematic course of education was carried on by both groups, and wherever one went the principal topic of conversation was the proposed charter with its city-manager plan and proportional representation, or one of the substitute amendments proposed by the ruling powers in the City Hall.

As election day came nearer and nearer watchers for the polls were secured, because it was realized absolutely that unless watchers were on hand the chance of winning was very remote. At the same time the Progressive (La Follette) group was just as busy getting its watchers signed up. But this group had its eye on the Supreme Court of Ohio, which had under consideration the question of permitting watchers at the polls for the Progressive Party. On Saturday before election day I arrived at headquarters and was greeted with a wail of dismay and discouragement, the decision of the Supreme Court that no watchers were to be allowed the Progressive Party, on the ground that it was not a political party in the strict meaning of that term but a committee spreading propaganda, having just been given out to the press. For the first time in the history of the city a watcher for a progressive movement had been secured in every precinct.

The campaign committee got busy at once, because it was learned that the City Charter Committee had not secured a full quota of watchers, and a La Follette watcher was put in every vacant place with instructions to remain for the entire count. And they were all on hand; every precinct in Cincinnati had its charter watcher. When I appeared at the precinct in my ward I was immediately informed that I was a watcher for the charter amendment only, and it was agreed that the charter vote would be counted first in order that I might go home. But I announced my entire willingness to remain and my desire not to be the recipient of such consideration. Then I was told bluntly that I couldn't stay; but I stated that I rather thought I would anyhow. Then it was suggested that I might get tired, as it was quite a tedious process to count all the ballots and it would probably take a long time. I cheerfully admitted that even so I was not asking for favors. At last I was informed that it was against the law for me to remain for the entire count, but that threat didn't seem to have the effect on me it was supposed to have. I said I was perfectly willing to have a test case made. Finally I was told I could stay if I "wanted to" and the "boss" said I could. So the "boss" took the matter under consideration and finally announced that it was perfectly proper and likewise perfectly legal for me to remain.

The "gang" has learned that when the public conscience is aroused it speaks with no uncertain voice.

Cincinnati, November 16 MARY D. BRITE

Farmers and Their Debts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read the article by Gertrude Mathews Shelby entitled The Politicians Betray the Farmer. She says among other things: "Ultimately, by 'loans at cost and loans that never come due' (repaid in regular instalments), the farmers will get out of debt." I beg to differ with that statement. As long as the system that put the farmers in debt continues they will never get out of debt. Of the six million farmers in the United States, three million are tenant farmers, and that is due to the fact that the land provided by the Creator for the equal use of all is rented to them by LAND-lords, thereby producing a nation of creditors and debtors.

Brooklyn, November 28 GEORGE LLOYD

An Open Letter to Ex-Soldiers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As an ex-soldier and a pacifist I was delighted to read A. H. Gibbs's article, What Every Veteran Knows. We ex-soldiers owe it to our generation to "speak out" about war. We owe it even more to the kiddies and the unborn than to our comrade dead in "Flanders Fields."

Why are so many ex-soldiers silent about the whole war system? Why do so few of them ever speak for the principles for which we youth fought—on every front? They know how we were made to hate by lying propaganda; lured on by ideals which were insincere; deceived by a "peace" which is only a truce. Almost all ex-soldiers know these bitter truths; why do they not speak up before younger brothers and little sons before the time when younger brothers and little sons grow up, as General Ian Hamilton expressed it, "to march, as we marched, to the paths of glory, and to find them, as we found them, a grave"?

One answer to this question is to be found in the degrading influence of war. Many ex-soldiers are spiritual casualties. Though they are repelled by the naked savagery of war, yet they cling to the brutal philosophy of life with which they were infected by military service.

But fortunately for humanity, there are many ex-soldiers of the type of Major Gibbs, Major Stallings (author of "What Price Glory"), General Currie of Canada, General Hamilton of England, General Shoenaich of Germany, and Generals Verraux and Percin of France, who have had the courage to call war what they know it is, to break with the war system, and to stand forth for a new day.

The British youth in their "No More War Movements" number many ex-soldiers. The American Fellowship of Youth for Peace has five former soldiers on its national council and scores of soldier members who are living refutations of the charge that war-abolitionists or pacifists are cowards.

Even though disabled men are leaders in the Fellowship of Youth for Peace the Hearst press declared on Defense Day: "We look in vain among these purple-scented, lily-livered pacifists for empty sleeves."

Ex-soldiers, here is a challenge to your moral courage. How many of you dare to join our ex-service men's section of the F. Y. P.? If you are interested in the world-wide youth movement to end war in our generation, write our office for literature and information concerning enrolment.

Your Tank-Corps Buddy,

New York, November 15 THOMAS Q. HARRISON,
National Secretary,
Fellowship of Youth for Peace

Catholicism and the State

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your September 3 issue is a letter from David Y. Thomas of Fayetteville, Arkansas, in which appears the following statement: "The supremacy of the church over the state is a fundamental tenet of Catholicism." Judging from the tone of his letter, Mr. Thomas will welcome information showing the error of that statement, while The Nation, one may be sure, will not object to it. In his "Encyclical Letter on the Christian Constitution of the State," published in November, 1885, Pope Leo XIII, addressing his words to the Catholics of the entire world, set forth Catholic teaching in respect to the relations of church and state in the following words:

> Almighty God has appointed the charge of the human race between two powers, the ecclesiastical and the civil, the one being set over divine and the other over human things. Each has fixed limits within which it is contained, and each in its sphere is supreme. Whatever is of a sacred character, belonging either of its own nature or by reason of the end to which it is referred to the salvation of souls or to the worship of God, is subject to the church. Whatever is to be ranged under the civil and political order is rightfully subject to the civil authorities.

As applied to America, we have the interpretation of that principle from the same illustrious pontiff given in an encyclical letter addressed to the Catholics of America in 1895:

> All men will agree that America seems destined for great things. The Catholic Church should not only share in, but should help to bring about this prospective greatness. She should keep equal step with the republic in the march of improvement, striving to the utmost by her virtue and her institutions to aid in the rapid growth of the States . . . ever keeping before the minds of the people the enactments of the Council of Baltimore, particularly those which inculcate the observance of the laws and institutions of the republic.

Of more recent date is the statement contained in the pastoral letter of the Catholic archbishops and bishops of our country, meeting in Washington in 1919, as follows:

> The state has a sacred claim upon our respect and loyalty. It may justly impose obligations and demand sacrifices for the sake of the common welfare which it is established to promote. Within its proper limits it has a right to our obedience, and this obedience we are bound to render not merely on grounds of expediency but as a conscientious duty.

Louisville, Kentucky, September 4 BENEDICT ELDER

Books, Music, Plays

First Glance

THE study of American folk-literature must in the nature of things proceed sporadically. We might prefer to see a vast net thrown over all the continent at once, a net from which no single deposit of song or superstition could escape; but we must be content with something dragged up here and something caught, perhaps by accident, there. The search has been especially active in recent years. Popular ballads have been collected from Kentucky, the Southwest, the Carolinas, and the lumber camps of the North. Myths about mighty men—Paul Bunyan, Tony Beaver, and Pecos Bill—have got into the monthly magazines. Four years ago appeared a volume devoted to Kentucky superstitions. And now appears "Legends of Texas" (Austin; Texas Folk-lore Society: $1.50), edited by J. Frank Dobie from materials gathered by himself and others through years of riding and talking and reading. It is an entertaining volume, one which Mr. Dobie has put together not so much for the professional anthropologist—he furnishes no apparatus for the comparison of his findings with those of scholars in fields remote from his—as for the lay Texan who some time will appropriate these legends for literary use. However that last may be, the book is rich in suggestion for any mind, and incidentally it has value as a picture of a people.

Mr. Dobie gives the largest share of his space to legends of buried treasure and lost mines. Other sections, dealing with supernatural visitations, for instance, and lovers' leaps, are less interesting than this one because their stuff is obviously less indigenous and authentic. Mr. Dobie finds the very soul of Texas in these beliefs, cherished by so many persons over so long a time, concerning Spanish gold sunk under sand or spilled into streams or hidden beneath hillside rocks. No Spaniard who came up as far as Texas ever brought real treasure with him, it would seem; but all of his race had dreams of gold, and now the settlers from the North have inherited those dreams, contracted that credulity. Texans of simple faith will pay a good price for charts—platas—directing them to buried wealth, and they will dig whole acres up with never a penny for their pains. Mr. Dobie, doubtless not without some relish for the plainness of the details, speaks of "four hundred dollars in Mexican coin that were rooted up by hogs in Frio County forty years ago"; but men have no such luck. The pile of stones that marked the site is scattered. As your horse leaps over a spring a bar of silver shines up out of it, but you go back the next day and you cannot find the spring. A Mexican leads you into a valley where he once saw trains of pay-carts standing full; somehow as you proceed the terrain ceases to be familiar, and the search ends nowhere. And there is Mike Wilson, "who is believed to be on his death-bed in a little hut in the Guadalupe Mountains, vainly trying to remember the location of probably one of the richest gold mines in the world."

Not so very long ago such stories as Mr. Dobie and his collaborators tell were dressed up in literary language borrowed for the purpose. Here they are quite naked; the language is local, the figures are homely, and there are no false moves toward romance. "One day while Murphy was holding down a wormy calf out in the pasture to doctor it he raised his eyes and saw . . ." Heroes ride to the scene of action not on foaming steeds but in buckboards. The spirit of a murdered man manifests itself in the form of a strange dog, and of a gate that will not stay shut. And the mysterious music in the San Bernard River at Music Bend in Brazoria County is reported sometimes to resemble "the sounds made by a steer which, having been knocked in the head, falls, kicking and beating the ground and bellowing in pain." The result is romance after all, of course—or, what is better yet, conviction in the reader that ordinary people with ordinary eyes believe they have beheld romance.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Nietzschean Novel

The Boy in the Bush. By D. H. Lawrence and M. L. Skinner. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

IT may be left to the psychoanalysts to explain the cause of the peculiar ambivalence of Mr. D. H. Lawrence's emotions, but whatever its cause this ambivalence is the most striking thing about his work. Neither he nor any of his heroes can love without at the same time hating, and the sense of maddened frustration thus generated is the driving force behind his work. Never desiring anything without being at the same time desperately anxious to escape it, he wanders from country to country in a state of almost unbearable irritation until the pressure of suppressed emotion becomes too great to be endured and he is compelled to discharge it in a book where various projections of his own personality fret and boil. Sometimes the passion may be obscure enough, but it is always too intense to seem dull; and even his mere accumulated irritation, always ready to be launched at whatever happens to catch his eye for a moment, imparts an unfailing vigor to his style. Thin legs, for example, can become a symbol of all that is contemptible in a contemptible world and he can dispose of them thus, once and for all:

> He hated a man slouching along with a discolored face and trousers slopping down his insignificant legs. He loathed that look which tramps and ne'er-do-wells usually have, as if their legs weren't there inside their beastly bags. Despicable about the rear and the legs. The best of the farmers, on the contrary, had strong, sinewey legs, full of life. . . . And Tom had good live legs. But poor old Dad had not been very alive, inside his pants.

So genuine is the passion that the reader is compelled, for the time being at least, to hate thin legs almost as much as the author; and the same sweep of passion carries him through more weighty passages. Yet when the spell of the book has passed he will realize that he has been vicariously experiencing Lawrence's turmoil without entirely understanding the reasons for it, and he will be led to ponder not so much the problems of his own existence as the problem of the author's peculiar temperament. Whence comes his baffled fury, and why is it that the rage of his characters is at once obviously genuine and yet not wholly rational?

Doubtless the original difficulty lay in that peculiar psychological twist which made it impossible for the hero of "Sons and Lovers" to unite himself wholly with any of the women whom he loved. But this sexual frustration has spread until with Lawrence it has produced a parallel in every activity of life, and no desire, whatever it may be, can be direct or clear. Finding himself utterly unable to be satisfied by any of the commonly accepted values, he has retired further and further into himself until at last he has developed a psychological system and an ethic which serve to justify his irritation in his own eyes. More and more his books have ceased to be objective representations of life and come to be projections of his own ego into situations which will help to make clear both the nature of his feelings and the scheme of thought by which they explain themselves. Thus "The Boy in the Bush," though it is said to be the rewriting of a novel published some time ago by an Australian woman novelist, is so completely assimilated by him that it becomes obviously a spiritual autobiography.

It tells of a young man expelled from the "tame" society of England to make his way in Australia; but its raison d'être is the development of his consciousness and his opinions along the lines upon which all of Lawrence's characters have been working. Like his creator he has always hated the place where he found himself; gradually he discovers that his only possible home is within himself. Born of a mother who teaches him that there is both a tame virtue and a wild virtue, he wishes first to be free without knowing from what or for what. Then by stages he deifies his own impulses into Lawrence's "dark God within" and becomes a law to himself. Love all but conquers him, until by taking two wives instead of one he proves himself its master instead of its slave and thus escapes destruction. "Before he went over the border he might have been tricked into a surrender to the soft hideous thing they called love, but now he would have love in his own way, haughtily, passionately, and darkly." We leave him as he is conducting this second wife home to the first, and the implication is that he has at last become reconciled to his restless discontent through the conviction that it is the distinguishing mark of a superiority which places him in the master class.

Thus the book seems to be thoroughly Nietzschean, even down to the express acceptance of the doctrine that life is good because it is painful. Yet, interesting as it is, it is not wholly convincing as doctrine for the reason hinted above: the philosophy is invented to fit the emotions instead of being the cause of them. The reader cannot escape the suspicion that some maladjustment to life has called forth Mr. Lawrence's mysticism and that the maladjustment is one too rare to be more than an interesting curiosity. The author can hardly hope to win disciples save among those who suffer from his own particular psychic twist. Fascinating as his books are, he must be put down as another one of the many who have mistaken the twinge of a nerve awry for the voice of a hidden god.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Frank Cobb

Cobb of "The World": A Leader in Liberalism. Compiled from his editorial articles and public addresses by John L. Heaton. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

FRANK COBB believed in the anonymous impersonality of the editorial; the World was to him an institution, not a medium through which to express himself—yet his work had a sweep and a ring that made men who knew say, as they read the World, "That's Cobb" and men who had never heard his name cry with enthusiasm, "That's the real old World style." He stamped his character on the most characterful editorial page in American newspapers and came to be one of the few nationally known editors of an editorless age.

John Heaton, Cobb's collaborator through nearly all his twenty years' service on the World, has collected a hundred of Cobb's characteristic editorials and articles, and added a sketch of Cobb the Man by Lindsay Denison, another long-time associate. Cobb never went to college; he was a rural high-school superintendent in Michigan before he began his newspaper career in Grand Rapids; and he was only thirty-four when Joseph Pulitzer drafted him from the Detroit Free Press after scanning the editorial pages of the continent. Meanwhile, however, Cobb had been studying. He knew American history as few university men knew it. He could quote the founding fathers aptly and easily—indeed these editorials quote from amazingly few except Lincoln and the founders. Apart from a few political writers the literary allusions include one passage from the Bible, one from Lowell, one from Beaumont and Fletcher, and two quotations from Kipling's verse; in an essay on Shaw he refers rather limpingly to Ibsen and Zola. Cobb's power lay not in literary grace or charm, but in a sledge-hammer directness, a manifest sincerity, and a capacity to dig and discover facts and then array them vigorously. He used short sentences; he knew the force of repetition; and he never wasted space in persiflage, intellectual subtleties, or fine writing. He knew what he wanted to say before he began writing an editorial; and when he had said it he stopped. There are no introductions and no perorations in his writing, but he had the gift of the final sentence that leaves an echo. At schools of journalism classes in editorial writing will have to use this selection from Cobb's work as a textbook.

Fortunately for him Cobb had none of the disheartening doubts of these latter days. He had unhesitating faith in democracy and in the American people. In 1913 he wrote that "In the course of these thirty years democracy has fought its fight with plutocracy and triumphed; the supremacy of human rights over property rights has been established"—and he probably still believed that when he died in 1923. As with many another survivor of early battles memories of the old obscured the significance of later struggles.

A kind of laissez-faire liberalism related to the eighteenth-century philosophy in which he steeped himself made him blind to the meaning of the labor movement. He was an almost purely political thinker; post-war economic issues meant little to him, and the new psychology less. He saw issues in black and white as right or wrong. In the war the Germans were all black; he swallowed the Potsdam myths. But the old-fashioned American streak in him made him staunch for free speech throughout and a crusader against propaganda when the war was done. He stood the test of defending free speech where he hated it: "The rule that applies to the Sinn Fein Irish, the Socialists, and the I. W. W.", he wrote in August, 1917, "applies to the militant suffragists and all the other assistant Germans who are trying to bedevil the Government of the United States when all its energies are needed for the prosecution of a great war. . . . The least dangerous thing that the most disloyal American can do is to talk or scribble. . . . The free play of public opinion can be trusted in war as well as in peace, and it is well to trust it." With his readiness for freedom of speech and of discussion went a confidence in it as a solvent of ills. Set public opinion free, he felt, and all would be well. He seemed to believe that public opinion could be set free by an act of will, as a moral principle. He did not appreciate the rarity of his position under Joseph and Ralph Pulitzer, the independent owners of the World. Increasingly, newspapers are businesses and editors hirelings. Inevitably and unconsciously newspapers become class and mass organs, stifling minorities; and only organized minorities can safeguard freedom.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

The Genealogy of a Genre

The Short Story's Mutations. By Frances Newman. B. W. Huebsch, Inc. $2.50.

THE legislature, the mob, and the fundamentalists of Georgia have conspired to make the name of their commonwealth a synonym for unenlightenment and reactionary violence, so that Heywood Broun, recently listing the things he instinctively hates, set Georgia high on his list. There must, however, be in that State something of a civilized minority, or certain Georgians would not have written the books which they have lately published. W. E. Woodward cannot be too confidently ascribed to Georgia, though he began his career as a writer there, and he has indeed just left the United States for an indefinite stay in Europe; moreover, Laurence Stallings and Walter F. White, while born in Georgia, live in New York. But Julia Collier and Julian Harris have successfully ridiculed the Ku Klux Klan in Columbus, John D. Wade keeps his head in the University at Athens, and Frances Newman flourishes as librarian and journalist in Atlanta. Possibly more significant still is the story of that modest young Atlantan who not long ago told a Manhattan editor that he had been led by reading Sherwood Anderson's "Story-Teller's Story" to give up an uncongenial business and to vow that he would do something more creative or else be a vagabond. The imbecilities of the anti-evolutionists may yet sting the educated Georgians into action. Where there is difference of opinion, there is always hope.

Miss Newman's book, of course, does not concern itself in any sense with Georgia, but it proves that an inhabitant of the city which shelters the Imperial Wizard can do a thing so unrepresentative of the Georgia majority as to trace the line of the short story, with erudition and intelligence, from Petronius to Paul Morand. "The Short Story's Mutations" is a remarkable anthology, and more. Besides reprinting sixteen stories, from Petronius, the fabliaux, the "Gesta Romanorum," Boccaccio, Voltaire, Hans Christian Andersen, Musset, Mérimée, Maupassant, Laforgue, Henry James, Chekhov, Sherwood Anderson, D. H. Lawrence, James Joyce, and Paul Morand, Miss Newman furnishes a commentary which sets a new standard for the American anthologist. What she has done, in brief, is to genealogize her own preferences. Leaving to more orthodox authorities the task of general history, she has traced the line of descent of the type among short stories which she herself prefers. That there are other types she knows well enough, for she is widely and discriminatingly read. But she makes no pretense of abstract justice to types outside her favorite line. She works, that is to say, not so much with a critical as with a creative mind, seizing upon those qualities which, it may be guessed, she herself would like her own stories to have, and viewing the successes of rival practitioners of the art with the magnanimity, as Mr. Cabell says, of a teased cobra.

The reference to Mr. Cabell serves to introduce a comparison of "The Short Story's Mutations" with "Straws and Prayer-Books." The method of the two treatises in much the same, except that whereas Mr. Cabell varies his discourse with illustrative stories which he himself has written, Miss Newman varies the stream of hers with stories which have been written by the masters whom she approves. Of their art she says many shrewd and pertinent things, but, like Mr. Cabell, she says less about their artistic processes, strictly considered, than about the intellectual attitudes which they take toward the life which furnishes them with materials. Thus she does not deal merely with substances which have come to her second hand; she strikes through the art to the artist, and through him to his directing intelligence and to the objects of his contemplation. This is not the simplest form of criticism, nor is it perhaps at all points the justest. But it is in the long run the best.

CARL VAN DOREN

"The Land of the Fathers"

The Land of the Fathers. By Sergey Gussiev-Orenburgsky. The Dial Press. $2.50.

TRANSLATIONS from the Russian nowadays should be dated. This novel of Gussiev-Orenburgsky's was written on the eve of the 1905 revolution. But to the vaguely informed the announcement on the gay orange jacket—"depicts a Russia strange to foreigners brought up on Tolstoi and Turgenev"—suggests an interpretation of the Russia after the deluge. Add Gorki to Tolstoi and Turgenev, and foreign readers will find nothing strange about this Russia of the opening century. The characters address their familiar and unanswerable questions to life: Why do we live? What, then, shall we do? The young proclaim that their liberated spirits have broken out of the cage of their fathers' prejudices—as they have proclaimed in each decade of Russian fiction. And the workmen rattle their chains, lift solemnly exalted faces toward the sunrise, and sing the songs of the future. These themes come like touching and beautiful echoes across the gulf of the Great War and the Revolution. It may be that they are being played now in Russia, but with the variations that would make all the difference of novel suggestion. New cages for old, perhaps, but with the illusion of freedom brightening the new.

The voracious capitalist oppressors in this book, the downtrodden peasants, the village revolt, the strike in the factory, the secret meetings, the eloquent speeches, the arrests, the riot—and the riot is a stirring bit of narrative—recall the striking display of posters last year at the Moscow Agricultural Exhibition, in the building called Lenin's Corner. Posters in vivid blacks and reds, crude, effective—and yet curiously unreal, like all propaganda viewed in retrospect. Moving in and out among the posters in this novel is the quite solid and fully realized figure of the robust priest, Father Ivan, who learns to fear neither thinking nor loving, and therefore comes to see that he must unfrock himself. In his church there is no place for the free man who seeks to serve a free God—and, the flippant may add, to take his neighbor's wife. Father Ivan battles vigorously with his difficulties, material and spiritual, and emerges at last on the heights, whence he sees humanity in the plains below, tormenting and being tormented meaninglessly; sees the injustice of it all, and feels that "he must hearten them with something strong and dominating, something which would echo like the sound of a bell in their hearts. What was it? He did not know yet . . . he did not know what it was . . . but he would learn!" One would be more hopeful of his learning if one understood him more intimately; if, in short, the author had not relied so much on propaganda posters to explain his priest's progress.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

Benjamin Constant

Benjamin Constant. By Elizabeth W. Schermerhorn. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

ONE of the most inexplicable things about Napoleon is that though he had no friends, though nobody who came in contact with him ever learned to love him, thousands of men followed him blindly. The most difficult myth to explain away is the Napoleonic legend. Even Professor Guérard, whose recent fascinating reflections on that subject have left admirers of Napoleon gasping with indignation, has not seriously challenged Napoleon's hold on the imagination. One of the earliest victims of the legend was Benjamin Constant. After he had followed Madame de Staël into exile, after he had been swept back into Paris in the train of Louis XVIII, after he had declared when the news of the return from Elba arrived that he would never play the part of a miserable renegade, the inevitable capitulation followed. Constant was invited to present himself at the Tuileries and he came away "hypnotized, astonished, convinced."

For the rest of his life Benjamin Constant dragged after him the charge of apostasy. "Go hang yourself, Talleyrand!" he remarked cynically, "we have been playing traitor and you weren't in it." If he was a traitor it must be admitted that he was in good company. Ney, who boasted that he would bring back Napoleon in a cage, had succumbed to the Emperor's personality without firing a shot. The bravest of the brave, the man who had fought five hundred battles for France and never drawn his sword against her, was executed for treason, while Constant lived to guide his countrymen into the path of liberal government.

In spite of the pose of cynicism, which, like most cynics, he adopted to hide his real emotions, Benjamin Constant did not give his services to the Emperor with any thought of personal advantage. Being susceptible to flattery he was an easy victim for Napoleon, but he yielded from the highest motives. He believed, and there is no possibility of proving him to have been wrong, that Bonaparte would be compelled to restore the liberties of France. No man was more enamored of liberty than Constant. Throughout his life he never swerved from the support of religious toleration, freedom of the press, and constitutional government. His speeches and pamphlets on these subjects were in everybody's hands, so much so that he came to be known as the first publicist in Europe. Even today his famous pamphlet "De l'Esprit de Conquête" is curiously alive and applicable to the needs of the twentieth century. It was reprinted in 1918 with an introduction by Albert Thomas, not as a literary curio but as a contribution to the problems of peace. "In modern times," says Constant, "a victorious war costs infinitely more than it can bring into the treasury." What a pity that that little pamphlet could not have been included in the prescribed reading for Junkerdom along with the ponderous tomes of Treitschke!

Unfortunately the character of Constant was not up to the level of his intellectual attainments. Something was lacking which might have given him the popularity or at least the respect that he craved. Béranger had it, a man not nearly so gifted as Constant, and because of it he went to prison and became the idol of France. We may call it the capacity to suffer for a conviction. No one can read Constant's autobiographical novel, "Adolphe," without realizing that the author had suffered; but the luxury of grief depicted in Adolphe was not exactly the experience calculated to temper a weak character. "Adolphe" is one of those curious novels, like Chateaubriand's "René," in which the author analyzes the memory of his emotions long after he has ceased to feel them. Character and environment count for nothing; the only source of interest is the pageant of a bleeding heart. We are not quarreling with the genre, but it is almost incredibly out of date. It is strange that Constant the novelist should be so infinitely removed from our tastes and sympathies when his pamphlets, usually the most ephemeral things in literature, still command our attention.

Miss Schermerhorn complains that Benjamin Constant has been unlucky in his biographers and that Sainte-Beuve in particular has damned him with faint praise. If this be so, justice has at length been done to him. Miss Schermerhorn has followed the sinuous path of his career, his love affairs with Madame de Staël, his philanderings with Madame Récamier, his achievements as an author and a statesman, without once intruding herself upon the reader's attention. Her method of biography is not as ambitious nor perhaps as creative as that of Guedalla or Lytton Strachey, but perhaps for that very reason the picture gains in intensity. It is a fascinating story that up till now had never been adequately told.

ARNOLD WHITRIDGE

Books in Brief

Mobilizing for Peace. Edited by Frederick Lynch. Fleming J. Revell Company. $2.

This is a series of addresses by a number of prominent churchmen who, a few years ago, were mobilized during the war to make the world safe for democracy—not in the trenches but on the platform—and who now profess an admirable interest in peace. Outside of the usual peacetime generalities of clergymen they have little to say about the problems of peace except that most of them profess the very comfortable gospel of the League of Nations. As an exposition of Christian pacifism we prefer the works of a certain unpopular minority of students at Northwestern University to the amiable platitudes of these gentlemen, who were, temporarily, so much more successful in making the last war holy than they yet have been in tackling the problem of a just and lasting peace.

Bushrangers. By Charles J. Finger. McBride. $3.

Mr. Finger has traveled enough in strange lands himself to have a taste for the adventurous life everywhere. In these tales of Australia before it became too civilized and tamely dull there are reckless and daring men, men able to endure incredible hardship and pain, men urged to become outlaws by a thirst for excitement and the monotony of London poverty, and men betrayed at last by their own bravado or stupidity or by mistaken kindness to a fellow-sufferer. Like the heroes of "Highwaymen," these gentlemen nearly all end their careers on the gallows or in the convict colony, yet it is certain that if they had been more respectable they could not have been more gay or dashing, and they would have furnished considerably less entertainment. Stormy Petrel Popjoy, the brave lad who almost broke up the coronation of His Majesty King George IV out of pure love for a joke, and who as a result spent his life in exile and rebellion until pardoned for as gallant a deed as heart could wish, is fit to stand beside certain epic heroes. Unfortunately, his Odyssey ended in disaster, but it and the tales of his companions in Mr. Finger's latest thriller from life are worth a dozen books of fictitious adventure.

My Brother's Face. By Dhan Gopal Mukerji. Dutton. $2.

This book presents both ancient India, with all its color and beauty and its doctrine of renunciation, of being, not doing, and India as it is being changed by contact with the West. The smoke of factories mingles on the shore of the sacred Ganges with the funeral pyres of the dead; the old, old streets of Calcutta have been widened to admit automobiles; the gold or purple or green sari which wrapped Indian women in dignity and grace is giving way to a dark skirt and a white blouse. Dhan Gopal Mukerji, after twelve years of living in the midst of Western civilization, is shocked to see the changes in his native country; he is disturbed by the possibility of conflict between the East and the West; when he takes his problem to a holy man in Benares he is told that external conflicts do not matter if there is inner peace. Therein lies an even more perplexing dilemma for India: she may attain inner peace at the price of stagnation and exploitation by the West; or she may become industrialized and, fighting the West with its own weapons, lose her own integrity. Mukerji does not know the answer to this problem; nobody knows it at present, although it may be that Gandhi, that man "in whose eyes shines the peace of Allah," with his boycott of foreign goods and his doctrine of non-resistance may be nearer a solution than anyone.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter

Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Puccini and Fauré

By PITTS SANBORN

IN the month of November died two composers who count—Gabriel Fauré in France and Giacomo Puccini in Italy. Fauré has interested an audience of comparatively few; the appeal of Puccini has been well-nigh world wide. And yet these two musicians of different nationality and artistic heritage were not so remote one from the other as a hasty observer might suppose. Puccini unquestionably owes his enormous popularity in all lands where occidental music prevails to his gift for provoking that primary purging of the emotions which is the shedding of tears. Fauré, too, can speak to the heart—witness his exquisite song "Les Berceaux"—but often he seems to address the intellect only. Neither man had the abounding native inspiration which makes the achievement of a Mozart or a Schubert (dead the one at thirty-five, the other at thirty-one) so impressive in its sheer ease and volume. Each was in his way a fastidious workman; each made haste slowly (even Puccini with the relentless whip of popularity urging him on); each cultivated his garden with an assiduous care; and, dying respectively in their sixty-sixth and eightieth years, each has left the world an important musical contribution.

The fame of Puccini suffers undeniably from a kind of paradox that dogs the footsteps of success. Were he less widely popular today his repute would be higher. Weber, Verdi, Wagner himself have tasted that contradictory cup. "Oh, Puccini . . . !" exclaim pretended addicts of Schönberg and Stravinsky, as if all of contumely were in the two words. Yet even Stravinsky will never be caviare again. Already he is welcome at many a bourgeois hearthside; tomorrow he will everywhere be sipping the tea of respectability, as secure in his comfort as Ibsen or Hardy. The fact that bootblacks and barbers stand three hours enthralled by a Puccini opera and lustily shout their joy of it is absolutely no reason why anybody else who avows his liking for Puccini should forthwith be set down as unbelievably naive, shockingly unsophisticated, stricken with bad taste beyond all hope of recovery or redemption.

The fact is, in "La Bohème" Puccini has created, as human products go, a perfect work. The life of young and struggling artists, their poverty, their hunger, their comradeship, their out-at-elbow joys and sorrows, was enshrined by Murger in his celebrated idyl of brick and mortar, "Scènes de la Vie de Bohème." Puccini was the man designed by God to make of it an opera. I would not dream of maintaining that his "Bohème" is so consummate a performance as "Die Meistersinger" or even as "Pelléas et Mélisande" (though here doubt enters), but it does preserve in music of intimate eloquence one phase—and not an unimportant one—of our manifold human experience.

Take the airs of Rodolfo and of Mimi in the first act. Was the shy avowal of amorous youth in that separate heaven which is an unheated garret ever so beautifully, so tenderly expressed as by this music which begins timidly and tentatively, gathers courage, swells to passionate disclosure, and then recedes, abashed and frightened at what it dared to say? And the act before the Café Momus, with its holiday hurly-burly amid gusts of snow, the lyric measures of the happy lovers, Musetta's challenging waltz shot through with latent fever, the irruption of the street band, the quick curtain; that act is a brief masterpiece. In the combination of disparate elements it is in its lesser way comparable with the first and second acts of "Die Meistersinger."

The individual quality of Puccini's melody (so unmistakable that it comes natural to use the singular in speaking of the melodic element in Puccini's work) finds its perfect mating in the subject of "La Bohème." To be sure, Puccini's melody first asserts its idiosyncrasy in "Manon Lescaut," an opera whose best pages are of a delightful spontaneity and freshness. But "Manon Lescaut" has always to contend against the captivating "Manon" of the Frenchman Massenet. "Madama Butterfly," owing its vogue to an effective libretto, is musically an adroit rehandling of earlier material, plus a generous dash of Japanese flavoring. What followed—"La Fanciulla del West," "Le Rondine," the triptych of one-act operas—could not, despite Puccini's abiding sense of the theater, last long. To the eye, "Gianni Schicchi" is a diverting enough farce of medieval Florence because it acts well. But Puccini's muse, like the earlier Bellini's, is a muse of sadness and tears; her laughter even is sorrowful. The liveliness of "Gianni Schicchi" is as desolate as a beribboned skeleton, and for its music, consciously or not, the composer turned in his extremity to Chaminade and Charles K. Harris.

Purposely I have not so far spoken of "Tosca." That opera stands apart from the rest of Puccini's work. It is both "grand" opera and hot, swift, lyric melodrama. And one indisputable distinction it possesses: it is the most successful piece of Sardoudling ever achieved in music. The trail of Meyerbeer is over some of it, and Puccini knew his "Boris" before Moussorgsky's masterpiece was even suspected by the audiences of western Europe. But Puccini is there too, a Puccini that does not care how hard he punches. "Tosca" is an opera of uneven merit; for raw brutality certain scenes have not been matched; but there is no gap in its effect as theater. Both in the primary matter and in the treatment, however, "Tosca" is outside the current that flows, now in a broader, now in a narrower stream, from the melodic reservoir tapped first for "Manon Lescaut" down through "La Bohème," "Madama Butterfly," and "La Fanciulla del West" to "Il Tabarro," "Suor Angelica," and "Gianni Schicchi" (it is too early yet to speak of "Turandot"). It is a curious fact that though "Tosca" captured the public from the beginning, Puccini never returned to the trail that it had profitably blazed.

"Tosca" in 1900 really ends Puccini's period of creation. And Puccini, in his turn, ends an epoch. He stands fifth and last in the big line of Italian composers of the nineteenth century. He took over the domination of the Italian lyric stage when Verdi left it, as Verdi had succeeded to the place of Donizetti and Donizetti to Bellini and Rossini. Deriving from Verdi only in the slightest degree, Puccini casts his roots rather into that emotional stratum of which Ponchielli and Boito were major and Catalani, Leoncavallo, and Mascagni minor manifestations. The impress of Wagner is, of course, patent. The curious, moreover, may trace the influence of Moussorgsky, of Debussy, and perhaps of other outlanders. Today Italian music is in the hands of a vastly different group. The future looks to Pizzetti, Malipiero, Zandonai, Casella, and their colleagues and disciples. But in that future the real fame of Puccini will undoubtedly increase, as the inflated currency of his operas shrinks to a healthy parity.

Fauré had not within him the seeds of popular appeal, and in some ways luck was against him. His penetrating, delicate, scrupulously wrought songs—of which "Les Roses d'Ispahan" is an ideal specimen—have been neglected by singers in favor of more obvious, more striking, more extravagant compositions. His fine incidental music for "Pelléas et Mélisande," the play, is all but forgotten in the fame of Debussy's opera. Musicians praise the fabric of his chamber music, but some folk dare to find it dry. His real importance as an innovator is obscured by the moderation, the measure, the balance, the refinement of his method. The humorous grotesqueries of Erik Satie, the explicit idiom of Debussy, the élan and vividness of Ravel caught on where Fauré's intellectual subtleties passed unnoticed.

And yet the young have sat at Fauré's feet and called him master. There are those who declare that he was the greatest musician (a dubious phrase) since Bach—a tribute also paid Saint-Saëns! Most find a world of patience indispensable to hearing through his opera of the patient "Pénélope," despite rare fineness in the workmanship; but a few who cannot be neglected profess to believe it an imperishable masterpiece. There are some who maintain that his sonatas, quartets, and quintets deserve to rank among the chief glories of chamber music. So the fame and fortune of Fauré have often fallen between the two stools of proverb. But at least his work is never meretricious. When the shockers of today are the Mrs. Winslows of tomorrow, time may be trusted to discover its just place.

Meanwhile, three aspects of the Fauré case may not be overlooked. One is the persistence of Fauré's creative activity up to the very end. He was sixty-eight when he gave "Pénélope" to the stage; and a requiem, the songs collectively entitled "L'Horizon chimérique," and a brave array of chamber compositions, including the second piano quintet and a quartet finished just before he died, belong to his last years.

Another is the fact that Fauré is an essential span in that bridge which leads from the great Frenchmen of the eighteenth century to Debussy, Ravel, and the Six themselves. As Wanda Landowska says in her acute review of the "Musiques d'aujourd'hui" of Emile Vuillermoz: "Between this 'astonishing andante, so pathetic and so restrained,' of Fauré and the 'Muse Plantine' of François-le-Grand [Couperin] are there not invisible bonds fine in the extreme?"

And finally Fauré is an important factor in the development of the modern French atmospheric technique.

Drama

Pure Theater

FROM the revival of an ancient Hindu classic, "The Little Clay Cart" (Neighborhood Playhouse), one might expect chiefly the exotic and the quaint. Actually, however, the impressions produced go infinitely deeper than either of these words would indicate, and they suggest reflections not only upon the whole theatrical art but upon civilization itself. Here, if anywhere, the spectator will be able to see a genuine example of that "pure theater" of which theorists talk, and here, too, he will be led to meditate upon that real wisdom of the East which lies not in esoteric doctrine but in a tenderness far deeper and truer than that of the traditional Christianity which has been so thoroughly corrupted by the hard righteousness of Hebraism. Here he will see acting which has abandoned all pretense of literal imitation but which is yet strikingly beautiful and impressive; staging which belongs frankly to the make-believe of children at play but which is nevertheless artistically satisfying; and, in addition, a play wholly artificial yet profoundly moving because it is not realistic but real.

To the producers at the Neighborhood Playhouse must, of course, go the credit for the penetration to see in the bare text the possibilities it held and for the skill necessary to set them forth. They have created upon the stage an adequate suggestion of the serenely curved line of Eastern architecture, and they have found actors capable of the exquisitely artificial intonation and gesture which produce the illusion of something simpler and more satisfactory than life. Yet no possible praise of their work can obscure the fact that the soul of the beauty which they have produced lay dormant in the ancient text. Whoever the author may have been, and whether he lived in the fourth century or the eighth, he was a man good and wise with the goodness and wisdom which come not from the lips or the smoothly flowing pen of the moralist but from the heart. An exquisite sympathy with the fresh beauty of youth and love tempered his serenity, and he was old enough to understand how a light-hearted story of ingenious complication could be made the vehicle of tender humanity and confident goodness. His simplicity was not the simplicity which knows little; it was instead the great and final simplicity which is simple because it can take for granted nearly everything about which others fret and wrangle.

Such a play can be produced only by a civilization which has reached stability; when a civilization has thought its way through all the problems it faces it must come to rest upon something calm and naive like this. Macbeth and Othello, however great and stirring they may be, are barbarous heroes because the passionate tumult of Shakespeare is the tumult produced by the conflict between a newly awakened sensibility and a series of ethical concepts inherited from the savage age. The realistic drama of our own time is the product of a like confusion; but when problems are settled, and when passions are reconciled with the decisions of an intellect, then form alone remains. Given an adequate wisdom, neither the tragedy of "Hamlet" nor the tragedy of "Ghosts" is possible; but the charm of lovers' intrigue and the beauty of generous forgiveness—these form the theme of "The Little Clay Cart"—are eternal, and the function of the artist is merely to realize anew their beauty. Nowhere in our own European past do we find, this side the classics, a work more completely civilized.

Never, it seems to me, has the Neighborhood Playhouse conducted an experiment so successful or so valuable. Miss Kyra Alanova as the courtesan heroine and Miss Paula Truman as her maid are charming, and the whole production is marvelously harmonious. Moreover, the delight which it brings is a delight different in kind from that which the theater ordinarily affords. Poetry has long been banished from the stage, and every recent attempt which has been made to achieve it by means of spoken verse has been at best a qualified success; but here is poetry absolutely genuine and exclusively theatrical. No words can describe it and no picture can convey it; it belongs to the theater alone, because nothing except the spoken word interpreted by the accompaniment of living pictures could call it forth.

The pre-holiday lull falling upon the theater has made it necessary to mention only two other productions. "Badges" (Forty-ninth Street Theater) is one of those conventional crook plays in which everybody turns out to be somebody else. It is, however, ingeniously told; and Gregory Kelly, as the youthful graduate of a correspondence school for detectives, who nevertheless makes good, is genuinely amusing. "Artistic Temperament" (Wallack's Theater) is preposterously bad.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

DEBATES ▣ LECTURES

The New School for Social Research
announces the following lecture by
COUNTESS CATHERINE KAROLYI
"Why I am an Exile"
Saturday, December 20, 8.20 P.M.
465 West 23rd Street Admission $1 New York City

OPEN FORUM Sunday, December 21, at 8 P. M.
MEXICO
FRANK TANNENBAUM
CARLETON BEALS
SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, 2 West 64th St., N. Y. C.
The Public is invited

International Relations Section

New Life in the Law

By FRITHJOF TOKSVIG

DENMARK'S first Labor Government came into power, it will be remembered, not long after Ramsay MacDonald moved into Downing Street. In addition to a Minister of War who is trying to do away with his own office by abolishing the army and navy at one stroke and a Minister of Education who, besides being the first woman Cabinet Minister in the world, is also an administrator of much sagacity and action, it contains a unique figure: a Minister of Justice who has lately concluded a tour to the prisons and penitentiaries of the country for the purpose, so to speak, of making the personal acquaintance of each convict. Though a hard task physically it was not an insurmountable one in a little country of three millions. But it is a task for which ministers of justice have hitherto lacked the mental agility necessary for trying to look at the law from the point of view of the law-breaker. The Danish Ministry of Justice is working at a revision of the penal code, and its head, Mr. Steincke, has shown a delightful directness in finding out what the convict has to say about his crime, his sentence, and his imprisonment—an important contribution to the formation of any penal code. These methods adopted by the Danish minister ought to be of interest to the Department of Justice of the United States and similarly conventional departments in other countries.

Whether or no Mr. Steincke has ever read Thomas De Quincey, it is a fact that he found the murderers to be the most interesting and intelligent category. The death penalty is not applied in Denmark and the psychology of these long-term convicts must surely throw light upon some important effects of the law.

Most of the convicts were "interviewed" in the wardens' offices of the various institutions without witnesses, while the comparatively few who serve their sentences in single cells were visited there—also without witnesses. A humorous touch was Mr. Steincke's meeting with a burglar who broke into his house two or three years ago. The recognition was mutual.

Brought thus face to face with the highest legal authority the majority of the convicts had remarkably few complaints, though there were, of course, requests of various kinds. The actual complaints were three in number: having been innocently condemned "this time," having received too severe a sentence in relation to the crime, and having been convicted because of remaining silent during the hearings. The latter is an interesting illustration of that "what I might have said" feeling which all of us have experienced.

This investigation, said Mr. Steincke to the press, was actuated neither by sentimentality nor mere humanitarianism, but only by a desire for that complete understanding of conditions which it is a legislator's duty to try to achieve. He believes that the penal code and the prison arrangements are of far less importance than people generally think, and that the general view of crime and the criminal would undergo a considerable change and many brutal and stupid assertions would be avoided if these human fates were met face to face.

Danish Disarmament

THE Danish Government bill for the abolition of the army and navy and the disarmament of fortifications is still before the Rigsdag. Its drastic proposals have excited violent opposition from the conservative parties within the country as well as from foreign governments. The important sections of the bill, together with "remarks" contained in the government paper giving the official text, are printed below:

Disarmament

1. Compulsory military service as per the law of June 8, 1912, is abolished, the military and naval conscription rolls become null and void, and the personnel thereon is crossed off. The Conscription Department, the Army and Navy, and the Ministries of War and Marine are abolished.

2. All fortifications are to be disarmed and razed. The material, buildings, and sites released from the army and navy are to be transferred for other public use or offered for sale.

3. The work of the general staff's topographical department and of the sea-chart department is to be continued. The army's and the navy yard's factories, workshops, laboratories, and the like are to be transferred for civil use under the state.

4. A watch corps shall be established and equipped to aid, in certain situations, the frontier gendarmerie, the customs service, and the police in guarding the frontier and coasts and in maintaining law and order.

A necessary number of ships, etc., shall be equipped and armed for fisheries inspection and charting, for the patrolling of Danish waters, and to safeguard the interests of Danish citizens in Danish sea-territory; more detailed decisions regarding this to be fixed by law.

5. Private corps, which are trained or organized for military activity, may not be established or exist. The volunteer corps now existing shall be disbanded within three months after this law goes into effect. Their weapons become the property of the state. Rifle associations which train their members in target practice are permitted when they are not organized as military corps, do not supply their members with firearms outside of practice, and do not hold military exercises.

Details regarding the manufacture and sale of firearms and ammunition shall be further fixed by law.

Remarks on the Bill

The bill corresponds in all essentials to the bill for a disarmament law put forward in 1922 by the Social-Democratic members of the Folketings army law committee.

The contention then made that Denmark as a member of the League of Nations has no obligation to maintain a military apparatus for use in war has since been strengthened still more.

When the World War broke out in 1914 it was seen that the Military Arrangement of 1909 failed completely. The main point of this arrangement was that Copenhagen should be safeguarded against having to surrender under the threat of bombardment. But when the highest authorities of the army and navy were asked in 1914, they declared that from the seaward side it was impossible to prevent a bombardment of Copenhagen to its very center and a defense from the landward side could only be of very short duration.

After the end of the World War, therefore, all quarters were agreed that in view of the experience we had gained the Military Arrangement of 1909 could not be maintained and in accordance with a law of February 12, 1919, there was appointed a Commission for Investigation and Consideration of the Future Arrangement of the Army and Navy. One of the tasks of this commission was "to draw up a collective plan for the future arrangement of the army and navy in which particular consideration must be taken to insure that the arrangement be compatible with Denmark's position in relation to other countries."

The commission submitted its report in the financial year 1922 and immediately thereafter the Government put forward a bill for a new defense act. In August of the same year the Government passed the laws for the arrangement of the army and navy now in effect.

In the new arrangement the direct defense of Copenhagen, the main feature of the Arrangement of 1909, was completely abandoned, and instead, as far as the army was concerned, the main emphasis was laid on the defense of Jutland.

But also in this respect is it certain that the army and navy created by the laws of 1922 will be completely unable to carry out the task intrusted to them. And this has also been fully affirmed by the statements of military experts since the laws were passed.

By adopting the present disarmament bill and the bills for the establishment of a watch corps and a state marine, Denmark will be in a position to fulfil her obligations and an arrangement will be created which will not only mean considerable economies but will also give greater security than the military arrangement of 1922.

Russia Answers Britain

THE Russian replies to the recent British notes repudiating the treaties negotiated by the MacDonald Government and discussing the Zinoviev letter have been published in the Manchester Guardian for November 29. The first on the subject of the treaties is addressed to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs:

November 28, 1924

SIR: I received, and acquainted my Government with, your note of November 21 in which the British Government notifies its refusal to advise the ratification of the general and commercial treaties of August 8 signed by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the British Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and by Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Soviet Government expresses its regret at the rejection of these treaties, the conclusion of which constituted an important step toward securing general peace, and in particular toward the strengthening of friendly relations between the peoples of Great Britain and of the Soviet Republics.

I am directed by my Government to state that on its part it has displayed the maximum of good-will and of concessions in connection with the working out of a basis of agreement on questions of particular interest to the British Government, to the working class, and to other sections of the British population. Therefore my Government cannot take any of the responsibility for the feeling of discontent which the decision of the British Government will cause in both countries.

I have the honor, etc. C. RAKOVSKY

The Russian reply to the letter on the Zinoviev incident, also addressed to the British Foreign Office, follows:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of November 21 and of Mr. Gregory's letter of the same date, with the contents of which I have acquainted my Government. I am instructed by my Government to recall the following facts:

The alleged letter of Mr. Zinoviev addressed to the Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party of Great Britain was the occasion for this correspondence and for Mr. Gregory's note of October 24, handed to me on the evening of the same date, four days prior to the British elections. Immediately upon receipt of the above note I informed Mr. MacDonald in writing of my absolute conviction that the alleged letter from Mr. Zinoviev was a forgery. Further, in a note to Mr. MacDonald on October 27 I stated that after having made careful investigation in Moscow my Government had instructed me to declare categorically that the alleged Zinoviev letter was an absolute forgery.

In view of the very great attention given by British public opinion to this document my Government, in order to remove any doubts whatsoever and in order to establish the unbiased truth, offered to submit the document in question for impartial investigation and arbitration. During several weeks my Government received no reply to its offer. In the meantime many members of the British Government had publicly expressed their doubts as to the genuineness of the alleged document and some of them had even expressed their conviction that it was a forgery.

In view of the doubts existing in the matter the British Government found it necessary, after the election campaign, to appoint an authoritative committee of the Cabinet, including the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to examine the nature and origin of the document. This committee established that neither the Government nor any of the government departments of Great Britain had seen any "original document." This fact was made public on November 4.

These curious circumstances explain why public opinion throughout the world considers the "Zinoviev letter" as an undoubted forgery. This declaration by an authoritative British committee destroyed the grounds upon which were based the accusation made by Mr. Gregory against the Soviet Government in the height of the election campaign, and my Government was inclined to consider the declaration as an actual withdrawal of the accusation. Indeed, the most elementary rules of jurisprudence forbid the making of accusations on the strength of copies of documents which have been neither verified nor certified by anyone and which no one of the accusers has ever seen.

It might be well to add that we understand that the delegation from the British Trade Unions Congress, consisting of Messrs. Purcell, Tillett, Bromley, Findley, Bramley, Turner, and Smith, has, as a result of its investigations in Moscow into the genuineness of the "Zinoviev letter," unanimously came to the conclusion that "the delegation is absolutely convinced that the 'document' is a forgery, that no evidence to the contrary can be produced, and that the refusal of the Russian offer of arbitration can only be explained on that ground."

In view of the above my Government expresses its extreme surprise that the present Government of Great Britain has found it possible completely to ignore the fact established by its predecessor and that after having declined the offer for an investigation of the "document" by an impartial court it makes vague statements unsupported by any evidence that the "document" is genuine. My Government cannot accept such unproved allegations.

My Government considers that it has even more reason for rejecting the unfounded allegations made by the British Government since in the past accusations have repeatedly been made against the Soviet Government based on documents which on closer examination were found to be forged and of which even the origin has been established. My Government considers as established and proved the fact that in a number of cities in Europe and America there exist organizations under the leadership of Rusian counter-revolutionary emigrants and of other suspicious elements engaged especially in the fabricating of forged documents with a view to undermining the international position of the Soviet Union. Quite recently I have submitted to the Foreign Office documental evidence at my disposal proving that on the territory of Great Britain there exist political organizations engaged in the fabrication and distribution of false documents concerning the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

In the name of my Government I express my deep regret that the British Government should base political acts having the most serious bearing upon the further relations between the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Great Britain on unverified documents emanating from doubtful sources, and should thus place the relations between the two governments on a very precarious foundation in that it makes them dependent upon the action of malevolent and sinister persons and political organizations pursuing selfish aims.

My Government considers that the declaration made by the British Cabinet committee on November 4 as to the absence of the document referred to by Mr. Gregory in his note of October 24 fully disproves the accusation made by him. My Government cherishes the belief that the British Government will in future be more circumspect in its accusations and that it will examine more carefully facts on which it bases official communications. If, however, the present Government wishes to ignore the statement made by the Cabinet committee on November 4, and reiterates the accusations based on a forged document, the Soviet Government, on its part, must insist on its offer of arbitration as the sole means to an unbiased settlement of this question. This offer was made in its note of October 27, which unfortunately was "lost" on the change of Government in Great Britain, but the contents of which, according to Mr. Gregory's note, are known to the present British Government. The British Government must be aware that the rejection of this offer of arbitration cannot but be considered by the public opinion of all countries as establishing that it is impossible for the British Government to substantiate and prove the accusations put forward during the election campaign.

Further, my Government regrets that in its note of November 21, the British Government evaded a direct reply on the question of arbitration on the concrete point at issue concerning the "Zinoviev letter," and that it thought fit to pass on to general accusations against the Soviet Government in connection with the activities of the Communist International. As regards these accusations I am instructed by my Government to reiterate the declarations repeatedly made as to the complete political and administrative independence of the Communist International from the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. My Government has never undertaken and cannot undertake to refuse the right of asylum to the Communist International, or to any other working-class organization, still less can it undertake to exercise pressure upon them. My Government considers any further discussion of attacks on international workers' organizations as useless and fruitless, and has requested me to declare that it has loyally carried out, and will in future carry out, on the principle of reciprocity, the obligations which it has undertaken.

Nevinson on Morel

HENRY W. NEVINSON has written a letter to the editor of the Manchester Guardian, in which he says of the late E. D. Morel:

I knew him first nearly twenty years ago, when I returned from a long journey in Central Africa, where I had been engaged upon a cause similar to that with which his name must always be associated: I mean the cause of delivering native tribes from an atrocious system of slavery and mutilation at the hands of European speculators and exploiters.

He was then in the midst of his struggle against the method of procuring rubber instituted or maintained by Leopold, King of the Belgians, and the rubber companies to which concessions had been granted. Few, I think, can imagine what labor that struggle involved. The poor and unknown clerk had enormous forces of wealth, royal influence, and international diplomacy ranged against him. Whenever I attempted to sound the depths of iniquity gathered to thwart his efforts I felt that I was wallowing about in a dark and bottomless bog, and I believe that no one of our generation has ever undertaken such a labor as his. The very chests that held the documents of the contest, all carefully arranged, would fill a room; and when only a few weeks ago he urged me to undertake his biography it was the memory of those chests and cases that made me refuse at once. For such a biography would be the work of a lifetime, and I have not a lifetime before me now.

Yet he persisted, and against all those odds he won. I shall not forget the occasion (I think in 1913) when we, including many leading people in the press, the church, and Parliament, honored ourselves by giving him a presentation because we all accounted him, as was said at the time, "a great knight-errant of humanity."

Then came the war, and almost at once he realized, like Edith Cavell, that patriotism was not enough. That is a dangerous knowledge to reveal in war time, and bitterly was Morel made to suffer for it. I suppose that throughout the war no one in this country was so madly hated and so shamefully vilified. Even witty and famous writers condescended to fling mud at him, and I only hope the mud will stick to their reputations forever.

Again he persisted, but he was a sensitive man and he felt the injustice deeply. Once when I was at home on short leave from the Dardanelles I happened to meet him in the Strand, and he passed me with a cold nod. I ran after him and asked what was the matter between us, and with tears in his eyes (for he never had the average Englishman's way of suppressing the signs of emotion) he replied: "I did not suppose that anyone would speak to me now!"

But once again time brought its revenges, and he has gone from us at the height of his popularity, his fame, his intellect, and his character. The opposition benches could miss no one more, so great was his knowledge, and his courage equaled it. We can do no more now to please him, but let us at least resolve to silence as far as we may the yapping and snarling of the ill-conditioned creatures who would hound him even in his grave.

Contributors to This Issue

MOLLIE BEST has spent over a year collecting from early records material on the lives of the Quaker leaders of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

HENRY W. NEVINSON, English poet, essayist, war correspondent, has written frequently on Imperial affairs.

MARC A. ROSE, formerly of the New York Sun, is managing editor of the Buffalo Evening News.

DOROTHY BREWSTER, co-author of "Dead-Reckonings in Fiction," has frequently reviewed books for The Nation.

ARNOLD WHITRIDGE is the author of "Critical Ventures into French Literature."

FRITHJOF TOKSVIG is a newspaper man in Copenhagen and The Nation's Scandinavian representative.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1924 No. 3104

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS..... 719
EDITORIALS:
The Preparedness Maniac Again 722
Advancing Backward 723
Cities in the Sand 723
THE RETURN TO JERUSALEM. By Ludwig Lewisohn 724
A $10,000,000 VERDICT. By Frank P. Sibley 726
QUAKER REVOLUTIONARIES:
The Woman's Battalion. By Mollie Best 729
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 731
CORRESPONDENCE 731
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Poems—Quag-Hole. By Whittaker Chambers 732
Carib Canoe Under Sail. By Grace Hazard Conkling 732
Ballad. By Charles Norman 732
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 732
Glimpses of Early Religion. By Alexander Goldenweiser 733
The Perfect City. By Stuart Chase 734
All Are Swine. By A. Donald Douglas 734
Books in Brief 734
The Nation's Poetry Prize 735
DRAMA:
Miscellany. By Joseph Wood Krutch 736
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
How to End War. By William E. Borah 738
England Turns Down the League 739

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor MARK VAN DOREN, Literary Editor

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Contributing Editors

ROBERT HERRICK LUDWIG LEWISOHN NORMAN THOMAS

JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

SENATOR BORAH'S clear-cut address, which we print in this week's International Relations Section, follows the outline of the foreign policy which The Nation has been advocating for more than four years. We urge our readers to study it. Too many faint hearts in America, we believe, cling to the Geneva League as "the only hope we have," and overlook the immediate steps of a forward-looking policy. They tend to overstress the importance of paper and machinery. As Senator Borah says: "There is no hope for peace so long as the great and powerful nations will that there shall be no peace. . . . We confine our love of peace to paper; our war spirit finds its expression in deeds." The United States could do more for world peace by getting out of Haiti and offering that pitiful republic reparation for our crimes there than by joining the half-hearted World Court at the Hague. The League's ban still maintained against Germany and Soviet Russia is more significant than all the pious resolutions which it has enacted since it was born in a flood of honeyed words. If we are to take forward steps on paper let them be whole-hearted, as Senator Borah urges, not hesitating gestures of timorous good intentions. If we join the World Court, let us make our action count by insisting that it be made a court of real authority. Let us not be afraid to move for the outlawry of war. The fact that Senator Borah has replaced Senator Lodge as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate is one of the best New Year's gifts which the world could have.

THE PROGRESSIVE GROUP in Congress is not so cowed and dispirited as some observers believed at the beginning of the present session. Certainly Senator Norris is not hesitating in his magnificent fight against the scheme of President Coolidge and the Republican majority to despoil the rights of the people in the great natural water-power at Muscle Shoals. The Underwood bill does not give, as has in some places been stated, the alternative of government or private control. It provides for a lease for half a century to a private money-making corporation, merely containing the proviso that if a bid is not forthcoming satisfactory to the Secretary of War the Government shall continue (pending further legislation) a control which it already has. In spite of the report of the Committee on Agriculture in favor of continued government control, the Senate majority is sponsoring almost without discussion or consideration a brand-new plan which Senator Norris describes accurately as carrying "a deed of conveyance to the electric water-power trust of America for one of the greatest inheritances of unborn generations of American citizens."

ONCE IN A WHILE a paragraph appears on the editorial page of one of the daily newspapers which so precisely and pertinently expresses our thought that we can only reprint it, wishing we had written it. Such an editorial is the following from the New York World:

> Zamboanga lies at the extreme western end of the Island of Mindanao in the Philippines. It is a port of entry and an important trading-point. A band of Moro outlaws raided a Chinese store near there, murdering five Chinese and robbing the store. Since the scene of the crime is American territory, under the American flag, the killing of five nameless Chinese causes no great agitation in official circles in Washington. No one feels called upon to proclaim that the persons of all foreigners must be held sacred and in frantic haste to cable a peremptory demand for the payment of large indemnities.
>
> But change the scene from the Philippines to China across the sea. Establish an American trading-post or mission there. Then, if a party of Chinese bandits raids the Americans' property, threatens to hold them for ransom or mistreats them, that's another story. It's an international incident that calls for the use of American gunboats in Chinese waters, for the landing of marines, and for official messages to the Chinese Government bristling with solemn threats.

MANY SUPPORTERS OF SENATOR LA FOLLETTE in the recent campaign were disquieted because his proposals were attacked so largely and successfully not by argument but by misrepresentation. They have questioned how democracy was to function in the future if the electorate could be hoodwinked so easily and effectively. Evidently this uneasiness is not confined to Mr. La Follette's supporters. Speaking before the League of Women Voters in Chicago lately David Lawrence, whose Washington correspondence goes into the most conservative newspapers, said that never before in his recollection had there been such misrepresentation "not only of the spirit but the letter of the Constitution by campaign speakers."

> Let us revert for a moment to the proposal made by Senator La Follette in the last campaign with respect to the Supreme Court [he said]. I am not in sympathy with Senator La Follette's programs nor do I believe the wrongs he seeks to remedy should be corrected by the method he proposes, but as an American I cannot refrain from expressing disappointment that a proposal to amend the Constitution in the regular way should be hailed as an attempt "to overthrow the Constitution."
>
> Senator La Follette proposed that an amendment be submitted to Congress to be passed by a two-thirds vote and to be submitted thereafter to three-fourths of the States for ratification. Even if he had been elected President he could not have approved or disapproved the amendment. Presidents cannot veto or ratify constitutional amendments. That power is lodged wholly in Congress and the legislatures of the several States. Did we tell the electorate that frankly in the last campaign or did we exaggerate? I leave it to you to decide.

IN ELECTING WILLIAM GREEN to succeed Samuel Gompers his fellow-members of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor chose the man whose advent to the presidency would mean least change. Of his two chief rivals one, James Duncan of the granite-cutters, was an old man and weak, who could not have held the helm; the other, Matthew Woll, of the photo-engravers, was a younger man with ideas of his own. Green is more dependable than either. In the mine-workers' union he has served as a sort of permanent official, surviving changes in leadership and loyally doing the bidding of his successive chiefs. In recent years he has often disagreed with John Lewis, but he has done Lewis's bidding—and the mine workers, once the leaders of trade-union progress, have become a bulwark of labor reaction. In his home at Coshocton, Ohio, Green is known as a "joiner," a good Sunday-school teacher, and a regular party Democrat. He was one of the minority who voted against indorsement of La Follette's candidacy by the labor federation. His arrival at its top means that Gompers's old cabinet continues its control of federation policies; but the permanence of that cabinet without "the old man" is another question.

EVEN IN GERMANY no one seems to be quite sure what happened at the December 7 election. The extremists lost—yes, but who won? The Republican parties gained, and so did the Nationalists. Communists and Fascists lost, but the shift toward the center was so slight that weeks of parliamentary negotiations are necessary for the formation of a new Cabinet. Part of the difficulty in interpreting the results is due to the amorphous nature of some of the German parties. The Centrum, to which Chancellor Marx belongs, is primarily a Catholic party, with otherwise vague principles; it includes avowed monarchists and virtual Socialists. The decision as to the new Government depends largely upon it. If the Centrum decides to form a coalition with the People's Party and the Nationalists, who stand to the Right of it, the new Government, despite the trend of the elections, will be more reactionary than its predecessor; if it throws in its lot with the Socialists, who are now the largest party in the Reichstag, Germany will have a Government pledged, like the present one, to fulfilment of the Dawes program.

THUS THE YEAR ends in Germany with the political situation practically unchanged. Mediocre men compelled to compromise all along the line are simply holding things together. But we have only to think how the welkin would ring with denunciations of the German menace had either the extreme Left or Right taken hold to appreciate how welcome is the present situation for all its temporizing, for all the difficulty of forming a new Cabinet. As it is, calumny is still at work. Thus, despite previous reports to the contrary, we now have a report from the Interallied Commission that Germany is still a menace because she has 400,000 police of one kind or another who would be available militarily in addition to her army of 100,000 men. Grant the 500,000 men; what could they do? Every German fort is razed or disarmed; her coasts are defenseless; she has admittedly no heavy or siege artillery, no Zeppelins, no bombing planes, no tanks, no rifles for the 500,000, no automobiles, no general staff, no supply reserves, no piles of ammunition. But what's the use? Those who wish to make her out a danger will continue to do so. Has not a member of the Reichstag just produced a book to show that chemically she can wage war—and so can any other land that turns to science for destruction of the race.

DANGER OF A COMMUNIST REVOLUTION in France exists almost exclusively in the minds of the fascist groups who would like to ride into a dictatorship of their own on the fear of a proletarian dictatorship. M. Millerand leads these groups; the Paris Liberté has made itself their organ. After the liberal election last spring Millerand was forced to resign as President of France, largely because while in office he had flirted with the idea of sweeping Parliament aside and making himself a French Mussolini. Now he is out for revenge, and every time a rusty machine-gun is lost or a group of sardine-packers go on strike he and his friends shudder publicly at the menace of bolshevism. Premier Herriot shuddered with them at first, but now he has gone to the other extreme; he has ordered the prosecution of the Liberté for dissemination of false news, and threatens to expel foreign correspondents who send out false alarms. Such action is likely to help the fascist cause; it never pays to make martyrs. The only country west of Russia where the Communist peril is real is Esthonia, and there it is being drowned in a sea of blood. Following the summary execution of two Communist leaders their party mates rose and seized the government buildings at night. They held them, however, less than a day, and wholesale executions followed.

COUNT MICHAEL KAROLYI, according to the Hungarian supreme court, is a traitor. His vast estates, with the ancient castle and many houses and farms, which have been in the hands of the Government throughout the reactionary regime, are finally confiscated; his private fortune of 10,000,000 gold crowns is seized. Count Karolyi was a pacifist and tried throughout the last years of the war to bring his Government to a negotiated peace. When the revolution swept Hungary he became the head of a liberal republican Government. Inside the country he was opposed by communism and by royalist reaction; and the Allied Powers did all they could to weaken and discredit this man who had fought the Hapsburgs and opposed the war. Rather than plunge his country into further revolution and civil war, in 1919 Karolyi turned the Government over to the Communists. But bolshevism was no more to his liking than reaction and, with many of his most intelligent and liberal supporters, he left the country. White terror succeeded communism; he was officially declared a traitor by the Horthy Government and his property was confiscated—an act which the present verdict merely confirms. Although he is not even charged with offering aid or comfort to the enemy, a new definition of high treason has been made to fit his case. Somewhere in this record of his sympathies and acts, phrased in other words and covered by laws created for the purpose, lies Count Karolyi's "treason." Perhaps to be a democrat and an honest man it is necessary to be a traitor to the Hungary of today.

SLOWLY THE ARCHIVES open. First Russia, then Austria and Germany; and now, hesitatingly, England. Ramsay MacDonald resigned before announcing his policy of uncovering British pre-war diplomacy, but he had taken the first steps in a program which Austen Chamberlain has decided to follow. The British archives, hitherto open only up to 1860, will be opened without restriction to research historians up to 1878. This modest decision—which, however, will be welcomed by historians for the light it may throw on British policy during the Franco-Prussian War of 1870 and the Russo-Turk War of 1878—is accompanied by a more interesting program. The Government has asked Harold Temperley, reader in modern history at Cambridge University, and G. P. Gooch, the distinguished author of the "History of Modern Europe 1878-1919," to study the records of the decade preceding the outbreak of the war, and to make and edit a selection from them. The selection will be eagerly awaited. Mr. Temperley has been an historian of the official school; Mr. Gooch's name will carry assurance that documents which might have supported Mr. Morel's distrust of his own Government will not be reburied.

TO TACKLE THE PROBLEM of automobile accidents at this late day is like locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen—or shall we say the garage door after the car has disappeared? But drivers of motor-cars themselves are awakening to the urgency of the problem—partly because of the delays and accidents to their cars. We are glad to pass on a recent comment of Secretary Hoover's: "The automobile is the greatest development of twenty years both economically and socially. It is no longer a luxury—it is a complete necessity. But if we wish for its fullest development we must reduce its terrors." This, he added, means that > We must find constructive measures to meet the crisis of tens of thousands of deaths, usually with hundreds of thousands of serious personal injuries and millions of property damage, accompanied by an economic loss of some staggering sum such as $600,000,000. Here is a waste of human lives each year equal to one-third of the American losses by death in the World War and two and one-half times as many casualties as all those suffered by the American forces.

FATALITIES DUE TO THE AUTOMOBILE, however, have decreased in recent years when compared with the number of cars in use. Perhaps drivers are more careful; possibly pedestrians are more wary. We have more than three times as many automobiles in the United States today as we had when we entered the World War seven and a half years ago, but the total of accidents has not quite doubled. The National Conference on Street and Highway Safety recently compiled for Mr. Hoover the following figures, which give at least the pale comfort of knowing that if this much has been done more can be done:

Year	Total Number of Motor Vehicle Deaths	Total Registration of Motor Vehicles	Fatalities per 100,000 of Motor Registration
1917	9,184	5,104,321	190
1918	9,672	6,146,617	160
1919	9,827	7,565,446	130
1920	11,358	9,231,941	123
1921	12,500	10,463,295	119
1922	14,000	12,238,275	114
1923	16,000	15,092,177	106

THE PLAN TO FOIST on the public an issue of $40,000,000 in silver "cartwheels" is to say the least an unreasonable inconvenience to the public and to say the most a plain impertinence. The scheme is a piece of penny-wise, pound-foolish economy by which government officials expect to make a saving without any sacrifice in their own expense accounts, solely by imposing a burden upon the public. If Mr. Mellon thinks that by his own fiat and a little government propaganda he can popularize the silver dollar he is mistaken. It is too large and heavy a coin to carry in a purse, while put loose in a pocket it soon wears a hole. Mr. Mellon hopes that the public will "cooperate" in his scheme for not printing so many paper dollars. We learned the meaning of that word during the war. He hopes, otherwise stated, that the public will knuckle under. We hope it will do nothing of the sort but, on the contrary, return Mr. Mellon's silver dollars to the banks as fast as it gets them. Helpless government employees, we note, are to be paid partially in silver, willy-nilly. We wonder how many silver dollars will be put in Mr. Mellon's pay envelope.

NEW YORK NEVER KNEW a greater newspaper sensation than the famous Sun moon hoax, when, in pre-telegraphic days, that genial paper exercised its fancy with the sights which it reported seen through a new South African telescope. When Percival Lowell, a brother of Harvard's president, reported canals and life-zones on Mars from his observatory at Flagstaff, Arizona, a quarter-century ago, it seemed as if the desert had driven the good man as mad as a Sun hoax-maker. Wise scientists stepped forth to prove, figures in hand, that life on Mars was an impossibility. For one thing, they said, the temperature of Mars is generally below the freezing-point of water, and life requires more warmth. Lowell, Pickering, Schiaparelli, and others, however, kept their eyes glued to their telescopes, and persisted in seeing beyond the white polar ice-caps broad blue areas as of polar seas, and toward Mars's equator areas which seemed to indicate the growth and decay of vegetation. Now Messrs. Carl O. Lampland and W. W. Coblentz, of the Lowell Observatory, have succeeded in measuring the temperature of Mars. They find, as one might expect, the equator hotter than the poles, the afternoon warmer than the morning, and summer milder than winter. An ordinary summer day shows a range of temperature from 45° to 65° Fahrenheit—quite enough to sustain a rich fauna. But we still know as little of the character of life on Mars as of the geography of that greatest land of mystery, the other side of the moon.

BUR... PUBLIC LIB...

The Preparedness Maniac Again

THE preparedness maniac is again abroad in the land. He has learned nothing from the World War. Logic has departed from him if it ever rested within his mind. He still places his entire faith in force and in a preparedness which never protected anybody and never will. When he is of the army or navy type he fills the air with alarums if he believes that a single battleship gun has not just the elevation that somebody else's has. He lives in a perpetual state of fear and of panic. He sees enemies at every turn, and if the course of history removes three or four possible rivals on the sea he concentrates his attention upon the remaining one or two. Publicly he will assert that blood is thicker than water, that we are bound to our allies by sacred ties sanctified in the shedding of our unforgettable blood; privately he puts spies on English battleships, and plays endless war games, with England as the enemy, in which the entire American battle fleet is always sunk and only 58 per cent of the British. Thereupon he imparts this dreadful information to our jingo editors, to naval and military experts who make their living by writing and lecturing on our unpreparedness. The dailies begin to howl, berate, denounce, to prophesy the end of the American Government, and then do their best to hasten the catastrophe by giving currency to every rumor, suspicion, charge of falsehood and sneaky underhandedness which will serve to embroil this nation with one of our two possible naval rivals, Japan and Great Britain.

This is no exaggeration, but an exact statement of what has been and is going on. The propaganda has, indeed, gone so far and given such evidence of an organized undertaking that President Coolidge found it necessary to speak strongly against it in his annual message. Within two weeks he has again let it be known that he takes no stock in this hysteria; that he is more than ever set against any international armament race and any sensational congressional overhaulings for the purpose of starting fresh jingo fires—and he appears still opposed to the elevation of the battleship guns. If he still permits the tactless and dangerous naval maneuvers off Hawaii and the coming cruise to Australia—where the anti-Japanese politicians may be counted on for calculated indiscretions—his Secretary of the Navy has ordered two captains before a court of inquiry to ascertain how confidential information in their possession found its way to the most belligerent of the civilian "experts" and through him to the newspapers. That is a commendable move. If naval officers, however sincere and able and however honestly alarmed for the welfare of their country, are behind this campaign we ought to know it.

The worst offender is, as usual, Bradley A. Fiske, a retired admiral whose stock in trade is appearing before men's and women's clubs to prove that preparedness alone will save; that preparedness is necessary to protect our women, and that, as the bulk of our women are tinged with pacifism (we quote from a recent bit of his rubbish), they must be taught that men are for war and preparedness only in order to protect their women in their virtue and the enjoyment of the luxuries of civilization. Some millions of farmers' wives and factory employees who have never seen those "luxuries" may think what they like of that. Finally, in the face of the record of our American manhood in the World War, he declares that the fiber of our manhood is gone because we are not adequately preparing.

Now, with these demagogues abroad in the land, it is time once more to set down a few unimpeachable facts as to this question of military preparedness. Preparedness never kept any nation out of war. While usually portrayed as an insurance for peace, it is a preparation for war, and it inevitably leads to war. The United States during its history as a nation has had five foreign wars, each one of its own seeking—that of 1812 with England, the brief hostilities with France, the Mexican War, the Spanish War (and the Philippine), and the World War. The state of our military and naval defense had nothing to do with our getting into a single one of these; we were put into each by executive and congressional acts. Our foremost historian, James Ford Rhodes, has just proved how unnecessary it was for President McKinley to put us into the Spanish War; General Grant in his memoirs called the Mexican War, in which he served, "one of the most unjust ever waged by a stronger against a weaker nation." Had we been as prepared as Europe in 1914 these wars would still have occurred, for they were brought on deliberately for ulterior purposes. As for the World War, President Alderman of the University of Virginia in his recent official eulogy of President Wilson before Congress has done history the service of repeatedly saying "President Wilson put us into the war because. . . ." That is the simple truth. Not Congress, not the people, but a single man put us into the war and he would have done so had we had ten times as much or ten times as little armament.

Preparedness never saved any European nation from war. Napoleon III thought he had a big enough force to beat Germany in 1870. The conversion of Germany into a military machine did not prevent her being dragged into war in 1914 by her ally, Austria. Russia was ready in 1914 to put larger legions into the field than any other country in the world; did they keep her out of the war? England voluntarily went in, without regard for the state of her preparedness. As for France, it is the happy custom of our militarists to point to her as the victim of unpreparedness. Her own General Buat, the late chief of staff, has declared that the French army was the equal of the German and surpassed it in some services.

Preparedness is never more than relative. No general and no admiral in human history has had men or ships enough. If you give them what they ask for safety against one nation, they ask for more to guard against two nations combined. The little nations can never hope for adequate preparedness against the great. They should follow the program of Denmark and disarm totally—they would be safer if they did. Advocates of preparedness insist that if the little countries of Europe—Switzerland, Holland, Norway, Denmark, and Sweden—give up troops their manhood will perish. But there are no hardier, manlier lands than the Scandinavian, although for years they have had relatively small armies. There is no argument of the preparedness war-mongers that is not similarly vulnerable—as vulnerable as it is destructive, archaic, anarchistic, and anti-Christian.

Advancing Backward

IT is said that toward the close of the Civil War a patriotic Southern newspaper, anxious to maintain the morale of its readers, published the following dispatch: "Our glorious army is rapidly advancing backward and the enemy is retreating after it." For the truth of this story we do not vouch, but we do give solemn assurance that a metropolitan daily recently headed an article "Rush of Progress Menace to the World, says Rockefeller."

Progress a menace? What then does "progress" mean? It sounds like a meaningless paradox. One would not say that a man was dying from excess of health, but one can, it appears, speak in all seriousness of a civilization which is going backward because it is "progressing" too fast. If there is any word of which the modern world has made a shibboleth "progress" is the word, and in the language of popular thought it has no definite meaning.

Asked to define it the average man would doubtless give some fairly satisfactory reply; unconsciously he uses it to mean no more than any increase in size, in power, or in speed. Words are but counters, and sometimes it makes little difference what they are taken to mean; but it makes a great deal of difference when an important word happens to mean one thing in theory and another in practice. When progress became the religion of the modern world and came to be identified with things which are not necessarily in themselves good, the present age of confusion began. Gradually men forgot that speed might be uncomfortably hurrying them nowhere and that power might destroy civilization itself. Ceasing to criticize their definition they ceased to criticize their aims, and the result is knowledge and speed and power which are constantly increasing without any proportionate gain in happiness or virtue. There is wealth enough to make every man comfortable and power enough to relieve him of all except a comfortable minimum of work, but there is no immediate prospect that poverty will disappear or that the majority of men will be released from the necessity of deadly toil; yet the average man never doubts that the world is progressing at an ever-increasing rate. His eyes glitter with enthusiasm when he speaks of the size of his city, which is stifling him with its congestion, he points with pride to accumulated wealth, which is crushing him; he will even regard with complacency the prospect of being blown sky-high with the rest of his family by an aerial bomb because he can rejoice in the "progress" which makes such an event possible.

The present age has little use for logical subtleties; "facts not theories" is its motto. Yet a little dialectic might save civilization. No frequenter of the Platonic Academy would ever have made a word the cornerstone of his faith without first defining it. Plato did not know countless things which we know, but had he known them he would have seen to it that something better came of them than the mad world in which we live. He would have laughed at progress which goes backward and he would have called a halt in the perfection of the machine until he had learned to use it for instead of against himself. We, having already so much power that we are in danger of destroying ourselves, think of nothing except how to make it greater. We can go anywhere we like and faster than we need to go; few realize that it is time to ask where it is most worth while to go.

Cities in the Sand

WHEN archaeologists pried open the ultimate door and entered the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen they found what, after all, had never been more than a tomb, a buried thing. The triumph was real enough, but the thrill was perhaps not quite so great as that which comes with the news that a city, once poured full of sun and rain, has been reclaimed from centuries of darkness. Objects were left in an Egyptian burial-chamber to await some kind of eye at any rate. Troy and Mycenae and Cnossos and Pompeii passed unconsciously into oblivion, and now excavators among their ruins can have the sensation of assisting life to resume—of letting light in again upon angles of houses, intersections of streets, and tips of distant mountain-shadows, even though the actual eyes that used to see these things are long since pinches of dust.

Little enough was unearthed at Troy and Mycenae, but Cnossos in Crete continues to yield the most astonishing archaeological treasures. The digging there is not done yet, and one is advised to watch developments. King Minos's throne and the great Ali Baba oil-jars seem to be only a promise of what some time may reveal all the splendor of this city on an island which once served as a stepping-stone between Egypt and Greece. Even in Pompeii, which was beginning to be uncovered more than a century ago, there are acres of earth and ashes into which no shovel has been struck; pavements rutted by chariot wheels still lie in silence, innocent of the tourist's foot.

The Romans built cities in Northern Africa for very special reasons, and these cities died at various times their special deaths. The fact that they were never centers of civilization, or even capitals of provinces, makes them peculiarly interesting now. As Pompeii was merely a city of resort, a breathing-place for well-to-do families from Rome and Naples, so Timgad, for instance, was merely a city which Trajan ordered his legion at Lambessa to rear in the intervals of their expeditions against the Berbers. It was a magnificent gesture in marble, a monument for Africa to look at if she chose; back home it hardly counted, and the historians made almost no mention of it. But there its columns stand, meaning much or little as one prefers, and meaning nothing at all to the sand about their bases. For the empire is gone, and with it the necessity of making an impression.

Timgad, as it happens, was never buried. But other cities of the sort were, and only recently Italian excavators have been busy with Leptis Magna in Tripoli. Because Septimius Severus was grateful to Leptis Magna for having given him birth, he lent it a factitious importance, when he became emperor, by endowing it with a palace and decorating it with statues and baths. It decayed as Rome decayed, and before long it was all but submerged by the desert. Photographs of those portions still uncovered show merely the tooth-like tops of columns estimated to have been more than twenty feet high. Elsewhere images of Venus and Apollo have been found, and even a marble fish-pond—dry, of course. When the remains of Cnossos are fully exposed we shall perhaps have the key to an important civilization. Timgad and Leptis Magna teach us little except that men have always had a good time while they could. They are pathetic for that reason, but also for that reason they are important.

The Return to Jerusalem*

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Jerusalem, November 1

THE change from West to East is abrupt and complete. The edges of Atlantic winds reach Warsaw; at Trieste the sky touches the top of the steep little Via del Monte; the young Jewish pioneers who trundle their luggage down that street are bareheaded; their shirts are open at the throat; a wind furrows their dark hair; their eyes seek the half-naked hills that jut out into the Adriatic. Night may bring the rainy Hyades; ships in the harbor have passed the Acroceraunian walls.

A world begins here which is, in truth, neither West nor East. It is that old, old Mediterranean world which is one, which saw all the beginnings of history, which gave birth to all the arts, to all the wisdom by which man lives, which has changed little, careless of millenniums, deaf to tumult. The naked cliffs of Crete, more myth than island, are mauve and tan in the translucent air, rough and yet shapely as the Judaean hills. At Brindisi, above a sordid little harbor street with shops aping the North, rise a palm and a Roman column, clear, definite yet soft against the sky, solitary and slender as obelisk or minaret, careless of giving shade or shelter in this light-flooded world.

The ship belongs to all worlds. It is a hired go-between. There are merchants from Germany, thoroughly well informed, but not likely to bring home more than they brought with them. There are handsome, likable British youths going out to colonial jobs and appointments, jolly and essentially supercilious. There is a family from Sedalia, Missouri, on a Cook's tour. They cannot tell you precisely why they came so far. But some day there will be a paper read before a women's club in Sedalia about Bible lands. The excellent husband and father is delighted at the cheapness of whiskey and soda on board and tells how he made his little pile lending money to farmers. There is a morose pasha whose emaciated daughter wears her conventional Western clothes like a masker's costume. There is a suave and Europeanized pasha who flirts in equally good French and English. There is an elderly cloak and suit manufacturer who lives in the Bronx and has, a little shyly, slipped away from his assimilated family to get a glimpse of the land of Israel.

At noon the passengers, half-surreptitiously, glance toward the plunging steerage deck. A group of stern, bearded Jews appears. Their phylactery boxes project from their foreheads; they are draped in their great, grayish praying-shawls. They rock back and forth and chant the words their fathers chanted centuries before England had a name. They, at least, are not going east. They never left the Mediterranean world. The voyage is less to them than a pin's prick. To them dream and reality were never divided. They are going from Jerusalem to Jerusalem. They know where to find the tomb of Maimonides and the house of study by the boiling springs on the shores of Lake Kinnereth.

It is not so simple for everyone. The tourists and merchants bring eyes and minds and leave their souls at home. Their case is not complicated. But how is it with the pioneers, the Chaluzim whose songs are heard from the steerage at twilight? Now that they are on their way it may be that landscapes of the North haunt them—pools in autumnal forests covered with leaves of bronze, upland meadows, cities by stormier waters with their lights at dusk. The Chaluzim are going east and south in no light fashion. They are putting off a spiritual garment that chafed and ached. But it had been long worn and its very imperfections were familiar. A garment—a world. They have entered the Mediterranean sun, the illimitable sun. If their adventure is to be a triumph, their souls must melt into a new earth and a new heaven and the sight of the flat roofs and white towers of Alexandria must be to them the beginning of the end of a journey home.

The first plunge into Alexandria is wild and fantastic. The Arab burden-bearers swarm in swirls of disorder, raising a coldly passionate clamor. Fezes and turbans and tattered cloaks of red and blue and orange reel in a strange rout. An old Arab, all wrinkled skin and taut sinews, one-eyed, bent double, obsequious with ten thousand years of slavery, swings a mountain of luggage on his back and rushes forward cursing all who obstruct his path. The burden-bearers, the customs sheds, the train, the wayside glimpses—fields, villages, cities, even the Nile: these are to the thoughtful eye as yet not Egypt, not Mizraim, not the house of bondage. Here is part of the wide domain of the Moslems, of the Arabs whose story-tellers told the immortal tales of A Thousand and One Nights, of the folk who still sit in calm places in the cool of the evening telling tales and matching rhymes. Theirs is Alexandria, theirs Cairo with its tombs of the Caliphs, with the narrow, clamorous streets of the Mousky, where in the alley of the goldsmiths a hundred artificers mold the soft, intensely yellow metal on little ringing anvils. Here the Arab ladies throng to buy their golden chains and hangings. They are not swathed in black veils as the orthodox demand. They have reduced modesty to the symbol of a bit of transparent white fabric covering mouth and chin.

But an hour from here is the edge of the desert. Among the white dunes of the sand and the rubble of the ages rise the pyramids and on the road that leads to the desert and the tombs there begins the life of the road, that life of the road that has changed little since the vast tombs were built. Women on donkeys or in ox-carts, clad in dusty black robes, men in green and blue on camels.

This is Egypt, this and the tombs and the memorials that have been brought from the tombs: golden jewels of kings and priests and princesses, alabaster libation tablets and urns, models of ships and shops, the incomparable statues in stone and wood that were ancient of years when Jacob sought a Pharaoh's favor, the throne and bed and caskets and intricately carved vases of alabaster that served the uses of Tut-ankh-Amen. This is Egypt. The Egypt of a gorgeous little upper class, like that of our own owners of castles and sea-going yachts and private railroad cars. Once a Jew named Joseph climbed into this class. Centuries later a Jew named Moses slipped by a legendary accident into the same class and was considered the son of the daughter of Pharaoh. . . .

* Mr. Lewisohn will send letters from Palestine through the winter.

I stood in the Museum at Cairo and contemplated the remains of an elaborate and splendid world. Here was a completely equipped civilization. It lacked science; it was not articulate in speech. But its instinct for the plastic was faultless, down to the design and execution of the humblest utensil of daily use. Into this civilization, as into many another since, the children of Israel were invited. They prospered and increased in numbers, as they have done many times since in many lands, and doubtless were good Egyptian subjects, loyal and patriotic. This state of affairs is said to have lasted for about four hundred years. By that time the prosperity and number of the Israelites excited the envy and the fear of the Egyptians and an anti-Israelitish agitation began. The fear was expressed that these strangers would become "too many and too mighty" for the natives of older stocks and, by the drastic action of a barbarous polity, the Israelites were reduced to the status of slaves. We may be sure that they had friends and defenders, that, having intermarried with Egyptians during the four centuries of their presence in the land, they had kinsmen among the members of the ruling race. But the fear of the predatory tribe was too great. For it may happen, the stout Egyptian patriots pleaded, "that when there falleth out any war, they also join themselves unto our enemies and fight against us." And so the classical cry against a minority was sounded for the first time in recorded history.

To these lives now "made bitter with hard service" Moses was probably not the only exception. No doubt there were Israelites of wealth and position who by giving bribes or by embracing the state religion saved themselves from the "anguish of spirit" and the "cruel bondage" of their brethren. They probably took good care to have their children marry into one hundred per cent Egyptian families and thus provided for the security of themselves and their posterity by merging themselves with the majority. Moses was, of course, in an exceptionably favorable position. He was a member of the court and thus wholly removed from the possibility of attack. But when "he was grown up he went out unto his brethren and looked on their burdens." He slew one of their Egyptian tormentors, despite the recorded meekness of his nature; he fled only to return as the leader and savior of his people, steadfast, majestic, greatly enduring, careless of happiness or content for himself, destined to die and lie in an unknown sepulcher after that one glance from Nebo across the glistening waters of the Dead Sea to the Judaean hills beyond.

Whatever this story be—history or fable—is it not the eternal symbol of a recurring fate? The argument that the Egyptians used against the Israelites, do not the Poles and Hungarians and Rumanians use it today? Did we not use it against every racial or spiritual minority in the days of the Great War? The story is the symbol of the fate of Israel; the fate of Israel is the symbol of an ultimate sin and an ultimate necessary redemption. The delusion that war is necessary nourishes the delusion that minorities must be absorbed or crushed. It was so in Egypt; it is so today. Thence springs a meaning deeper than he dreamed from the words of that Chassidic rabbi who exclaimed: "Lord of the world, redeem Israel! But if thou wilt not, redeem the Gentiles!" The redemption of Israel and the redemption of mankind are one.

The way goes eastward still. At Kantara a little ferry crosses the Suez Canal from Africa to Asia. The train winds into the wilderness of Sinai. Blinding white sand in hills and mounds, in graceful curves and slopes. On the sand is the exquisitely patterned tracery of the winds. The direct light pours down. A shadowless ocean of light. Here and there tufts of wilted grass or herb, enough to feed a few camels, a few hardy black goats. At long intervals a spring or a group of springs. Are they the springs of Elim? For here, too, are threescore and ten palm-trees. They are date-palms and the yellowish clustered fruits hang below the spreading leaves. The sea is not far here. Perhaps it is Marah, where the waters were bitter and trees were cast into the water to make it sweet. The Arabs still cast trees into the bitter waters here, as Moses bade his people do. Then the salt crystallizes about the boughs and the bitterness of the waters grows less.

Elim and Marah are left behind and Horeb, the holy mountain, and soon the desert on which the manna fell—"small as the hoar-frost on the ground"—is passed. Hills come and the rumor of ancient cities: Gaza, where was the border of the Canaanite and later the Philistine stronghold and shrine of Dagon; where Samson turned the mill as the asses and camels do to this day and then brought the god's temple down upon himself and the adversaries of his people. Here are the vale of Sorek and the cave in which Delilah beguiled Samson; here the valley in which Israelite and Philistine confronted each other and young David, shepherd and poet, shot the stone from his sling.

The hills of Judaea. . . . Once groves of the olive, the fig, the pomegranate stretched to their summits. Today the slopes and summits are barren and the great light beats upon them. The ancient terraces are still to be seen. But they are ruined and their stones clutter the sides of the hills. Cave after cave. Arabs live in a few. A woman in a dusty blue cloak comes out of one and lifts the water jar upon her head. Yellow sheep and black goats clamber near a few sun-baked Arab huts. No tree or bush or shade. Only the grim, contorted cactus here and there.

The forty years' journey is made in a day. The children of Israel continued their march northeast toward Hebron and the Dead Sea and the towers of Jericho. The train hugs the coast, goes a little northward to Ludd, then east toward Jerusalem.

It was long before Israel reached this city. And even when Joshua, the son of Nun, came there with his men he could not conquer the stronghold of the Jebusites. Not until David came did Israel possess the holy hill-top on which Abraham went to sacrifice his only son to God. Israel did not possess the hill-top long and does not possess it today. But cities do not matter, nor walls nor temples nor the tops of holy hills. Before the desert was crossed, before Hebron was taken or the walls of Jericho had toppled, Israel had become Israel. In the desert, in the barren places, a people had said to itself: "Thou shalt not take vengeance, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people; but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not do him wrong. The stranger that sojourneth with you shall be unto you as the homeborn among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were sojourners in the land of Egypt." From its first exile Israel had learned the lesson that mankind still waits to learn. . . .

Jerusalem. . . .

A $10,000,000 Verdict

By FRANK P. SIBLEY

THE latest chapter in the history of the great American habit of doing business on credit has been written in Boston. The chapter is not yet completed, though it has been more than a year in the writing. But when it shall have been completed, an effect almost as tremendous may be produced as that which followed the celebrated panic of 1907 when "somebody asked for a dollar."

The result of that panic, and its accompanying discovery that if everybody's loans were to be called at one time there would not be enough currency to go round, was the establishment of the Federal Reserve Bank. That new device did not exactly curtail credit; it sublimated it.

Men continued to borrow money on which to do business. Sometimes they could not pay their obligations when they became due. Here and there cases developed where the borrowers could not get their notes renewed or extended. Such a business was called "sick." In many instances, the lending individual or banks simply took over the borrower's business, "cured" it, and sold it or carried it along. Very few indeed have been the instances in which a business, cured of its sickness, remained in the hands of its original owner.

This "taking over the business" by banks has been common enough. Until recently, there seemed to be nothing to prevent it. However, a few years ago a law was passed by Congress which was aimed at the labor organizations; it forbade combinations to prevent employers from hiring whom they wished to hire, regardless of union affiliations or lack of them. Still later, the Supreme Court ruled that this law would apply to capital also. In other words, as the plaintiffs in the case which has just been tried in Boston claim, it is still possible for any financier to demand exorbitant terms for the use of his money. But if several financiers combine, having found a business in need of financing, to compel the owner of that business in return for money loaned to turn over his business to the lenders at a ridiculous price, an action will lie.

Something like this process of "curing a sick business" was gone through in Boston in 1918 and 1919, with the same old result. When it was all over, the former owner complained bitterly that he had been robbed of a perfectly sound and profitable business. He took his complaint first to Charles E. Hughes, who was an eminent lawyer before he was Secretary of State.

At the time Mr. Hughes was just starting for Europe and could not undertake the case. He advised that Sherman L. Whipple of Boston be retained. This was done. Suit was entered, and after the long and formal processes of law, came to trial in Dedham, Norfolk County, Massachusetts, on November 6, 1923. Interrupted once by the illness of the presiding judge, Christopher T. Callahan of Holyoke, the case has dragged through a weary year. For most of the time, court has sat four days a week; the case was finally given to the jury at noon on Monday, December 15, on the 184th day of court sessions. The jurors were kept together from that time until a verdict was reported. This came at the opening of court on December 18—the 187th day—when the jurors sent word that they had agreed upon a verdict. When it was opened, it was found that they had given the plaintiff practically all he asked for; the damages, based on the value of the two companies as taken away on March 24, 1919, with interest to date, minus the $500,000 the defendants paid on July 31, 1918, and the $125,000 paid on March 24, 1919, were set at $10,534,109.07.

It is interesting to note that during the trial one of the jurors was stricken by mental trouble, and that the case went on with eleven jurors—an unusual though not unique procedure.

The plaintiff was George F. Willett, who sued for $15,000,000 damages for the loss of the American Felt Company and the Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company by an alleged conspiracy. The defendants were headed by Robert F. Herrick, a well-known Boston attorney, the real founder and former president of the Harvard Club, who has been closely associated with banking interests in Boston. Other defendants were Daniel G. Wing, president of the First National Bank; Sewall H. Fessenden of the note-brokers' firm of F. S. Moseley & Company, and that firm; Robert Winsor of the great banking house of Kidder, Peabody & Company, and that firm, and the Chase National Bank of New York.

Willett was formerly a member of the firm of Willett, Sears & Company, and sued as the surviving partner of that firm, the partnership having been dissolved in 1920 with an agreement that Willett should assume all the liabilities and assets. Willett is an unusual man. One of his friends says "he is not interested in a company that is going along smoothly. He can see nothing but the development of industrial units; he is not interested in profits. Once he has acquired a company and fitted it into place in an industrial combination, he is interested only in the next step." His opponents described him as a danger to the financial world.

Willett was first in a bank, then in the wool business, next in the leather business, and finally in the felt manufacturing business. He acquired the American Felt Company, which at that time owned the Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company, in 1911. When a certain dividend of the American Felt Company was paid to Willett, Sears & Company by a check, this check was turned back to the company in exchange for its shares in the Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company. Then the expansion began.

By 1918 Willett, Sears & Company owned these two companies, and controlling interests in the stocks of some sixteen other companies. They included the Roxbury Carpet Company and its subsidiary, the Boston Belting Corporation; the Boston Piano Supply Company, the Luxemoor Company, Doremus & Company, and the Importers' Company. The last two were organized as selling and purchasing agencies for the Willett-Sears combination. Besides these, there were companies comprising what Willett called the "machinery unit"; these were the Woonsocket Machine & Press Company, the United Printing Machinery Company, the Framingham foundries, and the Ames Plow Company. Housing associations in Norwood, Franklin, and Framingham; a Norwood Construction Company and a Norwood Plumbing and Heating Company were real-estate propositions intended primarily to serve the interests of the employees in these towns, where the Willett-Sears plants were located. Finally—to the great confusion of inter-company accounts in the end—there was the Industrial Service and Equipment Company, intended to do the accounting, the laboratory and efficiency work, for all the Willett-Sears companies.

The story of what happened in 1918, so far as both sides agree to the facts, started in May. Willett's companies had millions of dollars' worth of notes outstanding and they had come suddenly up against the war conditions. There was a great rush of business, and simultaneously an immense increase in the cost of material and labor. Financing was needed to carry the two principal companies over the turn of the year.

The defendants say that this first became apparent when Willett himself made a tour of his banks of deposit in Boston, in June of 1918. The plaintiffs say that it was started by a delayed annual statement of the American Felt Company, which was sent out by the accountants on May 22, as of December 31, 1917. They say that the statement was unfavorable enough to cause the vice-president of the First National Bank to tell Mr. Sears, the financial member of the firm of Willett, Sears & Company, that the bank could not "check" their paper on that statement. Mr. Sears protested that the first three months of 1918 made a far better showing, and that if the figures were brought down to date they would show a condition that would enable the bank to check the paper. Unfortunately, however, the note brokers usually employed by Willett, Sears & Company (F. S. Moseley & Company) were already having difficulty to sell their notes. Then, the plaintiffs say, they requested Mr. Fessenden of that firm to set about arranging a special loan, and that he first advised Mr. Willett to "see the banks."

The defendants say that Mr. Willett first went to the Old Colony Trust Company, notified its president, Philip Stockton, that he wanted to use his full line of credit and that he wished also an extension of that credit by $100,000. From that bank he went to the National Shawmut, and told its president, Alfred L. Aiken, the same thing, adding that Mr. Stockton had agreed to his request. Mr. Aiken testified that he demurred to an extension except under conditions. Later in the same day Mr. Aiken was in communication with Mr. Stockton, who said there had been a misunderstanding; he had not promised Willett any new loan of $100,000. Almost at the same time Mr. Aiken heard from C. H. Dwinnell, vice-president of the First National Bank, that Mr. Willett had been there also. It seemed to the bank presidents that it was high time to call a meeting of the banks who had dealings with Willett, Sears & Company and to consider the status of that firm. The meeting was held on June 15; the bankers decided to get some more information, and called another meeting on June 18, at which Mr. Fessenden was asked to be present and to tell how much commercial paper Willett, Sears & Company and their companies had out. Mr. Wellington of the accountants' firm was also asked to be present to tell of the condition of the companies. In the version of the plaintiffs, these meetings were called by Mr. Fessenden for the purpose of arranging a special loan with a syndicate of banks.

A third meeting was called for June 24, and at this there were present representatives of the Old Colony Trust Company, the First National Bank, the National Shawmut, the Merchants' National, and the Webster and Atlas National. Mr. Sears was called in, and an effort was made to determine how much would be needed to finance the two felt companies across the turn of the year. The bankers knew all about the subsidiary companies in the Willett-Sears combination. They had not a very high opinion of them; they regarded the American Felt Company and the Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company, they testified, as "worth saving," but from the beginning of the negotiations refused to lend any money to carry on the other companies.

It was determined that $3,000,000—or in the careful bankers' phrase, "not more than $3,000,000"—would suffice. Willett and Sears protested that they did not need any such amount, but they testified that Mr. Fessenden told them they would better take what was offered and not be obliged to come around a second time for more help. There was another meeting on June 27. By this time the bargain was taking shape; the bankers offered a loan for six months, and demanded 6 per cent interest on the amount of money that might be drawn under the special loan. Six per cent on the whole $3,000,000 was to be paid "for the commitment"—that is to say, as a commission or bonus. This, as Mr. Whipple pointed out, amounted to an interest charge of 18 per cent. Furthermore, the bankers demanded that the entire control of the American Felt Company and the Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company should be turned to a committee of their appointing, to serve for the life of the loan.

Mr. Fessenden drew a memorandum of this agreement. Daniel G. Wing, president of the First National Bank, suggested to his vice-president, Mr. Dwinnell, that the First National's interest in the Willett-Sears affair be turned over to C. F. Weed, another vice-president, and Mr. Weed began to get up a draft of a formal agreement for the loan. He suggested, however, that the bank ought to retain counsel, and suggested that his brother, Arthur H. Weed, was in Robert F. Herrick's office, and might get Mr. Herrick to take the case. Mr. Herrick was general counsel for the bank and an intimate associate of Mr. Wing. Mr. Herrick agreed to come in on condition that Arthur H. Weed do the actual work, and that he advise from time to time. He was engaged also by the Old Colony Trust Company as counsel. Willett and Sears say they knew nothing of this, and that they were merely hearing from time to time through their financial agent, Mr. Fessenden, of the progress of the loan. Meanwhile, the time was going on, and the loan was not being made. Time was an important element to Willett and Sears; they had a note for $200,000 coming due in the Chase National Bank on July 15.

After the bankers' meeting on June 27, this Chase Bank note assumed more importance. It was one of two notes, each for $200,000, and they were notes of Willett and Sears, not of the felt companies; the second note fell due on October 15. And they were secured by 12,000 shares of American Felt common. Still another note, for $100,000, secured by 2,000 shares, lay in the Girard National Bank of Philadelphia. Unless Willett and Sears could somehow secure this stock which was up as collateral they could not comply with the condition imposed by the Boston bankers, that they should turn over the stock control of the American Felt Company during the life of the special loan.

Another meeting of the bankers was held on July 5, and this matter was discussed. At the end of the meeting a telegram was sent to E. V. R. Thayer, president of the Chase Bank, asking him to extend the notes and to deposit the stock with the Boston men. Mr. Fessenden sent the telegram. On July 8 Mr. Thayer came to Boston to a meeting of the bankers. They made the same request of him, and he refused to part with his collateral. He told them they could trust him just as well as he could trust them. But, he said, he wanted to help in the situation, and offered to have his bank participate in the loan, and to take as large a share as anybody. He asked Mr. Fessenden to write him a memorandum of what had occurred and departed. Mr. Fessenden did write that same day, stating the terms of the loan. Willett, Sears & Company were to convert $500,000 of non-liquid assets in the American Felt treasury into liquid assets; a "group of banks" was to lend the American Felt Company and the Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company not in excess of $3,000,000 until February 15, 1919, and this loan was to be a preferred debt. Not a word was said in the letter about the stock held by the Chase Bank.

Mr. Thayer answered on the following day, agreeing to the terms and saying his bank would take $440,000 of the loan. The plaintiffs claimed that these two letters constituted an agreement to make the loan, with the stock remaining in Thayer's hands. The defendants say that the meeting of July 8 resulted in a deadlock, and Willett and Sears were still obliged to raise $500,000 and to redeem the stock and bring it to Boston. In any event, Willett and Sears knew nothing of the facts, and went to everybody they knew, trying to raise the $500,000. They were unsuccessful until Mr. Fessenden suggested that they go to Robert Winsor of Kidder, Peabody & Company.

The bankers had already insisted that Moseley & Company ought to take part of the loan, as being the house that had put out so much of the American Felt commercial paper. Mr. Fessenden had agreed to take $440,000, and had persuaded Mr. Winsor to put Kidder, Peabody & Company in for a similar amount, as the banking house had sold the preferred stock issue of the felt company. Willett and Sears called on Mr. Winsor, and Willett put the matter before him. "If you will raise this money for us," said Mr. Willett, "you can have anything you want." Mr. Winsor agreed to form a syndicate and raise the money; his commission for doing so was to be 5,000 shares of the stock, with the proviso that Willett and Sears might buy it back for $500,000. This loan was to be for two years at 6 per cent interest.

The interview with Winsor was on July 18, three days after the first note in the Chase Bank had become due and had gone to protest. On July 24 Mr. Winsor told Willett and Sears that the terms of the loan would have to be changed. The transaction must be a purchase instead of a loan; he would buy their stock—16,500 shares of American Felt and 500 shares of Daniel Green—for $500,000, and give them an option to repurchase it at any time within two years. But also, he had taken in another man in the syndicate, and another share must be added to the repayment price. So the repurchase would cost them $1,227,000; it was made up of the original $500,000, a bonus of $500,000, the added share of $167,000, and $60,000 interest. With a note already gone to protest and a $3,000,000 loan hanging on the issue, Willett and Sears agreed to this bargain.

Papers were passed on July 31. The $500,000 syndicate consisted of Kidder, Peabody & Company, F. S. Moseley & Company, the Chase Bank and the Girard Bank, and Robert F. Herrick. The $3,000,000 loan was made, and the companies began to draw money against it. The full amount was never used; the Daniel Green paid up its share as due, and the American Felt Company reduced its debt enough within the six months so that renewal of the remainder was easy. The bankers appointed Messrs. Fessenden, Herrick, and Winsor managers of the subsidiary companies, and they set about liquidating them. Willett and Sears resigned all the offices they held in all their companies and began working on "plans of reorganization."

Willett had bought, or contracted to buy, the stock of the Plymouth Rubber Company. In his situation in the fall of 1918 he was unable to carry out this contract, and suit was brought in November by Mr. Sydemann, the owner of that company, to compel the fulfilment of the contract. Sydemann put attachments on all Willett's property. By this time bankruptcy for Willett, Sears & Company was more than a possibility.

In December Mr. Herrick bought up from several banks in Boston notes of some of Willett's companies, indorsed by Willett and Sears or by Willett. After the first of the year he caused suit to be brought on these notes, not against the makers but against the indorsers. He also put attachments on all the property of the firm and the individuals. There now seemed to be no way out for Willett and Sears except through the door of bankruptcy. They appointed assignees to settle with their creditors, and this was done in March, the $500,000 syndicate paying $125,000 more for all the remaining stock Willett and Sears had in the American Felt Company and the Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company, and the option to repurchase. The plaintiffs pointed out during the trial that this $125,000 was precisely the sum that was taken out of the treasuries of the subsidiary companies that were being liquidated, for "expenses."

Willett and Sears settled with their creditors, and the companies belonged to the syndicate. The transaction was complete. It was by no means unique, and the defendants have said frankly that their purpose from the beginning was to eliminate Willett, who was considered a dangerous man because of his reckless schemes of expansion.

The verdict produced intense excitement in Boston, where the defendants are some of the best-known men of the city. The newspapers got out extras and they sold literally by the thousands in the streets. The jury had believed that there was some thread of connection through the jumble of apparently isolated events, and that the things which happened did not happen of themselves. The effect of the verdict, if it be sustained by the Supreme Court a year or two hence, is almost incalculable.

If financiers are not to be allowed to protect their loans by ample margins of profit to protect their risks; if they are not to be allowed to foreclose on collateral; if they are not to be allowed to decide whether to loan or not, credit is going to be much more difficult to secure in this country. On the other hand, if business men are not entitled to credit upon a showing of their financial condition, business will have to be done at a much slower rate. One question that seems to be involved is whether national banks can refuse credit on their own judgment; another is whether any man with the ability to trade and to make book accounts appear more favorable than they might be is at liberty to go on buying one company after another, and indefinitely to spread out until a check in his income must bring down the whole structure of credit-supported business.

Quaker Revolutionaries

The Woman's Battalion*

By MOLLIE BEST

Even in war, moral power is to physical as three parts out of four.—NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

THE modern woman's movement has yet to make proper acknowledgment of its debt to George Fox, the moving spirit of the Quaker insurgency. His whole religious creed was based on the belief in the divine light in every soul, without regard to incidental and insignificant distinctions of race, color, or sex. His mental processes were simple and direct; if the Holy Spirit dispensed the gifts of the spirit impartially, he was not the man to question the wisdom of his Creator. He tells us he met with a people who claimed that women had no souls, adding in a light manner: "No more than a goose. But I reproved them and told them that was not right; for Mary said, My soul doth magnify the Lord." His sex heresy extended to his wife's property, over which he refused to exercise any control. His bold stand for the right of women to a voice in spiritual matters almost resulted in a Quaker schism.

Under his discipline women forged to the front and distinguished themselves as audacious fighters. The clergy were shocked when untrained men intruded on their preserves; when the women took the field they were frantic, and neither youth nor extreme age escaped rough usage. "A religious maiden," Mary Fisher, was concerned, says the cautious Sewel, "to go with a message from the Lord, as she believed, to Sultan Mohammed IV, then encamped with his army at Adrianople." Mary was a veteran of the war in New England, where her attempt to preach Christianity met with much resistance and little success. "Stripped naked and so barbarously used that modesty forbids to mention it," she was clapped into prison the moment her foot touched the soil of the land of the free, and was held incomunicado till she could be shipped back to England. It was Quaker strategy to attack the powers of darkness in their strongest positions, and as New England proved impregnable for the moment Mary directed her next attack on the Near East.

Mary got as far as Smyrna, where she was stopped by a vigilant English consul who disapproved of religious maidens interfering with the Turkish problem. The consul placed the docile Quaker lady aboard a ship headed for England, but he had failed to take her measure. Mary disembarked at the first stopping place and executed a flank movement. It was six hundred miles to Adrianople over the wild lands of Greece and Macedonia, but as her advance by sea was blocked Mary determined to attack by land. Alone and afoot, without knowledge of the language, she marched those six hundred miles. Not a word in the Quaker record of the adventures of that journey; it was sufficient to say that to the glory of God she reached the Emperor's headquarters safe and sound.

Though in the field with an army of fifty thousand men, Mohammed IV was not roughing it; surrounded by his great nobles he was camping in Oriental splendor. Mary would have had the company of citizens of Adrianople to the royal camp, but they were timid, therefore "she went to the camp alone, and procured information to be made to the Grand Vizier's tent that there was an Englishwoman who had something to declare from the Great God to the Sultan, who sent her word that she should speak with him next morning." This quick conquest of the Vizier is another unsolved mystery, for he was famous for his opposition to petticoat influence in his master's affairs, petticoats perhaps of another color.

Received with the ceremony accorded an ambassador of state, the next morning the Quaker girl stood in the presence of the Emperor, his nobles, and councilors. The Turks were less suspicious of an ambassador from God than the Puritans. Questioned by the Sultan whether it was true, as he heard, that she had a message from the Lord, "she answered, Yea. Then he bade her speak on, and when she stood silent a little, waiting on the Lord when to speak, he, supposing she might be fearful to utter her mind before them all, asked her whether she desired that any of them might go forth. She answered, Nay." This biblical frugality of speech was deceptive; it was the mental poise of the Quaker before the verbal leap.

"Then the Sultan bade her speak the word of the Lord, and not to fear, for they had good hearts and could bear it, for they were willing to hear it, be it what it would." Then Mary spoke, while the assembled statesmen and nobles of the empire "all gave diligent attention with much gravity and seriousness till she had done, then the Sultan asked her, Whether she had anything more to say. She asked whether he had understood what she said. He replied, Yes, every word: Adding that it was the truth, and desired her to stay in that country, saying that they could not but respect such a one as had taken so much pains to come to them so far as from England with a message from the Lord.

"Then they asked her what she thought of their prophet Mohammed? She answered warily, that she knew him not, but Christ who enlightened every man who came into the world, him she knew. Concerning Mohammed, they might judge him to be true or false according to the words and prophecies he spoke. The Turks confessed this to be true, and Mary, having performed her message, departed for Constantinople without a guard, whither she came without the least hurt or scoff. The Turks in this behalf receiving her message with far more respect and civility than she had often met with from those who covered themselves with a profession of Christianity. And so she returned to England."

In the countries through which the Reformation had spread the Pope rivaled the Turk for first place among national hatreds. The hatred of the papacy combined the venom of religious and political animosity, for the head of the Roman church was also a dreaded temporal sovereign. Two other Quaker adventuresses, in the hardihood of their faith in an invincible God and an endless life, set out for Alexandria to convert the Egyptians, but the vacillation of a Dutch captain resulted in their being set down in Malta, a citadel of the Roman church. Premonition or prevision seems to have been common among Quakers, and as they neared land Catherine Evans was seized with anguish of mind. "Oh we have a dreadful cup to drink in that place. Standing on the deck of the ship, and looking upon the people who stood upon the walls, she said, Shall ye destroy us? If we give up to the Lord he is sufficient to deliver us out of your hands; but if we disobey God, all these could not deliver us out of His hand. So all fear of man was taken from them."

* This is the second of three articles on Quaker Revolutionaries. The first appeared in The Nation of December 24.

The timid English consul at Malta warned the women that the Inquisition was in eruption, which convinced them that the hand of Providence had diverted them from Egypt that the light might shine in the greater darkness of Malta. Against the trembling entreaties of the consul they boldly sallied forth, and their exhortations to repentance and Christian charity created no little furor.

Accustomed to hunt down heretics the Holy Office was nonplussed by two women who deliberately thrust their heads into the noose. They were finally arrested on a charge of sedition, and while their fate was tragic their trial was amusing. The Inquisition moved with caution; it may be that the pious and immortal memory of the Great Protector was still potent; there may have been a moderate party; or the steady supply of Jews and Turks may have been sufficient to feed the fires and demonstrate the awful power of the church. Whatever the restraining influence, Catherine Evans and Sarah Cheevers were not led to the stake, put to the rack, or impaled on spikes, as was the custom. The pious monks, however, whiled away monotonous hours by assuring them that the fate of heretics would eventually be theirs. If they refused to become Catholics the Pope would destroy their bodies and souls. Their bodies, they replied, were at the service of the Lord to live or die, and their souls safe beyond the power of any potentate. A thousand devils would carry their souls to hell. They were not afraid of all the devils in hell, nor of the Inquisition, though it were backed by all the countries round. "You are possessed!" cried the monks in despair. "We are," they admitted, "by the power of an endless life."

To the Holy Office the Quakers proved a white elephant; they would gladly have been rid of them on any terms that would save face. Kissing the cross, receiving the holy sacrament as the actual body of Christ, any act symbolizing submission to the papal power would set them free. But their whole purpose was resistance to compulsion; submission meant defeat, they would never surrender.

Believing in his innocence that they were obstinate through fear, a well-meaning monk suggested that they might become Catholics secretly, while outwardly professing their avowed religion. If they had required proof that they were captives of the anti-Christ, this ill-advised brother supplied it.

They escaped the worst tortures of the Inquisition, but their lives were bitter enough. By close confinement in an unbearably hot climate, "We were fain to rise out of bed and lie down at a chink of the door for air to fetch breath; with the fever within and the heat without, our skin was like sheep's leather, and the hair did fall off our heads. We desired to die, but death fled from us." Still feminine though a warrior, Sarah did her hair "as she would lie in the grave," but far from being tamed by suffering they wrote the Inquisitorial Court: "If it was our blood they did thirst after, they might take it any other way as well as smother us in that hot room." For this insubordination their writing materials were confiscated, their Bibles having already been removed as the source of their propaganda.

Since threats failed to weaken their defiance it was decided they corrupted each other, and they were condemned to the most dreaded of punishments, solitary confinement; still the taming process made no progress. They must have broken into the monotony of monkish life. Constant prophecies of the monks as to her ultimate and eternal destination wore on Catherine's fagged nerves, and to one of her pious tormentors she commanded, "Depart from me, thou worker of iniquity." This astonishing irreverence toward his habit appalled the good man, and he dropped in on Sarah's solitude to acquaint her with the outrageous behavior of her fellow-heretic, who had called him a worker of iniquity. "Did she?" inquired Sarah, "and art thou without sin?" He believed he was. "Then," said Sarah judicially, "she hath wronged thee."

From the darkness and ignorance of human nature we turn to its brighter side. Many skippers who touched at the port, not Quakers but men of moral backbone, braved the Inquisition to beg liberty for the unhappy women. Workmen on the Inquisition buildings at great personal risk showed them much kindness. But a "poor young Englishman" bears away the palm for courage. Captured by the Turks and recaptured by Christian soldiers, who confronted him with the alternative "Our religion or your life," he expediently became a Catholic, as all religions must by that time have looked alike to him. At the risk of his life, on the forlorn hope of rendering assistance to the unfortunate women, he scaled the dungeon walls. He succeeded in talking with them before he was safely put behind the bars. With their habitual gloom the monks regaled the prisoners with dismal speculations as to his fate, but they were poor prophets, for he was released.

Daniel Baker, a Quaker who had also been intercepted by the English consul on Turkish territory, walked boldly into the lion's den and without mincing matters announced in good Italian: "I am come to demand the just liberty of my innocent Friends." Worn out apparently, the Inquisitors expressed a willingness to compromise on a money basis, but Daniel and the women were adamant; no tribute to the Babylonish woman.

Strongly opposed to Catholic teaching the Quakers had always been equally strong against the persecution of Catholics, and George Fox, who never rested while any of his followers suffered, appealed to the Catholic Lord d'Aubigny, an English nobleman with sufficient power at Rome, to cut the red tape of the Inquisition.

So the long imprisonment came at last to an end, and the journey home was in the manner of a triumphal march. "At length came one of the King of England's frigates called the Sapphire, commanded by Captain Titswel, who took them in, together with some Knights of Malta, among whom was the Inquisitor's own brother, who often spoke to the captain that they might not want for anything, and he told them that if they came to Malta again they should not be persecuted so. And to the captain he said: "If they go to heaven one way and we another, yet we shall all meet together at last." This was rank heresy and sedition in the very household of faith. Not without reason were these women deemed dangerous by the Inquisition. Into the established order of Malta they had driven the thin edge of the wedge of a new order.

In the Driftway

SOMEONE remarked that the pumpkin pie which graced the club menu that day was the best "since grandmother used to make them." Another member voiced the unorthodox view that he abhorred all those concoctions generally catalogued as "home cooking." From the beginning thus made there soon evolved a discussion as to whether the average woman cooks to please the male members of her household or to suit herself. One man offered as evidence that since early childhood he had been bedeviled by his mother to eat things he did not like. " 'Eat a little bit of it and you'll like it,' is what she always tells me," he said. "And although for thirty-five years I've known perfectly well that I don't like spinach, kale, parsnips, and a few other things, I'm being constantly urged to 'try them' on the theory that I may grow to like them. And they are constantly set before me in spite of the fact that everyone knows only extreme starvation would tempt me to eat them."

* * * * *

SUCH was one argument in support of the theory that woman cooks to please herself. Another was voiced by a quiet home-loving individual who apparently spoke with conviction. "When I was young," he said, "I always said my mother made the best coffee in the world. Then, on orders from the doctor, she quit drinking coffee herself. She still made it for me but it wasn't long before I quit too —but not because of any orders from the doctor."

* * * * *

BUT the housewives were not without defenders. "Look at the way hundreds of women constantly scheme to cook things their husbands and sons like," a meek-looking member piped up. "They go to all kinds of trouble to find out what the men like and to remember it." One of the club bolsheviks made short work of him. "No woman ever knows what her husband likes to eat," he said with finality. "I've been married for fifteen years, and my wife has been cooking for me 99 per cent of that time and she hasn't the slightest idea of what I like or dislike today. For instance, I like onions. But once, several years ago, I passed them up when they were on the menu for dinner. I did it because I was going to a theater that night and I've always felt onions should more properly be eaten and digested in privacy. But I had eaten them probably a thousand times during my married life previous to this time when I didn't eat them. And ever since my wife insists on telling everyone that I loathe onions and that I can't even eat anything that has been seasoned with them. I have a great fondness for porterhouse steak. But about six months ago I came home one night with a very poor appetite, due to nothing more startling than an unusually heavy lunch. We had porterhouse steak for dinner that night. I ate very sparingly because I wasn't hungry. About two months later, when I remarked that we hadn't had porterhouse steak recently, I was much surprised to be told 'I thought you didn't like it.' When I protested I did like it and pointed out that I must have eaten it several thousand times the response I got was that 'you didn't eat it last time we had it.' On the other hand, I'm not very fond of pork chops. But one night recently I came home hungry after playing golf all afternoon. There were pork chops for dinner and I ate six of them. I would have preferred something else, but the pork chops were there and I was hungry, so I ate them. We had pork chops four times a week thereafter until I protested, and there was great surprise when I did so.

* * * * *

SOME of the audience nodded assent and some didn't. Probably the symposium would be going on yet had not a new arrival broken in with: "I got WGN last night on a one-tube set with WCAP going at the same time."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Morel and MacDonald

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just noticed in your obituary tribute to Morel the statement that "when the MacDonald Government came in he was appointed liaison officer between the British Foreign Office and the League of Nations."

Unhappily that is quite untrue. Morel was passed over entirely by MacDonald—and passed over without a word of explanation or regret. The last months of his life were for him—as for many others—months of bitter disillusion. He had hoped to find the principles of the Union of Democratic Control translated into practice by a U. D. C. Foreign Secretary. He found them thrown aside in favor of the "principle of continuity." MacDonald's attitudes on Dawes, on Mexico, on Egypt were successive blows to him. So was the fact that only a revolt of the back benches, in which he played a very important role, secured the signing of the Russian treaty. Of the "affaire Zinoviev" I cannot speak, for I did not see Morel after the election. But I can imagine how he would have felt the new humiliation of MacDonald's hyper-Curzonian note.

Morel would have hated that he should be thought in any way responsible for MacDonald's foreign policy or that he held any official appointment in or under a government of which he was an untiring critic whenever it ran counter to the principles for which he had always, and the Prime Minister had sometimes, stood.

London, December 4 W. N. EWER

[Our statement was based on British press reports.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The Average Citizen's Thinking

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Krutch, reviewing in your Holiday Book Number, deprecates any tendency "to simplify the thinking of pacifists as the thinking of the average citizen was simplified by the convenient assumption that the Kaiser was, in his own person, the only remaining obstacle to universal brotherhood."

When did the average citizen make that assumption? As I observed him during the war he had plenty of curses left for Hindenburg, Ludendorff, Tirpitz, the Sultan, and he showed no sign of having lost any of his habitual distrust of the Czar and the Pope. He was quite as likely to accuse the Kaiser of letting himself be made the tool of a camarilla as to accuse him of initiating the crimes. He certainly believed that the existence of such a station as that of emperor, whether in Germany or in Austria or in Russia or in Turkey, was a leading obstacle to universal brotherhood; does Mr. Krutch, or his pacifist, think otherwise?

To show up one's opponents' absurdity by misrepresenting their ideas so as to make them absurd is to vitiate one's own thinking.

STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Ballard Vale, Massachusetts, December 10

Books and Plays

Poems

Quag-Hole

By WHITTAKER CHAMBERS

He waited and, as he waited, grew less eager.
He had come first, believing he was anxious.
The quag lay buried in the darkness at his feet.
The village lights shone far between and meager.

He must not whistle here. His nerves grew tauter.
A wind, that rose among the woods behind him,
Died through the fields. Then silence—broken only
By turtles puddling the invisible bog water.

Then, through a stillness, listening, he heard
Her running on the path, night-terrified
Or eager. And he watched her body slacken
And look for him. She stopped. He never stirred.

But saw how credulously, hour by hour, she stood.
And when, at last, the longing woman went,
He set his face to make the nearest light,
And marched to beat the silence through the wood.

Carib Canoe Under Sail

By GRACE HAZARD CONKLING

Beyond the peacock furrow plowed by the sun,
Where the foam-ridges break and feather to green,
Let the canoe be sharp on aquamarine
With twin sails of split silver. Let her run
Shrewdly along the sea as she has done
So many centuries, supple and lean,
And let those rakish moons of hers careen
And quiver, proud that she is the only one
To wear the wind.
At night from the shore mist
Her moth-wings flutter as they might forsake
The jungle dusk to haunt the harbor-mouth.
Out of its sleep the sea rouses to twist
Lianas of great stars along her wake.
Creature of sea and jungle, she is the south.

Ballad

By CHARLES NORMAN

When Christ came down from Galilee
  He was most plainly clad,
And villages turned out to see
  The look he had.

Christ was a good man, preaching love,
  And brotherhood, and pity;
And so on the hill that stood above
  The towered city,

They nailed him on a cross with two
  Who sinned in other fashion.
And splendidly he died, as do
  Most men of passion.

First Glance

A GOOD deal has happened in the rather small world where poetry is discussed since Matthew Arnold, endeavoring to say once and for all what poetry was, quoted a passage from Pindar and remarked: "Such poetry kills Dryden's the moment it is put near it." We cannot be so sure any more that poetry is a single definable thing, and certainly we have learned that one good kind never kills another. Remembering Arnold's condescension to Dryden, whom he granted a place only among writers of prose and apostles of reason, I derive rich satisfaction from the title of T. S. Eliot's new venture into criticism, "Homage to John Dryden" (London; The Hogarth Press: 3/6). Not only is Mr. Eliot one of the most considerable of contemporary poets; he comes very near to being the clearest and subtlest of contemporary critics. In an earlier volume, "The Sacred Wood," he was somewhat tantalizing through a failure to draw his excellent doctrines into line one with another and so shape a creed, and here also he is content to analyze rather than to legislate. To note this is to acknowledge his intelligence—which never flags; yet one cannot help suspecting that a greater degree of explicitness would have produced a profounder effect. However that may be, Mr. Eliot has perfectly defined Dryden, and in doing so he has justified him.

Mr. Eliot's preferences largely proceed from the dissatisfaction which he feels with the poetry of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. "To enjoy Dryden," he says, "is to pass . . . into a new freedom." For Dryden—and this would have seemed a paradox to Arnold—is one of the most purely poetical of all writers, possessing as he does the power to charge any material, even the most unlikely, with music and to render small things great through the vitality of his touch. It is this touch which Mr. Eliot has set himself to define. The details of his exposition cannot be gone into, though it should be remarked that as he advances he does not shirk the task of disengaging the precise quality of Dryden's wit. "He lacked insight, he lacked profundity," Mr. Eliot concludes. "But where Dryden fails to satisfy, the nineteenth century does not satisfy us either; and where that century has condemned him, it is itself condemned. In the next revolution of taste it is possible that poets may turn to the study of Dryden. He remains one of those who have set standards for English verse which it is desperate to ignore."

Some notion of the kind of poetry which does not fail to satisfy Mr. Eliot may be gained from the two essays which follow in this booklet. The essay on Andrew Marvell is the happiest that we have, and in the essay on the "metaphysical" poets of the seventeenth century Mr. Eliot states more clearly than ever before not only what he likes but what he himself is. He finds Donne and Herbert and Marvell and Cowley standing in the main current of English poetry by virtue of the fact that they "possessed a mechanism of sensibility which could devour any kind of experience. . . . When a poet's mind is perfectly equipped for its work, it is constantly amalgamating disparate experience; the ordinary man's experience is chaotic, irregular, fragmentary. The latter falls in love, or reads Spinoza, and these two experiences have nothing to do with each other, or with the noise of the typewriter or the smell of cooking; in the mind of the poet these experiences are always forming new wholes." The metaphysical poets were satisfactory because they absorbed all of the life about them and without sentimentality gave it forth again. Mr. Eliot adds: "Poets in our civilization, as it exists at present, must be difficult. Our civilization comprehends great variety and complexity, and this variety and complexity, playing upon a refined sensibility, must produce various and complex results. The poet must become more and more comprehensive, more allusive, more indirect, in order to force, to dislocate if necessary, language into his meaning." This is a long way from Dryden, and it is very close to the author of "The Waste Land."

MARK VAN DOREN

Glimpses of Early Religion

Primitive Religion. By Robert H. Lowie. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

NOT since the days of Daniel Brinton has America produced a comprehensive volume on primitive religion. The classical evolutionists always found in the field of religion unexampled opportunities for the application of their doctrines. The content of religious phenomena being elusive and the record of prehistoric religion thoroughly innocent of chronology, it was always possible to find similarities when similarities were sought and differences when these were desired, and to build up stages of development to one's heart's content. But with the rise of ethnographic technique, and the development of more rigorous methods and a wholesome critical attitude toward speculative theories, the ambitious works of the older authors were, one by one, discredited and discarded. The ghost theory of Spencer, with ancestor worship and the emotion of fear as the root of all religion; Jevons's elaborate structure with totemism at its base; Wundt's over-complex even though somewhat more critical scheme; even Durkheim's highly talented but withal speculative interpretation of Australian religion—these were unable to withstand the onslaught of modern ethnological criticism.

But it was easier to destroy the synthetic efforts of an earlier generation than to build up new and equally comprehensive ideological structures. Thus for many years the field of primitive religion presented an aspect forbidding to the layman, for detailed monographs on primitive faiths and rituals do not make easy or entertaining reading. In many ways, then, Mr. Lowie is to be congratulated upon a book which is comprehensive even though selective in scope and popular in form. The author offers four descriptive sketches of types of primitive religion; he then launches into a critique of some of the older students of the subject; and he winds up with a somewhat elaborate discussion of theoretical problems of a psychological and historical nature.

Of the concrete sketches the one on the Crow is easily the best, for here the author's personal intimacy with his data is constantly felt. The sketch of Polynesian religion is somewhat less successful than the other three, as the task of presenting in a brief space the essentials of the religion of so vast a district probably presented insuperable difficulties. The reader will not fail to note the marked subjectivism of Crow religion, with its absence of a rigid dogma or a moral code sanctified by religion; the somber magic and terrifying ghost worship of the African Ekoi; the high development of professional magicians among the Bukaua of New Guinea, among whom the power of these practitioners occasionally rises above that of the gods themselves; the formalism in thought and act in the religions of Polynesia, among whom the worshipers, the priests, the high chiefs, and even the divinities are encased in a rigid framework of ritualistic imperatives.

The critical section is perhaps the least interesting, for the authors here discussed, Tylor, Frazer, and Durkheim, have repeatedly been attacked and the conclusions thus reached have become familiar even to the general public. Still, the major conclusions of the author deserve to be stated: first, the belief in spirits may be a constant but is not an essential characteristic of religion; second, magic and religion differ in the method they adopt in approaching the supernatural, but are united in their common acceptance of it; and third, whatever the importance of the social determinants of religion, it is certain that the basic core of religious life rests in the personal experiences of the individual.

Most of the original contributions of the author to method and theory will be found in the last section. The most valuable point here is the author's insistence on the presence of individual variability in primitive communities. This may be seen in the varying suggestibility of individuals, male and female; in unequal capacity for leadership; in types of memory and imagination. Here Mr. Lowie makes skilful use of some of the findings of experimental psychology, a procedure unusual in anthropological literature. He is happily free from the tendency, common among American anthropologists, of substituting historical explanations for psychological ones: he takes care to point out that every historically formed variant of religious belief and ritual must at some time have originated in an individual psyche and must to that extent be amenable to individual psychological interpretation.

Less satisfactory are the author's ideas on the orientation of religion with reference to sex, art, symbolism, and ceremonialism. The sexual aspect of religious phenomena is dismissed too cavalierly. While it is true enough that the Freudian conception of religion as a sublimation of sex, pure and simple, deserves unstinted condemnation, one cannot afford to disregard the significant similarities between the thrill of a religious experience and that of a sexual one, nor the characteristic association of religious life with orgies of sex indulgence on the one hand and of sex continence on the other. The fact that religious hallucinations usually occur in persons starved not only for want of food but also of sex must be given due weight.

As for art, too much remains unsaid about the power of concrete objects to hold religious associations and the tendency observable everywhere to embellish or mark these objects in an artistic way. But over and above this, the conspicuous part played in later historic religions by architecture and music, especially through the introduction of the crowd psychological element, surely deserves some attention in a book on religion as general as Mr. Lowie's.

In the discussion of ceremonialism the author was misled by his predilection, previously noted by critics, for the purely social or play aspect of rituals. While the presence, interest, and even importance of this phase of ceremonialism will be readily granted, ceremonialism itself may not be dismissed as an "obvious form of religious behaviorism," for it contains in its mechanisms elements that are of the very core of religion. Among these are standardization of form and movement, rhythm—whether of the exaggeratedly slow or exaggeratedly fast type—and the psychologically potent intrusion of the crowd factor. Nothing, again, is said about what Marett called the evaporated emotions consequent upon ritualistic fixation, nor about the power of ritual as such to revivify and even to create anew religious emotion.

In dealing with symbolism the author is certainly right in emphasizing the significance of the historic determinants of locally current symbols, but the very universality of religious symbolism remains unelucidated. Nor is due heed taken of the frequency in such symbolism of the father image, a thesis on which Everett Dean Martin has built his recent book, "The Mystery of Religion." It is also surprising not to find any but the most passing reference to the relation between ritualistic behavior, which is always fortified by religious sanctions, and secular behavior, which is frequently but by no means uniformly so fortified.

The shortcomings noted above are, after all, but slight. The book is certain to have a wide appeal. Sufficiently orderly and systematic to be used as a text, it will attract the general reader by the inherent interest of its data, and it contains enough theoretical wisdom to prove of value to the professional brotherhood.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER

The Perfect City

The Super-City. By Robert Kern. Published by the Author.

MR. KERN is professor of economics and sociology at George Washington University. He is also a little mad. He plans a city where every apartment has space, sunshine, and beauty; where one looks from one's window along noble façades and out over open spaces bright with leaves and gleaming fountains; where there are no elevated trains or subway trains; where all manufacturing is kept to its smoke-eliminated area; where great "servisoriums" with their central kitchens and supply depots cut the labor of housekeeping in half; where the outlying districts are organized in mass-production farming and dairy zones, feeding the city with goods which travel in unheard-of straight lines; where waste and noise and friction have ceased, and one lives unhurried as the gods on Olympus. This city Mr. Kern proposes to build for 20 cents a cubic foot against current metropolitan rates of from 40 to 70 cents. Unfortunately I am not enough of an engineer or architect to know just how mad the author is. But I am enough of a moony sociologist to stand enchanted before the bright spires and pinnacles of his new Atlantis.

He cannot be quite daft, because his analysis of the almost perfect infelicity of New York, say, as a place for human habitation parallels in many respects that of Mr. F. L. Ackermann, an engineer and architect of the highest qualifications. When he says he can get more people on less land cover, with less crowding, by exercising a little advance intelligence, I know that he is only following in Mr. Ackermann's accredited footsteps. He writes with just a trifle too much assurance and too much sweetness and light: Come children, let us inspect this beautiful new home of ours . . . walk right along . . . everything is provided for. . . . If only real cities could be built so readily! The Super-City calls for a fresh start; a bare, clean tract of land, with, so far as I can make out, the laws of property in rigid abeyance. It calls for more foresight and intelligent community-control than any group of people has possessed since the days of the Incas of Peru—who built a lot of supercities along the western ridges of the Andes. Its engineering I suspect is mainly sound, but its social psychology is pretty terrible. Still, when Mr. Kern selects his site—and he will have to be a fast worker to beat the Babbitts to it—I will pick up stakes and join him. Such a brave, mad dream is worth losing a dozen jobs in the canyons of New York for, any day.

STUART CHASE

All Are Swine

Some Do Not. By Ford Madox Ford. Thomas Seltzer, Inc. $2.

IF it was the single purpose of Mr. Ford in "Some Do Not" to describe, or perhaps invent, the waste barrenness of English bureaucracy and English women, he has no doubt sought and found an angry accomplishment. If you are prepared to accept the world offered by Mr. Ford as any typical world of English society you can hardly deny the confused strength of his indictment. Even though he appears in hardly more than a dozen author's comments in the course of the narrative, he seems to transfer to his characters a bitterness which does not logically belong to their natures. They all suffer a kind of vicarious atonement for Mr. Ford's own distemper. What happens to them is pretty bad, and from first to last they are all very definitely annoyed. Yet their personal tragedies and their manifest anger do not always spring either from a temperamental ill-humor or from an enforced disillusion. Unlike the characters in Mr. D. H. Lawrence's greater novels they are torn not so much by a splendid fury as by a need of obscure irony. They unpack their bosom of curious words which flow black and muddy from a core of corrupted purity.

Some rest on snowy bosoms; some do not. Christopher Tietjens never finds his eventual snowy bosom. He has been tricked into marriage by a woman who already bore another's child under her heart. His astounding memory for miscellaneous information (he has learned by rote most of the Encyclopaedia Britannica) is utilized by a cynical bureaucracy to float disingenuous schemes of public finance. His wife runs away with another man, returns without repentance, and tortures him at her leisure. He goes about shouting that most men and all women are swine, and is rewarded with important jobs. The one pure love of his life never becomes an established fact. For all his innocence he is slandered, cheated by his bank so that he must resign from his club, humiliated by his wife in private and public. During the war an exploding shell destroys most of the brain cells which once so completely housed corroborative detail about any subject that rose in any conversation on anything all the way from taxes to architecture. He is reported to have had a child by a woman who in reality is having an affair with a man Tietjens has raised to eminence. At the last he returns to the war without even the hope that he may come back to his one pure love. No one except her fine soul has understood the incorruptible chastity of his mind.

Like all chaste minds, that of Tietjens displays an abnormal curiosity about the darker sins of sex. Like the irascible Lear ridden by an obscene vision of a lustful world, Tietjens breaks out into sudden tempests of an incomprehensible rage wherein the world shows darkly through a risen fume of sex. He is a chaste Circe who turns all women into swine and all swine into men. Somehow the rage appears to rise not from a desperate horror of the world but from a source unrevealed even in the long pages Mr. Ford gives to his anger. All the characters are broken and spent with an anger which does not belong to their natures even where you are quite prepared to accept those natures. Admitted that Tietjens never found his snowy bosom, he should not therefore see all feminine bosoms as giving refuge to the unsleeping worm. He exclaims: "Not a woman in the country who won't let you rape her after an hour's acquaintance!"; and you protest that not even his wife's treatment of his love would inevitably suggest to him so extensive a conclusion about English maidenhood.

A. DONALD DOUGLAS

Books in Brief

Germinal. By Emile Zola. Edited with a Preface by Ernest A. Vizetelly. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

The Dram-Shop. By Emile Zola. Edited with a Preface by Ernest A. Vizetelly. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

The first two volumes of a projected edition of Zola based upon the standard English translation.

Johnson's Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland and Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides. Edited by R. W. Chapman. Oxford University Press. $4.20.

A valuable because convenient edition in one carefully prepared volume of two rival records of a famous journey.

P. Ovidi Nasonis Tristium Liber Secundus. Edited with an introduction, translation, and commentary by S. G. Owen. Oxford University Press. 85 cents.

A masterly edition of Ovid's most personal and, in a way, his most interesting poem.

The Rise of the Greek Epic. Third edition, revised and enlarged. Oxford University Press. $4.70.

A standard work on the origins of Homer, enlarged by the addition of historical material.

Diary of Samuel Pepys. Deciphered by the Rev. J. Smith. With notes by Richard Lord Braybrooke. With an introduction by Guy N. Pocock. Thirty-four drawings by Major Benton Fletcher, and many contemporary portraits. E. P. Dutton and Company. 2 vols. $6.

Though the text of this Pepys remains far from complete, the charming illustrations—numerous, if a little too neat—make the edition necessary to a Restoration collector.

Songs and Sonnets of Pierre de Ronsard. Translated into English verse with an introductory essay and notes by Curtis Hidden Page. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

A welcome reprint, in the four-hundredth year after Ronsard's birth, of the only sizable volume presenting the poet in an English version.

Travels of Carl Philipp Moritz in England in 1782. A reprint of the English translation of 1795. With an Introduction by P. E. Matheson. Oxford University Press. $1.20.

Readers of Austin Dobson will know this naive yet sensible German travel-book for one of the most entertaining accounts of late eighteenth-century England in existence. It now takes its place in that admirable series, The Oxford Miscellany.

The Acropolis of Athens. By M. Schede. Translated from the German by H. T. Price. Berlin: Schoetz and Parrhysius. 11/6.

Elaborately illustrated and carefully composed, this volume offers an agreeable introduction to the available knowledge concerning the hill upon which Athene reigned for a thousand years.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers its fifth annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest follow:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Monday, December 1, and not later than Wednesday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 11, 1925.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

WINNERS of the

PRIZE REVIEW

Contest for

THE PEOPLE'S CORPORATION

by King C. Gillette

1st Prize, $500.00
MR. STUART CHASE of the Labor Bureau
New York, N. Y.

2nd Prize, $250.00
MR. GEORGE SOULE
of the Labor Bureau
New York, N. Y.

3rd Prize, $100.00
MR. NORMAN THOMAS of the League of Industrial Democracy
New York, N. Y.

4th Prize, $50.00
MR. HARRY SALPETER
New York, N. Y.

5th Prize, $50.00
MR. RALSTON FLEMMING
Norfolk, Va.

6th Prize, $50.00
MR. J. N. AIKEN of the Virginian Pilot
Norfolk, Va.

In addition to the cash prizes the next 100 winners each receive a volume from the Modern Library selected by them.

BONI & LIVERIGHT GOOD BOOKS 61 WEST 48th STREET NEW YORK, N.Y.

The Pulse of the World

The busy reader wants to get at the gist of affairs and the real facts of what is going on in the world with directness and without circumlocution.

The view of the world and its doings gathered from the reading of indiscriminate magazines and newspapers is necessarily partial and imperfect.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

is specially edited to give the reader a comprehensive view of the world's salient happenings each week without distortion or suppression of facts.

Its news columns are uncolored by propaganda; its editorial opinion is always unbiased; its reviews of current literature, music and the drama are always illuminating and not hackneyed adulations.

In more than sixty countries readers find that, given a half hour each week, The Manchester Guardian Weekly registers for them the pulse of the world, keeping them in touch with all vital happenings and all important new currents of thought.

MAIL COUPON BELOW

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to The Manchester Guardian Weekly, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England, commencing with the current issue.

Name .....

Address .....

Drama

Miscellany

THE qualities which made not a few once famous plays seem classics of the new drama were qualities which belonged to the infancy of the modern theater. Not so many years ago veracity and honesty seemed in themselves enough to make a play distinguished, simply because neither was familiar. To set down grim facts, to look frankly at the injustices of society, and to imitate as accurately as possible the unromantic aspects of humble life was to issue a challenge and perhaps to fight a battle. Playgoer and author combined to affirm, the one by writing and the other by admiring, their protest against romantic superficialties. They forgot even to be bored when they might reasonably have been, because, believing that good plays were truthful, they were inclined to consider all truthful plays good—and so for the moment they were. But the new drama is no longer new. The principles for which it fought have been almost universally recognized; no one is surprised at honesty. Accordingly we ask of a play that it shall be sincere to some purpose, that it offer some significant comment; or better still, that it move with an emotion powerful enough to seem new and fresh. Mere propaganda for realism is, like all other propaganda, dead as soon as it is successful, and half of Ibsen, like a part of Shaw, is no more than that. "A Doll's House" and "Widower's Houses" seemed in their day hardly less important than "Ghosts" or "Candida."

Herman Bahr, author of "The Mongrel" (Longacre Theater), was never a first-rate dramatist. A skilful practitioner in various manners, he took up the realistic drama at the height of its career and at the moment when to be veracious and grim seemed enough. Without the genuine passion of those who created the new mode, he turned a clever pen to the description of humble life and as late as 1914 produced the play under discussion. It tells the story of an ignorant peasant who conceives the idea that society has wronged him because it refuses to punish the "murderer" of his only companion—a mongrel cur—and who finally takes vengeance into his own hands. The central character is skilfully conceived and the atmosphere is faithfully reproduced, but the implied criticism of the legal system is modish rather than profound and the whole incident is too slight to sustain the interest of an audience not committed to the enthusiastic support of all naturalism good or bad. Today it seems frankly insignificant.

Mr. Rudolph Schildkraut could sustain, if anyone could, the interest of a contemporary audience in this slow-moving story; yet not even he can make it exciting. His impersonation of the old man, maddeningly pig-headed and yet intensely pathetic, is a remarkably complete piece of character-acting, fertile in its invention and moving in its sympathy; but the character is without development and the result upon the audience is to produce admiration untouched by enthusiasm. Although the play (adapted by Elmer Rice) has been mangled, it is hardly worth while to protest.

Doubtless some of the hits in "Candida" (Forty-eighth Street Theater) are less telling than they were when the play was written, but as a whole it springs into vigorous life in the admirable production given it at a series of special matinees by the Actors Theater. Timely it undoubtedly was, but the timeliness was no more than an accident of its greatness. Neither Morell's socialistic Christianity, Marchbank's impetuous individualism, nor Candida's firm reliance upon something greater than her purity to keep herself faithful to her husband is any longer startling. The genuine emotional power of the piece and the ideas with which it deals keep it perfectly fresh because they are eternally true. Katherine Cornell and Claire Eames have received and deserved the praise of the daily press, but Mr. Richard Bird deserved more credit than he has been given. The role of Marchbanks not only is the most difficult one in the play; it is extremely exacting in its demand for a suggestion of great intellectual and emotional power combined with physical timidity and weakness of the kind commonly thought contemptible. Mr. Bird makes Marchbanks not only credible but likable, and that is no easy accomplishment.

In "The Sap" (Apollo Theater) Raymond Hitchcock reveals very considerable ability as a legitimate comedian in a play which is about as bad as can be conceived. Aside from the presence of Mr. Hitchcock only one thing can be said in its favor. It is so consistently unreal and preposterous that its absurdities never annoy. Upon "Day and Night," produced at David Pinski's new Jewish Theater in the Bronx, I can pass no adequate judgment since I do not understand the language in which it is played. The settings, done in the latest Russian manner, are undoubtedly interesting, and the ensemble acting of the fantastic second act is particularly good.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says:*

THEY KNEW WHAT THEY WANTED—seems to me extraordinarily interesting.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD—emphatically worth the while of any person with the slightest taste for one of the most exquisite creations of the past.

THE GUARDSMAN—Philip Moeller, Alfred Lunt, Lynn Fontanne, Helen Westley, and Dudley Digges have, working together in marvelous harmony, made it one of the current plays indubitably worth seeing.

DESIRE UNDER THE ELMS will be, with one exception, the most moving play seen during the current season.

MINICK—In less than a quarter of a minute from the raising of the curtain, a ripple of laughter announces the fact that the audience has achieved a delighted recognition of itself. "Minick" is a succession of such recognitions.

GROUNDS FOR DIVORCE—has the advantage of having with it Miss Ina Claire, our foremost expounder of that light charm which is not inconsistent with the most complete sophistication.

CONSCIENCE—The spectator can go late and come away early, yet still spend a more profitable evening than the average theatre affords.

WHAT PRICE GLORY?—Unquestionably the finest play of the war which America has seen.

THE LITTLE CLAY CART—Acting strikingly beautiful and impressive. Staging artistically satisfying; a play wholly artificial, yet profoundly moving because it is not realistic, but real.

GREENWICH VILLAGE FOLLIES—Mordkin.

THE SHOW-OFF—An exceedingly veracious, telling play of American life, beautifully observed, admirably acted.

* Excerpts from reviews in The Nation.

Those Who Recognize

that a play excellent enough to extract unusually high praise even from a Nation critic has something behind it deserving encouragement should communicate at once with the

Cherry Lane Players, Inc.
40 Commerce Street, New York
Telephone: Spring 2480

"The Way of the World," by Congreve, now is being played at the Cherry Lane Theatre. Of this play Joseph Wood Krutch said in The Nation: "Emphatically worth the while of any person with the slightest taste for one of the most exquisite creations of the past to seize an opportunity not often afforded."

Please inform me of the plans and purposes of your group of players.

Name .....

Address .....

City .....State .....

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation